Sheriff Principal Bowen: You have indeed, so please forgive a certain rustiness on my part. I have been involved in criminal cases in the High Court during that period, but I have been out of touch with what has been going on in the sheriff court. However, I am accompanied by three members of the team who assisted me with the review, who are well up to speed and more than capable of keeping me right.

The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill contains only a few provisions that arise from the report, because many of the recommendations relate to areas of organisation and practice that do not call for statutory provisions. As you might be aware, the main problem that was identified and addressed in the report was the waste on a large scale of the time of victims, witnesses, police officers and others who are required to appear at trial diets that do not proceed. The report proposed that that be dealt with by the introduction of a system that is in line with High Court practice, whereby cases are indicted to a first diet, with trials assigned only if the case is likely to proceed.

I also wanted first diets to be effective, so I recommended a statutory duty on fiscals and the defence to meet face to face before service of the indictment. That recommendation has not been accepted in its terms, but the new provisions will introduce a statutory obligation to communicate within 14 days after service of the indictment, and will require the lodging of a joint statement of preparations two days before the first diet. I understand the reasoning behind that and I am content with those proposals, although they do not exactly reflect what I recommended.

Beyond that, the remaining provisions in the bill are, in the main, consequential on that change of procedure—in particular, the proposed removal of the 110-day rule and its alteration to 140 days, which might give rise to some issues. That is all that I wish to say at this stage. I hope that that helps to set the scene.

John Finnie: Does your decision that business meetings should be compulsory indicate failure under the existing system?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: In a word, yes. I heard a lot of sheriffs say that they gained the impression that the first time that the Crown and the defence spoke to each other was at the first diet and not before then. I heard from defence solicitors who said that they could not get hold of fiscals and from just as many fiscals who said that they had difficulty in speaking to defence agents when they wanted to. The clearest possible way forward was to place a statutory duty on both parties to communicate.

John Finnie: To what extent did you determine—if you determined it—that demands on staff in the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service contributed to the lack of communication?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: It was difficult to get to the bottom of that. At times, one felt that the cause boiled down to the inappropriate operation of telephone lines—to something as basic as not being able to get through on the phone.

I cannot help but feel that the pressures that the present system generates as a result of all the work and scurrying around that must go on at trial diets—because everything is resolved at the last minute—must have a backlash further down the line. Fiscals who ought to be available to speak about cases at an early stage of preparation are too busy trying to sort them out when they are due to come to trial.

John Finnie: Telephone contact has been raised with me as an elected representative. The situation is similar in Police Scotland, which has a centralised telephone system. Is the issue as stark as that? Do the defence and the fiscal exchange direct line numbers?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: I heard from defence agents that they had been provided with hotline numbers that did not work. That was the position three or four years ago, but I know that communications have improved since then, particularly by email. I would not like to rely too heavily on what I said about my fairly limited communication findings.

John Finnie: Could it be said that you are trying to replicate the High Court model?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: Indeed. Aspects of the High Court model are acknowledged to be a considerable improvement—particularly the fact that trial sittings now proceed. In the main, the trials that are set down now go ahead. The figure is not 100 per cent, but it is a vast improvement on the situation before Lord Bonomy reported. I take the same line.

John Finnie: The High Court system is not without its frailties.

Sheriff Principal Bowen: It is not perfect.

John Finnie: Did you suggest any enhancements on it for the sheriff and jury system?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: The statutory duty to communicate goes beyond the High Court system, as does the written statement of preparation. That structure is more formalised than that in the High Court.

The Convener: I know that an act of adjournment is to be made, but what information do you expect to see in the written statement of preparation to assist in accelerating cases and preventing delays and adjournments?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: That will vary from case to case, but the basic starting point is the witnesses whom parties will require, as not every witness who is on a list that is appended to an indictment ends up giving evidence—far from it. The defence might say that it has not received sufficient information about the interpretation of mobile telephone evidence and that it needs further time to consult an expert or look into that. If there were vulnerable witnesses and special measures were needed to take their evidence, I would expect that to be included. I would also expect to see general issues that relate to forensic evidence and whether the fiscal and the defence have discussed any resolution of the case.

10:15

The Convener: I see that the written record is to be lodged not less than two days before the first diet, although there is shrieval discretion. The bill states:

“The court may, on cause shown, allow the written record to be lodged after the time referred to”.

What would happen if it was not lodged and the sheriff was angry about it and thought, “I’m not exercising my discretion here”? [Laughter.]
The Convener: Oh, believe you me, I have been on the other end of it.

Sheriff Principal Bowen: We agonised long and hard over the question of sanctions, both for the defence and the fiscal, if the document is not lodged, and we came to the conclusion that it was virtually impossible to come up with an appropriate sanction.

It is very much a matter for sheriffs to take a strong line, making it clear that, if that is not done, not only the court but the public will be inconvenienced. They can appeal to people’s consciences on the matter.

The Convener: So you think that the sharp edge of the court’s tongue will suffice.

Sheriff Principal Bowen: That puts it very nicely—yes.

The Convener: That expression was once used to me, which is why I remember it. It is ingrained, although it was directed not at me but at the other party.

Sandra White: I welcome your report, Sheriff Principal Bowen, having been on the sharp end of witnesses, you might say. I am sure that others here have been there, too. The churn and the lack of communication between prosecution and defence need to be dealt with for the sake of victims, witnesses and the general public, so I very much welcome your report.

I understand the point about the compulsory business meetings. Perhaps the word “compulsory” was too strong, but I think that we have to knock a couple of heads together—perhaps that is the wrong phrase—to make sure that people are speaking to each other.

John Finnie talked about replicating the High Court system. However, the Law Society of Scotland has questioned whether a system that works comparatively well in the High Court can be transferred to sheriff and jury courts. Do you have any comment on that? Are there any other reforms that might produce a culture of knocking heads together in the judiciary to stop the churn in the courts?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: First, in my view, there is a lot to be said for sheriff and jury procedure and High Court procedure being the same. We have a summary system of justice and a solemn system of justice. Purely from the point of view of professional familiarity, it makes sense not to subdivide solemn procedure again and to have different types of procedure for the two courts.

Secondly, the culture that you speak about should plainly be common to both courts. A number of cases start life on petition and one does not know whether they will be heard in the High Court or in a sheriff and jury court, so there has to be a degree of common approach in all cases.

The third factor is in fact a joint factor. Not so long ago, the sentencing power of sheriffs was increased from two years to five. It is likely that, when the wider reforms that were proposed in Lord Gill’s review go ahead, a much larger volume of cases will be dealt with by sheriffs. The fact of the matter is that, at the top end of the sheriff and jury scale, in terms of seriousness and complexity, there is not much to choose between the cases that go through that court and the cases that proceed in the High Court. The argument in favour of making the two systems pretty much the same is quite compelling.

Sandra White: I would like to do that, actually.

Margaret Mitchell: Having been on the Justice 1 Committee when the Bonomy reforms were first considered, I was supportive of the preliminary hearing to ensure that everything was in place and ready to go to trial. However, some concerns have been expressed about how practical it would be to replicate the system in sheriff and jury cases, given that the numbers of solemn cases are much higher in the sheriff courts. For example, last year, 691 people were found guilty in the High Court compared with 4,298 who were found guilty under solemn procedure in the sheriff courts. Does that huge difference in volume cause any concerns about whether it is practical to undertake the compulsory business meeting?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: When one starts to look at volume, one gets a picture of an even greater problem in the sheriff court and of the time wasted when trials do not go ahead. The numbers are quite revealing. Off the top of my head, I think that we were talking about expecting something like 1,200 cases out of 8,000 to go on. The difference is huge. The downtime—the time when the sheriff court programme is set aside for sheriff and jury trials that do not take place—is considerable. I think that I have a figure for that somewhere. [Interruption] I will find it.

If more of that wasted time was devoted to preparing cases, that is to say, if the maximum effort went in at the earlier stage, the overall saving in not only court time but witness inconvenience time would more than justify the fact that more time would be spent at the first diet and preparation stage—that would be inevitable—but that is the improvement in the system. There were 1,750 days programmed in Glasgow in 2009 and only 780 days were used. That is an awful lot of court time that had to be moved at the last minute and could be used much better at a different stage of the programme.

The Convener: Sheriff principal, other members of the panel can give evidence if they wish or provide data. It is just an evidence-taking session, so anyone can speak.

Sheriff Principal Bowen: Thank you.

Margaret Mitchell: Are you saying that, instead of tabling everything automatically and discovering at the last minute that there was no case to answer, there would be a much more realistic prospect of everything being in place? Is the answer to the huge volume that the same number of cases will not appear?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: I am happy to accept the view that the volume means that a lot of time will be spent at first diets and that that will have to be managed, but my answer is that it will save a lot of time further down the line.

Margaret Mitchell: Is there any resource implication? Does the closure of sheriff courts create any additional pressure?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: There must be a resource pressure on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service to change the way that it approaches matters. In preparing the report, I got a great deal of support from the COPFS and its response to the report was positive. I understand that it is still behind the proposals so, whatever the resource implications for it are, it is prepared to address them in the interests of efficiency.

I am sorry, what was the second part of your question?

Margaret Mitchell: Will the sheriff court closures have an impact?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: I do not think that there is any significant implication in that the courts that are scheduled for closure are, in the main, those with a low volume of sheriff and jury business, whatever else they might have done. Under the proposals in the Gill review, the movement towards centralised sheriff and jury business is inevitable. Indeed, as I understand it, the Crown Office has reorganised its system to make it more centralised. I do not think that changes in the sheriff and jury system raise any issues in terms of the court closure programme.

The Convener: I noticed that the panellists were in the public gallery when we were dealing with criminal legal aid earlier. It may not be within the remit but, broadly speaking, would there be any savings to criminal legal aid if we stopped having so many delays?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: I would not like to put money on that. I think that there will be substantial savings in the amount of money that is paid out to witnesses who turn up needlessly and the amount of police overtime—that sort of area. I would not like to make a prediction about legal aid.

The Convener: There may very well be savings to other areas of the criminal justice system.

Sheriff Principal Bowen: I would be very disappointed if there were not.

The Convener: Apart from more accelerated justice.

Sheriff Principal Bowen: Yes.

The Convener: Mr Bonnar, you are nodding.

Gerry Bonnar (Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure): I am nodding. I am looking at paragraph 7.16 of the report, in which we calculated the numbers of witnesses who might be saved attendance, depending on several models. If an average of three witnesses were cited per case, we calculated that 7,224 witnesses might be saved from citation—if saved from citation is an appropriate way of describing it. If the average was five witnesses, just over 12,000 would be saved from citation and it would be almost 17,000 if the average number of witnesses per case was seven. Those figures were based on assumptions—

The Convener: I feel an arithmetical problem coming on, in which we multiply all these witnesses by some figure and come out with another figure. We are not doing that just now. Do you have that figure? Do you have an idea?

Gerry Bonnar: Paragraph 7.16 of the report sets out potential numbers of witnesses—

The Convener: But not in cash.

Gerry Bonnar: Not in cash; no. Sorry.

The Convener: That is the bit that I am thinking about. We can do that later.

Gerry Bonnar: Further modelling would—

The Convener: Yes, but there is obviously a real cost saving in this, and I presume that there is a saving in court time and sheriffs' time. Is there?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: I would like to think that they would be doing something else.

The Convener: Heaven forfend! I thought that you were away knitting or something instead.

Sheriff Principal Bowen: I am sure that their time would be filled. They would be more productive, because they would not be sitting in their chambers, waiting to find out whether or not a case was going to start.

The Convener: Yes. I hasten to say that I have not seen knitting pins in sheriffs' chambers. That was just a metaphor for time passed casually.
John Pentland: Sheriff Principal Bowen, you said that you were two and a half years out of the system. Please excuse me if you are feeling a wee bit rusty. I advise you that I am 20 years out of the steelworks and if you think that you are rusty, how do you think I feel? [Laughter.]

In your report you recommend the establishment of a compulsory business meeting and you advise that that would be appropriate. Should sanctions be applied if people fail to attend compulsory business meetings?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: The compulsory meeting recommendation was not picked up in the bill. Instead, there is a statutory obligation to communicate—whatever way you do it—and I can see the thinking behind that. I am quite happy with it.

In my answer to the question about the lodging of the joint statement of the state of preparation I spoke about sanctions. We also wondered about sanctions for not communicating and again came to the conclusion that it was a matter for sheriffs to take a firm line and point out that the obligation to communicate is a professional statutory duty and that it would let everybody down not to do it.

By and large, everyone I spoke to in the profession appreciated that it was the right thing to do. It is not something that is being forced on defence solicitors or fiscals; they want to do it. I do not have the notion that they will say, “This is all too much,” although resource problems are possible. I hope that, with the enthusiasm that the Crown Office has shown, it will pick that up without difficulty.

John Pentland: If that is picked up, do you believe that the evidence that is used in the business meetings could be taken to court?

10:30

Sheriff Principal Bowen: It will not be evidence as such, although areas of agreement that are reached at the business meeting might then be put before the court formally. Usually, there is a joint minute of agreement that sets that out, which in itself avoids the need for witnesses to come forward. So part of the benefit of the process will be the early identification of the areas that can be agreed without the need to call witnesses to deal with them.

Roderick Campbell: Do you foresee any difficulties in changing the culture of defence solicitors, fiscals or the shrieval bench in relation to the provision?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: With fiscals, there should be no difficulty, because they are very much in favour of it. The defence agents who were involved in the review, particularly those from the Glasgow Bar Association, were all in favour of early engagement, so I do not think that there will be a difficulty with them.

Sheriffs also see the need to resolve cases early. There will have to be a change of programming because, at present, in some courts, sheriffs hear up to 40 first diets a day. That will not be possible with the system that I propose. I have indicated that each first diet needs at least 15 minutes. So if the day is not to be unbearable, the number of first diets will have to be brought down to 20 or fewer—18 is probably realistic. Given the sheriffs’ acknowledgement of the benefits of the system, provided that they get the time to do it, I think that they will happily do their best to make the system work.

Roderick Campbell: So you do not foresee difficulties in ensuring that the written record of the state of preparation is lodged timeously. Will it be down to sheriffs to try to ensure that it happens in practice?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: If there are difficulties, pressure can be brought to bear, although I would like to think that doing so in open court would be the last resort. In the course of the review, I visited a number of sheriff courts. In the one that was working the best—I am happy to flatter the sheriffs there by saying that it was Kilmarnock—there was a good working relationship between the sheriffs, the fiscals and the local bar. In my view, they all pulled together well. That is the sort of local co-operation that I see as necessary to make the system work, and the proposals in the bill will help people to do it.

Roderick Campbell: How will we measure success and when should the system be evaluated?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: The only true measure of success will be when every single sheriff court jury trial that is set down for trial proceeds to a conclusion. We will never quite get to that, because some people will always change their minds when they get to the door of the court, but if we have a marked reduction in the figures that we have mentioned this morning on wasted time at trial diets, the system will have succeeded.

Gerry Bonnar: For completeness, I add that chapter 10 of the report makes recommendations on monitoring and evaluation.

The Convener: We will of course speak to the participants in the process in the next panel.

Margaret Mitchell has a question. She has told me that it is very short, so this is a test—I want to know whether it is short. Sandra White is the master of short questions.

Margaret Mitchell: Okay.
Sheriff Principal Bowen, you recommended increases in the time limits for various stages of solemn cases. In effect, that was because people cannot pack in more and prepare effectively without that. In an ideal world, would you have preferred the resources to be increased to meet the current time limits?

Sheriff Principal Bowen: The obvious answer is yes, but it is difficult to see that happening. The starting point in Scotland is the time limit that Lord Bonomy referred to as the jewel in the crown, which is the fact that we do not keep people in custody for more than 80 days without telling them what the charges are. The indictment has to be served within 80 days. When you think about it, in a case of some complexity, that is a very short interval of time. It is what follows from that that necessitated the recommendation that the 110-day limit be raised to 140 days.

In the current climate, in which cases are far more complex because of things such as DNA analysis, mobile telephone analysis and closed-circuit television, it is difficult to see how our timescales could be any shorter. To keep the 110-day limit, we would have to reduce the 80-day limit, which I do not think is possible.

Margaret Mitchell: That is helpful.

The Convener: That was quite a short question, although not the shortest.

I thank our witnesses for their evidence. I suspend the meeting for five minutes.

10:36

Meeting suspended.

10:41

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome to the meeting our second panel on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: John Dunn, procurator fiscal, west of Scotland, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service; Grazia Robertson, member of the Law Society criminal law committee, Law Society of Scotland; Michael Meehan, Faculty of Advocates; and Cliff Binning, executive field services, Scottish Court Service. Good morning to you all.

Margaret Mitchell: What are the implications of this reform for the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service?

John Dunn (Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service): The implications for us include the opportunity to allow us to focus on the cases that actually require to go to trial, in the same way as we did in the High Court; the opportunity to reduce the number of witnesses who are brought to court; and the opportunity to have cases brought to trial on the first occasion, which will minimise inconvenience to witnesses and jurors.

There is also the opportunity to learn from the lessons of what happened in the High Court. I do not think that we can replicate that experience, because there is a different order of business in the High Court and in the sheriff and jury courts. However, we can be informed by the experience of what happened in the High Court, which Mrs Mitchell will remember from the Justice 1 Committee.

If we compare where we were with where we are now, there has been a very significant change. You will recollect that before Lord Bonomy started his report, 1,605 cases—at the highest and worst point—were indicted into the High Court per annum. There are now, on average, 750 cases being indicted into the High Court per annum and in 300 of those cases, evidence is required to be led in a trial. If we can capture a proportion of that in the sheriff and jury courts, where we get roughly 6,000 cases per annum, that will be a good place to be.

Margaret Mitchell: A number of witnesses in their written evidence have cited the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service as being particularly under pressure, yet when we hear evidence directly from the COPFS there seems to be a reluctance to say that there is any pressure on resources. There are quite diametrically opposed views on that point.

John Dunn: We are living in times in which there is a requirement to make public sector savings, which inevitably puts pressure on us all. However, we have attempted to deal with that pressure by organising ourselves in such a way that we can cope with it. In the past—if I look at what I used to do back in 1989—I would do a little bit of this and a little bit of that. I would do some case marking, some summary trials, some sheriff and jury trials and some High Court preparation work. I was a jack of all trades and arguably the master of none.

We are now organised along lines of federations, or larger groupings of what used to be 11 areas. Within the federations, we are organised along functional lines so that we do a proportion of business that allows for some specialisation. There is pressure, but we have dragooned ourselves in such a way that we can try to accommodate that pressure in light of the savings that we have all had to make.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to come in on that? Mr Binning?

Cliff Binning (Scottish Court Service): No.
The Convener: You should not make little movements with your hands because I see you and think that you want to come in.

10:45

Michael Meehan (Faculty of Advocates): I was a full-time advocate depute for three years, which involved me preparing High Court cases for preliminary hearings. A point that has been made by all is that the scale is very different. In a four-week preliminary hearings cycle, an advocate depute will spend two weeks preparing cases and there will be two weeks in which hearings will take place but they will not be in court every day. On average, I prepared between 10 and 15 cases. That might seem to be a small number, but there could be five drugs cases with a huge number of productions, or murder cases in which every detail is very important. Even with that size of case load, the person who was preparing the case would have to read every single page of the productions and witness statements. That means that when we were speaking to the defence, we knew the case back to front when we were agreeing evidence and negotiating a plea.

A difficulty with the sheriff and jury model is that it seems highly unlikely that there could ever be a fiscal depute who was involved in dealing with sheriff and jury cases having that number of cases. If someone is not so well apprised of a case because of the sheer volume of cases that they have had to prepare, it is not so easy to discuss a case or conduct negotiations.

I have heard it said that it is only at the trial diet, when the fiscal who will prosecute the sheriff and jury case has watched the CCTV or has gone over the papers in that detail, that the plea has then been agreed. I am sure that the committee is aware, although it is not always apparent from discussion, that the impression is given of the defence suddenly offering to plead guilty, or the accused changing his mind. Sometimes there is more of a middle ground in which, perhaps because the evidence has been scrutinised more carefully or even because Crown witnesses do not turn up, and they were not expected to turn up, a plea is negotiated at the trial diet that would not have been accepted at an earlier stage.

Grazia Robertson (Law Society of Scotland): I wanted to say on behalf of the Law Society of Scotland that the suggestion of meeting and attempting to resolve resolvable cases would help the defence solicitors to know which cases to prepare for by way of a trial and give them some knowledge of when that trial might take place. At the moment, it is often unclear whether a trial that is allocated to a sitting will take place during that sitting or whether it might require to be adjourned to a later date. In our response, therefore, we have said that we support the measure.

However, it would be unfair if we did not indicate that the resource implications are not a minor factor. To enable the measure to serve the purpose for which it is intended, there will have to be proper resourcing. If it is not properly resourced, there could be further delay in the system. The clear suggestion is that if the sheriff is not satisfied that both parties are prepared for trial, he will not fix a trial diet. If both parties come to their first diet not fully prepared, there could be further delays in the system, which is why the Law Society’s responses emphasise the financial implications while taking on board the earlier comments about the financial reality in which we are now working, and the changes that that has imposed on us over the previous years.

Margaret Mitchell: Would that be true for the defence and the COPFS?

Grazia Robertson: I would say so, yes. Both have to be properly resourced and organised in such a way that we can meet requirements. I find the suggestion that we need our heads to be knocked together quite understandable, especially having heard what Sheriff Principal Bowen said. However, when John Dunn is sitting in his fiscal's office and I am sitting in my defence lawyer's office, we are not having a coffee and wondering what to do next. We are, in our own ways, endeavouring to resolve cases that are resolvable, and to prepare those that are not resolvable to ensure that we can proceed to trial. There are difficulties with the suggestions that have been made, but we recognise their benefit with regard to meeting at the appropriate time and identifying those cases.

Margaret Mitchell: Convener, I am concerned that we are hearing evidence from the COPFS that it is managing perfectly well, whereas we are hearing from others that that is not necessarily the case.

The Convener: We heard an interesting point about the preparation of a case, in that it might be a different member of the PF team who deals with a case as it goes through. I am referring to what Mr Meehan said. When an advocate is handed a case, they will read it inside out, but it might sometimes be the case—perhaps I have got this wrong—that the party who is dealing with the case for the Crown, on the PF's side, might first get a good look at the papers only when the trial is staring them in the face, whereas the other people will already have looked at them. Is that the case? Would there be lots of fingers in the pie before the case reaches trial?

John Dunn: We aspire to minimise the number of fingers in those pies, as it were. It is not always the case that the same person will be able to deal with the case from cradle to grave. Glasgow sheriff court is the busiest court by a long chalk. We are trying to organise ourselves into teams so that the case preparers sit on the same team as the case prosecutors. It is inevitable that there will be many instances in which it is not possible to have the same people dealing with a case from start to finish—all that we can do is to maximise the chances of it being the same person.

The Convener: That is helpful to know. However, will the provisions in the bill concentrate minds? When somebody is looking at the papers for a prosecution, and it seems likely that the case will go to trial, that can attract a more concentrated focus, because the statement or record has to be lodged within a certain time. That draws things together. I am not saying that there is a question of things being slipshod, or of tardiness, in the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, but perhaps the provisions will concentrate minds more, so that the case has to be sharp and the focus has to be brought earlier.

John Dunn: Your comment is fair. That represents a change in ethos and in the way in which we undertake our preparation for cases. Previously, sheriff and jury cases were prepared with the purpose of reporting to the Crown Office, and there were instructions from the Crown counsel on indicting the case. Essentially, there was a report to someone else to get their permission to indict the case. Nowadays, our case preparation involves a living document, which is prepared as if it were a trial document, so as to try applying that focus—preparing for trial if there is one.

If all that happens as a consequence of the measures in the bill is that we add another layer of procedure without changing anything else, it will not work. We must change the culture. From June 2012 to June 2013, 769 cases were resolved by plea at the trial diet, which was 16 per cent of the case load. If the only thing that we do is to move a proportion of those pleas, if not all of them, to an earlier stage, that must create capacity to focus on the cases that are actually trials. All the things that we need to do—checking where the witnesses are, citing them, checking which evidence is actually required and seeing what can be agreed—are good things to apply to cases that will go the distance and which will involve witnesses giving evidence in court. It is a matter of focusing the issues.

The tools are all there, in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995: section 257 on the agreement of evidence, section 258 on statements of uncontroversial evidence, and defence statements under section 78. It is not for me to comment on judicial management, but it is well known that part of the culture is to apply the same sheriff management to sheriff and jury cases as now applies in the High Court.

Sandra White: I am interested in what you have just said about changes to the culture, and I was going to ask a question about that. I will not talk about knocking heads together, but—

The Convener: You have just done it again.

Sandra White: Yes; I will do it again anyway. When I am out and about in Glasgow, that is what people mention to me in this regard.

The Convener: Now you are blaming Glasgow.

Sandra White: No, no—I am talking about members of the general public being called to be witnesses in many weeks’ time. That is a resource matter as far as I and others are concerned. I will return to the subject of resources in a minute.

Regarding the change in the culture, you have all agreed that holding the early meetings is correct, and that you can move along with that. Can you suggest anything else that would improve the culture between prosecution and defence lawyers who get together?

John Dunn: There are three things that will make that work. One is disclosure, which I hope that we are now on top of given that we have the secure disclosure website. It means that we are better at disclosing a case in earlier course to keep the defence informed about the case and its strength from the Crown’s perspective.

The second thing is the opportunity of deploying a sentencing discount under section 196 of the 1995 act. A five-year sentence is a long time in anyone’s view, and if the chances are that someone will get a third off that sentence if they plead guilty, they might find that an opportunity worth seizing.

We have spoken about early engagement, and heard about fiscals not getting defence agents and vice versa. I can sit here next to Grazia Robertson and we can throw pebbles at each other about how we cannot get in touch, but that will not help at all. We need to move forward constructively, which we are trying to do by having hotlines and advertising that service more widely so that people know who they can contact.

Another thing that we must do—and which we already do with the Faculty of Advocates in relation to the High Court—is ensure that the compilation and submission of the written record, which will contain sensitive information about vulnerable witnesses, is done securely. The Faculty of Advocates is almost universally signed up to the criminal justice secure email system, and we are trying to roll out the system to different practitioners at the sheriff and jury levels. Again, I can sit here and tell the committee that our take-up rate is low, but we need to look at the reasons for that. Are there practical difficulties that explain that? The answer is yes.

We put quite a lot of effort into assisting defence firms in operating the secure disclosure system, and that has borne fruit, so I suggest that we will have to do the same with criminal justice secure email. One practical issue—we had not appreciated it at first—is that if someone signs up to criminal justice secure email and starts using it, and then stops using it for a month, their account is suspended. Those are the sort of things that we must appreciate and engage on to get them sorted out.

Again, there is the simple expedient of using the telephone, and ensuring that people know who they can contact in order to talk about the case. In the immediate aftermath of the accused’s first appearance, the case preparer will now write to the nominated solicitor who is engaged in the case to identify themselves and say, “This is my direct line, and this is my solemn manager”, and to begin to canvass the outlines of what might be an acceptable plea.

That is very early in the process—probably too early for anything meaningful to be discussed—but the information is there in early course. Where that starts to move slightly adrift in a jurisdiction such as Glasgow is where the case goes into the court system with regard to the sitting arrangements and knowing who has the case. Again, we have to work on that so that people know who to speak to, because communication is everything.

The Convener: Perhaps Mr Binning can comment. Does the Scottish Court Service have a role in that regard as part of a triangle that includes the defence, the prosecution and the court?

Cliff Binning: I would not necessarily see SCS personnel playing an active facilitation role in that particular context.

I reinforce what Sheriff Principal Bowen and others said earlier. In the context of programming the business of the courts, we seek to ensure the expeditious disposal of business and the best use of available court time. Both of those things are predicated on having the best level of certainty that is possibly achievable at the first diet, which covers certainty of intention as to the plea, and certainty of preparation and of length. The greater the level of certainty in those respects, the more effective the programming of the core business will be with regard to achieving those objectives.

The Convener: Who sets up the criminal justice secure email that you have?

John Dunn: We sponsor it.

The Convener: We all use email, attachments and so on for committee business. Will the record be lodged as an attachment in e-form?

I wanted to bring in the SCS so that I could hear about the communication between you, and whether you can say, “Yes, we are ready and this is here—we can send it as an attachment or an email. This is what we are putting down as a record and what we have as a minute of agreement, and it is all going in.” Is that all in train?

11:00

John Dunn: It is all in train in the High Court, I believe. I think that the written record is submitted electronically in the High Court, and that is the aspiration that I would have for the sheriff and jury courts as well.

The Convener: Yes. Why is that not the case? What is the problem?

John Dunn: We do not yet have written records to submit. The issue is that the extension of the secure email to the defence community is at an early stage. It has not been without its practical difficulties, one of which is that the system is owned not by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service but by the Ministry of Justice, which means that we do not have complete control over it. However, that should not prevent us from working on the issues that are preventing people from communicating, so that we can do so securely. I reiterate that the communication has to be secure.

The Convener: Of course. We appreciate that. The information is sensitive and cannot be in the public domain.

Grazia Robertson: In our written submission, we said that, in the High Court, the Crown submits what is, in effect, its bit of the closed record and then we do the same from the defence perspective. It is not a collaborative bit of work to produce the one document.

The Convener: No, but any minute of agreement following on from that would have to be collaborated on, obviously.

Grazia Robertson: Yes. However, I should emphasise that, with regard to putting in the record, the Law Society had indicated that a system that was akin to that of the High Court system, where each party puts in its record in turn, rather than having to meet and do that together, would be slightly more sensible than the other way that has been proposed. That is just a practical concern. We are saying that, if we use the same system that the High Court uses for the lodging of the closed records—that is, the lodging of the records—that would assist. That was me getting my terminology mixed up.

The Convener: I was thinking that.

Michael Meehan: I would make very much the same point that Grazia Robertson has made. The practice in the High Court is that each party puts in its own written record. I think that the Crown’s one is called schedule 1 and the defence’s is called schedule 2. The Crown will set out in schedule 1 its position with regard to a variety of matters—vulnerable witness applications, agreement of evidence, what technology is required by way of video recorders, whether interpreters are required and so on. Each accused—it is worth bearing in mind that there will be cases in which there are multiple accused—will put in their own schedule, which will be circulated electronically. There could be practical difficulties involved in getting everybody together to put in one document and, if you cannot get everybody together, no one can move forward. It would be easier if the prosecution could prepare its document, submit it to the court and copy other people in, and then each defence party did likewise. Under the proposal, if, in a case with five accused people, one of the accused had sacked their legal team or had disappeared, nothing could be done. However, if everyone else could be doing their bit, the process would not be delayed.

It is difficult to see how the system could work as well as it does in the High Court if it were not being done electronically. For example, the Crown will copy in the victim information and advice service when it puts in its written record, so the service will be able to update the complainers about what is going on. That is done easily by simply adding an address on an email.

The Convener: That issue would link into the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill, which we have just passed.

Michael Meehan: Yes.

Cliff Binning: I cannot think of any technological barrier to having the same system in the sheriff courts as is used in the High Court. The technology is there.

Sandra White: I think that we have wandered a wee bit—

The Convener: It was important to tease out the issue, because it is about information sharing.

Sandra White: Absolutely. I would have picked up on some of the stuff—

The Convener: But I pre-empted you.

Sandra White: I would like Grazia Robertson to respond to the question that I asked Mr Dunn about the culture change.

Grazia Robertson: As a defence practitioner who practises in Glasgow, I am not entirely at one with the idea of a culture change. You will have heard Sheriff Principal Bowen saying that, in his investigations and in the preparation of the report, there seemed to be a consensus that it was in everyone’s interests to resolve resolvable cases and properly prepare for those that are going to trial.

It is not that the profession is reluctant to engage; rather, there is a sad realism born out of bitter experience. As the years have gone on and it has become more difficult to resolve cases for a variety of reasons, there is an expectation that matters will not progress. There might be an element of that but, if the systems are properly resourced—I hate to keep going on about that—and implemented, this proposal could work and, if witnesses are not required to attend court unnecessarily and matters can progress at a reasonable pace, there might be savings to the public purse. That is in the interests of everyone, including defence solicitors.

Sandra White: I was going to ask about resources, but you seem to agree that the situation has to improve not just for the courts themselves but for witnesses, victims and the accused.

Grazia Robertson: Yes. It is recognised that it does not help the perception of Scottish justice if members of the public who attend court do not have things explained to them and have to go away and come back again. There is of necessity certain information about a case that cannot be imparted to witnesses and sometimes a full explanation of what is going on has not been given. As a result, people go away with a very poor impression of what has gone on, and the fact that they cannot see what is being done leads to the suggestion that we are all sitting around not doing a great deal.

Additionally, panel jurors themselves might not be used and, as a result, will constantly have to go back and forth to the court. That is very wearing on people and I have sympathy for those people I see day and daily attending court and perhaps having to be sent away. It does not always happen but, when it does, it is unfortunate, and anything that lessens such a situation will benefit everyone.

Sandra White: That is not just a perception but the reality for many people, whether they be jurors or witnesses, who turn up at court and are not called. The trial might go on for six months. In some respects, the Scottish Court Service is very good at giving out information through texts, phone calls and letters, but the problem that most people see is the churn.
With regard to resource implications, Mr Dunn talked about replicating certain practices in the High Court and said that where 1,600 cases were being indicted into the High Court per annum previously, only 750 were being indicted now, and only 300 of those were actually going to court. I would think that bringing the numbers down in the same way in the sheriff court—and, indeed, improving on what has happened in the High Court—would result in a resource saving. After all, those who turn up at court get witness expenses and whatever and any savings that could be made in that respect could be put into having, say, a computerised system. Of course, it is not just about monetary savings but about saving people the bother of having to turn up at court when nothing is going to happen. When you talked about resource implications, were you talking about the computerised system? If we are going to save money from the witness expenses that are paid to people who have to turn up at court, could those savings not be put into other resources?

Grazia Robertson: There must be a system in place not just in Glasgow but elsewhere to ensure ease of communication between the parties. I imagine that the email and computer system will be of significance in that respect, but there are staffing issues to bear in mind, as someone needs to be at the other end of an email to respond to it and communicate with the sender; indeed, defence solicitors are cognisant of their own obligation to engage in that kind of communication.

As for any suggestion that people are not playing their part, the sheriff comes in at the first diet to ascertain what the parties have done and where the problems and issues lie. Each of us has to stand up in court and explain what has happened to date and why matters have not progressed as well as they should have done.

The Convener: Just for clarification, I believe that Mr Dunn said that the Ministry of Justice had ownership of the criminal justice secure email systems. Were you talking about the UK Ministry of Justice, or was that comment simply a slip?

John Dunn: I was talking about the UK Ministry of Justice.

The Convener: Thank you.

John Dunn: I cannot give you the exact detail on that, but what I can say is that we are trying to get better control over the system’s administration to resolve some of the practical issues that defence agents are facing in using it.

The Convener: I do not want to dwell on the matter, but thank you for clarifying the point. The committee might well want to find out more about the system in place and even the historical reasons why the UK has ownership of it when justice is in the main devolved, apart from the international aspects.

Sandra White: I was going to pick up on the same issue, convener, but I think that we also have to get clarity about the resource implications. There seem to be a number of financial resource implications, but I have to say that I have not heard any answers about where the resources are going to come from to cover a member of staff who might, for example, have to open up all these emails. Surely if you stop the churn and have fewer cases going through and therefore have less of a workload and fewer witnesses turning up, the money that would be saved would offset any financial implications further down the line.

As for the matter involving the UK Ministry of Justice, do you know whether the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service pays into that account?

John Dunn: I am not sure—I would have to check.

The Convener: That is why I said that we will have to use our own resources to find out more about why the Ministry of Justice runs the system and how we might bring ownership of it under the demise of the cabinet secretary and his department and expand it out. The discussion has taken an interesting route.

Sandra White: I believe that Mr Dunn wants to talk about the financial implications.

John Dunn: On the point about resources, I have already said that we could reduce our witness expenses and start to reduce the inconvenience to witnesses as a consequence of being repeat cited by ensuring that they come to court only when the case in question has gone through the gateway, if you like, and been deemed fit for trial. In the financial memorandum, that particular element was costed at £128,000 but, to reinforce my earlier comment, I have to say that only adding the compulsory meeting to this and changing nothing else will not be a recipe for success. We need to invest savings in the additional things that we need to do, such as engaging early with the defence, having the compulsory business meeting, compiling the written record and getting ourselves into a state of readiness to ensure that, if the court identifies that the case must be adjudicated through a trial, that happens first time out as far as possible.

Elaine Murray: Two principal differences between the bill and Sheriff Principal Bowen's report are the timing of the compulsory business meeting, which is to happen after the service of indictment, and the lack of a requirement for face-to-face meetings. Sheriff Principal Bowen seemed fairly relaxed about the fact that the bill was different; indeed, he seemed to understand the reasons for those differences. Do you share his relaxation about the differences between the report and the bill?

John Dunn: I have to confess that, as a member of the reference group, I always held the view that the best time for the meeting was after the case had been indicted. Up to that point and until we get Crown counsel’s instructions, we do not have the authority to indict it as a solemn case; in fact, if Crown counsel forms the view that it does not require a jury sentence, it might be reduced to a summary case. Of course, the case might also go to the High Court if it is found to be more serious than had first been thought. We do not know any of that until we get the authority to indict, at which point we know what we are dealing with.

There is nothing wrong with communicating beforehand, but there are certain issues that we cannot address at that point. For example, I would imagine that the first question that an accused person is going to ask themselves when they get the petition, which will not necessarily bear a close resemblance to the charges on the ultimate indictment, is, “What am I being charged with? What am I pleading guilty to?” This approach might work in some cases where there is only one charge but not in others.

Communication is certainly a good thing and stipulating that the compulsory meeting follows the indictment of the case is no bar to people speaking to each other beforehand. It simply means that, at the point at which you are required to communicate and detailed engagement has to kick in, there is a focus, because you know, for example, whether it is a jury case and what the charges are. As a result, I am quite happy with the proposal.

Grazia Robertson: The Law Society supports the timing suggested in the bill as appropriate.

Elaine Murray: Coming back to the financial implications, I think that Mr Dunn mentioned a figure of £128,000. According to the financial memorandum, the total cost of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s provisions is £87,000 a year whereas the possible savings amount to £228,000 a year. Is there any reason for that discrepancy?

John Dunn: I suspect that I am looking at different figures. The figures that I have were submitted by COPFS, which identified savings of £128,000 from witnesses—

Elaine Murray: I am sorry—you were talking about your savings. Overall, the figure is £228,000.

John Dunn: And the figure for admin costs is an additional £6,000.

Elaine Murray: Right. Do you think that the estimates in the financial memorandum are reasonable? After all, they represent a significant overall saving as a result of the proposals.

John Dunn: I think that they are probably realistic, given what we have seen in the High Court but, as I have said, there will be additional costs from additional parts of the business.

11:15

Roderick Campbell: I refer to my entry in the register of interests, which says that I am a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

The bill provides that, although the written record of the state of preparation is supposed to be a joint agreement of the parties, it is the prosecutor who will have to lodge the written record with the sheriff clerk. In practice, will that put extra pressure on the Crown Office to make the running in that procedure? Will it not have significant resource implications?

John Dunn: As Grazia Robertson has referred to, if we are required to have a single document, that could be quite onerous—especially in a multiple accused case. As I understand it, the practice in the High Court is that there are separate written records, or a proportion of the written records are separate—Mr Meehan will correct me if I am wrong. That does not mean that we are all blindsided to what each other has submitted—records will be copied across so that we are all aware of what we are recording as the output of the communication that has been undertaken.

If it were the case that the Crown compiled a single document and was required to chase down every defence agent in a multiple accused case, that could be quite difficult. That is not how I perceive that it would operate in practice. It is not how it operates in practice in the High Court.

Roderick Campbell: Are you happy with how the bill is drafted on this subject?

John Dunn: I think that it is drafted in the same way as legislation for the High Court is. It is my understanding that “jointly”, in essence, refers to an awareness of the contents.

Michael Meehan: I did not check the bill against what is in statute for the High Court. In my evidence earlier I indicated that the practice is that people put in separate written records.

This is fresh legislation. Some minor amendments could take out, for example, references to joint preparation. Subsection (4) of proposed new section 71C of the 1995 act says:

“The prosecutor must lodge the written record with the sheriff clerk.”
Instead of that being a joint written record, it could be an individual written record, and each party would lodge with the sheriff clerk a copy of their written record and intimate a copy to the other parties. Minor amendments could be made to reflect the practice in the High Court.

Mr Campbell made a point about the Crown making the running. Albeit that the position is that there are individual written records, the Crown tends to make the running. The Crown issues its written record to the parties first of all, then others come in. There is no rule that requires the Crown to be first, but very often the Crown written record will be circulated to parties and then the defence party will send a written record to the High Court of Justiciary and copy in the Crown.

The Convener: Roddy, are you referring to the fact that there may be confusion? It looks like that to me.

Roderick Campbell: It is something that we can reflect on.

The Convener: The bill says that the prosecutor and the accused's legal representative will “jointly prepare a written record” and “written record” is singular thereafter, so it can be inferred that one record is being lodged. Is that not the case in those sections?

Michael Meehan: They give that impression. Subsection (2) of proposed new section 71C of the 1995 act talks about what should happen after the meeting.

The Convener: Yes; it says that they will “jointly prepare a written record”.

Michael Meehan: If the word “jointly” was taken out and subsection (2) was amended to say they will “prepare a written record of their respective states of preparation”, that would work well.

The Convener: Thereafter there could be a plural reference to written records. I presume that if there were multiple accused, there would be multiple records, multiple defenders or whatever.

Grazia Robertson: The Law Society comments on the same issue in its written submission. The requirement for a joint written record could be misleading or lead to difficulties.

John Dunn: It has been nuanced in the practice note that the High Court delivered in 2005, which says that parties must prepare a joint “written record of their state of preparation with regard to their cases. The written record must be a joint one, although it may contain separate statements of the prosecutor’s and the accused’s representative’s state of preparation.”

There seems to be a degree of nuancing with regard to how the written record would be submitted.

Roderick Campbell: To refer back to the first panel and to Sheriff Principal Bowen’s comments on the question of culture—without misrepresenting him, I hope—I think that he seemed to take the view that we were at least halfway to achieving culture change, given the attitudes that had been displayed to his review. Does any of you disagree with that view and feel that it will be more difficult in practice to change the culture, or are you content with that view?

John Dunn: It is fair to say that enhanced judicial intervention will bring a rigour to matters, which is evident in the High Court. As to whether that is a bad thing, I suspect not.

The Convener: Does that mean sheriffs taking people into chambers and saying stuff?

John Dunn: Not in chambers.

The Convener: I know that sheriffs would say things in public as well, in front of a busy open court. I am talking about a situation in which both sides might be involved and there was displeasure—I take it that sheriffs would also have a quiet word in the ear as well as saying things in open court.

John Dunn: I spoke earlier about the absence of sanctions in relation to the written record not being submitted and parties not being prepared. The 2005 practice note says that the High Court judge would regard that state of affairs as “unacceptable”. However, the reality is that those provisions have been in place for some eight years now and I am not conscious of there being any occasion when a written record has not been submitted.

Of course, there is a sanction for the Crown, if you remember, because we have time bars that require to be operated to. If we did not comply with the legislation, the court could properly say, “You have a time bar that is about to expire on X date and I am not going to extend it, because you have not done what you should do,” so there is a disciplinary consequence.

The Convener: That would be bad news.

John Dunn: That would be bad news.

Michael Meehan: The written record form that is completed in the High Court has been revamped relatively recently in that, if the parties are not in a position to fix a trial date, they need to give detailed information about when the party was first instructed—about when disclosure was made. That will provide the preliminary hearing judge with detailed information setting out, before the case calls in court, various steps along the way showing what has been handed over.

Both the Crown and the defence forms have changed somewhat relatively recently, so that type of information is available, which will inform the judge. Presumably, if one was to then conduct a review in later years, the forms would contain very useful information about why cases were perhaps not ready to go ahead when they should have been. An act of adjournal perhaps about a year ago changed the form to provide more information.

The advantage of what is contained in the bill about what is to go in the form—I think that it is covered in subsection (6) of proposed new section 71C of the 1995 act—is that it is to be prescribed by act of adjournal. It can therefore be amended as people become used to how it works in practice and find out what works, what does not work, what could be improved, what could be left out and so on.

Grazia Robertson: From the perspective of the Law Society, the written record could also be an opportunity to highlight any problems that emerge with regard to the preparation of cases or any problems from the defence perspective. If we are requiring people to put this information in the document and the document is there for the court to see, if any issues arise in the earlier stage of the preparation of the case, they may be highlighted by the written record. It would be a good opportunity to focus on any problems that might occur.

To take a simple example, if there turned out to be a technological difficulty at some stage with closed-circuit television footage—with regard to having it copied, having it disclosed, checking the quality or having it assessed—that could be highlighted in the written record. It could then perhaps be looked at and addressed. The written record could therefore provide an opportunity for focusing on any issues and resolving them.

The Convener: John Finnie is next with a question.

John Finnie: Thank you, convener—the point has been covered.

The Convener: I am not looking at anybody else so that I can say that I do not see anyone else with a question—I am blinkered in case somebody decides to ask a last gasp question. I thank the witnesses for their helpful evidence, which clarified some points that had not been raised before.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

09:33

The Convener: Agenda item 2 is the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Am I going too fast for you?

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): Just a tad.

The Convener: I will slow down for you, Margaret, until you get your bearings again.

Our next item is to take evidence from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. The cabinet secretary will give evidence on part 1 of the bill, which is on arrest and custody; part 4, which is on sentencing; part 5, which is on appeals and the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission; and part 6, which is on people trafficking, television links and the police negotiating board for Scotland. I remind members to keep to those segments—"segment" is my mot du jour. We will move on to other items next week.

We will start by looking at part 1. We will then have a break to allow officials to change over for parts 4, 5 and 6.

I welcome to the meeting Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice, and Scottish Government officials. Elspeth MacDonald is deputy director, criminal justice division. Lesley—Bagha?

Lesley Bagha (Scottish Government): Bagha. Lesley Bagha.

The Convener: Thank you. Lesley Bagha is the bill team leader. Aileen—oh, somebody should tell me how to say it—Bearhop?

Aileen Bearhop (Scottish Government): Bearhop, yes.

The Convener: There we go. Why can you not have Smith as your name? It is so much easier. Aileen Bearhop is head of the police powers team. Jim—Devoy?

Jim Devoy (Scottish Government): Correct.

The Convener: Gosh. Jim Devoy is policy officer, youth justice. Anne Hampson—you are a good person—is policy officer, victims and witnesses team.

Cabinet secretary, I understand that you wish to make a brief opening statement, after which I will take questions from members, who should be ready with their hands up to get on my list.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill): Thank you, convener. A good new year to you, members and all. I welcome the opportunity to give evidence today on the bill’s provisions relating to arrest and custody, sentencing, appeals and other issues. In this opening statement I will focus on police powers and the rights of suspects.

We all want Scotland to have a modern and effective criminal justice system—one that is fit for purpose and which properly balances the rights of individuals and the duties of the state. I believe that the bill’s provisions will deliver that system. The bill will clarify and modernise police powers of arrest. It will streamline current police powers by moving from detention followed by arrest when a sufficiency of evidence exists to a single power of arrest on suspicion of having committed an offence. The provisions will improve the law and will be easier for the police to apply than those under the current system.

The statutory arrest power will replace the existing complicated landscape of common law and statutory arrest. It will bring the Scottish system more into line with the European convention on human rights, which refers to arrest with initial deprivation of liberty and detention as the period of police custody following arrest.

The bill recognises that modern investigations are often complex and protracted. In line with Lord Carloway’s recommendations, the bill balances the needs of a thorough police inquiry with a suspect’s right to liberty, for example through the introduction of investigative liberation.

The bill’s provisions put Scotland at the forefront of human rights protection. The bill will extend the rights of those held in police custody. Everyone will now have the right to speak to a solicitor, regardless of whether they will be interviewed by the police.

The bill provides greater protections for children and vulnerable persons held in police custody.

The committee has heard evidence from representatives of various organisations involved with the criminal justice system and I have listened to their views and concerns. As a result, I intend to lodge a number of Government amendments to the bill.

One area in which change is needed is to make provision for the release of a person from arrest when the grounds for that arrest cease to exist. That has been referred to in evidence as “de-arrest”. I will lodge an amendment to section 4 to make a de-arrest provision.

I am also aware of police concerns about the 12-hour limit for keeping persons in custody and the need to consider provisions to allow an extension in exceptional circumstances. There is a serious issue here about balancing an individual’s right to liberty against protection of the public, and I continue to listen to all the arguments for potential extension in exceptional circumstances.

Police powers of detention and arrest, both at common law and statutory, have served Scotland well. However, it is time for us to modernise our systems and recognise that modern-day investigations require modern-day legislation. We must ensure that the public are protected by police who have the powers to do the job that we entrust to them. We must also protect the rights of individuals in police custody.

I am grateful for the opportunity to answer your questions on those and other provisions in the bill.

The Convener: Thank you, cabinet secretary.

It was remiss of me—I will not be forgiven—not to welcome Graeme Pearson to the meeting. He seems to want to join us on many occasions. You are welcome back, Graeme.

Graeme Pearson (South Scotland) (Lab): Thank you.

The Convener: It is nothing; I just felt in a good mood.

I want us to start off with arrest and police custody, if that is all right with everyone, before we move on to other questions. Elaine Murray will be followed by Mary—sorry, I mean Margaret Mitchell. I beg your pardon, Margaret.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): Thank you, convener. Happy new year.

Cabinet secretary, in your opening statement you explained a bit about the definition of arrest and detention—detention being the period after arrest when one is being questioned. I suppose that the problem is that public perception of arrest and detention is slightly different. In the public mind, arrest is when the police think that someone may have done something and they charge them, and they could be questioned prior to that. Because of that perception, could there be damage to the reputation of people who are arrested but who do not go on to be charged?

Kenny MacAskill: No, I do not believe so. I understand and recognise where you are coming from. Many of the points that you make relate not to nomenclature or the statutory definitions of arrest or detention but to media profile. I am thinking of the example of a high-profile case in England a year or so ago—never mind the fact that, although I do not recall any prosecution against Nigella Lawson, every time I saw the television, I thought that she was on trial because that is how the media portrayed matters. That is for a separate debate and must be dealt with separately.
In Scotland, we must remember that the presumption of innocence remains sacrosanct. Although somebody may be arrested by the police, they are presumed innocent until a court case conclusively proves otherwise. I think that everyone in Scotland recognises that point, although, sadly, it sometimes does not appear to be portrayed in that way in the media.

It is correct that we move towards the European definition in relation to arrest and detention. The concept of detention is relatively new in Scotland, as Mr Pearson and Mr Finnie will no doubt be able to confirm. When I started my law degree, detention did not exist, but by the time I became a law apprentice, the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980 had come in, so what Charles Stoddart taught me was superseded.

Detention has been with us only since the 1980 act, and we are providing greater clarity in the bill. The bill provides clear definitions of arrest and detention, which are beneficial and will apply not only in Scotland, because they apply across other jurisdictions. However, we must also remember that those who are arrested on suspicion—it is on suspicion only—are presumed innocent. That will always remain the case, and perhaps we must all work with the media to ensure that that applies to people who are arrested for whatever reason. Indeed, as in the high-profile case to which I referred, sometimes people are not even arrested but simply interviewed by the police.

Elaine Murray: I understand what you are saying. From listening to the media in England, I myself have sometimes misapprehended what an arrest has meant when somebody has been taken in. I am thinking of the case that you mentioned. If the bill is enacted, are there ways in which we can tackle the public perception so that, if somebody is arrested, it is not presumed that they have done something?

Kenny MacAskill: Some of that might have to be for another day—dealing with the media certainly is—but the bill provides greater clarity. If we were to ask them, we would find that ordinary citizens in Scotland find it pretty hard to explain the difference between arrest and detention and why some people are arrested straight by the police and others are detained.

There is a desire, which is correct and comes from Europe, for a clear difference between detention, which is when someone is deprived of their liberty, and arrest, which happens at the outset. We are heading towards that. It might take some time, but it will be a lot clearer than the current situation in Scotland, where someone is detained under the 1980 act but can be arrested under common law, which is probably harder for people to understand. It will become quite clear that detention is when someone is detained and their liberty is affected, but the point of arrest is when there is the suspicion that an offence has been committed.

Greater clarity will come as we row back, perhaps, from what was introduced in 1980.

The Convener: I subscribe in part to what Elaine Murray says. I agree that it is a matter for the media, but I do not think that they will be contained in that way. Might there be room at some point to consider giving accused parties in certain cases the anonymity that is provided to the principal witness?

If we are going to move to people being arrested and not officially accused, the public will say that there is no smoke without fire in certain very serious cases. If the case in London to which you referred, the man’s life was pretty well ruined. He had to change his appearance and all kinds of things. I presume that he has never got over the fact that he was tried by the papers and, to some of the public, will still have been found guilty by the press. Can we not do something in law that would provide protection?

Kenny MacAskill: That is a jurisprudential debate that we can have. The only caveat that I would add concerns the world of social media. Various high-profile footballers who have had court orders or anonymity south of the border have appeared on the front page of The Scotsman newspaper, albeit with some masking of their eyes, and anyone who had any passing knowledge of football knew who was being discussed.

I am always happy to look at such matters because they have great consequences. The difficulty is when such things happen in a different jurisdiction or the information is available on Twitter or YouTube. Even if there were a court order it would be pretty hard to enforce.

09:45

The Convener: Nevertheless, if one were to go in that direction, there would be a breach.

Quite rightly, we have protections for the principal witness in certain cases, particularly sexual offence and rape cases. All I am saying is that, in those circumstances, it may be worth considering allowing the accused protection, given that we will have in custody persons who are not officially accused, which seems to take it a step on from being about perception. I appreciate the difficulties with the media, but that applies to all our laws.

Kenny MacAskill: You are correct. Such protection applies at present to minors, unless the court were specifically to exclude that and allow for publication. At present, the young person’s
“I have yet to hear a cogent argument for why it makes something better to change terminology largely without changing content, and I fear that the consequence of the wrong information being recorded because officers are dealing with a new set of processes, even if the general principles of fairness are applied, could lead to cases being thrown out of court.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 1 October 2013; c 3288.]

Kenny MacAskill: I do not believe that will happen. What Lord Carloway is proposing, which is part of a general direction within Europe, will make things clearer. We are moving from the current position, in which an officer has to decide whether to arrest somebody or detain them under the 1980 act. The bill will make it clearer. The officer will simply arrest someone on suspicion—it has to be a reasonable suspicion. The situation will be clearer for officers, although I accept John Gillies’s point that officers will require to be given some training. I go back to the point first raised by Elaine Murray, on people’s understanding of detention and arrest. At present, detention and arrest blur into each other. We should head towards the situation in which—as correctly encapsulated by Europe—arrest should be at a point when there is suspicion, and detention should be the deprivation of someone’s liberty.

We will have to see how the media and the public interpret that approach but I think that it will give greater clarity than exists at the moment. If someone were to be detained by a police officer now, would they be arrested or detained? At the moment, the answer could be both. It would all depend on what the officer has decided and which act he was following. The situation will be clearer when the bill is passed because people will simply be arrested. There may come a point at which they will be detained but, to begin with, they will be arrested on suspicion.

Margaret Mitchell: In that case, you will not agree with Assistant Chief Constable Graham of Police Scotland, who feared that the new definition could prevent a person from being arrested in order to stop a crime. Are you quite satisfied that arrest on suspicion fully covers that?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes.

Margaret Mitchell: So you see no need for the power of arrest to prevent a crime to be implicit in the bill.

Kenny MacAskill: The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents was correct to express its concerns on the matter but I make it quite clear that the common-law powers of arrest, other than that changed by the formal statutory arrest procedure, remain and will always be available. The power of arrest to prevent a crime and indeed to ensure public safety remains.

Margaret Mitchell: But your opening statement suggested that you were seeking to clarify the common law in statute. Surely this is an opportunity to make it clear that the power to arrest on the ground of prevention is within the powers available to the police.

Aileen Bearhop: In part 1 of the bill, we are making the common-law power of arrest a statutory power. Other common-law powers are not affected at all and will continue. Our concern about putting into the bill the power to arrest on the ground of prevention is all about what someone who has not committed a crime would be arrested for. The bill allows for someone who is committing a crime to be arrested.

The Convener: What if someone with a brick in their hand is standing next to a car window?

Aileen Bearhop: I think that that would come under intent to commit a crime.

The Convener: Under common law.

Aileen Bearhop: If the brick were sitting on the pavement and the person in question had not moved towards it, they would not have actually done anything.

The Convener: What if they have the brick in their hand and are looking at the car window? That situation would not be covered by this power because they would not be committing an offence. They might just be holding a brick.

Aileen Bearhop: The point at which the person in question becomes someone who will commit a crime is an operational decision for the police. They would be in the act of committing a crime.

The Convener: So someone standing with a brick in their hand looking at a car window would be committing an offence under the bill.

Aileen Bearhop: Yes.

The Convener: I am just asking because surely it would be difficult to know. After all, the person could defend themselves by saying, “I’m a brickie,” or, “This is my car.” Could you explain the common-law provision that deals with such a situation?

Aileen Bearhop: It does not come under common-law provisions. It is an operational decision about the point at which a person is seen to be committing a crime.

The Convener: Okey-dokey.

Aileen Bearhop: I believe that the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 also contains powers to allow the police to pick up, say, a known housebreaker with housebreaking kit who is walking towards a building.

The Convener: What is “housebreaking kit”? A T-shirt?

Aileen Bearhop: The police can also pick up someone who is in a building they should not be in and who looks as if they are about to commit a crime. Other powers are available.

The Convener: I must apologise to Margaret Mitchell. I was just intrigued by the issue.

Margaret Mitchell: Perhaps I can tease this out a bit more. How does the new power to arrest on suspicion of committing a crime differ from arresting someone to prevent a crime from being committed?

Aileen Bearhop: I have just been handed a note—from the lawyers, I think—that says that there is a common-law offence of attempting to commit a crime and conspiracy. That will remain.

Kenny MacAskill: I think that we are getting into esoteric matters. If there is evidence to show that someone is conspiring to commit armed robbery, that person will be arrested. If someone is standing with a brick in their hand and it looks as though they are about to put it through a car window to take a handbag or whatever else might be lying around, they are clearly about to commit a crime.

The difficulties for police and law enforcement come, to some extent, from the position that there is no jail for thought, as such. There are people out there whom we think might be considering offending, but unless we can show conspiracy we are not really able to charge them.

Aileen Bearhop referred to specific statutory matters. For example, if someone is in the curtilage of a property or in a common close—in a stair where they do not live and where there is no reason for them to be—with a screwdriver in their back pocket, an assumption can be made, especially if they have previous convictions, that might mean that they could be detained. I am trying to remember whether that would be under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

Aileen Bearhop: Yes, it would be.

Kenny MacAskill: The difficulty arises when people are thinking about offending. Unless that can be proved, or there is a risk of a sexual offence and we can get a sexual offences prevention order, or the person is subject to an order for lifelong restriction, there are difficulties, which present huge challenges for all jurisdictions. What would the person be charged with if they were arrested—”We think that you are thinking of committing an offence”? They would say, “What offence?” We might know that the person has a propensity for doing evil things. That causes great problems, which is why we created the SOPO, for example. However, if someone is standing with a brick or has gone into a common close with a screwdriver in their back pocket, that can be dealt with and will be dealt with under the new statutory provisions.

Margaret Mitchell: Do you envisage that the police will need more training?

Kenny MacAskill: When any new legislation comes in, as happened post-Cadder, the police look to ensure that they can deal with it. What we are talking about will not happen in isolation; Lord Carloway has taken a position about matters from the point of first suspicion through to the ultimate appeal, so there will be a whole area in the legislation in relation to which the police will have to get trained up to deal with the changes.

The police will work through those matters, and we have had discussions with them. They will take time to ensure that training is given—some of it will be on the job, some of it will be online and some of it might take place at Tulliallan. That is a matter for John Gillies and the senior officer command team. As I said, post-Cadder, only a few years back, the police showed that they were able to deal with the situation and I do not think that people noticed a change in the quality of service in our communities.

Margaret Mitchell: Concern has been expressed about the provision whereby the person who is arrested must be taken to a police station as soon as is practically possible. It has been suggested that the provision lacks flexibility. Will you comment on that?

Kenny MacAskill: That is to do with the interview. Apart from in exceptional circumstances, such as a kidnapping, in which access is denied—there will be very few such cases—a person who is arrested will be taken to a police station, where they will be advised by their letter of rights, which will be available in a variety of languages and scripts. Officers and senior officers will have to indicate whether the person is vulnerable because of their age, capacity and so on, and legal advice will be offered.

Margaret Mitchell: Lord Carloway recommended a less rigorous approach. He said that the arrested person should be taken to a police station only “when necessary”. Why has the Government gone further?

Aileen Bearhop: The wording is there simply in recognition of the fact that in some cases—for example, in rural areas—it might take longer to get the person to a station. As the minister said in his opening statement in the context of de-arrest, it is recognised that there will be cases in which the grounds for arrest no longer apply and the person should no longer be under arrest, so we will change the bill to ensure that the arrest can be stopped and the person can be released straight from the street without having first to be taken to a police station only to be sent home.

Margaret Mitchell: Lord Carloway said that a person should be taken to a police station only “when necessary”—never mind the de-arrest, which I think muddies the waters. I admit that I am not a great fan of the term “de-arrest”, which sounds a bit confused.

Aileen Bearhop: I think that the reason for requiring that a person be taken to a station is the recognition that people must be accorded their rights. Individuals must be given access to a solicitor and proper recording must be done, so that the right process is followed.

Margaret Mitchell: If that happens for every crime, will that not change dramatically how things work in practice?

Aileen Bearhop: If the police could charge persons on the streets, they would not have to go to a police station.

10:00

Kenny MacAskill: Many of the challenges that we have faced post-Cadder have related to statements or admissions that were made at the scenes of road traffic accidents or other such scenes when the person had not been cautioned, and the person who admits that they were the driver could incriminate themselves. I think that there is good reason for people being taken as quickly as possible to a police station and for ensuring that when the police want to interview a person it is done at a police station at the point of arrest.

We must have latitude, however. Scotland is not a uniform country; we have rural and isolated communities. Such challenges arise rarely, but I have heard of officers in Shetland, for example, having had to hire a boat in order to arrest someone who lived not on their beat but on one of the smaller islands. It takes time to get to those islands. On other, larger islands that are closer to the mainland there may be no lawyer present when a death has occurred in a section 1 road traffic accident, so we must ensure that there is latitude.
There must be fairness for the accused when the police have formed a suspicion. The person has a right to know that they have the right to legal advice, and I do not think that that can, in the main, be dealt with at the roadside or in the common close. Down at the police station, things can be formalised and a balance can be struck between officers seeking to interview people and advice being made available to those who may or may not wish to make comment.

Margaret Mitchell: For the avoidance of doubt, convener—

The Convener: I want to move on. I have a list of members who want to speak.

Margaret Mitchell: Are you saying that, under the bill, every person must be taken to the police station at some point?

Aileen Bearhop: That is not so if the officer decides that they can charge the person immediately—in which case the person can be charged and then released for appearance in court at a later date.

Kenny MacAskill: That process is for dealing with very minor matters. We know the challenges that police officers face, for example when they encounter somebody urinating in the street at night. That is unacceptable behaviour whether it is being done in their own close or wherever. It is downright offensive. Do we need to take officers off the streets to take such people back to the police station? We might if their behaviour became more unacceptable, but the officers might just be able to deal with the matter there and then. We must provide the flexibility to allow officers out on the streets to make that decision.

If somebody needs to be taken off the street and interviewed, we must balance their rights. If their behaviour is unacceptable but can be dealt with at a later date, we can move on. They do not have to accept the ticket—they can challenge it—but the matter can be dealt with later. The bill provides flexibility for the police officer in such circumstances.

The Convener: Thank you for that full explanation. I want to move on to supplementaries on this line of questioning.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): You have covered most of what I was going to ask about in your most recent response, cabinet secretary.

The Scottish Human Rights Commission has suggested that there should be more statutory definition of the reasons for which someone can be taken to a police station. Will you comment on that?

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to consider that, but the SHRC would have to spell out what it is suggesting. We have had discussions with it to ensure that, through the letter of rights, people will understand what is happening to them, what their rights are and what may happen thereafter. Other than that, the best thing that we can do in the circumstances is let people know that they have a right to additional advice, if they want it, through access to a lawyer either by telephone or in meetings, depending on the views and wishes of both the individual and the legal representative. I think that that is the best way of addressing the matter.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Good morning, cabinet secretary. You said that common-law and statutory powers of arrest have served us well—I think that that was the term that you used. You went on to say that the common-law powers remain. On the changes that have taken place, do you think that the 1980 detention legislation was an improvement on the previous legislation?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not think that I am able to comment on that. I did my evidence and procedures in 1977 and the detention act came in in 1980, so my life as a practising lawyer started with the 1980 act coming in. It was just kicking in when I was a law apprentice—I was the last of the jurisdiction of law apprentices before the move to law trainees. So, I had a historical training from Sheriff Stoddart on the common law from Sheriff Gordon’s textbook, but all my practising life we have had detention, so I do not think that I am best qualified to comment. What that shows, however, is that detention has not been with us forever. Regardless of whether people were arrested or detained, to some extent what mattered was that they were down the police station.

John Finnie: Of course, prior to 1980 people who were down the police station “helping police with their inquiries” had a very indeterminate status. The 1980 act formalised an arrangement, which I would have thought the legal profession welcomed.

Kenny MacAskill: “Helping police with their inquiries” was a euphemism that could have a variety of meanings, some of which were perfectly acceptable but some of which began to go to the margins of what would be viewed as acceptable. Greater clarity was provided.

That is why Lord Carloway went away and looked at matters. He is quite correct that, from the public’s perspective—and sometimes even from the perspective of a police officer—it might be an arbitrary judgment call as to whether someone should be arrested or detained. Equally, if people are in police custody, various things have to kick in, particularly access to rights and the availability of legal knowledge. Therefore, we could not and should not go back to a situation where people are “helping police with their inquiries.”

John Finnie: I agree. Do you acknowledge that the purpose of the power of arrest would change if the bill goes through? What would the purpose of the power of arrest be?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not think that it would change, necessarily. Police officers detain people when they think that a crime has occurred, or is about to occur, and they have to intercede. There are, doubtless, instances—John Finnie has probably experienced this more than I have—when officers have had to decide whether to detain someone under the statutory powers or to arrest them under common law. The bill makes it clearer that officers will simply arrest on suspicion. The basis will not be flimsy, however. People will not be arrested because the officer does not like the cut of their jib or their gait. Something will have to have happened; there will have to be a clear reason.

Immediately on a person’s being arrested, rights will kick in, because we have to retain balance. The bill provides greater clarity—certainly for the man or woman in the street, who probably would not understand whether the person had been detained under the statutory powers for six hours or whether they had been arrested. All that they would know is that their son, husband or whoever was down at the police station.

John Finnie: Section 1(1) of the bill states:

“A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed or is committing an offence.”

Given that, do you think that there is any possibility of a reduction in people being reported for summons?

Kenny MacAskill: No. I think that it will come down to good practice. We do not want officers to be off the street when they could instead deal with situations by issuing fixed penalty notices or in a variety of other ways. This is simply about allowing officers to use their discretion so that matters can be dealt with in other ways, such as giving information or issuing a fixed penalty notice. We want to keep that rolling.

It is a matter of balance. If someone’s behaviour has been unacceptable and can be dealt with by a fixed penalty notice, we think that that person would prefer to accept that notice and then go away suitably humbled to being taken down to the police station for many hours. It will come down to how the legislation is implemented in practice, but I have no reason to believe that the police will not continue to use their discretion, which I believe is at the core of policing in Scotland.

John Finnie: I agree that discretion is the strongest power that any constable has.

Section 1(2) qualifies the power of arrest by stating:

“a constable may arrest a person under subsection (1) only if the constable is satisfied that it would not be in the interests of justice to delay the arrest in order to seek a warrant”.

Section 1(3) lists the circumstances in which that would be legitimate. If the common-law powers of arrest have served us well and will be in place, why does section 1(3) not refer to the common-law powers of arrest, rather than being worded as it is?

Aileen Bearhop: We recognise the need to be clearer in law about what police officers are arresting for. The bill is clearer in that regard than the current position, in which some police use common-law powers of arrest because they are not entirely sure what the proper statutory power of arrest might be.

John Finnie: I acknowledge that I might be extremely rusty on this, but aspects such as someone having no fixed abode or their giving a name and address that are believed to be not correct do not seem to feature in the bill.

The Convener: What about the catch-all phrase, “otherwise obstruct the course of justice”?

Does that help?

John Finnie: My question is this: if the common-law powers have served us well, why are they not reproduced in the bill?

Aileen Bearhop: We considered that the wording of that particular provision was sufficient for the purposes of arrest in Scotland.

John Finnie: So, just to clarify, will section 1(3) supersede the common-law powers? Are we in for one of those many legal debates?

Aileen Bearhop: There will be no common-law powers of arrest.

John Finnie: I am sorry, but I understood the cabinet secretary to say that those powers will remain.

Aileen Bearhop: There will be no common-law powers of arrest. In response to a question that came up earlier, we talked, in terms of prevention arrangements, about there being common-law powers regarding attempts to commit crimes.

Lesley Bagha: Just to clarify, in talking about the difference with common-law powers, the ones that are remaining are not criminal common-law powers or offences. They are still there as statutory offences; it is just the common-law power of arrest that is being replaced by a statutory power in the bill.

John Finnie: So, if the bill is passed, the common-law power of arrest will cease. Is that correct?

Aileen Bearhop: Yes.

John Finnie: Okay. Thank you very much.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): Good morning everyone and happy new year. I think that a number of my questions have already been answered.

The Convener: Excellent. So this will be a short question.

Sandra White: I have supplementary questions. To go back to the first point about detention and arrest, which I think has had a very good airing, I just want to pose to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice—and perhaps to committee members, as well—a particular question. We are talking about people being innocent until proven guilty and the different terminology, but I just wonder whether you would agree that there is also a responsibility on the media and press. The convener mentioned the fact that we could perhaps look at some way of explaining it. Do you agree that the media also have a responsibility with regard to people being innocent until proven guilty when this law comes in?

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely.

The Convener: Can I just stop you, cabinet secretary? Can we have questions on the bill?

Sandra White: The question is on the bill.

The Convener: No.

Sandra White: I am sorry, convener. The question is on the bill. It is about people being detained or arrested. We have discussed it.

The Convener: I think that we have pretty well examined the role of the media and the fact that we cannot deal with the media in this bill.

Sandra White: I am sorry, convener, but—

The Convener: I will let you go on.

Sandra White: Thank you very much, convener.

The Convener: You are looking peeved.

Sandra White: I was third to come in for a question, but unfortunately I am now about sixth. I am not bothered about that. I just want clarification on a point.

The Convener: Forgive me, but I think that you are bothered because you have mentioned it. Your colleagues came in for supplementaries. If you had asked for one, I would have allowed it.

Right. On you go.

Sandra White: I just want clarification on the point that I raised. Do you agree that the media have a role, and that they have a responsibility to people who are innocent until proven guilty?

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. As the convener said, that is a jurisprudential argument, but people are innocent until proven guilty, which should be reflected. Clearly, the courts have powers if matters are reported inaccurately; occasionally editors are summoned. In the main, we try to ensure that we get that balance right.

Sandra White: My next question may be a supplementary question. It is on what Margaret Mitchell said. Again, the first premise of any justice system is that people are innocent until proven guilty, and that obviously applies to where there is suspicion that a crime has been committed. In that regard, we talked about the housebreaking kit, for example. John Finnie and Graeme Pearson obviously have a lot more experience in such areas and I think that, by the looks on their faces, they will certainly come up with more issues. We have talked about suspicion of crime, cabinet secretary, and common law and the new law that will come in. Will the new law protect the police as well as suspects, and make it clearer for the police that they have a power of arrest?

10:15

Kenny MacAskill: The intention is that the bill will make it clear that the common-law power of arrest for offences will be repealed and replaced with a power of arrest on suspicion of having committed a crime. All other common-law powers will remain. An issue was raised by the ASPS, understandably, about the powers that officers would have if someone was about to jump off a bridge, for example. The powers will therefore remain for the police to protect people from harming themselves and others.

The bill will provide greater clarity and certainty and will allow us to avoid situations such as the ones that John Finnie mentioned. Inviting people to come to the police station when they did not feel that they could decline was inappropriate, and people did not have certainty. Post Cadder, we have made sure that we provide access to lawyers and information about rights. The bill will make the situation clearer and retain that which was sought by ASPS, which is the general catch-all question about what the police do when they think that something dreadful is about to happen, but it is not necessarily a criminal offence.

Sandra White: Thank you, convener.

The Convener: Not at all. That was very graciously said, Sandra.
Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I turn to custody of suspects prior to their first appearance in court. You will recall that the Carloway report outlined concerns about the length of time for which some suspects are held in custody, particularly during bank holidays and long weekends. During our evidence sessions, a number of witnesses raised concerns about whether we could continue to comply with article 5 of the European convention on human rights if that continues. What practical measures are you putting in place to ensure that people are not held in police custody for unacceptably long periods?

Kenny MacAskill: We have, for example, courts that sit on Saturday when there are public holidays. We have a working group that is led by Police Scotland, and which also includes the Scottish Court Service and the Crown, to consider what can, should or might be done relating to what are called Saturday courts; I have never heard anyone suggest that there should be a Sunday court. That is being looked at because I am aware of the pressures on courts, and on those who do the detaining as well as those who are being detained. I am happy to keep the committee apprised as that progresses.

Alison McInnes: Are you comfortable that we do not need a stronger legislative framework within the bill to cover the concern?

Kenny MacAskill: It is more a matter of practice than of the legislative framework. We need to see whether the problem can be worked out without putting the specifics in the legislation. There is a general understanding that there are pressures on the system.

Those concerns do not just come from the police who detain individuals. I get complaints from sheriffs about Mondays when courts can sit well into the evening, which affects everyone involved. I do not think that we require any legislative change. The situation is not straightforward or simple; for example, employees’ terms and conditions have to be considered, as do a raft of other matters. The Crown has to be brought in because if someone is arrested for an offence on a Friday and is in court on the Saturday, the indictment or complaint has to be prepared. The detail is important.

We recognise the desire that Lord Carloway encapsulated; I sympathise with him. We just have to make sure of the practicalities if someone is to appear in a court on a Saturday. Is the fiscal’s office open? Are staff available? Can the issue be dealt with by the following morning? I do not think that legislative change is needed, but I assure the committee that the working group is up and running and that I will meet officials regularly.

Alison McInnes: I accept what you say about not needing legislative change, but I am not sure that there is enough momentum in the system at the moment. Clearly, your responsibility is to ensure that the legislation complies with the ECHR. Do I have your assurance that you will take a keen interest in the issue?

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. I will meet the chief executive of the Scottish Court Service later this week; I am more than happy to take on board points that the committee might wish to make about the desirability of Saturday courts. I will also be happy to feed back to the committee.

Alison McInnes: I have one more question to ask, if I may, convener.

Sections 31 and 33 of the bill deal directly with protecting the rights of child suspects. Can we consider the age of criminal responsibility? I know that your Government’s 2012 publication that reported on its action plan to deliver progress against the 2008 concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child said that you would “give fresh consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12 … in the lifetime of this Parliament.”

It seems to me that the bill is a good bill to do that. Why did not you choose to do that in the bill? Will you consider lodging an amendment to address that anomaly?

Kenny MacAskill: I think that we would require to consult. We have raised the minimum age of prosecution, which was always unacceptable and was not applied in practice, to 12, and we are aware of the calls for the minimum age of criminal responsibility to increase. We are happy to see what we can do within the lifetime of this session of Parliament, but I do not think that it would be practical to raise the age in the bill, especially given that consultation will have to take place and that there are disputes about what that age should be.

Alison McInnes: There was extensive consultation in the run-up to the bill. Would it have been sensible to take forward such consultation at the same time? What is behind your reluctance?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not think that we are in a position to do that at the moment. We must consult on the matter, and we are happy to work to have that dealt with within the lifetime of this session of Parliament.

Not everything can be included in the bill. There is a limit to the on-going consultations that we can have at any one time. As I said, we have addressed the minimum age of prosecution. There are understandable concerns about the age of criminal responsibility, and we are happy to give an undertaking to work on that.

Alison McInnes: Thank you.

The Convener: I think that Elaine Murray has a supplementary question.

Elaine Murray: Yes. Does the bill achieve an appropriate balance by allowing 16 and 17-year-olds to consent to be interviewed by the police without a solicitor being present?

Kenny MacAskill: I think that we have struck the correct balance. Those under 16 clearly are protected—Lord Carloway is right about that—but we have recognised as a Parliament and we recognise as a Government that 16 and 17-year-olds in Scotland are in a different position. They still have to be protected, but they can marry, pay taxes or join the army. Clearly, they must have advice, which is why I think that we have the correct and appropriate balance. They would have to have the presence of a responsible adult—that would have to be taken on board—before they could renounce anything.

We take the view that protection is sacrosanct, so to speak, for under 16s. Given the position that 16 and 17-year-olds have and the rights to which they are entitled in Scotland, however, while we provide that protection we also have to give them some responsibility to be able to overrule if they have taken advice on board before they could renounce anything.

Elaine Murray: In the recent Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill, we defined a child as a person up to the age of 18. We received evidence from witnesses, such as the Law Society of Scotland, who believed that somebody who is under 18 should not be able to waive that right.

Kenny MacAskill: We have had on-going debates about things such as the age at which people should have the right to vote in the referendum and the age at which people should be able to drive a car. We live in a world in which people can get married at 16, cannot drive a car until they are 17, cannot drink alcohol until they are 18, and cannot get a high-powered car until they are probably around 25 or 27, given the insurance issues.

We take the view that we have to protect those who are under 18. Those who are under 16 are in a specific position that has to be protected. Those who are 16 or 17—whether because of their voting entitlement that will come not only in the referendum but probably across the board, marriage or whatever—should have some ability to overturn that position so long as they have the benefit of some responsible advice.

John Finnie: Cabinet secretary, the Scottish Human Rights Commission raised two issues, the first of which relates to the information to be given to suspects. It seeks—and I hope that you support—a simplification and strengthening of the advice that is given to suspects. Will you consider that?

Kenny MacAskill: I think that we have done that. The letter of rights has been drafted and, as far as I am aware, the SHRC is happy and content with it. Part of the issue is then about how it is made available. As I recall off the top of my head, it comes in something like 34 different languages and in a variety of scripts. Everything that can be done is being done to make the information as readily available as possible, and to make it available in a manner and format that is understandable.

John Finnie: Are the levels of illiteracy among people who find themselves in custody being taken into account?

Lesley Bagha: I can add to what the cabinet secretary said.

I note that the letter of rights has been used in police stations since July. It is the plain English version at the moment. As the cabinet secretary said, the letter has been translated into 34 languages, and we are now looking to roll out those versions to address the point that you make and to ensure that suspects who have special needs, particularly those who are vulnerable, have access to the letter in additional formats. We are going to set up a couple of groups, including an advisory group with third-sector organisations that deal with such individuals, to ensure that we have the most appropriate formats so that the letter can be as effective as possible in practice.

It is not yet a statutory letter of rights, but that is on-going work. The letter of rights will need to be amended again if the bill is passed and the rights are enhanced, but that work will continue over the next few months.

John Finnie: That is welcome. Could the committee be kept apprised of the progress of that work, please?

Lesley Bagha: Absolutely.

John Finnie: Thank you. The second point is on access to legal advice and whether it is made clear to individuals that they have the right to face-to-face contact with a solicitor and not just the right to speak to them. I acknowledge that there are challenges regarding geography—they have been alluded to in relation to other matters—but can some regard be paid to that? The role of a solicitor is not simply to give advice; sometimes, it is to check on the conditions in which individuals are being held.

Lesley Bagha: If I may, I will answer that question as well. We are trying to keep some flexibility in the bill. The normal default would be that the suspect has the right to choose, but we did not want to place too much in the bill to say that the contact has to be face to face because it might be that, in some circumstances, that is not appropriate. If the suspect is going to be—

John Finnie: In what circumstances would it be inappropriate for a suspect to be given advice in that way?

Lesley Bagha: It may be that they speak to their solicitor and their solicitor does not think that it is necessary for them to come out. The suspect may not be being questioned.

The aim is just to keep some flexibility. If the suspect is being questioned, there is a right for the solicitor to be present, which is an enhancement from the current position. It may be that in many cases a telephone call is sufficient, although there may be other circumstances where that approach would not be appropriate. The suspect would be told that they have a right to speak to their lawyer. They would discuss the matter with their lawyer, and their lawyer might choose to come down.

The aim is to maintain flexibility. The bill enhances the right to legal advice for suspects who are taken into custody. We want to ensure that it works effectively in practice for all those who are involved, and particularly for persons who are in custody, according to what is appropriate in individual cases. In most cases, it is for them to decide what is appropriate.

John Finnie: Will you clarify whether discussions have taken place with the Law Society? It previously made representations on the circumstances that you have mentioned, where an accused changes their mind and a question arises about the reimbursement of fees to a lawyer who has travelled a distance only to find that the contact has been cancelled.

Lesley Bagha: We have spoken to the Law Society about the bill. The legislation enables a suspect to change their mind. It may be that, initially, they do not want to take legal advice and that, having been informed of their rights, they say, “No, I want to waive my right to legal advice”, although that cannot happen in the case of certain categories such as vulnerable persons. However, even if they choose to waive their right to legal advice, the bill does not prevent them from changing their mind, saying, “I’ve now decided that I want to obtain legal advice”, and asking for their solicitor to be contacted.

Kenny MacAskill: Some of this is a matter of custom and practice for lawyers. When I practised and I got a call from an officer such as you, Mr Finnie, or Mr Pearson in the early hours of the morning, if it was a serious charge, the likelihood was that I would go down, but if it was a less serious charge or it involved somebody with past experience, I basically went back to my bed—

The Convener: That is too much information.

Kenny MacAskill: What we find is that lawyers speak to their clients and give them advice over the phone. If they feel that it is appropriate for them to attend because of the nature of the charge or the nature of the client, they will attend. A lot of decisions to deal with matters by telephone come from lawyers themselves, who have no desire to go to the police station.

John Finnie: Absolutely, but if someone travels 30 miles to a police station and arrives there only to find that the accused or the suspect has changed their mind, will they be reimbursed?

Kenny MacAskill: That would be a matter for the Scottish Legal Aid Board. I do not know the particular rules or regulations there, but—

The Convener: We are wandering off the bill here.

John Finnie: Are we?

The Convener: Yes.

John Finnie: All right. I will be guided by you, convener.

The Convener: Legal aid costs are not in the bill.

Kenny MacAskill: We have the duty agent scheme and the contact line that the Scottish Legal Aid Board has set up.

10:30

John Finnie: Okay.

The Convener: Legal aid costs are not in the bill, John—they are covered in another bill. You are giving me a quizzical look, but I am telling you—that is the fact.

Sandra White has a supplementary question.

Sandra White: Yes, I do.

The Convener: It had better be a supplementary question—I feel that I am being tested this morning.

Sandra White: I feel as though I am in court or on trial—

The Convener: You are close.

Sandra White: But thank you very much convener—this is a supplementary question.

I was very interested in what Ms Bagha said about working with the third sector to give information and advice. From past experience on other committees, I know that there was a problem with people who are deaf and dumb being able to get interpreters and suchlike. Would you be looking at the voluntary sector being able to work with them? Can we get an appraisal of that approach?

Lesley Bagha: Yes. I am aware that there is also another EU directive about interpretation, but that might be separate from languages. We have not yet set up the group to do this, but the first thing to do is to identify the groups of people currently in custody who are most in need of information in other formats. One of our first tasks is to identify our priorities. Over the next few months, once the group is set up and we have identified where other formats may be appropriate, we will be more than happy to write to the committee to let you know about that.

The Convener: That is close to the bill, but we are drifting a bit. An arrest is challengeable—all these processes are challengeable if the party does not understand the proceedings.

Sandra White: You are awfy tetchy this morning.

The Convener: I am not tetchy. I am just trying to keep to the facts of the bill and not drift into other areas—interesting though they are.

Roderick Campbell has a question. I hope that it relates to the bill—I am sure that it will, given that he is an advocate.

Roderick Campbell: It definitely relates to section 14 on investigative liberation.

Section 14(2) states that

“If releasing the person from custody, a constable may impose any condition that an appropriate constable”— that is deemed to be an inspector—

“considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.”

There seems to be a right to apply to a sheriff to have the conditions reviewed if there are concerns about them. Is it your view that the bill says enough or balances the rights of an accused sufficiently in these circumstances? For example, if, as has been suggested by one witness, curfew conditions were imposed, which would certainly have an impact on liberty, is there enough balance in the bill to protect the rights of the accused?

Kenny MacAskill: I am happy to take on board any thoughts that the committee may have, although ultimately I think that these details have to be considered by the court. To some extent, it is about the ability to get the issue to court: if we are looking at the rights of the accused, there has to be some form of appeal and the appeal on the decision of the senior officer, albeit that it is not a formal legal appeal, would be to the court.

In years to come, the courts will no doubt set down what they view as appropriate. Some of these things have to come from working parties. On a lot of issues the concern has also perhaps come in relation to the rights of victims of domestic abuse to ensure that people who are being released will not return to the matrimonial home or into a certain area. Some of the issues are best dealt with at a local level, where senior officers will work with the judiciary to get an indication of what is acceptable and how they wish to deal with matters. Equally, when the conditions are not acceptable, we have to enable the accused to get to court as quickly as possible to challenge them.

I am open to providing greater detail in the bill, but I find it difficult to see how the issue could be dealt with, because a lot of the conditions might be geographically specific or specific to individuals and might relate to the nature of the curfew or the street or address that the accused cannot go to. Understandably, in cases of prolific shoplifting it may be that the accused is denied access to the town centre or, if it is an assault, they may be denied access to a housing scheme. I am open to any thoughts or suggestions.

Roderick Campbell: Is the 28-day period right? Police witnesses have suggested that they should be able to apply for a longer period.

Kenny MacAskill: The 28-day period is what Lord Carloway came back with. I think that, in the main, 28 days should be sufficient. There may be challenges on some aspects related to forensics or other issues, but as you said at the outset we have to balance that with the rights of the accused.

Again, I am happy to hear and take on board members’ thoughts on the matter, but the 28-day period seems appropriate and reasonable to me. I certainly think that the accused and, indeed, victims and witnesses need finality and certainty, and given that the people concerned will be in something of a limbo we need to keep things tight.

Roderick Campbell: Do you think that the 28-day period will have significant resource implications? Some have suggested that the whole investigative liberation scenario will have a resource implication.

Kenny MacAskill: I cannot for the life of me see why it should. After all, no matter whether the person was remanded or detained, the police would probably be doing the same work anyway and making further inquiries either through technical means such as computers or forensics or through investigatory means and dogged police work. What investigative liberation does is provide greater flexibility for the person under suspicion.

Roderick Campbell: I also have a short question about post-charge questioning.
The Convener: Before you ask it, Mr Campbell, I would like to get the issue of investigative liberation straight in my head.

At that stage, the person will have been arrested but not officially accused or charged of anything, but will there be a crime—say, attempted burglary—that can be labelled or defined as such? My concern is that, if a person is arrested under investigative liberation, the police might—to use common parlance—try to find something to pin on them. In that case, it might be like a fishing warrant. Am I on the wrong path? Will the investigation in question be pretty narrow?

Aileen Bearhop: The person in question will have been told the general reason for their having been arrested.

The Convener: What do you mean by “general reason”? How broad would that be?

Aileen Bearhop: It would be as it is now—[Interruption.]

The Convener: I beg your pardon. Did you want to say something, Roderick?

Roderick Campbell: I think that section 14(1) gives some indication, convener. It has to be “a relevant offence”.

The Convener: Yes, and it also includes the phrase:

“by virtue of authorisation given under section 7”.

However, section 7 just mentions “a person ... in ... custody ... arrested without a warrant, and” who “since being arrested ... has not been charged with an offence”.

It does not say that the reason has to be pretty specific.

Jim Devoy: We have to be clear about the purpose of the criminal procedure that the police will be undertaking at that point, which will be to investigate a crime.

The Convener: Yes, but what crime are we talking about? Will the person under the investigative liberation procedure—or indeed their lawyers—have any clear idea of what on earth they have been accused of?

Jim Devoy: The police will be clear about the complaint that they have received in relation to the offence that has been committed. The charge might change based on the investigation and the information that is gathered, but the police will be clear about the investigation that they are undertaking and the suspect will be clear about what the investigation relates to and what the alleged offence is.

The Convener: What would happen if something else turned up that had nothing to do with what the person in question had originally been arrested on suspicion for? Could that form another investigation?

Jim Devoy: Yes. As happens at the moment, that would be a separate matter that would be dealt with separately.

Kenny MacAskill: The usual view of caution and charge is that it relates only to the reply that is given at the time. However, if someone is arrested or detained, cautioned and charged on breach of the peace and other matters come to light, the complaint or indictment served by the Crown can differ significantly from that to which the caution and charge relates. As I have said, the caution and charge relates only to the reply that is given at the time.

The Convener: I understand that, but is investigative liberation like having a search warrant? Does it involve digging into material things, looking at people’s computers and cupboards or going into their factories or whatever?

Aileen Bearhop: It gives the police time to undertake their investigations and acknowledges that in a modern society such investigations can be rather more complex.

The Convener: I understand all that, but will police officers and so on still have to apply for a search warrant?

Aileen Bearhop: Yes.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely.

The Convener: But might the investigative liberation procedure supersede all that?

Aileen Bearhop: No.

Kenny MacAskill: No, it will not change the warrant procedure. However, it will avoid the accused being remanded or the police not having specific evidence in a world where, as Aileen Bearhop has made clear, we have access to computers, forensics and so on. It does not give them any right to go in and do anything that would otherwise require a warrant.

The Convener: Thank you—that is clear now. The issue had concerned me.

Margaret Mitchell: Cabinet secretary, I seek clarification of the logistics of how investigative liberation would work. It would cover a 12-hour period but could be for an hour or half an hour at a time, and someone could be released but be officially under suspicion all that time. They could be brought in for two hours and released, and then brought in for another half an hour and released again over a 28-day period. Are you confident that the information technology system that is being developed by Police Scotland as we speak will be able to cope with that? The Scottish Police Federation has raised real concerns about that, and we have raised the issue in the Justice Subcommittee on Policing. It seems to me that a very complicated set of recordings could be required.

Kenny MacAskill: I am confident that the IT system will be able to cope. In the main, people will be released for a period of time before they return, which will allow the police time to investigate. I think that you are mixing up investigative liberation with periods of detention. As we know, the computer system requires to be upgraded. That is a priority for Police Scotland and it will ensure that the system is fit for purpose to deal with both the current and future issues and challenges.

The Convener: Roderick Campbell has a different question.

Roderick Campbell: I have a short question on post-charge questioning. The Scottish Human Rights Commission takes the view that the bill should state that no adverse inference should be taken from silence. What is your view on that in the—we hope—relatively rare circumstances of post-charge questioning?

Kenny MacAskill: That seems to be the current position: more and more, interviews in the presence of a lawyer and under caution are dealt with by the simple response that, on the advice of their solicitor, the person has no comment to make. That may be the advice in the context of post-charge questioning just as in the context of judicial examinations, which were the previous way in which the matter would have been dealt with.

In my limited involvement with judicial examination, the advice that I gave to my client was that they should say that, on the advice of their solicitor, they had no comment to make. No real questions can be asked if that is the line that the accused takes, so I do not see how any inference can be drawn.

Lesley Bagha: The position on post-charge questioning is very much the same as the position on pre-charge questioning, which takes place before somebody is officially accused, in that there is a right to silence and the person does not have to say anything.

Under the current legislation, when there is a judicial examination, rather than the possibility of adverse inference as such there is a provision that enables, in certain circumstances, comment to be made during a trial as a result of something that happens at the judicial examination. The legislation tends to have to enable comment to be made rather than it being the other way about.

Therefore, rather than the legislation saying that no adverse inference should be made, it is assumed that there is a right to silence and that people have a right not to say anything.

Roderick Campbell: That answers my question. Thank you.

Elaine Murray: I have a question on section 33, on the support for vulnerable people, particularly in relation to people who are suffering from a mental disorder, which is defined as having "the meaning given by section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003".

Section 33 requires a constable to assess whether intimation should be sent to a person who is "suitable to provide the support."

The constable must also assess whether the support is required. Is it not rather a burden on the constable involved that they should, for a start, be aware of the definition of "mental disorder" in the 2003 act?

Kenny MacAskill: We have had the definition for a considerable time. A mental disorder is defined as a "mental illness", "personality disorder" or "learning disability", and there is tried and tested practice according to which the police have been assessing the vulnerability of suspects, accused, victims and witnesses for many years. I tend to think that the term "mental disorder" is perfectly understandable. We are not asking police officers to act as psychiatrists; we are asking them simply to make an assessment of somebody's ability. That has been routine custom and practice and has worked well.

Elaine Murray: You do not agree with the Law Society's concerns that it might be difficult for a constable to assess whether somebody has such a condition.

Kenny MacAskill: No. Over the years, officers have shown their ability to make an appropriate assessment and, as I said, when they have doubts on aspects they go to a police surgeon.

The Convener: Right. I am going to stop this section. I thank the other witnesses; the cabinet secretary is staying. We will suspend for two minutes to allow the officials to change places before we move on to the next sections.

10:45
Meeting suspended.

10:46
On resuming—

The Convener: We will press on, because we are dilly-dallying a bit today. We move on to parts 4, 5 and 6. In addition to the cabinet secretary I welcome to the meeting Elspeth MacDonald—I beg your pardon; I am not welcoming her at all, as I have done that already. Wait a minute. Where am I going? She is still here, but in addition—I will need to learn to read my script—I welcome Kathleen McInulty, policy officer, criminal justice bill team; Philip Lamont, head of the criminal law and licensing team; and Ann Thomson, head of the workforce sponsorship unit. I still have Lesley Bagha and, of course, Elspeth MacDonald. We have settled it now. Thank you.

I will move on to questions. What am I doing now? It is sentencing and—

Roderick Campbell: Appeals.

The Convener: Sentencing and appeals and so on. Right.

Elaine Murray: I have a question on delays in appeals. Why do the bill’s provisions concentrate on the initial stages—the late notice of appeal and so on—rather than the progress of appeals? I am sure that the cabinet secretary will remember the case of one of my constituents, Adam Carruthers, who was convicted of rape of a couple of people who were also my constituents. There was a series of appeals that dragged on and on. At that time, I had quite a lot of contact with one of the victims, who felt that the appeal process was an additional burden on her as she had to relive the crime. The bill does not seem to address that part of what is often a very traumatic—

The Convener: Can I ask whether those proceedings are concluded?

Elaine Murray: Yes. The person has served his sentence and has been released, so we can discuss it.

That part of a victim’s experience, when the appeal process can continue to torment the victim, does not seem to have been addressed.

Kenny MacAskill: You make a fair point, which is why the bill has to take cognisance of the rights of victims and those involved in the court process. On-going appeals, which there have to be as a consequence of the ECHR, which I think nobody challenges, have caused families significant pain and had a significant impact on them.

There are two things. One is that we must have some certainty and clarity for those who seek to appeal and those who are affected by that—the victims—which is why Lord Carloway has correctly put in specific timescales that apply other than in exceptional circumstances where there is a reason why an appeal has not gone in.

Some of the other aspects that you touched on relate to case management, which is down to the judiciary. Some of that will be dealt with through, and will I hope benefit from, court reform. It is down to individual case management by the appeal court and the judiciary.

I think that we have struck the right balance. The Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk both understand that delays affect not simply the rights of the accused but the rights of the victim. You made a fair point, but the latter aspect is more about case management; the other aspect relates to what has to be in the statutory provisions.

Elaine Murray: So the bill is not the place to deal with the latter aspect, because it is not a legislative issue.

Kenny MacAskill: Government and Parliament would always hesitate to get involved in case management and how proceedings run in court. Aspects of evidence and how long the case should run for should be dealt with by those who are, quite correctly, set up independently. That is why we passed the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2010.

What we are doing here is giving the accused clear intimation of what the timescales are for marking an appeal against sentence or conviction or both. That also makes it clear to victims that if an appeal is not in by a specific time, it will not come in—barring exceptional circumstances.

I understand the point about on-going delays in an appeal, but some of that has to be left to those who are administrating it. If new evidence has to be obtained, that issue has to be left to the courts. I think that we would face difficulties if we said that an appeal has to be dealt with within a period of X. If someone said, “I’ve got to get additional evidence”, it could be a period of X plus Y.

Elaine Murray: While we are on that topic, we had evidence from the Law Society that the exceptional circumstances test might be unduly restrictive. Are you able to comment on that?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not believe that it is. It is for the judiciary and the appeal court to interpret that, but I think there is common parlance of what is viewed as exceptional circumstances. The fact that someone just could not be bothered or had not quite made up their mind does not constitute exceptional circumstances. Ill health or clerical error could constitute exceptional circumstances. I think that the appeal court can work with the test and solicitors clearly understand that exceptional circumstances are beyond something that just did not fit in with someone’s schedule.

The Convener: Is that not the case anyway just now? Is that not the way the court behaves anyway if there has just been sloppiness on the part of an agency?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes, which is why we decided not to go down the route of sanctions. It is a matter for the administration of the system by the courts or those in professional practice.

John Pentland (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): Section 71 talks about extending the maximum term for weapon offences from four to five years. At the committee’s meeting on 19 November witnesses were questioned on that topic, but they were unable to provide much guidance on whether there is a need for increased sentencing powers. What evidence do you have for the need for the extension?

Kenny MacAskill: We have made significant progress in tackling knife crime in Scotland. We have seen a 60 per cent reduction in the offence of handling an offensive weapon since this Government came to office, but there have been tragedies. Every member of the committee and probably every area of Scotland has been touched by such tragedies in some shape or form.

As an Administration, we are not prepared to take our foot off the accelerator in tackling and driving down knife offences, because they affect families, communities and the whole country. We therefore think that we are heading in the right direction. The average sentence now for handling an offensive weapon is over a year. I think that that gives the court the appropriate balance. When they think that some leniency can be shown because of the background to the case, they can show it. Equally, when it is quite clear that there was malevolence and malice, they correctly impose tough sentences, which we fully support. This is about continuing to make Scotland safer and continuing to address an issue that has scarred Scotland. The situation is getting better, but we would be remiss if we were complacent.

John Pentland: If section 71 is approved, what impact do you expect the availability of longer sentences to have in practice?

Kenny MacAskill: It will give greater discretion to a sentencing judge or sheriff. Our position has always been that the sentence is for the judiciary to decide, which is why we have never supported mandatory sentences. Indeed, as the average sentence in Scotland is over a year, why would we wish to impose a mandatory tariff that is less than that? The measure is simply about giving the judiciary discretion and recognising the significant harm that knife crime can cause. It will be for the judiciary to decide whether to impose that length of sentence. I think that they should have the right to impose such a sentence, but it will be for them to decide whether to do so, on the basis of clear facts and circumstances that merit that.

Alison McInnes: I have a tiny supplementary question. The bill does not seek to alter the maximum custodial sentence for summary offences. Will you explain your rationale for that?

Kenny MacAskill: It is for the Crown to decide whether a case should be a summary one or an indictment. A sheriff might feel that his sentencing powers are inappropriate. That is really a matter for the Crown and the judiciary. They will have to decide whether to proceed on summary complaint or under the solemn procedure.

Philip Lamont (Scottish Government): It might be helpful to clarify that the current maximum for handling an offensive weapon when prosecuted at the summary court is 12 months, which is the maximum general sentencing power of the summary court. If we were to increase that, we would be going beyond the general maximum that has been provided for in other legislation. That is why we have not done that.

The Convener: Do we have the figure for how many sentences of four years have been dished out?

Philip Lamont: It is very low. I think that the most recent statistics indicated that the maximum had been given in only one or two cases, although it is sometimes complicated because other offences are wrapped up together. Not very many people received the maximum but, as the cabinet secretary explained, we feel that the measure is about empowering judges by making an increased maximum available, perhaps for repeat offenders who have a track record of using knives and who once again are caught carrying them. It will be for judges to decide on the basis of the individual circumstances of the case.

Roderick Campbell: Human trafficking is an issue on which things have been moving quite quickly in recent weeks and months. I welcome sections 83 and 84, and I have read the cabinet secretary’s letter to the convener dated 16 July 2013 but, for the record, will you outline the Government’s thinking in connection with human trafficking? What do you say to the critics who say that Scots law should have a definition of human trafficking?

Kenny MacAskill: A statutory people trafficking aggravation is the first stage. The Government has recognised that there is a problem. We are aware that people have been trafficked here and that Scots have been involved in carrying out trafficking and have been correctly sentenced in other jurisdictions, particularly in Northern Ireland. We are aware of the issue. We believe that the first necessary step is to bring in a general aggravation, because we are conscious that that will help to raise awareness and allow evidence to be led. I think that it will make it easier for us to deal appropriately with those who perpetrate human trafficking.

However, we are persuaded that more has to be done, so the question then is how we do it.
Marra has proposed a member's bill on the issue, and we are in on-going discussions with the United Kingdom Government on its draft modern slavery bill. Indeed, I recently attended an event down at number 10 that was chaired by the Prime Minister. We are introducing the general aggravation to show our willingness and desire to deal with the issue, and to show the necessity of doing so.

11:00

On the broader aspect of the legal definition of human trafficking, we are happy to look at what is best and see whether matters can be dealt with in the draft modern slavery bill. We are talking about a criminal offence that, by its nature, crosses jurisdictions. We are in discussion with the UK about whether the bill will apply to Scotland, and if it can do so appropriately, we will be more than happy to take that route, because that will be the quickest way of ensuring that Scots law is fit and appropriate.

The Convener: I am interested in section 82, "References by SCCRC". You might recall a little tussle, which I lost—not for the first time—in the context of the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, which was emergency legislation on the back of Cadder. It was thought that there would be a flood of applications to the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission, so the 2010 act introduced, first, a gatekeeping role for the High Court, so that it could refuse referrals from the SCCRC. Secondly, the act provided that, even if an appeal was successful, the sentence might not be quashed if that was in the interests of justice. That is the background.

I am glad that the gatekeeping role is going; I am not glad to see that the second aspect remains. For the life of me, I do not understand why, when an appeal has been successful on its merits, the High Court, sitting as the appellate court, should be able to reject the appeal, on the basis that quashing the sentence would not be in the interests of justice, having regard to “finality and certainty”.

The example that Lord Carloway gave—of a person pleading guilty to the crime in the middle of the appeal proceedings—is not helpful, because such an event is very unlikely. Why are we retaining the approach? I do not understand why we are doing so. There was no flood of applications to the SCCRC after Cadder. You are always talking about access to justice, but the approach seems to fly in the face of justice.

Kenny MacAskill: The proposals in the bill strike the correct balance. I am aware of your concerns and I think that we have retained what is necessary while taking on board your concerns. It is clear that the role of the SCCRC, which we in Scotland cherish, is to consider miscarriages of justice and seek review. It is important that the High Court should consider and take cognisance of whether there has been a miscarriage of justice and, at the end of the day, it is the High Court of Justiciary, sitting as the appeal court, that must decide whether something is in the interests of justice. The provisions are likely to be used or considered very sparingly.

The point that the Lord Justice Clerk made has merit. There could be circumstances in which, for whatever reasons, matters were not dealt with appropriately at first instance and there was a miscarriage of justice, but there has been an admission of guilt. In such a case, it seems to me that the court of appeal should be able and required to take into account the interests of justice, or we might end up with the absurd situation in which a person is acquitted by the court of appeal and in the following week we must consider an application in the context of double jeopardy, on the basis that there is good reason to believe that the person committed the crime.

The Convener: I would have no problem with such an application, now that we have got rid of the double jeopardy rule. My concern is that, in any other appeal process, if the appeal is successful it is successful. However, if there is a successful appeal in a case that was referred by the SCCRC, which will already have applied an interests-of-justice test before referring the case, it will be treated differently from any other appeal, solely because it has come from the SCCRC. That is my problem. The principle should be the same as it is for every other appeal: if the appeal is successful, it is successful.

Kenny MacAskill: I see where you are coming from but, in the main, appeals that come from the SCCRC tend to be a lot more historic. Years will have passed and every other avenue will have been considered—there will probably have been a great deal of events over a long timescale. At the end of the day, the SCCRC must be protected and cherished for what it does in allowing reviews in such cases, but it is fundamental that in an appeal the High Court should remain the ultimate arbiter of not simply whether there has been a miscarriage of justice but whether action is in the interests of justice. The SCCRC makes the referral, but the ultimate decision should be made by the High Court.

The Convener: May I clarify something? If an appeal goes through the normal appellate procedure rather than being referred by the SCCRC, is it the case that, even if the appeal is successful on its merits, the High Court can apply an interests-of-justice test and reject the appeal?
Philip Lamont: No. That is not the case.

The Convener: The High Court can apply that extra test only if the reference was from the SCCRC.

Philip Lamont: That is right.

The Convener: Well, that is my problem.

Philip Lamont: As the cabinet secretary explained, the approach reflects the fact that, since the commission was established in 1999, it has always had to apply the interests-of-justice test as part of its consideration. As the cabinet secretary said, that reflects the type of case that the commission often deals with and its special role. What Lord Carloway recommended—we agreed and put the provision in the bill—was that the commission should review cases and be the avenue by which cases can come back to court, and that it should consider the interests of justice in so doing, but that the High Court should apply the same tests. That is what is in the bill.

The Convener: The test has already been applied, but the High Court applies it again.

Philip Lamont: Because of the type of cases that we are talking about.

The Convener: We are just going to have to differ on this. It seems to me that when you say “type of cases” you are making two classes of appeal, which is completely unnecessary and was not the case before. The SCCRC’s sifting procedures are rigorous, as you know, and the commission has a good record at achieving success either on sentence alone or on conviction and sentence. The SCCRC’s sifting procedure is pretty tough.

I understand why the approach was taken initially, but for the life of me I do not understand why we are retaining it. Cabinet secretary, I must give you notice that I will lodge an amendment to delete the provision and take us back to where we were before the 2010 act. I will see whether I am successful this time.

So there you go. I think that Roderick Campbell wants to raise a different subject.

Roderick Campbell: Yes. Calum Steele, of the Scottish Police Federation, expressed concern about whether the police negotiating board’s remit will include the terms and conditions of all police officers. Can the cabinet secretary update us on the position?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes. We were waiting only to hear from the Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association, which has indicated that it is willing in that regard. We have never pushed on that; we have always taken the view that a willing volunteer is better than a reluctant conscript. We hoped that the SCPOSA would come forward, as it has done.

All police officers, from the newest constable to the chief constable, will therefore be dealt with by the board.

The Convener: If members have exhausted their questions—I see that we are exhausted—I thank the cabinet secretary very much.

11:07

Meeting continued in private until 12:15.
Scottish Parliament
Justice Committee

Tuesday 14 January 2014

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill:
Stage 1

09:32

The Convener: Our next item is our second evidence session with the Cabinet Secretary for Justice on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. The cabinet secretary will give evidence on corroboration and related reforms, such as the jury majority, admissibility of statements, and sheriff and jury proposals. Those provisions are contained in parts 2 and 3 of the bill.

We will start by looking at the provisions on corroboration and related reforms and the admissibility of statements. For the benefit of all the witnesses and the cabinet secretary—and, indeed, me and the committee—we will have a five-minute break after we have dealt with this batch of provisions, after which we will move on to the next sections.

I welcome to the meeting the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Kenny MacAskill, and Scottish Government officials. Iain Hockenhull is policy manager in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill team; Elspeth MacDonald is deputy director, criminal justice division; Lesley Bagha is the bill team leader; and Kathleen McInulty is policy manager in the bill team.

I understand that the cabinet secretary wishes to make an opening statement before members ask questions.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill): Thank you.

Last week, we discussed the bill’s proposals for reforming police powers and increasing the rights of and protections for persons who have been accused of crime. Today, we will address the protection of the public.

Abolition of the corroboration requirement is an essential and long-overdue reform and is at the heart of a bill that seeks to ensure justice for all members of society in 21st century Scotland.

I do not seek conflict with the legal profession. As a former practitioner, an MSP and a citizen, I am proud of our system, but as the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, I have to consider the interests of all society. If we cannot protect the vulnerable, we as a society will have failed. We have a duty to provide an effective justice system for all citizens, not just those whose cases happen to meet complex corroboration rules that even judges find confusing.

Committee members will have heard the significant concerns that have been aired about justice being denied because of the corroboration rule. Brave individuals, backed up by organisations such as Rape Crisis Scotland, Victim Support Scotland and Scottish Women’s Aid, have spoken out.

Assistant Chief Constable Malcolm Graham spoke passionately here about there being 3,000 victims every year whose cases do not even get submitted to prosecutors. A United Nations committee has highlighted its concern that the requirement for corroboration impedes the prosecution of sexual offences. I know that some committee members have challenged witnesses to make positive suggestions about what can be done. I do not wish to dwell on the deficiencies of our rules on corroboration. Members have heard how they have been stretched, eroded and circumvented in order to cope with hard cases, but that has made for bad law.

Members have heard that no comparable system has the general requirement for corroboration, which is onerous in some cases and in others is, in the words of the Law Society of Scotland, “whittled down ... to the bare minimum.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 26 November 2013; c 3791.]

Few would adopt a corroboration rule in designing a system from scratch. Ensuring that cases are high quality must surely be the focus of a modern criminal justice system. Scots have every right to the same degree of access to justice as that enjoyed by their neighbours.

I know that some have concerns. There seems to be a popular view that the abolition of corroboration will mean prosecutions that are based purely on one person’s word. That is not our intention, nor is it the Lord Advocate’s. Simply looking at other systems should provide reassurance here. Their courts are not awash with cases based on a single source of evidence. The Lord Advocate has said that he will require supporting evidence to bring any case.

Let me make clear what is meant by supporting evidence. It means allowing cases like the examples presented in written evidence by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service to go forward. I think that most people would agree that those examples feature enough evidence to merit a court hearing. The second example features a victim’s testimony, with her distress and her special knowledge of the accused’s distinctive underwear and a description of the scene, but there is no corroboration of the alleged indecent assault. That case could not proceed in our country, but it could in others. That is what the Lord Advocate and I mean by supporting evidence.

I appreciate that many of those calling for further study are not wedded to the past, resistant to change or unsympathetic to the plight of victims, but a further review of whether the corroboration rules should be abolished would take us no further. We would hear the same voices, the same terms and the same suggestions, but I am convinced that in the end we would still be looking at the same recommendation: to remove the requirement for corroboration from our law. In the meantime, the manifest injustices would continue.

The Lord Advocate shared his personal experience of some of the hundreds of strong cases denied a hearing every year. We cannot wait a further three, four or five years to address those injustices. We need to hear those who have been suffering in silence behind closed doors: the elderly victim who is robbed by a bogus caller; the person who suffers day in, day out at the hands of a violent partner; and the rape victim attacked in her own home. We need to give them access to justice as soon as we can.

Although I am passionate about the need for reform, I will respond to constructive suggestions. I met with several stakeholders over the festive period and I look forward to the committee’s stage 1 report. However, members should not doubt my commitment to seeing the corroboration rule abolished. The provision of justice is not a game; this is about getting it right for everyone: society, victims and accused.

I repeat that I remain open to constructive suggestions, but I cannot stand by and allow our system to perpetuate disregard for those being denied access to justice.

The Convener: I thank the cabinet secretary, although I have to say that I do not think that anybody on the committee considers that the abolition of corroboration is a game. I think that we take it very seriously indeed, which is why we are taking trouble over this very important issue.

John Finnie will be followed by Elaine Murray, followed by Roderick Campbell, followed by Christian Allard, followed by Sandra White, followed by—well, it is John, then Sandra. I wonder why they are so interested in asking questions. We do not normally have this flurry.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Good morning, cabinet secretary. The Scottish Human Rights Commission described corroboration as being a legal safeguard. Similarly, the Lord President described it as being “one of the great legal safeguards in our criminal justice system.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3717.]

Is it for that reason that you propose to alter the jury numbers?

Kenny MacAskill: I just put it on the record that the term “game” actually came from Derek Ogg
QC in a programme on corroboration, and I think that it is referred to in a letter to the committee from Colette Barrie. She said that it is not a game to her but part of the suffering that she sustained. I think that that letter will be part of the committee’s evidence.

I had a very useful and helpful meeting recently with Professor Alan Miller and Shelagh McCall from the Scottish Human Rights Commission. We are happy to consider any additional safeguards. That is why we went out to consultation. One basis for seeking to increase the required jury majority from 8:7 is to have an additional safeguard for protection.

This is always about ensuring that the scales of justice are balanced. We have to protect the rights of the accused as well as the rights of the victim. I believe that corroboration impedes the rights of the victim. I also believe that if we remove corroboration, we have to ensure that the scales are calibrated appropriately. One suggestion, with which I am comfortable, is to move to a two-thirds majority. That seems to me to be a reasonable position to be in.

John Finnie: If that is one way of addressing the removal of corroboration that applies to solemn procedure, what additional or alternative safeguards have you put in for solemn procedure?

Kenny MacAskill: Do you mean summary procedure?

John Finnie: For summary procedure. I beg your pardon.

Kenny MacAskill: For summary procedure, that should be considered by the sheriffial bench. We are happy to consider any additional safeguards. For example, it was suggested to me in discussions with the Faculty of Advocates that we should consider dock identification. That issue is long overdue for consideration. We are open to considering any such suggestions. The other suggestion is to consider whether matters should be removed from the jury. Obviously, that does not apply to summary procedure.

John Finnie: You have put a proposal in place in relation to solemn procedure, but you have not put any alternative proposal in place in relation to summary procedure.

Kenny MacAskill: No, because those are the safeguards on which we went out to consultation. They were approved by the senators of the College of Justice. I met Shelagh McCall and Alan Miller, who are not so much looking for additional safeguards. I think that where they are coming from is how the system operates in the new landscape, if I can put it that way. Some of that would be down to judicial training through the Judicial Institute for Scotland.

However, the position remains that, although we are open to any suggestions for additional safeguards, so far few have been forthcoming.

John Finnie: But the reason why safeguards are mentioned is that it is frequently said that the Scottish system is the only one in which corroboration is retained. Other systems, where corroboration does not necessarily apply, have alternative safeguards. Is that the case?

Kenny MacAskill: No. Again, I have been looking at potential safeguards and discussing the issue with academics. I think that the Lord Advocate wishes to get to the system in the Netherlands, where there requires to be additional evidence. That is why an additional safeguard that may be suggested—it has not been, but I would be open to it—would be to put the prosecutorial test in legislation.

The Netherlands system is not corroboration in that it is not required throughout the whole strand of evidence. However, for a conviction there has to be additional evidence beyond the principal matter, whether that is a confession or the main substantive piece. The Lord Advocate seems to have indicated that that is where he wishes to take the prosecutorial test, the quantitative and qualitative tests and the evidential test. The additional safeguard, if you wish, that would be available would be to put that on the face of legislation and enshrine what has to be proven before there can be a conviction.

John Finnie: The police staff associations’ position seems to support you, cabinet secretary. It has clearly taken reassurance from the Lord Advocate about the protection that would be afforded its members prior to any prosecution being instituted. It is the same for the teaching and social work professions, and quite rightly so. What protection can the Lord Advocate give the unemployed labourer?

Kenny MacAskill: There are specific consequences for those professions, given the other organisations involved and other challenges in their employment when parallel investigations are going on.

The assurance that we have in the example that you gave is that safeguards can be brought in. If safeguards that exist in other jurisdictions are not referred to, I am happy to have them invoked. So far, the suggestion has been dock ID. We are also happy to consider putting the prosecutorial test on the face of the bill. Beyond that, it would be for others to state what is there.

Equally, the system that operates in the 47 countries that have signed up to the European convention on human rights seems to be fair and balanced. Scotland is unique and alone in its current system, but I am happy to sign up to the additional safeguards that I have mentioned. If there are additional safeguards that you think should be brought in, I ask that you specify them and I would be more than happy to seek to implement them.

09:45

John Finnie: Do we take from your response that the Scottish Government will propose amendments in the form of additional safeguards?

Kenny MacAskil: It has always been our intention to lodge amendments to update the system and ensure that safeguards are in place. We have made clear our commitment that corroboration must go because it is denying access to justice for not tens or hundreds but thousands of people each year. That is unacceptable. I give the commitment that we must have the scales of justice properly calibrated. On that basis, it has always been our intention that there would be amendments to provide greater safeguards. We are discussing those safeguards and looking to have those confirmed or clarified, and I am looking to hear from the committee what additional safeguards you wish to suggest. I give you a commitment that we would be happy to look very favourably at them. That is also why we are engaging with other stakeholders. It is through those discussions that, for example, dock ID has been raised as a matter in which there must be some change.

John Finnie: In solemn procedure, do you favour allowing submissions of no case to answer, with the judge able not to refer the matter to the jury?

Kenny MacAskil: I am perfectly comfortable and relaxed about that. That was the situation before, but it was changed. I can see some good reasons why it should be in the power of the judge to take a matter away from the jury if he or she believes that there is an insufficient case to go forward with.

John Finnie: What would your understanding be—

The Convener: Can I just interrupt, John? I want to let other committee members in. I will let you come back in. In fairness, I have given you quite a long whack at it—you have had about quarter of an hour.

John Finnie: Okay.

The Convener: Elaine Murray has some questions.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): I start by saying that I and all other committee members, irrespective of our views on the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, are equally concerned about the lack of delivery of justice to people who are victims of sexual crimes and domestic abuse.

First, I return to a point made by John Finnie. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration would apply to the trade unionist on the picket line and the protestor on a demonstration, as well as to the victims of the crimes that I have mentioned. Do you have no concerns about civil liberties?

Kenny MacAskil: I am satisfied with where the Lord Advocate is coming from. It will be inadequate simply for one officer to say that a crime has been committed. Additional supporting evidence will always be required before a case is brought. The need for additional supporting evidence provides some backstop along with any other safeguards. The requirement is for two or more witnesses—indeed, if there are two or more, they will be brought—but, as I say, no case will be brought without additional supporting evidence.

Elaine Murray: The problem is that that is the word of the current Lord Advocate and it does not tie any future Lord Advocate. It would no longer be in legislation, so it would tie nobody; it is only a desire of the current Lord Advocate and you as cabinet secretary.

Kenny MacAskil: That is a fair point and that is why I am perfectly happy to lodge an amendment to include it in the bill.

The Convener: In the instance that Elaine Murray gave of someone on a picket line and a police officer what would supporting evidence be as opposed to corroboration?

Kenny MacAskil: That would ultimately be for the Crown to decide. It could be closed-circuit television, for example. All these things depend on context. Normally, there would be more than one officer present at any melee, whether that is at a picket line or a football game. What any additional evidence would be would depend on the context or the circumstance. However, what you have an assurance of from the Lord Advocate and me is simply that the word of one individual will not, on its own, be enough.

Elaine Murray: Surely that is what corroboration is—it is supporting evidence and not necessarily a second witness.

Kenny MacAskil: The difficulty is that we do not know what corroboration is. I met two of our most senior academics and I asked them whether they could give me a one or two-page synopsis of the law of corroboration. They admitted that they probably could not get one on which they would agree. It is quite clear that the judiciary find it difficult to agree what corroboration is. If the committee can tell me what corroboration is and agree to it, that will probably mean some progress.
Elaine Murray: Could there not have been an alternative to abolition of the requirement for corroboration? You mentioned in your opening statement that the corroboration rules are complex and that they have been stretched, eroded and circumvented. Would an alternative have been to ask a body such as the Scottish Law Commission to draw up a definition of what counts as supporting evidence? It could include the distress of the victim and special knowledge, for example, as contributing towards corroboration. Would it have been an alternative to abolishing the requirement to have a stricter, recognised definition of what counts as corroboration?

Kenny MacAskill: There are two arguments there. One is that we should not abolish corroboration, but I think that the case against corroboration is made. When not tens, not hundreds, but thousands of people every year do not get access to justice, it is a clear impediment. It is not simply about rape and sexual offences. As the Solicitor General for Scotland has commented, and as has been raised by Sandra White, whether we are talking about elderly and vulnerable people who are victims of assault in their own home or a care home, an elderly person who is a victim of a scamming offence, or child victims, people are being denied access to justice. That is why every victims organisation that appeared before the committee, such as Scottish Women’s Aid, Victim Support Scotland and Rape Crisis Scotland, was quite clear. I think that the case against corroboration is made, and I cannot see how we can tweak it.

I accept that there can and must be something that will allow us to get safeguards right in the new landscape. We have been and are open to consideration of further safeguards. We are open to discussing the issue and to placing it in the bill. We are perfectly comfortable with that in order to make sure that we do not remove a manifest injustice for those on one side of the equation and replace it with a manifest injustice for those on the other side.

The status quo is not, however, tenable. I firmly believe that the case against corroboration is proven.

Elaine Murray: I do not know, cabinet secretary. I might just be a simple-minded scientist rather than a lawyer, but I do not understand the difference between the supporting evidence that the Lord Advocate requires and the supporting evidence that is required for corroboration. They sound to me as if they are the same thing.

Kenny MacAskill: I do not want to put my own interpretation on that, but a view will be required from the very beginning right through the whole case. At present, two forensic scientists have to speak to a sample and two police officers have to speak to the collection of a CD-ROM from London. All that has to be done because such evidence is part of the integral thread of the case. The Lord Advocate is talking about the principal evidence that goes to court and how that happens in the Netherlands, for example. If people can tell me why we have to have two forensic scientists sign off on a label when the issue is not being challenged, I am open to being persuaded, but according to the rules of corroboration that is what is necessary when such evidence is part of the fundamental aspects of the case. That is why, as I say, corroboration cannot be tweaked or altered. We have to get rid of corroboration, but, in doing so, we must make sure that the safeguards, checks and balances, and the operation of the system, are appropriate.

Elaine Murray: The two police officers or the two forensic scientists are not the issue in domestic abuse and rape cases. It is the supporting evidence and the definition of the supporting evidence that will corroborate statements.

Kenny MacAskill: Yes, but that is not the law of corroboration, which requires not simply what happens in the court case—

The Convener: We appreciate that, and I understand your argument about the threads that lead up to the court case. However, to focus on what happens once a case is in court, I and others are concerned about the discretion or flexibility that exists for corroboration, and I think that the same thing will happen in relation to what is, or is not, supporting evidence. The judiciary will continue to make the same decisions. I agree with Elaine Murray: in the court context, I cannot see that there is a huge distinction, if any, between supporting evidence and what is now admitted as corroboration, in the widest sense, in the circumstances of each individual case.

Kenny MacAskill: That is probably because we have difficulties with the definition, and academics and the judiciary have difficulty with announcing what corroboration is.

The Convener: Will the same issues not also pertain to what the judiciary concludes is sufficient supporting evidence in the case? It seems as if we are changing labels to some extent.

Kenny MacAskill: No. What we are looking to do is start afresh, which is why we looked at the safeguards. Let us remember that when corroboration was brought in, it was meant to be evidence from two people. It has since been ameliorated and watered down. Is it evidence from two people? No. What is it? It depends on the circumstances. It has been ameliorated, understandably, for the right reason—to provide flexibility, whether in relation to Moorov or a variety of other things.

I think we should get away from the view that corroboration has to be there, given all the difficulties that it causes from the very beginning. There is duplication of resources, as we heard from ACC Graham, given what individuals have to do, right through to the impediment of justice, given that cases of indecent assault do not even get into the court arena because there is no corroboration.

The Crown put forward evidence about a young girl who was assaulted and who was able to identify the perpetrator, who was apprehended because they were wearing distinctive underwear. That seems to me to be additional supporting evidence, because how could that girl know about the underwear? Why would she make it up? Was it just pure chance that she knew? A jury could decide, but, as things stand, such cases do not even get into court.

That shows why the case against corroboration is proven. Case law will always come up. In the world in which we live and the common-law system in which we operate, the court will always have to interpret the law and set rules. We can set down the matters that the committee and others feel are necessary. That is not just about the size of the jury majority or whether the prosecutorial test should be enshrined in statute, although they can be enshrined to make things quite clear. However, we will always have to have some flexibility for the judiciary because every offender is different and every case is unique.

The Convener: Yes. We understand that.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): In the first supplementary written submission from the Crown Office—CJ46a—paragraph 4 states:

“It is important to be clear at the outset that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration is not about improving detection or conviction rates.”

When the Lord President gave evidence, he said:

“I think that is a rather simplistic statement from the Crown.”

He went on to discuss matters that I think are largely incorporated in the new prosecutorial test. He then said:

“If it is simply a matter of giving access to justice, I have to say that that is not my understanding of the Lord Advocate’s role. Of course, I might be wrong.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3729.]

Can you clarify the Government’s thinking at the present time about detection and conviction rates?

Kenny MacAskill: Conviction and detection rates are for the police and, ultimately, the courts. I agree with the Lord Advocate that this is about access to justice.

I come back to the letter sent to the committee by Colette Barrie. She wanted access to justice. When I met her, she was quite clear that she hoped that that would result in a conviction. She would be disappointed if it did not, but she would accept the view of the jury. She was groomed and abused as a child and had to live with the consequences. Despite the fact that she is a bright, intelligent woman, what happened to her affected her whole life in tragic ways.

Colette Barrie wanted her day in court. She told me that she wanted to look her abuser in the eye and say, “You ruined my childhood and you’ve damaged my life.” She would be disappointed if there was no conviction, but she recognises that neither I nor the Lord Advocate can make up the jury’s mind: it is down to the jury to decide. The jury might make a decision that is unacceptable to her, but she would at least have her day in court. As she put it, she wanted to be able to look her abuser in the eye. She wanted access to justice. She knows that we cannot deliver beyond that, because it is for the judge or jury to decide. She hopes that greater access to justice will result in more justice being delivered, but she recognises that the decision will be for the judiciary and the jury. Access to justice is about giving the Colette Barries the opportunity to have some closure on what has happened to them.

Roderick Campbell: But you will accept that as far as conviction rates are concerned what will happen is really a matter of speculation.
Roderick Campbell: Moving on to the question of—

The Convener: Before we move on, Mr Campbell, I note that the cabinet secretary referred to the people in question as victims. We have to be very careful with our language because, notwithstanding some of the horrors in the examples that have been highlighted, they are not victims until the case itself is proven. What of concerns about access to justice for the accused? You have talked about balances and recalibrations but there have been false accusations and one concern might be that, if those accusations come to court, there will be trial by media. Notwithstanding what happens at the end of a case and whether the person in question is acquitted or indeed the verdict is not proven—if that verdict is kept—their life will have been ruined.

Kenny MacAskill: We simply have to ensure that adequate safeguards are in place. That issue has been raised by Mr Finnie and I have already mentioned discussions that I have had with other bodies. My door is open to suggestions about additional safeguards and I will welcome any comments that the committee makes on the matter.

Equally, it is quite clear from discussions that I have had with many people that the issue is not just about the number of safeguards. When you look at other European or western democracies and even other Commonwealth countries, you will see that the additional safeguards are probably not all that great. The issue is how everything stitches together. We are happy to look at the matter and take time to get it right. As I have said, however, we have the opportunity to give victims access to justice.

As for the question of publicity, the courts have some powers over that issue—indeed, it has been touched on by commissions and inquiries elsewhere—but the bill is about getting the balance right. I accept that corroboration resolves matters but I believe that, in giving victims access to justice, we also have to provide adequate protections, not just safeguards, for the rights of the accused.

Roderick Campbell: I welcome your comments this morning about safeguards but I am slightly troubled by Lord Carloway’s view that, if the requirement for corroboration was abolished, there would be no need for any rebalancing through the introduction of further safeguards. Moreover, in his evidence to the committee on 20 November, the Lord President said:

“If there is a good solid intellectual case for abolishing corroboration, there should be no need for any safeguards. The moment that we say that there have to be safeguards, we are conceding that the change creates a risk of miscarriage of justice, which, in my view, it will.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3727.]

Is it not a matter of concern that the two leading figures in the judiciary have taken what I consider to be a slightly negative view of safeguards?

Kenny MacAskill: I am happy to accept that there have to be additional safeguards. We are perfectly comfortable with and think there are good reasons for, as Elaine Murray suggested, enshrining the prosecutorial test in statute and protecting it from political changes. I do not think that the issue is necessarily the number of safeguards that are in place but how things operate collectively once we remove corroboration.

Equally, however, a lot of the requirements for corroboration that I have mentioned are only a prelude. The issue is not simply what happens in court on that particular day.

It is accepted across the political spectrum that it is daft that two police officers have to go down to London to pick up a CD-ROM. Why do two forensic scientists have to sign off a label? That is core, so you do not necessarily have to counterbalance the safeguards there. However, when it comes to court hearings, we must ensure that when corroboration—albeit ameliorated from the days when two eye-witnesses were required—is gone, we have enshrined what is necessary. We must also ensure that any other issues that have been identified—such as dock identification, which I have always been somewhat sceptical about—are properly analysed, and the Administration is happy to review them properly and take time to get things right.

Roderick Campbell: Why do you think that it is important for the reform to take place now?

Kenny MacAskill: The reform must take place now because, as I said, Lord Carloway was asked to go away and carry out a review following the Cadder decision, he has done the review and he has given us the opportunity to draft the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, which covers the point of first suspicion through to the point of final appeal. We have the benefit of seeing that process laid out in one bill.

Secondly, as we have not tens, not hundreds, but thousands of victims of crime who are denied access to justice every year, we need to act, and Lord Carloway’s review has given us the opportunity to do so. We are quite comfortable about taking some additional time to get it right, so that the new landscape and new evidential regime are right and fit for purpose before we say that the reform is good to go.

The Convener: We shall hear from Graeme Pearson next, followed by Christian Allard, John...
Pentland, Sandra White, Alison McInnes and Margaret Mitchell. After that, John Finnie can come back in if he has supplementarys.

Graeme Pearson: Cabinet secretary, you mentioned the Cadder decision, which was taken by the Supreme Court, of which Lord Hope was a member. Lord Hope gave the judgment and has recently gone public in indicating that he thought that the current Administration’s approach to corroboration and its abolition as a principle is wrong. His voice and his view are joined by those of the Lord President and many other significant people in our community. Even Miscarriages of Justice Organisation Scotland has come on side, indicating its concerns. It is a controversial issue and one that causes concern.

Is there time to take a breath, and not lose years over the next stage but at least take the next months to ensure that we get the approach right and that we have a balanced process of delivering justice? We talk about what checks and balances we can put in place. Corroboration is one of those checks and balances in the current system, and it does not sit well merely to call it an outdated technical requirement; it is part of a process that has taken hundreds of years to hone down to its current state.

Have you taken time to think about whether the Scottish Law Commission or some other mechanism can be utilised to look at the judges’ powers, the size of the jury—never mind what a majority looks like—and the not proven verdict, the use of hearsay evidence within the trial, dock identification, which you have mentioned, and the impact of corroboration on forensic science and post-mortem analysis? There are now minutes of agreement that do not require two witnesses to come forward. Is there time to stand aside for a moment and to get it right for everybody concerned?

Kenny MacAskill: There is time to get the new system of evidential requirements and the other aspects that you mentioned right, but I do not think that there is any time to delay in getting rid of corroboration. The view that it is archaic came not from me but from Lord Carloway. I know that there are other senior members of the judiciary who disagree with him, but let us be clear about the fact that Lord Carloway is the only judge who went away and spent a year investigating the issues. None of the others did. He came back persuaded of the need for abolition.

I have listened respectfully to Lord Hope. Equally, I note that at no stage has it been suggested in the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom or in other places, whether in the Commonwealth, the Caribbean or elsewhere, that a requirement for corroboration should be introduced in England, Wales, Northern Ireland, St Lucia or anywhere else.

I believe that the case against the requirement for corroboration is made. We have time to make sure that we have the system right and that it is the best system that it can possibly be. That will give it merit. It seems to me that the Netherlands, Germany and other countries are not awash with manifest injustices. They seem to me to be decent democracies that are signed up to the ECHR, and they do not have a requirement for corroboration.

I can certainly give you an assurance, Mr Pearson. We can take time to get it right, but I do not think that we can delay in getting rid of the requirement for corroboration.

The Convener: Before Graeme Pearson goes any further, I note that you said that Lord Carloway took a year out. Did the rest of his review panel take a year out as well? Were they out doing the work, too?

Kenny MacAskill: They were a reference group, so—

The Convener: The reference group spent a long time on the work too, did it not?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not know. The reference group was there to engage with Lord Carloway, whereas he was doing nothing but the work.

The Convener: We were told that the vast majority of the reference group opposed the abolition of corroboration. It was not a one-man operation; there was a team as well. I mention that just for clarification.

Graeme Pearson: Lord Carloway took the year out. He was a member of the bench at that time and has since been promoted to his current position. We have a huge number of people with similar experience to Lord Carloway—some might argue that there are people who have far more experience of the administration of justice in Scotland—who take an alternative view. That causes concern to people like me, who are trying to come up with the right way forward.

On your point about other jurisdictions, I did a brief review of miscarriages of justice in England and Wales, and in recent decades 62 cases have been found, after many years of people being imprisoned, to have been miscarriages of justice. Thankfully, that has not been the case in the Scottish system; in comparison, we have had very few miscarriages of justice.

Is it really the cabinet secretary’s view that we can be as cavalier as this? We have motored on and considered all the issues in a matter of months. You say that the Government is open to suggestions from the public, the committee and others, but surely it was for the Administration to Kenny MacAskill: We are building on Lord Carloway’s review. This was not done by officials—

Graeme Pearson: The justice system is not Lord Carloway’s system. We are talking about Scottish justice, and we have a community of people who have said that they are very concerned about the issues. They too seek justice for victims—as we all would.

Kenny MacAskill: First, let us deal with the question of justice. I cannot comment on the cases that you mentioned south of the border because I do not know them. Other aspects of the system there might be relevant. I do not think that you could say necessarily that they were all related to corroboration, although it is not for me to comment on them.

Equally, countries that are signed up to the ECHR, those in the Commonwealth and others do not operate a requirement for corroboration, but I am not aware of manifest injustices in Scandinavia, Canada, New Zealand or Australia. Doubtless they will have some, and miscarriages of justice also happen in Scotland. It is for those reasons that we quite correctly have the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission—which is a tribute to my predecessors, who brought it in—because occasionally the system does not get it right.

We should recognise that the requirement for corroboration has not avoided miscarriages of justice here, and equally that the lack of corroboration has not resulted in them elsewhere. They occur for a variety of reasons. The fact that we are one of the few countries that have a commission to review criminal cases is a tribute and testimony to the serious view that we take of the matter. That is the position.

10:15

Very few people are arguing for retention of the requirement for corroboration, but an awful lot of people are expressing concerns about the new landscape after the requirement for corroboration has gone, which is understandable. Very few, it seems to me, have come here to say that the requirement must stay. Those who have would probably caveat that by saying that the issue should go to a commission or whatever.

The Administration has been happy to consult on safeguards after the Carloway report. In response to that consultation, the senators of the College of Justice, for example, did not seek to have the right to remove the case from the jury. I am happy to take a contrary view to the senators on that. They were happy with a requirement for a two-thirds majority for a guilty verdict, but we are open to taking more time to get the new landscape right. I will come back to the point: corroboration has been shown to be “archaic”. That is Lord Carloway’s word, not mine.

Graeme Pearson: I am conscious that I am a guest of the committee. Can I ask one last question?

The Convener: We are very good to guests.

Graeme Pearson: You have said that you will take time. Would the Government accept an amendment to the effect that if it gets its way on the future of the requirement for corroboration, it will not enact the change until a group had reported on the appropriate checks and balances to be put in place when the change occurs?

Kenny MacAskill: Of course. We cannot go from the old regime to the new regime without ensuring that we have got it right. I am saying that if we have to ensure that we get it right, we have to give that time.

I am also conscious, as Graeme Pearson will be from his professional background, that we have to train not just police officers but the judiciary and prosecutors for the new landscape, so there must be some delay in its implementation.

Graeme Pearson: Yes, but before that training can take place that new landscape must be clarified and understood. Whether it be through the Scottish Law Commission or some other structure, it needs to be clear to us how you would do that.

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to take the time to get it right and we are conscious that we cannot start training people until we have decided on that. We are also conscious that this is a busy year, with strain on the police from the Commonwealth games and so on, so we have never anticipated that police training would begin until a considerable period had passed.

The Convener: Can you clarify what you are actually saying? You have come out with a lot of substantive but not firm proposals—tests about other tests that you would put in place if the requirement for corroboration were to go. I, for the life of me, cannot see how we can deal with those at stage 2 or stage 3, because we would have to take further evidence, certainly at stage 2.

Are you saying that you would keep the removal of the requirement for corroboration in the bill but that it would not be enacted, pending something else?

Kenny MacAskill: No.
The Convener: You are not.

Kenny MacAskill: I am saying that the requirement for corroboration has to go. We believe that its removal must remain in the bill and we must trigger that. Graeme Pearson made a perfectly valid point, but we never anticipated that when the bill received royal assent we would immediately go live. The likelihood is that royal assent would be given before training and so on had taken place.

We also recognise that we have to get the landscape right and we must balance the scales of justice. We have to remain committed to the removal of the requirement for corroboration and adhere to the principles that have been set down by Lord Carloway, but we must ensure that the change does not take place until we have got right the new landscape in which the prosecution and the judiciary must make decisions.

The Convener: I am concerned about the phrase “got right”. Would there be a role for the committee? Perhaps I should be asking not you, but the clerks. I appreciate that you say that the change would come later, but if it will not be enacted right away, is there a way that the committee or Parliament could look at it again? It would be in the bill and in the act as passed, but in suspended animation until such time as further evidence came back to the committee. That would allow us to say, “Okay. Now we have taken our time, which was better than trying to do it at stage 2.” Maybe I am asking the wrong question; I do not know.

Kenny MacAskill: I think that such matters will be triggered by subordinate legislation but they can come back before the committee and Parliament through, say, the affirmative and super-affirmative procedures. Indeed, from my discussions with various people, including academics, I think that such a method would provide for greatest scrutiny.

The Convener: Do you want to come back on that, Graeme?

Graeme Pearson: In the light of that particular thought process, is it your intention that the bill will contain not only a commitment to discarding corroboration as a basic requirement but a safeguard that that discardation or whatever you might call it—

The Convener: Discardation? That is a new word.

Graeme Pearson: I am glad that I have invented it, convener. Do you intend that the bill will contain a safeguard to the effect that discarding will not occur until a committee or some other vehicle proposes safeguards with which the committee is satisfied?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes. We are perfectly comfortable with that direction of travel.

Elaine Murray: I want to ask a wee supplementary because, again, I am getting a little bit confused. Part of your argument for having to do this in the bill was that thousands of victims are not getting access to justice, even if the bill might not deliver justice for them. However—I have to say that I am, to a certain extent, reassured by this—you are now arguing that you would suspend such a move until the various safeguards had been interrogated, which might well put it off for a couple of years.

Kenny MacAskill: We never intended to bring the new regime into place until 2015 anyway, because the police had made it quite clear to us that with the Commonwealth games, the Ryder cup and so on, officers would simply not be able to undertake training either online or at Tulliallan in 2014. Although the bill will go through and receive royal assent, it has always been our intention that the changeover would not be triggered until 2015 or whenever. As with many bills, things can come in at different stages; we have that window of opportunity.

Elaine Murray: So, your argument about the urgency of the move was actually irrelevant.

Kenny MacAskill: No. There is urgency to get this done as quickly as possible, but this is as quick as it can be done. It cannot be done any quicker than that. I cannot ask the chief constable to take officers away from carrying out necessary orders during what will be a busy time for Scotland, but they will have to be trained up. As a result, the measure was never going to come in until 2015. In fact, the period before it would come in had not even been considered, although it will happen in 2015. That gives us a window of opportunity to get it right. Does that mean that some people will suffer from lack of access in 2014? Well, yes—but we were never going to be able to do this in that time. We need to get this done as quickly as possible and, indeed, that is what we have discussed with Victim Support Scotland, which supports that position.

We need to get this right. Corroboration has to go, but we must replace it with something appropriate and we will take the time to get it and the timing right.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): Having spoken to Victim Support Scotland and others about corroboration, I am concerned about the timescale. Are you saying that the measure will come in no later than 2015? Given the reference to the Scottish Law Commission, my great concern is that we could be talking about two, three or even four years before something is put in statute. Can you confirm that, if this process has to go ahead, it will not take any longer than a year?

Kenny MacAskill: The Lord President himself said that it should not take longer than a year. Given that we did not, in any case, think that the police could be trained in less than a year, we think that we can use this dead time—if I can put it that way—to get this right. We want to get the balance of the scales of justice right between doing this as quickly as possible and having sufficient time to get it right, but at this juncture we can carry out a further review. The principle that will be enshrined is that corroboration will go, and that will be triggered as soon as possible to end the manifest injustice that so many victims face.

The Convener: Forgive me, but I was just checking with the clerk, because you have thrown in mention of the super-affirmative procedure. The committee will have to find out exactly what that does to primary legislation. I do not think we have done that before, but I know that the process allows us to take evidence and take a matter back to Parliament. However, I do not know what the procedure would do to a measure that is already enacted. As you say, cabinet secretary, the provision is coming in, but whether corroboration is abolished or not depends on Parliament; the committee will have to keep its finger on the pulse of that change.

Graeme Pearson: My question is about the change. You have shared a new approach with us today, cabinet secretary, saying that you would set up a review group. Have you thought about who would lead on that group? Would it be the Law Commission, with a timescale set to report back by a certain date, or do you see it being led by some other body?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not think that the Law Commission would be appropriate. It does not currently have the resources for that. We have some thoughts, but we are open to views from the committee. As I said, the principle that the Government is enshrining is that corroboration will go, and we will take time to get the safeguards and related matters correct, after which we will implement the change. We are happy to discuss other matters with the committee and, indeed, with other parliamentary groups.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): On that point, I would like to know more about the training of police officers. Do you think that we need to wait for all the safeguards to be debated before we start to train police officers?

Kenny MacAskill: Not necessarily, but it would probably be better. I would have to leave that to the police; it is a matter for them. The only discussions that we have had with the police were about the fact that, after the Commonwealth games, the referendum, the Ryder cup and the homecoming, police officers will probably need time off, as I am sure John Finnie and the Scottish Police Federation will agree. It would be difficult to organise in 2014 the training that is required, so we gave the police a commitment that we would not proceed with it this year. I am happy to leave that to the good offices of the police and the federation. What matters is that they get the training and get it right. They could probably start doing some training, but it might be easier to leave it until everything is sorted. However, that is a matter for the police and their staff.

Christian Allard: So it is a question of timing, and we have room to make sure that it starts as soon as possible, if we all agree that the removal of corroboration is the way forward, which now seems to be the view of the committee—everybody is talking about timing as opposed to whether we should remove the requirement for corroboration. I will go against the committee on that and go back to the suggestion that the requirement for corroboration could be abolished only for some cases, although when Lord Gill gave evidence he said that, if the requirement for corroboration were removed, it should be removed across the board. Did you think about the possibility of removing it only for some cases? How would you address that situation?

Kenny MacAskill: We thought about it, but there is a good reason why the law of evidence should apply to all cases. Although the Lord President did not use the terminology that I would normally use about different categories, I understand where he is coming from. Why should I have to find myself telling people whose son has been murdered that the case could not proceed because corroboration was required, yet if I was speaking about a rape offence, it could be that that case proceeded?

The creation of two categories would cause great difficulties for those who operate the system. The police and forensic scientists could turn up at a crime scene not knowing whether the crime that had been committed was a serious assault, a murder or a sexual offence. The victim could be unconscious or dead, so what law of evidence would they apply—the law for murder and assault or the law for rape and sexual offence? Take your pick. All the way through the system, forensic scientists normally know what to do, and we cannot have a system in which they do not know whether evidence needs to be corroborated or not. What would happen when a rape victim died, as sometimes happens? The police and forensic scientists would start out with no corroboration requirement, but then, all of a sudden, the law would change.
I think that the law of evidence should be, in the main, clear across the board. We considered the suggestion to which you refer, but the Lord President and the Faculty of Advocates were opposed to it, and in all the evidence that I have heard from forensic scientists and the police, they are opposed to it, too. Superficially, it might be easy to say that the requirement for corroboration would be abolished in cases of rape and sexual offence and that that would be it, but what about an old lady who was the victim of scamming? Would corroboration be required? What about an assault of a vulnerable victim? At the end of the day, in terms of both implementation and operation, it would be too difficult if people had to ask, “What rule of evidence am I going to apply today?” I think that there should be one law of evidence.

Christian Allard: It was just an alternative to your proposals. Is there any other alternative to your proposals?

Kenny MacAskill: The alternative to our proposal to abolish the law of corroboration as a routine requirement is to ensure that we have the appropriate safeguards, that the system fits together and that there are checks and balances. That is how all other regimes operate. Reference has been made to the fact that the Netherlands has corroboration, but it does not—the Netherlands has something much more akin to what the Lord Advocate is advising, which is that there should always be supportive evidence. I am comfortable with that. It does not need to be provided at the beginning or require two officers to go and collect a CD-ROM, for example. No other country has gone there.

I remember my first discussions with Lord Carloway about the matter. He said that he had tried to work out why we introduced corroboration, in which law it was introduced and when it was introduced. He could not trace it. As far as he could see, it came from Romano-canonical law. It seems to me that Scotland and the world have become different places since we routinely applied Romano-canonical law in Scotland. On that basis, I cannot see any alternative other than to ensure that we get the best safeguards, have the right landscape and go in the direction that most other modern, western and European democracies have gone in.

Christian Allard: Let us take the particular example of the Netherlands. We heard evidence from the University of Dundee—

The Convener: Before you go on to that, other members want to ask supplementary questions.

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): On the law of evidence?
different approaches in relation to separate categories of offence.

Christian Allard: I would like to go back to the position in the Netherlands. We heard from Professor Pamela Ferguson and Professor Fiona Raitt, both from the University of Dundee, who told us that Scotland was bizarre in having the corroboration requirement. However, when they thought about it, they said that, in the Netherlands, although there is no requirement for corroboration, there is a system of corroboration that operates unofficially, as is the case in many jurisdictions. That leads me to think that removing the requirement for corroboration will be a lot more seamless than was first expected.

Kenny MacAskill: I think that you are right. I disagree with Margaret Mitchell’s view of the current law of evidence, and the Procurator Fiscal Service has always operated as it does. What she suggests is unnecessary.

With regard to the points that you make about the Netherlands, the Lord Advocate has specified that he sees the position as being that additional evidence should always be required. I would take the view that the system in the Netherlands is not one of corroboration but one in which additional evidence is required. I think that every right-minded person would expect that. As Elaine Murray said, we do not want a situation in which an accusation that is made by one police officer or individual is sufficient for a conviction. That is not and will not be acceptable. There will always have to be additional evidence. Equally, it seems to me that, in the examples that were given by the Lord Advocate—the woman raped in her own home or the indecently assaulted child—there was additional evidence that would have meant that the cases could have proceeded in the Netherlands but, because of corroboration, not in Scotland.

I do not think that removing the requirement for corroboration will be entirely seamless, but I accept the point that you make. Margaret Mitchell tried to make the point—I think; whether I am right in saying so is for her to say, of course—that a lot of what goes on is viewed as perhaps being needless corroboration. However, I think that it cannot be dispensed with simply by the Lord Advocate saying, “I am not going to have corroboration evidence with regard to that CD-ROM.” Far too many cases have fallen because an aspect in the build-up or preparations was not corroborated, and there was therefore no outcome.

John Pentland (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): We are now in our 11th evidence-taking session on the matter and I am still unsure whether the Mexican stand-off will be avoided. However, from your opening remarks, I wonder whether you are softening in your pursuit of an all-or-nothing approach to the issue, given that you talked about taking on board suggestions or reaching compromises. On that point, bearing in mind that conflicting evidence exists, it is interesting to note that Lord Cullen and Lord Hamilton have said that limited exclusions from the requirement for corroboration would be better than its complete removal. Might that be one of the compromises that you would be prepared to reach?

Kenny MacAskill: No. I have the greatest respect for Lord Cullen and Lord Hamilton and was grateful for their contributions. However, their suggestion regarding limited change was rebutted by others.

I am clear that the case against corroboration is made. We are not softening our position on that in any shape or form. However, we recognise that there are concerns about the number of safeguards and how the system will work in the new landscape that will exist after corroboration has gone. We are happy to take the time to get that right. I do not think that we can have a partial removal of corroboration. I think that corroboration is past its sell-by date, given that it came from Romano-canonical law and that it is not applied in any other jurisdiction. Equally, we probably want to ensure that, later in the game, in the new jurisdiction and system that we will operate, we get the best aspects from wherever and that the system is fit for purpose in our land.

John Pentland: You have emphasised that we really need to get access to justice for victims of rape, sexual assault and domestic abuse. I certainly support that. However, have you looked at any alternative to the removal of corroboration?

Kenny MacAskill: Corroboration is not sacrosanct. The point has been made that when corroboration first came in it required two eye-witnesses to speak to an incident. It came in in a world that did not have CCTV, forensic science, 3 million-to-one certainty or professional legal defence teams. However, all those aspects have come about. The world has changed in that respect.

For good reason—because justice was being denied—the courts brought in the Moorov doctrine, which was a fundamental change to corroboration. Moorov has been tweaked, changed, ameliorated and broadened because it was just not working, and it still does not provide everything. There have been wholesale changes to the law of corroboration over the years. That is why I think that it has long passed its sell-by date. It causes more difficulties because it is unclear. When I speak to learned academics and they tell me that the definition of corroboration cannot be agreed, I think that we have a problem.
I therefore think that corroboration has to go. We must ensure that we get the alternatives right. However, I do not see how corroboration could be tweaked. It has been tweaked; Moorov was probably further broadened even within my time as a lawyer.

John Pentland: There is widespread opposition to the bill, so if it is unsuccessful do you have a plan B?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not think that there is widespread opposition to the bill, although I accept that there are concerns about it within the legal profession. However, we should remember that on the other side are Victim Support Scotland, Scottish Women's Aid; Rape Crisis Scotland, Police Scotland, the Scottish Police Federation and the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents. I do not seek to minimise the legal profession's understandable concerns about ensuring that whatever system we move to is right. However, I think that the case is made on corroboration, because those who suffer from injustice overwhelmingly seek the change that is the removal of corroboration.

John Pentland: Do you have a plan B if the bill is unsuccessful?

Kenny MacAskill: No. I think that we have a plan to deliver access to justice and, as I said, to take the time to get the safeguards and changes to the system.

Sandra White: I concur with what my colleague John Pentland said about the corroboration issue and access to justice for certain crimes that people are victims of. John Pentland and other colleagues have mentioned that most of the judiciary are against getting rid of corroboration. However, a number of members of the judiciary have also said that if they were starting afresh with the justice system, corroboration would not be part of the law. Have you heard that comment, cabinet secretary? Is that a fair summing-up of the position on corroboration?

Kenny MacAskill: It seems to me that most of the opposition is not about preserving corroboration, because I think that everyone accepts the difficulties that exist with it because we cannot define it.

I take the view that in the main laws should be understandable not just to lawyers but to the general public. In some instances, corroboration is not even understandable to the legal profession. One lawyer will disagree with what another views as corroboration; in fact, we should remember that although the Lord Advocate highlighted some cases as not being capable of going forward, one of Scotland's foremost legal professors disagreed and said that they could go forward. Surely a case either is or is not capable of going forward to court.

The fact is that people are unable to write down in one or two pages what the law of corroboration in Scotland is. Are two witnesses required for every case? No. Well, then, which cases are they not required for? Given that the law is not capable of being understood and given that, having been in place for hundreds of years, it cannot be tweaked or refined, the time has come to look at what works elsewhere. Graeme Pearson is right about protecting ourselves from miscarriages of justice, which is why we are looking at what is happening, say, in the Netherlands and building that in. The point is that we need to give people the right to access justice when there is a sufficiency of evidence and to ensure that we get the safeguards right. However, I just do not think that we can simply tweak this.

10:45

The Convener: The inability to define or describe something does not always mean that it does not exist. For example, people know an elephant when they see one, but it is very difficult to define or describe an elephant to someone who has never seen one so that they know exactly what it is. On the other hand, a judge or, indeed, a jury might well know what corroboration is when they come across it because of the facts and circumstances of a case.

Kenny MacAskill: I would accept that argument in many spheres of society. However, in a court of law, when we are talking about imprisonment and justice, we cannot say, "We'll know this when it comes in the room." No—we should know what it is and it should be understandable. When we cannot get the academics or the judiciary to agree on the law of corroboration, we are leaving it to individuals to make a decision—probably the right one—about access to justice, and there is something fundamentally wrong with that. Some areas of law, such as those applying to information technology or conveyancing and land and, indeed, certain laws of evidence, are very complex and are not understandable to the ordinary man or woman, but when such a fundamental law—the requirement for two sources of evidence—that superficially appears so simple is, when you get into it, not simple at all, that law is no longer fit for purpose.

What matters is not so much the intellectual argument but the fact that every year 3,000 victims are not able to get access to justice.

The Convener: I still stick by my elephant example, cabinet secretary, but there we are.

Sandra White: There are actually two types of elephants, convener, not just one. [Laughter.] I am not a lawyer or a member of the judiciary; I might be an MSP but I am also a member of the public.
and I think that the cabinet secretary is absolutely right: the public should know exactly how the law works. After all, it should be for them, not just for the higher echelons, the intelligentsia or whatever you want to call them.

The committee has listened to the discussions, arguments and disagreements over whether the removal of corroboration will lead to further prosecutions. In that respect, I noted the cabinet secretary’s opening comments about access to justice and Colette Barrie. I do not know whether he will agree but, having spoken to Scottish Women’s Aid, I certainly agree with it that for many years domestic violence was hidden and that the more it came to light and the more people were heard in court, no matter whether there were prosecutions, the more people reported it.

Cabinet secretary, do you agree that, with the removal of corroboration, more people will feel more comfortable about coming forward and reporting such incidents and that, eventually—although perhaps not in six months or a year—we will see a cultural change among juries and others with regard to not just domestic abuse but rape, sexual assault and, say, assaults on older people in homes where there is no witness?

Kenny MacAskill: One would hope so. All the evidence points to an increase in sexual offences and the reason for that is that people feel more comfortable about reporting such matters and believe that they will be dealt with better by the police and the prosecution, that they will be better protected in court and that there will be better outcomes.

If people feel more secure that the law will support them in the challenges that they face, they are more likely to report crimes. I do not necessarily believe that more sexual offences are being committed now than before; I think that more sexual offences are being reported now than before.

Your point has merit. There are various factors that we do not know in why juries come to decisions—we will never hear the end of that—but if victims believe that the law provides support for them, they are more likely to report crimes and go through all the stages that can be traumatic for them.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): Cabinet secretary, over the past couple of years, you have used your parliamentary majority to drive through legislation that has been controversial: I am thinking of the Offensive Behaviour at Football and Threatening Communications (Scotland) Act 2012 and the creation of the single police force. On both those occasions, you sat in front of this committee and, in your chirpy, friendly and confident way, told us that everything was fine and there was nothing to worry about. However, as the legislation was implemented, we saw very quickly that it had flaws.

We are at a critical stage of this bill and a host of voices have given evidence and wise counsel to this committee that cautioned against this move. Why are you deaf to that?

Kenny MacAskill: I listen respectfully to the voices of those who are concerned about the removal of the routine requirement for corroboration, but I cannot ignore the fact that not tens, not hundreds, but thousands of people are denied access to justice.

I can understand that the judiciary applies the law and will say that justice has been done—they would not necessarily even see the problem. The lawyers will submit their note or whatever and say that they have done their job. However, I have to meet the victims of crime who do not get access to justice—it goes with the turf. I have met Colette Barrie and I will meet the woman who gave her story to The Herald recently, because she contacted me. I have to listen to their stories, which are very poignant. Something is manifestly wrong when I have to say, as justice secretary, “Well, that’s the law.” When they tell me that they are denied access to justice, I have an obligation to them, others and Victim Support Scotland to make a change for the better.

Alison McInnes: I put it to you that you have an obligation to protect the justice system in Scotland, not to offer false hope to people. There is a real concern that you are raising false hope about prosecutions and convictions. If all you are doing is trading a compromise in the justice system for false hope, that is not a good way forward.

You have spoken a lot this morning; you keep saying that we must get this right, but you seem to have put the cart before the horse. You have said that it is essential to abolish the requirement for corroboration and you have started to acknowledge that there might need to be some safeguards, but I do not sense that you are doing anything to identify what kind of web of safeguards you need to put in place. I put it to you that there would be some sense in doing what many of us have called for for many months: ask either the Scottish Law Commission or a royal commission to look at the whole process, rather than somehow muddle through. We are beginning to get a bit of a muddle now, are we not?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not believe that I am raising false hope about access to justice. I return to the point I made about Colette Barrie. She was quite clear about this and I said that it is not for me or anyone else in Government or in politics to impose a conviction; it is about access to justice. She accepts that. She has said that she would be deeply disappointed if there were not more convictions and she believes that there will be more, but she accepts that this is about access to justice, so I do not think that we have ever given false hope. The position of Rape Crisis Scotland, Victim Support Scotland and Scottish Women’s Aid is the same, although—probably because of its strength—Colette’s testimony sticks in my mind most of all.

On safeguards, we have always had the same position. Once Lord Carloway published his report, we did a further review of safeguards, which took on the view of the senators of the College of Justice, which included the no case to answer submission—if we can put it that way—which is about the right of the judiciary to take the case away from the jury. If the committee feels it fit, we are happy to consider that we should not take the senators’ view on that.

Equally, as I said then, as I have said since and as I say again, we are open to other suggestions. That is why, when I meet James Wolffe and he raises the issue of dock identification, I say, “Fine; let us have a look at it.” I accept that 21st century dock ID has moved on from what it was when someone was charged with stealing a horse in the 19th century.

We are happy to take the time to get this right but, as I say, I believe that the right of victims such as Colette Barrie to access to justice is sacrosanct.

Alison McInnes: Do you not think that taking a pick-and-mix approach, with members throwing in amendments at stage 2 and other people coming forward with concerns, puts at risk the integrity of the system? Would it not be better to look in the round at all the possible safeguards that we would need and come up with a comprehensive package that assures everyone that there are still strong foundations that will protect everyone against miscarriages of justice?

Kenny MacAskill: That is what we seek to do and is where I hope we get to. I do not believe that a royal commission would be appropriate, nor do I believe that the Scottish Law Commission is in a position to accept such a review. However, we have time to make sure that we can give some consideration to ensuring that the system will operate fairly for all—for victims as well as for accused. The issue can be dealt with and we can stay on course. I will take on board the views of committee members about how it can be dealt with.

We are currently engaging with individuals and organisations to make sure that we take on board the points about appropriate safeguards and the interoperability of the system.

Alison McInnes: How will you determine when you have got it right? What test will determine that?

Kenny MacAskill: Ultimately, that will be for the Parliament.

The Convener: I agree with Alison McInnes. It seems that issues are being raised ad hoc about safeguards. I do not know whether the cabinet secretary has actually said that if the committee was to propose the super-affirmative procedure, he would be amenable to accepting that proposal.

Kenny MacAskill: I am happy to look at that.

The Convener: Before I let Margaret Mitchell come in, I will make that point plain because she might want to focus her questions. I have a note from the clerks about what that would mean; I was not too sure myself. If the provisions on corroboration were kept in the bill, they could be subject to the affirmative or the super-affirmative procedure; it would need to be specified in the bill. Affirmative procedure would allow the committee to consider whether the proposed additional safeguards would be sufficient; that would mean three weeks of evidence. The super-affirmative procedure, under which the committee has already considered prison visiting committees, would allow us to take more evidence before final orders were laid. The Government would have to put final, super-affirmative subordinate legislation to the Parliament for it to accept or reject the commencement of the provisions on corroboration. I hope that I have explained that properly. That is how the procedures would work. As the committee is talking about having real concerns about safeguards and so on, that is a procedure that could be used. I just thought that I had better explain it, because it does not come up very often.

Elaine Murray has a question; is it on this matter?

Elaine Murray: It is actually on Alison McInnes’s point about the Scottish Law Commission. The cabinet secretary has been very reluctant to refer the issue to the Scottish Law Commission but the Government has suggested that the third verdict be referred to the Scottish Law Commission, and we heard last week that section 53 of the Title Conditions (Scotland) Act 2003 is to be referred to the Scottish Law Commission, so why the reluctance to refer something as fundamental as the abolition of the requirement for corroboration and what will come in its place?

Kenny MacAskill: The view is that because of the nature of its staffing at the moment, the Scottish Law Commission is not necessarily best placed to deal with criminal matters. We do not think that the Scottish Law Commission is the appropriate place to go at the moment. It also has a pretty full calendar because of everything that has been put there and its on-going research. It has published its work programme and the difficulty is that it is lacking in the specific criminal skills, and it has limited time and ability.

Elaine Murray: But that is not the case for the third verdict.

Kenny MacAskill: Well, it has some time. We discussed that issue with it and it was going to take it on board. It has a new commissioner going in—Lord Pentland—but its resources in terms of criminal staff are not great, or huge in number.

The Convener: Roderick Campbell has a supplementary question.

Roderick Campbell: Just to clarify, it is my understanding that, in respect of section 53 of the Title Conditions (Scotland) Act 2003, the Scottish Law Commission could not commence work until 2015 anyway.

11:00

Kenny MacAskill: It has published its work programme—I cannot remember for how many years, but it is pretty busy. It does do criminal work but, if I recall correctly, Patrick Layden is on his own at present and is having to do everything.

The Convener: I call Margaret Mitchell.

Margaret Mitchell: I think that we should deal with the red herring of the affirmative/super-affirmative suggestion that you have thrown into the pot this morning, cabinet secretary. All that it means is that the Government would use its parliamentary majority to force through a decision on something that is causing widespread concern.

One thing is not in doubt this morning. You and I agree that access to justice is crucial. You said this morning that 3,000 victims of serious sexual assault do not get access to justice. The other side of the coin is the hundreds and thousands of people who go through our criminal justice system every year and have a right to a fair trial. That is what is in jeopardy. You are also raising the prospect of many more unsafe convictions, and you are doing this, it seems, because Lord Carloway's report and your own experience as a prosecutor in the courts, which was some time ago now, have led you to believe that the case has been made on corroboration.

Your evidence this morning has been confusing. Early on, you suggested that the case for corroboration is not proven, but I suggest to you that that is the case. The people who have come forward are not saying that we absolutely must retain it. A lot of us feel that we should retain it, but many are saying, "My goodness, why shouldn't we look at it?"

I want to nail this. How long did Lord Carloway spend looking at corroboration? I remind the cabinet secretary that the bill covers arrest and custody, arrest by police, custody of persons not officially accused, investigative liberation, police liberation, rights of suspects in custody and police powers and duties—we have not come to corroboration yet—as well as breach of liberation conditions, common law and enactments, disapplication and interpretation of parts, sentencing, appeals by the SCCRC and miscellaneous provisions. How long did he spend looking at corroboration?

Kenny MacAskill: I think that, rather than taking hearsay evidence, you would have been better to ask Lord Carloway that when he was here.

Margaret Mitchell: With respect, cabinet secretary, you are saying that the case has been made on corroboration because Lord Carloway has convinced you, yet you are asking me to go back and ask him how long he spent on it. Did you not ask him that?

Kenny MacAskill: It is not a matter of going back. You had him here before as a witness. You should probably have asked him the question.

Margaret Mitchell: Should you not have satisfied yourself before—

Kenny MacAskill: I have to say—

The Convener: Now, now. Can we not have a barney and talk over each other? Passion is wonderful, but can we have civility?

Kenny MacAskill: It was difficult to understand what the question was.

Margaret Mitchell: Do you know, cabinet secretary—

Kenny MacAskill: I think that the question was what period of time, in the one year in which Lord Carloway carried out his review, he spent on corroboration.

Margaret Mitchell: Yes.

Kenny MacAskill: I have to give you the answer, Ms Mitchell, that I cannot answer that. I do not know how long he had for coffee breaks or how long was applied to anything else. He was asked to carry out a review. He was appointed not by me but by the Lord President. He took time off from sitting on the bench to go away and investigate—

Margaret Mitchell: You have answered the question. You do not know, cabinet secretary.
Kenny MacAskill: I do not know. You would need to ask Lord Carloway—

Margaret Mitchell: Right. Well, I think that that is material if we are talking about evidence that he has produced that has convinced you overwhelmingly that the case on corroboration has been made. I turn to the Carloway expert review group. Do you know what it recommended?

Kenny MacAskill: It was split. Some did not agree and some did agree.

Margaret Mitchell: But do you know what the group recommended?

Kenny MacAskill: It was a reference group to Lord Carloway. It is Lord Carloway’s report that is put to me.

Margaret Mitchell: You do not know what it recommended. I will tell you, then, because we heard evidence on it. It recommended—

Kenny MacAskill: It was a reference group.

Margaret Mitchell: —that corroboration be put to a law commission. Okay?

Kenny MacAskill: It was a reference group to Lord Carloway.

Margaret Mitchell: Yes, and that is what it recommended to Lord Carloway.

Kenny MacAskill: And Lord Carloway made a report—

Margaret Mitchell: It seems that you did not know that, cabinet secretary.

The Convener: Please do not talk over each other. Please talk one at a time, because I am having difficulty hearing.

Margaret Mitchell: Did you know that information?

Kenny MacAskill: Lord Carloway made a report to me. I asked the Lord President for a judge to carry out a review after the Cadder decision. The Lord President appointed Lord Carloway, who had a reference group to give him support and advice. Lord Carloway produced the report, which he submitted to me. I am aware that many members of the reference group did not agree with his position on corroboration, but others, including the former chief constable of Lothian and Borders Police, David Strang, did. The report came to me and I support it, as I have said.

It is fair to say that what has persuaded me most that corroboration requires to go is not the eloquence of Lord Carloway or any other legal practitioner but the testimony of Colette Barrie. She has not given evidence before the committee, but she would be happy to do so or to give evidence directly to you.

Margaret Mitchell: Let us not go off at more of a tangent—you are an expert at doing that. You owe it to the hundreds of thousands of people who go through the criminal justice system every year, who expect a fair trial, to take the issue seriously and not go off at tangents.

The Convener: In fairness to the cabinet secretary, I do not think that he is not taking the issue seriously. I know that you and he are at opposite ends of the spectrum.

Margaret Mitchell: He should not go off at a tangent.

The Convener: The suggestion is most unfair. I accept Margaret Mitchell’s position, but I ask her to test more questions.

Margaret Mitchell: The question is about the fact that the cabinet secretary has said that the need is immediate and that we must get justice for the victims now. At the same time, he has said that it is important to take time to get this right.

The Scottish National Party Government has a majority. Surely any reasonable person would consider the weight of expert opinion that we have heard. There has been a damaging attempt to polarise opinion by placing the judiciary and the legal profession on one side and victims on the other, which does a huge disservice to victims, as we know from the evidence of the cross-party group on adult survivors of sexual abuse, for example, whose firm opinion is that the accused’s rights must be protected to get a fair trial for victims and ensure that justice is done. It does victims a disservice to use a numbers game and polarise opinion.

Given all that, your testimony today that you want to get this right and the fact that you have no clue how long Lord Carloway spent on looking at corroboration, is it not reasonable to give the issue not to the Law Commission, which we accept that you say is far too busy, but to a royal commission set up to look at the law of evidence, as Lord Gill suggests? It is clear from the evidence that we have heard and what you have said that that law is not being applied properly in court. Your evidence is contradictory—you say that corroboration has been whittled down to almost nothing, but it is also supposed to be a barrier. Given all that, surely any reasonable person would say that, while we look at possible safeguards, we should look at whether to retain or abolish the corroboration requirement.

Kenny MacAskill: No.

Margaret Mitchell: I did refer to any reasonable person.
The Convener: I am not having that, please—let us contain our emotions.

I have a question for completeness. A petition has been lodged to ask that, if the mandatory corroboration rule is abolished, that decision will have retrospective application. Will you address that point?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not think that retrospectivity can be brought in.

The Convener: Will you develop that a little? That would be helpful, as somebody has taken the trouble to bring a petition to the Parliament on the issue.

Kenny MacAskill: Retrospectivity would cause great difficulties for prosecution. I appreciate the sensitivity, because people have suffered injustice. However, there must be clarity and certainty. I say to Ms Mitchell that that comes back to the point that the law must be understandable. People must know whether the law applies to them. Retrospectivity causes difficulties with that. Our position is that retrospectivity would not be possible, although I have sympathy for those who seek to bring it in.

The Convener: I call John Finnie.

John Finnie: Has Margaret Mitchell finished?

Margaret Mitchell: I am finished.

The Convener: I did not just wade in.

John Finnie: I asked in case you thought that I had a supplementary question, convener.

The Convener: I did not think that.

John Finnie: My question is about Romano- whatever law—Romano-Greco law?

Kenny MacAskill: Romano-canonical law.

The Convener: Romano-Greco—that sounds like a restaurant.

John Finnie: Cabinet secretary, you said that a lot has changed since people were being charged with horse thefts and the like. That is the case, because we now have CCTV, IT, mobile phones, forensic science, DNA and a record number of police officers—we are able to use all those resources. That is all the more reason to acquire corroborative evidence, many would say.

Kenny MacAskill: It is about justice. One of the interesting discussions that I had with the chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission and his colleagues was on that point. As we know, because of ECHR, a victim might choose eventually to go to Europe to challenge the system because they are not getting access to justice. People have gone to Europe frequently about convictions or whatever.

At some stage or other, it is possible that a victim would go to Europe and Scotland could face significant difficulties if we were challenged—we have the UN report relating to sexual offences. We have to prepare for that possibility and certainly the SHRC accepts that it is within the bounds of credibility that such a challenge could come. Perhaps, as in other instances, such a challenge has not been brought so far because the poor and the victims tend not to have access to the lawyers.

One of the other aspects of the proposal is about ensuring that Scots law is fit for purpose, can sustain challenges from the ECHR or wherever and provides that correct equilibrium for the scales of justice.

John Finnie: So the Scottish Government's position is that Scots law as it stands, with the requirement for corroboration, is challengeable under the ECHR.

Kenny MacAskill: It could be challenged, yes.

John Finnie: That point does not feature in any of the previous representations, explanatory notes, policy memoranda and so on that we have had. When did it come to light, cabinet secretary?

Kenny MacAskill: I have discussed the matter with past Lord Advocates.

John Finnie: And yet we have nothing in our papers to suggest that and I would have thought that it is of great significance.

Kenny MacAskill: The Lord Advocate has expressed concerns. I have certainly had discussions not simply with the current Lord Advocate but with past Lord Advocates about the possibility that, ultimately, we could face difficulties if a challenge was brought.

John Finnie: What changes would there be in work practices and attitudes were the requirement for corroboration to be removed from the Scots law system—in particular with regard to police officers? I asked Mr Graham about the amount of effort a police officer would put in with regard to someone who was the subject of a single witness accusation, perhaps with some CCTV evidence or whatever. Would the police be going out looking for evidence that would support the assertion of the accused that he had not committed the offence?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes—if we accept the position of the Lord Advocate, the police would always look for additional evidence. Probably the easiest way, once they had heard from one witness, would be to try to get a second or third witness. It would only be in cases where the police were restricted in terms of witnesses that they would not try to get that evidence from witnesses and they would look for additional evidence.
I think that the work practices of police would remain exactly the same. If there was an incident and a large number of witnesses were there, the police would get as many witness statements as possible. They might cite only a few of them, but that is probably the situation at present. You probably know of instances yourself in which there might have been 100 people who saw an offence. That does not mean that all 100 of them would be called—the police would probably just have noted their details—but it would help to make sure that charges were brought. I do not think that the proposal will make any difference to the work practices of the police.

The proposal will ensure that we avoid duplication of resources in matters that are not fundamental to the case—as in the example of two officers having to go down to London to collect a CD-ROM. You have probably experienced such situations yourself. The kernel of the matter comes back to what Lord Carloway was saying: it is about the quality, not the quantity, of evidence; it is about making sure that the case is proven; and it is about making sure that there is a sufficiency of evidence.

That is why we are looking at building on the qualitative and quantitative test by the Lord Advocate—the evidential and prosecutorial test. Is there sufficiency there? Is it in the public interest? Is there not just a single source but additional evidence? If there are several sources, that is what you want. If it is a situation with only one eyewitness, what additional evidence can you get? Is it that the pants of the perpetrator look the same as the description given by the young girl? Is it that she was able to identify a locus that she does not know? Is it that she is clearly able to express all those things? Those are all additional pieces of evidence but, at present, because of the arbitrary rule of corroboration, such a case cannot go to trial. However, in any other western democracy, it would proceed and it would be for the jury to decide. I do not think that the measure will change the practices of the police, apart from getting rid of the duplication that I think everybody concedes is unnecessary.

11:15

The Convener: Can I stop you a minute because everybody is chipping in again? I will let the discussion be exhausted but, just for enlightenment, I will tell members who is waiting to ask questions. Alison McInnes is indicating that she has only a small question, but I have a lot of members doing that. I have questions from Roderick Campbell, Sandra White, Elaine Murray, Christian Allard and now Alison McInnes. I am happy to take you all, but let us not go over old ground—let us pick up new things. I ask John Finnie whether he has finished. I see that he is perched and ready to go.

John Finnie: I have a question on one further issue.

The Convener: Okay—as long as it is new.

John Finnie: It is regarding domestic violence. There has been a welcome change of approach, certainly since I was in the constabulary a long time ago. As I understand it, following the Lord Advocate’s guidelines, perpetrators, who are overwhelmingly male, can be arrested on uncorroborated evidence and detained in custody, only for the case not to proceed to court when the fiscal gets the papers in the morning. I understand that another dimension is the growing practice of counter-accusations through which the initial alleged victim finds themselves the subject of an accusation, and both parties are arrested. Under Cadder, both parties summon solicitors, who give advice that it would be inappropriate to say anything, which results in a logjam. That is in no one’s interest. Were we to remove corroboration, do you fear that there would be more counter-accusations? That is happening with corroboration.

Kenny MacAskill: No. The issue that you raise relates to the policy that is operated by the Crown and the police. That relates to a zero tolerance policy and to better training for police officers in relation to what they are looking for. I do not think that the law of corroboration makes any difference to that, so I do not think that the change would affect police policy.

Roderick Campbell: Just for good order, I refer to my entry in the register of interests, which shows that I am a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

To follow on from the point that John Finnie made about the ECHR, I think that I am right in saying that Dame Elish Angiolini made a speech on the issue last year. That might not be in the policy memorandum, but it is certainly something that previous Lord Advocates have talked about.

The Convener: What did she say?

Roderick Campbell: She talked about the policy of challenge under the ECHR if corroboration was not abolished.

The Convener: That is helpful.

Roderick Campbell: Again for good order, I want to refer to a comment by Lord Gill, who said:

My suggestion is that there should be an examination of all the various safeguards in the criminal system in the round. There could be, for example, reconsideration of the admissibility of certain statements, a re-examination of the use that can be made of confessions, a re-examination of the right of the accused not to testify, an examination of the right of the accused to withhold his defence at the earliest stage of a prosecution, and so on.—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3720.]

In considering safeguards, will you take on board the Lord President’s comments?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes. Some of those aspects might be for other reviews, but all of them would at least have to be considered initially as to whether they would be appropriate. It is becoming clearer to me that the issue is not simply about safeguards and the number of them; it is also about the operability of the systems and other aspects, such as those that the Lord President raised, which you have correctly touched on. We are happy to take the appropriate steps to ensure that we consider those.

Sandra White: I have a small point of clarification that is similar to the point that Rod Campbell made earlier. Perhaps the clerks could check this, but I seem to recall that, in evidence to the committee, Lord Carloway said that he was protecting the Scottish Parliament against someone taking a case to the European Court of Human Rights, which could happen if we still had corroboration.

The Convener: In considering our report, we can go back to look at the evidence.

Sandra White: John Finnie said that he had not seen any evidence on that, but I am almost certain that it was part of the evidence.

John Finnie: If that is the case, I accept that.

The Convener: We will deal with that issue when we look over the evidence that we have received. Members are beginning to exchange with one another and we are getting evidence from members.

Sandra White: Sorry—I just wanted to point that out.

Elaine Murray: I return to the possibility of the requirement for supportive evidence being put into the bill. That would change it from being a bill that abolishes the requirement for corroborative evidence to one that replaces it with a requirement for supportive evidence, which is quite different.

I am quite attracted to that idea on the first glance, but we would need time to take evidence on it to see whether it would satisfy some of the concerns that have been raised with us. We received a lot of evidence—a big file of it—from people on both sides of the argument. Would you, on behalf of the Scottish Government, be prepared to give time for that as the bill goes through the Parliament? Secondly, and importantly, why did you not put that provision in the bill in the first place before it was introduced to Parliament?

Kenny MacAskill: We consulted on safeguards. It is becoming clear to me that the issue is not only safeguards but the operability of the system. We seek to get as much consensus as possible. Sometimes, it is not possible to get consensus. We have, on one side, those who say that corroboration can never go and, on the other, those who think that it has to.

We are persuaded that corroboration has to go. We recognise the need for safeguards, which is why we have collaborated on a few. We are aware of continuing concerns, which is why we have always said that the door is open. We have even had discussions within the past fortnight or so. The Faculty of Advocates raised dock identification, to which we were perfectly happy to give consideration. Roderick Campbell made a good point about other aspects, so we are happy to consider that.

It is about getting the balance right, as Sandra White said, within time. We are happy to take time to try to ensure that we get it right. We think that the principle is established that corroboration is past its sell-by date and archaic. Equally, you make a good point. With the removal of corroboration, we have an opportunity to decide what is necessary to prove a case. We can take time to ensure that we set that out.

The Convener: Would that be incorporated in the prosecutorial guidance that, if I have kept my bearings during the discussion, you are now considering putting into the bill?

Kenny MacAskill: The prosecutorial test would go into the bill. Prosecutorial guidance is a matter for the Lord Advocate.

The Convener: I understand that; sorry, that was my mistake. The prosecutorial test—

Kenny MacAskill: That could go into the bill.

The Convener: Would that be a place to put something like that?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes, that would be the place to do it.

The Convener: Before I get any more confused, I call Christian Allard to be followed by Alison McInnes. After that I want to have a suspension before we move on to the next set of questions, if that is all right with members.

Christian Allard: Thank you, convener. I do not want you to be more confused about that matter, but I am confused about something that I heard. It concerns the number of prosecutions and convictions that there will be if we remove the requirement for corroboration.

At the start of the debate, the people who did not want to remove the requirement for corroboration claimed that there would be no increase in the number of cases brought to prosecution. When I asked Lord Gill about that, he answered no, there would not be an increase. When I pushed him on it, he answered that it might increase the number of prosecutions. Again, we are not sure whether the numbers will or will not increase.

We heard from Margaret Mitchell that many more unsafe convictions could arise if we remove the requirement for corroboration, but Lord Gill said that he was not convinced that it would increase the number of convictions. I would like your views, cabinet secretary: what would it be?

The Convener: I do not think that Lord Gill said that it would increase the number of convictions. Do you have that in front of you?

Christian Allard: He said:

“1 am not convinced that it would increase the number of convictions.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3727.]

The Convener: That is correct.

Christian Allard: That does not add up to many more unsafe convictions.

Roderick Campbell: The issue is the number of cases in which there might be a miscarriage of justice, not the number of convictions per se.

The Convener: Yes. The evidence from the SCCRC was that it thought that there would be more unsafe convictions and, therefore, that more appeals would go to it. That was another point, so there were two points there.

Christian Allard: Nevertheless, my question is on the number of convictions.

Kenny MacAskill: I do not believe that there would be an increase in the number of miscarriages of justice, as Lord Carloway made clear, and certainly not when the appropriate safeguards are in place. We already have an SCCRC, unlike many other countries, excepting England and Norway.

The removal of the corroboration requirement will increase access to justice, and it is likely that increased access to justice will lead to more convictions, but we cannot confirm or guarantee that any particular offence that is prosecuted as a result of that increased access would result in a conviction. As Sandra White said, it is likely that more people who might previously have pleaded not guilty despite the evidence or in the hope that the evidence would not hang together, thinking that they would be able to evade justice, might plead guilty and acknowledge their offending.

The Convener: We will move on. Alison McInnes will have the last word.

Alison McInnes: Mr MacAskill, you said in response to John Finnie’s question about police practice following the abolition of the corroboration requirement that there would not be many changes apart from a reduction in the duplication of resources. Have you quantified the savings that might be made in police and forensic services if they did not need to have all those double resources?

Kenny MacAskill: Her Majesty’s inspector of constabulary was going to do some work in that area, but he has not yet reported on the costs of duplication, which are hard to quantify. The abolition of duplication will not create financial savings as such, but it will mean that two officers who have to go down to London to pick a CD-ROM—

The Convener: We do not need to hear about two officers and a CD anymore; I think we all know about that by now.

Kenny MacAskill: I got the example from the federation—

The Convener: I know—forgive me, cabinet secretary. We accept the example of the two officers and the CD, but I think that the point has been made.

Kenny MacAskill: To conclude, rather than having two officers going to London—I do not need to expand on that—perhaps one officer will go while the other will stay on the beat in Aberdeen, Glasgow or wherever. That is replicated so that, in future, rather than two forensic scientists doing something, one of them could get on with some analysis. They would be able to do the work that they are paid to do rather than simply having to sign a chitty to say, “I was there too.”

The Convener: I appreciate that. I am beginning to wonder what was on that CD-ROM, but we will park that subject.

We have finished this session, and I suspend the meeting for a five-minute break, which is much needed by the convener and possibly by others, including the cabinet secretary.

11:27

Meeting suspended.

11:34

On resuming—

The Convener: We are back, refreshed and energised, and we move to the second set of questions, on the sheriff and jury proposals in part 3 of the bill. The cabinet secretary and his officials are still with us. I seek questions from members, although I do not see the flurry of hands that we had in the previous session—I do not know why.

Margaret Mitchell has a question.
Margaret Mitchell: On the proposal to increase the majority that is required for a conviction in jury cases, is there not a problem with considering that as a safeguard?

I am wondering whether I am on the right subject here.

The Convener: I do not think so.

Margaret Mitchell: No, I am not—my apologies.

The Convener: That issue is related to corroboration, and that moment has passed.

I hope that your point was not about a CD. You are not one of those two policemen, are you? No.

Margaret Mitchell: My apologies.

The Convener: That is okay. John Finnie will go next.

John Finnie: Cabinet secretary, the bill contains some wide-ranging proposals to improve the business management of the court system. In the past, the introduction of intermediate diets was intended to serve a similar purpose. Why would such a change work this time if it has not worked previously?

Kenny MacAskill: It has worked in the High Court. We are discussing sheriff and jury cases, and the proposals are predicated not so much on bringing back the intermediate diets that were introduced in the 20th century as on Lord Bonomy’s report at the start of the noughties, on which the changes to the High Court were based. The change has worked remarkably well there and, given the nature of the High Court, it should work reasonably well in sheriff and jury cases. It is different from what has taken place in summary cases, and the changes in the High Court are the main comparator.

John Finnie: I acknowledge that my experience in relation to such matters is from a previous century.

Kenny MacAskill: As is mine.

John Finnie: Yes. With regard to the secure email system and the question of ownership that was discussed, will that provide challenges given the additional number of sheriff and jury cases in comparison with the number of High Court cases?

Kenny MacAskill: We face challenges with the IT system at present, so we know that there will be challenges, but we have to make those changes anyway, and I am confident that Crown prosecutors and everyone else will be able to resolve the issues. That will take time, but we already know that the IT systems require to be improved across the justice domain. New systems bring challenges, but we are changing the system to get it right.

Roderick Campbell: We heard in our second evidence session on the bill from representatives of the Faculty of Advocates and the Crown Office. There was discussion about whether, under section 46, the written record of the state of preparation should be a joint statement, or whether the prosecution and defence could both sign and prepare their own statements, in which case the bill would require to be amended. Do you have any comments on that?

Kenny MacAskill: We are aware of the concerns about who will do what, so we are happy to review the issue and see how we can resolve it.

Roderick Campbell: Secondly, do you have any comments on the resource implications of those proposals?

Kenny MacAskill: We have set out those details in the financial memorandum. There will be increased costs through legal aid that we will have to address, but there will also be savings in the systems as a result—it is hoped—of having fewer citations not just for witnesses and jurors but for specialist witnesses. We know that there are issues to be addressed, but we have quantified the costs and worked with the relevant agencies, and we believe that we can manage them.

The Convener: When you say that you will go away and look at the issue of the written statement about the state of play in a trial, I take it that you are sympathetic to the submission of separate records by the prosecution and the defence. I can recall there being difficulties with a civil minute of agreement, where one party got the blame when it was the other party that was dragging their feet.

Kenny MacAskill: I am happy to try to ensure that we get that right. Perhaps Kathleen McInulty can comment on that.

Kathleen McInulty (Scottish Government): Yes. The issue needs to be considered and given further thought because if there are separate schedules it is likely to take sheriffs longer to assimilate the information. Indeed, because of the volume of cases, it is likely to have a more significant impact on the sheriff court rather than the High Court.

The Convener: But you take my point that if the Crown or the defence were dragging its feet you would at least know that if each side had to have the schedule in within the appropriate time.

Kathleen McInulty: Yes.

The Convener: I will press the point no further but will simply say that such an approach would be fairer to both parties.

Margaret Mitchell: On section 67 and compulsory business meetings, the Government has decided that such meetings could be held by electronic means and—contrary to the Bowen review, which recommended that they be held before indictment—that they should be held after indictment but before the first trial. Why was that decision taken and will the timing make the business management meeting any less effective?

Kenny MacAskill: The defence and prosecution both preferred the meeting to be held post service of the indictment because it would give them the opportunity to focus on the matter. I understand that when Sheriff Principal Bowen gave evidence to the committee he indicated that he was happy and content with such an approach. Everyone is happy for the meeting to be held at that point. I can certainly see the logic in that; when the indictment is served, it focuses minds on the charge that is being faced while, prior to that, some edging around goes on. We have simply gone with what all those involved seem to have wanted.

Margaret Mitchell: What has the Scottish Government done to ensure that resource pressures do not hamper the reform’s effective implementation?

Kenny MacAskill: We seek to fund all the agencies and parties involved from the Scottish Legal Aid Board through to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service and the Scottish Court Service and each is aware of the challenges. We have taken account of all this; in some areas, there will be savings while, in others, there will be expenditure but we have prepared for all that and believe that we are capable of dealing with it.

Margaret Mitchell: Are there any lessons to be learned from the High Court reforms, which introduced something very similar that has worked well?

Kenny MacAskill: The lesson to be learned is that the sheriff and jury procedure is much more akin to the procedure in the High Court. We know that the volume of cases in the sheriff and jury system is greater but you are quite correct that there is good practice in the High Court, including the earlier resolution of cases, and that the reforms have worked well. Sheriff Principal Bowen looked at that and we are seeking to expand it. The challenge is that there are more cases in the sheriff and jury system but the principles, such as taking an early focus, minimising what has to be discussed and debated and ensuring that we inconveniencce people as little as possible if they do not have to be cited or called, are the same.

Margaret Mitchell: Thank you.

Elaine Murray: I am reasonably content with most of the provisions in this part of the bill but I want to probe the approach taken in section 65, which changes the pre-trial time limits, and the Scottish Government’s analysis of the responses to the Bowen report. For example, some people felt that there was no strong justification for change and I wonder whether you can give us any information on the proportion of sheriff and jury custody cases in which the court agreed to extend the current 110-day limit.

Kenny MacAskill: We do not have that information because it is not recorded. However, we know how things are operating in the High Court following Lord Bonomy’s review and that Lord Bonomy himself said that “the real jewel in the crown” of solemn procedure was the requirement for someone on remand to have their indictment served within 80 days. That remains sacrosanct and the extension of the limit from 110 to 140 days puts solemn procedure in the sheriff and jury system in line with that in the High Court. We have retained the principle that the indictment has to be served within 80 days but the change simply takes into account the complexities of many cases as a result of forensics and other aspects.

Elaine Murray: The limit can be extended at the moment but we do not know how many cases have required such an extension.

Kenny MacAskill: No.

Kathleen McInulty: Those figures are available for High Court cases but, as I understand it, they are not recorded in the management information systems for sheriff and jury cases. Instead, that information is recorded in the written minute of the court proceedings.

The Convener: Do we have the figures for High Court cases?

Kathleen McInulty: According to the Scottish Court Service’s 2012-13 annual report, it was normal for there to be at least one extension of the 140-day rule in cases.

Elaine Murray: The 110-day rule.

The Convener: The 110-day rule.

Kathleen McInulty: I am sorry—it was 140 days in the High Court.

Elaine Murray: Of course.

The Convener: Of course. [Laughter.] It is like a duet.

Elaine Murray: Will you consider monitoring the extension of the limit in sheriff court cases to get some idea whether the 140 days is appropriate?

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to do so, but the fact is that High Court cases are by their very nature likely to be more complicated than sheriff and jury cases. However, as we stated in response to Sheriff Principal Bowen, we intend to monitor the implementation of the proposals.
When the limit was 110 days, any extension was granted reluctantly and, with the change to 140 days, the situation will have to be monitored to ensure that any extension is granted only with good cause. There are checks and balances and there is, of course, the opportunity to seek bail in some instances.

The Convener: I am not going to look at the rest of the committee but I do not think that anyone else has put up their hand to ask a question. I therefore thank the cabinet secretary and his officials very much for their attendance.

As agreed earlier, we now move into private for item 3.
Written evidence to the Justice Committee

Aberdeen City Council Appropriate Adult Service
Aberlour Child Care Trust
ASSIST
Association of Scottish Police Superintendents
Auchie, Derek P, University of Aberdeen
Barnardo's Scotland
Barrie, Colette
Barrie, Colette (supplementary submission)
Chalmers, Professor James; Farmer, Professor Lindsay; and Leverick, Professor Fiona; University of Glasgow Chalmers, Professor James (supplementary submission))
Children in Scotland
Children Are Unbeatable! Scotland
Community Safety Glasgow
Convention of Scottish Local Authorities
Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (supplementary submission)
Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (supplementary submission)
Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (supplementary submission)
Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (supplementary submission)
Duff, Professor Peter, University of Aberdeen
Edinburgh Bar Association
Equality and Human Rights Commission Scotland Evangelical Alliance
Faculty of Advocates
False Allegations Support Organisation
Families Outside
Ferguson, Professor Pamela R, University of Dundee and Davidson, Fraser P, University of Stirling
Glasgow Bar Association
Green, Hayley; Bremner, Val; and Sharp, Laura; Robert Gordon University
Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland
Highland Violence Against Women
Howard League for Penal Reform in Scotland
JUSTICE Scotland
Law Society of Scotland
Law Society of Scotland (supplementary submission)
Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland
Petal
Police Scotland
Police Scotland (supplementary submission)
Police Scotland (supplementary submission)
Rape Crisis Scotland
Salvation Army
Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People
Scottish Appropriate Adult Network
Scottish Association for Mental Health
Scottish Child Law Centre
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Aberdeen City Council Appropriate Adult Service

Introduction

1. Aberdeen City Council operates and supports the “Appropriate Adult” service within the Aberdeen City geographical boundary. Appropriate Adults presently facilitate communication between the police and adults (persons aged 16 or over) who have a mental disorder. This is defined as “any mental illness, personality disorder, learning disability however caused or manifested”. In practice this includes people with acquired brain injury, autistic spectrum disorder and dementia.

2. Aberdeen City Council presently has no legislative requirement to support or coordinate an Appropriate Adult service. The service is currently provided by the Council on a voluntary basis using its existing resources and there is no dedicated funding to support the running and development of the Appropriate Adult scheme.

3. This submission will primarily confine itself to the specific sections of the Bill that relate to “Vulnerable Persons” [s.33 and s.34] – as these have significant relevance to Appropriate Adult services. Reference will also be made to the Bill’s policy memorandum and explanatory notes, where they refer to and/or elucidate those sections of the Bill.

General

4. Overall, Aberdeen City Council welcomes the recognition in the Bill of the need for support to those considered vulnerable whilst in police custody. Although Appropriate Adult services have been in place in Scotland (in one form or another) since 1990, this is the first legislative recognition for the service. However various agencies have made specific reference to Appropriate Adult services previously (for example Guidance on Appropriate Adult Schemes (Scottish Office Circular No: SWSG8/98), and the Lord Advocate’s instruction to Chief Constables in relation to Appropriate Adults and the waiving of legal advice – dated 27 September 2012).

5. However, Aberdeen City Council has concerns in relation to ‘age range’, ‘responsibility’ and ‘funding’ as we feel these issues will become increasingly significant if/when the Bill becomes law.

Age range of provision of appropriate adult services

6. It is recognised that the Bill extends provision for a ‘responsible person’ to 16 and 17 year olds. However, there are some concerns that this will mean that 16 and 17 year olds with a mental disorder, who presently get the specialist support of an Appropriate Adult under the informal system, will no longer automatically get the same access to this support. The ‘responsible person’ would not be required to have the same abilities/training in supporting communication and understanding as the Appropriate Adult. There is therefore a real risk of disadvantaging 16 and 17 year olds who have a mental disorder whilst in police custody.

7. It is recognised that nothing in the Bill prevents the informal use of Appropriate Adults to support 16 and 17 year olds in police custody. However we do feel that there is potentially a missed opportunity here to ensure that 16 and 17 year olds with mental disorder get access to an Appropriate Adult in the same way as those aged 18 and above.

8. It is therefore Aberdeen City Council’s suggestion that the definition contained in s.33(1) be expanded to include 16 and 17 year olds.

Responsibility for provision of appropriate adult services and associated funding

9. It is noted that s.34 allows Scottish Ministers to make further provisions as to who may be considered suitable to provide “Appropriate Adult” type support. However, we are unclear if this provision will allow for the stipulation of who will be responsible for ensuring the provision of Appropriate Adults as a service. From our reading of the Bill it does not appear to do so.

10. We note that paragraph 128 of the policy memorandum for the Bill states that “The Scottish Government does not intend at present to make any particular body statutorily responsible for the delivery of Appropriate Adult services...with the expectation that the non-statutory service will continue to run alongside these statutory provisions”.

11. In addition, we also note the statement in paragraph 236 of the Bill’s explanatory notes that “The provisions in the Bill in relation to vulnerable adult suspects will be of interest to local authorities but will not entail additional costs as Appropriate Adult Services are provided at present on a non-statutory basis”.

12. Aberdeen City Council has grave concerns in regards to the assumptions underpinning the two statements quoted above. It is our view that not making a particular body responsible for the provision of Appropriate Adult services could prove highly problematic. It is also our view that the belief that there will be no additional costs as a result of the vulnerable adult suspect provisions in the Bill is wildly optimistic.

13. It is our view that the formalising of the duties on the Police to contact a suitable person (i.e. an Appropriate Adult) via s.33(2) is very likely to result in an increase in requests for Appropriate Adults. Aberdeen City Appropriate Adult service has already experienced an increase in requests following the circulation of the Lord Advocate’s instruction in 2012. We anticipate further increases if the Bill’s ‘vulnerable person’ provisions go live. This would be expected as a consequence of the increased visibility of the requirement, alongside a focus on compliance with the Bills’ provisions.

14. At present, some Appropriate Adult services in Scotland receive funding from various bodies (local health boards, Police Scotland, Local Authorities etc) to employ Appropriate Adults and pay for the administration of their schemes. Other Appropriate Adult services, however, do not receive any funding from any agency at all – except, perhaps, ‘in-kind’ support in relation to training, infrastructure and some staff member time.

15. At present, ‘Appropriate Adult’ services which do not have dedicated funding from public agencies struggle at times to meet current requests from the Police – particularly at weekends and outside of working hours.

16. We may therefore have, with the Bill’s provisions, the difficult situation where there is an increase in demand for Appropriate Adult services due to the requirement for the police to seek those services, but no clear responsibility for meeting that subsequent demand.

17. There therefore may be the real risk that agencies which are providing Appropriate Adult services ‘informally’ - with no dedicated funding, and no legal requirement to do so, may withdraw from providing this service. This would be due to the significant pressures on their existing resources to meet an increasing demand when they have no statutory obligation to do so.

18. As a result, there may be the difficult situation where the police have a legal responsibility to seek the services of an Appropriate Adult but are unable to meet this responsibility if there is either no Appropriate Adult service to call upon or the existing Appropriate Adult service lacks sufficient resources to respond.

19. It is Aberdeen City Council’s view that the issue of responsibility and funding for Appropriate Adult services must be addressed if a statutory duty to seek Appropriate Adults is being given to the police. To do otherwise may (at a minimum) lead to inequalities in Appropriate Adult service/access throughout Scotland, and may (in a worst case scenario) lead to the withdrawal of existing Appropriate Adult services where responsibility and funding to meet increased demand cannot be agreed. This would be to the significant disadvantage of adults with mental disorders who have contact with the police.

Summary

20. Aberdeen City Council is delighted to see Appropriate Adult services recognised in statute (albeit tangentially).

21. There are some concerns about the potential disadvantage to 16 and 17 years from not being included in the standard ‘requirement’ for the police to notify in s.33(2).

22. More fundamentally, there are very significant concerns that the lack of clarity in relation to who is responsible for providing and funding Appropriate Adult services may lead to significant service delivery problems if/when the ‘vulnerable person’ provisions go ‘live’.

Aberdeen City Council Appropriate Adult Service
August 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Aberlour Child Care Trust

About Aberlour
Aberlour is Scotland’s largest solely Scottish children’s charity. Working in over 40 locations across Scotland in fields such as disabilities; residential and foster care for looked after children and parental substance use, we’ve been helping to improve the lives of Scotland’s most vulnerable children, young people and their families for 140 years.

Our service portfolio links into criminal justice issues in a number of areas, including the work we do in HMP Cornton Vale supporting the Mother and Baby Unit there; in working with young unaccompanied asylum seekers and victims of trafficking in Scotland’s only guardianship service; in our street based youth work service YouthPoint which seeks to offer diversionary activities to young people who might otherwise be associated with antisocial behaviour and in our work with families affected by parental substance use. As such we have a keen interest in certain aspects of the draft bill. We shall restrict our comments to only those sections of the Bill which pertain to children in general or those areas in which we work.

The age of criminal responsibility
The Scottish Government’s 2012 publication reporting on its action plan to deliver progress against the 2008 concluding observations of the UN Committee of the Rights of the Child: ‘Do the right thing – a progress report’ stated:

‘Following the raising of the age of criminal prosecution in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, we will give fresh consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12 with a view to bringing forward any legislative change in the lifetime of this Parliament.’

Given that this Bill represents an entirely appropriate legislative vehicle for such a change, we were dismayed that no such provision has been made in the Bill, particularly when sections 31-33 deal directly with protecting the rights of child suspects.

We strongly urge the Committee to consider using this Bill as an opportunity to act on the Scottish Government’s 2012 commitment to the UN Committee by increasing the age of criminal responsibility to 12.

The rights of child suspects
We welcome provisions in chapter 5 sections 30-33 of the Bill which seek to ensure that the highest standards of protection are offered to children in the formal justice system. Ensuring access to the support of a parent, carer or other responsible person goes some way to honouring our country’s outstanding commitments to article 37 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. As such we would urge the committee to seek explicit reference to article 37 in sections 30-33 of the Bill.
Provision of advocacy to child suspects - chapter 5 section 32
Section 32 supports the right of under 18’s in custody to have ready access to the person or persons intimated about their arrest. The Bill stipulates that this will normally be the child’s parent or carer or other ‘responsible person’. Where it is inappropriate for the parent or carer to support the child in custody or they cannot be located, the Bill suggests that it will be up to the local authority to appoint a ‘responsible person’ to support that child.

We feel that this section would be strengthened with an explicit provision for a right to independent advocacy in the context of the ‘other person’ that a child may have access to in section 32. This would be consistent with section 122 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act which gives the right to the service of a trained advocate for children appearing before the panel. Such a right to advocacy must be underpinned by the standards defined in the Government’s guidance: ‘Independent Advocacy and Guide to Commissioners 2013’

A trained advocate is different but complimentary to the role of a solicitor in this regard in that they are trained to interpret what is happening for the child in question and communicate the point of view of the child more effectively. If we recognise the needs of children to have access to the service of a trained advocate in the legally sanctioned proceedings of a children’s panel, to cut through technical language and processes on behalf of a child, then we should make similar provision in the formal criminal justice system.

The repeal of section 51 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003
Section 51 of the 2003 Act creates a legal defence of ‘justifiable assault’ for parents who hit their children (with certain limitations). It is our contention that this defence is unlawful and in direct contravention to our commitments to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and as one of only 5 member states still to offer such a defence, that we should now take the opportunity afforded by this bill to consider giving equal protection from assault for our children by repealing it.

In the past, proponents of retaining the ‘Justifiable assault’ defence have argued that without this defence we would criminalise the normal parenting behaviour of thousands of Scottish parents who would subsequently be charged and possibly imprisoned. Organisations like ours who support the removal of this defence have sought not to criminalise parents but to bring about a cultural shift, through legislation that would end physical punishment in the same way legislation shifted attitudes to smoking in public places.

The element of discretion afforded to police constables in clauses 1-3 of Chapter 1 Section 1: Power of a Constable in the Bill could support the possible repeal of section 51 of the 2003 Act. This section establishes a reality in which constables are further encouraged to exercise judgement and proportionality when deciding whether to arrest. This would support the cultural shift intended in the repeal of section 51 without leading to the unnecessary criminalisation or prosecution of hundreds of parents.

We ask that the committee consider the repeal of the ‘justifiable assault’ defence in the context of Chapter 1 in this Bill.
Definition of well-being

Section 42 (subsection 2) covers the consideration of a child’s best interests when a constable is deciding whether to place a child under arrest. That subsection states:

> In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child as a primary consideration.

We are not clear why the Government has sought to prioritise the well-being of the child when the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, makes a child’s welfare the primary concern.

The Scottish Government uses the term ‘well-being’ interchangeably but the most prevalent definition of well-being is found in the application of Getting it Right for Every Child in the context of the Government’s SHANARRI well-being indicators. Whilst the intent of this subsection is to be welcomed, we would contend that depriving a child of their liberty may not always be compatible with SHANARRI indicators. As such, if the intent is to proceed with the definition of well-being we would like to see explicit reference to GIRFEC and SHANARRI well-being indicators in the context of section 42 either on the face of the Bill or in robust guidance underpinning this.

Aggravation in connection with people trafficking

Working with Scotland’s young unaccompanied asylum seekers, many of whom have been trafficked into this country against their will, we warmly welcome the aggravation that this Bill seeks to attach to an offence connected with people trafficking in section 83.

Alex Cole-Hamilton
Head of Policy
29 August 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from ASSIST

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. ASSIST, functioning since 2004, is a Specialist Independent Domestic Abuse Advocacy Service. The aim of ASSIST is to ensure all victims of Domestic Abuse are safe, informed and supported throughout their involvement with the criminal justice process.

ASSIST is colocated with Police Scotland in Glasgow, East Kilbride, Clydebank, Kilmarnock and Renfrew. ASSIST provides information daily to the Procurators Fiscal in all the courts in the legacy Strathclyde Police Force area and is linked to the Specialist Domestic Abuse Courts at Glasgow and Ayr Sheriff Courts and, for male victims, Edinburgh’s Domestic Abuse Cluster Court. ASSIST provides a service to half of Scotland’s population and is the only Scottish organisation to achieve accreditation through CAADA’s Leading Lights process.

We welcome some aspects of the bill for example, the abolition of corroboration, however we have major concerns that the proposals around investigative liberation if applied to victims of domestic abuse will be dangerous and lead to victims’ experiencing further harm.

Any changes to the way domestic abuse is policed or prosecuted should only be taken forward if it is considered that the change would improve the current situation either in terms of victim safety or perpetrator accountability.

Rather than improving the current situation, these proposals are dangerous. In their current form, they will increase the risk to victims and could deter victims coming forward to report what is happening to them. From a victim’s perspective, the effect of this change is that the issue of domestic abuse is being downgraded to a minor crime, which flies in the face of all the work that has been done by successive Scottish Governments.

ASSIST receives direct referrals from the police after a domestic incident and contacts the victims within 24 hours. The current period between arrest and appearance in court allows a robust risk assessment and safety planning process to be carried out and in areas where ASSIST operates, information to be provided to the Sheriff to inform her/his decision at the initial hearing of the case, usually the following day. Sheriffs regularly say to us that they see the gap when they sit in other courts, particularly family courts.

The current procedures also indicate to both the Accused and the victim that Scottish society views domestic abuse very seriously. Given the complexities of domestic abuse and the close relationship between the Accused and the victim, the power of this should not be underestimated.
The literature on domestic abuse risk assessment for example by Dr Amanda Robinson amongst others, states clearly that the victim’s fear is a crucial element that requires to be taken into account when considering the risk of further violence by the perpetrator. If the proposals for investigative liberation are agreed, perpetrators will be released a short time after the incident without this vital information. I accept that protective conditions may help, but they still do not answer the questions about how an appropriate risk assessment could be undertaken, or the issue of downgrading domestic abuse.

If victims of domestic abuse cannot rely on the Police, the Procurators Fiscal and the Court to keep them safe, why should they report what is happening to them.

I am incredibly worried by these proposals and am concerned that this proposal is being considered due to the costs of keeping people accused of domestic abuse in custody and the pressure on the court system rather than improving the current system. In other words, that the change is planned as an administrative measure to ‘solve’ the problem of victims coming forward in ever greater numbers.

There are undoubtedly difficulties for agencies due to the amount of domestic abuse being disclosed; however, this is not the way to solve it. The figures for domestic incidents are reducing in the legacy Strathclyde Police force area; due I believe to the robust way that domestic abuse is policed and the partnership between Police Scotland and ASSIST, which is unique. The move to Police Scotland is ensuring that a similar approach is adopted across the country and this is surely a far safer way to reduce the amount of domestic abuse. However, it will take time for systems and practice to be embedded and ensure that victims throughout Scotland receive a similar service no matter where they live.

I hope that the Justice Committee will consider very seriously the proposals for investigative liberation and I would welcome the opportunity to explain in further detail, the real difficulties these proposals will cause.

Thank you for again for the opportunity to respond to the consultation.

ASSIST
30 August 2013
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents

1 Introduction

We welcome the opportunity to comment on the general principles of the Bill as presented.

2 Police powers and rights of suspects (Part 1 of the Bill)

The police powers as drafted give rise to uncertainty in a number of areas.

3 Arrest (Section 1)

The powers differ from the current Common Law powers of arrest when considering the “grounds” for a constable to consider when deciding whether or not to make an arrest. They fail to explicitly cover an important element where an arrest is executed in the interests of the offender or in the interest of public safety. The powers of arrest are not wholly consistent with the general duties\(^1\) of a constable defined in the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, in that they lack an explicit power to arrest to prevent a crime.

Police Powers of Arrest in England and Wales enable arrest, without warrant, anyone who is about\(^2\) to commit an offence. Is this an implied power in Scotland or is it the intention to curtail any power to arrest for a person about to commit a crime? While the Criminal Procedure Scotland Act 1995\(^3\) provides that an attempt to commit a crime is punishable as a crime, new powers of arrest should be clear that an arrest can be made to prevent an attempt to commit a crime.

4 Arrested person to be taken to police station (Section 4)

It may be worth considering a clause that provides for the immediate de-arrest of an arrested person where the grounds of arrest no longer apply. This can be done at any time and should not require a person to first be taken to a police station as required under Section 4, just because they have been arrested. There is also a public interest and justice need to consider enabling an arrested person to be lawfully taken by arresting officers immediately upon arrest to where a living person is concealed (kidnap) or a dead body is located or to recover property or other evidence that might be lost. It should be clear that this should be done in very rare circumstances which must be justified.

---

1 \[\text{http://www.legislation.gov.uk/asp/2012/8/section/20}\]
2 \[\text{http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1984/60/section/24}\]
5 Authorisation for keeping in custody (Section 7)

The practicalities of this, particularly in some of the more remote areas should be noted. It may be appropriate to consider providing that it is not necessary for the authorising constable to be physically present to reduce the scope for any legal challenge arising as to the competency of any authorisation where the authorising officer was not physically present to apply the test in Section 10. It may worth considering including similar wording as in Section 19 (3) regarding “a constable not to be subject to any claim whatsoever” by reason of authorising keeping a person in custody. It is important to ensure that the role of the officers applying the test for Section 7 is adequately understood and respected by arresting officers and Senior Investigating Officers. It is important that the Authorising Officers responsibilities and authority is adequately covered in law and supporting guidance or Code of Practice provided. The role of arresting and investigating officers may also need to be addressed in supporting guidance or Code of Practice.

6 Review after 6 hours (Section 9)

The practicalities of this, particularly in relation to setting the reviewing rank at Inspector, should be considered. It may be appropriate to consider providing that it is not necessary for the reviewing Inspector to be physically present to reduce the scope for any potential legal challenge arising as to the competency of any authorisation where the authorising officer was not physically present to apply the test in Section 10. The pressures on Police Scotland to achieve savings through “management delayering” are significant. Reduction in supervision ratios may place the Inspecting ranks under significant pressure. It is important to ensure that new responsibilities under this Bill are given sufficient consideration by Police Scotland and that these responsibilities are not just “bolted on” to Inspectors performing Duty Inspector roles, where a potential conflict of interest may arise, in terms of ensuring an appropriate response to crime whilst safeguarding the rights of arrested persons.

7 Test for section 7 and 9 (Section 10)

The test relates to whether the keeping in custody following initial arrest can be authorised and whether at the review point of 6 hours continued keeping in custody can be authorised. The important point about that the reviewing Inspector has “not been involved in the investigation”, may need additional guidance or a Code of Practice to ensure that this is adequately understood. It should be clear if an Inspector performing a Duty Officer Role, responsible for leading and managing the police response to incidents, can be reasonably regarded as “not involved in the investigation” and can carry out the reviewing role to the satisfaction of Parliament.

The degree to which an Inspector is regarded as “not involved” in the investigation may be a point of dispute in legal proceedings unless this is explicitly understood. The reference to “necessary and proportionate” at 10, (1), (b) and (2), (a), (b) and (c) does not adequately meet the policy objectives outlined in paragraph 45 where it provides the police must, when considering custody, take into account:
The degree to which police working practices may need to change should not be underestimated. The importance in legal proceedings of decisions both “authorising” and “reviewing” should be understood. The likely inclusion as witnesses in any legal proceedings of such officers and the examination of their decision making should be clarified.

8 12 hour limit: general rule (Section 11)

The degree to which police working practices may need to change should not be underestimated. By specifying that “the person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence” constrains police action. Currently a person who is detained under Section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, status changes when they are placed under arrest. There is no requirement to charge them at that point, although that may happen. If a person is being detained for appearance at court from police custody there is a period of time during which police are able to prepare the charges and then formally charge the arrested person. The wording in Section 11 (2) may result in additional costs (financial through overtime or opportunity by handing the case over to others to deal with) to Police Scotland by removing the flexibility currently available about specifying exactly when a person is charged. Alternative wording to be considered that still ensures the arrested person understands why they are being kept in police custody might be: “The person may be continued to be held in police custody only if the constable informs the person that they are going to be charged with an offence.” This can negate the requirement for the full details of all the charges to be ready by the completion of the 12 hour period, in those cases where a person is to be held in police custody prior to appearing at court and this would still be fair to the accused.

9 12 hour limit: previous period (Section 12)

The challenge to monitor and implement the 12 hour limit – previous period should not be underestimated. It will require a technology fix to support this. The implementation of this legislation could be done on a paper basis but the some of the complexities will need a technical solution. The design of the technical solution is dependent upon the final version of the Bill and managing the dependency with the technical solution providers will be an important point to get right to avoid additional costs around technology. Failure to get this right may lead to the loss of criminal cases at court and justice not being done.

Given the additional rights and safeguards in the Bill there is serious doubt in the practicality of completing all the activity that is required within a 12 hour limit. It is perhaps expecting too much to manage the increasing complexity of progressing a criminal investigation relying on external third parties for Forensic Analysis and other enquiries, safeguarding an arrested persons wellbeing and ensuring an arrested persons rights are met all within the context of a 12 hour time limit and 28 days Investigative Liberation. Getting the balance right in an interview where the suspect is regarded as vulnerable may require additional breaks (see paragraph 119 of the Policy Memorandum). A 24 hour period is more reasonable and is likely to be more feasible and achievable than a 12 hour period. Additional ECHR safeguards could be built in by review from a Superintendent, not connected to the investigation, in those cases where 12 hours is assessed as being insufficient.

10 Medical treatment (Section 13)

The implementation of this legislation could be done on a paper basis but the some of the complexities will need a technical solution (tracking exact times). The design of the technical solution is dependent upon the final version of the Bill and managing the dependency with the technical solution providers will be an important point to get right to avoid additional costs around technology. Failure to get this right (breach of time limits) may lead to the loss of criminal cases at court and justice not being done.

11 Investigative Liberation (Section 14)

The Policy Memorandum (paragraph 58) indicates that these powers “are most likely to be of use in the investigation of serious crimes which often involve complex and technical examinations of telephones, computers etc.” This is a new power for Scotland but there is a similar power that has been available for some time in England and Wales. The study “Police use of pre-charge bail” carried out by the former National Policing Improvement Agency (NPIA) published in 2012 identified four aspects of the pre-charge bail or in the Bill’s terms Investigative Liberation, perceived to be driving the use of this power, and were potentially sources of unnecessary use:

1) Unplanned arrests
2) Insufficient quality in initial investigations
3) Demands on limited custody space
4) Differing perceptions on levels of evidence required for charging leading to delays in the process.

Some of the reasons for this included Force policies and processes driving individual officer’s decision to arrest, risk aversion, performance pressures, resource pressures where response officer numbers are depleted through increased number of specialist investigative units. Police Scotland has a robust performance management regime and its impact on the implementation of Investigative Liberation will need close monitoring.

The NPIA research paper identified the types of reasons why pre-charge bail would be appropriate, it included not only the time consuming technology investigations but also, DNA, fingerprints, wellbeing of suspect (illness, injury, drug or alcohol intoxication) and that similar factors applied to victims and witnesses all of which could necessitate release while investigation took place. If all of these factors are to be considered in terms of fairness to the suspect it is likely that Investigative Liberation may be required on fairness grounds for more than just “serious crimes”, as presumably fairness is required for all suspects’ not just suspects for serious crime. On fairness grounds it may well be that Investigative Liberation becomes used more frequently than envisaged in the Policy Memorandum, given the prevalence of drug and alcohol in crimes investigated by police in Scotland. Further guidance and/or a Code of Practice may be required for this new development to learn the lessons of Investigative Liberation in other jurisdictions and to ensure the policy objective is achieved. That it is used where it is necessary and proportionate with regard to fairness to any suspect rather than “mostly in the use of serious crimes which often involve complex and technical examinations of telephones, computers etc.” (Policy Memorandum, paragraph 58).

12 Investigative Liberation - Release on conditions (Section 14)

The implementation of Investigative Liberation could be done on a paper basis. However, managing the process, ensuring resources are available, there is sufficient cell capacity, that conditions are automatically updated to the Criminal History System in time etc. will need a technology solution. Ensuring there is sufficient numbers of Inspectors and that they have the capacity to meet this new requirement given the requirements for “management delayering” to achieve savings, is something the Justice Committee may wish to receive assurance on from Police Scotland. Setting of conditions will need to conform to ECHR tests of proportionality, necessity and lawfulness. Conditions will need to take into account the PM objectives of “needs of the enquiry”, “public safety” while “balancing the fundamental rights of a person suspected of having committed the crime”. The officer setting the conditions will need to have sufficient information from the investigating officer to satisfy themselves as to the lines of enquiry required, why they cannot be completed at the time, how long they will take and if there is a reasonable prospect of them being completed within the 28 days.

The NPIA report highlighted it generally took 4 weeks for forensic examination (DNA, blood fingerprints, digital etc.). What is the current average time for the results of Forensic analysis of all types to be provided to Police Scotland? Is there a Service Level Agreement between the Scottish Police Authority and Police Scotland that specifies a limit of within 28 days? In terms of public safety the officer setting the conditions will need access to sufficient information to assess the risk of harm to the victim and witnesses, the general public and the suspect – either from risk of self-harm or indeed by persons seeking to harm the suspect. A “tick box” approach is unlikely to meet the policy objective; proper consideration of the facts will be required.

13 Investigative Liberation – 28 Day limit (Section 14)

It is likely that this time period will be insufficient, particularly if the Police Scotland performance management approach drives an increasing number of submissions for forensic examination in an increasing number of cases. The Bill is silent on the detail around the detail of the operation of Investigative Liberation (IL). Is it competent to specify a condition that the person released on IL must attend a specified police station at a specified time and date – once the further enquiries have been completed? It would appear to be competent for a Constable to then arrest the suspect for the purpose of questioning the suspect on matters arising from the result of the further enquires in relation to the matter in which he was arrested – exercising the power under Section 1 in accordance with Section 2. Depending on how much time is left on the 12 hour “custody clock” – this may not be sufficient time to ensure the suspects rights are fully safeguarded and still complete any necessary interview. 12 Hours may not be sufficient and the balance of fairness may be more heavily weighted in the suspects favour. A period of 24 hours may represent a more fair balance between the suspect and victims.

14 Conditions ceasing to apply (Section 15)

The need for a technology solution is noted to keep records up to date.

15 Modification or removal of conditions (Section 16)

The need for a technology solution is noted to keep records up to date. The requirement on Inspectors to “keep under review” investigative liberation will create new work for the Inspecting ranks and consideration should be given to whether the review of investigative liberation conditions is placed at the right level or if it should be placed at a Custody Sergeant level.

16 Review of conditions (Section 17)

The potential for new work for police in relation to managing conditions is noted. Additional reports to COPFS for any review of Investigative liberation conditions being heard by the Sheriff. The need for a technology solution is noted to keep records up to date.

17 Information to be given before interview (Section 23)

Some clarity over what is meant by “voluntary attendance” and what rights any person who attends voluntarily at a police station has would be helpful. This might include the requirement in law to inform any such person they are

- Not under arrest
- Free to leave at any time
- Not obliged to answer any questions

Clarifying what is meant by “police custody” would also be helpful. Does this mean a person who is under arrest or otherwise detained under other statutory power for the police to detain a person (Misuse of Drugs Act etc.)? Some clarity over whether there is a requirement to make a record that Section 23 has been complied with may be helpful.

18 Right to have solicitor present (Section 24)

Occasions – very rare - may arise where it is necessary to remove a solicitor from an interview. There is no reference to this in the Bill.
19  Consent to interview without solicitor (Section 25)

Is the use of the words “mental disorder” sufficient and is there a need to consider “incapable”, in terms of the in the Adults with Incapacity (Scotland Act 2000, Section 1, (6) which includes physical disability.

20  Questioning following arrest (Section 26)

Clarification would be welcome on the police powers to question a person under arrest for an offence and having charged (officially accused) that person in relation the offence for which they were arrested, now seeking to question them in relation to other crimes and offences not relating to the offence they were initially arrested for or arising from the same set of circumstances as the offence. This may arise whereby they are initially arrested for an assault and are subsequently charged. Checking of police recorded crimes may reveal that they are suspected of other recorded crimes and police may need to question them regarding those crimes. Would police have to arrest the person in relation to those other crimes and would the entire process have to start again – with fresh authorisations, reviews and custody clock? Subsection (3) may need to include another item at (f) - the person’s occupation. Some occupations are very relevant – particularly in relation to public protection where placing a requirement to give their occupation may be important. This might be relevant when dealing with someone who may be in a position of trust and may avoid revealing their occupation because it may have an immediate impact. Is there a need to consider making it an offence not to disclose occupation?

21  Authorisation for questioning (section 27)

This new provision will require new work for police and COPFS in preparing the case for seeking court authorisation. There will be an opportunity cost. Such authorisation could have been provided by a police Superintendent within tight time limits and guidelines and saved COPFS and Courts time and money.

22  Arrest to facilitate questioning (Section 29)

This new provision for a warrant to arrest for further questioning under Section 27 will require new work for police and COPFS in preparing the case for seeking court authorisation. There will be an opportunity cost. It is likely that a warrant will be required in most cases to facilitate questioning. Such authorisation could have been provided by a police Superintendent within tight time limits and guidelines and saved COPFS and Courts time and money.

23  Right to have intimation sent to other person (section 30)

Subsection (5) is an important judgement to be made regarding delaying intimation and additional guidance/Code of Practice may be necessary.

24  Right to have intimation sent: under 18s (Section 31)

Subsection (5) (a) for a person believed to be under 16 years of age it should specify parent, guardian or other appropriate person. For police to fail to inform a parent or guardian of a person they believe is under 16 is likely to give rise to unnecessary complaint. There may also be occasions when it is inappropriate to inform the parent or guardian (they may be a suspect) and so a lawful alternative needs to be available. Evidence of compliance with this right will be necessary and will require a paper based and technology solution to record compliance. Restricting access is an important judgement and further guidance and/or a Code of Practice may be required.

25 Support for vulnerable persons (Section 33)

Is the use of the words “mental disorder” sufficient and is there a need to consider “incapable”, in terms of the in the Adults with Incapacity (Scotland Act 2000, Section 1, (6) which includes physical disability. As it is for the police to assess vulnerability (see Policy Memorandum paragraph 121) a review of the current level of training to identify vulnerable suspects may be necessary. Some consideration may be necessary as to which constable has the responsibility for assessing the vulnerability of a suspect. Is it the constable authorising or reviewing detention, the arresting officer or the investigating officer or Senior Investigating Officer in serious crime cases? How are any disagreements between constables as to the vulnerability of a suspect to be addressed in a manner that safeguards the Human Rights of the suspect?

26 Right to have intimation sent to solicitor (Section 35)

There may be investigative reasons to delay sending intimation to a solicitor, in very rare occasions, and explicit lawful provision should be made for this that goes beyond “as soon as is reasonably practicable.”

27 Right to consultation with solicitor (Section 36)

It would be helpful to clarify what is meant by “at any time”. Does this mean that the person can demand multiple consultations during their period in police custody? What sort of circumstances might apply that equate to “necessary in the interests of justice”? Who determines the method of consultation?

28 Use of reasonable force (Section 37)

Consider alternative wording similar to “A constable may use the minimum reasonable force necessary....”. This supports the requirement of police to act in compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights and apply the proportionate, legal and necessity test within a framework of policing by consent. Note police use of force is provided for in various other legislation such as the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

29 Common Law power of entry (Section 38)

An opportunity is missed here to modernise police powers of entry and search without a warrant that would save money, improve justice for victims, enhance opportunity to preserve and secure evidence and improve justice.

30 Common law power of search (Section 39)

An opportunity is missed here to modernise police powers of search. What use of minimum reasonable force applies here?

31 Power of search etc. on arrest (Section 40)

What use of minimum reasonable force applies here?

32 Breach of Liberation Conditions - Offence where condition breached (Section 43)

Is there a deliberate intention to curtail any preventative power of arrest (is likely to break\footnote{www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1995/46/section/28}) in relation to liberation, as can be found in relation to Bail in Section 28 of the Criminal Police Procedure Act 1995. What are the implications for the Lord Advocate guidelines – will breach of a Liberation Condition be grounds for holding accused in police custody for court?

33 Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest (Section 50)

Is the common law power of arrest by a citizen unaffected and is there a need to refer to citizen powers of arrest?

34 Meaning of officially accused (Section 55)

Is there any implication here for the statutory warning of intended prosecution under the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988\footnote{http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1988/53/section/1}?

35 Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms (Part 2 plus section 70 of the Bill)

I remain not wholly convinced of the case for the complete abolition of the requirement for corroboration.

36 Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (Part 6 (section 87) of the Bill)

I welcome this proposal.
38 Conclusion

The Bill as drafted raises a number of questions. It may be necessary and advisable to provide additional guidance and/or Codes of Practice to ensure the intention of Parliament is appropriately implemented.

Association of Scottish Police Superintendents
29 August 2013
Summary

1. The essence of the corroboration rule is not two sources of evidence, but instead is confirmation by coincidence, and the urge to seek such confirmation exists in everyday life, to reduce the risk of mishap, which is the rationale of the corroboration rule. It is difficult to see why such confirmation is not required in the criminal courts.

2. The corroboration requirement is flexible and applies in different variations, giving the prosecutor a toolkit of applications to suit the case.

3. The Carloway Review, at least as far as its examination of corroboration is concerned, is a starting point for a wider debate; it is not a sufficient basis alone for legislation abolishing corroboration.

4. There are a number of reform possibilities short of abolition, none of which have been explored (including in the Carloway Review).

5. In conclusion, it would be rash and dangerous to the administration of criminal justice in Scotland to abolish corroboration in the absence of a wider debate.

Part A: The corroboration rule in Scotland

1. The starting point for examination of the proposals is consideration of the corroboration rule as it currently applies in Scotland. The corroboration rule in Scotland requires that the facta probanda (essential facts) of each criminal charge are proven by corroborated evidence. There are two facta probanda for each charge: that a crime was committed and that it was committed by the accused. These are the only two facts which require to be corroborated. In the basic case, there is a main source of evidence (for example the eyewitness account of the victim) and that main source is ‘confirmed or supported’ by another admicicle of evidence from an independent source (such as the accused’s DNA found on the weapon used to commit the crime). A variation on this might be the eyewitness testimony of the victim, supported by the eyewitness testimony of a bystander. The idea is that there are two sources. They may be of the same type (as in the latter example) or of different types (as in the former example). The doctrine, in its traditional form, operates by the identification of one of the pieces of evidence as the main admicicle, which is ‘confirmed or supported’ by the other piece of evidence. Of course, there may be more than two admicicles, but the minimum requirement is two.

2. Today, the requirement to corroborate might accurately be described as a de minimis requirement. This is for two reasons: the technical nature of the rule and variations on its basic (traditional) application. Both are considered later. Before we do so, we need to consider the essence of corroboration, and in doing so we consider its underlying rationale.

The essence of corroboration in Scotland

3. This has not changed at all since the time of the institutional writers, where the current concept finds its roots. The content of the doctrine has changed, not its essence. Content is considered below. On essence, the key to corroboration is coincidence or correlation, as demonstrated by confirmation. In order to understand this, we need to consider how confirmation is valued in everyday life. Some examples will demonstrate this. These include: the need to have a four digit code as well as a bank card in order to withdraw money from an ATM; photographic (as opposed to non-photographic) identification (involving an identification card/document of a certain specification, confirmed by the use of an incorporated photograph for comparison purposes); elaborate forms of ID such as passports; special security measures on tickets for events—all involve confirmation of entitlement above and beyond mere possession.

4. The human urge for confirmation does not end there. In everyday life, we seek confirmation of something we strongly suspect to be the case. If we notice someone we think we know across the street, we will make sure that we have not made a mistake before drawing attention to ourselves. We do this by taking a second look or looking for confirmatory clues in the gait, height, clothing, hair or other physical quality of the person we think we recognise.

5. Why does this urge for confirmation exist? The answer is simple. We wish to avoid mishap, to avoid an error. Of course, the presence of confirmation does not guarantee that an error has not been made; a bank card might be stolen in circumstances where the thief has acquired the matching four-digit password; we might mistakenly spot someone who is uncannily similar to someone we know in the street; we could miss an error on the document we are completing; convincing forged passports are available. However, the likelihood of such outcomes is considerably reduced by the use of confirmatory techniques.

6. This brings us to a criminal charge. The possible consequences of guilt are clear and harsh—a criminal record, loss of reputation, loss of employment, imprisonment. It is not difficult to see why the natural, everyday urge for confirmation should apply here too; indeed, why it would be stronger, given the consequences of a conclusion on the question of guilt, when compared with the consequences of lack of confirmation in everyday life.

7. Considered in this way, the essence of corroboration lies in the confirmation provided by coincidence. In this sense, corroboration is not about the number of sources or even the strength of the individual adminicles; it is about the coincidence between them. So, it could be said that a stronger case for guilt arises from the combination of two adminicles of weak evidence, compared to the existence of one adminicle of strong evidence.

---

8. Sometimes the essence of the requirement to corroborate is described in numerical terms; two sources are required. This can make the doctrine seem rather technical, artificial or arbitrary. Indeed, often the test is stated to be a quantitative one rather than a qualitative one. However, this is misleading. It suggests that the two are unconnected, that the corroboration requirement must fall into one camp or the other. As we will see later, when considering the Carloway Review’s analysis, the requirement for confirmation is both quantitative and qualitative; the quality of the Crown case is measured by whether confirmation exists.

9. This all leads us to consider the rationale for the corroboration rule. It is often said that its justification is that it is better to exonerate the guilty than to convict the innocent. However, there is no need to resort to such general (and perhaps controversial) platitudes, pitting one undesirable outcome against another to determine which is the least desirable. The case for corroboration can be more simply put: the desire to reduce the risk of mishap. It is often said that there are two main risks: that a witness may lie or is mistaken, and so gives inaccurate evidence against the accused. On lying, those who have represented clients in the criminal courts, as well as those who deal with criminal trials, are only too well aware of how witnesses can (and are) motivated to lie by dislike, revenge, jealousy, loyalty, money, love or self-preservation, naming just a few common motives. Some witnesses are good at lying. The honest witness (and it is safe to say that most fall into this category) will be truthful, but can often be mistaken. Crime happens quickly, leading to fleeting glimpses. Add to this the lengthy time period between the event and the trial (compounded in Scotland by the emphasis on dock identification – see later) and one can see how a witness might make an error in identification or in remembering the details of who did what to whom. A further source of mishap is the reliability of scientific evidence of guilt, a prominent source of high profile appeals.

10. The consequences of mishap are clear – someone may be convicted of a crime which he/she did not commit. By requiring a minimum level of confirmation from coincidence, the requirement to corroborate reduces that risk to an acceptable level.

The scope of the corroboration rule in Scotland

11. Now that we have considered the basic rule and its essence, we need to consider in more detail its content (or scope) before examining how the Carloway Review process handled the doctrine.

The technical nature of corroboration

12. A number of points of clarification of the concept in its modern form require to be stated. The most fundamental of these is that the Crown case need only be capable of being corroborated. This is the position when the court is considering a no case to answer submission at the end of the Crown case. In order to adjudicate on such a submission, the judge (whether or not sitting with a jury) must pretend that the Crown

---

2 See the interesting and practical comments of former sheriff, DJ Cusine in To corroborate or not to corroborate 2013 SLT 79.

3 It has been noted that “humans are surprisingly poor at using witness demeanour to discern dishonesty, not least because the alleged signs of lying, such as sweating and a raised voice, may also indicate nervousness, and this can be suppressed by practised liars.” See Nicolson and Blackie, Corroboration in Scots Law: “Archaic Rule” or “Invaluable Safeguard”? Edin Law Rev, 17.2 (2013) 152 at 170 and the research cited at footnote 122.
case is perfect: that all witnesses will ultimately be regarded as credible and reliable; that all ambiguities in the evidence will be resolved in favour of the Crown; in short, that the Crown evidence will ultimately be accepted.\(^4\) The reason for this rather artificial consideration is clear: the court cannot yet assess the evidence, since at that stage, only the Crown case has been presented. For the purpose of corroboration, however, what is being considered is the technical, legal requirement of corroboration.

13. The second point to be made is that the admicile of evidence used to ‘confirm or support’ the main (or other) piece of evidence need not be, in itself, incriminating, demonstrating how little is required by way of confirmation. The requirement to ‘confirm or support’ has led the courts in some cases to the conclusion that certain evidence is neutral, and so cannot corroborate.\(^5\) However, as discussed later in considering possible reform, in these cases there is confusion between evidence which is incriminating and evidence which is not but which could be incriminating.

14. The third point is that not all admiciles of evidence need to be corroborated; only the facta probanda are caught by this rule. In this sense, then, it is not facts in the ordinary sense that need to be corroborated, but rather it is two parts of the Crown case: crime and identity. For this reason, thinking of corroboration as requiring the confirmation or support of facts, is misleading, making the requirement seem more onerous than it is.

Variations on a theme

15. So much for the technical nature of corroboration, what of the variations on its basic operation? Not surprisingly, there are many such variations which have developed in order to cater for the multitude of circumstances which can arise from the configuration of evidence available in any particular case. These variations are sometimes considered as exceptions to the corroboration rule; however, this is misleading. They are simply examples of the operation of the basic rule as it applies in certain situations. They all have in common the application of the essence of corroboration: confirmation from coincidence. They also have in common the fact that they do not fit the mould of the traditional application of the corroboration rule: namely the identification of the main source of evidence, confirmed or supported by another source.

16. The main variation of the corroboration rule is the Moorov doctrine. The idea here is simple. Rather than taking the confirmation of the main admicile (almost always the account of the complainer) from other evidence related to the charge (as such confirmation does not exist) the confirmation comes from a course of offending, a pattern of conduct. Such a pattern need only consist of two similar offences. The confirmation, then, arises from the similarity between each pair of offences. The similarities need not be between all of the offences on the complaint or indictment; for the purposes of the application of Moorov, charges are paired up. Indeed, Moorov might apply between two charges in a four charge indictment, the \(^4\) The question is whether there is sufficiency in law, and so this requires the judge to assume that the Crown evidence will be accepted: Williamson v Wither 1981 SCCR 214.

\(^5\) For examples, see the cases of Gallagher v HMA 2000 SCCR 634 and Gonshaw v HMA 2004 SCCR 482. In the latter case, of Lord Macfadyen’s dissent is hinged on the capability of confirmation or support, and his reasoning is convincing.
other two charges each attracting their own corroborating evidence. This rule has been classified as a kind of ‘similar fact’ evidence rule.

17. Another variation is the rule on ‘special knowledge’ confessions. Confession evidence is very powerful, and so attracts special protection in many jurisdictions. As Lord Justice-Clerk Thomson observed:

“One reason for this rule is to ensure that there is nothing phoney or quixotic about the confession. What is required by way of independent evidence in order to elide such a risk must depend on the facts of the case, and, in particular, the nature and character of the confession and the circumstances in which it is made.”

18. In Scotland, little is required by way of corroboration where there is an admissible confession. Where all that is available is the confession, in order to be sufficient, the confession needs to disclose some knowledge of the crime such that the only reasonable explanation for the suspect having that knowledge is that he was involved in the crime. In fact, it would be unusual for a suspect to confess to a crime in such a way that special knowledge is not displayed. This means that in the vast majority of cases where there is a confession, nothing else will be required.

19. A further significant example of the corroboration rule involves cases categorised as ‘circumstantial only’ cases. These occur where there is no direct (eyewitness or confession) evidence connecting the accused to the crime. Instead, the Crown focuses on indirect evidence which, when taken as a whole, points to the guilt of the accused. There is no requirement in such cases to identify the principal piece of evidence and find independent confirmation of that; indeed, none of the admindices of evidence relied upon in such cases need be, when taken alone, incriminating at all. It has been made clear that in circumstantial only cases, the concentration is on the indirect evidence taken as a whole, and not on whether the admindices are, on their own, incriminating. These cases essentially involve an examination of sufficiency in the round, in much the same way as the English prosecutor would examine sufficiency (see below). There is a requirement that the indirect evidence does not all come from one source, and so in this sense, the core of corroboration (confirmation) is retained. Indeed, at its core, these cases demonstrate the value of coincidence since it is this value which compensates for the lack of direct evidence.

20. Where the libel consists of a number of component parts (common in assault and breach of the peace cases) not all parts of the libel require to be corroborated; the rule seems to be that the main part of the libel should be, but that the remainder of the libel can be proven by one source: Campbell v Vannet. This means that in a case where there are three alleged actions by the accused (for example, punch, kick

---

6 Sinclair v Clark 1962 JC 57 at 62.
7 Woodland v Hamilton 1990 SCCR 166; 1990 SLT 565. The explanation as to how the suspects may have innocently acquired the knowledge should not be speculative, for example he may have been a witness may have visited the locus or via the media, where there no evidence that this was the case: see Beattie v HMA 2009 JC 144. In other words, there must be some evidential foundation for the alternative explanation.
8 See, for example, Little v HMA 1983 JC 16, Norval v HMA 1978 JC 70, and for a case where the evidence was deemed insufficient, see Broadley v HMA 2005 SCCR 620.
9 Al-Megrahi v HMA 2002 JC 99; Scott v HMA 2008 SCCR 110.
10 1998 SCCR 207.
and slap) only one of these elements needs to be corroborated, meaning that two-thirds of the libel (or four fifths, or some other proportion) may be proven on a single source.

21. The corroboration rule applies in a flexible (although unsatisfactory) way where fingerprint or DNA evidence features. The basic rule is this: where the fingerprints or DNA of the accused is found in a place which is not a public place nor a place to which the accused has access as a matter of course, where this place is the scene of the crime, it is presumed that the accused is guilty of that crime, and the Crown will have a sufficient case. The onus then shifts to the accused (not formally, but in practical terms) to offer an innocent explanation as to why his DNA or fingerprints have been deposited at the crime scene.

22. Where the accused’s fingerprints or DNA are found at the scene of a crime, a number of assumptions need to be made before the presence of such material can be taken to be an indication that the accused committed the crime, but these assumptions are indeed made. Given the importance of DNA and fingerprint evidence, this evidential shortcut makes many criminal prosecutions much easier.

23. Other more minor variations of the rule allow evidence of the identity of the driver of a vehicle to be corroborated by the status of the suspect as the registered keeper of the vehicle.

24. Taken together with corroboration in its ordinary application (an adminicle from a principle source confirmed or supported by an adminicle from a subsidiary source) these variations represent a toolkit from which the Crown may choose the most convenient tool when seeking to justify corroborative sufficiency. One can readily see that very little in terms of volume is required to compile sufficient corroboration. However, corroboration is not about volume; it is rooted in the value of a basic, de minimis level of confirmation.

Part B: The Carloway Review (‘the Review’)

25. The Carloway Review fails to capture the essence of corroboration. In any event, the Review is far too limited in length on corroboration to be adequate as the basis for abolition. It considers corroboration over only 35 single-spaced pages (less than 13,000 words). This includes a three-page description of an empirical study. This is limited treatment of a critical, distinctive and enduring cornerstone of the Scottish criminal system of proof, and is certainly less exhaustive than one would expect as the basis of a case for a recommendation of outright abolition. This contrasts with the rigorous approach to law reform adopted by the Scottish Law Commission (‘SLC’). The SLC produces much more detailed reports on what are sometimes less fundamental law reform proposals. For instance, the SLC _Report on Similar Fact Evidence and the Moorov Doctrine_ extends to 162 pages, and arguably the reforms suggested there are less far reaching than the abolition of corroboration (they would not apply to every prosecution, by any means). Indeed, it is very surprising (some might even say inexplicable) to note that such a major reform of the law is being carried out without a reference to the SLC, especially when one considers the remit of the SLC; its task is to “recommend reforms that improve, simplify and update the law of Scotland” and it offers the Government “independent advice on law reform”. The work carried out by the Review team is a valuable starting point for what should be a much wider debate about the law of evidence in criminal cases in Scotland. Further, it is clear from the Reference Group views (as minuted and published) and the views expressed both during the Review’s consultations and the Government’s consultation that there is very little appetite for reform as a result of the Carloway Review’s process (even among those who support reform or might support abolition).

---

11 Scot Law Com No 229, May 2012.

26. A further limitation of the Review is its failure to fully consider the wider legal context of abolition, such as the SLC’s proposals on previous conviction/prior conduct relevancy, the weaker tenor of the ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ directions in England and Wales; the discretion to prosecute as it operates in other jurisdictions compared with in Scotland, and Scotland’s uniquely unusual liberal attitude to the admissibility of the internationally discredited dock identification process. Indeed, the rules on identification sufficiency generally have been seriously weakened over recent years. All of these points are of considerable importance, to avoid a situation where Scots Law is made more vulnerable than other systems (such as England and Wales) in the event of corroboration abolition; it will arguably be left in a weaker state, with a greater risk of miscarriage of justice than at present and than exists in other systems.

27. The Review’s comparative discussion is flawed too, failing to take account of French Law which arguably carries a requirement to corroborate (Federal Code of Criminal Procedure Article 80-1 requiring ‘strong or concordant evidence’). There are other corroboration requirements, such as in the US in relation to confessions, which are not considered by the Review, and other corroboration requirements exist elsewhere. In the absence of a proper survey of corroboration requirements internationally, there is a real danger that the Government will proceed on an incomplete (and therefore inadequate) survey of the global position. When one considers the wider context factors in those systems (as described above, such as standard of proof and other evidential rules) there is a real risk that the Government will make Scots Law weaker than in many other systems.

28. Further, there is little discussion of reform of the law of corroboration in the Review – the choice seems to be all or nothing. It is not clear why this is so. Some possible reform options are discussed below.

29. The empirical research in the Review is limited and of little use. It is aimed at gathering evidence of the impact of corroboration, when such evidence is simply not available reliably, and there are several obvious flaws in the research methodology. The impact of the empirical research is, therefore, overstated by the Review.

---

12 These comments are on the “About us” page of the SLC’s website: http://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/about-us/. See also s.3(1)(e) of the Commission’s founding legislation, the Law Commissions Act 1965, which provides as one of the functions of the Commission: “to provide advice and information to government departments and other authorities or bodies concerned at the instance of the Government of the United Kingdom or the Scottish Administration with proposals for the reform or amendment of any branch of the law.”
Part C: Possible reform of the corroboration requirement

Option 1: retention with some reforms

30. There are some aspects of the current corroboration requirement which are problematic, and could be reformed by legislation:

(1) the requirement of corroboration of mens rea could be removed. This has caused some considerable confusion in the law, and even recently has had to be considered by the High Court.\(^{13}\);

(2) the definition of corroboration could be enshrined in statute, indicating that corroborative evidence is evidence which is capable of supporting or confirming an adminicle of incriminating evidence, and includes evidence which may otherwise be considered neutral. This would prevent acquittals in cases where the evidence might be regarded as neutral, when in fact it could also be regarded as being capable of providing an independent check on the principal source.\(^{14}\)

(3) the ability of the jury to consider whether a legally sufficient case has been presented could be removed; currently, the accused may make a submission of no case to answer following the close of the Crown case, and, in the event that this fails, can still argue that the accused should be acquitted due to lack of corroboration. Where a submission of no case to answer is not made, or is made and rejected, the accused should not be able to argue legal insufficiency (around corroboration or for any other reason) before the jury. This is consistent with the notion that corroboration is about the capability of certain evidence to support or confirm other evidence; the actuality need not be instrumental. There would remain a right of appeal against the refusal of a submission. This reform would mean that the only test which the jury would need to consider is the ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ standard. This would mean that the jury could still convict on uncorroborated evidence (for example if there are two eyewitnesses and one is believed and the other is disbelieved) but the Crown would still require to present (by the close of its case) evidence such that a corroborated case is possible. In other words, corroboration would be limited to being a pure sufficiency barrier, and would not limit the jury’s discretion.

(4) The reform recently suggested by the SLC (the retention of Moorov but absent the requirement for evidence of a course of conduct) could be introduced, making proof in Moorov cases easier.

(5) On corroboration by distress, considered by the Review,\(^{15}\) it would seem that this is capable of corroborating the complainer’s evidence, and should be permitted to do so (not just to corroborate lack of consent, as is currently the case). The source of the evidence of distress is not the complainer but is the witness who perceives it (the idea that the source is the complainer is flawed,

\(^{13}\) Adamson v HMA 2012 JC 27.
\(^{14}\) See the cases of Gallagher v HMA 2000 SCCR 634 and Gonshaw v HMA 2004 SCCR 482. In the latter case, the dissenting opinion of Lord Macfadyen is very persuasive.
\(^{15}\) Para 7.2.21.
since the evidence is an observation of the condition of another, not the distress itself). This would make conviction in cases of sexual assault easier;

(6) The requirement that the gathering of a confession (and of fingerprint and DNA evidence, if such a rule exists) by two witnesses should be abolished, since, as argued above, this is not a requirement born out of a proper application of the rule requiring the corroboration of the \textit{facta probanda}.

31. Taking together these reforms, many of the current problems with corroboration can be ironed out, leaving the requirement in place offering clear, consistently applied and a minimum level of protection against unfair conviction.

Option 2: abolition for only certain crimes

32. One of the concerns in modern criminal cases in Scotland is the low conviction rate in rape cases, and this seems to have heavily influenced the Scottish Government’s desire to abolish the corroboration requirement.\footnote{See the Scottish Government’s Policy Memorandum to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at paragraph 136, available at: \url{http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/Bills/65155.aspx}} The requirement for corroboration in such cases may deter victims from reporting the crime, especially where there is a perception that conviction is more difficult, and can lead to less convictions where cases are prosecuted.\footnote{Some commentators have highlighted the fact that prosecutions for sexual assault often fail even in the presence of corroboration since they hinge largely on credibility and reliability issues mainly around the question of consent. The other flaw in the sexual prosecutions argument is that in the absence of a corroboration requirement, more victims of sexual crimes will require to give evidence in a ‘complainant’s word against the accused’s’ context, leading to more concentration on the complainant’s credibility and character than is the case currently: see Nicolson and Blackie, 17.2 (2013) 152 at 165-166. For a detailed discussion of this issue as one of the possible unintended consequences of the abolition of corroboration, see Cairns. I., \textit{Does the Abolition of Corroboration in Scotland Hold Promise for Victims of Gender-Based Crimes? Some Feminist Insights} [2013] Crim L R 640 at 651-652.} The abolition for sexual crimes (as defined in s.288C of the 1995 Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act) would be simple to legislate on, and could be justified on the basis that such crimes are normally committed in private. There is a precedent for different evidential rules applying to sexual crimes: see ss.274-275A of the 1995 Act on the posing of sexual history questions and the effect that granting an application to ask these has on the exposure of evidence of the accused’s previous sexual offending.\footnote{This reform is supported by Professors Raitt and Ferguson but in cases where the accused is known to the complainant and so identification is not in issue, and where the issue is whether or not consent was given – see \textit{A Clear and Coherent Package of Reforms? The Scottish Government Consultation Paper on the Carloway Report} [2012] Crim LR 909 at page 924.}

Option 3: retention for only certain crimes

33. Corroboration could be required in only the most serious charges (for crimes which could be statutorily defined) and abolished for all other charges. In England, the corroboration requirement is retained for only certain crimes, as the Review notes. In Scotland, these crimes could be the most serious ones, defined by name or maximum sentence.

34. It would be possible to combine options 2 and 3: a corroboration requirement for the most serious offences, but abolition of this requirement for all sexual offences.

Option 4: a new test

35. A more flexible option would be to define the requirement to corroborate according to the reasonable availability of corroborative evidence. The requirement could be to corroborate an incriminating adminicle of evidence only where such evidence is ‘reasonably available’. Reasonable availability could be statutorily defined with reference to a number of factors: the seriousness of the crime, the impact of the crime on the victim, and the reasonable expenditure of public funds. This would mean that where there is no corroborative evidence which is reasonably available, an uncorroborated case would be sufficient. Examples of areas where disputes might emerge would include: whether DNA testing should have been carried out or whether a more extensive search for a missing witness should have been undertaken.

36. This option would lead to case law on the question of whether ‘reasonable availability’ exists in any particular case, but this would be a distinctive and innovative approach which would protect against the danger of complacency in the face of a complete abolition of the corroboration requirement. Options 2 and 3 would not, then, apply, since there would be no need to define the requirement by reference to crime-type or severity. The reforms suggested under option 1 could still (with any other reforms) be enacted.

37. Option 4 would lead to the retention of a balance between the legitimate protection of the accused’s rights and the effective prosecution of crime, especially given the more weakened state of the corroboration requirement if reformed from its current position.

Concluding comments

38. It seems ironic that corroboration is being abolished now, at a time when the detection and prosecution of crime is easier than it has ever been, given the variations of corroboration coupled with the increase in technological and scientific evidence gathering and presentation techniques. The purpose of the current rule on corroboration is to provide for an independent check against the principal source of... evidence. As has been recently stated: “Witnesses lie. They can be mistaken.”

In abolishing a concept designed to counter the possible ill effects of these undeniable observations, carefully developed and adapted over hundreds of years, the Scottish Government has demonstrated its preference for radical change in haste (and against the tide of powerful opinion) over sober, careful law reform debate. I hope there is still time to have that debate and that the current proposal in s.57 of the Bill is abandoned, at least until that debate has been concluded.

Derek P Auchie
Senior Teaching Fellow
University of Aberdeen
29 August 2013

---

Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Barnardo’s Scotland

Barnardo’s Scotland welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence for the Committee’s Stage 1 scrutiny of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

Links to children’s rights issues

Section 42 of the bill represents an important step towards bringing the criminal justice system in Scotland fully into line with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). By ensuring that the police treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child (defined as a person under 18) as a primary consideration when making decisions to arrest a child, hold a child in custody, interview a child about an offence or charge a child with an offence, police practice will be brought into line with Article 3 of the UNCRC “In all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration.”

However, we would welcome further explanation of why ‘well-being’ has been used rather than ‘welfare’, given the fact that welfare is used in other justice legislation such as the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act.

The bill as currently drafted represents a missed opportunity to bring greater alignment between the criminal justice system in Scotland and children’s rights.

Barnardo’s Scotland, along with other leading children’s charities, recently wrote to the Minister for Children and Young People to highlight the omission in the Bill of measures to raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility from eight to 12 years old in line with the commitment in the Scottish Government’s Do the Right Thing Progress Report 2012 to give this fresh consideration “with a view to bringing forward any legislative change in the lifetime of this Parliament.”

We recognise that in practice most offending activity committed by children under the age of 16 is dealt with through the children’s hearings system, and welcomed the raising of the age of criminal prosecution to 12. However, it is still possible for a child as young as eight to acquire a criminal record through the hearings system, which we believe is incompatible with the Scottish Government’s commitment to children’s rights.

We therefore urge the committee to consider using this bill as an opportunity for acting on the Scottish Government’s commitment to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child by increasing the age of criminal responsibility to match the age of criminal prosecution.

---

1 (1989) UN Convention on the Rights of the Child
http://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/CRC.aspx
Children in the justice system

We welcome the provisions in sections 30-33 of the bill, which seek to ensure that the highest standards of protection are offered to children in the formal justice system. We believe that ensuring children have access to the support of a parent, carer or other responsible person will help implement Article 37 of the UNCRC in Scotland. As such we would like to see a more explicit reference to Article 37 of the UNCRC in this part of the bill.

As the bill sets out in section 32, where it is inappropriate for the parent or carer to support the child in custody or they cannot be located, it will be up to the local authority to appoint a ‘responsible person’ to support that child.

We feel that more explanation is required about the role and responsibilities of this ‘responsible person’, and would like to see an explicit reference to the right to independent advocacy. This would be consistent with section 122 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act which gives the right to the service of a trained advocate for children appearing before the panel. Any such advocacy provision should be modelled on that available under the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, and be in line with the recently published draft guidelines for the commissioning of independent advocacy.

A trained advocate would complement the role of a solicitor. An advocate would help ensure that the child understood the process, and could communicate effectively. If we recognise the needs of children to have access to the service of a trained advocate in the legally sanctioned proceedings of a children’s panel, to cut through technical language and processes on their behalf, then we should make similar provision in the formal criminal justice system.

Children affected by parental imprisonment

As well as the commitment to safeguard and promote the well-being of children in the justice system, the well-being of dependent children should be considered when an adult is detained in police or prison custody. There is a wealth of Scottish and international research which has highlighted the short- and long-term impacts on children and families when a family member is imprisoned. It has been estimated that around a third of prisoners’ children were present during the arrest of their parent, and this can have a traumatic impact on the well-being of the child.

We would therefore like to see a greater recognition in the bill that the well-being of children in the justice system should also include the well-being of children affected by parental imprisonment.

Barnardo’s Scotland is currently working with Families Outside and other children’s and criminal justice organisations to promote the use of a Child and Family Impact Assessment at key stages in the criminal justice process. An important first step in this would be to ensure that the use of the 'Child in Need' assessment, which the police currently have the option to request from the local authority when a carer is arrested and detained, should become mandatory.

---

Conclusion

We look forward to working with the Committee and Parliament to deal with the issues highlighted above, in the context of our work to strengthen the links between the Scottish Government’s policy agenda for children and young people, centred on GIRFEC and children’s rights, and justice policy.

Barnardo’s Scotland
2 September 2013
I am delighted by the fact that the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill includes provisions which will abolish the requirement for corroboration in criminal trials.

The Justice committee Stage 1 scrutiny of the Bill has thus far involved 3 meetings and at the first of these – 24 September 2013 – it was agreed to keep my petition open and further discuss my request to incorporate a retrospective component to the new legislation.

Prior to and shortly after the meeting on the 24th September, I was contacted by a clerk to the Committee, and asked if I wished to add anything further to the submissions which I provided when the committee first discussed my petition in September 2012. I updated the clerks regarding the endeavours which I have made in the intervening period to both promote awareness of my petition and garner additional support of its aims. Continuing to waive my rights to anonymity, I have agreed to:

- Submit an article for publication in Rape Crisis News
- An interview with the Daily Record in March 2013
- Speak at a seminar organized by Rape Crisis Scotland in March 2013 and at which Mr MacAskill also spoke
- An interview with BBC ‘Good Morning’ in April 2013

I have also offered to provide an oral submission to the committee and, following the committee’s decision that this would not be required, I have been asked whether I would submit further, supplementary information supporting why I consider retrospective legislation to be so necessary.

Why Retrospective Legislation?

I am disappointed to read in the minutes of the meeting held on 24th September that, with regards to making new legislation retrospective, a committee member feels that ‘It seems [...] to be a proposition that will not go anywhere, so [...] wonder whether there is any point in considering it further’. Yet I am the heartened by the thoughts of another member who says that ‘There are requests to look at making it retrospective, particularly in the case of historic sexual abuse. There is therefore an opportunity to at least give further consideration to the issue’ and it is in relation to all sexual abuse cases – historic and current - that I wish to now further elaborate.

Some statistics

Child Sexual Abuse (CSA)

The NSPCC have recently published statistics on the prevalence of childhood sexual abuse (CSA), and two recent World Health Organization (WHO) reports have estimated figures at 20% for women and 5% for men.
The 2001 Census records Scotland’s adult population as 4,089,946. Of these, 2,155,701 are female and 1,934,245 are male. Using the WHO findings, this means that, in Scotland:

431,140 women may have been sexually abused as children

96,712 men may have been sexually abused as children

The percentage of these women and men who have been able to approach the police about their abuse is unknown. So too is the percentage who may ever be ready to do so.

With over half a million of Scotland’s adult population as possible victims of CSA, how many of Scotland’s adults are actually perpetrators? One perpetrator can have several victims but some also have a single victim to whom they have unquestioned access. I don’t know what ratio to apply to get a meaningful estimate but even if we allow 1:3 (one perpetrator being responsible for three victims) it is feasible that, in Scotland, there are 171,191 perpetrators of Child Sexual Abuse. With Scotland’s current prison population being 7845, it may be reasonable to suspect that many of the possible 171,191 CSA perpetrators live undetected within their communities.

Adult Sexual Abuse (ASA)
Available data suggests that nearly one in four women worldwide may experience sexual violence by an intimate partner in their lifetime (WHO, 2002). (Available online at www.who.int)

With Scotland’s adult female population being 2,155,701, this ‘one in four’ translates as a possible 528,925 victims

In 2012/13, 1372 rapes and 90 attempted rapes were reported to the police in Scotland. (Statistical Bulletin Crime and Justice Series, Recorded Crime in Scotland 2012-13). I cannot find any data regarding prosecution and conviction rates regarding these cases. However:

In 2009 / 2010. Rapes recorded by police: 884. Number prosecuted: 92. (10.4%) Number convictions: 41 (4.6%)

In 2007 /2008. Rapes recorded by police: 821. Number prosecuted: 85 (10.35%). Number convictions: 26 (3.1%)

Corroboration has been a barrier to justice. Research by the Crown Office found that in 2010, there were more than 458 cases where an accused person was placed on petition but where the case did not go any further because of a lack of corroboration.

Fiscals looked at a further 141 sexual offences not prosecuted in 2010, and found 94 (67%) had a good chance of a conviction had they made it to court. This would have meant that there would have been a total of 135 convictions in 2010, representing 15.3% of cases reported; whereas, as figures above prove, only 4.6% were.
Effects & Impact of Sexual Abuse

People are affected in different ways and to different extents by abuse. Survivors live their lives just like anyone else, but for some there are long-term effects:

- Mental and physical health problems
- Alcohol and drug misuse to cope with trauma
- Homelessness and suicide

Not all survivors go on to have these problems, but many suffer long-term trauma in one form or another. (http://www.survivorscotland.org.uk/about-sexual-abuse/)

As the committee will be aware, I am a survivor of childhood sexual abuse and it was many years – and even then only owing to having been in therapy for some time – before I was able to approach the police and make a statement about what had happened to me. Therefore, on a very personal level, I have a clear understanding of the trauma and effects of such abuse.

I also have some professional understanding. During my career as a probation officer, I have worked as the case manager for sex offenders, the treatment programme facilitator for domestic abuse perpetrators – many of whom employ power and control tactics to coerce partners into non-consensual sex – and a Woman’s Safety Officer, working to protect abused women.

Within my caseload are also young men who have been sexually abused as children or raped as adults and it is even harder for them to find the courage to seek justice.

I have seen how the trauma experienced by these groups of people has manifested in low self-esteem, powerlessness, stigma, self-loathing, feelings of shame and guilt, unhealthy relationships, substance misuse and self-harming.

A Question of Justice

The statistics which I have quoted in this document suggests that there is a high proportion of Scotland’s population who are survivors of Child Sexual Abuse or Adult Sexual Abuse and that current criminal justice legislation is failing them when they seek justice. Abolishing the corroboration requirement is one step towards remedying this but in itself it is not enough.

The current low rate of sexual offence convictions means that there are an unacceptable number of sex offenders living unmonitored within their communities.

When the probation services assess risk of harm posed by perpetrators, we use an evidence base which tells us that ‘the predictor for future behaviour is past behaviour’. Therefore, unmonitored as they are, these sex offenders are likely to reoffend and this means new victims.

I know from personal experience how brave one must be to report sexual abuse and what it costs to do so. It took 3 years from initial contact with the police to finally having a court date. I never expected it to take this long and these 3 years were exhausting. I went through the precognition with the Fiscal and also with my abuser’s solicitor, the access to and sharing of my medical and therapy records, a Viper ID and verbal abuse from my abuser’s supporters. The whole process was one which re-traumatized me. I could once again taste, feel, smell and hear my abuser and each and every thing that he did to me was as once more as clear as when he first did them. I am certain that my experience is shared by all who take the brave step of seeking justice; we lay ourselves open to reliving the trauma. Yet we do so in the hope that finally there will be an ending to it; an ending only made possible when our abusers are finally held to account for what they have done to us.

By making the new Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill retrospective, Scotland’s legislators will accord to us the opportunity to once again seek justice for the harm caused to us and the pain which we continue to endure. We may once more have hope of healing and an ending to such pain. When one is wounded by something harmful which leaves shrapnel imbedded in the flesh, the usual response by professionals is to remove the shrapnel and thus prevent further pain or injury. Sexual abuse leaves its own unique shrapnel embedded in the very core of the victim and, survive as we do, the wound can never fully heal until the invading presence is neutralized.

What Costs?

I know that there are concerns about how far back is it realistic for retrospective legislation to apply. I am sure that most of the hesitation arises from concerns about the costs involved should hundreds of cases once deemed insufficient to proceed owing to lack of corroboration now be deemed sufficient. The increased workloads for the Crown and Courts obviously has a monetary value.

The committee will be aware of the cases regarding Jimmy Saville and Stuart Hall; the sheer number of victims across a period of several decades. No doubt there is a vast amount of money involved in pursuing justice for their victims yet this is precisely what is happening. Not solely owning to the fact that, in so doing, the prosecutors seek to facilitate healing for the victims – this removal of the ages old shrapnel which blights their lives – but also because it is in the public interest. The message to other abusers must be clear – no matter who you are or how long ago you abused your victim(s), you will be held to account. Such a message will hopefully encourage other victims to come forward and also deter unmasked abusers from further abuse.

It is my belief that my abuser continues to abuse – for why should he not? He has been getting away with it for years, the one chance I had for him to be held to account for this and stopping him from harming another was thwarted by the corroboration requirement. His employment provides him with access to children and another thing which my training has taught me is that when a person is sexually aroused by children, they will always be sexually aroused by children. They don’t ‘grow out of it’ and there is no ‘cure’. It is only by engaging in treatment programmes that they learn the strategies to employ to prevent themselves from acting upon the urge to satisfy their sexual cravings. Unconvicted, my abuser has obviously not engaged in such treatment and therefore has no strategies to prevent him acting on his urges. It has been 19 months since the second victim withdrew and my case against him was dismissed. He was reinstated by his employer almost immediately and has thus had 19 months in which to continue satisfying his sexual deviance. How many more victims might he have claimed? One more is one too many.

The corroboration requirement means that other rapists and abusers have not been held to account and are, in all likelihood, continuing to rape and abuse. So how many more victims? Again, one more is one too many.

Retrospective legislation will incur a cost including additional staffing and court time. When this is determined on a cost per case basis, perhaps it will be several thousand pounds. Are we truly living in a society which is prepared to say to a rape victim or a childhood sexual abuse victim that the harm caused and the pain they endure is not worth such a financial cost? When the psychological and emotion cost to them in incalculable? Is today’s Scotland prepared to dismiss the risk which unprosecuted perpetrators pose to future victims?

A reminder of the rape cases recorded by the police since 2007: 3077 in total. Number prosecuted: 177. Number of convictions: 67.

Not all of the cases which failed to satisfy the rule for sufficiency of evidence will suddenly do so once the corroboration requirement is abolished. Referring back to the Fiscals’ findings that in 2010, of the 141 sexual abuse cases they re-examined, 94 stood a good chance of conviction if the corroboration requirement had not prevented them getting to court. Although 94 represents 67% of the 141 cases examined, it represents 10% of the 884 reported during 2009/2010. Therefore it might not be several thousand cases which retrospective legislation affords the opportunity to reapply for justice. It may be several hundred.

How far back should retrospective legislation go? I am not going to dismiss the impact which such legislation will have on the criminal justice system and am appreciative of how overwhelming it may be to have hundreds of cases return for consideration. Perhaps the retrospective component of any new Act could be specific to sexual offences.

In making retrospective the legislation which abolishes the requirement for corroboration, the Scottish Parliament is not taking a bold new step. Rather, as this committee will be aware, it will be following the precedent of The Double Jeopardy (Scotland) Act 2011 which itself allows retrospective application. As cited in my petition, the legislators at that time stated that ‘it is immaterial whether the conviction or, as the case may be, the acquittal was before or after the coming into force of the Act’.

What was important – what is important – is that victims of crime have access to justice and that perpetrators of the most heinous acts are held to account for their actions and prevented from harming others.

Colette Barrie
12 November 2013
In calling on the Scottish Parliament to urge the Scottish Government to pass new Criminal Justice System legislation which allows for the retrospective abolition of the corroboration requirement thus ensuring full access to justice for victims of crime, mine is not a lone voice.

As the debate regarding the proposed abolition of corroboration continues, much attention is given to the thoughts and opinions of various professional agencies and bodies. Although several victim organisations are mentioned, I don’t believe that there is equity in the coverage given to them and that given to criminal justice professionals. One may argue that the criminal justice professionals have a greater understanding of the minutiae of the legal process and therefore a greater understanding of how abolition may threaten or impact upon the delivery of such. However, of those whom I have heard speak against the abolition of corroboration, none have spoken of the victim with any tangible, genuine compassion. I detect a lack of victim empathy – for anyone who does sincerely empathise with the victim would surely not stand against a legislative change which will give them access to justice.

On 13th November 2013, Scotland Tonight featured an interview with Kenny MacAskill regarding the proposed Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and included footage of Derek Ogg, QC, sharing his opinion as to why the corroboration requirement is necessary. (http://video.stv.tv/bc/news-131113-st-justice/?redirect=no)

During his ‘summing up’, Mr Ogg gives the impression that Law & Order are somehow quite different from Justice. Perhaps he agrees with the late American Supreme Court judge, Oliver Wendell Holmes, that ‘This is a court of law, young man, not a court of justice’?

Mr Ogg concludes with part of his job being to protect people against wrongful conviction and this being ‘part of the justice game’. Justice game? I did not know that justice is a game. Perhaps though Mr Ogg has voiced what many have long suspected as ‘game’ suggests winners and losers; more skilled, practised and cunning opponents succeeding over less skilled, less practiced, less cunning ones. Yet the responsibility for protecting people from harm, for administering appropriate punitive measures to those who are guilty of causing harm and for ensuring the safety of current victims whilst preventing offences against future ones is surely no ‘game’?

I share Mr Ogg’s desire that no innocent person is wrongly convicted. I doubt that anyone, anywhere in Scotland, wants such a thing. However, in his passionate stating of what seems such an obvious and fundamental tenet, his defence of the needs of the accused seems to eclipse the needs of the current victim and does not heed the danger posed to future victims should a guilty person be acquitted. Such a person may be guilty of further crimes which may be fatal to innocent victims who need not have been victims if justice had been put first and the need to ‘win the game’ put second.

Law and order exist for the purpose of establishing justice and when they fail in this purpose they become the dangerously structured dams that block the flow of social progress. (Martin Luther King, Jr.) Social progress in this context being the continued advancement which the Scottish legal system is making towards public protection; safeguarding communities by punishing perpetrators, monitoring / rehabilitating offenders and protecting victims.

The corroboration requirement is a keystone in the ‘dangerously structured dam’ and it has blocked justice for far too long.

In offering to give oral evidence to the committee, my hope was to further promote the victims voice in this debate. In my written submission in September 2012, I included comments from other victims / supporters who are signing my petition. I now do so again:

JB
The abused need all the help they can get, and the least we can do is give them justice.

VW
I am a victim of rape, as far as I know I am his second victim with no justice!

MK
Survivors of abuse must have the full backing of the Law.

MA
I am part of a group of women survivors who want to change the law in Scotland so that victims of sexual violence get the justice that they are currently denied.

SA
Anyone with a heart would care and want this law changed.

LS
Justice cannot ever be served if accused are able to avoid a trial based on this requirement and irrespective of the quality of the evidence.

NT
I think children who have been abused deserve to see justice being done.

LM
Justice should lie with the lay people (juries) not advocates who have a vested interest.
LG
I'm tired of victims of sexual abuse not receiving justice when they're brave enough to strive for it, and laws like this play easily into the hands of attackers. A few of my small circle of friends were raped as very young women (all bar one by her boyfriend at the time) but we all know it's hardly worthwhile even reporting it, the men know this best. It feels like it's the last crime that isn't seen by the authorities as a real crime, it's like the authorities play lip service to it. Many men just don't see rape as a crime.

RJ
Justice for victims they are going through enough without this extra burden

JH
Because the current system is unjust

ED
This is important because justice for victims of crime particularly victims of sexual abuse is very often not served.

CM
As a counsellor working in the field of domestic and sexual abuse for decades I am appalled that victims have to suffer such an aggressive and adversarial so-called 'justice' system.

VC
The low rate of conviction is the tip of the iceberg, in no other crime would the victim be asked how they were dressed, past history of partners and trivia like this?

In his Review Report, Lord Carloway quoted Gladstone when he cited: Justice delayed is justice denied. In my petition, I express my belief that justice has been delayed for far too long and thus has been denied for far too many for far too long.

In this addendum which now contains several quotations from others, I would like to conclude with the following:

'Justice for crimes against humanity must have no limitations' (Simon Wiesenthal) Hence why the War Crimes legislation is retrospective. ‘Crimes against humanity’ includes rape… or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity; other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering or serious bodily or mental injury. In describing the effects and impact of Child Sexual Abuse (CSA) and Adult Sexual Abuse (ASA) in my submission dated 12th November 2013, I have listed traumas which satisfy this definition.

This again is why new legislation abolishing the corroboration requirement must be retrospective.

Colette Barrie
18 November 2013
1. While this submission focuses on those aspects of the Bill about which we have concerns, that should not detract from the fact that we are broadly supportive of the proposals made by the Carloway Review and are similarly supportive of the Bill. We have no comments to make on those aspects of the Bill which do not stem from the Carloway Review.

2. James Chalmers and Fiona Leverick have published an extensive analysis of the Carloway Review’s proposals (“‘Substantial and radical change’: a new dawn for Scottish criminal procedure?” (2012) 75 Modern Law Review 837-864) and a shorter analysis of the related issue of majority jury verdicts (“Majority jury verdicts” (2013) 17 Edinburgh Law Review 90-96). We would be happy to supply the Committee with copies of either publication should these be of assistance. In broad terms, we are concerned that the Bill as it stands would leave Scotland with a lower level of protection against wrongful conviction than any comparable system, insofar as such comparisons are possible.

3. With these general comments in mind, we wish to make the following points in this submission:

(1) Some aspects of the drafting of the legislation are excessively complex.
(2) While we express no view on the desirability of abolishing corroboration, we do not support the case made by the Carloway Review to justify this proposal.
(3) We do not consider that section 70 (providing for new rules regarding guilty verdicts returned by juries) provides an adequate safeguard against wrongful conviction in the absence of a corroboration requirement.
(4) We believe that the trial judge should have the power to withdraw a case from the jury where the evidence is such that no reasonable jury could convict on it.
(5) We believe that section 82, requiring the High Court to apply an additional “interests of justice” test when considering references from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission, serves no appreciable purpose and that the resulting cost to the public purse would be wasteful and inappropriate.

4. The remainder of this submission deals with each of these points in turn.

(1) The legislative drafting

5. Some aspects of the drafting of the legislation are excessively complex. For example, the abolition of corroboration is achieved by way of four sections with multiple cross-references. The same effect could be achieved in a single section, as follows:

57 Corroboration not required

(1) If satisfied in any criminal proceedings that a fact has been established by evidence, the judge or (as the case may be) the jury is entitled to find the fact proved by the evidence although the evidence is not corroborated.

(2) Subsection (1) applies only to proceedings for an offence committed on or after the day on which it comes into force, including proceedings for a continuous offence committed during a period of time which includes that date.

(3) Subsection (1) does not affect the operation of any enactment which provides in relation to the proceedings for an offence that a fact can be proved only by corroborated evidence.

6. Even this section is a relatively cautious and lengthy approach to drafting the necessary rule. It is not clear why the drafting needs to be as lengthy or complex as it is, nor how this is believed to assist in making the legislation comprehensible and accessible.

(2) The abolition of corroboration

7. There is no doubt that corroboration is a complex and unsatisfactory area of the law which has little parallel in other jurisdictions. While we would not wish to make a positive case for its retention, we are not satisfied that the case for its abolition has been made out. James Chalmers and Fiona Leverick have already made extensive criticisms of the approach taken by the Carloway Review to corroboration in their article “Substantial and radical change: a new dawn for Scottish criminal procedure?” (2012) 75 Modern Law Review 837-864, noting in particular the inadequacy of the empirical research upon which the Review relied and the Review’s apparent unawareness of research conducted on behalf of the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice which ran contrary to some of the claims made in the Review.

8. The broader problem is that the Scottish criminal justice system has been constructed around the requirement of corroboration. Other systems which do not employ a corroboration requirement have developed a variety of other mechanisms to safeguard against wrongful conviction. In Scotland, such mechanisms have consistently been rejected on the basis that Scotland offers an alternative safeguard in the form of corroboration. To remove corroboration without a full reassessment of safeguards would, therefore, verge on the reckless. Making a token change to the rules regarding majority jury verdicts is patently insufficient.
(3) Majority jury verdicts

9. We do not believe that requiring a majority of 10 jurors from 15, in the absence of a corroboration requirement, provides an adequate safeguard against wrongful conviction. We note that the Scottish Government chose, in consulting publicly on additional safeguards, to ask whether a majority specifically of 9 or 10 should be required. Despite this, a significant number of respondents to the consultation went beyond the terms of the question asked and indicated that a higher majority was necessary.

10. As James Chalmers and Fiona Leverick have explained elsewhere (“Majority jury verdicts” (2013) 17 Edinburgh Law Review 90-96), lay jury systems worldwide typically require either unanimity or near-unanimity in order for an accused person to be convicted. The only significant exception appears to be the Russian criminal jury, where a verdict of guilty can be returned by seven of twelve jurors. The Russian system, however (which was wrongly characterised as one with “no additional safeguards” in the Scottish Government consultation) counterbalances this rule with a number of safeguards which have no parallel in Scotland: (a) extensive rights to question and object to potential jurors; (b) a minimum period of three hours’ deliberation before a vote may take place (a unanimous verdict may be returned before this) and (c) jury verdicts being returned in the form of answers to a questionnaire, thus providing additional information regarding the basis of the jury’s decision which is not available in Scotland.

11. Insofar as it is possible to quantify the level of protection against wrongful conviction offered by any criminal justice system, the effect of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as it now stands would be to reduce the level of protection against wrongful conviction offered in Scotland below that offered in any other comparable jurisdiction. We are not aware of any other jurisdiction which has chosen to experiment with the combination of (a) no corroboration requirement; (b) a near-simple majority requirement within the jury and (c) minimal judicial supervision of jury verdicts (see (4) below). We are unclear on what basis the Scottish Government has felt able to conclude that the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill would represent a safe manner in which to run a criminal justice system.

(4) Withdrawing a case from the jury

12. We have previously argued that a trial judge should have the power to withdraw a case from the jury on the grounds that the evidence is such that no reasonable jury could convict on it. We repeat that submission here. We are concerned that the failure to permit the trial judge to do this leaves the level of protection against wrongful conviction in Scots law at a dangerously low level, and in addition risks needlessly wasting public funds.

13. We note the statement in the Carloway Review (at para 7.3.19) that:
“If the requirement for corroboration were to be abolished, there is no need for any further change to the existing law on sufficiency of evidence at the trial stage. The issue for the trial judge would be the same as it is at present, except that there would be no need for corroboration.”

14. We find this statement peculiar to say the least. A no case to answer submission currently requires the trial judge to consider whether there is corroborated evidence available in respect of each fact which is crucial to the prosecution case. To say that if corroboration were abolished the issue for the trial judge “would be the same… except that there would be no need for corroboration” seems to us to misrepresent the practical reality of the current law.

15. Because the abolition of corroboration would bring Scots law into line with English law, it is helpful to note how a no case to answer submission should be dealt with in that jurisdiction (as did the Carloway Review). In R v Galbraith [1981] 1 WLR 1039, Lord Lane observed that a submission should succeed in the case (1) “where there is no evidence that the crime alleged has been committed by the defendant” and (2) “[w]here the judge comes to the conclusion that the prosecution evidence, taken at its highest, is such that a jury properly directed could not properly convict upon it”.

16. Case (2), however, is currently excluded from the ambit of the Scottish no case to answer submission as a result of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, which inserted a new section 97D into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to this effect. Consequently, implementing the Carloway proposals as they stand would mean that the no case to answer submission would verge on the redundant and would offer significantly weaker protection against wrongful conviction than that available to accused persons in England and Wales.

17. As the consultation paper notes, the Scottish Law Commission previously recommended that it should be possible to sustain a no case to answer submission on the basis that no reasonable jury could convict on the evidence led (Report on Crown Appeals (Scot Law Com No 212, 2008)). The government chose not to implement that recommendation, but as the consultation paper again acknowledges, this was in the context of the accused being protected by a requirement of corroboration. This is consistent with a longstanding view that the requirement of corroboration minimises the need for trial judges to be given further powers to prevent wrongful conviction (see e.g. Scottish Home and Health Department, Identification Procedures under Scottish Criminal Law (Cmnd 7096: 1978) para 5.03). If corroboration is to be abolished, the Scottish Law Commission’s proposals should be implemented.

18. We cannot see why, if an appeal court is permitted to quash a conviction on the grounds that no reasonable jury would have convicted (as it is under section 106(3)(b) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995), a trial judge (who is in a far better position to judge what the jury can reasonably do, having heard all the evidence) should not have a similar power to prevent a case proceeding at the end of the prosecution case. We accept that the practical importance of such a rule would have been relatively limited while a requirement of corroboration remained in place, but this is unlikely to be so if that requirement is abolished. If a judge were of the view that no reasonable jury could convict on the evidence led, they would surely be obliged to state this in their report to the appeal court in an appeal against conviction, and the appeal court would in turn be all but obliged to accept the view of the judge who had personally heard all the evidence. Requiring such cases to be dealt with by way of an appeal against conviction is a waste of public resources and would unjustly and unjustifiably leave the individual concerned with the stain of a criminal conviction, notwithstanding its being quashed on appeal. We are fortified in this view by the fact that the other recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission in its 2008 report, as implemented in 2010, now mean that it would be possible for the appeal court to correct any error made by a trial judge in this regard in the unlikely event that this should be necessary.

(5) Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission references to the appeal court

19. Section 82 requires the High Court to apply an additional “interests of justice” test when considering references from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission.
We believe that this section of the Bill should be removed except insofar as it repeals section 194DA. Either the SCCRC is competent to decide the interests of justice point or it is not. It makes little sense to argue, as Lord Carloway did, for section 194DA of the 1995 Act (which allows the appeal court to refuse to consider a reference if it would not be in the interests of justice to do so) to be repealed only to re-introduce an “interests of justice” test at the point when the appeal is determined.
Indeed, this proposal is more objectionable than the present situation, as it would prolong proceedings unnecessarily and waste resources. We would refer to References by the SCCRC in the cases of RM and Gallacher [2012] HCJAC 121, where the appeal court expresses its full confidence in the Commission’s ability to decide the interests of justice test.

20. Under the current section 194DA of the 1995 Act, introduced in the post-Cadder emergency legislation, the appeal court has the power to rule that it is not in the interests of justice that an SCCRC reference should proceed to an appeal. Case law (see RM and Reference by the SCCRC in the case of Mark Chamberlain-Davidson [2012] HCJAC 120) has suggested that the Crown has little interest in pursuing the “interests of justice” point but has nevertheless invited the court to rule on this point.
This seems only to have wasted public time and money.

21. It is difficult to see exactly what problem Lord Carloway is attempting to address here. In evidence to the Justice Committee, he gave the example of someone who had their case referred to the High Court by the SCCRC but who, in the interim, confessed to the crime. But this unlikely scenario could happen in any appeal. There is no reason to think that it is more likely in a case referred by the Commission; if anything, it is less likely. If this is the basis for section 82, section 82 is a wholly inadequate means of addressing it. In any event, the problem does not need to be addressed: it could be dealt with by the High Court’s existing power to quash the conviction while granting permission for a retrial. Moreover, it is not clear how section 82 could ever address the problem, as it creates no power for the court to hear evidence of the alleged confession and so take it into account.

22. In summary, section 82 is an inadequate means of addressing a non-existent problem and will result only in a waste of public time and money.

23. For these reasons, our view is that the test for determining SCCRC appeals should be the same as the test for determining any other appeal against conviction: whether or not there has been a miscarriage of justice.

Professor James Chalmers;
Professor Lindsay Farmer; and Professor Fiona Leverick.
University of Glasgow School of Law
28 August 2013
1. I am grateful for the opportunity to provide supplementary evidence to the Justice Committee in light of the evidence given by Lord Carloway on 24 September 2013. I have written an article for a forthcoming issue of the Scots Law Times dealing with this issue, and summarise that article here.

2. In summary, I note in that article that Lord Carloway made three particular claims in his evidence to the Committee, as follows. First, that “other countries” are disturbed by Scotland’s application of a corroboration rule. Secondly, that Scotland is the “only country in the civilized world” to retain such a rule. Thirdly, that corroboration’s abolition could be supported by the lack of evidence to suggest that the rate of miscarriages of justice in Scotland was higher than elsewhere.

3. I suggest in the article that these claims cannot be justified. First, I am not aware of expressions of concern by “other countries” about corroboration, and such references to the Scottish rule of corroboration in the international literature as I can identify are either positive or neutral. I note, however, that international concern has been expressed about the Scottish simple majority verdict in jury trials, accepting that this unusual rule may be counter-balanced by the corroboration requirement. I note also that the reforms proposed to the simple majority verdict in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill would still leave Scotland significantly out of line compared to common law jury systems around the world.

4. Secondly, I note that it would be wrong to suggest that Scotland is the only country which retains a rule prohibiting conviction on the evidence of a single witness. The Netherlands continues to maintain a general rule to this effect, while various other countries prohibit such convictions in particular circumstances.

5. Thirdly, I note that there is an absence of evidence on rates of miscarriages of justice in Scotland. No material is available which would allow us reliably to assess this issue. In any event, if all that can be said is that the rate of miscarriages of justice in Scotland is no higher than elsewhere, it is doubtful that we can afford to remove a key safeguard against wrongful conviction such as corroboration.

6. In conclusion, I suggest that the failure to recognise corroboration’s importance as a safeguard against wrongful conviction is a lacuna in the Carloway Review. I do not support calls for a further broad review of the criminal justice system. The Carloway Review itself was such a broad review, and an excellent one. However, the issue of safeguards was omitted from that review and deserves further careful consideration.

7. Further review of this issue need not delay the progress of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. If the Scottish Government is determined to abolish corroboration, it could do so on the basis that the relevant provisions will not be brought into force until the Scottish Law Commission, or an ad hoc body, has completed a focused review of safeguards against wrongful conviction and any legislation which is necessary as a result of that review has been enacted.

Professor James Chalmers
School of Law, University of Glasgow
18 November 2013

Abolishing Corroboration: Three Bad Arguments

On 24 September 2013, Lord Carloway gave evidence to the Justice Committee of the Scottish Parliament as part of its Stage 1 investigation into the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Unsurprisingly, a considerable part of the questioning was taken up with the issue of corroboration, which has proved to be the most controversial part of the Bill by some distance.

A great deal has already been written about the possible abolition of corroboration, and this article will not rehearse these debates. However, Lord Carloway’s appearance before the Justice Committee provided him with an opportunity to refine the arguments which he has made for removing this rule, and to emphasise certain key points.

There were three such points repeated by Lord Carloway throughout his evidence. The first was a claim that “other countries” were disturbed by Scotland’s application of a corroboration rule. The second was a claim that Scotland was the “only country in the civilized world” to retain such a rule. The third was that corroboration’s abolition could be supported by the lack of evidence to suggest that the rate of miscarriages of justice in Scotland was higher than elsewhere.

Each of these points was made more than once by Lord Carloway, with the second being described as “the critical feature that I ask the committee to bear in mind” (col 3247). They seem now to form a core part of the case – perhaps the core of the case – which is being made for corroboration’s abolition. This article assesses each of these arguments in turn, arguing that none of them can be justified. All references to column numbers are references to the Official Report of the Justice Committee for Tuesday 24 September 2014.

The views of other countries

Lord Carloway asked the Justice Committee to take into account “what other countries think about our having such a rule”, which he described as an “extremely persuasive reason why the rule must go” (col 3248). He repeated this point subsequently: “Other countries regard the fact that we have such a rule as disturbing” (col 3258).

This is a surprising statement. Scotland is a small jurisdiction and it is unlikely that our corroboration rule is particularly well-known in other jurisdictions. Silence should, therefore, not be taken as endorsement. However, the claim that other countries have expressed criticism of the Scottish corroboration rule is a new one. No such criticism was cited in Lord Carloway’s report, and so it is unclear on what basis this claim has been made.

I have reviewed the international literature to try and identify comments from abroad about the Scottish rule. There are not many, but such references as I can identify – there will doubtless be others – have been either positive or neutral. I include a list of examples at appendix A to this article.

Perhaps more importantly, international observers have consistently expressed concern about the possibility of a jury convicting on the basis of a simple majority verdict, while accepting that this may be counter-balanced by the corroboration requirement. I include a list of examples at appendix B. While the Bill would increase the majority required for conviction from 8 of 15 jurors to 10 of 15, this remains out of line with the general requirement in the common law world that lay juries must return unanimous or at least near-unanimous verdicts. Civilian systems are more likely to permit conviction without near-unanimity, but counterbalance this with a degree of judicial supervision of the jury which is absent from the Scottish system.

In summary, it is not clear on what basis Lord Carloway felt able to assert that the corroboration rule has provoked concern internationally. It is clear, however, that the reform which his review proposed – allowing a jury to convict by a simple majority on the basis of uncorroborated evidence – is something which would be regarded with concern outside of Scotland. The Scottish Government’s separate proposal to adjust the jury majority required for conviction does not provide an adequate answer to this concern.

The uniqueness of the rule

Lord Carloway described Scotland as “the only country in the world that has the rule” (col 3240), going on to say that “Scotland is the only country in the civilised world – I include in that the whole of Western Europe and all the Commonwealth countries – that has a rule that requires corroboration.” (col 3242). Finally, he remarked that “Scotland is the only country in the civilised world that retains this archaic rule of medieval jurisprudence” (col 3247).

In his Report, Lord Carloway identified the requirement of corroboration as having Romano-canonical origins, and so being influential both within Scotland and in continental Europe. He suggested that the corroboration rule was abandoned by other European systems in the eighteenth and nineteenth century, stating (at para 7.1.14):

“...advances in thinking changed the approach entirely. Provided society could ensure that its judges were learned, reasonable and impartial, the essence of proof of guilt would involve the subjective persuasion of the trier of fact. The test would become, in French, ‘l’intime conviction’ and, in German, ‘freie Beweiswürdigung’. This is the antithesis of a system with formal rules of evidence, including a requirement for corroboration. Instead, there are no rules of proof and conviction depends upon the view of the judge, or subsequently a jury, having heard all relevant evidence placed before the court.” (Carloway Review: Report and Recommendations (2011) para 7.1.14)
This is an accurate statement of the manner in which criminal procedure has developed in continental Europe, in general terms (see e.g. the comments about French and German law made by H Mannheim (1950) 13 MLR 90). However, the more sweeping statements made by Lord Carloway in his evidence to the Justice Committee are problematic.

The Scottish corroboration rule can fairly be described as unique, insofar as it represents our own modern development of a rule with its foundations in Romano-canonical law. However, the suggestion that all other countries have abandoned the Romano-canonical rule requiring more than one witness is wrong. The Netherlands appears to retain a general rule of unus testis nullus testis (“one witness is no witness”: art 342(2) of the Dutch Code of Criminal Procedure), which prevents a conviction being based on the evidence of one witness alone, although the two witnesses may speak to different matters and so not provide corroboration in the sense required by the modern Scottish rule. (See P J P Tak, The Dutch Criminal Justice System, 3rd edn (2008) para 7.17; S van der Ah, Stalking in the Netherlands (2010) 191-192; App No 39024/97; LN v Netherlands, European Court of Human Rights, 9 November 1999.)

Perhaps more importantly, a 2006 study published by the Council of Europe suggested that a number of European jurisdictions remained sceptical about conviction on the basis of a single witness’s evidence in particular contexts, applying special rules prohibiting conviction on the basis of, for example, incriminating testimony delivered by an anonymous witness, an alleged accomplice of the accused, a witness who refused to be cross-examined, or a witness who gave evidence by video-link. (See Council of Europe, Terrorism: Protection of Witnesses and Collaborators of Justice (2006) 20-21, referring to the law of Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg and Portugal.)

Such rules provide a lesser safeguard against wrongful conviction than the Scottish corroboration rule, but they provide significantly more of a safeguard than would remain in Scotland were the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill to be enacted in its current form.

I do not intend here to make any general claims about the approach of continental European jurisdictions to corroboration, and would not claim any comprehensive understanding of the many different criminal justice systems in Europe. It may be that the Dutch rule is unique on the continent, but that is mere speculation. When, in 1997, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia had to consider whether unus testis nullus testis represented a general rule of law which it should apply to its own procedure, it felt able to say only that the Dutch rule represented “an exception to the prevailing rule in the civil law” (Prosecutor v Tadić, ICTY Trial Chamber, 7 May 1997 para 538, emphasis added.) Importantly, the Tadić court concluded that unus testis nullus testis was not a general rule which it should apply. It would clearly be correct to say that most countries have abandoned such requirements. It is not, however, correct to claim that Scotland remains uniquely isolated in requiring a plurality of witnesses for conviction.
It would be possible for the Scottish Government to commission the necessary research to establish the extent to which this rule persists across Europe, although it would be a time-consuming process which would require the assistance of experts in each jurisdiction and an understanding of the criminal justice system as a whole in any given country. No such research was carried out as part of the Carloway Review, and it is doubtful that any such research would have been particularly helpful. However, now that the supposed uniqueness of the Scottish rule has been stressed so strongly to the Justice Committee, it is important that the committee does not uncritically accept the claim that “Scotland is the only country in the civilised world that retains this archaic rule of medieval jurisprudence”. Scotland is at least unusual, but the research which would be required to justify such a strong claim as the one Lord Carloway made in evidence has not been carried out. In any event, the claim seems simply to be incorrect given the Dutch rule.

The rate of miscarriages of justice

Lord Carloway referred to the lack of “material to suggest that the incidence of miscarriage of justice... is different from that in any other country in the civilised western world or the Commonwealth” (col 3240); later “there is no evidence whatsoever that Scotland’s incidence of miscarriages of justice is any lower than that of any other country in the civilised world” (col 3250); saying later that “there is no suggestion that the incidence of miscarriages of justice in England is greater than it is here” (col 3261).

There are two serious problems with this argument. First, it cuts both ways. If there is no evidence that the Scottish incidence of miscarriages of justice differs from other countries, this suggests that we are not in a position where we can afford to abandon one of our principal existing safeguards against wrongful conviction.

Secondly, it is not at all clear what the evidence for this claim is. As Donald Nicolson and John Blackie have noted in their important review of corroboration, “[n]o one has begun to estimate the rate of unjust acquittals in Anglo American jurisdictions, whereas the rate of convictions of the “factually” innocent have only been capable of reasonably accurate estimation following the advent of DNA testing and then only where DNA was available to establish innocence.” (D Nicolson and J Blackie, “Corroboration in Scots law: ‘archaic rule’ or ‘invaluable safeguard’?” (2013) 17 Edin LR 152 at 158-159). There is no clear evidence on the rate of miscarriages of justice in Scotland, nor is it clear how such information could be reliably compiled. The best mechanism we have for establishing guilt or innocence is the criminal justice process itself. Outside of the narrow category of cases where DNA evidence was not initially available, but is at a subsequent date, and can be regarded as determinative, we lack any secondary mechanism which we can use to check the overall accuracy of that process.

In summary, the Justice Committee should place no weight on the claim that Scotland’s miscarriage of justice rate is no different from elsewhere. There does not appear to be any evidence which supports that claim, and in any event there would be no means of reliably testing it. But even if we accept that Lord Carloway is right to suggest that the Scottish miscarriage of justice rate is no different from elsewhere, that would suggest that we could not afford to abolish corroboration. If our existing criminal justice system is as it stands no better at preventing miscarriages of justice than other systems, how can we afford to remove one of its key safeguards?

One other aspect of Lord Carloway’s approach to miscarriages of justice during his evidence is worthy of note. He explained to the Justice Committee that additional safeguards were not required, because the abolition of corroboration “would not cause miscarriages of justice of the type that we are discussing in the narrow sense of appellate jurisdiction – that is, something going wrong in the trial process” (cols 3243-3244). That is correct, but it is also irrelevant. The “narrow sense” Lord Carloway refers to treats a miscarriage of justice as consisting of a significant failure to follow the rules governing a criminal trial. That means that Lord Carloway appears to have claimed that changing the rules governing a criminal trial will not cause the rules governing a criminal trial to be breached. On that approach, no change to the rules of evidence or procedure could ever cause miscarriages of justice. The claim is a meaningless one and tells us nothing about whether abolishing corroboration would be likely to lead to an increase in the number of factually innocent people convicted of criminal offences.

Why does this matter?

In identifying corroboration as an “archaic rule”, the Carloway Review failed to recognise that however archaic the rule may be, it is by virtue of its lengthy heritage the rule around which so many other aspects of our criminal justice system have been constructed. The existence of a broad corroboration rule has meant that we have simply never engaged in debate about a whole range of more specific problems. We have never, for example, had to consider whether it would be safe to allow a jury to convict based solely on the evidence of an accomplice, an anonymous witness, hearsay evidence or dock identification. Corroboration always rendered such questions moot; even if we might have doubts about particular forms of evidence, there would at least have to be two incriminating sources.

Moreover, we have been able to assuage our doubts about permitting simple majority jury verdicts, an approach which looks remarkably lax compared to the rest of the common law world, by pointing to the counterweight offered by corroboration. We have resisted a rule which would allow trial judges to withdraw unsafe cases from juries, but maintained a meaningful no case to answer procedure on the basis that trial judges assess whether corroborated evidence has been presented by the Crown. And aside from questions of corroboration (and fresh evidence), we have permitted very little review of the factual basis for a conviction on appeal.

If corroboration is abolished, the assumptions which underpin Scots law’s position on every single one of these positions is undermined. It is remarkable, therefore, that Lord Carloway takes the view that alternative safeguards against wrongful conviction are simply not “directly relevant” (col 3244) to the question whether or not corroboration should be retained.

This does point to a way forward. Some criticisms of the proposal to abolish corroboration have suggested that there should be some form of broad review of the Scottish criminal justice system before such a change is made. This is a suggestion which is unlikely to find favour with the Scottish Government, and for good reason: it is difficult to see what the Carloway Review was if not a broad review. However, there is a clear lacuna in that review. The failure to acknowledge corroboration’s importance as a safeguard against wrongful conviction, and the manner in which the criminal justice system has been constructed around it, means that further work must be done to identify what safeguards the criminal justice system should put in its place. The Scottish Government’s own consultation on this matter, which canvassed only the most minimal of changes, provides a starting point for this but cannot claim to be an adequate review of the issues involved.

The narrow issue of safeguards is a focused one which could realistically be referred either to the Scottish Law Commission or to an independent body, to be addressed in a relatively short timescale. That need not even impede the passage of the Bill: if the Scottish Government is determined to abolish corroboration, it could do so in this Bill but delay the implementation of that provision until a safeguards review is carried out and any necessary changes are made.

This would not be revisiting the Carloway Review itself, but addressing an issue which was omitted from that exercise. It would remain possible, of course, to make the argument that no safeguards actually are required, although that seems to be a view which is unlikely to command much support.

Conclusion

Lord Carloway’s review has been an enormously valuable exercise. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill will put a large part of the Scottish criminal justice system on a footing more sound and rational than that which currently exists. Lord Carloway’s proposals give great weight to the protection of suspects at the investigative stage, and will ensure that Scots criminal law continues to give greater protection at this stage than many other jurisdictions. There is a danger, however, that the abolition of corroboration will seriously damage the review’s legacy. If corroboration is to be abolished, serious consideration needs to be given to safeguards against wrongful conviction in Scots law. Lord Carloway himself claimed that there is no evidence that the incidence of miscarriages of justice in Scotland differs from elsewhere. If that is true – although it is difficult to see how we could reliably know this – then we cannot afford simply to abolish our principal safeguard against wrongful conviction and leave nothing in its place. A focused review of safeguards against wrongful conviction would fill the gap in Lord Carloway’s own work, allow the Government to proceed with its settled intention of abolishing corroboration, and ensure that Scotland retains a criminal justice system which properly recognises the dangers of, and seeks to prevent, miscarriages of justice.
Appendix A: international observations on the Scottish corroboration rule

L Griffin, “International perspectives on correcting wrongful convictions” (2013) 21 William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 1153 at 1207 (noting how the Scottish rule would avoid certain single-witness convictions which have proved problematic in the United States); P Hardin, “Other answers: search and seizure, coerced confession and criminal trial in Scotland” (1964) 113 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 165 at 183 (describing corroboration an “important” and “salutary” rule); S Mount, “A criminal cases review commission for New Zealand?” [2009] New Zealand Law Review 455 at 462 (suggesting that the “added hurdle[] to conviction” presented by corroboration might make miscarriages of justice less likely in Scotland than in New Zealand); C Sherrin, “Jailhouse informants in the Canadian criminal justice system, part II: options for reform” (1997) 40 Criminal Law Quarterly 157 at 160-164 (expressing scepticism about how much protection corroboration could offer as a safeguard against wrongful conviction on the basis of false testimony from an informer, but expressing no disturb as to the general rule).

Appendix B: international comments on the Scottish simple majority verdict

Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from Children in Scotland

Evidence on Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Thank you for the opportunity to provide written evidence for the Committee’s Stage One proceedings on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Children in Scotland previously contributed to the Scottish Government’s consultation on Lord Carloway’s recommendations leading up to this Bill. Further to that we warmly welcome the apparent reflection of those recommendations in section 42 of the Bill in respect of placing a duty on police constables to consider the best interests of the child when holding, arresting, interviewing or charging a child. We would however seek assurance that the use of the word “well-being” in section 42 (2) in the Bill is fully consistent with this. We also warmly welcome the Bill’s definition of a child as under-18 in line with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) and view these as important steps forward. We would, however, like to focus our Committee evidence to two areas of particular interest and concern, which we feel should also be addressed through this Bill.

Age of Criminal Responsibility and Prosecution of Children

Children in Scotland was amongst signatories to a joint letter to the Minister for Children & Young People following the Bill’s publication from a range of children’s organisations concerned at the omission in the Bill to raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility from eight to 12 years old in line with the commitment in the Scottish Government’s Do the Right Thing Progress Report 2012 to give this fresh consideration “with a view to bringing forward any legislative change in the lifetime of this Parliament.”

We would, however point out that a minimum age of 12 would still be lower than most other European jurisdictions which (apart from Scotland) range from ten in England & Wales to 16 in Belgium. In practice most alleged offences committed by children under the age of 16 are dealt with through the Children’s Hearings system providing for child’s “needs and deeds” to be considered in the round with an overarching welfare and rehabilitation focus in line with the ethos of the Kilbrandon Report. In this regard Scotland is an exemplar to the rest of the world, however it does however mean that, unlike the rest of the UK, Scotland does not have a distinct system of juvenile courts. As such it remains theoretically possible, and has occurred in practice, for a child as young as 12 (or for a crime alleged to have been committed at that age) to be prosecuted as an adult and obtain a conviction and criminal record for which it may be unclear relates to when he or she was a minor with the attendant impact that may have on that child’s future life chances.

Whilst we recognise that children can, and sometimes do, engage in offending behaviour, we strongly believe that, even if reflected in sentencing and slightly different provisions under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, it is inappropriate

---

1 (2012) Scottish Government: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/05/3593/23
a child can be prosecuted and receive the same conviction and criminal record as a fully mature adult.

It should be made clear that none of this is to say that offending behaviour by children should not be addressed or appropriately punished, but recognises that the mental, physical and sexual maturation process is by definition less advanced in children and scope for change and rehabilitation considerably greater and that this should be reflected in the procedures and sanctions pursued and imposed. Children are not simply small adults.

In addition to the moral issues concerning the treatment and welfare of an individual child, there are also wider practical reasons arising from societal benefits, both socially and financially for the focus to be on addressing offending behaviour and rehabilitation rather than early criminalisation. There is a range of examples of effective good practice provided by a number of our membership organisations in this regard.

As such we would support a strengthened presumption against criminal prosecution and in favour of constructive alternatives for children aged up to at least 16. For the same reasons we would also be in favour of widening the definition of a “child” as described in section 199 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 to a person under the age of 18. At the moment the definition extends only to those 16 and over who are subject to a compulsory supervision order or if referred to the Principal Reporter before they turned 16. This would be a logical extension of Lord Carloway’s recommendation taken forward in the Bill that, for the purposes of arrest, detention and questioning a “child” should be defined as anyone under the age of 18 years as previously mentioned. It would also be in keeping with the definition found in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) to which the UK is a signatory and which the Scottish Government has a stated commitment to as well as the definition set out in its current Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill.

If not reflected in primary legislation we would also impress on the Committee the need to ensure robust guidance for police and Procurators Fiscal in relation to proceedings, criminal or otherwise where children are involved. Developments in technology and legislation have created extra scope for falling foul of the law through, for example posting of inappropriate comments or images online. Whilst we are very concerned about the potential consequences and support appropriate action preventing and dealing with so-called “cyber-bullying” and “sexting” for example, it should be recognised for reasons mentioned above that the nature of such behaviour and the appropriate sanctions are very different if perpetrated by children than by a fully mature adult towards a child and that such nuances should be properly taken account of in a consistent manner. It remains a considerable anomaly that a child can in theory be prosecuted and convicted like an adult and even placed on the sex offenders register for activity to which they are rightly legally unable to properly consent. It is particularly important to avoid a situation where children and young people may feel prevented from seeking help or advice or are potentially vulnerable to blackmail on this basis.
Equal Protection from Assault

As the law currently stands children are the only group not to be protected by law from being hit due to the defence of “justifiable assault” (physical punishment) in the Criminal Justice Act 2003. While this legislation did prohibit the use of implements, blows to the head and shaking, the fact that children are not afforded at least the same protection as every other individual against physical assault, particularly the enshrinement in law of certain forms of assault against children as “justifiable”, leaves Scotland increasingly out of step with the majority of other European jurisdictions.

In May of this year, the UN Committee Against Torture examined the UK’s (including Scotland’s) compliance with the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Its concluding recommendations state: “The Committee takes note of amendments in legislation in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, which limit the application of the defence of ‘reasonable punishment’ (or ‘justifiable assault’ in Scotland), but remains concerned that some forms of corporal punishment are still legally permissible in the home for parents and those in loco parentis.„The Committee recommends that the State party prohibits corporal punishment of children in all settings…repealing all legal defences currently in place, and further promote positive non-violent forms of discipline via public campaigns as an alternative to corporal punishment.”

This call has been echoed by the GB Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC)4, the Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC)5 and Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People.6

If the Scottish Government is serious about its stated commitments to make Scotland “The best place to grow up” and to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child it needs to explain why it will allow Scotland to be one of the increasing minority of European jurisdictions where equal protection for children from assault is not in place.

This is not to say that children do not need to be disciplined, but that hitting is neither an appropriate, constructive nor an effective form of punishment and that parents should be supported to use other methods to teach children correct behaviour. The current law is confusing, ambiguous and undermines the ability to protect children

---

3 Para 27 http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/cat/cats50.htm
4 (August 2012) EHRC submission to CAT on list of issues on the UK 5th periodic report
5 (April 2003) SHRC submission to CAT, Para 31 from harm. Arguments that prohibition of corporal punishment would lead to widespread criminalisation of parents or juvenile indiscipline have not been borne out in the jurisdictions which have changed their law to provide equal protection from assault. What we do know is that smacking can, give a bad example of how to handle strong emotions, may lead to children hitting or otherwise bullying others and can lead to anger and resentment adversely affecting their development.\textsuperscript{7} Similarly, the argument that corporal punishment is a necessary last resort as children do not have the full capacity to reason would be totally unacceptable in relation to vulnerable adults.

We therefore view the absence of any provisions in this Criminal Justice Bill to take similar steps to other European countries in this regard as a serious omission and missed opportunity to match the Scottish Government’s stated ambitions on children’s rights and wellbeing.

I hope this is helpful to the Committee in its deliberations but please do not hesitate to contact us if we can be of any further assistance to its Members or staff.

Yours faithfully

Children in Scotland
5 September 2013

Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Children Are Unbeatable! Scotland

The Scottish Government is committed to a challenging modernising agenda to ensure our justice system is as efficient and effective as possible in meeting the needs of a modern and progressive country and to ensure that Scottish criminal law and practice is compliant with the European Convention on Human Rights ("the ECHR") and able to withstand challenges on Convention grounds. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is the legislative vehicle to take forward the next stage of essential reforms to the Scottish criminal justice system to enhance efficiency and bring the appropriate balance to the justice system so that rights are protected whilst ensuring effective access to justice for victims of crime.

Children are unbeatable! (CAU) Scotland agrees that the Bill should serve this purpose but there is a significant omission: the Bill fails to give children the same protection from assault as adults.

Children are unbeatable! (CAU) Scotland is an alliance of individuals and organisations opposing the use of corporal punishment in the home and is campaigning to ensure that children enjoy equal protection from assault, under the law, as adults.

Adults hitting children is a human rights issue. It is out of date, out of sync with the majority of countries in Europe and delivers a harmful message that hitting is a way to solve problems. The current law in Scotland is confusing and undermines our ability to protect children from harm. By removing the current legal ambiguity about what constitutes physical harm to a child we can keep all children safe and respect their human rights.

In the work of our member organisations such as ParentLine Scotland, which is a free helpline and email service for anyone with a concern about a child, and professionals such as doctors we are in touch with real life experiences and the harm caused by violence. So in addition to the need for legal reform, the ethos underpinning our campaign is:

- Discipline is a critical element of parenting but smacking is not an effective or constructive way of dealing with a child’s bad behaviour
- We want to support parents to use other methods to teach their children the difference between right and wrong
- We know that nurture in the early years is a key priority for Scottish Government and we believe that equal protection will help to achieve this.

Justifiable assault

It is ten years since the Scottish Parliament passed the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 which introduced, in Section 51, a defence for adults of 'justifiable' assault when they hit children as a punishment, and sought to prohibit the use of implements, blows to the head and shaking\textsuperscript{v}. Despite promises to mount a public information campaign and to monitor the use of the law, there has been little activity on this matter in the last ten years.

Section 51 undermines the Scottish Government's ambition for 'Scotland to be the best place in the world for children to grow up'. That ambition is unrealistic as long as the law justifies the assault of children and they are treated differently in law and in practice from adults. As it was the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 that justified this defence, we feel that this Criminal Justice Bill is an appropriate vehicle to remove this defence. Simple legal reform will send a clear message that hitting children is as unacceptable and unlawful as hitting anyone else. CAU is concerned that there is no evidence that the law is working effectively which is another reason to listen to the UN and take action now. There would be no financial cost involved in the removal of section 51.

The existence of Section 51 for ten years contradicts other policies. Although it supports "tough action to punish those who break the law and invests in work to tackle the causes of violence\textsuperscript{vi}" it refuses to change the law on hitting children. In practice there is a real potential for conflict as the oath of Scotland's new National Police Force, operational since 1st April 2013, states "I, do solemnly, sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of constable with fairness, integrity, diligence and impartiality, and that I will uphold fundamental human rights and accord equal respect to all people, according to law.\textsuperscript{vii}

In the Scottish Government's recent response to the Universal Periodic Review it was stated that "that the existing law provides the right protection of children and young people" and that there are "no plans to change this approach". However the description given of the existing law was incorrect, stating that "it is already illegal to punish children by shaking or hitting them.\textsuperscript{viii} Although S51 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 prohibits the administration of blows to a child's head, the shaking of a child and the use of an implement in the chastisement of a child, it does not make it illegal to punish children by hitting them. This emphasises the confusion caused by the complexities of the current law.

We believe that children need and deserve at least equal protection in all circumstances as adults. In this particular situation children do not currently have even equal protection to adults.

It is now time that the law on hitting children is consistent with international human rights law.

Positive parenting

We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to supporting alternative ways for parents to raise children, including positive parenting\textsuperscript{x}. We would, however, like to see this translate into a more meaningful commitment. Along with the removal of the defence of justifiable assault we would like to see reporting requirements on local authorities, to see what they have done to promote positive parenting in their area, and a concurrent evaluation of the impact of this.
We welcome the new section 51, and would expect the police and other relevant agencies to take the best interests of the child into account when deciding whether to prosecute a parent who has hit their child. We feel strongly that a removal of the defence of justifiable assault should not lead to disproportionate responses or parents unnecessarily being criminalised. We are, however, very clear that in cases where there is criminal injury we do support criminal sanctions. We believe that in cases where no serious injury is inflicted there may still be a need for some form of follow up, and consideration should be given to what these supports and/or sanctions should entail.

International example

The UN has repeatedly recommended that the UK and Scotland change its laws:

- In 2008 when assessing the UK’s compliance with the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women “further recommends that the State party include in its legislation the prohibition of corporal punishment of children in the home.” A further Hearing on UK compliance took place in July 2013, and the physical punishment of children was discussed. Concluding observations stated: ‘The Committee further recalls its previous concluding observations (A/63/38, paras. 280 and 281) and is concerned that corporal punishment remains lawful in the home. The Committee urges the State party to… Revise its legislation to prohibit corporal punishment of children in the home.’

- In October 2008, the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child stated in its concluding observations on the UK: “The Committee is concerned at the failure of State party to explicitly prohibit all corporal punishment in the home and emphasises its view that the existence of any defence in cases of corporal punishment of children does not comply with the principles and provisions of the Convention, since it would suggest that some forms of corporal punishment are acceptable.” In June 2006, the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child said that giving children equal protection from assault is “an immediate and unqualified obligation” under the Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC).

- In May 2009, when assessing UK compliance with the UN Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ‘The Committee reiterated its recommendation that physical punishment of children in the home be prohibited by law’.
In May 2012 the UK’s human rights record was examined by the UN Human Rights Council and Sweden, Finland, Norway and Hungary recommended that the UK must ensure the freedom of children from corporal punishment, in accordance with the UNCRC.

In May 2013, the UN Committee Against Torture examined the UK’s, including Scotland’s, compliance with the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. In its Concluding Observations, published on 31st May 2013, the Committee urged prohibition of physical punishment of children by adults: “The Committee takes note of amendments to legislation in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, which limit the application of the defence of “reasonable punishment” (or “justifiable assault” in Scotland), but remains concerned that some forms of corporal punishment are still legally permissible in the home for parents and those in loco parentis. In addition, it expresses concern that corporal punishment is lawful in the home, schools and alternative care settings in almost all overseas territories and crown dependencies. The Committee recommends that the State party prohibits corporal punishment of children in all settings in Metropolitan territory, Crown Dependencies and Overseas Territories, repealing all legal defences currently in place, and further promote positive non-violent forms of discipline via public campaigns as an alternative to corporal punishment.”

Conclusion
The case for legal reform has already been successfully made in many countries to change the law on physical punishment. It is extremely disappointing that Scotland has failed to learn from their example. Currently Section 51 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act provides parents/carers with a “justifiable assault” defence if they hit a child as a punishment. It is bizarre that the law should permit and define “justifiable assault” on any human being. CAU urges the committee to consider the issue of physical punishment and the adult defence of ‘justifiable assault’. If the opportunity presented by this Bill is not utilised to repeal this defence, Scotland cannot claim to be the best place for children to grow up.

By amending the law and removing this defence, the human rights of children will be respected and protected. Children should have the same legal protection from violence as adults currently enjoy.
Appendix 1 - Evidence

The extent and use of physical punishment in Scotland is not well understood. The investigation into child abuse and neglect in the Western Isles was published in 2005 and is instructive about the use and effect of physical punishment in one home. The Social Work Inspection Agency concluded that "...the children were subjected to physical abuse throughout their childhood until their removal from home. Some of the physical injuries to the children were caused by over-chastisement by Mr A. Once in England and twice in Eilean Siar he admitted at the time to losing his temper and/or causing an injury. In a later statement to police he said: ‘I did have a temper…like anybody I became aggressive, shouting and shaking…if I had to smack them I would smack them, but I’m heavy handed …on the legs…bruising…'

The Report went on to point out: "We recognise that during the period when these physical injuries to the children occurred, common law entitled someone with parental responsibilities and rights relating to a child and someone with care and control of a child to physically punish the child. It entitled parents to use force to discipline their children provided their actions could be justified in court as ‘reasonable chastisement’. Section 51 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 set out to clarify the law relating to the physical punishment of children. The 2003 Act specifically prohibited blows to the head, shaking and the use of an implement."

"However, in all other cases the defence of ‘reasonable chastisement’ remains and the onus is on the prosecutor to prove that the punishment went beyond this. Mr and Mrs A were, and still would be, legally entitled to physically punish the children and if prosecuted could have claimed a defence of ‘reasonable chastisement’. While there is evidence that professionals, particularly in England, did encourage Mr and Mrs A to use more positive methods of discipline, they could not legally prevent them from using physical punishment." (para 80, Ibid)

A study of the ChildLine database by the Centre for Research on Families and Relationships at Edinburgh University found alarming levels of violence reported in calls from children suffering physical abuse. Children tell of physical assaults that are frequent, brutal and sadistic. Whilst they use many terms to describe the nature of their abuse including smacking, slapping and hitting, they more commonly discuss it in terms of ‘being battered’, ‘beaten’, ‘hammered’, ‘punched’, ‘kicked’ and so on. Children often talk about having marks, bruises and abrasions after assaults and some children talk about being kept off school until their bruises are healed.

Children subjected to corporal punishment have been shown to be more likely than others to be aggressive to siblings; to bully other children at school; to take part in aggressively anti-social behaviour in adolescence; to be violent to their spouses and their own children and to commit violent crimes.

Children and parents alike tell us that they do not like physical punishment, and that it doesn’t work. The intention of law change would not be to criminalise parents, but to help them understand that physical punishment is unacceptable. In conjunction with this law change we would want to see support for parents to use other methods of discipline and approaches to parenting.
Children subjected to corporal punishment have been shown to be more likely than others to be aggressive to siblings; to bully other children at school; to take part in aggressively anti-social behaviour in adolescence; to be violent to their spouses and their own children and to commit violent crimes xiii.

Children and parents alike tell us that they do not like physical punishment, and that it doesn’t workxiv. The intention of law change would not be to criminalise parents, but to help them understand that physical punishment is unacceptable. In conjunction with this law change we would want to see support for parents to use other methods of discipline and approaches to parenting.

Children are Unbeatable! (Scotland)
29 August 2013

---

i Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill Policy Memorandum paras 3-4 pub by Scottish Government ii For example the UK is one of only five EU countries not to have committed to introduce a ban to prohibit corporal punishment. xiv S51 (1) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003
v Ibid S 51 (2)
vii Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012: Section 10: Constable’s Declaration viii Roseanna Cunningham’s letter to Lord McNally regarding the UPR process, dated 29th August 2012
ix http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/10/4789 xi http://www.endcorporalpunishment.org/pages/pdfs/hittingwrong.pdf
xii ‘Respecting children, supporting parents’, a short film about physical punishment based on calls to ChildLine Scotland and ParentLine Scotland xiii http://www.endcorporalpunishment.org/pages/pdfs/hittingwrong.pdf
xiv ‘Respecting children, supporting parents’, a short film about physical punishment based on calls to ChildLine Scotland and ParentLine Scotland
1. Introduction

1.1 Community Safety Glasgow (CSG) (formerly Glasgow Community and Safety Services) welcomes the opportunity to comment on the general principles of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

1.2 CSG’s Trafficking Service, TARA, has supported women who have been trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation since 2005. Therefore, the focus of this submission will be on the principles of the bill that relate to the prosecution of this dreadful crime.

2. Corroboration (s57)

2.1 We are supportive of the removal of the requirement for corroboration and view this as a further step to improve access to justice for victims of human trafficking, especially those exploited in domestic servitude and/or those exploited in off street prostitution. The hidden nature of trafficking often means exploitation and the subsequent offences are often committed in private residences and/or removed from the view of the authorities and general public.

2.2 Frequently there are no witnesses other than the victim or the accused. Victims of trafficking simply do not hold sufficient information to assist with the identification of potential witnesses such as those who have paid for sex with them. (CSG would argue that such purchasers, especially those who have bought sexual services from a trafficked woman (or man) are in effect perpetrators of violence against women.) Lack of corroboration in such cases should not be a barrier to justice for the victims of this serious crime.

3. Aggravation as to people trafficking (s83-85)

3.1 We are pleased to see the introduction of an aggravation as to people trafficking. We believe this will be a useful tool to further combat Human Trafficking in Scotland and promote Scotland as a hostile environment for perpetrators of this serious breach of human rights and crimes against people.

3.2 The introduction of this offence is clearly aimed at tackling Scotland’s low rate of prosecutions for the crime of Human Trafficking) and endeavours to assist with the evidential difficulties inherent in prosecuting Human Trafficking. These principles are to be warmly welcomed. However, CSG’s TARA Service is very concerned that there is significant risk that existing legislation, which carries up to 14 years imprisonment, will be ignored in favour of the simpler aggravation offence.
3.3 Despite this welcome addition, in particular sections 83 and 84, CSG’s TARA Service remains concerned that even with the introduction of an aggravated offence, legislation within Scotland remains piecemeal and is contained within several acts of parliament and associated amendments.

3.4 With regards to s 85 (1) there is, currently, no legal definition of Human Trafficking within Scots Law. All government agencies and support services work to the definition contained within the Council of Europe Convention on Action Against Trafficking in Human Beings. Whilst in agreement with this definition and being cognisant that Scotland is subject to the Convention’s legal obligations, TARA considers the lack of a Scots law definition problematic. In particular, s85 (1) which refers to s22 of the Criminal Justice (Scot) Act 2003 and s4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004 for the meaning of ‘a people trafficking offence’. In effect this means two definitions of the same crime.

3.5 CSG’s TARA Service also believes that s22 of the Criminal Justice (Scot) Act 2003 does not reflect all forms of commercial sexual exploitation for which women are (disproportionately) trafficked. The sex industry, and the demand for women to fulfil its demands, is especially profitable for traffickers and organised crime groups. ‘Prostitution’ and ‘obscene material’ is insufficient and the exclusion of a broader understanding of commercial sexual exploitation has the potential to cause difficulties utilising the proposed aggravated offence.

4. Supplementary Considerations

4.1 Although outwith the scope of this evidence gathering exercise the committee may wish to consider any opportunities within this bill to include offences addressing the demand for trafficked persons and their labour which is generated within Scotland. In particular, addressing the demand for women trafficked to be exploited in the sex industry, is one of the key prevention tools that CSG’s TARA Service recommends.

4.2 CSG’s TARA Service urges the committee to consider including the provision of Judicial Direction in the bill, which the Scottish Government has previously committed to introduce in sexual offence cases (by providing factual information on the responses of victims). TARA believes it to be necessary to improve juries’ knowledge of human trafficking and the impact on victims of this crime given the complex issues surrounding Human Trafficking, the means used by traffickers to coerce and control, trauma and how they combine to impact on survivors of this crime.

4.3 The Scottish Government considers the current legislation to be ‘broadly compliant’ with its legal obligations following the ratification of the EU 2011/36/EU Directive on Preventing and Combating Trafficking in Human Beings and Protecting Victims. A number of provisions were included in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scot) Act 2010 making amendments to the Criminal Justice (Scot) Act 2003 and s4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004. However, a recent article, Human Trafficking in Scotland: The Legislative Response’ by Paul Arnell and Tracy Ogilvie from Robert Gordon University, published in the August edition of the SCOLAG Legal Journal notes that ‘in England and Wales the law has been explicitly amended to affect compliance with the Directive, in the form of two new offences in:

i. s 59A of the Sexual Offences Act 2003
ii. section 4 (1A) of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants etc) Act 2004
iii. Trafficking People for Exploitation Regulations

It appears a case could be made that Scots law in this regard is lacking – both in comparison to England and Wales and in regard to the Directive itself.

4.4 The committee may also find it interesting to note that the Home Secretary, Teresa May, recently announced the intention of the UK Government to introduce a Modern Slavery Bill and the appointment of a Modern Slavery Commissioner to oversee changes. TARA are extremely supportive of the introduction of such a bill and Commissioner. These recent developments may have future implications for the Scottish Government and Parliament.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from COSLA

1. COSLA welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and is generally supportive of the stated policy goals of the Bill to enhance efficiency and ensure appropriate balance between the rights of the accused and effective access to justice for victims. Although the provisions of the bill are wide-ranging, the majority of the five themes identified in the committee’s call for evidence relate to police powers and the technical aspects of law and detention. A minority of these may impact on local partnerships, depending on the nature of those arrangements, and our members may wish to make individual comment in this respect. For the purposes of this response, we have focused on those points our members feel are likely to impact across local authorities and which are of political concern; there may be further issues of a professional nature and again, our members may wish to comment on these separately and/or through relevant professional networks and associations.

2. Our comments deal mainly with the first of the Committee’s scrutiny themes (theme i. Police powers and rights of suspects) and specifically with those provisions relating to the provision of responsible persons for 16-17 year olds and solicitor access, and support for vulnerable adults in custody (Part I, Chapter 4, section 25 and Part I, Chapter 5, sections 31 to 33). We would also wish to draw the Committee’s attention to a number of further issues, which, although not included within the provisions of the Bill itself, relate to regulations Ministers may make in exercising powers the Bill establishes, or to further service reform which may be considered in the future.

Provision of an “Appropriate Person” for children (Part 1, Chapter 5, section 31)

3. The Bill establishes the requirement for intimation to be sent to an ‘appropriate person’ when a person under 18 years of age has been taken in to police custody. In practice, there may be occasions where local authority social work staff a required to fulfil this role – for example, where the child is in local authority care, or where attempts to contact a parent or guardian have been unsuccessful. While this is entirely in keeping with the historical role and current expectations of the social work profession, we would caution that it may not always be the case that the ‘appropriate person’ is a registered social worker.

4. Indeed, the Bill itself does not seem to include any requirements in relation to the qualification levels of an appropriate person. However, it will be important to ensure that any supporting regulations or guidance reflect this and make it absolutely clear that local authorities can exercise discretion when identifying an appropriate person, and that there is no requirement for this person to be a registered social worker. Any attempt to remove this discretion through regulations relating to the training, qualification or experience levels of an appropriate person would limit local authorities’ ability to meet need and incur additional costs which have not been accounted for in the financial memorandum accompanying this Bill.

Young People aged 16 & 17 years (Part 1, Chapter 5, section 32)

5. The supporting documentation accompanying the Bill (Financial Memorandum, paragraph 227 ff) acknowledges that the provisions of the Bill in relation to 16 and 17 year-olds mean that local authority provision will be the ‘backstop’ where no other appropriate person is available. We understand that the detail of this role is still to be developed, but that it is intended the appropriate person would be required to:

- Act as the ‘relevant person’ described in section 25(3), with whom any request by the young person to be interviewed without a solicitor present must be agreed
- Remain in the police interview whether the lawyer is present or not, if it is requested by the 16 or 17yr old

6. It will be important that appropriate guidance to clarify the scope and nature of this role is formulated and that this is developed in partnership with COSLA and ADSW, as there are a number of potential issues arising which are dealt with in the section on solicitor access below.

Solicitor Access (Part I, Chapter 4, section 25)

7. The Bill sets out circumstances under which 16 and 17 year olds may consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present and establishes a requirement for this to be agreed with a ‘relevant person’. In practice, there may be occasions when a social worker acting as an appropriate person is asked to fulfil this role. The Bill is not sufficiently clear about what is being asked of the appropriate person here. It could be read as them being asked to determine whether the 16-17yr old understands and is able to make this decision, or to decide whether it is the right decision and one with which the social worker agrees.

8. We would argue that an appropriate person should only be expected to agree on whether the young person understands the situation and is capable of making an informed decision, and never to form a view on whether their decision is the right one. To ask a person to consider the crime and circumstance of the 16-17yr olds and come to their own view about whether a solicitor’s advice is needed goes beyond what can be reasonably expected of a person who does not have the relevant legal training or experience, and begins to encroach on other roles such as that of safeguarders. This would apply irrespective of whether the appropriate person is a registered social worker or not. The Bill needs to be amended in this respect and regulations and guidance will need to make it clear that appropriate persons can only form a view on whether the young person is capable of making a decision, and not whether the decision is the right one.

Support for vulnerable persons (Part I, Chapter 5, section 33)

9. As COSLA understands it, one of the Bill’s aims is to ensure that vulnerable adults who are taken in to custody are supported to understand what is happening, and that effective communication between the vulnerable person and the police can take place. We further understand that the bill places no new or additional duties on local authorities in relation to vulnerable adults, but rather requires the police to contact a person they consider suitable to provide support, to inform them of the situation.

10. Although this places no new duties on local authorities, in practice, local authorities are often the agency that police contact – either directly, or through an ‘appropriate adult’ service that the local authority commissions. Some councils feel that this new police duty is likely to result in a rise in the number of occasions when the police contact the relevant appropriate adult services that are provided or commissioned by local authorities. Indeed some councils are already experiencing a shift in practice for requests for appropriate adults and a move away from providing victim support to providing support to vulnerable suspects or accused persons, which has resulted in significantly increased demand.

11. The provisions of the Bill will make this practice a requirement, and although this shift is to be welcomed in policy terms, it may result in significant increases in demand for appropriate adult services, and a resulting rise in the cost of meeting that demand. It is difficult to estimate how demand and cost may increase across Scotland as there are variations in both, for example in relation to the service model and in terms of the effect of deprivation on the numbers of people being taken in to custody. However, some councils who have experienced the described shift in practice, have reported referrals tripling over a four-year period.

Future regulation further defining appropriate or relevant persons (Part I, Chapter 5, section 34)

12. The Bill establishes Ministerial powers to make changes to the nature of support to be provided by ‘appropriate persons’; and (through future regulation) to specify who can act as an appropriate person – including what training, qualifications and experience they should have. We would caution against any regulations which move away from the flexibility on the face of the Bill in relation to appropriate persons. Depending on where the ‘bar’ was set, for example at registered social worker level, this could lead to additional costs and difficulties in identifying appropriate persons at certain times or in certain circumstances and may not be necessary to deliver the required support.

13. Local authorities should be given maximum flexibility in shaping appropriate person provision to fit with local need. For example, there may be occasions where a qualified social worker is required, however there may also be occasions where this is not needed and a local voluntary or community organisation is better-placed to provide support. Local authorities need to be able to shape provision to respond to local need and to build on community assets – regulations which restrict local flexibility could arguably act as a barrier to this.

14. These points notwithstanding, regulations which specify who can act as an appropriate person will have cost implications that rise in proportion to where the bar is set in terms of training, qualifications or experience. Should these powers remain within the Bill, we would seek assurance that any subsequent regulations protect local authorities’ discretion and are agreed with COSLA and ADSW. We would also seek assurances that any cost implications are met in full by the Scottish Government.

Service models

15. We also understand that different service models that could be adopted in the future are currently the subject of discussion with the police, and that this includes a model whereby the police would centrally co-ordinate and commission appropriate adults services. COSLA hasn’t yet had the opportunity to view these proposals, and while we recognise that this discussion is not connected to the Criminal Justice Bill itself, we would want be clear that any move to further centralise local authority functions, or to change their role or funding arrangements, would need the political agreement of COSLA and professional agreement through ADSW.

Resources

16. Given that the requirements of the Bill will result in increased demand, we would want to be clear that the provisions in relation to vulnerable persons will not be cost-neutral. As highlighted above, some councils are already experiencing increases of as much as 300% as a result of shifts in policy intent. It is reasonable to expect that this trajectory will continue and gather pace as the police move from a voluntary policy position operating in some areas, to a legal duty that will apply across Scotland.

17. Furthermore, although the costs attached to appropriate persons provision are not significant when compared to the overall local government settlement, the financial memorandum (at paragraph 230) dismisses these as ‘opportunity costs’. We would wish to be clear that local government cannot continue to absorb even small amounts within the current economic environment, and we would therefore expect that the provisions of the Bill should not result in any additional costs to local authorities. That point notwithstanding, we are also concerned that those estimates set out at table 26 of the financial memorandum may prove to be too conservative – they relate to new provision for 16 to 17 year olds and we therefore have limited means to say with any certainty whether those estimates are accurate. Even if overall estimates of case numbers were accurate, it is difficult to say within what the level of need will be. Equally, we cannot say with certainty how complex the cases will be and how long an appropriate person would be required to stay, and 4 hours may be an under-estimate in a number of cases. This will also vary depending on issues of rurality, transport infrastructure etc.

18. We would therefore want an assurance that all assumptions (and the overall cost of provision, including for both young people and vulnerable adults) will be closely monitored and would be reassessed after a set period to reflect emerging evidence. We would also want the Scottish Government to discuss the distribution of these funds with COSLA.

COSLA
5 September 2013
Introduction

1. In Cadder v HMA 2010 S.L.T. 1125 Lord Rodger said “the recognition of a right for the suspect to consult a solicitor before being questioned will tilt the balance, to some degree, against the police and prosecution”. Recognising that as a result of the Supreme Court decision there would require to be both legislative changes and changes to police and prosecution practice, he stated that there was also a need “to ensure that, overall, any revised scheme is properly balanced and makes for a workable criminal justice system”. Lord Carloway in his review sought to identify how to re-cast criminal law and practice in Scotland to meet the challenges and expectations of a modern society and legal thinking. His recommendations adopted this balanced approach with some, such as the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, being perceived as favourable to the victim; and others, such as the relaxation of the approach taken to a suspect’s admissions, being perceived as favourable to a suspect. His central aim was to ensure that a human rights based approach was fully integrated into criminal justice practice and procedure. The Scottish Government now seek to implement these recommendations in this Bill.

2. The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) welcomes the introduction of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill which proposes significant changes to Scottish Criminal Law and Procedure. The reviews conducted by Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen provide the framework for this Bill which codifies their recommendations into a coherent structure of evidential and procedural reforms.

3. The Bill will have a significant impact on COPFS and how we deal with the cases reported to us. In particular, the abolition of the requirement for corroboration will result in a revised approach by prosecutors assessing available evidence when considering whether to take action in a case. The current prosecution test has two parts: firstly a technical quantitative assessment as to whether there is sufficient evidence for each essential fact, that is two sources of independent evidence; and secondly whether it is in the public interest to take action.

4. In response to the changes around the technical requirement for corroboration that the Bill introduces, COPFS proposes to introduce a new prosecution test. The proposed test would have two stages, namely an evidential test and a public interest test. In considering if a case meets the evidential test the following matters must be considered:-

   (i) a quantitative assessment– is there sufficient evidence of the essential facts that a crime took place and the accused was the perpetrator?

   (ii) a qualitative assessment – is the available evidence admissible, credible and reliable?
(iii) on the basis of the evidence, is there a reasonable prospect of conviction in that it is more likely than not that the court would find the case proved beyond reasonable doubt?

If a case meets the evidential test, the second part of the prosecution test must then be satisfied – is prosecutorial action in the public interest?

The full details of this test will be published in due course in an updated COPFS Prosecution Code which will inform all prosecutorial decision making including the wider decisions that prosecutors make which do not involve a decision to prosecute.

5. The “reasonable prospect” test is based on considerations of quality of available evidence. The current technical rules are focused on quantity of evidence in that a prosecutor requires to look for two sources of evidence before considering the second stage of the prosecution test relating to whether prosecution is then in the public interest. The new test will focus on the credibility of the allegation and the quality of evidence which supports the allegation, requiring prosecutors to assess all available evidence with regard to its admissibility, credibility and reliability.

6. COPFS has engaged fully in the consideration of a number of changes that will require to be made to implement the new approaches required as a result of the provisions of the Bill. We have carried out scoping exercises on the likely impact of the removal of the technical requirement for corroboration on the numbers and types of cases reported to us by the police. We are adapting our administrative processes to ensure they are efficient and fit for purpose in respect of the new test and we are developing extensive training resources to ensure that all our staff are prepared for the changes in working practices that will be required.

7. The law, and those who practise it, are sometimes viewed by society at large as antiquated, out of touch, resistant to change and restrictive. However this Bill is progressive and focussed on Human Rights entitlements of both suspect and victim, and will improve access to justice for many victims of crime who have previously been denied this most basic of rights.

Police powers and rights of suspects (Part 1)

Chapter 1

8. COPFS regard Sections 1 to 6, which introduce an entirely new regime of arrest without warrant, as a welcome simplification of the often complex rules regarding powers of arrest. It is in line with Lord Carloway’s views on an ECHR compliant system; it is consistent with the provisions of Article 5(1) (c) of the Convention which provides that deprivation of liberty will only be appropriate “on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence”; and in combination with provisions such as s10 (test for keeping in custody), s14 (investigative liberation) and s41 (duty not to detain unnecessarily), protects the position of those reasonably suspected of having committed crimes.

Chapter 2
9. COPFS considers that in conjunction with s51 which abolishes the requirement to charge (and thus also the concept of chargeable suspect) these provisions meet Lord Carloway’s aims and allow the police to fully investigate allegations of criminal conduct whilst ensuring that a suspect’s Article 5 & 6 rights are protected.

10. There has been some debate around the 12 hour period contained within the provisions. This is considerably shorter than the law allows at present and is also a more restricted period than the equivalent detention periods in other parts of the UK. COPFS has previously indicated its support for provisions to extend the 12 hour period in certain circumstances and continues to take the view that this may be appropriate in a limited number of the most serious cases where there are exceptional reasons for such an extension. The Police Service of Scotland have indicated that only 0.4% of all persons detained require to have their detention extended beyond 12 hours and in their written evidence to this committee have provided a number of strong examples of when such extensions have been necessary. Such extensions are used in the most serious of cases where there are compelling reasons to do so.

11. The provisions state that a person may be held in custody for a “continuous” period of 12 hours from the time his/her custody without charge is authorised under section 7. The policy intention is that this period can be over a length of time as long as the entire period the suspect is in police custody does not exceed 12 hours. COPFS support the contention that the period should be continuous counting only the period of time spent in police custody and not time whilst at liberty having been released on investigative liberation, irrespective of the number of occasions the individual is within police custody in respect of one inquiry.

12. The provisions recognise a suspect’s Article 5 rights providing a clear regime to justify any deprivation of liberty whilst introducing the concept of “investigative liberation” to also ensure that a suspect is not kept in custody if that is not required. Investigative liberation respects the suspect’s right to liberty whilst also protecting a victim’s rights by the imposition of certain conditions on that suspect for a limited period of time. It is similar in effect to ‘police bail’ which has operated in England & Wales for many years. The ability of the police to impose conditions on liberation is not a new power and the police have had experience of imposing conditions on a suspect since the introduction of s22 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 some time ago. In addition, the Bill provides for a robust system of judicial scrutiny and review of any such conditions imposed.

13. s51 and the abolition of the requirement to charge has necessitated the introduction of the term “officially accused” which is first referred to in this chapter and is defined at s55.

Chapter 3

14. This chapter largely repeats similar provisions in the 1995 Act and COPFS is satisfied that these provisions are appropriate.
Chapter 4

15. One of the novel provisions of the Bill is found at s27-29 which introduces a regime of “post charge questioning” for the first time in Scotland. COPFS are supportive of this provision. As we have said previously, the concept that an accused cannot be interviewed after charge is not based on a human rights analysis and is not required in a modern justice system. It is often the case that certain pieces of evidence such as the results of forensic examinations are not available at the time of an initial investigation and at present a suspect cannot be asked about them. It is without doubt the case that in many situations, as a matter of fairness, an accused should be given the opportunity to comment on matters which may not have been available at the time they were initially questioned by the police. This gains particular significance in light of s62 which abolishes the distinction between exculpatory, incriminatory and mixed statements made by the accused. In some circumstances it may be in the interests of an accused to state his position at an earlier stage of an investigation and then to rely on that position at trial without the requirement to give evidence.

Chapter 5

16. s30-36 relate to the rights of a suspect when in police custody and COPFS have no specific comments to make on this chapter other than to confirm it is supportive of the suspect’s right to legal access regardless of whether or not they will be interviewed.

Chapter 6

17. s37 to 40 expressly provide for the continuation of the common law in respect of powers available to a police officer. This is a pragmatic and practical approach and COPFS supports the policy intent that current common law powers which attach to arrest will continue alongside the new power of arrest without warrant introduced by s1.

18. COPFS also consider that s41 and 42 demonstrate the practical application of Lord Carloway’s intent to create a Human Rights based system by emphasising the right to liberty and the rights of a child, both provisions reflecting on earlier provisions in the Bill seeking to protect these same fundamental rights.

Chapter 7

19. These provisions are self explanatory and COPFS is of the view that they are clear and straightforward.

Chapter 8

20. COPFS welcomes the simplification of arrest powers which is introduced by s50 and refer to earlier comments made in this regard in respect of s1 above.

21. COPFS have repeatedly expressed the view that there should be no requirement to charge a suspect as long as that suspect is notified of the nature of the allegation against them and what will be happening to them as a consequence. In many instances currently the terms of the charge narrated by the police is very different from that finally brought at court. In addition, the importance of the concept of “charge” has diminished and the position has been clarified in the recent case of Lukstins v HMA 2013 SLT 11 in the Appeal Court in Scotland and Lauchlan v HMA and O’Neill v HMA 2013 S.C.C.R. 401 in the UK Supreme Court. COPFS accordingly are supportive of s51 which abolishes the requirement to charge.

22. The remaining provisions in this chapter are relatively straightforward and do not require further comment.

Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms (Part 2)

23. COPFS strongly support the abolition of the requirement for corroboration and welcome the terms of s57. COPFS consider that this provision will allow proceedings to be raised in a number of cases where at present the Crown cannot proceed due to a technical lack of corroboration but where otherwise the available evidence is of high quality and supports the victim’s version of events. In particular this provision will allow COPFS to consider cases which arise from areas of law which currently disadvantage certain groups of victims purely due to the nature of the offences committed against them such as domestic abuse or sexual crime. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration is not about improving detection or conviction rates but is about improving access to justice for victims of crime.

24. The issue of corroboration is particularly acute in the charge of rape where currently a number of essential facts require to be corroborated for a charge to be proved in court. Penetration is one of the essential facts that must be corroborated in a rape case. It is normative behaviour in many cases of rape for a victim not to report the matter to the authorities until some time later. This means that forensic opportunities which may provide corroboration of penetration, such as vaginal swabs containing semen, are lost. The victim’s evidence is one source of this but there has to be corroboration or a second source of evidence to establish this. Pre-Cadder, it was common for a suspect to deny the charge of rape but explain that intercourse was consensual. This provided corroboration of penetration. Post-Cadder, it is the experience of police and prosecutors that this source of evidence is no longer available in the vast majority of rape cases. Accordingly, the technical requirement for corroborated evidence of penetration cannot be established regardless of how otherwise credible and compelling is the allegation and evidence to support it. And if penetration cannot be established then the crime of rape cannot be proved. Such a position, in denying rape victims access to justice, is surely untenable in a modern society.

25. In the English case of DPP v Kilbourne [1973] AC 729, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone, observed: “The word ‘corroboration’ by itself means no more than evidence tending to confirm other evidence”. Dictionary definitions of “corroborate” include “to strengthen; to support with other evidence; or to make more certain”. Despite this, in the Scottish Criminal Justice system, “corroborate” has often come to have a technical and complex meaning resulting in cases which would meet the test for prosecution in other common law jurisdictions throughout the world not being taken up in Scotland due to this technical requirement. for corroborative evidence. The Scottish criminal justice system, with its continuing retention of a technical rule of corroboration, is in an isolated position and as a result some victims of crime in Scotland are currently denied access to justice. As a modern, 21st century society, Scotland must ensure that its criminal justice system is human rights compliant not only for suspects and accused but also for victims and witnesses.

26. Lord Carloway has said that there is a “critically important aspect to the Convention’s declaration of individual rights and this is the concept of the rights of the victims or potential victims of crime. The state has a positive obligation to secure and protect those rights; not merely to avoid infringing them.....(these rights) can only be meaningful if the state secures their protection through an effective system for the prevention, investigation and prosecution of crime”. The importance of effective criminal sanctions has been repeatedly stressed by the European Court of Human Rights. The Court’s research report “Child sexual abuse and child pornography in the court’s case-law” published in June 2011, states “The Court has found a positive duty on the part of the Contracting states to protect their inhabitants in a range of cases. In such cases, the state is not the primary violator of rights (i.e. it is not the state that beats, rapes, enslaves etc.), but rather the state has inadequate structures in place to prevent these kinds of abuse. This can mean that the state does not provide adequate criminal sanctions for actions that violate Convention rights. States may also be compelled to provide regulations and policies that effectively deter and prevent abuse.”

27. In addition, in the case of M.C. v Bulgaria, Application no. 39272/98 - (2005) 40 E.H.R.R. 20 at paragraph 149 the court said “....the obligation of the High Contracting Parties under Article 1 of the Convention to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention, taken together with Article 3, requires States to take measures designed to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subjected to ill-treatment, including ill-treatment administered by private individuals ....150. Positive obligations on the State are inherent in the right to effective respect for private life under Article 8; these obligations may involve the adoption of measures even in the sphere of the relations of individuals between themselves. While the choice of the means to secure compliance with Article 8 in the sphere of protection against acts of individuals is in principle within the State’s margin of appreciation, effective deterrence against grave acts such as rape, where fundamental values and essential aspects of private life are at stake, requires efficient criminal-law provisions. Children and other vulnerable individuals, in particular, are entitled to effective protection ....152. Further, the Court has not excluded the possibility that the State’s positive obligation under Article 8 to safeguard the individual's physical integrity may extend to questions relating to the effectiveness of a criminal investigation ....153. On that basis, the Court considers that States have a positive obligation inherent in Articles 3 and 8 of the Convention to enact criminal-law provisions effectively punishing rape and to apply them in practice through effective investigation and prosecution.” The abolition of the requirement for corroboration is a vital step towards ensuring effective criminal sanctions and improving access to justice for victims of crime.

28. In recognition of the importance of securing access to justice, COPFS is committed to increasing public confidence in our policies and procedures regarding case marking decisions and to ensuring that these are consistent with the EU Directive on Minimum Rights of Victims. If a victim or witness is dissatisfied with the decision taken by a prosecutor they may raise that under the COPFS Customer Feedback Policy and consideration of a victim’s right of review is also ongoing in respect of the Victim and Witnesses Bill which is currently before Parliament.

29. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration will result in a move from a largely quantitative assessment of evidence to a more nuanced qualitative assessment. In this regard, it is worth noting the comments of the US Supreme Court in the case of Weiler v US 323 U.S. 606

“Our system of justice rests on the general assumption that the truth is not to be determined merely by the number of witnesses on each side of a controversy. In gauging the truth of conflicting evidence, a jury has no simple formulation of weights and measures upon which to rely. The touchstone is always credibility; the ultimate measure of testimonial worth is quality and not quantity. Triers of fact in our fact-finding tribunals are, with rare exceptions, free in the exercise of their honest judgement, to prefer the testimony of a single witness to that of many”.

30. In addition the European Court of Human Rights demonstrated its concern for the quality of evidence relied upon for conviction in the recent case of Gafgen v Germany (22978/05)(Grand Chamber 1/6/12) at paragraph 164.

“….. the quality of the evidence must be taken into consideration, as must the circumstances in which it was obtained and whether these circumstances cast doubts on its reliability or accuracy. While no problem of fairness necessarily arises where the evidence obtained was unsupported by other material, it may be noted that where the evidence is very strong and there is no risk of its being unreliable, the need for supporting evidence is correspondingly weaker ....”

31. It is vital to remember that it is the requirement for corroboration which is being abolished, not the concept of corroboration itself. The removal of the requirement for corroboration will not extinguish or even reduce the requirement to thoroughly explore all investigative avenues. In many cases corroborative evidence as we currently understand it will be available. In all cases the police and COPFS will look for evidence which supports the credibility of the allegation of the commission of a crime as it is this supporting evidence which will often be a check and a balance against possible injustice.

32. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration will not be an excuse to diminish either police standards of investigation or prosecutorial rigour in the assessment of the evidence. The duty on the Crown to fully investigate is emphasised in the COPFS Book of Regulations which is publically available on our website:

2.1.2 - The Procurator Fiscal has responsibility for the investigation of crime committed within his jurisdiction ... Procurators Fiscal accordingly must ensure that the police are made aware that they are subject to control in the investigation and reporting of criminal offences which fall to be dealt with by the Procurator Fiscal.
2.1.4 - It is the duty of the Procurator Fiscal to ensure that all evidence which may be relevant to the crime under investigation is secured. This includes any evidence which may be favourable to an accused or potential accused. Accordingly Procurators Fiscal must ensure that the police and other reporting agencies submit all evidence which may be relevant to the offence under investigation.

33. The case of Smith v HMA 1952 JC 66 also confirms the responsibility of COPFS to investigate crime:-

"When a crime is committed it is the responsibility of the Procurator Fiscal to investigate it...The duty of the Police is simply one of investigation under the supervision of the Procurator Fiscal, and the results of the investigation are communicated to the Procurator Fiscal as the enquiries progress. It is for the Crown Office and not for the Police to decide whether the results of the investigation justify prosecution...It is their (the Police) duty to put before the Procurator Fiscal everything which may be relevant and material to the issue of whether they suspect the party is innocent or guilty...”

34. In addition, the standard of proof remains the same, namely that a charge must be proved ‘Beyond Reasonable Doubt’ which remains a high threshold. COPFS will also put in place a robust evidential test, the “reasonable prospect of conviction” test referred to at paragraph 4 above, to assess the quality of the available evidence. In tandem with a public interest test, this will ensure that only the appropriate cases are taken up. These tests will be publically available, as our current prosecutions tests are publically available, in a revised Prosecution Code.

35. In preparation for this Bill, COPFS and the police have conducted research into the impact of the abolition of the technical requirement for corroboration. The results of the exercises suggest a 1.5% increase in the number of cases which will be reported to COPFS by the police; a 1% increase in COPFS summary business; and a 6% increase in COPFS solemn business. The results for solemn cases, as far as any comparison can accurately be made, are within the same range as those suggested by Annexe A of the Carloway Report.

36. COPFS also welcome the terms of s59 which deals with the practical commencement of the abolition of the requirement for corroboration. This will be based on the date of the offence.

37. There were a number of possible mechanisms for the introduction of the abolition of the requirement for corroboration but each had its own difficulties and challenges. Although this provision will result in a “dual” system of cases running in tandem (cases which require corroboration and those which do not proceeding at the same time) this provision does avoid many of the difficulties that other possible solutions create and provides clarity and certainty for suspects, accused, victims and witnesses in respect of the offences which will be affected.

38. COPFS also support the simplification proposed by s62 which clarifies the position in respect of statements made by accused persons during interview and which abolishes the distinction between exculpatory, incriminatory and mixed statements. The law in this area has become extremely complex and difficult to explain to juries. This provision simplifies this issue and complements s27-29 in respect of “post charge questioning” which recognises that it may be in the interests of an accused person to state their position at an earlier stage of an investigation.

Court Procedures (Part 3 plus s86 of the Bill)

39. COPFS welcome the provisions contained within Part 3 of the Bill built upon the recommendations contained within Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury procedure published in June 2010 and which amend Sheriff and Jury procedure. COPFS consider that the provisions will help reduce the inconvenience to witnesses and provide an opportunity to reduce churn in Sheriff and Jury procedure. COPFS supports the aims of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s report and many of his recommendations for reform. This includes the citing of cases to first diet only, earlier engagement between the Crown and defence and having a full discussion at first diet on the status of the case all of which should assist in ensuring that only those cases likely to proceed to trial are allocated to a trial diet.

40. Internal COPFS statistics suggest that in the period from June 2012 to June 2013 769 cases were disposed of following a plea tendered at the trial sitting without evidence having been led. That represents almost 16% of all sheriff and jury cases over that period. In the vast majority of those cases witnesses will have been cited to attend court. COPFS believe that more effective preparation and engagement between the Crown and defence solicitors will lead to an increase in the number of pleas secured before the trial diet and more use of section 76 procedures.

41. COPFS consider that in the majority of cases the most effective stage at which meaningful discussions can take place between the Crown and the defence is after the case is indicted but before the first diet. This will not be the first point of engagement with the defence however it is only at this stage that Crown Counsel will have given authority to indict upon the final charges the accused will face. As a result, this is the point at which some form of resolution is most likely to occur.

42. COPFS agree with the approach contained within the Bill which requires this engagement to take place after the indictment is served but prior to the first diet. This is made possible by the proposed extension of the period between service of the indictment and first diet to 29 days.

43. The provisions provide flexibility to allow discussions to take place by the most effective means. This reflects the reality identified by Sheriff Principal Bowen that sheriff and jury procedure covers a broad spectrum of cases. The advent of secure email and secure online disclosure allows for more effective means of communication between the Crown and the defence which in turn allows space to be created for those difficult cases which would benefit from a face to face discussion.

44. In respect of s86 which relates to the use of live television links, COPFS are encouraged to note that the provision will allow the use of TV links for all court appearances with the exception of hearings where evidence is being led. This will allow for a significant increase in appearances from custody via TV link, particularly first appearances from Police custody centres. The increased numbers of appearance via TV link will produce benefits such as long term financial savings across the system due to the reduced requirement for prisoner movement around Scotland and reduction in the risks involved with the movement of high risk prisoners. It provides opportunity to better schedule individual appearances and will also allow greater flexibility to consider prisoner health and welfare issues arising from the current need to escort them to court securely. There will be environmental gains in reduction to the carbon footprint of prisoner movement. We recognise that this also meets the Scottish Government commitments to make greater use of IT and electronic processes to deliver services. It will also enhance the development of the Cross Justice Video Conferencing Project

Appeals, sentencing and aggravations (Parts 4, 5 & 6)

45. COPFS welcome the changes reflected in s74 to 82 in respect of appeals procedures. The draft provisions represent an across-the-board tightening of procedures and will improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the appeals process generally.

46. COPFS also welcomes the provisions creating a statutory human trafficking aggravation. There are often evidential difficulties in prosecuting human trafficking offences and a statutory aggravation will be a useful tool to allow prosecutors to bring those who exploit others to justice. The aggravation will be of use in circumstances in which there is insufficient evidence to proceed with a human trafficking offence but where other offences can be proved. At present, the lack of an aggravation means that in such circumstances prosecutors cannot lead evidence of the background or context of human trafficking against which an offence is committed.

47. s57 which provides for the abolition of the requirement for corroboration does not remove the need for or reduce the merit of introducing a statutory human trafficking aggravation. There may be some cases, particularly around peripheral matters relating to human trafficking, where it would be appropriate to consider labelling a statutory aggravation rather than a human trafficking offence. For example, actual criminal activity may relate to ancillary offences such as identity theft, fraud, drugs or sexual offences but these offences may be committed against a background of human trafficking. In some cases there will not be sufficient evidence to prosecute for human trafficking but it will still be possible to prosecute for other offences. The use of a human trafficking aggravation will allow COPFS to highlight to the court the context of such offences and therefore allow the court to properly sentence on the basis of the full circumstances. The absence of such an aggravation would give a false impression of the extent of the criminal behaviour of the accused and would not allow a properly targeted sentence to be considered.

Conclusion

48. COPFS are highly supportive of the provisions contained within this Bill which recognise the complexity of the investigation of crime in the modern era. COPFS considers the Bill strikes a balance in a criminal justice system set in a modern society between the rights of the suspect and the need to properly investigate criminal allegations and question the suspect. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill will have a significant and positive impact on the criminal justice system in Scotland.

Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service
12 September 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

In anticipation of the Lord Advocate and Catriona Dalrymple, Head of Policy’s appearance at the Justice Committee on 20 November 2013, COPFS considered it would be helpful to provide further information about the Crown’s position on the abolition of the requirement for corroboration.

Introduction

1. COPFS support the abolition of the requirement for corroboration and welcome the terms of s57 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

2. The technical requirement for corroboration has proved a barrier to justice for victims in many cases which would be prosecuted in most other jurisdictions in the world, a fact recognised by Lord Carloway in his report.

3. As stated at paragraph 23 of our written evidence to the Justice Committee dated 12 September 2013, COPFS consider that this provision will allow proceedings to be raised in a number of cases where at present the Crown cannot proceed due to a technical lack of corroboration but where otherwise the available evidence is of high quality and supports the victim’s version of events. In particular this provision will allow us to consider cases which arise from areas of law which currently disadvantage certain groups of victims principally women and children purely due to the nature of the offences committed against them such as domestic abuse or sexual crime.

4. It is important to be clear at the outset that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration is not about improving detection or conviction rates. It is about improving access to justice for victims of crime. The comments of the Supreme Court of Canada in Boucher v The Queen (1954) 110 Can CC 273 at 270 are highly pertinent:-

"It cannot be over-emphasised that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction; it is to lay before the jury what the Crown considers to be credible evidence relevant to what is alleged to be a crime."

5. It is also vitally important to remember that it is the legal and technical requirement for corroboration which it is proposed to abolish, not the concept of corroboration itself. In many cases corroborative evidence as we currently understand it will be available - that will not change.

6. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration will not diminish the necessity of professional and thorough investigations by the police under the direction of the Lord Advocate. In all cases police and prosecutors will seek out evidence which supports the credibility of the allegation of the commission of a crime.

What is corroboration in law?

7. In order to prove a crime in the law of Scotland the Crown must lead evidence from 2 independent sources of the essential facts. These are: that a crime has been committed; and that the accused committed the crime. However over the years what the law regards as corroboration has significantly altered from its original form. Another area in which the courts have developed the concept of corroboration in the legal context is the doctrine of mutual corroboration. This is known as the “Moorov doctrine”, which provides that where the accused has carried out a series of offences and there is only one witness to each of these offences, corroboration of each of the offences can be found in the fact that he or she behaved in a similar manner to another victim. There is only one witness to each crime. This method of corroboration is particularly used in the proof of sexual cases.

8. Dictionary definitions of “corroborate” include “to make strong” or “to strengthen”; “to confirm”; “to support with other evidence”; and “to make more certain”. These definitions and explanations of what constitutes corroboration appear straightforward to apply. Yet in Scotland, “corroborate” has come to have a narrow technical meaning, as acknowledged by Professors Chalmers and Leverick in their recent article.

“The Scottish law of corroboration has become technical and highly complex, and cannot simply be described as a ‘two-witness’ rule”

9. Scotland finds itself in an isolated position in its continuing requirement for corroboration. This requirement is not found in other jurisdictions. Notably it is not required in supranational courts such as the International Criminal Court. Its rules of procedure and evidence state:

“……. a Chamber shall not impose a legal requirement that corroboration is required in order to prove any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court, in particular, crimes of sexual violence.”

10. Corroboration as a legal principle in Scots law is different from the application of evidence which supports the credibility of the allegation. Support can be found in evidence that does not at present amount to the legal definition of corroboration, but is none the less highly persuasive.

11. Three recent appeal cases demonstrate the uncertainty of what amounts to corroboration in Scotland. The case of HMA v Mair [2013] HCJAC 89 related to a

---

1 “Substantial and radical change’: a new dawn for Scottish criminal procedure?” (2012) 75 Modern Law Review 837 charge of murder; HMA v Hutchison [2013] HCJAC 91 and Mutebi v HMA [2013] HCJAC 142 to allegations of rape. All three cases proceeded to trial in the High Court and in all three cases the defence made a “no case to answer” submission at the end of the Crown case. It was argued that the Crown had failed to lead sufficient that is corroborated evidence of the crime charged. In the cases of Mair and Hutchison, the High Court judges hearing the trials agreed with the defence that there was insufficient evidence and stopped the prosecution after the Crown case. The Crown appealed these decisions. In both cases the Appeal court, consisting of three other High Court judges, upheld the Crown appeals, disagreeing with the trial judges and deciding that there was in fact corroborated evidence in both cases. Conversely in Mutebi v HMA, the High court judge ruled that there was corroborated evidence and refused the defence submission. The case was determined by the jury who found him guilty. The defence appealed the conviction. The three appeal court judges decided that the trial judge had erred in concluding that there had been corroborated evidence. The appeal was allowed and Mutebi’s conviction quashed. It is therefore clear that there are disagreements and misunderstandings as to what amounts to corroborated evidence even at the highest levels of our legal system.

12. Another area of complexity is the treatment of evidence of a victim’s distress. It can have differing evidential weight depending on the circumstances of the crime it relates to. So the evidential significance of distress of the victim of an assault and theft may be regarded differently to that of the distress of a rape victim. And even in cases of rape, the evidential weight of distress will be different in cases of a rape where force was used to those of non-forcible rape such as where the victim was asleep or intoxicated.

13. These examples amply illustrate that the technical requirements of corroboration have resulted in a complicated set of legal rules which can often be difficult to apply and for victims to understand.

14. It may be of assistance to look at a number of areas to give some further information on how the abolition of the requirement for corroboration may impact on COPFS and the justice system as a whole.

Test for prosecution

15. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration will require the introduction of a new test for prosecution. The proposed test would, as at present, have two stages, namely an evidential test and a public interest test. However it is proposed that the evidential test will be in different terms to our current test which is largely based on assessment of the quantity of evidence. Under the new test the prosecutor will have to make the following assessments:-

   a. a quantitative assessment– is there sufficient evidence of the essential facts that a crime took place and the accused was the perpetrator?

---

3 A “No case to answer” submission is not based on the quality of the evidence, only on the quantity and is made when the defence does not think the Crown have lead corroborated evidence of the crime charged.
b. a qualitative assessment – is the available evidence admissible, credible and reliable?

c. on the basis of the evidence, is there a reasonable prospect of conviction in that it is more likely than not that the court would find the case proved beyond reasonable doubt?

16. Only if a case meets the evidential test, will the prosecutor consider what, if any action, to take in the public interest. This aspect of the test will not change and public interest considerations will remain as at present.

17. The proposed new test focuses on the credibility of the allegation and the quality of evidence which supports that allegation. The evidence must be sufficient to allow a reasonable prospect of conviction.

18. We consider the application of the test will allow proceedings to be raised in a number of cases where at present the Crown cannot proceed due to a technical lack of corroboration for what are credible allegations where there is compelling supportive evidence. In particular this provision will allow us to consider cases in which some victims are disadvantaged purely due to the nature of the offences committed against them.

19. This test will be published as part of the Prosecution Code which will be publically available and which will give further guidance on the way this test will be applied.

Supporting evidence

20. We have noted the concerns expressed by many commentators that this will allow the Crown to raise cases on the evidence of a “single witness” or “one witness” cases. Such terms are unhelpful and can misrepresent the evidential position in a case. The removal of the requirement for corroboration will not extinguish or even reduce the requirement for the police and prosecutors to thoroughly explore all reasonable investigative avenues.

21. It is wrong to suggest that the abolition of the requirement for corroboration will result in sloppy police investigation or poor prosecutorial analysis. The police and COPFS are professional organisations which have duties to investigate crime which are independent of the evidential basis of our decision making.

22. It is wrong to suggest that the Crown would be content to attempt to convince a court beyond reasonable doubt at trial on the basis of the account of one person which had not been investigated further or where no attempt had even been made to obtain evidence without supporting evidence. To do so demonstrates a complete misunderstanding of the ethos and standards of COPFS. The Crown will always look for supporting evidence in every case.
Case examples

23. Case examples can be found at Annex A. We consider that these examples could meet the new prosecution test should the requirement for corroboration be abolished. These examples are from real cases which were marked for no proceedings due to insufficient corroborated evidence and accordingly the perpetrator was not prosecuted. In each example there is evidence which supports the credibility of the allegation and is of such quality as to give a reasonable prospect of conviction. The cases have been anonymised and specific details changed to protect the parties.

Sexual offences

24. Sex offenders do not wait until there is someone about before committing a crime, rather they do the opposite. They will wait until the victim is isolated and alone, when there is no-one and nothing to corroborate the victim’s account. By their very nature sexual offences are committed in private when there is no-one else around. As a society we find ourselves unable to prosecute many such crimes, as the supporting evidence does not amount to corroboration but is highly persuasive as outlined in the examples. This is one reason why COPFS supports the abolition of the requirement for corroboration

Domestic abuse

25. Domestic abuse often occurs behind closed doors where there are no other witnesses. In such circumstances, it is often the case that there is a lack of corroborative evidence. The domestic abuse examples at annex A demonstrate that in many cases of domestic abuse there is evidence which goes to support the credibility of the allegation made and so makes access to justice possible.

26. Each of these crimes deserves to be prosecuted. Each victim deserves access to justice. Each accused person deserves to be punished for their behaviour. In each of these scenarios, COPFS were unable to take action due to the technical requirement for corroborated evidence. In each case, there is sufficient quality and quantity of evidence to put before a jury. In each case, we assess there is a reasonable prospect of conviction. It should properly be for the judge or jury to consider the facts and whether they point to guilt.

Effective criminal sanctions

27. As a modern, 21st century society, Scotland must ensure that its criminal justice system is human rights compliant not only for suspects and accused but also for victims and witnesses, a fact that Lord Carloway recognised in his report. The importance of a state having effective criminal sanctions has been repeatedly stressed by the European Court of Human Rights.

---

“The Court has found a positive duty on the part of the Contracting states to protect their inhabitants in a range of cases. In such cases, the state is not the primary violator of rights (i.e. it is not the state that beats, rapes, enslaves etc.), but rather the state has inadequate structures in place to prevent these kinds of abuse. This can mean that the state does not provide adequate criminal sanctions for actions that violate Convention rights.”

28. This question of whether Scotland provides effective criminal sanctions has recently been commented on by the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women in their report dated 23 July 2013 at paragraph 26:-

“The Committee is concerned that, following the findings of the Carloway Review of criminal law and practice in Scotland, the burdensome requirements of corroboration impede the prosecution of rape and other sexual violence cases”

29. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration is a crucial step towards ensuring effective criminal sanctions and improving access to justice for victims of crime. As we have said earlier, the abolition of the requirement of corroboration is not about improving detection or conviction rates. It is about improving access to justice. It is about changing the law to ensure that criminals are not immune from prosecution, protected by complicated rules of evidence that create injustice. And it is about ensuring that the victims of those crimes do not have to sit in silence but have the opportunity for their voices to be heard.

30. Concerns have been expressed from various commentators about the Crown being able to take forward certain types of case. In particular cases based on solely confession evidence, what has been termed as the one witness case and false allegations against professionals. It is important that we make our position on these areas of concern clear.

Confessions

31. Confessions are now rarer following the ruling in the Cadder case that a suspect has right of access to a lawyer. This was recognised by Lord Rodger in his opinion in the Cadder case

“the recognition of a right for the suspect to consult a solicitor before being questioned will tilt the balance, to some degree, against the police and prosecution. “

32. It is though recognised that people will confess to crimes they have not committed. The Lord Advocate agrees with Lord Hope’s comments in the recent article from Holyrood magazine\(^5\) that no-one should ever be convicted on the basis of a simple confession alone. Therefore it is essential that there is evidence to prove that a confession is true. The police and the Crown will always look for supporting evidence which in cases of confession evidence will be evidence which supports the truth of that confession.

\(^5\) Edition dated 04 November 2013

False allegations against professionals

33. COPFS acknowledges that certain professional witnesses are susceptible to malicious allegations, including police officers, teachers, social workers, health professionals and prison officers. Again proceedings in such cases would not be taken up without strong supporting evidence.

34. We already have measures in place to guard against the taking of proceedings based on false allegation. In the case of allegations against teachers by pupils in the course of their employment, prosecutors must investigate these and precognosce the eye witnesses. Proceedings against a teacher can only be instructed by Crown Counsel. In the case of allegations of criminality by police officers, COPFS has a dedicated specialised unit to investigate these. Criminal proceedings against police officers can only be taken on the instruction of a law officer. Such processes ensure that prosecutions founded on malicious allegations are guarded against. The abolition of the requirement for corroboration will not change that approach. In each and every case the evidence will be carefully scrutinised and robustly examined to protect all individuals against malicious allegations.

Conclusion

35. As prosecutors in the public interest we are justly proud of the criminal justice system in Scotland where the rights of those accused of crime are robustly protected by the courts. As prosecutors though we support the abolition of the requirement for corroboration to ensure that all victims of crime have access to justice and to ensure perpetrators of crime can be brought before courts for their guilt or innocence to be determined, rather than be hampered by technical rules which do not allow us to present strong cases to the court.
Some case examples

Example 1

The victim was at home asleep at night. She woke up to find the accused, who was a complete stranger, standing in her bedroom, brandishing a weapon. He raped her and threatened her, telling her not to report the crime to the police after he left. He also forced her to wash herself to get rid of evidence. She was terrified and did not contact the police. The following day whilst she was out, the accused entered the house again and stole items which may have linked him to the crime had they been forensically examined. A number of witnesses saw the accused taking these items away. The accused was clearly trying to destroy any evidence of sexual activity. The victim is credible and reliable and there was recent distress after the incident and the circumstances are highly supportive of her account.

As there is no corroboration of penetration, we cannot prosecute the charge of rape.

Example 2

The victim is a girl under 12 years of age. She was going to play with friends when she was grabbed by the accused and pulled behind a building. She recognised the accused as he lives near her. The accused unfastened his trousers and she could see he was wearing distinctive underwear. He put his hand under her clothing and indecently touched her. She tried to run off but he stopped her and threatened her. She managed to run away again but tripped over items and was grabbed again. She managed to break free again, ran home and told a family member what happened. She was screaming hysterically and showed where the accused had touched her. The accused was detained a short while later and was found to be wearing similar clothing and underwear as that described by the victim. On going to the locus, the police found a number of items which the victim had described, all of which support the credibility of the account given by the victim.

No action could be taken as there was no corroboration in law of the commission of a crime.

Example 3

In a Moorov case, where the evidence of one complainer to each crime corroborates the, the failure of one witness to be able to give evidence at the door of the court has resulted in the collapse of the case as a whole. The evidence of the one witness, even if there was for instance evidence to say the accused and the victim were seen together at the time of the offence, would not be sufficient to provide corroboration.
Domestic abuse examples

Example 4

The victim and accused has been in a relationship for a few months and the accused had been violent towards her on a number of previous occasions, none of which had been reported to the police. On the date in question the victim was in a neighbour’s flat waiting for a workman to arrive at her own flat. The only other person with a key to the victim’s flat is the accused. The victim and her neighbour heard the sound of someone entering the victim’s flat. The victim left but the neighbour did not go out or see who had entered the flat. On entering her flat the victim found the accused was inside. He immediately attacked her and then dragged her out the flat and down the stairs. A neighbour later described what they thought was furniture being dragged along the floor. The accused dragged her along the street making a number of threats as he did so. She managed to escape and ran into nearby premises where she asked for the police to be contacted. She was injured and very distressed. She was taken to hospital by ambulance and detained in hospital due to her injuries. Her injuries were consistent with her account of the attack. When police attended at the victim’s home to uplift personal items for her, they found the accused waiting within. He denied any assault.

Although there is evidence of an attack and the accused being the perpetrator, there is no corroboration that it was the accused who carried out the attack and as such proceedings could not be taken.

Example 5

The accused and the victim had been in a relationship and have a child but have now separated. The accused attended to uplift the child for access. He was under the influence of alcohol or drugs, was behaving aggressively towards the victim, and was shouting and swearing at her. The victim decided that the child should not go with the accused due to his behaviour. The accused then grabbed her by the neck and ran her towards the door causing her to strike her head against the door. He then grabbed her by the throat and pushed her to the floor causing her to strike her head against the floor. All of this occurred in the full view and presence of the child who was sitting in a highchair. The accused then left the house but he continued to shout and swear and threatened her with violence. The police were called and found her to have swelling and reddening to her left cheek and a substantial lump to the back of her head with fresh scratches to her body. The police also spoke to a witness who heard the sounds of a male voice shouting and a female screaming.

Again there is no corroboration that the accused committed the assault. We can say only that it was a male. Proceedings could therefore not be taken.

Catherine Dyer
Crown Agent & Chief Executive
15 November 2013
At the Justice Committee hearing on 20 November 2013, the Lord Advocate and Catriona Dalrymple, Head of Policy, undertook to provide written details of matters discussed regarding (i) shadow marking exercises conducted by COPFS, and (ii) further information on additional safeguards in the trial process.

Shadow Marking Exercises

To assist with COPFS consideration of the impact of the proposal for the abolition of the requirement of corroboration three separate shadow marking exercises have been carried out. Firstly by the police to allow estimates in numbers of reports to the Procurator Fiscal; secondly by COPFS in relation to numbers of cases that would be taken up under any new prosecution test; and thirdly in relation to the impact on domestic abuse cases in particular. I will also provide detail of the marking exercise which was carried out for Lord Carloway’s Review.

By the Police

1. In summary, five officers of the Police Service of Scotland considered about 1400 cases where a suspect had been identified, but the case had not been reported to COPFS due to a lack of corroboration. The officers assessed these cases applying draft guidance issued by COPFS based on our proposed new test for prosecution, and considered how many of the cases would be reported if the requirement for corroboration was abolished. A member of COPFS was involved in reviewing this exercise and was satisfied that the police were applying the COPFS guidance appropriately in relation to the evidence required to report the case. The results suggest that there is likely to be an increase of 1.5% in the number of cases reported to COPFS by the police.

2. In 2012-13, 280,942 criminal reports were received in total. Of these, around 248,000 were reported by the Police. So a predicted increase of 1.5% would imply that around an extra 3720 or so cases annually would be received from the police.

By COPFS

3. In order to assess the likely impact on the numbers and types of cases that would be taken up following a change in prosecution test, COPFS carried out its own internal shadow marking exercise. This was conducted by Scots prosecutors who understand the law of evidence and the definitions of crimes in Scotland. This is essential to the process. I attach a link to the letter COPFS sent to the Finance Committee outlining the detail of this shadow marking exercise: COPFS letter to Finance Committee - Detail of Shadow Marking
The Crown Agent in her evidence to the Justice Committee on 29 October 2013 in relation to the Draft Budget Scrutiny 2014-2015 spoke in general terms about the results of the shadow marking exercise. During these discussions, reference was made to the 6% figure relating to Sheriff and Jury cases. To clarify the position, I would confirm that the figure of 6% in fact relates to all solemn cases, that is both High Court cases and Sheriff and Jury cases combined. Therefore the results of the shadow marking exercise suggest a 6% increase in overall solemn business which includes both High Court and Sheriff and Jury cases.

Annex A

5. Annex A to the Carloway report featured analysis of a selection of cases which might be impacted by a change in prosecutorial test. Two experienced Scots lawyers looked at these cases and a two-stage test was applied. First, they considered for each case whether there would be sufficient evidence to prosecute if the corroboration requirement were removed. Secondly, they applied a qualitative test to the available evidence; looked at the credibility and reliability of the available evidence; and considered whether there was a reasonable prospect of securing a conviction.

6. At first glance the results from Annex A and the COPFS shadow marking exercise look different. For example, Annex A indicated that 58.5% of the solemn cases (268 of the 458) would meet a "reasonable prospect" test; and 67% of the sexual cases (95 of the 141) would also meet that test. However, the additional cases predicted by Annex A need to be considered in the context of the increase that they represent to the total number of solemn disposals that there would be during the year in question. Once that figure is calculated, it indicates that the results of Annex A actually suggest a 9% increase in solemn business. The shadow marking exercise predicted a 6% increase but within a range of a possible increase of between 2% and 10%. Accordingly, as far as comparison is possible, the results of Annex A and the shadow marking exercise are not inconsistent with one another.

Domestic Abuse

7. COPFS also recently carried out another shadow marking exercise in respect of domestic abuse cases. In 2012-13, 2803 domestic abuse charges could not be taken up because there was insufficient admissible evidence. These 2803 charges related to 2210 cases (some of the cases feature a number of charges of domestic abuse). A statistically relevant sample of 328 of these domestic abuse cases was considered, and the new prosecutorial test applied to them. This provided an estimate of the proportion of cases (about 60%) where action might be taken under the new prosecution test.

8. The outcome of this exercise suggests a yearly increase in domestic abuse prosecutions of around 1000 cases. The vast majority of these cases would proceed on summary complaint.

9. These results therefore indicate that a relatively large proportion of the net additional summary cases estimated in the main shadow marking exercise will be domestic abuse cases.
Safeguards in Scotland’s criminal justice system

10. There has been some discussion as to whether additional safeguards should be introduced if the requirement for corroboration is abolished. In what was a major review, Lord Carloway did not consider that additional safeguards were necessary. During his appearance before the Justice Committee on 20 November, the Lord Advocate explained that there are at present many safeguards in the trial process.

Current Safeguards

11. The most important of these are that the accused is presumed innocent and that it for the Crown to establish that the accused is guilty of the offence charged beyond reasonable doubt. This criminal standard of proof is rightly a very high standard of proof.

12. There are many other existing safeguards in the trial process a number of which are outlined below:-

- The police and Crown are under a legal duty to thoroughly investigate all criminal allegations;
- The accused has the right against self incrimination and the right to legal advice before interview;
- The Crown is obliged by law to disclose to the defence all material information for or against the accused;
- The judiciary is independent and impartial;
- Criminal trials proceed in public;
- The trial process itself has regard to common law fairness;
- COPFS and the judiciary are both obliged to uphold an accused’s Article 6 ECHR rights;
- Evidence irregularly or unlawfully obtained is prima facie inadmissible;
- Evidence obtained by coercion or unfairly obtained by police officers will be inadmissible;
- The accused’s representative can challenge the admissibility of evidence;
- Defence agents and counsel can cross examine all witnesses;
- The accused can call his own witnesses and lead evidence in his or her defence;
- An accused can decide not to give evidence and no adverse inference can be drawn. He has the right to be legally represented if so wished;
- The law of evidence prohibits hearsay and collateral evidence subject to certain exceptions, prescribed by law;
- In solemn cases, judges provide clear directions to juries explaining to them how they must apply the law, and approach their task as masters of the facts;
- In solemn cases, a majority of the jury must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused; and there are two acquittal verdicts;
- If convicted, the accused has a right of appeal on the basis of any alleged “miscarriage of justice”, or in solemn cases that the jury returned a verdict which no reasonable jury, properly directed, could have returned;
The right of appeal is supplemented by the ability of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission to refer cases to the High Court to be considered on grounds of a “miscarriage of justice” or “in the interests of justice”.

13. These safeguards ensure that there is a system of fair trials for accused persons, and compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights.

Other potential safeguards

Jury majorities

14. Section 70 of the draft Bill proposes raising the number of jurors required for a guilty verdict from the present 8 to 10 of 15. COPFS is supportive of this proposal in line with the responses to the Scottish Government consultation on this matter.

15. In this regard, and in contrast to other jurisdictions, it is significant that Scotland has three verdicts open to jurors, with the “not proven” verdict functioning as a second verdict of acquittal.

The Not Proven Verdict

16. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice has indicated his intention to refer consideration of the Not Proven verdict to the Scottish Law Commission and this was welcomed by the Lord Advocate, as he stated when he gave his evidence on 20 November.

Withdrawal of cases from juries by trial judges

17. The Scottish Government also consulted on this proposal. COPFS consider that cases should be allowed to go to juries where there is a sufficiency of evidence. COPFS agrees with the position that was taken by Scottish Government in the consultation paper on safeguards namely that it would be very rare that, at the conclusion of a trial, the prosecution's case would rest on a single source of evidence of doubtful credibility. This is especially unlikely in light of the proposed prosecutorial test.

I trust that this information assists the Justice Committee and would be pleased to assist further if required

Catriona Dalrymple
Head of Policy Division
9 December 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

During the evidence panel session on Part 4 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill on 19 November, I agreed to provide some further information to the Committee in writing.

In particular in relation to delays in appeals, I attach a copy of the case of Beggs v United Kingdom Application no 25133/06 on the website of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), which was the case I mentioned during my evidence.

In this case the ECtHR held that there had been a breach of Article 6(1) due to the periods of inactivity they identified on the part of the judicial authorities. It is fair to say that there were a number of complications which led to delay in this case, including a period during which the case was adjourned to wait for a decision of the Supreme Court. In paragraphs 211 to 273 of the judgement the ECtHR outlines what happened at each stage of the case and which periods they considered contributed to the appeal proceedings not being held within the reasonable time requirement of Article 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights. The appeal took 10 years in total to conclude. Not all of that period though was attributable to delays by the state. The court recognised that a substantial proportion of the delay was attributable to the applicants own conduct, as well as delays through waiting for clarification of certain aspects of law.

I referred in my evidence to the gate keeping role of the Appeal court to reject a reference from the SCCRC. In my evidence I mentioned the case of Carberry v HMA [2013] HCJAC 101 in which the court recently rejected the reference. I attach a copy of that opinion for the attention of the Committee.

In relation to the sections 79 and 80 of the Bill the Committee asked for information about how often Bills of suspension and Advocation are used. In the 2 years up to end of October 2013, COPFS have a record of 108 Bills of Advocation and 140 Bills of Suspension.

Lastly the Committee asked for details of the COPFS’ Records Management Policy, and I attach a link to the full policy which is available on the COPFS website.

COPFS Records Management Policy

The policy in relation to retention of case papers depends on the forum of the proceedings. For a High court case papers should be retained for a period of 10 years within COPFS, after which time the papers will be transferred to the National Records Archive for permanent retention. The policy in relation to Sheriff and jury and summary case differs between sexual and non- sexual cases. In Sheriff and Jury sexual cases they will be retained for a period for 10 years within COPFS, and then destroyed. All other Sheriff and jury papers are retained for a period of 5 years from trial or appeal and then destroyed, unless the Procurator Fiscal considers it necessary for further retention. For summary cases involving sexual offences the papers are retained for 5 years. In all other summary case the papers are only retained for 2 years.

This policy only applies to the Crown’s paperwork. As I explained to the Committee, following the trial and any period in which the accused has to lodge an appeal, if no appeal is lodged the Crown has to return the physical items of evidence relied upon at trial, which are know as ‘the productions’, to their owners. Some productions may actually require to be destroyed – for example where the production presents a bio-hazard, for instance if it is blood stained. Other biological material may degrade over time and witness’ memories may dim. The ability to successfully mount any retrial is accordingly not simply dictated by the availability of the Crown papers.

I hope that this information is of assistance to the Committee in its consideration of part 4 of the Bill.

Fraser Gibson
Head of Appeals Unit
31 December 2013
Supplementary written submission from the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

Evidence on the secure email system

I can confirm that the secure email system referred to on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) website is the Ministry of Justice hosted application Criminal Justice Secure Email www.cjsm.net.

By way of background, COPFS has continually sought to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of its communication with defence solicitors. The introduction of the use of Criminal Justice Secure Email is the latest step in this process and should be viewed in conjunction with other COPFS initiatives over recent years such as electronic disclosure of evidence to the defence through the development by COPFS of our secure disclosure website.

As was appreciated by the Committee, any email system used for communication between prosecution and defence must be secure because of the sensitive nature of much of the general information contained in correspondence around criminal charges and which must at times include personal data.

The Crown has always used secure Government hosted email networks as do the police and Scottish Courts and that means that all of the criminal justice public authorities send email between one secure network to another. COPFS was formerly part of the Government Secure Internet (gsi) and is now a member of the Public Service Network (psn).

The issue that arose when we wanted to explore use of email communication with the defence was that the Crown had secure email while defence solicitors did not. They had individual arrangements for email accounts with no overarching facilities supplier arrangements.

We will not send email containing sensitive data to an insecure network as that would invalidate our secure network authorisation and violate the Data Protection principles (which defence agents are also required to comply with).

It became apparent that the quickest and simplest initial solution was for the Crown to facilitate arrangement of use of a current secure network for parties outwith Government networks. In the short term it was recognised that CJSN was available immediately while time was going to be needed to explore any potential longer term solutions.

CJSN allows secure email transmission between various Government Secure networks and private web based email accounts.
Over 600 defence agents and all Faculty of Advocates members are now currently registered. CJSM can be used by defence representatives in both Summary and Solemn cases, it is not reserved to just High Court or Sheriff & Jury business.

The matters that Mr Dunn referred which caused some initial difficulties to defence solicitors making use of CJSM were that CJSM is set up so that if any user does not sign into their CJSM account for 30 days then their password is locked and they have to contact a CJSM administrator to have it unlocked. If any account has been inactive for a period of 90 days, then that account will be suspended and will require to be reactivated via the administrator. If an account has been inactive for 180 days it will be deleted.

All of these conditions were clearly set out when users signed up to CJSM however, as with all new systems, it has taken time for some new users to fully engage with the system.

The introduction of the use of CJSM by defence solicitors was monitored by COPFS from the outset. We noted that the lack of regular use by some defence agents initially caused them to experience some of the issues referred to above. To minimise inconvenience COPFS is discussing with the Ministry of Justice a change to the current arrangements and place COPFS in the position of as administrator for the defence solicitors in Scotland which would allow quick reinstatement of access to CJSM if such issues arise.

COPFS is currently reviewing all methods of communication with defence agents with the aim of further improving the time taken to exchange all information necessary to allow the most efficient resolution of cases. We will be working with defence solicitors locally in the coming months to explain the revised processes we are putting in place and detail the benefits of using the secure email system and dedicated phone numbers referred to by Mr Dunn.

I hope this summary of the position is of assistance.

Danny Kelly
Policy Division
10 January 2014
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Professor Peter Duff

Proposed abolition of corroboration

1. I have no fundamental objection to the abolition of corroboration. First, no other major jurisdiction still has such a requirement and there is no evidence that this leads to a greater number of miscarriages of justice. Second, the Scottish requirement has been so ‘watered down’ over the years, principally by judges anxious to avoid the acquittal of the obviously guilty, that is not nearly as strong a safeguard against wrongful convictions as its supporters claim. Additionally, the ‘fiddles’ that judges have created to get around corroboration have led to a confusing, illogical and inconsistent set of evidentiary rules which practitioners, including judges themselves, often have great difficulty in applying.

2. On the other hand, I very much doubt that the abolition of corroboration will have much impact upon the conviction rates for rape, indecent assaults, domestic violence and the like, as is often claimed. Commentators are generally agreed that the Crown Office ‘research’ carried out for the Carloway Review, purporting to show that a large number of cases that do not presently proceed would be prosecuted if corroboration was abolished, is highly questionable.

3. To make the most obvious point: the Crown Office reviewers of the sexual assault cases that were not prosecuted for lack of corroboration simply assumed that all such cases would have proceeded if there was no requirement for corroboration. This ignores the fact that many rape victims are under the influence of drugs or alcohol at the time and/or suffer from addiction problems, mental illness etc. Unfortunately, such vulnerable women are particular targets for rape. The defence is usually one of consent and, in the absence of the corroboration requirement, the Crown would inevitably have to make a decision on the likely credibility of the victim and, in particular, whether she will stand up to robust cross-examination in court. There is much research demonstrating that juries are reluctant to convict accused of rape in a ‘he says, she says’ dispute over consent and unless the jury has almost complete faith in the complainer’s version of events, it will acquit.

4. The Crown Office reviewers implied that all such cases where there is no corroboration would be prosecuted in England but the practice south of the border is that the Crown will only proceed if there is a ‘reasonable chance’ of conviction. In many cases, the likely credibility of the complainer will be highly questionable and there will be no proceedings. The ‘research’ would have had some validity if, for instance, English prosecutors had been asked to review the Scottish cases where there was no corroboration and to determine whether they would have embarked upon a prosecution. All the evidence suggests that in England the Crown is often reluctant to proceed where there is no evidence supporting (ie corroborating) the victim’s account where her potential credibility in front of a jury is questionable. This is borne out by the fact that, as is well known, there is no difference between conviction rates for reported rapes in Scotland and England.
5. In my view, the best hope for increasing the number of prosecutions and convictions in cases of rape and other sexual assaults is a reform allowing the appointment of a lawyer to safeguard the complainer’s interests during the trial. This has long been advocated by Professor Fiona Raitt of Dundee University and I would suggest that you might take this possibility up with her.

6. Finally, if corroboration were to be abolished, there is the question of replacement safeguards. I think it advisable to ‘tweak’ the rules of evidence in some areas. For instance, I think a conviction based solely upon ‘dock identification’, even by more than one witness, should not be permissible. Second, I am not convinced that the proposal to adjust the majority verdict will act as an alternative safeguard, simply because there is no evidence as to how juries reach decisions in Scotland nor on the effect of the bare majority rule. In contrast, many studies have been done by social psychologists demonstrating that ‘peer pressures’ within jury rooms will strongly influence ‘hung’ juries in one way or the other. Therefore, most 8-7 majorities for conviction may simply become 10-5 majorities in practice. We simply do not know. I am ambivalent on the question of granting the judge the power to remove the decision from the jury where, in his or her view, ‘no reasonable jury’ could convict. On the one hand, this would prevent ‘perverse’ convictions which I think are inherent in trial by jury. On the other hand, this would require one judge, rather than 15 jurors, to make a decision on the credibility and reliability of a witness or a piece of evidence (eg a purported DNA match) and the judiciary, of course, are not immune from misjudgements in this area and the influence of extraneous matters.

Peter Duff
Professor of Criminal Justice
Law School, Aberdeen University
21 October 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Edinburgh Bar Association

The Criminal Justice Bill lays out a number of sensible provisions designed to protect accused persons being processed by the justice system. It is therefore a great shame that it also contains provisions that threaten to seriously damage that system - predominantly the abolition of the need for corroboration at Section 57. As requested in the Government’s request for responses, the Edinburgh Bar Association’s response will follow the order of the provisions within the Bill.

Following the decision in the case of Cadder, police were given the power to detain members of the public in custody for extended periods - in some cases for up to twenty-four hours. Lord Carloway raised concerns that this increase in detention was unnecessary and should be reconsidered. Clearly this has been given consideration, leading to the provisions contained in sections 9 to 12 of the Bill. Therein, a twelve-hour time limit is enshrined, with the necessity of detention to be reviewed after six hours. We say the Bill should go further and instead re-impose the six-hour limit previously in force. As an association, our experience is that this allows ample time for solicitor contact to be made and consultations to take place (in cases where it is requested). An extension beyond a six-hour limit is unnecessary and should not be provided for.

Post-charge questioning will be possible if Section 26 of the Bill comes into force. It is proposed that the Court be given power to grant warrant to arrest for questioning, "If it seems to the court expedient to do so". The phrasing of this provision is worrisome to the association. Expedience is convenience. "Where it seems to the court that there is good reason to do so" would represent a higher and more appropriate test. The right not to be detained unnecessarily is a theme in the Bill and would be better served by a shorter time limit, out with which further questioning should take place only where good reason is demonstrated.

Section 36 confers a right upon a detained person to consult with a solicitor at any time whilst in custody. Typically, this will take place prior to interview by police officers. We suggest that consideration be given to placing an obligation on constables to provide pre-interview disclosure to the solicitor. Disclosure should include all information relating to the subject matter of the interview necessary to advise the detainee - principally on the subject of the "right to silence".

The need for corroboration in criminal cases should not be abolished. No proper case has been made out for abolition. Lord Carloway describes the standard of proof as "the real protection" against miscarriages of justice. There seems to be a desire to dismiss corroboration as a sacred cow that serves no real purpose and will not be missed. Nothing could be further from the truth. Abolition places accused persons, at every level of prosecution, at risk of conviction on the testimony of a single, convincing liar. No cross check required. It is commonly said that the standard of proof in Scotland is a high one, and it is. But that does not mean that on its own it is sufficient to protect against grave miscarriages of justice. In a civilised society such as ours we should not be seeking to pare back the legal protections of our citizens to a bare minimum. Scotland deserves better than that.

Concerns have been raised that abolition will make the jobs of our police and prosecution service more difficult. Corroboration provides a sensible, reasonable base line which inquiries and prosecutions require to meet before they are proceeded with. It allows decisions regarding reporting or prosecuting to be made quickly and fairly. If corroboration is removed, then all single witness allegations will - technically - meet the test of sufficiency of evidence. This will place enormous, and potentially unbearable, strain on police officers: firstly to make the reporting decision and secondly to follow up and prepare the greater number of prosecutions that will inevitably follow. The same can be said of the Crown and Procurator Fiscal Service. A lower prosecution threshold necessarily means more cases in a system that is already struggling to cope. This is evidenced by the move to extend custody time limits in sheriff and jury cases. We understand that reporting/prosecuting decisions will be made on the basis of whether there is a realistic prospect of conviction. This is an entirely subjective test. It is entirely possible to envisage the test being applied in different ways across the country. It would be a great surprise if that were not the case. Stepping away from the current objective test - "is there sufficient corroborated evidence to proceed?" - is stepping backwards.

Consideration has been given to safeguards, in the event that abolition does happen. The proposed safeguards are inadequate. In jury cases, a guilty verdict will be passed when ten jurors are in favour. This is a far lower threshold than in other jurisdictions where corroboration is not required. England is an obvious example, where ten out of twelve jurors must vote for a guilty verdict to result in conviction. A smaller majority means weaker protection. Perhaps most obviously and most importantly, the Bill does not propose any safeguards whatsoever in relation to summary prosecutions. The vast majority of prosecutions are at summary level. Conviction at summary level can result in imprisonment for up to twelve months - eighteen in aggravated cases. The stakes are high. Should there not also be additional protection in these cases? The logical course is to retain corroboration and solve the problem before it arises.

As indicated above, pre-trial time limits are to be extended in sheriff and jury level custody cases. As practitioners in Edinburgh, we are aware that there is often a large backlog of sheriff and jury cases and that the system is under pressure. However, extending the custody time limits is no way to go about resolving the problem. Inefficiencies and under-staffing in the Procurator Fiscal service, coupled with a number of recent policy decisions increasing the number of cases tried on Indictment, are to blame here.

It is disappointing that the Bill seeks at section 66 to introduce written records in sheriff court solemn cases. This would place a further bureaucratic burden on both prosecutor and defence. Defence solicitors are already required to lodge Statements of Defence – written records would mean duplication of work. We are under obligations to our clients in terms of quality of service, and to the court as officers of the court. There seems little justification for further provision on this point.
Naturally, the focus of responses such as this is criticism. The Edinburgh Bar Association hopes that in considering our views, the Scottish Government will understand that we share its objectives. Our sole concern is that the justice system in Scotland is protected and - where possible - improved. If the issues raised here can be are addressed, we see no reason why the Bill cannot be a success. If they are not, fairness in our courts may soon be a thing of the past.

Edinburgh Bar Association.
30 August 2013
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Equality and Human Rights Commission

Introduction
The Equality and Human Rights Commission promotes and protects equality across Scotland, England and Wales, working to eliminate discrimination, reduce inequality and make sure that everyone has a fair chance to participate in society. In Scotland, we share our role as a National Human Rights Institution with our colleagues in the Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC).

There are several aspects of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill which are relevant to our remit, including:

1. The proposal for an aggravation for people trafficking
2. The abolition of corroboration rule
3. The proposals for rights of suspects in police custody including vulnerable adults.

Proposed human trafficking aggravation
In November 2011, the Commission published its report on the Inquiry into Human Trafficking in Scotland. The inquiry aimed to understand better the factors which underpin human trafficking in Scotland, as well as to examine the legal, institutional and policy shifts required to address it more effectively.

One of the main findings from the inquiry was that legislation on human trafficking in Scotland is piecemeal and inconsistent. Human trafficking is addressed in a range of legislation, such as sexual offences, asylum or immigration law, and these different pieces of legislation carry different definitions for what is essentially the same act. Since the inquiry’s publication, the Council of Europe’s Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings (GRETA), in its report on progress in the UK, has also highlighted the need to work to the best and most comprehensive definition of human trafficking. The inquiry recommended that the Scottish Government introduce a comprehensive Human Trafficking Bill based upon a review of all its legislation relating to human trafficking. While recognising that a new statutory aggravation does not address these wider points, we welcome the proposal and believe it can be an important additional weapon for police and prosecutors.

Abolition of corroboration rule
The Carloway Report reflected on the experience of women victims of violence and noted the challenge of corroborating offences whose hidden nature makes this difficult, if not impossible. Our human trafficking inquiry also identifies the evidential bar set by corroboration as a barrier to cases getting to court. Scots law requires corroboration for a criminal offence that can be proved only by “leading evidence from at least two independent sources that the crime was committed and that the accused was the perpetrator”. In the view of the COPFS, this requirement, together with the inherent difficulty of getting traumatised survivors to be witnesses, poses "real challenges in obtaining a sufficiency of evidence to satisfy the requirement for corroboration".\(^4\)

There are however, wider and deeper factors which contribute to the very low conviction rates for certain crimes. Systemic issues around appropriate questioning and support, and wider public attitudes to rape and sexual offences may be just as important, if not more so, than the issue of corroboration rules stopping cases reaching court. Similarly, juries’ reluctance to convict in rape trials is linked to wider assumptions and negative attitudes. In order to address low conviction rates, there is much work that to be done to build the capacity of sheriffs, judges, police, and the members of juries, to respond appropriately to sexual and domestic violence. Clearly if changes to the corroboration rules proceed, the Government must also ensure that the human right of accused persons are appropriately protected.

Rights of suspects in police custody, including vulnerable adults
The Commission welcomes the provisions in the Bill which define a vulnerable person on arrest, detention and questions as a person aged 18 or over who is assessed as vulnerable due to a mental disorder as defined in section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.

Again, there are wider challenges around awareness-raising and training for staff working in criminal justice agencies. In order to strengthen rights and protection for disabled accused persons, the Commission recommends that Article 13 of the United Nations Convention on the rights of Persons with Disabilities is given meaningful effect in practice: ‘In order to help to ensure effective access to justice for persons with disabilities, State Parties shall promote appropriate training for those working in the field of administration of justice, including police and prison staff.’

Equality and Human Rights Commission
29 August 2013

\(^4\) COPFS evidence to human trafficking inquiry, p 70.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written Submission from Evangelical Alliance

Introduction

1. The Evangelical Alliance in Scotland is the largest body serving evangelical Christians in Scotland and has a membership including denominations, churches, organisations and individuals. Across the UK, Evangelical Alliance membership includes over 700 organisations, 3500 churches and thousands of individuals. Our members in Scotland include the Baptist Union of Scotland, Vineyard Churches, the Salvation Army, Newfrontiers, Elim Pentecostal Churches, Assemblies of God, The Free Church of Scotland, Brethren, a number of congregations within the Church of Scotland and other independent churches. We have a number of organisations as members in Scotland including Glasgow City Mission, Bethany Christian Trust, Tearfund and Scripture Union Scotland.

General Comments

2. The Evangelical Alliance welcomes the opportunity to comment on the proposed Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. As a representative organisation we have members engaged at almost every stage of the criminal justice process whether as individual members in the policing or legal professions, churches involved in community safety initiatives such as Street Pastors, or organisations working with offenders and their families before, during and after time imprisonment. The church has always taken an interest in supporting vulnerable people, whether those at risk of offending, or those who are victims of crime. In addition the provision of fair and equitable justice is a core theme of Christian theology and one in which we believe is one of the fundamental hallmarks of a modern, civilised society. We would be happy to give oral evidence to the committee as representatives of civic society and communities across Scotland, should that be helpful to the committee.

Police powers and the rights of suspects

3. The Evangelical Alliance is in broad agreement with the provisions contained in the Bill on police powers and the rights of suspects. We welcome the clarity given by having a single state of custody, a single maximum 12 hour period of questioning and the provision of the Bill to ensure that cases are heard at the next sitting day of the court. We believe these are broadly sensible proposals that strike a reasonable balance between the rights of the person detained, and the time needed for the police to properly investigate and question a suspect.

4. We also welcome the provisions on the rights of suspects. In particular we welcome placing the right to a solicitor on a permanent, statutory footing. This was an anomaly of Scots law that was tolerated for far too long and we believe that placing this provision at the heart of the Scottish Criminal Justice System is an important step following on from the provision of the 2010 Act. We also welcome the provisions for Child Suspects and Vulnerable Persons who may be under arrest.
Corroboration

5. In common with the majority of respondents to the Scottish Government’s consultation, the Evangelical Alliance has concerns about the planned removal of the need for corroboration in criminal cases. This issue is a very difficult and sensitive one and we have great sympathy for cases where victims of crime feel that the requirement for corroboration affects their ability to access justice. However we also believe that the provision of corroboration provides an important safeguard in the criminal justice system and the removal of corroboration comes dangerously close to lowering the burden of proof required to secure a criminal conviction. Successful prosecution should rely on effective policing, compassionate support services to victims and deterrent sentences upon conviction, and however heinous a crime the state should not resort to changing the legal standards necessary to secure a conviction.

6. In our approach to this issue we wholly recognise the sensitive nature of cases, particularly of sexual crime and domestic violence, which are advocated by the Scottish Government as reason to remove corroboration. We would advocate providing additional resources in these areas for policing and victim support services, as well as tougher sentences upon conviction of these crimes to act as a deterrent.

Court Procedures

7. We broadly welcome the provisions for court proceedings as outlined in Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations. Often court proceedings are unnecessarily complicated, unwieldy and inefficient for victims, witnesses and suspects alike and we support any recommendations to streamline the provision of services and provide better value for the taxpayer.

8. We also welcome the provision of the early communication between prosecution and defence as a way to improve efficiency. However we are concerned that the increase of remand time to 140 days is excessive and are not convinced that such a large extension is necessary to accommodate this meeting. This seems to us to be an unacceptable price to pay in the liberty of those who at that stage have not been convicted. We are also concerned that this will lead to increased pressure on an already overburdened prison system.

9. Whilst we are not persuaded about the removal of corroboration we do agree that the jury majority required should be increased to two thirds, whether or not the corroboration requirement is removed.

Statutory Aggravation for Human Trafficking

10. The Evangelical Alliance has been heavily involved with partners in trying to raise awareness of the issue of Human Trafficking. We welcome the new focus being given to this issue in Scotland and also the provision of the statutory aggravation for offences with a human trafficking background.
INTRODUCTION

1. On 26 June 2013 the Scottish Parliament’s Justice Committee issued a call for written evidence on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. The call sought views on the general principles of the Bill.

2. The Faculty of Advocates is the independent bar in Scotland. Its members include advocates who have considerable experience of the criminal justice system, both as defence counsel and as prosecutors. The Faculty’s written evidence is in the form of an executive summary followed by a more detailed response in respect of each part of the Act.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

3. The Faculty welcomes the simplification, clarification and modernisation of the law of arrest and detention. Although the Faculty has comments on certain specific features of Part I (and these are set out below), generally speaking the Faculty welcomes the thrust of the reforms set out in Part I of the Bill. The one point which the Faculty would wish to highlight is the importance of the review provided for in section 17. If this is to be an effective safeguard, the police should be under an obligation of disclosure, and funding arrangements will require to be in place.

4. The Faculty does not support the proposal in Part 2 of the Bill to abolish corroboration. The following are the Faculty’s principal reasons:

   (i) The requirement of corroboration is central to the administration of criminal justice in Scotland at all stages. It cannot be removed without considering (and responding to) the ramifications for all stages of the criminal justice system.

   (ii) There is no clarity as to what will be put in its place. We do not know what test prosecutors will apply in deciding whether or not to prosecute a case. Without knowing what will substitute for corroboration, it is difficult to make a meaningful assessment of the effects of removal.

   (iii) Corroboration is a safeguard against miscarriages of justice. The only counterbalance proposed in the trial process, in light of the abolition of corroboration, is the increase of the jury majority from a bare majority to two thirds (10 out of 15). The consequence – that an accused may be convicted on the uncorroborated evidence of a single witness whom five out of fifteen jurors disbelieve – leaves the safeguards against wrongful conviction at an unacceptably low level.
(iv) There is no evidence to support the contention that the abolition of the requirement of corroboration will result in an increase in the proportion of sexual offence cases which result in a conviction. At present, the only cases which proceed to trial are those in which there is corroboration. The proportion of those cases which result in an acquittal reflects the fact that, even with a requirement of corroboration, such cases may present difficulties. It is a fallacy to believe that, by prosecuting cases even where there is no corroboration, the proportion of successful cases will increase. The reverse is more likely to be true.

(v) At the same time, the abolition of corroboration may disadvantage victims of crime. Cases may be prosecuted where there is, in fact, no strong likelihood of success, putting complainers through a trial process only to see the accused being acquitted. At the same time, if there is no legal requirement for corroboration, there is at least a risk that the police will not investigate with a view to finding corroborative evidence if it exists. This could mean that cases which currently result in a conviction will, following the change, result in acquittal - because it may be the corroborative evidence which persuades the jury to believe the complainer's account, or to prefer the complainer's account to that of the accused.

(vi) In the current environment, the resource implications of abolition cannot be ignored. The analysis in the Financial Memorandum is open to criticism for all the reasons set out in the Faculty's draft response to the Finance Committee's call for evidence (which is attached as an Annex). Perhaps most seriously, the Financial Memorandum assumes that the additional resources required can largely, if not entirely, be absorbed through efficiency savings. In relation at least to the COPFS and the Court Service, this seems to the Faculty to be unrealistic.

5. The Faculty's position is elaborated in more detail below.

6. The Faculty does not consider that the proposal in Part 3 of the Bill to increase the majority required for a guilty verdict from eight to ten out of fifteen goes far enough. To convict an accused where five out of fifteen jurors are not convinced of his guilt is not consistent with the requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt. The Faculty would take this view even if corroboration were not being abolished. In the context of the abolition of corroboration, this change is insufficient to secure a trial process which provides reasonable assurance against miscarriages of justice.

7. The Faculty offers some specific comments on other parts of the Bill as set out below.

PART 1 ARREST AND CUSTODY

Chapter 1 Arrest by police

8. The Faculty supports the simplification, clarification and modernisation of the law of arrest and detention in light of the European Convention. As the Faculty pointed out in its previous response to the Scottish Government, one of the key features of such a system is that an individual should not have his liberty restricted without good reason.

9. The Bill introduces a new police power to re-arrest a suspect on the same grounds and to hold the suspect in custody for the unexpired balance of the 12 hour period. The Faculty suggests that there should be a statutory obligation on the police to inform a suspect upon release that (i) he may be re-arrested and (ii) then held for the unexpired balance of the 12 hour period. Such a provision could be added to section 11.

Section 5

10. The Faculty understands that as of 1 July 2013, all people held in police custody are given a letter informing them of their seven key legal rights. The Faculty submits that the letter must be given to the person at the earliest opportunity and that the rights must also be read out to the person to assist their comprehension. Accordingly, subsection (3) should be amended to state that the information must be provided ‘verbally and in writing’.

Chapter 2 Custody: Persons not officially accused

11. In respect of individual sections of the Bill, the Faculty wishes to make the following observations and suggestions:

Section 7

12. The Faculty believes that authorisation for keeping a person in custody should be by an officer of the rank of sergeant or above rather than the rank of constable. The Faculty notes that section 9 requires the review after 6 hours to be carried by a police inspector or above.

Section 9

13. The Faculty believes that there should be a statutory requirement that a record of the review of detention after 6 hours is maintained. This is an important safeguard against individuals being detained for longer than is necessary and proportionate.

Section 11

14. The Faculty believes that the section should make clear that upon expiry of the 12 hour period the person shall be informed immediately that the period has expired and that he should be released immediately from custody.

Section 12

15. There should be a statutory requirement upon arrest and upon arrival at the police station to inform a re-arrested person of the maximum period he may be held for, namely the 12 hour period less the period spent in custody previously.
Section 13

16. Subsection (6) envisages the questioning of a suspect at hospital. Suspects are not regularly taken to hospital for treatment; suspects are usually examined within a police station by a casualty surgeon. In circumstances where the police feel that it would be appropriate to take a suspect to a hospital for treatment, the Faculty believes that it would be inappropriate to question such a suspect until he is taken back to the police station.

Section 14

17. The Faculty notes that this provision bears a similarity to the existing power of the police to release a person on an undertaking in terms of section 22 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and in terms of sections 19 and 20 of the Bill. However, important requirements of section 22 of the 1995 Act are missing. Section 22 of the 1995 Act requires that the person agrees to provide the undertaking and that he signs the undertaking. If not, then the police may either liberate him without an undertaking or refuse to liberate him. The Faculty believes that section 14 of the Bill should be amended to include these requirements.

18. In addition, the Faculty believes that upon release under section 14 of the Bill the person should be provided with a copy release document. Furthermore, the copy release document should include a section informing the person of his right to apply to a sheriff to have the conditions of his release reviewed under section 17.

Section 17

19. As indicated in our evidence in respect of section 15, the Faculty believes that the copy release document provided to the person upon release should include a section informing him of his rights under section 17.

20. The section does not specify that the length of the period of the investigative liberation as something which can be reviewed by the court. The Faculty believes that this should be capable of review.

21. In the absence of a requirement to provide the person with a summary of evidence (which is now routinely provided by COPFS to persons appearing in court), it is difficult to see how meaningful representations can be made on the appropriateness and proportionality of the conditions. For the same reason, it is difficult to see how a sheriff could carry out a meaningful review.

22. The section is silent on important procedural matters. Would there be a hearing on the application or would the application simply be dealt with in chambers? Would there be a time limit fixed by statute within which the application must be heard? Would the person have notice of, or an opportunity to comment on, the procurator fiscal's representations? Would legal assistance be available? If so, how would it be funded? What impact would the processing of these applications have on the police, COPFS and the courts?
23. In order for a review to be practically effective, the Faculty believes that there would need to be: (i) a disclosure protocol in respect of the information which apparently led to the imposition of the conditions (ii) a procedural structure and (iii) funding for legal advice.

Chapter 3 Custody: Persons not officially accused

Section 19

24. The Faculty notes that liberation of a person on an undertaking requires the person to give an undertaking. However, the section does not require that the undertaking is in writing nor does the section require that it is signed by the person. The existing police power to release on an undertaking contains these requirements. The breach of an undertaking is an offence. The Faculty believes the section should mirror the existing legislation: it should contain specific requirements that a person released on an undertaking signs it and is provided with a copy of it.

25. In addition, the Faculty believes that the copy undertaking should include a section informing the person of his right to apply to a sheriff to have the conditions reviewed under section 22.

Section 20

26. The Faculty recognises that giving the police the power to release a person on conditions may often be in the interests of that person. It allows him to be released sooner; if the police did not have this power, then the person would need to be held in custody until his court appearance when the same conditions might be imposed by the court.

27. The imposition of a curfew on a person who has not been officially accused of committing a crime is a significant restriction on that person’s liberty: it effectively places a person under house arrest for a period of up to 12 hours in any 24 hour period. The Faculty believes that if the police feel that a curfew is appropriate then an application should be made to the court.

Section 22

28. As indicated in our evidence in respect of section 19, the Faculty believes that the copy undertaking provided to the person upon release should include a section informing him of his rights under section 22.

29. In the absence of a requirement to provide the person with a summary of evidence (which is now routinely provided by COPFS to persons appearing in court), it is difficult to see how meaningful representations can be made on the appropriateness and proportionality of the conditions. For the same reason, it is difficult to see how a sheriff could carry out a meaningful review.

30. The section is silent on important procedural matters. Would there be a hearing on the application or would the application simply be dealt with in chambers? Would there be a time limit fixed by statute within which the application must be heard?
Would the person have notice of, or an opportunity to comment on, the procurator fiscal’s representations? Would legal assistance be available? If so, how would it be funded? What impact would processing these applications have on the police, COPFS and the courts?

31. In order for a review to be practically effective there would need to be: (i) a disclosure protocol in respect of the information which apparently led to the imposition of the conditions (ii) a procedural structure and (iii) funding for legal advice.

Chapter 4: Police interview

Section 23

32. The Faculty believes that subsection (2) should require that the specified information is given at the start of the interview as well as being given not more than one hour before the interview.

Section 24

33. Subsection (4) would enable the police to interview a person without a solicitor “in the interests of the investigation”. The Faculty believes that this is far too low a threshold. The existing provision in section 15A(8) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides the higher threshold of “in exceptional circumstances”. Furthermore, the recently proposed European Directive on Rights of Access to a Lawyer provides for a similarly high threshold. The Faculty firmly believes the police should not be allowed to interview a person without a solicitor unless such a higher threshold is met. The Explanatory Notes to the Bill fail to mention the existing statutory provision.

Section 25

34. The Faculty believes that the words “owing to mental disorder” where they appear in subsection (2)(b) should be deleted. It may be very difficult for a police officer, without medical training and without any assistance from a police casualty surgeon, to assess whether or not a person is suffering from a mental disorder. The Faculty believes that any person who appears unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or communicate effectively with the police should be provided with support. Furthermore, it is highly unlikely that such an interview, if challenged, would be regarded as admissible. If the words are deleted, subsection (6) should be deleted as a consequential amendment.

Section 29

35. The Faculty believes that maximum length of time a person may be held in custody for post charge questioning under subsection (2) should be fixed by statute rather than left completely to the discretion of the court. This period of detention should include the period between arrest and arrival at the police station.
Chapter 5: Rights of suspects in police custody

Section 33

36. The Faculty believes that the words "owing to mental disorder" where they appear in subsection (1)(c) should be deleted. It may be very difficult for a police officer, without medical training and without any assistance from a police casualty surgeon, to assess whether or not a person is suffering from a mental disorder. The Faculty believes that any person unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or communicate effectively with the police should be provided with support. As we indicated earlier in our comments in respect of section 25, it is highly unlikely that such an interview, if challenged, would be regarded as admissible. If the words are deleted, subsection (5)(a) should be deleted as a consequential amendment.

Chapter 6: Police powers and duties

37. The Faculty has no comment to make on this chapter.

Chapter 7: Breach of liberation conditions

38. The Faculty has no comment to make on this chapter.

Chapter 8: General

39. The Faculty has no comment to make on this chapter.

PART 2: CORROBORATION AND STATEMENTS

Section 57

40. The Faculty does not support the proposal in the Bill to abolish the requirement of corroboration. The following are the Faculty’s principal reasons:

(i) The requirement of corroboration is central to the administration of criminal justice in Scotland at all stages. It cannot be removed without considering (and responding to) the ramifications for all stages of the criminal justice system. Yet there is no clarity as to what will be put in its place. We do not know what test prosecutors will apply in deciding whether or not to prosecute a case. Without knowing what will substitute for corroboration, it is difficult to make a meaningful assessment of the effects of removal.

(ii) Corroboration is a safeguard against miscarriages of justice. The only counterbalance proposed in the trial process, in light of the abolition of corroboration, is the increase of the jury majority from a bare majority to two thirds (10 out of 15). The consequence – that an accused may be convicted on the uncorroborated evidence of a single witness whom five out of fifteen jurors disbelieve – leaves the safeguards against wrongful conviction at an unacceptably low level.

(iii) At the same time, the abolition of corroboration may not benefit victims of crime. Cases may be prosecuted where there is no reasonable prospect of success, putting complainers through a trial process without the satisfaction of a guilty verdict at the end of it. It is often the corroborative evidence which convinces the jury that the complainer’s account is to be preferred to that of the accused. If there is no requirement for corroboration, there is a real risk that the police will not investigate with a view to finding corroborative evidence if it exists, and prosecutors may prosecute without insisting on corroboration.

(iv) In the current environment, the resource implications of abolition cannot be ignored. The analysis in the Financial Memorandum is open to criticism for all the reasons set out in the Faculty’s draft response to the Finance Committee’s call for evidence. Perhaps most seriously, the Financial Memorandum assumes that the additional resources required can largely, if not entirely, be absorbed through efficiency savings. In relation at least to the COPFS and the Court Service, this seems to the Faculty to be unrealistic.

41. In its response to the Scottish Government’s Consultation on Lord Carloway’s Report, the Faculty emphasised that:

(i) the matters raised are of fundamental importance to the administration of justice in Scotland;

(ii) given the centrality of corroboration to the system of criminal justice in Scotland, any review of corroboration should be undertaken as part of a review of the Scottish criminal justice system as a whole and having regard to distinctive Scottish features such as the routine reliance on dock identification;

(iii) if the requirement of corroboration were to be abolished then an accused person could be convicted of the most serious crime on the basis of the uncorroborated evidence of a single witness whom seven out of fifteen jurors do not believe; such a proposition is unacceptable in any modern justice system.

(iv) in the absence of corroboration, the criterion to be applied by prosecutors should be made known and articulated in statute.

42. In respect of Point 3, Lord Carloway did not consider an alteration to the majority necessary for a conviction as “either necessary or desirable” [Carloway Report, para 1.0.20]. The Scottish Government has rejected Lord Carloway’s position and the Bill now seeks to increase the majority in a jury of 15 from 8 to 10 jurors. The Faculty maintains the position set out in its response to the Scottish Government’s Additional Safeguards consultation. Many comparable systems with a jury of 12 require a majority of at least 10 jurors for a conviction. The Faculty questions why the Scottish criminal justice system should require proportionately fewer jurors to be convinced of the guilt of the accused. The Faculty would favour a reduction of the jury to 12, with a requirement of at least 10 for a guilty verdict.

43. In respect of Points 1, 2 and 4, the Faculty maintains its position. The Faculty remains concerned that fundamental reforms of the Scottish criminal justice system are being considered in a piecemeal fashion. Support for the Faculty’s position can be found in Lord Carloway’s evidence to the Justice Committee (on 29 November 2011) which illustrated the complexity and interdependence of the issues involved: “if we go down the route of examining majority verdicts, we must examine the not proven verdict. If I had gone down that road, there would have been another 150 pages in the report.” Notwithstanding this evidence, the Scottish Government now proposes to alter the size of the majority verdict but not to examine the not proven verdict; instead, it intends to refer the not proven verdict to the Scottish Law Commission.

44. The Faculty would not wish to be understood as opposing any re-assessment of the place of corroboration in the criminal justice system. The Faculty recognises the real concerns that, in some cases, the requirement can result in crimes going unpunished. But if corroboration is to be abolished, this should only be done following an assessment of its place in the criminal justice system as a whole, that it be done only in conjunction with measures designed to ensure that miscarriages of justice do not occur, and that it be done with eyes wide open to the potential resource implications of the change.

The effect of removing the requirement of corroboration

45. The requirement of corroboration permeates the criminal justice system at every stage. The abolition of this safeguard would, if no other changes were made, create a system which would look quite different at every stage.

(i) The police would presumably report cases to the fiscal on the basis that there was a single piece of evidence supporting each of the two essential facts: a crime had been committed and the accused was the person or one of the persons who committed it.

(ii) Assuming a single piece of evidence to support the two essential facts, the only question for the prosecutor in deciding whether or not to prosecute the case, would (if no other change was made to the criterion to be applied by prosecutors in marking cases for prosecution) be whether the public interest favoured prosecution.

(iii) On the assumption that there is at least a single piece of evidence supporting each of the essential facts, there would be no basis upon which the trial judge could withdraw a charge from the jury no matter how unsatisfactory the evidence.

(iv) Juries would be directed that they could convict on the basis of a single piece of evidence acceptable to them which established the two essential facts.

(v) An accused could be convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness or a single piece of evidence, even if (on the proposals in this Bill as regards majority verdicts) five out of the fifteen jurors found that single witness or single piece of evidence incredible or unreliable.

(vi) On appeal, again assuming a single piece of evidence supporting the two essential facts, the only basis upon which the appeal court could review the case by reference to the quality or sufficiency of the evidence would be the “no reasonable jury” test.
46. The proposal to abolish the safeguard of corroboration invites at least the following questions, the answers to which would be relevant to any decision as to whether it is a wise or appropriate step:—

(i) What safeguards or guarantees are there, against a backdrop of significant and sustained pressures in funding, that the police will not short-circuit the investigation of individual cases?

(ii) What criterion are prosecutors to apply when deciding whether or not to prosecute cases?

(iii) On the assumption that prosecutors are to be required to apply some criterion in deciding whether or not to prosecute, should the trial judge not have power to withdraw the case from the jury if, in fact, the evidence at trial does not meet that criterion?

(iv) Separately, should trial judges be given the power – or indeed the duty in all or certain classes of case – to warn the jury of the dangers of convicting on the basis of uncorroborated evidence?

(v) Is it acceptable that an accused could be convicted on the basis of one uncorroborated item of evidence even if five out of the fifteen jurors do not accept that evidence or do not find it a sufficient basis for conviction?

Investigation of crime

47. There is a legitimate concern that if corroboration is not required as a matter of law, the police will not carry out exhaustive enquiries directed to finding corroborative evidence if it exists. This is a real concern in the current climate where there are significant pressures on resources (and where it is recognised that the abolition of corroboration will result in additional cases being prosecuted). This could easily have the effect of causing, rather than preventing, miscarriages of justice for complainers as well as for accused persons. Often, it is the apparently minor piece of corroborative evidence that makes rather than breaks a case. For example, in an allegation of sexual assault through nerves, vulnerability or for some other reason a complainer may not appear to be a convincing witness and on his, or her, testimony alone the jury would not be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt. However, further police or forensic investigations may reveal a piece of evidence, which not only provides the technical corroboration but confirms the complainer’s evidence and satisfies the jury to the required standard. In a justice system where corroboration is not required, there is a risk that, in such a case, the corroborative evidence will not be found, and the complainer’s evidence alone will not convince the jury of the guilt of the accused.

Decisions to prosecute

48. Corroboration is not just a technical requirement. If there is corroborated evidence that the accused committed the alleged crime, this provides a reasonable assurance that the case is one which has reasonable prospects of success. If the requirement of corroboration were to be abolished without substituting any other criterion upon which prosecutors are to proceed when marking cases for prosecution, there would be pressure on COPFS to prosecute any case where some evidence exists regardless of the quality of that evidence. Cases would be pursued and complainers subjected to the trial process where there is, in fact, no realistic prospect of conviction. Such a situation would be unfair both to complainers and to accused persons and would involve a waste of public resources.

49. It seems to be accepted or acknowledged that, if the safeguard of corroboration were to be abolished, prosecutorial marking decisions would not simply be based on a test of sufficiency (plus public interest), but would be based on some qualitative assessment of the evidence as a whole. The comparative exercise carried out as part of Lord Carloway’s review used a “reasonable prospect of conviction” test. Slightly different formulations of the test could, at least in theory, have a significant effect on the type and number of cases which would be prosecuted. Are prosecutors, for example, to prosecute any case where there is some evidence unless there is no reasonable prospect of conviction? Or are they to prosecute a case only if there is a reasonable prospect of conviction?

In the Faculty’s view, the question of what test should be applied by prosecutors in the event of the abolition of corroboration is a question which cannot be avoided if corroboration is abolished – indeed is intrinsic to the question of whether or not corroboration should be abolished. The effects of abolition cannot meaningfully be assessed without knowing what criterion is to be put in its place. That question is one of great public interest. It should be the subject of explicit, informed and public debate, and any test should be prescribed by law.

50. The application of a qualitative test of this sort would depend significantly on individual judgment. Further, prosecutors mark cases on the basis of the papers. They rely on the statements which have been taken by the police. Precognition by a member of the COPFS staff is, today, unusual. In these circumstances, the prosecutor’s ability to make a realistic assessment of the quality of a witness’ evidence is limited. Take, for example, a case where a complainer alleges sexual assault. Without seeing the witness, how is the prosecutor to form a view as to the prospects of success?

The role of the trial judge

51. If prosecutors are to apply a “reasonable prospect of conviction” test, or indeed, some other qualitative test, in deciding whether or not to mark a case for prosecution, what is to happen if the evidence as it in fact emerges at trial is not of a quality which should properly have been held to meet the test? Surely the prosecutor should then be obliged to withdraw the case from the jury. And if the prosecutor were not do so, the trial judge should have the power to withdraw the case from the jury. It would surely not be acceptable to have a system in which, if the evidence does not come up to the standard which would have justified a prosecution in the first place, the defence could not make a submission to that effect, and the trial judge could not withdraw the case from the jury.

The fact that our system permits the Appeal Court to overturn a conviction on the basis that no reasonable jury would, on the evidence, have convicted implies a recognition that juries, sometimes, do behave unreasonably. The Appeal Court, in applying that test, recognises and respects the advantages which those present at the trial, who saw the evidence, have over the Appeal Court, which can proceed only on the papers. Why should the trial judge – the one professional independent judge who has seen and heard the evidence – not be entitled to take the view that the case should not be left to the jury if the evidence is not such as would justify a conviction?

52. In any event, if the requirement of corroboration were to be abolished, the question of how the judge should charge the jury would have to be addressed. Judges would presumably, at least, have to direct juries that there must be at least one piece of evidence which the jury accepts and which supports each of the following facts: (i) that a crime has been committed; and (ii) that the accused is guilty of the crime. But should the judge be required to direct the jury on the need to consider all the evidence that they have heard and to consider whether there is evidence which supports, or on the other hand, undermines, the Crown case? If (as our system has hitherto assumed) there are dangers in convicting on the basis of uncorroborated evidence, judges should have the power, if they consider it appropriate to do so in the particular circumstances of the case, to give juries a warning to that effect.

Resource implications

53. Quite apart from these issues of principle, it seems to the Faculty that the resource implications of the proposal require to be addressed. In order to assess the potential impact of the proposal on the resources required by the criminal justice system, it would be necessary to consider at least the following:

(i) What is the likely impact on the number of additional cases reported by the public to the police? It seems reasonable to surmise that a number of crimes go unreported because there is only one witness.

(ii) What is the likely impact on the number of cases reported to the procurator fiscal?

(iii) What is the likely impact on the resources required by COPFS in the precognition and marking of cases?

(iv) What is the likely impact on the number of cases which are prosecuted at a time of court closures?

(v) What is the likely impact on the incidence of convictions?

54. The Faculty has dealt in detail with this in draft evidence to the Finance Committee of the Parliament. Given the significance of the issue, the Faculty appends that evidence to this response also. That evidence is in draft, not least because the Faculty has requested from the Scottish Government sight of two “shadow” exercises which were undertaken and which inform the assessment of the effects of the change. If those were to be provided, the Faculty would wish to consider its evidence on the resource implications of the Bill in light of that material.
Section 59

55. In the event that the safeguard of corroboration is removed, the Faculty agrees that this should not be with retrospective effect. Legal advice is given on a lawyer’s understanding of existing law and practice. If the law in respect of corroboration was to be changed with retrospective effect, then an accused may be prejudiced for acting on advice which was sound legal advice at the time it was given but which would not have been given had there not been a requirement for corroboration. In particular, an accused may have been advised to refrain from making either a mixed or an exculpatory statement.

Section 60

56. This section provides that where the period of time during which a continuous offence is committed includes the relevant day, the specified condition is deemed to be met in relation to the whole offence. This effectively means that the abolition of corroboration is to be given retrospective effect in relation to a “continuous offence”. The Faculty opposes this proposal. It gives the abolition of corroboration retrospective reach – which the Faculty does not believe is consistent with principle. It would permit, for example, a prosecution to be brought in relation to events long predating the relevant date and continuing until after the relevant date and for a conviction to be brought on the basis of a single uncorroborated piece of evidence even if the whole period after the relevant date was, at trial, deleted from the charge.

Section 62

57. This section effects a significant change in respect of the admissibility of statements made by an accused. For important public policy reasons, exculpatory statements and/or mixed statements (containing incriminating and exculpatory material) led by the defence were not admissible as proof of any fact contained therein. In effect, this meant that an accused could not rely on exculpatory statements which he had previously made and thereby avoid having to give evidence on oath and be subjected to cross-examination at the trial.

If this provision were to be enacted, then an accused person, who made a statement to the police or other official, would be able to have his position e.g. consent to a sexual charge, self-defence to an assault considered by the fact-finder without himself having to give evidence on oath and be subject to cross-examination.

PART 3: SOLEMN PROCEDURE

Section 63

58. This section deprives the accused of an opportunity to make a declaration in respect of any charge. It is not clear why this change is being made. Why should the accused not be entitled to make a declaration if he wishes to do so?
Sections 65 to 67

59. The Faculty has some concerns that the volume of cases in the sheriff court and the pressure on the COPFS, particularly in Glasgow and Edinburgh will make it a difficult task to transpose, in effect, High Court procedure into the sheriff court.

Section 70

60. This provision amends the size of the majority for a guilty verdict. For the reasons set out above, the Faculty does not consider that the increase in the majority goes far enough. To permit an accused to be convicted when a third of the jurors are not convinced by the case against him does not seem consistent with the principle that an accused should be convicted only if the evidence against him establishes guilt beyond reasonable doubt. The Faculty would take that view even if corroboration were not being abolished. In the context of the abolition of corroboration, this provision is insufficient to secure a trial process which provides reasonable assurance against miscarriages of justice.

PART 4: SENTENCING

61. The Faculty offers no comment on this Part of the Bill

PART 5: APPEALS AND SCCRC

Section 82

62. The Faculty is concerned about the imposition of additional criteria only in respect of appeals referred by the Scottish Criminal Case Review Commission. The effect of this section would be that a conviction which the Appeal Court was satisfied amounted to a miscarriage of justice might not be set aside. Establishing to the satisfaction of the Appeal Court that there has been a miscarriage of justice is a very high threshold. The Faculty believes that it cannot be in the interests of justice to allow a conviction which the Appeal Court has found to have been based on a miscarriage of justice to stand.

PART 6: MISCELLANEOUS

Section 86

63. This section provides for the participation of a detained person by means of a live TV link. The Faculty welcomes the appropriate use of technology in courtrooms. It believes, however, that the successful use of technology will depend on the facilities made available. In particular, it will be essential that there is a facility for the accused to speak privately to his legal representative in advance of, or in the course of the hearing, if required.

Faculty of Advocates
6 September 2013
1. Introduction
This paper aims at providing a response to the consultation on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill issued by the Scottish Government in June 2013, after Lord Carloway’s review of key aspects of Scottish criminal law and practice. This paper also discusses a few issues not raised by the Bill but which are worth considering to the end of improving the Scottish criminal justice system.

It is an undeniable fact that false allegations of crime can and do exist. Although admitting that quite often crime figures and statistics are inaccurate and difficult to be collated, the relevant authorities themselves confirm the existence of false allegations. The fact that in some areas, such as rape and domestic violence, the number of people persecuted for perverting the course of justice is significantly smaller than the number of prosecutions is by no means evidence that malicious or misguided allegations are irrelevant, but it might rather indicate the greater difficulty met when persecuting false allegation makers. By the same token, the same figures should not lead to underestimate the impact false allegations might have on the individual concerned and on the system of justice as a whole.

It should also be remembered that the goal of any change in the law should not be to merely increase conviction rates at all costs but rather make sure that only the guilty is punished. Thus, any change in the current law and practice must not skew the balance in favour of the Crown but rather confirm the overriding principle that a person is innocent until proven otherwise.

2. Corroboration
It is our understanding that the Bill recommends the abolishment of corroboration in Scots law.

A number of arguments are put forward against the retention of this principle, such as the increase of bureaucracy, the quality v. quantity argument, the difficulty of the general public to grasp such a concept.

The corroboration principle has however served Scottish law very well over the years mostly avoiding persecution based on petty evidence and inception of numerous and costly trials resulting in no convictions. The selection of cases going to trial needs indeed a filter, which should be as far as possible objective (rather than left to the prosecutor fiscal judgement’s and thus subjective) as persecuting any allegations would by contrast obstruct justice, for instance by dramatically increasing the prosecutors and courts' workloads as well as the associated costs.

---

Providing for the persecution of single evidence cases is likely to result in trials solely started on the basis of the persecutor’s own perception of the credibility and reliability of the complainer, or the likelihood of success. Therefore, a subjective test would be used when determining the quality and sufficiency of evidence.

The public interest is better served if the legal system is just, impartial and efficient and, therefore, corroboration should be retained. By the same token, the argument that corroboration should be abolished in order to balance the system appears faulty because our system is based on the overriding principle of presumption of innocence, and thus the Crown and the defendant are not supposed to be on an equal footing but rather the former should prove the latter guilty beyond any reasonable doubt. The presumption of innocence is indeed a legal instrument to favour the accused based on the legal inference that most people are not criminals.

Furthermore, the fact that the Scot law is unique in providing for corroboration should not be viewed in isolation. In jurisdictions where there is no corroboration, further safeguards are often provided to avoid miscarriage of justice and to ensure that a person is only convicted if found guilty beyond any reasonable doubt. For example, in most European jurisdictions, the appeal stage allows for full reassessments on not only points of laws but also of facts, and the right to appeal is always granted to the accused, as opposed to being subject to a permission by the relevant court. Therefore, the corroboration principle may be better defined or explained but should be retained by the Scottish legal system.

3. Jury Majority and Size
The increase of the number of jurors (from 8 to 10) required to make a guilty verdict as envisaged in the Bill is welcome because it upholds the overriding principle that one must be proven guilty beyond any reasonable doubt in order to be convicted.

Any possible change in the number of jurors needed for a jury must be accompanied by a system of weighted majority because, inter alia, the risk of verdict contaminated by prejudices of individual jurors increases in smaller juries.

Furthermore, it is well known that in some jurisdictions (such as Canada and New Zealand) where the number of jurors is lower than in Scotland, unanimity or at least a qualified majority is always required.

No change in the number of jurors making a jury shall, therefore, be made without careful consideration and implementation of sound measures, which preserve justice.

4. Not proven
It is often said that the Scots system is unique in providing for the “not proven” verdict.

In fact, this is not accurate because similar acquittals verdicts are indeed present in other jurisdictions. For instance, under the Italian Criminal Procedure Code, in addition to the two verdicts that resemble the Scottish not proven and not guilty, three further acquittal verdicts are present, namely that no crime was committed by anyone; that the defendant acted justifiably; and that a procedural technicality requires acquittal.
Furthermore, in the US a number of academic proposals favouring the introduction of not proven verdicts have been made in the last years. The main reason why some scholars in the US would favour a system which resembles the Scottish one is because they believe the two-verdict system limits the jury's speech. Furthermore, in cases such as rape, often revolving on the credibility of both the accuser and the accused rather than on totally convincing evidence, a not proven verdict would appear particularly helpful because it would allow a jury to acquit the defendant without casting doubts on the honesty or reliability of the victim. The same scholars conclude that consequences of introducing this verdict would amount to more information, more acquittals, and more stigma depending on the case.

Some detractors of the not proven verdict would favour its abolition based on the argument that in sexual related crimes, the number of not proven verdicts is indeed higher compared to other types of offences. However, this information should only be interpreted as reflecting the jury’s difficulty in making a decision, particularly in cases where due for example to different gender or cultural interpretations of certain behaviours, it could be extremely complex to draw clear cut conclusions. The not proven verdict should, therefore, be retained.

5. The confrontation clause under article 6 of the European Human Rights Convention (EHRC)

Article 6 of the EHRC provides that everyone charged with a criminal offence has, inter alia, the right to "examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him".

It is our understanding that Scots law already provides for the possibility of defence lawyers to read any witness statements and to obtain pre-recognition statements from the same. However, it is also our understanding that, under Scots law, witness statements cannot be disclosed to the accused, but just provided to their lawyers on the strict understanding that they are to be treated as highly confidential, and they will not be copied to an accused person. The motivation behind this seems to be that they ought to be kept out of the public domain.

This law seems unique across the European member states and poses questions on its compatibility with letter d) of article 6 of the European Human Rights Convention. If the accused has a right to a fair trial, he should be put in the position of being fully aware of the details of the charges against him. Obviously, being able to read a witness statement by oneself or being told of it by a third party can make a difference including in the understanding and interpretation of the same witness statements. Not allowing the defendant to have direct access to witness statements impairs the defendant's confrontation right and does not seem fully justifiable on the basis of the need to keep such statements out of the public domain.

Furthermore, since the prosecutor is likely to have access to any statement, the same right should be granted to the accused.

The right to a fair trial is indeed an essential right in all countries respecting the rule of law and it is worth bearing in mind that the trial rights listed by article 6 of the EHRC are clearly and expressly defined as minimum rights.

6. Directions given by judges to the jury
It is our understanding that some organisations are urging the Government to introduce judicial direction in sexual offence cases. In other words, judges would be required to inform juries that factual information such as delayed disclosure and lack of physical resistance should be disregarded when making a verdict.

It is self-evident that if judges were to lecture juries, this would dramatically affect jurors decisions, and this would undermine one pillar of Scots criminal procedure law: either jurors are trusted to be able to make decisions or they are not.

Jurors should make their decisions without any influence whatsoever and are not supposed to be familiar with the law. This explains why some professionals and categories of people, such as those involved in the judicial/legal/social sectors, are actually considered ineligible to serve as jurors.

The jury is and should be required to make its decision solely based on the evidence provided.

7. Criminal records
It is understood that, under the current laws and procedures, when an allegation of rape or sexual abuse is made, any possible information on the arrest of the accused is retained on police computer records from the moment of the arrest for the rest of the accused’s life. The fact that such record won’t be removed even if the allegation is not followed by conviction or later proved to be false means that the accused may experience difficulties and restrictions in finding employment or involvement in some voluntary organizations. Furthermore, the keeping of such information can interfere with the right to a family life, as social services interventions dictate access to families (even those whose case has been dropped).

These restrictions contravene UN and EU Human Rights principles and in particular article 8 of the ECHR, which guarantees people the right to "private and family life". Therefore, if the current laws and procedure do not provide for removal of such records, they should be promptly amended or repealed.

It’s also worth noting that the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in a recent case stated that "indiscriminate and open-ended collection of criminal record data is unlikely to comply with the requirements of Article 8 in the absence of clear and detailed statutory regulations clarifying the safeguards applicable."³

By the same token, the UK judiciary has recently expressed concerns about the impact that disclosure of past offences might have on an individual life, and has pointed out the need for “overdue reforms – properly balancing the aim of public protection with privacy rights”\(^4\).

---

³ See the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) ruling in M.M v. the United Kingdom of November 2012, as downloadable from [http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/sites/eng/pages/search.aspx?i=001-114517#itemid:"001-114517"] The ECtHR stated inter alia that retention and disclosure of a job applicant’s police records to potential employers was incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights.

If the disclosure of certain past offenses after some time from their occurring looks disproportionate to the judiciary and is also discouraged by some UK legislation, such as the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, the retention of records on people not convicted but simply investigated or arrested results completely unjustifiable.

Margaret Gardener
FASO (UK) Director
29 August 2013

Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Families Outside

1. Introduction
   1.1 Families Outside is a national independent charity that works on behalf of families affected by imprisonment in Scotland. We do this through provision of a national freephone helpline for families and for the professionals who work with them, as well as through development of policy and practice, training, and face-to-face support. As such, specific sections of this Bill are of considerable interest to our work, and we are grateful for the opportunity to comment. We are happy to elaborate on any of these should the Committee require additional information.

2. Part 1, Chapter 5: Rights of suspects in police custody
   2.1 Families Outside welcomes Chapter 5, section 30 on the “Right to have intimation sent to other person” when someone is in police custody. Both the fact of custody and the location is likely to be pertinent to people other than the suspect. Good practice would be to ensure that this “other person” also receives relevant information such as contact details for support and queries, and we would like to see this incorporated into the Bill.

   2.2 We also welcome section 32, the “Right of under 18s to have access to other person” while in police custody. First, we welcome the recognition that the definition of young people should extend to at least age 18, commensurate with the provisions in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. Second, their age makes these young people potentially vulnerable, and older family members or carers may well have concerns for their welfare. Engagement with a responsible adult from the earliest possible stage, where this is in the best interest of the young person, is likely to be of benefit throughout the Children’s Hearing or Criminal Justice process and for resettlement afterwards.

   2.3 Families Outside also welcomes provisions for support for vulnerable persons (section 33) while in police custody. Again, we would want to ensure that the suitable person to provide support also receives information about the welfare of the person throughout the Criminal Justice process and has information such as contact details for queries and provision of information.

3. Part 1, Chapter 6: Police powers and duties
   3.1 Of particular interest to us in the Bill was section 42, “Duty to consider child’s best interests”. To subsection (1), we would add the following:
   (e) detain a person with caretaking responsibilities.

   3.2 We agree that “…the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child [must be] a primary consideration”, but these needs are not routinely assessed when an adult is detained in police or prison custody. Research in Scotland and internationally reflects both short- and long-term impacts on children and families when a family member is imprisoned.¹ About a third of prisoners’ children are present during the arrest, and the trauma they experience from this can be considerable.² Families Outside is currently working alongside a number of interested organisations to promote a Child & Family Impact Assessment at key stages in the criminal justice process. However, police already have the power to request a ‘Child in Need’ assessment from the Local Authority and, when a carer is arrested and detained, should be required to do so.

4. Part 4: Sentencing

4.1 The short sections on sentencing would benefit from expansion to include a section to make it commensurate with the terms of the Children & Young People’s Bill. Specifically this section could usefully include reference to the importance of child wellbeing (or indeed ‘welfare’ or ‘best interest’ as defined under existing legislation and case law). It should also reflect a need to take the child’s best interest into account as a primary consideration in all actions that affect them (also Article 3.1 of the UNCRC). Section 278 of Part 18 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 asp 13 (Scottish Act) also sets a precedent in which the child’s interests have to be considered and addressed in state actions concerning the child’s parent(s) (“Duty to mitigate adverse effect of compulsory measures on parental relations”).

4.2 As noted above, such considerations could be assessed through a ‘Child in Need’ assessment with the Local Authority or through a specifically designed Child & Family Impact Assessment. Such an assessment should also question the impact of decisions on a child’s Right to Family Life under the Human Rights Act 1998. In Slovakia v Denise Srponova,³ this consideration prevented the extradition and imprisonment of a lady that would have resulted in her son’s placement in an orphanage following her breach of a probation order.

5. Part 6, Chapter 1: Procedural matters

5.1 Finally, we welcome the provision in section 86 for the use of live television links in court. However, this section could usefully be extended to include the use of such technology to maintain family ties; encourage family participation in prison case conferences; and promote positive parenting such as through participation in parent-teacher conferences, commensurate with recommendations in the National Parenting Strategy for additional support for imprisoned parents.

> Given that many prisoners come from marginalised and impoverished backgrounds, the cost of travelling long distances may mean it will not be possible for families to visit if the prison is a long distance from the area where the family lives.\footnote{Coyle, A. (2002) "A Human Rights Approach to Prison Management." London: International Centre for Prison Studies.}

Ten years later this is still the case, if not more so:

> … the poorest households with a car were spending at least 17% of their income on transport.\footnote{Dalton, A. “Families plunged into ‘transport poverty’." The Scotsman, 29 Feb. 2012.}

5.3 Travel to prisons for visits continue to be a barrier for families to maintain contact. Families Outside would recommend the use of video technology in prisons to lessen the burden for the families imprisonment separates.

6. Conclusions

6.1 As an organisation with a very specific remit in relation to children and families affected by imprisonment, we recognise that our evidence is similarly specific. In saying this, the broader implications when a family member is caught up in the criminal justice system means that elements of this Bill are key to ensuring that the rights of children and families are acknowledged and supported. In an address to the Early Years Collaborative in May 2013, Sir Harry Burns emphasised the fact that outcomes for children are inextricably linked to those of their parents and carers; this Bill is an essential opportunity to recognise this.

6.2 In conclusion, Families Outside broadly welcomes the Criminal Justice Bill but want to make sure that it does not miss the opportunity to address the broader implications for children and families. We appreciate the opportunity to comment and are happy to engage in further discussion where this would be helpful.

Prof Nancy Loucks
Chief Executive
Families Outside
30 August 2013
Summary

We are not satisfied that the case for abolition of corroboration has been made.

- Arguments to the effect that it is an ancient rule and out of keeping with developments in evidence in the 21st century do not make the case for abolition. If anything, improvements in CCTV techniques, DNA analysis, etc suggest that it may be easier to acquire corroboration than hitherto.

- The argument that other jurisdictions do not have corroboration, and therefore Scotland is ‘out of line’, also adds little; there is no corroboration requirement as such in England, but it is our understanding that prosecutors routinely look for corroboration and do not generally prosecute without it.

- Fact-finders (whether judges or jurors) will in practice seek some further piece of evidence which confirms or supports a complainer’s version of events. Abolishing the corroboration requirement is likely to raise false hope in victims of sexual assaults that their cases will result in conviction.

- We have had piecemeal tinkering: once it was recognised that those being detained and interviewed by the police had a right to legal advice, the period of detention was doubled and the abolition of corroboration proposed. To offset this, it is now proposed that the jury majority be changed. The Law Commission, or other specially appointed body, should be asked to evaluate the criminal process as a whole (trial and pre-trial; laws of procedure and of evidence), and to consider whether it strikes an appropriate balance between the rights of accused persons, and the wider public interest in preventing crime and securing that those guilty of breaking the criminal law are convicted and punished.

- If corroboration is to be abolished as a general requirement, an exception should be made for certain forms of visual identification evidence, and for confession evidence. Dock identification should no longer be permitted unless the witness has made a positive identification of the accused on an earlier occasion. Legislation should provide that evidence may be led from experts in the field of identification, in appropriate cases.

We can supply papers we have co-authored on some of these points, if this would be of assistance to the Committee:
Since it seems likely that corroboration will be abolished as a general requirement, we focus in this note on the argument that it should continue to be a requirement for two types of particularly problematic evidence, namely for visual identification and confession evidence.

(a) Eyewitness identification evidence: Identification may not be an issue at trial, for example, where an accused is pleading self-defence to an assault or homicide charge, or consent in a rape trial, but where it is at issue, a distinction may be made between cases in which the accused is well-known to the victim, and the circumstances are such that there was ample opportunity for the witness to see the perpetrator, and those cases in which identification rests on less solid foundations. In the former case, the veracity of the witness may still be in doubt – a witness who states categorically that her husband punched her; that she saw her neighbour trampling her prize roses; or that her boss forced her to have sexual intercourse may be lying, but if she is telling the truth then it is unlikely that her identification of the perpetrator is mistaken. In contrast to this, where a witness and perpetrator were not acquainted before the incident, then it is far more likely that even an honest complainer may be mistaken. In such cases, miscarriages of justice can and do occur. Likewise, where the witness caught but a ‘fleeting glance’ of the perpetrator, misidentification may occur, even when the accused is someone to whom the witness is well known. The Scottish courts have recognised the problematic nature of such evidence, indeed it has been stated that where a prosecution depends on eyewitness identification, ‘the risk of a miscarriage of justice is notorious.’ This echoes the view of the Criminal Law Revision Committee in England, who regarded ‘mistaken identification as by far the greatest cause of actual or possible wrong convictions’. Research from the USA similarly suggests that mistaken identifications account for more miscarriages of justice than all other causes combined.

Wrongful convictions may result from two types of eye-witness identification errors. Even when observers have a perfect view of an event or person, they interpret rather than straightforwardly record what they are seeing, while their memory of what they have seen is unconsciously adapted over time. Thus there may, for example, be a tendency to persuade oneself that a person one sees is actually someone whom one knows, while in one’s memory of that event the individual perceived becomes more and more like that person. Moreover, while it is commonly supposed that an individual is more likely to recall an event vividly and accurately if it is especially traumatic, the reverse is actually true. It is also the case that the prejudices of the witness may significantly distort perception, and, even when not prejudiced, observers are much less accurate when identifying members of racial groups different to their own. A second error may occur when the fact-finder, particularly if this is a jury, assesses the identification evidence and affords it more weight than it merits, since juries tend to place great weight on identification evidence. Their faith in such evidence may often be misplaced, but it is usually difficult to assess whether the confidence of a witness in making a positive identification is well founded, and since such witnesses tend to be absolutely certain of the truth of what they are saying, cross-examination is rarely an effective means of testing the value of such evidence.

The problems of identification evidence are compounded in Scotland since we still permit dock identification of the accused as the perpetrator of a crime. Sometimes the purpose of this is simply to confirm that the person in the dock is indeed the person whom the witness has previously identified. However, dock identification can take a different form, where a witness has not previously been asked to make an identification at an identification parade. The appeal court has recognised that this type of dock identification is open to criticism and has stressed that trial judges should normally instruct juries on its dangers. These can include the fact that the witness is identifying someone they saw only once, perhaps some considerable time previously, that dock identification lacks the safeguards inherent in an identification parade, and that the accused is indeed sitting in the dock. (As a former prosecutor, one of us has had the experience of witnesses identifying the accused as the perpetrator solely on the basis that they assume the person in the dock must be the person who ‘did it.’) If a trial judge omits to warn a jury of these dangers, this will not necessarily lead to a conviction being overturned. Some years ago the Departmental Committee on Criminal Procedure in Scotland in its Second Report suggested that identification parades should replace dock identification, and that the latter should not be competent where the witness had failed to identify the accused at a parade. This was not acted upon, and the appeal court has rejected the argument that it is unfair to allow a witness to identify the person in the dock as the perpetrator, even where there was effectively only one person who could be identified, the court having been cleared. Several other appeal court decisions have upheld the acceptability of dock identification. This is a practice which ought to cease.

Given the risk of miscarriages of justice, trial judges should direct juries on the problematic nature of identification evidence, generally. However, precisely what a trial judge says in this connection is a matter for his or her discretion. In England, where a case rests on disputed identification evidence, the trial judge has to warn the jury of the need for caution before convicting on the basis of such evidence, explaining how it can be inaccurate, and making reference to its strengths and weaknesses in the case in question. Similar views have been expressed in other Commonwealth jurisdictions.

Moreover, the Scottish jury will not have the benefit of expert evidence on the dangers of mis-identification. The High Court has ruled against the admissibility of such evidence. This lack of expert assistance, coupled with the tendency, noted above, of juries to set particular store by such evidence, makes it doubtful how much impact judicial warnings have. In this context, the fact that juries tend to be convinced by such evidence means that the requirement of a two-thirds majority in favour of a guilty verdict – as proposed in the current Bill – is unlikely to represent much of a safeguard. Indeed the studies regarding the dangers of this type of evidence have all occurred in jurisdictions where similar safeguards are already in place.

An example of how reliance on such evidence can lead to miscarriages of justice is found in an American case where a man served 14 years' imprisonment for a crime he did not commit, ultimately being acquitted on the basis of DNA evidence:

‘Though … the rape victim … spent more than forty-five minutes with her attacker in her brightly lit home, spoke to him face-to-face, and took special care during the attack to make careful observations and notes in her mind of all the attacker’s identifying characteristics, … [she] identified the wrong man in a photographic identification, in a line-up, and at trial. She claimed to be “100% certain” of her identifications on all three occasions.’

It has been suggested that corroboration of eyewitness identification ought to be required in the USA. It would be ironic if Scotland were to dismantle this important safeguard at a time when other jurisdictions are considering its reintroduction.

As it currently operates, however, corroboration offers little safeguard in cases involving visual identification evidence. Lord Justice-General Emslie summarised the approach of the Scottish Courts: ‘where one starts with an emphatic positive identification by one witness then very little else is required. That little else must of course be evidence which is consistent in all respects with the positive identification evidence’. In other words, it is not necessary that at least two witnesses positively identify the accused as the perpetrator. If one witness does so, the requirements of corroboration are met if another witness testifies that the accused has the same build as the perpetrator, or is the same height and has the same hair colour as the perpetrator. It was enough in one case that the corroborating witness indicated that the accused resembled the perpetrator in terms of basic looks. In one case the corroborating witnesses picked out the accused at an identification parade as resembling the man she had seen in terms of build, hair colour and hair length. She had also picked out another individual as resembling the man she had seen, yet the court saw this as no barrier to her evidence having corroborative effect.

There is also the issue of how positive the primary identification evidence, which is corroborated by the ‘weak’ identification evidence, has to be. It is clear that the witness does not have to be entirely certain that the accused is the perpetrator. It amounts to a positive identification if a witness says that the accused is ‘very like’ the person they saw. The same is true if one witness testifies to being ‘80%’, and another to being ‘75%’ sure that the accused is the person they saw. It can be appreciated then that the retention of the corroboration requirement as it currently operates would not offer much of a safeguard in quite a number of cases. The central problem with visual identification evidence is related to its very nature. No doubt in broad terms the more witnesses who can identify an accused, the more likely it is that the identification will prove to be accurate, but given that such evidence is often inherently suspect because of the factors mentioned above, the mere extent of visual identification evidence is no guarantee of accuracy. It may therefore be necessary to concentrate on improving the quality of identification evidence through such devices as the guidelines provided for the authorities under Code D of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in England. The Bill represents an opportunity to strengthen aspects of the law of evidence. In 2004, Parliament recognised the legitimacy of admitting expert psychological or psychiatric testimony. It is suggested that a similar provision could be enacted which would allow evidence to be led from experts in the field of identification, in appropriate cases. Rather than trial judges merely warning of the dangers of accepting uncorroborated identification evidence, such testimony could explain the inherent unreliability of the human memory in certain types of situations.

(b) Confession evidence: The second area where consideration might be given to the retention of a corroboration requirement relates to evidence of an extra-judicial confession. While Scotland is unique in retaining a general corroboration requirement, it is not the only jurisdiction to have a requirement in relation to confessions. Most US states maintain such a requirement. According to the US Supreme Court, the foundation of this

‘lies in a long history of judicial experience with confessions and in the realization that sound law enforcement requires police investigations which extend beyond the words of the accused. Confessions may be unreliable because they are coerced or induced, and although separate doctrines exclude involuntary confessions from consideration by the jury, ... further caution is warranted because the accused may be unable to establish the involuntary nature of his statement. Moreover, though a statement may not be “involuntary” within the meaning of this exclusionary rule, still its reliability may be suspect if it is extracted from one who is under the pressure of a police investigation – whose words may reflect the strain and confusion attending his predicament rather than a clear reflection of his past.’

It is impossible to assess how frequently false confessions are made, but there is ample evidence that they do occur, and one study has found that almost a quarter of all wrongful convictions in the USA may be attributable to false confessions. Quite apart from the situation where the suggested confession was never in fact made, individuals do make false confessions for all manner of reasons. As the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice observed,

(i) people may make false confessions entirely voluntarily as a result for a morbid desire for publicity or notoriety, or to relieve feelings of guilt about a real or imagined previous transgression; or because they cannot distinguish between reality and fantasy;

(ii) a suspect may confess from a desire to protect someone else from interrogation and prosecution;

(iii) people may see a prospect of immediate advantage from confessing (e.g. an end to questioning or release from the police station) and

(iv) people may be persuaded temporarily by the interrogators that they really have done the act in question...

In our view, Scotland ought to retain the requirement of corroboration in relation to confessions.

In practice, a confession can almost corroborate itself, in the sense that corroboration can be found in the fact that the circumstances of the crime coincide with the confession. This approach might be seen to make perfect sense in cases like Manuel v HM Advocate where the confession revealed details which only the perpetrator could know: where the victim’s body and certain items of her clothing could be found. He then led the police to the body itself. In such a case, the concern that the confession might be fabricated is largely absent. However, the approach also seems to prevail when there is no such safeguard; it is no bar to conviction that the coincidence of the details of a confession with those of the crime providing corroboration are largely in the public domain, nor that while some of its points coincide with the details of the crime, others are actually at odds with those details.

It is apparent, then that the safeguard provided by the insistence that a confession must be corroborated has been significantly weakened, in practice. Special knowledge confessions can corroborate when the knowledge revealed is not so special, in that it is shared by many or could have been acquired other than by being the perpetrator of the crime. Indeed, a special knowledge confession can still corroborate even if parts of it are entirely inaccurate. To say that such matters are capable of being weighed by the jury is especially problematic, since it seems that juries are particularly impressed by confessions, thus the chances of being acquitted in such circumstances are very low, especially as judges in Scotland do not routinely warn juries of the dangers of relying on uncorroborated confessions, as happens in certain other jurisdictions. In contrast to identification evidence, the courts are more open to the admissibility of expert evidence in relation to the reliability of confessions. Thus experts can be heard on such matters as an accused’s peculiar susceptibility to pressure when questioned by the police, and the likelihood that several people who heard a confession being made would be able to recall it in almost identical terms. However, special circumstances must be present before expert evidence may be admitted.

It is recommended that Parliament should signal the continuing importance of corroboration in this area by retaining the requirement. For example, legislation could provide that:

> ‘A confession requires to be corroborated by evidence independent of the confession, except where the confession reveals special knowledge of the crime, the only reasonable explanation of which is that the accused was the perpetrator.’

Provision could also be made for expert testimony to be admitted, to explain to jurors that not all ‘confessions’ are genuine. Without such expert evidence to guide them, juries will struggle to fathom why an innocent person would confess to a crime. Simply requiring a two-thirds majority in favour of a guilty verdict is unlikely to provide any real safeguard, and certainly nowhere near as secure a safeguard as a proper corroboration requirement.
References

9. See generally Cutler and Penrod, n. 7 above, at 104.
14. 1975, Cmd 6218, paras 46.10 and 46.13.
18. Cutler and Penrod, n. 7 above, at 263 suggest the impact is minimal. See also R. C. Lindsay, G. L. Wells and C. M. Rumpel, ‘Can People Detect Eyewitness and Identification Accuracy Within and Across Situations?’ (1981) 66 Journal of Applied Psychology 79.

Murphy v HM Advocate 1995 SCCR 55.

Adams v HM Advocate 1999 JC 139.

Kelly v HM Advocate 1998 JC 35.

Gracie v Allan 1987 SCCR 364.

Nolan v McLeod 1987 SCCR 558.

Royal Commission on Criminal Justice (1993, Cm 2263).

R v Sykes (1913) 8 Cr App Rep 233 at 237.

As in Boyle v HM Advocate 1976 JC 32; where a soldier who had gone AWOL confessed to a bank robbery, because he preferred a civilian to a military prison.

1958 JC 41.

Gilmour v HM Advocate 1982 SCCR 590.

46  Gilmour v HM Advocate 1982 SCCR 590.

47  Campbell v HM Advocate 2004 SLT 397.
1. Introduction

1.1 The Glasgow Bar Association ("the GBA") was formed in 1959. The objects of the Association, as contained in its constitution, include the promotion of access to legal services and access to justice and to consider and, if necessary, formulate proposals and initiate action for law reform and to consider and monitor proposals made by other bodies for law reform. The GBA also offers legal education programmes and sponsors and supports legal education and debate at Scotland's Universities and Schools.

1.2 Today the GBA remains a strong, independent body. Its current member levels sit at around four hundred, by far the biggest Bar Association in the country. The GBA would encourage the Justice Committee to continue to seek its views on all legislative matters and is grateful to the Justice Committee for inviting our submission.

2. Section 57 Corroboration

2.1 The most significant and controversial proposal in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is found in section 57 and relates to the proposed abolition of the requirement for corroboration in criminal trials. The Glasgow Bar Association strongly opposes this proposal. The Scottish criminal justice system has for centuries required corroborated evidence before a citizen can be convicted of a criminal offence. We are strongly of the view that this important element of our justice system must remain.

2.2 The fact that a system is established is not justification in itself for its continued use and we welcome modernisation of the criminal justice system. However this proposal as advanced by Lord Carloway in his review has not been supported by any of the other Senators of the College of Justice and we are aware of widespread opposition to its implementation.

2.3 As the law presently stands it is a common misconception that corroboration in criminal cases means the requirement for two eyewitnesses to a crime. This is entirely inaccurate and it is well established that very little is required to provide corroboration of the testimony of one eyewitness. In addition, in certain circumstances evidence is considered to be self-corroborating. Examples of this are the presence of fingerprints or DNA at a crime scene. To provide an example, an undated but unexplained fingerprint at the scene of a robbery within a house would provide corroborated evidence that the person who left the print was the person who committed the crime.

2.4 It appears that the catalyst for the removal of corroboration is the apparent low conviction rate in sexual offences and in particular in allegations of rape. We are not convinced that removing the requirement for corroboration would significantly increase the conviction rate. Without any corroborating evidence the jury may be left with two competing accounts without any assistance as to which to believe. It is often the corroborating evidence, found for example in the evidence of a neighbour who heard the complainer's distress which assists the jury in their determination. We are not clear how potentially removing this evidence from the case would assist in increasing the chances of conviction.

2.5 Any change to the present system would require to be workable for criminal cases which are heard by a jury and those which are heard by a single Sheriff or Magistrate. It is well recognised that one of the most effective ways of ascertaining if a witness is telling the truth is to test that person's evidence against the corroborating witness, both of whom may claim to have seen the same conduct. There are many occasions in criminal trials when a witness may appear to be telling the truth until it becomes apparent through cross-examination of the second witness that the former cannot have been truthful in his/her account. It is of great concern to our members who practice in the criminal courts that this ability to test the crown case may be removed. We believe that the requirement for corroboration provides a safeguard for all parties which is essential in the criminal court system.

2.6 We have not been able to ascertain how such a new system of prosecutions would work. Would any allegation of a criminal offence made by one individual require to be proceeded with, no matter how unreliable or incredible that witness was nor how unlikely the chances of a successful conviction? This would significantly add to the workload of the prosecution service while the alternative would be requiring the police to act as judge and jury in assessing the strength of the case pre report to the fiscal. If one person’s word against another’s were to be the starting point for a criminal prosecution then the courts can look forward to allegations and counter-allegations which could continue indefinitely.

2.7 The requirement for corroboration along with the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt are the minimum safeguards which must apply in our criminal courts and we have heard no valid argument for their removal.

Glasgow Bar Association
30 August 2013
Police powers and rights of suspects (Part 1 of the Bill)

1. Part 1 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (the ‘Bill’) as introduced deals with arrest by police without warrant. In particular Section 1(2) introduces a general police power to arrest a person without a warrant in respect of an offence not punishable by imprisonment. Subsection 2 states that such an arrest can only take place in certain circumstances, namely only if the constable is satisfied that it would not be in the interests of justice to delay the arrest in order to seek a warrant. Subsection 3 attempts to define circumstances where the interests of justice would not be served by delay in arrest.

2. These commentators would suggest that the terms of Section 1(3) as currently drafted are framed in such a way as to be unclear in two respects. Firstly Section 1(3) requires a constable to have a reasonable belief as to a negative assertion; i.e. that if the person is not arrested without delay that the person will act as described in subsection 3(a) to (c). It is understood that the rationale for this is perhaps to require the constable concerned to make an assessment of risk but given that this judgement will require to be made when the constable is on active duty as the circumstances unfold, it is suggested that the test should be made as clear as possible.

3. It is suggested that the test could be better worded if it allowed a constable to arrest without a warrant if the interests of justice demanded an immediate arrest. Parts (a) to (c) could then outline factors that could be taken into account when making this assessment.

4. As currently drafted Section 1(3) is silent as to whether parts (a) to (c) are to be read as a cumulative list or if these form alternatives. This is important in the context of arrest without warrant as it is unlikely that a constable could have a reasonable belief that all three potential actions on the part of the person would take place and therefore this subsection would be little used in practice. However if the three parts (a) to (c) are read as alternatives their individual application is likely to be much more frequent. If the latter interpretation is to be adopted then it must be understood that constables could interpret these subsections widely thereby allowing for the arrest of persons for what could be regarded as minor offences.

5. Whilst the subsection and its parts would be open to judicial interpretation these commentators are of the view that if Section 1(3)(a) to (c) are left as currently drafted there is the very real possibility that persons could be arrested without a warrant for minor offences without any real justification. Doubtless operational guidance would be issued by Police Scotland on this issue but these commentators would prefer to see additional wording within the subsection to qualify the scope of the circumstances where such an arrest can take place to include:
An overarching condition that there must also be a reasonable belief on the part of the constable as to the existence of a risk to public safety arising from the actions of the individual at the time of the intended arrest.

6. It is suggested that this wording would ensure that any arrest with the mandatory consequence of being taken to a police station was a proportionate and justified response to any offence which would present a risk to public safety rather than one which was no more than a minor contravention of a statute.

7. Chapter 4 of the Bill as introduced sets out the rights of the suspect in custody or who attends voluntarily and in particular Section 24 sets out the right of such a person to have a solicitor present during interview and in Section 36 the right to a consultation with a solicitor at any time whilst being held in custody. These sections appear to represent a development of the rights enshrined in Section 15A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 introduced following the decision in Cadder v HMA [2010] UKSC 43.

8. These commentators welcome the simplification of the right of access to a solicitor by a person in custody to allow a private consultation to take place at any time during the period of custody and not just prior to or during questioning. In addition the Bill introduces a right to have a solicitor present during interview which did not previously exist in statute although anecdotally it is known that in certain situations (e.g. serious sexual offences) some police officers are content to allow solicitors to be present at interview whilst continuing to operate in terms of Section 15A.

9. What is of concern to these commentators is the lack of financial provision for the exercise of this new right on the part of a person in custody within the Financial Memorandum attached to the Bill. SLAB have since the inception of access to legal advice post Cadder kept full statistical information regarding requests for advice and how these are dealt with. Whilst accepting that we are moving further towards the English system in which there is 70% attendance by solicitors and acknowledging that the right to a consultation at any time will certainly increase the number of requests for consultation itself, there seems to be little reference to the cost implication of a solicitor being present during an interview. Whilst currently a grant of ABWOR can be made and will be paid if personal attendance can be justified in order to consult, under the provisions of the Bill the solicitor might be requested to be in attendance for the duration of the interview leading to an increase in ABWOR expenditure.

10. These commentators suggest that insufficient consideration has been given to potential additional costs here in terms of the Legal Aid budget. Experience tells us that if people are given a right they will use it and it must therefore be likely that there will be at least a reasonable number of persons in custody who assert their right to have a solicitor present at interview. In these circumstances it is only proper that solicitors called upon in these situations are properly remunerated.
Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms (Part 2 plus section 70 of the Bill)

11. There are implications in Section 57 of the Bill for the future of dock identification where no identification parade or similar procedure has taken place as a source of evidence which does not appear to have been considered. In Holland v H.M. Advocate 2005 I SC (PC) 3 Lord Rodger of Earlsferry at para 57 agreed with the Lord Justice Clerk that “except perhaps in an extreme case, there is no basis, either in domestic law or in the Convention, for regarding such [dock identification] evidence as inadmissible per se. The safeguards to which the Lord Justice-Clerk draws attention — the requirement for corroboration, the opportunity for counsel to contrast the failure to identify at the parade with the identification in the dock and to comment accordingly — are, of course, important. Their mere existence cannot be used, however, to justify the abstract proposition that in all cases in Scots law an accused who has been convicted on the basis of dock identification has necessarily had a fair trial.”

12. If the requirement of corroboration is removed it is at least theoretically possible that a case could be brought on the basis of a complaint from one witness that he was assaulted by an accused “who he could identify if he saw him again”. There would be no strict requirement to hold an ID parade. The case could come to trial and the witness could point out the accused in court as the person who committed the offence. Without the safety net of corroboration there is no way of knowing whether the accused has been picked out because he is in the dock.

13. Cases since Holland have quoted the comments of Lord Rodger and referred to the protection offered by corroboration. If that is removed might we have to look at making ID parades mandatory where dock identification is to be relied upon. Otherwise the accused has to rely on his defence team undermining the credibility or reliability of the eye witness and on the directions of the judge to the jury on the perils of eye witness identification. The LA’s guidelines on the subject are quite clear but they do not seem to be observed very closely, presumably for reasons of resourcing.

14. Section 63(1) has the effect of withdrawing from the accused the opportunity to make a judicial declaration when appearing before the sheriff to be committed for further examination or to be liberated in due course of law. Subsection 2 repeals the provisions on judicial examination. While it is acknowledged that persons appearing before the sheriff on petition rarely choose to emit a declaration, and while the use of judicial examination is saved mainly for murder cases, there seems to be no pressing reason to remove them.

15. The Explanatory notes and Policy Memorandum that accompany the Bill are silent as the reasons for the inclusion of Section 63 in the Bill other than to suggest that the abolition of judicial examination and the removal of the opportunity to make a declaration would become surplus to requirements if the proposals to grant the police extended powers to question a person officially accused of committing an offence contained in Sections 27-29 are passed, especially as the accused may also still make a voluntary statement to the police at any time (Policy Memorandum 92).
16. However, an accused person may in some circumstances prefer to make a declaration, duly tape recorded and lodged as part of proceedings, in the security of the court in the presence of an impartial judge. Furthermore, there may still be circumstances in which it would be expedient for the prosecutor to judicially examine an accused person and so unless the government can make out a more convincing case for abolition of these procedures; these commentators recommend that they remain available.

17. Section 69(2) amends Section 77(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and has the effect of removing from Section 77 the requirement that the accused, if he is able to do so, sign a written copy of the plea of guilty to an indictment or any part of it and that such plea be countersigned by the judge. This amendment seems to have emerged as one of the recommendations made by Sheriff Principal Bowen in his Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure
(See 9.4).

18. Apart from the assertion that the removal of the need to sign a plea of guilty will generate savings by allowing persons, presumably those accused remanded in custody pending trial to plead guilty remotely, (Financial Memorandum 243) it is nowhere explained in either the Explanatory Note or the Policy Memorandum which accompany the Bill why this step is considered to be necessary or advisable, or how it will benefit the smooth operation of proceedings or for that matter how great the savings might be. It is assumed that savings could be made in the cost of transporting accused from prison to court for a first diet to tender a guilty plea when it is clear that the matter could not be disposed of without first obtaining background reports, thus requiring the accused to appear in court on a further occasion. However, as has already been stated, no estimates are provided as to the possible savings.

19. Section 70(2) of the Bill inserts a new section, namely section 90ZA(1), into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which has the effect of increasing the number of jurors required to return a verdict of guilty (in both solemn and summary procedure) from 8 to 10. This means that a majority of two thirds will now be required to secure a conviction as opposed to the simple majority currently required.

20. The Bill also provides for situations where the total size of the jury falls below 15 members (see section 70(2) and the insertion of 90ZA(2)(a)-(c)). Where juror numbers decrease for whatever reason, the majority of at least two thirds will always be required. Thus if the total jury size decreases to 13 members for example, at least 9 jurors would have to be in favour of a verdict of guilty in order to secure a conviction.

21. One would expect to see clear reasons why the Government is specifically proposing to increase the number of jurors to 10, yet the Policy Memorandum simply states that the objective for choosing a two-thirds majority is to introduce an additional safeguard into the Scottish criminal justice system (Policy Memorandum 171). What is not even remotely clear is why a two-thirds majority as opposed to a larger majority has been deemed appropriate in providing such a fundamentally important 'additional safeguard' in the face of corroboration being abolished.
22. If we look at the current system where a jury could legitimately decrease from 15 to 12 members due to juror illness or other extenuating circumstances for example, the jury could still return a verdict of guilty so long as 8 of the jurors were in favour of such a verdict. If we compare this situation above to the proposed two-thirds majority (apparently offering such an ‘additional’ safeguard), the percentage of jurors required in order to secure a conviction is exactly the same. That percentage being 66%. (A majority of 8 to 4 in the first situation and 10 to 5 in the second). While it is acknowledged by these commentators that juries of 12 members are not commonplace in Scotland they are not rarities either.

23. It appears that the Scottish Government in its Consultation on Additional safeguards Following the Removal of the Requirement of Corroboration (the ‘Consultation’) only ever sought views on whether the majority required to return a conviction should be increased to either 9 or 10 jurors because this would provide a “less dramatic change to the current system”. Despite only being given the choice between 9 or 10 jurors, a significant number of respondents to the Consultation thought the majority should be higher than 9 or 10 in order to provide an additional safeguard. (http://www.scotland.gov.uk/publications/2013/06/7066).

24. These commentators are of the view that in the absence of any other safeguards proposed by the Bill, the two-thirds majority does not provide any real additional safeguard against potential miscarriages of justice. These commentators would suggest that in order to provide an additional safeguard a larger majority of at least three-quarters is required. In other words, 12 out of 15 jurors. Furthermore, this would have the effect of bringing the majority verdict required in Scottish in proportion with other Commonwealth adversarial systems. There is no compelling reason and certainly there are none offered by the Explanatory Notes or Policy Memorandum as to why the majority being proposed by the Bill should be much lower than other criminal justice systems.

25. In consulting on the possibility of a majority verdict being introduced, it was disappointing that no further consideration was given by the Government in potentially reducing the jury to 12 members and requiring a majority of 10, which is commonplace in many other common law countries. Despite the obvious financial savings in having fewer jurors to cite and pay expenses to, it seems entirely plausible and perfectly timed to consider such a change.

26. If corroboration is abolished by this Bill then juries will be asked to decide a person’s guilt or innocence based on the strength of that evidence and conceivably on the basis of single witness testimony and uncorroborated evidence. These commentators are of the view that a higher proportion of jury members being satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of an accused guilt would go some way to providing a safeguard for accused and victims of crime in jury trials.

Court procedures (Part 3 plus section 86 of the Bill)

27. The wider proposals for reform of Sheriff and Jury procedure contained in Part 3 of the Bill emphasise the importance to case management of the first diet by bringing procedure into line with that followed in High Court cases since 2004. If a case can be made for the economic benefits of enabling the accused to attend proceedings by way of live TV link, then it may make some sense to hold those first diets that it is known will result in a plea of not guilty by way of TV link from a remote location.

28. Some of the responses to the Bowen consultation expressed concern that the technology currently used to enable the accused to participate though live television link is not sufficiently robust to be used as a matter of course. (Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice, Reform of Sheriff and Jury Procedure: Analysis of Consultation Responses 8.8) If the equipment breaks down or television links are lost at crucial points it may increase the number of appeals or instances in which proceedings require to be adjourned. Even if the court room technology could always be relied upon, there is an important point of principle to be considered.

29. It was noted in the Analysis of the Consultation Responses 8.7 that to dispense with the accused’s attendance at proceedings at which he was to plead guilty was to detract from the gravitas of the situation and this commentator sees some force in this comment. To plead guilty to a case on indictment is a serious matter. To have the plea recorded on the accused’s behalf while he watches proceedings via a TV link removes an important aspect of the accused’s participation in proceedings. It detracts from the recognition of his personal responsibility for his situation.

30. At present the accused must sign his plea and if he has second thoughts he may refuse to sign, normally signaling the withdrawal of his representation and resulting in a delay in proceedings. However if that prevents the accused from subsequently making spurious allegations that he was persuaded to plead guilty, in order to secure a discount in sentence for example, so be it. Even if the accused is asked to confirm his plea of guilty via the television link and an audio recording is made of proceedings, there would still be greater scope for the accused to claim that in confirming the plea, he misunderstood the words of the judge or could not hear them sufficiently well to give him grounds to appeal. At present, the signing of the plea is a clear signifier of the accused’s acceptance of his situation and the courts will not normally permit a plea made on legal advice and signed by the accused to be withdrawn at a later date. See for example Crossan v H.M.Advocate 1996 SSSC 279.

31. In conclusion, these commentators are of the view that a compelling case for removing the need to sign a plea of guilty has not been made out. There is insufficient evidence that it would save time and money or to what extent, protects the accused’s representatives from allegations of defective representation and protects the accused in that he ultimately has the choice to sign, or not if he has doubts at the last moment. It is suggested that Section 69 be removed from the Bill.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland

HMICS welcomes the opportunity to comment on the provisions in the Bill and recognises that these propose significant change to criminal justice processes and police procedures and powers. We believe that the provisions will help to safeguard the rights of individuals who are subject to police investigation but will also provide opportunities to prevent harm to victims and communities in Scotland.

In accordance with the call for written submissions we have structured our comments based on the five themes.

Police powers and rights of suspects (Part 1 of the Bill)

It is this aspect of the Bill that will have the biggest impact on policing in Scotland. In general we welcome the provisions as they set out to clarify police powers and procedures governing the arrest and detention of individuals subject to criminal investigation.

We consider that there are a number of areas within Part 1 that would benefit from clarification in terms of the intention of the provisions including:

- The implications of the abolishment of common law powers of arrest on other common law powers e.g. powers of entry and powers to search.
- Section 9 of the Bill makes provisions for reviews of detention after 6 hours but doesn’t explain how that should be done.
- Section 19 (2) (c) allows the police to refuse to release a person from custody once charged with an offence, but does not give any indication of the reasons for such a decision.
- Sections 14 to 17 introduce the concept of Investigative Liberation. Clearly the service will welcome this power as a useful aid to preventing further crime and protecting victims and witnesses. However the restrictions that are proposed weaken the provision. For example in more serious cases police inquiries will last longer than 28 days, e.g. historic sexual abuse, homicide etc. In such cases the value of any conditions would be meaningless if lost after 28 days. Additionally the introduction of a review process with no details as to frequency or how they are to be conducted introduces a level of bureaucracy that may result in the provision being inefficient and ineffective. It may be more appropriate to remove the 28 day limit for solemn cases and introduce provisions for formal reviews to be conducted e.g. every fourteen days with the outcome of the review being noted in the person’s custody record.
- Sections 30 to 36 set out the rights of individuals taken into custody with particular reference to safeguards for children and vulnerable people and widened access to legal advice. We welcome these measures as a means of ensuring the fair and just treatment for all individuals that are taken into custody. However, with such provisions comes additional bureaucracy to
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Highland Violence Against Women

Please find the response by the Highland Violence Against Women Partnership, part of the Community Planning structure in Highland, outlined below. Statutory members in the partnership addressing Violence Against Women in Highland are NHS Highland, The Highland Council, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service and the Police. These members work in collaboration with a number of voluntary organisations on this issue, including Caithness & Sutherland Women’s Aid, Lochaber Women’s Aid, Inverness Women’s Aid, Ross-shire Women’s Aid, Victim Support, Witness Service and Children 1st.

Our Focus
The aspiration of the Highland Violence Against Women Partnership is to end Violence Against Women. We recognise that to end all forms of gender based violence we need to improve current approaches to tackling perpetrators, ensuring the safety of victims and their children, and to work with the public on changing attitudes and increasing understanding of the causes and consequences of Violence Against Women. We also believe that it is important to consider the human rights of victims of crime – all women and men have a right to be protected from rape and when individuals have been affected, they have a right of access to justice.

We respond to the consultation on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill from this viewpoint. In particular, we are responding to the proposal to abolish the need for corroboration and the suggested increase of a jury majority from 8 to 10 people.

Abolition of Corroboration
We welcome the proposal included within the Bill for the abolition of corroboration. We believe that this particular aspect of law disproportionately impacts on female victims as much of the violence they experience occurs in private spaces and is perpetrated by men known to them. We believe that the abolition of corroboration has the potential to increase conviction rates and, therefore, increase public safety; increase confidence in the criminal justice system for rape and domestic abuse victims; and will have the potential to deter future perpetrators. We recognise that a change in the way that these cases are dealt with in itself will not end Violence Against Women in Scotland, but it will send a clear public message that these issues are being taken seriously and that they are crimes.

We are, however, concerned that the abolition of corroboration will not be retrospective. Current media coverage of several, high profile, men who sexually abused children has, anecdotally, across the country, seen an increase in disclosures from adult survivors of child sexual abuse in a variety of settings, including to the police. It is widely recognised that many people affected by sexual violence in childhood or as an adult do not report to the police immediately after the event. This is for a variety of reasons including, fear they won’t be believed, embarrassment, feeling like it was their fault, worried about what the perpetrator might do, and/or feeling like it would be a waste of time as conviction rates are low. It must be recognised that people will continue to come forward about past experiences of sexual abuse and that these individuals should be afforded the same access to justice. By ensuring that the abolition of corroboration applies retrospectively, we believe that the Bill can go some way to providing this.

Increase in Jury Majority
We agree with the concerns raised in the Rape Crisis Scotland Briefing on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, July 2013, in relation to the increase in the jury majority required for verdicts from 8 to 10 people (from a total of 15). We believe that this is extremely problematic for cases involving sexual violence due to the existing evidence in relation to attitudes about rape. These rape myths are prevalent in everyday society and usually involve blaming the victim for what happened and negating the behaviour of the perpetrator. As research suggests such significant proportions of the population believe these myths we are concerned about the proposed increase required for a jury majority and would urge the Scottish Government to retain the simple majority of 8 for a verdict to be reached.

We believe that to increase the majority required has the potential to lead to an increase in the ‘not proven’ as well as the ‘not guilty’ verdict. We understand the ‘not proven’ verdict to be potentially as devastating as a ‘not guilty’ verdict for those who have experienced sexual violence and are already concerned that rape cases receive the highest acquittal rates for both ‘not guilty’ and ‘not proven’ verdicts. We are also concerned that the potential result of a ‘not proven’ verdict, as well as ‘not guilty’ verdicts is an increased risk of further repeat perpetration of sexual violence by the perpetrator as not only has justice not been served, but the person has received a powerful message that they can ‘get away with it’. We would suggest that cases of ‘not proven’ will increase with a requirement for an increased majority.

The ‘not proven’ verdict for cases involving sexual violence is also significantly higher than for cases in general. Of all crimes proceeded against in 2011-12, less than one percent (0.8%) were ‘not proven’. For rape and attempted rape, during this time period, 17% were ‘not proven’ and for sexual assault this rose to 69% of all cases. We are concerned that the proposal for an increase in the numbers of jurors required for a verdict will result in increased rates of ‘not proven’ for crimes of sexual violence, which is already disproportionate when compared with other criminal offences.

Further more, whilst we appreciate that there will always be cases that are very difficult for juries to make decisions about, for a whole range of factors, we believe that a ‘not proven’ verdict leaves victims of sexual violence in a state of limbo. We would not accept the argument that it would be preferable for victims to receive that verdict compared with one of ‘not guilty’ as they remain in a situation where no sentence as been received and closure has not been granted. We would urge the Scottish Government to consider reviewing ‘not proven’ as an option for verdicts.

Highland Violence Against Women
28 August 2013

---

1 Criminal Proceedings in Scotland 2011-12, Scottish Government, November 2012
2 Criminal Proceedings in Scotland 2011-12, Scottish Government, November 2012
ensure that the rights have been delivered correctly. These will introduce additional delays to prisoner processing and the overall investigative process, which may impact on the police’s ability to conduct relevant inquiries within the 12 hour time limits. We consider that it would be in the interest of the efficiency and effectiveness of the service and the interest of justice to suggest that provisions are made in serious cases for the extension of the 12 hour detention limit to 24 hours.

We recognise that the Bill itself may not be the appropriate place to specify the detailed intentions of the provisions and how they are envisaged as working. We suggest therefore that consideration is given to the development of a form of Codes of Practice to accompany the legislation that clearly articulate its meaning, intent and the processes and procedures required to achieve that.

Finally we suggest that the order in which Part 1 of the Bill is laid out may benefit from restructuring to follow the natural stages in the arrest and detention process as follows:

CHAPTER 1
POLICE POWERS AND DUTIES
Sections 1 – 2 Arrest without warrant
Insert here –
Sections 37 – 42 Powers of police
Sections 3 – 6 Procedure following arrest

CHAPTER 2
CUSTODY: PERSON NOT OFFICIALLY ACCUSED
Sections 7 – 13 Keeping person in custody
Remove and insert at * below -
Sections 14 – 17 Investigative liberation

Insert here –
CHAPTER 5
RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS IN POLICE CUSTODY
Sections 30 – 36 Intimation and access to another person; Vulnerable persons and Intimation and access to a solicitor.

Insert here –
CHAPTER 4
POLICE INTERVIEW
Sections 23 - 29 Rights of suspects
Followed by –
* Sections 14 – 17 Investigative liberation

Insert here –
CHAPTER 3
CUSTODY: PERSON OFFICIALLY ACCUSED
Sections 18 – 22 Person to be brought before court and Police liberation
CHAPTER 7
BREACH OF LIBERATION CONDITION
Sections 43 - 49

CHAPTER 8
GENERAL
Sections 50 – 56 Common law and enactments

Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms (Part 2 plus section 70 of the Bill)
We have no comments on this aspect of the Bill.

Court procedures (Part 3 plus section 86 of the Bill)
We have no comments on this aspect of the Bill.

Appeals, sentencing and aggravations (Parts 4 and 5 and sections 83 to 85 of Part 6 of the Bill)
We have no comments on this aspect of the Bill.

Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (Part 6 (section 87) of the Bill)
We have no comments on this aspect of the Bill.

HM Inspectorate of Constabulary
29 August 2013
The Howard League for Penal Reform in Scotland

The membership of the Howard League for Penal Reform in Scotland (HLS) is drawn from a wide range of disciplines connected to criminal justice. The executive committee consists of academics, lawyers, criminal justice practitioners, a GP, and a justice of the peace. There is an even balance of those who are professionally involved in victims groups, the criminal courts and the delivery of criminal justice services.

The aims of HLS are:
“The Howard League for Penal Reform in Scotland is an independent organisation whose members seek improvements to the criminal justice system in Scotland.

We believe it is time for criminal justice policy and systems to take a different direction, a direction with much more reliance on effective community approaches to reducing crime and dealing with criminality. A direction with much greater chance of success in reducing crime.”

The mission statement of the HLS is:
“Whilst still committed to Penal Reform — the improvement of Prison conditions and the promotion of rehabilitation — the Howard League Scotland is convinced that a steady reduction in the numbers of people committed to prison is essential and achievable. Howard League Scotland members have extensive experience across all aspects of the criminal justice system in Scotland. They have no rosy-eyed view either of the effects of crime nor of the nature of criminality, even in its most drastic forms. HLS shares these views with many others, not just in Scotland but across the UK. In pursuit of these aims we work closely with our sister organisation — the Howard League for England and Wales.

HLS does not represent individuals nor provide services, nor does it plan to. It is a fully independent body, representing an enormous amount of experience and active engagement — with members (including Committee members) at all stages of careers. It seeks to draw from the wisdom of this experience and engagement to promote realisable goals for Scotland’s criminal justice system and help promote effective pathways to achieving those goals — which include a sustained reversal of the increase in prison numbers.”

HLS welcome this opportunity to state their view on the provisions of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.
Part 1: Police Powers and Rights of Suspects

HLS welcome the introduction of a statutory duty on the police to treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of a child as a primary consideration when making decisions regarding that child (section 42).

HLS have no other comment to make on the draft sections in Part 1.

Part 2: Corroboration and related reforms

HLS do not accept that removal of the requirement of corroboration for criminal proof is necessary or desirable. In some contexts, the removal of the requirement might be thought likely to result in higher rates of conviction, for example in charges of sexual offences. HLS recognise that there has historically been a low conviction rate on charges of rape. However, HLS members have expressed a range of concerns about the proposal to remove the requirement of corroboration.

HLS recognise that corroboration has formed an important principle of the law of criminal evidence for a considerable time (e.g. Balfour’s Practicks, 1754). Criminal procedure and the law of evidence have developed together. The consequences of removing a fundamental requirement of criminal proof are uncertain. Corroboration is not an element of criminal proof which can be considered in isolation. The requirement for corroboration has a direct bearing on the investigation of crime by the police, the Crown’s decision to prosecute and the conduct of criminal trials. The implications of its removal are likely to be substantial and may be unforeseen.

Moreover, the HLS is opposed to reform of such a central element of the criminal justice system on the basis of a consultation exercise. HLS consider that it would be far preferable for the matter to be considered by the Scottish Law Commission (SLC), the statutory body charged with recommending reforms which are just, principled, responsive and easy to understand. The SLC have previously reported on hearsay and similar fact evidence. In the view of HLS, the SLC is the appropriate body to undertake the task of considering and reporting on substantive law reform of this sort.

A number of potential concerns arise from the removal of the requirement for corroboration:

- Under pressure of time and limited resources, police officers may carry out less thorough investigations if corroboration of a charge is not required, with the potential for miscarriages of justice;

- The prosecution may find it more difficult to apply the test of whether a prosecution has a reasonable prospect of conviction where the only potential evidence of guilt is contained in the police statement of a single witness; it may be impossible to sift out vindictive or inaccurate complaints prior to trial;

- Precognitions are no longer obtained by the Crown where the decision to prosecute is made, so there is no further sifting of cases in which the evidence of a single witness may readily be shown to be incredible or unreliable; there may be an increase in prosecutions where there is, objectively, no realistic prospect of proof of a criminal charge;

- If a single witness gives evidence that a crime has been committed and the accused committed it, the trial judge would be unable to withdraw the charge from the jury no matter how obviously unsatisfactory the evidence of that witness is; time and expense are likely to be wasted in such situations, with a greater prospect of miscarriages of justice occurring;

- the prosecution of charges where there is no realistic, or very poor, prospects of proof of a criminal charge would unnecessarily and unfairly put witnesses and victims through the ordeal of giving evidence.

- Careful consideration is required of the present jury system of majority verdicts if the requirement for corroboration is removed; it would be substantively unjust in many cases for an accused to be convicted on the evidence of a single witness whose evidence is rejected as incredible or unreliable by 7 members of a jury; the precise number to constitute a jury and a just majority system requires careful thought; a recommendation on these matters should only be formed after careful consideration of the Scottish system and a comparative analysis of foreign jurisdictions; that work is most transparently and effectively undertaken by the SLC.

The requirement for corroboration in criminal proof operates as part of the finely balanced system of criminal justice. HLS have serious reservations about changes to this isolated area following a public consultation exercise. The SLC have the particular expertise to carry out research and impartially consider the impact of the proposals. It is not clear why the SLC have not been consulted on the proposal contained in the Bill. That omission is particularly concerning where the Senators of the College of Justice (as the senior judiciary in Scotland) are unanimous in recommending that the requirement for corroboration is not removed (with the exception of Lord Carloway).

Part 3: Court procedures

HLS welcomes the simplification of the constitution of a jury and requirements for returning a verdict. HLS however consider that the majority required to convict on a charge is a matter which should be considered by the SLC along with the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration. If both sections are made law, a person may be convicted on the evidence of a single witness where 5 members of the jury found that witness could not be believed. By contrast, in England and Wales, the majority required for a guilty verdict is 10 to 2. Some jurisdictions require unanimity.

Part 4: Sentencing and appeals

The HLS recognise the harm caused to individuals and the damage caused to society through the prevalence of offensive weapons. HLS support measures to reduce the number of weapons carried and used in the commission of crime. However, HLS do not believe that an increase in sentences for carrying offence weapons is the most effective means of preventing offending and rehabilitating offenders. An increase in the maximum sentence available is likely to result in an escalation of sentences for carrying offensive weapons.

A change in the culture of carrying or using offensive weapons is likely to be more effective than any deterrent effect of an increase in sentences.

The combined effect of clause 78 and 81 is to remove the inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal to cure a miscarriage of justice in the most highly exceptional circumstances (through exercise of the nobile officium). The Court has repeatedly affirmed that this is a very limited jurisdiction. However, where the clearest miscarriage of justice has occurred in a prosecution and through no fault of the convicted person a time-limit is missed, the proposed amendments to the 1995 Act would remove the ability of the Court of Criminal Appeal to consider the matter. The removal of this very limited jurisdiction is an unnecessarily draconian step, which in due course, is likely to result in miscarriages of justice.

Howard League for Penal Reform in Scotland
30 August 2013
Introduction

1. JUSTICE is a UK-based human rights and law reform organisation, whose mission is to advance justice, human rights and the rule of law. JUSTICE is regularly consulted upon the policy and human rights implications of, amongst other areas, policing, criminal law and criminal justice reform. It is the UK section of the International Commission of Jurists. On Scottish matters it is assisted by its branch, JUSTICE Scotland.

2. In general terms, we welcome the Bill as a means of bringing forward reforms to the Scottish criminal justice system, particularly to amend changes brought about through the emergency legislation hastily enacted in response to the Cadder case\(^1\) that recognised the right of access to a lawyer during police detention. The Bill follows extensive consultation over the past few years by the Government, through dedicated enquiries and cabinet reviews. We have responded to many of these in great detail. For ease of reference, we do not repeat that detail here, but refer to those responses which can be found on our website.\(^2\) We agree that reform has been needed for some time to the arrest and detention procedure. The Bill allows the Scottish Parliament to focus on how the system might be improved. We have some suggested amendments to the proposed reforms, informed by standards provided in England and Wales under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, and research that JUSTICE has been engaged with for the past two years in police stations in Scotland.\(^3\) However, we continue to have concerns regarding proposals for other reforms to the criminal law, in particular, the abolition of corroboration and restrictions on appeal, which we do not consider have yet been justified, nor appropriate replacements envisaged.

3. We have focussed on particular elements of the Bill in our written evidence below. Silence with regard to any sections should not be taken as acceptance of the proposal.

---

\(^1\) Cadder v HM Advocate [2010] UKSC 43

\(^2\) See the Scottish section of our website http://www.justice.org.uk/pages/policy-work-events-and-news.html and in particular our response to the Carloway consultation where we set out comparative legal provisions and relevant case law.

\(^3\) J. Blackstock, E. Cape, J. Hodgson, A. Ogorodova, T. Spronken, Inside police custody: an empirical account of suspect’s rights during police detention, (Intersentia, forthcoming). The research was conducted in two sites in England and Wales, France, the Netherlands and Scotland, with an average of two months spent in each site.
Part 1 – Arrest and Custody

Chapter 1
Sections 1 – 2: Statutory power of arrest

4. Whilst JUSTICE Scotland welcomes the decision to place the power of arrest on a statutory footing, the clear benefit of creating a legislative framework to govern police powers of compulsion is to sufficiently circumscribe those powers, to promote public confidence and to enhance legal certainty both for individuals and for police officers exercising those powers. We are concerned, however, that the powers set out in Sections 1 – 2 do not satisfy these benefits by being overly broad. We would welcome amendment of these provisions to make it clear that the power of arrest must be exercised proportionately. For example, in England and Wales, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 provides that a person should only be arrested where it is necessary for a limited number of purposes. These are in order to prevent the person arrested: a) causing physical injury to himself or any other person; (b) suffering physical injury; (c) causing loss of or damage to property; or (d) making off before a constable can assume responsibility for him. Some of these justifications are recognised in section 1(3), in the context of arrest without warrant for non-imprisonable offences, but are still not circumscribed with sufficient detail.

5. With regard to arrest for non-imprisonable offences we are concerned with the principle that the provisions in Section 1 would extend the power of arrest without warrant, in a range of circumstances, to relatively minor offences not attracting a custodial sentence. We find it difficult to assess any circumstances in which it might be necessary and/or proportionate to deprive someone of his liberty, albeit temporarily, in order to properly investigate a relatively minor offence for which a later power of arrest could be obtained by warrant, or more appropriately, a summons to court. If this power is to remain, further proscription of the power as set out in paragraph 4 above is essential to limit the likelihood of an interference with the right to liberty pursuant to Article 5 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) or the right to respect for private life pursuant to Article 8 ECHR.

Section 5 – Information to be given at police station

6. Section 5(2) lists the information about which a person must be informed when taken into police custody. Section 5(2)(b) refers to other sections of the Bill where substantive rights are set out. Section 33 should be included in the notification of information, regarding support for vulnerable persons, as this is a matter upon which persons with vulnerability should be informed. The assistance of an appropriate adult is a right that a suspect retains. The constable assessing vulnerability may not appreciate that a suspect is in need of assistance. By informing the suspect that support is available, they may be able to indicate whether this is needed, which will assist the constable in making their assessment pursuant to Section 33. Section 24 should also be included in this list, so that the suspect knows from the outset that they have not only a right to consult with a solicitor, but that the solicitor can accompany them to any interview.

7. Furthermore, no right to interpretation or translation is set out in the Bill. This right must be notified under Section 5(2) and inserted as an additional provision. It is fundamental that suspects held in police custody are provided with the assistance of an interpreter and that certain documents are translated to assist them, in order to ensure that they understand the process and can communicate with their lawyer, should they request one and the police. It is also necessary to include notification and provision of the right pursuant to EU directive 2010/64/EU on the right to interpretation and translation in criminal proceedings and directive 2012/13/EU on the right to information in criminal proceedings.

Chapter 2
Section 7 – Authorisation for keeping a person in custody

8. Section 7 provides the circumstances in which an arrested person may continue to be detained in police custody following arrest. It only applies to persons arrested without a warrant. Since a warrant only authorises the arrest of a person, we consider it necessary that the section apply to both those arrest without and with a warrant.

9. We welcome the provision in Section 7(3) that authorisation may only be given by an officer who has not been involved in the investigation of the suspected offence. However, we do not consider this goes far enough to ensure that a fair and objective decision is made. Upon arrival at the police station, the investigating officer presents the suspect to the custody sergeant. This is the person who should authorise the decision as to whether the suspect should remain in custody. The custody sergeant is independent, may be of senior rank to the investigating officer, but most importantly, is responsible for the welfare and control of the suspect during detention.

Section 10 – Test for sections 7 and 9

10. We welcome the test set out in Section 10 since it focuses on whether continued detention is necessary following arrest in order for the police or prosecution to make the decision whether to charge. However, Section 10(2)(a) as drafted provides that regard may be had to ‘whether the person’s presence is reasonably required to enable the offence to be investigated.’ We believe this test to be set too low, given the incursion of the suspect’s liberty. The person’s continued detention must be necessary to enable the offence to be investigated otherwise there is insufficient justification to keep him in custody.

Section 11 – 12 hour limit: general rule

11. The six hour detention period was extended to 12 hours by way of the emergency legislation. We did not believe a case had been made out for the extension then, nor has one since. The justification at that time was a concern that the introduction of solicitors to police stations would delay the investigation, risking the six hour period of detention expiring prior to a decision being taken as to charge. This has not happened. In practice, most solicitors are able to attend a police station.

---

4 OJ (26.10.10) L 280/1
5 OJ (1.06.12) L 142/1
6 Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010
within a matter of hours. We therefore consider that the maximum period of detention should be six hours. In complex cases, the possibility to extend the period up to 12 hours could be made available upon the decision of a senior ranking officer.

Section 14 – Release on conditions

12. Section 14 provides for the possibility of conditions to be placed upon a suspect who is released from police custody prior to charge where a constable considers it necessary and proportionate to impose such conditions for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation. Whilst we have no concerns about release on condition in principle, firstly we believe that the decision should be taken by an officer of the rank of inspector or above, as has been provided for in Sections 9, 16 and elsewhere for decisions concerning the suspect’s detention. This will ensure that the decision is taken by an officer independent of the investigation and with seniority to the investigating officer. Secondly we consider that the conditions that could be imposed must be set out in the legislation by way of an exhaustive list, to ensure that officers exercise their powers within reasonable limits and uniformly across the Police Service.

Section 16 – Modification or removal of conditions

13. Section 16 provides for the review of conditions imposed upon release by a constable of the rank of inspector or above, but it does not specify a period for such review. The review must be carried out at reasonable intervals between the release from custody and the end of the 28 day period of release upon conditions, provided in Section 14. We would propose seven day intervals of review to be reasonable, so as to ensure that the investigation is being pursued throughout the period of conditional release.

Chapter 3

Chapter 4

Section 23 – Information to be given before interview

14. Section 23(2) states that ‘Not more than one hour’ before a constable interviews a person about an offence, they must inform the suspect of their right to silence, to have a solicitor present in interview with them and to the other rights under Chapter 5. The time period specified is far too short to enable the suspect to exercise their rights effectively. Should a suspect wish to have consultation with a solicitor, as provided by Section 36, this will have to be organised. The SLAB Solicitor Contact Line must be contacted by the investigating officer, which must take sufficient details concerning the case in order to instruct a solicitor. Contacting a solicitor to act on the suspect’s behalf will take over half an hour. Once the solicitor has agreed to act, they may speak to the suspect by telephone prior to attending. They will need travel time to attend at the police station from their location. The suspect is then entitled to consult with their solicitor prior to interview. In order to allow for proper discussion and advice we suggest that allowance should be made for the consultation to last not less than half an hour. In complex cases it may take considerably longer. With respect to assistance from a parent, guardian, appropriate adult or interpreter, this may also take over an hour to organise and for the relevant person to attend.

15. In our view the suspect should be informed of the rights contained in Section 23, at the point in time specified in Section 5. The omission at Section 5 is to notify the suspect of their right to have a solicitor present during interview, as provided in Section 24, which as we set out above, should be included at Section 5. If the intention of Section 23 is to repeat the rights available to the suspect, it should state that the person must be informed not less than two hours before interview of the rights set out in Section 23, where these have not already been exercised. To repeat the rights unnecessarily and out of context can only serve to confuse suspects about what their rights are and can lead to them not exercising them effectively when they may well benefit from the assistance of a particular right.

Section 24 – Right to have a solicitor present

16. Section 24 provides that a person has the right to have a solicitor present while being interviewed. This does not adequately describe a solicitor’s role, as understood in the judgment of the UK Supreme Court in Cadder. The section should specify that a person has the right to be assisted by a solicitor while being interviewed. This would ensure that a solicitor is able to make appropriate interventions on behalf of their client so as to effectively represent their interests. Section 24(4) provides that a constable may proceed to interview without a solicitor present in certain specified circumstances. As in the instances above, this is a decision concerning the exercise of the rights of the suspect whilst in police custody. It must therefore be taken by an independent officer of the rank of inspector or above, so that the decision is objective and fair in the circumstances. Furthermore, the exceptions to this requirement should be more tightly drawn so as to reflect the fact that Strasbourg has indicated that access should be allowed unless there are compelling reasons, in light of the particular circumstances of the case, to restrict that right.7

Section 25 – Children and waiver of legal advice

17. Broadly, Section 25 provides that children under 16 cannot consent to the waiver of their right to have a solicitor present. In effect, this will ensure that children cannot be interviewed without their having received legal advice in some form. We welcome this provision. Children in custody are particularly vulnerable and although accompanied by a relevant person in interview, that relevant person – often a parent or guardian - may have minimal or no experience of custody, little understanding of gravity of the offence which the child has been arrested in connection with, and no grasp of the significance of the right to have a solicitor present.

18. The Bill would exclude children aged 16 and 17 from this waiver, but would provide that they can waive consent only with the approval of their relevant person. We consider that many of the same risks will apply to all under 18s as apply to those aged 16 and under. The Bill may be designed to recognise that older children and young adults have increasing cognitive capacity and competence to understand complex decision making and to take responsibility for their own choices. However, this approach is somewhat undermined as the determinative decision on waiver will ultimately be taken by the relevant person in many cases. The relevant person will often be in a significant position of responsibility and able to influence the decision of the young person in custody. Parliamentarians may wish to ask the Scottish Government to further explain the rationale behind this two step approach to under 18s and waiver. If the Bill is to adopt the distinction between under and over 16 year olds, we consider that it will be important to ensure that both the relevant person and the young person in custody are given clear guidance on the right to legal representation, the significance of the right to legal representation and the relevance of the waiver decision. In all circumstances this information should be provided in an accessible format which both the young person and the relevant person assisting them can readily understand. The requirement that this guidance be given should be statutory.

7 Salduz v Turkey (2009) 49 EHRR 19, para 55.

Sections 27-29 – Post-charge questioning

19. Section 27(1) allows for the questioning of a person after being accused of having committed the offence. This is immediately followed by the limitation of questioning to cases where it is in the interest of justice to do so (Section 27(2)) and where it satisfies a three-part test of determining: (i) the seriousness of the offence; (ii) the ability to have questioned the accused person pre-charge about the offence; and (iii) that the information, having been obtained earlier would have cleared the accused of any wrong-doing (Section 27(3)). JUSTICE Scotland considers that the perceived value of post-charge questioning is overstated and is unsure of what value it will add in the Scottish context. For offences such as terrorism which may require post-charge questioning, enabling provisions already exist.

20. From our perspective, the general prohibition on post-charge questioning should be retained as: it prevents unfairness to and oppression of suspects and it may be contrary in certain instances to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. As explained in our response to the Consultation, JUSTICE Scotland considers that any expansion of post-charge questioning must be accompanied by a legal framework providing safeguards in line with the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Human Rights. These include that:

- the post-charge questioning deals with evidence which has come to light after charges were brought;
- the total period of post-charge questioning last for no more than 5 days in aggregate;
- the presence of the accused’s lawyer is necessary during any questioning;
- review of the transcripts from questioning after it has occurred by the same judge who authorised the post-charge questioning to ensure it remained within the prescribed scope of questioning;

---

8 Counter Terrorism Act 2008.
10 Memorandum from Professor Clive Walker, Centre for Criminal Justice Studies, School of Law, published in Joint Committee on Human Rights, Counter-Terrorism Policy and Human Rights (Eighth Report): Counter-Terrorism Bill (HL 50/HC 199: 7 February 2008)
11 Ibid, Para 37.
• the questioning be completed within the allotted time; and
• post-charge questioning should be limited to the period before the commencement of a trial.

21. We welcome the acknowledgement in the Bill that post-charge questioning must end when a trial is commenced. It is also important that any questioning will be authorised by a judge and that the individual concerned will be able to make representations. However, many of the other safeguards are omitted. Importantly, the test to be applied by the relevant judge, as proposed in Section 27, is extremely vague. An ‘interests of justice’ test is extremely flexible and is clearly not limited to circumstances where new evidence comes to light which was not available at the time when the investigation leading to charge was ongoing. Equally there is no statutory time limit for the questioning authorised. Although the judge has the discretion to set a time frame for the questioning, there is no statutory framework for that discretion proposed, beyond that it be in the interests of justice. In theory, the time-scale set by order could provide for questioning over a period of months during a significant pre-trial period. Significantly, there is no provision, beyond authorisation, for judicial supervision. The rationale of the JCHR was that without supervision, there would be a significant potential for post-charge questioning to be abused. JUSTICE Scotland would urge the Committee to consider a recommendation that this provision – if not removed – should be amended to reflect the clear safeguards above.

Chapter 5
Section 30 – Right to have intimation sent to another person

22. Section 30(5) affords to a constable the power to delay the exercise of intimation. We repeat as set out above in relation to Section 24 that this decision should be made by an officer independent of the investigation of the rank of inspector or above.

Section 31 – Right to have intimation sent: under 18s

23. Section 31(4) distinguishes between juveniles under 16 or over 16 in relation to whether a constable should continue to contact a parent or guardian to attend at the station on their behalf where it has been difficult to reach them. We do not believe this distinction should be made between these age groups. A 16 or 17 year old child may become impatient at waiting for assistance and decide that intimation is no longer necessary simply to seek to avoid further delay and detention in the police station, rather than because they no longer need the support. Section 31(4)(b) should be deleted.

Section 32 – Right to under 18s to have access to other person

24. Section 32(3) again makes provision for the refusal of access in exceptional circumstances. As with other exercise of this power, the decision must be taken by an independent officer of the rank of inspector or above.
Section 33 – Support for vulnerable persons

25. Section 33(1) distinguishes between adults and juveniles with regard to whether they need assistance owing to a mental disorder. We do not think the distinction ought to be made. It cannot be assumed that a parent is able to provide appropriate assistance to a child with a mental disorder. The officer should make enquiries of the parent as to whether further assistance is needed, and have the residual discretion to obtain further support where they consider it necessary, even if the parent does not.

Section 34 – Power to make further provision

26. Section 34(1) provides that the Scottish Ministers may amend by regulations section 33(1)(c) and 33(3). It should be made clear by the Justice Secretary to what end these amendments may be made and we would encourage the Committee to seek clarification as to the purpose of this section.

Section 36 – Right to consult with a solicitor

27. Section 36(2) again makes provision for the refusal of access in exceptional circumstances. As with other exercise of this power, the decision must be taken by an independent officer of the rank of inspector or above.

28. We do not agree with the provision in Section 36(3) that appropriate consultation may be provided through telephone advice. Solicitors are unable to adequately advise their clients by telephone alone since they are unable to assess the suspect’s welfare and demeanour; nor does the solicitor have the same opportunity for access to information from the police concerning the suspected offence. Furthermore, the solicitor cannot readily make effective representations to the police concerning the decision to charge or further detain if they only advise their client by telephone. Allowing solicitors to give advice only by telephone risks condoning the provision of inadequate advice. We would therefore propose that Section 36(3) be amended to provide that ‘consultation means consultation in person but initial advice may be by such means as may be appropriate in the circumstances and includes (for example) consultation by means of telephone.’ As stated above in relation to Section 24, the exceptions to this requirement should be more tightly drawn so as to reflect the fact that Strasbourg has indicated that access should be allowed unless there are compelling reasons, in light of the particular circumstances of the case, to restrict that right.

Chapter 6
Section 37 – Use of reasonable force

29. Whilst we welcome the setting out of the need to use reasonable force, we consider it necessary to define what reasonable force entails, and when it may be used, in order to ensure that all police officers apply the power uniformly. The use of force must be legitimate in the circumstances, not excessive, and never applied
The provision of clear guidance, training and support for officers on when force will be reasonable and proportionate is essential.\textsuperscript{12}

Sections 39 - 40 – Power of search etc on arrest

30. Sections 39 - 40 concern the powers of police officers to search persons, seize an item from them and to place them in an ID parade. For completeness and to ensure the power is used appropriately, we consider it necessary to include at Section 40(2)(a) that the subsection applies to a person who is in police custody having been \emph{lawfully} arrested without a warrant. By inserting 'lawfully' the section ensures that the power is used in accordance with the appropriate exercise of the power to arrest.

31. Further, since these powers are now placed on a statutory footing, we consider it necessary to set out when each power may be exercised. In relation to search, this must be on the basis of a reasonable suspicion that an illicit item (including any item which might be used to cause harm to himself or others), or item connected with a suspected offence, is concealed on the person. In relation to seizure, this must be on the basis that the item may present a danger to the public, is illegal, or is evidence in the commission of an offence. In relation to an identification parade, there must be a necessity for a witness to identify the suspect in connection with a suspected offence, and an identification parade must be the most appropriate means of securing that identification. Statutory proscription of the conditions of any search and the treatment of property seized would also be appropriate.\textsuperscript{13}

Section 42 – Duty to consider child’s best interests

32. We welcome the statutory provision of the child’s best interests as a primary consideration. We are concerned however that the Section includes the possibility of holding a child in police custody. Custody should be used as a last resort in relation to children and for the shortest possible time.\textsuperscript{14} Rather, where their arrest is deemed necessary, a child must be taken to a place of safety. The Section should be re-drafted to reflect this as the standard procedure, and police custody only in circumstances of last resort where no other accommodation is available.

---

\textsuperscript{12} The current guidance given by the Crown Prosecution Service in connection with the prosecution of police officers in England and Wales alleged to have acted excessively, provides: Where force is alleged to have been used in the prevention of crime or arrest of an offender necessity may not equate with reasonableness. The following must be considered: the nature and degree of force used a) the seriousness of the offence which is being prevented or in respect of which an arrest is being made; b) the nature and degree of any force used against an officer by a person resisting arrest. See http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/a_to_c/allegations_of_criminal_offences_against_the_police/

\textsuperscript{13} In England and Wales, these powers are expressly governed by provisions in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and further guidance given in the associated Codes of Practice. These measures provide for greater certainty of police powers on arrest. For example, search on arrest (PACE, Section 32), searches of detained persons (PACE, Section 54). PACE Code D deals in detail with the issue of police identification. It, for example, explains that where suitable, for example, video identification should be used as an alternative to an identification parade.

\textsuperscript{14} Article 37 UN Convention on the Rights of the Child
Part 2
Corroboration of Statements

Section 57 Corroboration not required.

33. The Bill proposes that in future criminal proceedings in Scotland, a judge sitting alone or with a jury will be able to find a fact proved without corroboration. This would implement one of the most controversial recommendations of the Carloway review.

34. As we stressed in our earlier submissions, JUSTICE Scotland does not support the proposed removal of the rule of corroboration. Corroboration is still considered by many to be the mainstay of Scots criminal law and it is a principle around which the investigation and prosecution of crime in Scotland have long been formed. We are concerned that the seriousness of this change has not been sufficiently grasped by the Scottish Government. In order to effect such a profound change to our law of evidence and procedure, Parliament must be satisfied that the proposals which will replace it will maintain not only fair trial standards for persons accused of crime but will instil within the public at large confidence that our system of criminal justice will ensure, as far as possible, that the guilty will be convicted and the innocent acquitted. We are not persuaded that the case has been made for such a significant change to the criminal law in Scotland, nor have sufficient safeguards against ill-founded prosecutions and miscarriages of justice been proposed. In summary:

- The Carloway Review did not identify any specific problem with the operation and application of the doctrine of corroboration in practice. Before the conduct of this review, there was little or no discussion of the need to change the rule of corroboration, whether by practitioners or civil society. We find it difficult to identify why the changes prompted by the decision in Cadder could justify such a wholesale change to the law without further evidence to support the case for reform.

- Without provision for alternative mechanisms to protect the quality of evidence, the right of the accused to a fair trial and the credibility of our criminal justice system, we are concerned that the removal of the requirement for corroboration is highly likely to lead to miscarriages of justice. In our earlier submissions, we stressed our concern that the Review – and the subsequent Consultation – did little to address the risk of miscarriages of justice. We return to this issue below.

- The Review focused predominantly on the rights of victims, and particularly, vulnerable victims and victims of sexual offences. We acknowledge that there has been some concern expressed about the implications of the need for corroborative evidence on the prosecution and investigation of some types of offence. However, we are concerned that the Review did not conduct a full investigation into the implications of corroboration for the effective prosecution of sexual and other sensitive offences and other means of protecting victims in those cases. We are concerned that there is no direct evidence that removal of corroboration alone will improve prosecution rates. In many countries where corroboration is not required, prosecution rates for sexual offences remain low (see for example, the long history of investigation of the low rate of conviction for rape in England and Wales). In any event, if the requirement for corroboration is removed, without appropriate consideration of safeguards to protect the safety of any ultimate conviction, this will be to the detriment not only of the criminal justice system but individual victims. If convictions are unsafe, we run the risk not only that the wrong people will be unfairly and unlawfully convicted, but that the true perpetrators of those crimes will go free.

35. We are not satisfied that any sufficient safeguards are proposed on the face of the Bill and we remain gravely concerned about the future of Scottish criminal law in the absence of corroboration. We consider that, without significant change, successful challenges to convictions under Article 6 ECHR as miscarriages of justice and incompatible with the right to a fair hearing are inevitable, whether before the Appeal Court, the UK Supreme Court or the European Court of Human Rights. The obvious points for challenge will arise in those areas of evidence where – as in historical miscarriage of justice cases identified by JUSTICE in our work in England and Wales – the risk of miscarriage of justice is most obvious: identification evidence, disputed expert testimony and the admissibility and weight to be afforded to confessions.

36. We are concerned that the only proposed amendment to the Scots system of criminal justice provided to try to compensate for the removal of corroboration will be a shift in the proportion of jury members needed for conviction from a bare majority to a majority of two-thirds (10 of 15, with adjustments for smaller juries). As noted in our response to the consultation, this measure, taken alone is altogether insufficient to compensate for the removal of corroboration. As a minimum, the consensus required in England and Wales for a conviction without corroboration is more robust (10 of 12 jurors, only after direction by a judge that a majority verdict will be accepted following an appropriate period attempting to secure unanimity). None of the other safeguards in place in systems where formal requirements for corroboration have been removed were considered seriously by the Consultation, nor are they proposed by this Bill. We are anxious that without these specific statutory safeguards, there will be inadequate, or perhaps even no, opportunities for judicial oversight of the quality and strength of the evidence in a prosecution case. Since, without a formal requirement for corroboration, quality of evidence will be at the heart of a criminal trial, this should be a serious concern for Parliamentarians. As we explained in our earlier submissions, without further protections to preserve the presumption of innocence, the right to silence, the prosecutorial burden of proof and the standard of proof ‘beyond reasonable doubt’, and the possibility to exclude unfairly prejudicial evidence, the likelihood of miscarriages of justice is high.

37. The prosecutorial burden of proof means that it is for the State to prove its case against any accused. The high criminal standard of proof serves a similar purpose: to ensure that the triers of fact, whether judge or a jury, set a high bar for conviction. We are concerned that after the removal of the requirement of corroboration, it is unclear what steps will be taken to ensure that these standards remain in place. While we expect that the Government intends that directions will be given to police, prosecutors and judges to ensure that cases are only presented and prosecuted when evidence is sufficient to secure a conviction, the tests proposed for Scotland have not been explored or provided to Parliamentarians for scrutiny. This should be a matter of significant concern. Equally, judicial oversight of the sufficiency and quality of evidence is crucial. Without clear guidance and control on sufficiency and standards of evidence, the jury will be the ultimate arbiter of fact, but will also be required to adopt an entirely subjective assessment of the sufficiency of evidence in any individual case. Against this background, clearly any or only 'some' evidence could be deemed sufficient, bringing a real risk of serious inconsistency. This standard is no standard at all and would clearly violate the right to a fair hearing as protected by Article 6 ECHR.

38. Furthermore, there is no provision in the Bill to provide for judicial oversight and control in cases where a prosecution is clearly ill-founded, or the evidence presented involves a bare sufficiency, but unacceptably, poor quality (for example, by statutory provision for submissions of no case to answer). It is unclear whether the Government intends that existing criminal procedure rules might be used for the purposes of submissions of no case to answer. This is unacceptable. We struggle to see what role there would be in the future for section 97 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. With ‘no reasonable jury’ submissions already abolished by section 97D of the 1995 Act, there appears to be no role whatsoever for the Court in relation to the quality of the evidence, outwith a corroboration rule. Absent clear provision for judicial supervision of the quality of the prosecution case – according to high standards designed to maintain the prosecutorial burden and the requirement for proof beyond reasonable doubt, and sufficient powers to assess the quality of the evidence by the Court – JUSTICE Scotland considers that Parliament must remove these piecemeal and inadequate proposals from the Bill.

39. Before this Bill progresses Parliamentarians must, at a minimum, require the Scottish Government to explain precisely what standards will apply to ensure consistency and sufficiency in the rules of evidence and make provision for clear powers for judges to intervene when those standards are not met. In JUSTICE Scotland’s view these standards must be expressed clearly and grounded in statute.

Part 3 – Solemn procedure

40. This Part of the Bill implements some of the recommendations of the Bowen report on indictment procedure in the sheriff court. Those recommendation in large part replicate the Bonomy reforms in the High Court and are on the whole to be welcomed. JUSTICE Scotland remains concerned about the resources available for the implementation of these changes and that proposed changes to time limits and the written record may not be appropriate or necessary. These reflect the concerns we expressed in connection with the consultation on Sheriff and Jury Procedure.

---

15 Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure Report by Sheriff Principal Edward F Bowen June 2010
Resources

41. The qualified success of the High Court reforms may not easily be achieved in the Sheriff Court. Notably, the volume of cases is considerably greater. As Sheriff Principal Bowen noted in his original report, the overall trend is of an increase in the volume of both routine and priority cases in the Sheriff Courts. The disclosure obligations on the Crown have greatly increased since the date of the report and accommodation pressures, brought about by court closures, the relocation of justice of the peace courts and the proposed reforms to the civil jurisdiction of the Court of Session, are significant. If the aims of the reforms are to be achieved, it is crucial that adequate resources are made available to COPFS and Scottish Courts, to try cases within a reasonable period of time, and to ensure that victims, witnesses, and accused persons are able to access the courts. Further as both Lord Bonomy and Sheriff Principal Bowen have observed, successful implementation will require adequate funding of defence solicitors in relation to the additional (and earlier) work required of them as a result of the proposed reforms.

Section 65 - Time limits

42. Section 65 proposes an increase in the time limit between committal and trial. We do not support the proposal to simply increase the 110 day timelimit to 140 days wholesale. The justification for such an increase has not been made out. Lord Bonomy's view that the timelimits in the Sheriff court should be altered to bring them into line with his proposals for the High Court were not, at that time, accepted by the Scottish Government which noted that extensions of time limit were less frequently sought in the Sheriff Court. In any event, an evaluation of the Bonomy reforms noted that they had done little to alter the culture of applications for extensions in the High Court, even after the increase in time limit to 140 days. Whilst there has been a rise in the complexity of some cases indicted even in the Sheriff Court, very many are comparatively straightforward and a longer period before the case must be brought to trial may prove counter-productive to the aim of ensuring parties prepare their cases at as early a stage as possible. Of most significance is the period of time victims must wait for justice to be served, and accused persons to be tried, particularly those remanded in custody. The length of time between charge and trial must be kept to a minimum to ensure a fair trial can take place, within a reasonable period of time.

Section 66 – The written record

43. Section 66 of the Bill seeks to introduce the written record procedure to the Sheriff Court. The proposed section departs from the High Court procedure by requiring the parties to communicate within 14 days after service of the indictment and imposing upon the procurator fiscal the obligation to lodge the written record. JUSTICE Scotland considers that neither change is desirable, adding a layer of bureaucracy which is unnecessary. Pre-trial communication in busy jurisdictions may impose significant burdens on all parties and in particular the Crown. It is inevitable in custody cases that problems with disclosure, forensic reports or defence experts will arise relatively late in the process, and after the stipulated meeting which has to take place at least two weeks before the first diet. In the High Court the perceived problem of late or inadequate communication has been addressed by changes to the written record form, requiring parties to detail the dates and nature of their communication. We consider that a similar approach is equally apt for the Sheriff Court and that section 66(3) is unnecessary. Equally, placing the obligation on the procurator fiscal to lodge the complete written record seems unnecessarily burdensome. The current High Court practice, whereby parties e-mail their own part of the written record to the clerk, seems preferable.

---

19 By inserting a new s71C in the 1995 Act.

Part 5 Appeals and SCCRC

Sections 76 and 77 – Limiting the discretion to extend time

44. Both Section 76 and 77 would limit the discretion of the court to allow appeals out of time to cases where applicants are able to show ‘exceptional circumstances.’ JUSTICE Scotland is concerned that there appears to be little or no evidence that such a change is necessary or justified. The primary mischief identified by the Carloway Review related principally to the overall length of time taken to deal with appeals, not to the need for appeals to be started on a more timely basis. As we highlighted in our response to the Consultation, there is no evidence that unmeritorious appeals are being allowed to proceed without justification. On the contrary, it is our view that courts are increasingly robust in their approach to finality and the exercise of their discretion on time limits, in the interests of preserving the finality and certainty of proceedings. Without such evidence, JUSTICE Scotland is concerned that this new statutory qualification would fail to strike the right balance between the need for an efficient appellate system and the right of appeal itself.

45. The time limits which apply to the lodging of appeals are already closely circumscribed. For example, the commencement of an appeal against a summary conviction is an application for a stated case which has to be lodged with the Clerk of Court within one week of the conclusion of proceedings (section 176(1)(a) of the Criminal Procedure Scotland Act 1995). The discretion to extend time, although already closely guarded, may be key to ensuring justice in an individual case.

46. It should be recalled that section 181 of the 1995 Act was last amended by the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, with the purpose of avoiding floodgates appeals post Cadder v HM Advocate. JUSTICE submitted before the Supreme Court in Cadder that the floodgates argument was overstated. The Court’s workload has not multiplied as was predicted by the Crown in Cadder. It is therefore difficult to see why a further strengthening of this power, and consequent greater difficulty in gaining access to the Court for appellants, should be adopted.

47. We recommend that the Committee asks Ministers to provide clear evidence that a further hurdle is necessary and justified and will not pose an undue restriction on the individual right to appeal. If the test is to be restricted, we have a number of concerns about the procedure proposed:

---

a. There is no guidance provided in the Bill or in the Explanatory Notes on what circumstances may be considered exceptional. If this discretion is to be left to the court, it should be broad and uncircumscribed.

b. We are concerned that the effect of these provisions is that the Appeal Court will deal with any application for an extension of time solely on papers. Whilst an explanation in relation to delay should be provided and the proposed ground of appeal must be stated, the strength of those arguments, and their basis may not be readily identifiable simply from a perusal of papers. The appellant is encouraged (see Lilburn and Toal) to state his ground of appeal as soon as the information comes to hand. The outstanding preparation for appeal, and an explanation for the delay, can be best justified in oral submission. 21 If the ‘exceptional circumstances’ test is adopted, as a minimum, the right to make representations and provision for a hearing before permission is refused, must be included.

Section 82 - References by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC)

48. JUSTICE Scotland welcomes the repeal of section 194DA of the Criminal Procedure Scotland Act 1995 which granted the High Court the power to reject references from the Commission where it did not consider the action was ‘in the interests of justice’. This measure was introduced to encourage finality and certainty in the proceedings. We objected to the introduction of this measure and we consider that it should be repealed. We reiterate the words of Lord Kerr which have a wider application in relation to this Bill and the general approach to time limits and finality:

Lord Atkin’s remark in Ras Behari v King Emperor (1933) that ‘finality is a good thing, but justice is better’ seems to me to be infinitely preferable to that of his near contemporary Justice Brandeis in 1927 in Di Santo v Pennsylvania that it is ‘usually more important that the law be settled than it be settled right’. 22

49. JUSTICE Scotland deeply regrets that it is instead proposed to reinstate the ‘interests of justice’ hurdle in section 194B. The standard required of the Appeal Court to find that there has been a miscarriage is already a high one. We cannot fathom how if such an injustice has been identified, there could be grounds based on the ‘interests of justice’ not to allow the appeal and quash the conviction.

50. In reintroducing the ‘interests of justice’ qualification, the High Court is required again to have regard to the need for ‘finality and certainty’ in the determination of criminal proceedings. Beyond Lord Kerr’s principled preference as outlined above, we note that the application of the finality and certainty test has so far been applied by the Scottish appellate courts to the significant detriment of the individual right of appeal, particularly when considered in the context of the ‘interests of justice’. We are concerned that, in some cases, the need for finality is conflated with a determination that it would not be in the interests of justice for any appeal to proceed, which is a different and important determination.23

---

21 Toal v HM Advocate 2012 SCCR 735, at [108]; Carberry v HM Advocate [2013] HCJAC 101 at [7].

51. Much of JUSTICE’s early work related to miscarriages of justice. Working with the BBC’s Rough Justice and Channel Four’s Trial and Error programmes, JUSTICE helped secure the release of many prisoners who had been wrongly imprisoned. Our policy work and recommendations helped inform the reforms that brought about the establishment of the Criminal Cases Review Commission and subsequently the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission. We consider that the proposed change in Section 194B (Section 82 of the Bill) will pose a significant challenge to the ability of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission to help to identify miscarriages of justice and to secure redress and remedy for those individuals affected by failings in our criminal justice system. We would ask Parliament to accept the repeal of Section 194A, but require the amendment of Section 82 of the Bill to delete new Section 194B.

JUSTICE Scotland
16 September 2013

Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
Written submission the Law Society of Scotland

Introduction

The Law Society of Scotland aims to lead and support a successful and respected Scottish legal profession. Not only do we act in the interests of our solicitor members, but we also have a clear responsibility to work in the public interest. That is why we actively engage and seek to assist in the legislative and public policy decision making processes.

This response has been prepared on behalf of the Society by members of its Criminal Law Committee ("the Committee").

General Comments

The Committee welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Scottish Parliament’s Justice Committee’s call for written evidence upon the general principles of this Bill which was introduced into the Scottish Parliament on 21 June 2013.

The Committee has been actively engaged with the Scottish Government and Scottish Parliament since the Judgement in Cadder v HMA [2010] [UKSC] 43 and has also responded to a number of Scottish Government Consultation Papers which have been taken forward and which now form the basis of much of the Bill including the Scottish Government Consultation Paper entitled “Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: Carloway Report” in October 2012, “Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: Additional Safeguards following the removal of a requirement for corroboration” in March 2013 and “Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Procedure Reform of Sheriff and Jury Procedure (the Bowen Report)” in March 2013.

With particular reference to the Carloway Report which was published in July 2012, the Committee, while welcoming many of Lord Carloway’s recommendations, a number of which are contained in the Bill which will introduce safeguards concerning vulnerable suspects, child suspects under 16 not being able to waive their rights to legal representation and the reduction of the maximum detention period without charge to 12 hours, remains seriously concerned with regard to the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration in criminal proceedings as referred to in Section 57 of the Bill.

The Committee believes that in so doing, whilst also failing to introduce sufficiently strong safeguards in the Bill, will simply result in a contest between two competing statements on oath and result in an unacceptably increased risk of miscarriages of justice.

The Committee believes that the requirement for corroborated evidence is not an antiquated outmoded legal notion but is a fundamental principle on which the Scottish Criminal justice system has been founded. Any proposal to remove this requirement should be set against the background of a wider review into the Scottish criminal justice system.

While the Committee notes that Section 70 of the Bill amends Section 90 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, by changing the number of jurors required to return a verdict of guilty from 8 to 10, this change alone is insufficient to remove the risks created by abolishing corroboration.

The Committee strongly believes that there needs to be full and informed public debate on the prosecution policy and criteria in respect of cases in which there is no corroboration.

The Committee strongly believes that careful consideration requires to be given to the leading and evaluation of identification evidence in trials. Routine reliance on dock identification of an accused person, sometimes years after an alleged offence, is a distinctive feature of the Scottish criminal justice system. In the past, the requirement for corroboration (i.e. identification from another source) has been used to justify this procedure. Without corroboration, continued reliance of dock identification of an accused by a single witness is likely to increase the risk of mistaken identification leading to a miscarriage of justice.

The Committee strongly believes that in cases where there is no corroboration, the trial judge should have the statutory power to withdraw the case from the jury on the basis that the evidence would not entitle a reasonable jury to convict.

Such safeguards have not existed previously precisely because there has always been a requirement for corroboration.

The Committee should like to respond to the Bill as follows:

PART 1: ARREST AND CUSTODY

CHAPTER 1: ARREST BY POLICE – (Sections 1-6)

The Committee believes the current system is working well and there is no requirement to move to a system of arrest on the basis that a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed or is committing an offence in terms of Section 1 of the Bill.

CHAPTER 2: CUSTODY

Person not officially accused (Sections 7-13)

The Committee notes that the Bill incorporates Lord Carloway’s recommendation of the maximum time the suspect can be held in detention should be 12 hours without being charged or advised that he or she is to be reported to the procurator fiscal.

In respect of section 7, the Committee believes that an officer of the rank of sergeant, rather than the rank of constable, should authorise the keeping of a person in custody.
The Committee notes that the 12 hour limit cannot be extended and indeed, requires to be reviewed after 6 hours in terms of Section 9 of the Bill by an officer who is of the rank of Inspector or above and has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody all in terms of Section 9(3) of the Bill.

Investigative Liberation (Sections 14-17)

This appears to reflect the position in England and Wales with regard to Police Bail where there have been criticisms regarding the accused not being in a position to make representations regarding bail or conditions.

The Committee is concerned that Investigative Liberation will become the norm rather than the exception and, with particular reference to Section 14 (Release on conditions), is concerned with regard to the period of 28 days referred to in Section 14(1)(c) of the Bill. It is noted from Lord Carloway’s Report, that he recommended that the period of liberation on conditions should be limited to a maximum of 28 days. The Committee believes that the period should be any period up to a maximum of 28 days as opposed to a blanket 28 day period as is provided for in the Bill.

The advantage in allowing a shorter period upon which a person can be released from custody is that more onerous conditions of investigative liberation may be accepted on the basis that a lesser period is provided for.

This will also have the advantage of there being fewer applications for a review of conditions as provided for in terms of Section 17 of the Bill.

The Committee notes that Section 17 of the Bill allows a review of conditions before the Sheriff, but suggests that the time period should also be subject to review. Such a review should be undertaken within 48 hours of an application being made, in writing to the Court. Where a review hearing has been fixed, the Crown must provide the accused, or his agent, with full written details of the evidence relating to the case, as at the date of the hearing. Said summary of evidence to be provided to the accused, or his agents, prior to the hearing to review special bail conditions.

The Committee highlights the Legal Aid implications for this new procedure of investigative liberation and review and welcomes clarification in this regard.

CHAPTER 4: POLICE INTERVIEW

Rights of Suspects (Sections 23, 24 and 25)

The Committee notes that Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the rights to have a solicitor present should apply to a person either in police custody or attending a police station or other place voluntarily for the purposes of being interviewed by a constable is now incorporated in Section 24 of the Bill.

In respect of section 24, the Committee believes the proposed threshold of “in the interests of the investigation” allowing the police to interview a person without a solicitor is inappropriate. The Committee strongly believes that the threshold should echo the existing statutory test of “in exceptional circumstances”.

The Committee, while welcoming that a person may not consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present if that person is under 16 years of age, also believes that this should apply to 16 and 17 year olds who should not be permitted to waive their rights to a lawyer at all. The Committee is concerned that many 16 or 17 year olds are vulnerable and require protection during police interview. The Committee does not believe that such protection could be afforded by a parent or relative, its, in some cases, may be ill-equipped for the task.

In respect of section 25, the Committee believes that any person who appears unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or communicate effectively with the police should be provided with support. Support should not be restricted to situations where this is due to mental disorder. The Committee makes the same observation in respect of section 33 of the Bill.

PART 2 CORROBORATION AND STATEMENTS

Corroboration not required (Section 57)

The Committee refers to its general comments and to its comments expressed in previous consultations and maintains that the requirement for corroboration is an essential evidential safeguard. Its purpose is to protect against miscarriages of justice. Other than increasing the minimum jury majority for a guilty verdict, no other safeguards against miscarriage appear to have been considered. The Committee observes that Lord Carloway himself did not consider an increase in the minimum majority to be “necessary or desirable”. The Committee notes that Lord Carloway’s position has been rejected.

In paragraph 7.0.6 of Lord Carloway’s Report, it is stated that independent research was commissioned to assess the impact of corroboration in the progress of criminal cases through the system and that, after thorough consideration of this research alongside all other information, evidence and submissions on the subject, the Review is able to recommend with confidence that the system would be best served by removing the requirement. However, the Report did not consider the alternative safeguards which exist in other jurisdictions which do not have the safeguard of corroboration.

The Committee further notes that the Bill does not take into account police reporting standards nor prosecutorial tests in the absence of the requirement for corroboration.

The Committee further notes that other safeguards incorporated in other jurisdictions where there is no such requirement, such as rules of admissibility of eyewitness identification evidence and the possibility of withdrawal of unreliable evidence by a judge from a jury as safeguards are restricted in Scottish criminal procedure precisely because there is a requirement for corroboration. It is noted that such safeguards have not been considered and do not appear on the face of the bill other than a minor change from a simple to a weighted majority verdict at Section 70. The Committee reiterates its previously stated position that any change to the law in Scotland requiring corroboration requires to form part of a full scale review of Scottish criminal procedure and should under no circumstances be contemplated in isolation in order to prevent miscarriages of justice from taking place.

As a consequence of the removal of the requirement of corroboration, the Committee remains of the view that cases will be less likely to be thoroughly investigated by procurators fiscal taking into account resources used and that there will less evidence presented at trial. The Committee believes that proper research should be commissioned into the removal of requirement for corroboration in that any change to the size of a jury majority as is proposed in Section 70 of the Bill may well have resulted in acquittals in cases where there had previously been a conviction on a majority verdict. The Committee believes that research into assisting juries should be part of the overall review of the Scottish criminal justice system. In particular, there is no evidence that a jury of 15 persons is better able to determine questions of guilt or innocence than a jury of 12 persons.

The Committee remains seriously concerned that this proposal runs the risk of radically transforming the criminal justice system in Scotland from one which is widely recognised as having a very strong procedural safeguards for the prevention of miscarriages of justice to one with weaker procedural safeguards.

The corroboration rule in Scots Law has consistently been cited by successive Governments as a reason for not introducing into Scots Law safeguards against wrongful conviction which are common in other jurisdictions. Removing the corroboration requirement without, as a minimum, properly reassessing the case for these other safeguards, would be wholly inappropriate.

The Committee further notes that the removal of the requirement for corroboration will expose a large cross section of the public who deal with the individuals on a one-to-one basis, to the possibility of inappropriate prosecutions. What prosecution policy will apply in the case of an individual alleges that he was assaulted by a police officer or a prison officer? Or a pupil alleges that a teacher or social worker acted inappropriately?

The Committee notes that no consideration has been given to the test of sufficiency of evidence at trial and, on the basis that corroboration is an integral part of this test, this proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration will be problematic given the terms of Section 97D of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 whereby a judge has no power to direct a jury to return a not guilty verdict on any charge on the ground that no reasonable jury, properly directed in the evidence, could convict on the charge and accordingly, no submission based on that ground or any ground of like effect is to be allowed.

The Committee believes that, on the basis that the requirement for corroboration is to be abolished in terms of Section 57, it should therefore be possible for the trial judge to sustain a submission that no reasonable Jury could convict on the evidence led. The Committee notes that the Scottish Law Commission has previously recommended this (Report on Crown Appeals) Scot Law Com No. 212, 2008).
Statements by accused (Section 62)

The existing rule was designed to prevent an accused from avoiding giving evidence on oath and being subject to cross-examination by relying instead on exculpatory or mixed statements (containing incriminating and exculpatory material) made earlier. This new provision would allow an accused alleged to have committed a sexual assault to have his position of consent considered without going into the witness box.

PART 3: SOLEMN PROCEDURE (Sections 63-70)

The Scottish Government’s Consultation entitled “Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: Reform of Sheriff and Jury Procedure” identified at that time a number of practical issues regarding proposals for reform in this regard.

In particular, and with reference to Section 66 of the Bill (Duty of parties to communicate), the Committee remains concerned regarding the resource implications of this provision for both Crown and Defence. The Committee believes that responsible practitioners will seek out procurators fiscal and vice versa in order to set up discussions with a view to progressing the case in any event without the requirement for legislative change.

With regard to the written record of state of preparation, the Committee notes that in High Court cases the practice which has developed is for each party to individually prepare and email to the court an electronic record of that party’s preparation. An electronic copy of the record is also emailed to the other parties in the case.

Accordingly, the Committee believes that there should not be a requirement for a joint written record as referred to in Section 71(c)(2) of the 1995 Act as asserted by Section 66(3) of the Bill. Rather, the requirement should be for an individual written record.

First diets (Section 67)

The Committee believes that, as indicting cases to the first diet will happen every day in Sheriff and Jury Courts in both Glasgow and Edinburgh, consideration must be given to the impact that this proposal will have on “hub” jury courts in rural areas and how this will work in practical terms.

Guilty Verdict (Section 70)

The Committee refers to its general comments and believes that proper research should be carried out under the direction of the Scottish Law Commission in order to determine the number of persons who sit on a modern jury and the majority required for any verdict.

The Committee notes that this was not part of Lord Carloway’s remit, and that such research has not been undertaken.
The Committee believes that this research should look at the existing system in Scotland as well as other modern jurisdictions where serious charges are determined by lay juries.

The Committee believes that it may well be the case that 12 jurors rather than the traditional 15 jurors is the appropriate number. The Committee notes that if the number was reduced to 12, as is the case in many modern jurisdictions, then this would result in significant savings in expense to the public purse and a deduction in the inconvenience caused to persons who sit on juries and to the large number of people who are cited to attend for jury duty.

A reduction in the quorum of all juries throughout Scotland would inevitably result in significant and sustained savings. In a time of pressure on public funding, these savings would free up money for investment in practical and effective measures to assist juries e.g. the one-off investment in electronic tablet devices to view photographs and documents instead of the present practice of providing printed copies for each jury member. In addition, money could be spent on providing juries with paper or electronic copies of the lengthy legal directions given at the end of the trial. At the moment, juries have to listen, try to note down, understand and then apply legal directions to the facts of the case.

The Committee further notes that, in England and Wales, a minimum number of 10 out 12 jurors is required for a verdict of guilt with a further safeguard that, in the first instance, juries are instructed to seek a unanimous verdict.

On the basis that Scottish juries continue to have 15 members, the Committee suggests that, in line with other modern jurisdictions, consideration should also be given to requiring 12 out of 15 jurors to be persuaded before any verdict is returned. The Committee believes that this provision is, however, only piecemeal reform and believes that proper research into the working and findings of juries in Scotland should be undertaken as soon as possible as there is at present no information available regarding jury verdicts in Scotland. Regard should also be given as to the age of jurors and who should be eligible to sit on a jury as part of overall jury reform. The Committee notes that the Scottish Government consulted in 2008 ("The Modern Scottish Jury in Criminal Trials") Other than the limited provisions at Sections 93-97 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, there has still been little in the way of jury reform.

Separately, the Committee notes that the not proven verdict is not a matter which has been placed on the face of the Bill.

With reference to Lord Carloway’s evidence to the Justice Committee on 29 November 2011, he stated that “if we go down the route of examining majority verdicts, we must examine the not proven verdict. If I had gone down that road, there would have been another 150 pages in the Report”.

Although the Committee understands that the Scottish Law Commission is to consider the three verdict system, the Committee believes that the research it has previously recommended be undertaken, should also consider the impact of the three verdict system.
In this regard, the Committee refers to its general comments that, rather than piecemeal reform, a wider review into the Scottish Criminal Justice system is necessary.

PART 4: SENTENCING: (Sections 71 to 73)

The Society has no comment to make on the basis that sentencing is a matter of public policy.

PART 5: APPEALS AND SCCRC (Section 82 References by SCCRC)

The Committee welcomes the repeal of Section 194DA of the 1995 Act which removes the High Court’s ‘gatekeeping role’ The Committee believes, however, the SCCRC should be in a position to decide the interests of justice point or otherwise and accordingly the Committee sees no merit in this repeal only to be introduced as an interests of justice test at Section 194B of the 1995 Act as inserted by Section 82(2) of the Bill at the point when the appeal is to be determined.

The Committee does not believe that it can be in the interests of justice for the Appeal Court to allow a conviction based on a miscarriage of justice to stand. Such an approach would undermine the credibility of the court and confidence in the Scottish criminal justice system in which the SCCRC plays a respected and important role.

PART 6: MISCELLANEOUS (Section 86 Use of live television link)

The Committee supports the policy intent of this provision on the basis that the Court should only allow the Hearing to proceed by television link on the basis that it is satisfied that it is not contrary to the interests of justice to do so.

Law Society of Scotland
6 September
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from the Law Society of Scotland

I refer to the oral evidence session on 1 October at which Grazia Robertson provided evidence on behalf of the Law Society of Scotland on the general principles of Part 1 of this Bill. At the end of this session, you invited supplementary points.

Unfortunately, there was no opportunity for Mrs Robertson to address the Committee upon Section 14 of the Bill.

This has been brought into sharper focus given the position of Police Scotland who stated that 28 days would potentially be restrictive as an absolute time limit.

The Law Society of Scotland is also concerned with regard to the period of 28 days but notes Lord Carloway’s Report where he recommended that the period of liberation on conditions should be limited to a maximum of 28 days. The Society believes that any time period fixed should be a period up to a maximum of 28 days as opposed to the blanket 28 day period as is provided for in the Bill.

The Society believes that there is advantage in allowing a shorter period of investigative liberation upon which a person can be released from custody in that more onerous conditions of investigative liberation may be accepted on the basis that a lesser period is being provided for.

This will also have the advantage of there being fewer applications for a review of conditions as provided for in terms of Section 17 of the Bill.

With regard to Section 17 of the Bill, the Society welcomes the review of conditions before the Sheriff but suggests that the time period should also be subject to review.

Section 17 does not provide for a time period within which a review should be undertaken and the Society accordingly suggests that a review should be undertaken within 48 hours of an application being made in writing to the Court and that where a Review Hearing has been fixed, the Crown must provide the person who is subject to a condition imposed under Section 14(2) of the Bill or his or her agent full written details of the evidence relating to the case as at the date of the hearing and that such a summary of evidence should be provided to the person or his or her agent prior to the hearing to review special bail conditions.

The Society also highlights the practical issues of securing the simultaneous attendance at a police station of the police officer, solicitor, person suspected and in some cases, appropriate persons and/or interpreters.

The Society further highlights the Legal Aid implications for this new procedure of investigative liberation and review and would welcome clarification in this regard.
I trust that these further comments will be of benefit to members of the Justice Committee.

Alan McCreadie
Deputy Director, Law Reform
9 October 2013
Write to the Secretary of State for Justice

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland

The Commission is grateful for the opportunity to comment on this Bill. Most of the Bill relates to matters not within our remit and on which we can offer no comment.

The one matter on which we wish to comment is the proposal to prescribe a statutory duty to provide an “appropriate adult”.

We warmly welcome sections 33 and 34 of the Bill. We have previously expressed concern that there was no statutory procedure in Scotland to provide an “appropriate adult” to support a vulnerable person held in custody. While it was custom and practice to do this, we considered that a statutory basis would be important to ensure that vulnerable individuals’ rights are protected.

We look forward to further consultation on regulations under section 34 after the Act is passed.

Donald Lyons
Chief Executive
Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland
August 2013
The Case for the Abolition of Corroboration

The case for abolition involves 3 main arguments:

1. The rule, in being difficult to understand, inconsistent and ineffective, is not fit for purpose in the modern Scottish criminal justice system.

2. It is unnecessary because fact-finders can and should be trusted to accurately evaluate the strength, persuasiveness and reliability of evidence free from legal regulation and technical rules, and because there are a range of other protections against unjust convictions, most notably the high standard of proof which ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ requires.

And, most pertinent to Petal’s standpoint as an organisation which supports victims’ families through their understanding and experience of our criminal justice system at a time of great trauma and anguish:

3. It is disproportionately prejudicial to the interests of victims, their families, witnesses and the public

1. As the Carloway Report notes, the corroboration requirement is “frequently misunderstood by lay persons and lawyers, not least judges”, difficult to explain to juries and applied differently by different judges. Moreover, alterations to the rule, such as the development and application of the Moorov doctrine: has further complicated the rule. We suggest that the simplification of jury directions is in the interests of justice, and so the abolition of corroboration is necessary.

Moreover, in addition to complexity, the resulting “interpretations, refinements, exceptions, loopholes and pure ‘fiddles’” ensure that “corroboration is not as strong a safeguard against miscarriages of justice as many of its supporters believe”.¹ For instance, a study by Duff² points to case law holding that:

- ‘corroborating evidence need only be consistent with evidence that needs to be corroborated rather than more consistent with such evidence than with alternative explanations for such evidence’³;
- “where one starts with an emphatic positive identification by one witness, then very little else is required”
- dock identifications can corroborate even when not preceded by an identity parade or even where the witness identified one of the stand-ins;
- distress may corroborate lack of consent in sexual offences although it can be easily feigned;

¹ REFERENCE
² REFERENCE
³ NICOLSON reference
• confessions may be corroborated by special knowledge of the crime, even where that knowledge was not uniquely known by the suspect.

There is no doubt that these examples considerably weaken the corroboration requirement.

2. In response to those who claim abolition poses a threat to civil liberties, as well as the fact there is no evidence for the proposition that corroboration prevents wrongful convictions it is clear that there will and should still be a test against which cases will be judged before they can proceed to court, but it should be one based on qualitative, not quantitative, considerations. Police and prosecutors will continue to seek the best evidence in every criminal case, and fact-finders will be unlikely to convict on the basis of flimsy or unreliable evidence. Abolishing corroboration should, however, enable the Crown to bring prosecutions in cases where there is a lack of corroboration but where they believe there is still sufficient evidence to give a reasonable chance of conviction.

The protections for suspected and accused persons in Scotland following implementation of the Bill will continue to be substantial - access to legal advice, right to silence, extensive rights of disclosure, the high standard of proof of beyond reasonable doubt (which seems, rather obviously, the greatest protection afforded to an accused person, given that in practice juries are really being asked to assess the quality of witness evidence), the unique and stilted three verdict system, and robust rights of appeal (which are not enjoyed by complainers, victims or their families). As such, we do not believe that the abolition of corroboration will result in an unfair or fundamental unbalancing of the system.

3. As is noted in the Carloway Report, the corroboration rule has its origins in a different era: one in which there was little or no scientific evidence, and which included the presence of capital punishment. It was designed to prevent miscarriages of justice occurring in the form of wrongful convictions. Today, however, as the Report highlights, there is no evidence that corroboration prevents such wrongful convictions. Rather, the rule now serves all too often to actively prevent justice from being done, and from being seen to be done. Potentially meritorious cases are prevented from proceeding to trial on the basis of what is, and is observed by victims, their families, and witnesses as being, a ‘technicality’. The Report suggests that but for the corroboration rule, an additional 450 serious cases would have proceeded to trial in Scotland in 2010. Although this does not necessarily mean that these trials would have led to convictions, the victims, their families, and witnesses would have been given their day in court and a chance to see justice being brought to bear on factually guilty people.

In short, the rule can bar prosecutions that would in another legal system seem entirely appropriate, and victims of crime are denied access to the courts simply because the prosecutor could not bring proceedings due to a lack of corroborated evidence. As has been stated elsewhere, that situation is due to variations of fate or providence, which in a modern legal system is not acceptable.\(^4\) In this we agree with Lord Carloway’s position that convictions should not depend on matters of chance, such as whether there is more than one source of evidence, which may in fact be less persuasive than “a single independent or impartial eyewitness, whose character cannot be impugned”.

\(^4\) REFERENCE

As an organisation which supports the families of victims of serious crime, and campaigns for changes and improvements to the criminal justice system in their interests, Petal agrees that the present situation, where witnesses and victims see an accused who may in fact be guilty go free due to an outdated technicality, must now change.

JURY AND VERDICT

Although we are of the position that the abolition of corroboration is necessary and that it does not fundamentally alter the balance of the criminal justice system, we recognise that the simple majority required for conviction may need to be revised to adequately protect the accused in solemn trials should abolition happen.

As such, we accept the Bill’s proposal that a guilty verdict can only be returned should 10 out of the 15 jury members agree.

NOT PROVEN VERDICT

Some commentators have suggested that removal of the corroboration requirement would impact upon use of the ‘not proven' verdict.

One justification offered for the not proven verdict is that it can be applied where a jury considers that an accused may be guilty but does not think that there is adequate corroboration. As a result some might argue that removal of the requirement for corroboration would render the not proven verdict unnecessary. There is also an argument that has been advanced that, without the requirement for corroboration; the distinction between not proven and not guilty would become much harder to appreciate, running the risk of confusing jurors as to its use.

We at Petal welcome and agree with these arguments. For us, however, the three verdict system has long been a barrier to justice, rather than posing a threat only upon the abolition of corroboration. It provides the defence and the accused with a 2:1 advantage, given that the not proven and not guilty verdicts are of the same effect – acquittal. Petal can find no justification or logic in having three verdicts when two are of the same effect.

Also, it is not clear that juries understand that this same effect occurs, or indeed understand the three verdict system itself. They are not given an explanation of either at trial, and so it is open to their own interpretation. Indeed, in a study by Hope et al, results showed that understanding of the Not Proven verdict was poor, highlighting ‘inadequacies in the nature of judicial instructions relating to this verdict’. This in itself can only hinder the workings of justice, certainty and consistency.

Furthermore, for victims of crime, their families and also witnesses, the three verdict system presents confusion, disappointment, and frustration. A return of the ‘not proven’ verdict can leave these people bereft of the justice, redress and conclusive answers they sought from our legal system, given how it is commonly understood as being positioned between the ‘guilty’ and ‘not guilty’ verdicts. Such an eventuality can be devastating for the families and loved ones of victims.

---

5 REFERENCE
6 REFERENCE

As an organisation which supports victims of crime and their loved ones and which has advocacy as a central concern, Petal therefore strongly suggest that the abolition of corroboration in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill should lead to a re-examination of the not proven verdict’s place in our legal system. We are firmly of the opinion that a two verdict system should be reinstated in Scotland, be it ‘guilty’ and ‘not guilty’ or ‘proven’ and ‘not proven’. It is in the interests of justice and fairness, and legal certainty. Juries should be able to reach their decision of whether they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty/case is proven based not on outdated technical rules of corroboration or the availability of an outdated and manifestly unfair third verdict, but upon the quality of the evidence before them. Moreover, victims’ families deserve conclusive answers as to the accused’s guilt or innocence.

Petal
29 August 2013
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from Police Scotland

The provisions within the Criminal Justice Bill represent some of the most significant changes to the laws of criminal procedure in Scotland for at least a generation, arriving at a time when Police Service has undergone its most radical structural change since the 1970s.

Police Scotland is determined to ensure that the challenges of implementing the proposed legislation are embraced and deliver the maximum benefits to the people who live, work, visit and invest in Scotland, further reduce crime and anti-social behaviour and keep them safe.

Police Scotland welcomes and supports many of the provisions within the Bill, including:

- Removal of the separate concepts of arrest and detention and the move to replace them with a power of arrest on ‘reasonable suspicion’, laid out in statute, will simplify the process and ensure that suspect rights are more fully aligned with prevailing solicitor access provisions;

- The proposal that the police should be given express power to liberate a suspect from detention, pre-charge/report, subject to appropriate conditions, will enable the pursuit of evidence and further investigations whilst minimising threat or risk of harm from any offending related to the matter(s) under investigation;

- A system whereby the police may seek judicial authority to question a suspect further, after the point of charge or intimation of a report being sent to the Procurator Fiscal, but prior to the individual’s first appearance at Court would be used when new evidence emerges or other material becomes known. We note the requirement to seek permission from the court provides an independent safeguard to this position;

- The move to redefine the age of a child as in line with most other European jurisdictions, European jurisprudence and emerging European Union Law; and

- We strongly support the proposal that the absolute, quantitative requirement for corroboration should be abolished and believe it is the quality of evidence, not quantity that should be taken into account.

We will revisit some of these issues and others in greater detail within this submission and would welcome the opportunity to further discuss them as part of our oral evidence.
1. ARREST

1.1 Police Scotland supports the removal of the separate concepts of arrest and detention and replacement with a statutory power of arrest.

1.2 Police Scotland understands that despite the abolition of the common law power of arrest, all other current common law and statutory provisions in relation to search and seizure will remain available to the service. These include powers of arrest for non-criminal activity such as Matrimonial Homes legislation, Adult Protection Orders and those reported absent without leave from the Armed Forces etc.

1.3 However, it appears that the initial recommendation contained within the Carloway Review that a suspect should be taken to a police station when necessary has been superseded by the proposed legislation contained within the Criminal Justice Bill (Section 4) in that when arrested all suspects must be taken as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station.

1.4 This requirement to take an arrested person to a police station on every occasion gives little or no scope to carry out enquiries at the locus to determine whether or not an arrested individual has in fact committed the offence for which they have initially been arrested on suspicion.

1.5 Police Scotland would also strongly argue that the wording of Section 4 is unduly restrictive and could lead to persons being unnecessarily or disproportionately detained and taken to police stations e.g. minor offences where they may be subsequently released for report, or where identification is a potential issue or it needs to be established that a prima facie crime has been committed.

1.6 This may require the person to remain with officers for a few minutes, the reality of which being that if they chose to leave they would require to be prevented from doing so in the interests of justice and effectively be the subject of some degree of compulsion. Such individuals may therefore be considered to be under arrest and required by Section 4 to be taken as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station.

1.7 Where officers are able to conduct brief but diligent enquiries at the scene of the incident or crime the suspect’s identity and address can often be verified and the facts established that there is no likelihood of repetition of their conduct, making their arrest and subsequent detention at a police station unnecessary and disproportionate.

1.8 The current wording of Section 4 would seem to contradict the presumption to liberty enshrined within Lord Carloway’s Review. It would be beneficial in minimising the breach of an individual’s human rights if there was an ability for an officer to ‘de-arrest’ a suspect when grounds for the continued arrestment of their liberty cease to exist.
1.9 Operational scenarios which afford examples of such circumstances may be found within Appendix A.

1.10 It is understood that Section 13 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 is to be reviewed and potentially amended. This may afford the opportunity to modify this legislation and enable a constable to require a person suspected of an offence to remain with them while making reasonable enquiries to establish whether an offence has been committed and whether reasonable grounds for suspecting that the individual has committed the offence.

2. MAXIMUM DETENTION PERIOD

2.1 The Criminal Justice Bill proposes that a suspect’s detention in police custody should be limited to 12 hours. Police Scotland is of the view that this would be an insufficient period of time for a limited number of serious and complex investigations.

2.2 The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (as amended) currently provides Police Scotland with the ability, in exceptional circumstances to detain individuals in police custody for up to 24 hrs without charge. Police Scotland has worked closely with Criminal Justice colleagues to ensure that persons suspected of committing an offence are not detained for any longer than is absolutely necessary.

2.3 The decision to grant an extension period beyond the 12 hour threshold to a maximum of 24 hours can only be done on review by a custody review officer. This officer requires to be satisfied that the continued detention is necessary to secure, obtain or preserve evidence relating to that offence in connection with which the person is detained; that the offence with which the person is detained is one that is an indictable offence and the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously. The custody review officer is currently a police officer of at least the rank of inspector and is unconnected to the investigation. Guidance remains that, not only must the offence be indictable, but likely to be prosecuted by indictment.

2.4 A recent study (June 2013) has indicated that only 0.4% of all persons detained require to be extended beyond 12 hours, which equates to approximately one case each 2.5 days. Although small in numbers, these can represent some of the most serious matters that Police Scotland is required to investigate.

2.5 Such extensions are required to allow the police to complete sufficient enquiries to prove a charge and ultimately report the offender to the Crown while at the same time mitigating any risk to victims, and promoting public safety and confidence where such enquiries could not be concluded and the suspect released from custody.

2.6 A person’s detention in custody is currently reviewed on an ongoing and dynamic basis by Police Scotland Custody Division personnel who are trained to review the necessity of a person’s detention. Their conduct and behaviour is dictated by a comprehensive Police Scotland operating procedure relating to the care and welfare of persons in police custody. The operating procedure explicitly advises that no person should be held in custody for longer that is absolutely necessary to complete all police enquiries and ensures that any persons charged with an offence should appear in court from custody or be otherwise released from custody.

2.7 Police Scotland strongly assert that the current parameters for detention should continue. Further, that there should be no diminution of police powers to detain persons for up to 24 hours where it can be demonstrated to be necessary and proportionate.

2.8 Operational examples in support of this proposal have been included within Appendix B regarding this topic.

3. STATUTORY REVIEW OF SUSPECTS DETENTION

3.1 Section 9(2) of the Criminal Justice Bill proposes a requirement for a review of a person’s detention when they have been in custody for 6 hours. It is proposed that this would be done by a police officer of at least the rank of Inspector. Police Scotland remains unconvinced as to the necessity for such a review to be enshrined in law.

3.2 Currently the review of persons held in police custody is conducted on a dynamic basis during their period of detention. This is undertaken by dedicated officers and staff from Police Scotland Custody Division and governed by comprehensive Police Scotland operating procedures. The appropriateness of individuals remaining in custody is additionally scrutinised by an Inspector during each shift. Details of such reviews are recorded within associated records.

3.3 Police Scotland consider formalising such a review is unnecessary and adds no additional value to the protection of an individual’s rights. It would create an additional unnecessary layer of management intervention and associated demand on the service. Police Scotland propose that the current operational protocols within Custody Division continue and as such do not require to be enshrined in legislation.

4. INVESTIGATIVE LIBERATION

4.1 Police Scotland welcome the inclusion of the concept of investigative liberation within the provisions of the Criminal Justice Bill. This proposal affords the service more operational scope and contributes to the protection of the public. The proposed limitation to the application of conditions to such liberations to 28 days, while reasonable for the simple and more mainstream investigations would however potentially cause significant difficulties in its application to the investigation of a small but significant minority of serious and complex crimes.

4.2 These offences often involve, or are heavily dependent on, international enquiries, complex forensic examinations, financial enquiries or acquisition of digital/communication data and are unlikely to be progressed sufficiently within the 28 day window.

4.3 It follows that any conditions placed upon suspects designed to moderate their behaviour or conduct would be lost to investigating officers. Operational examples in support of this position are contained within Appendix C.

4.4 The Criminal Justice Bill (Section 16(3)) proposes that a Police Inspector review these investigative liberations on a regular basis. It also provides that the suspect may make representations to a court in relation to such conditions.

4.5 An option for consideration might be that conditions could be initially applied by a Police Inspector, however could be extended beyond 28 days on the authorisation by an officer of the rank of a Police Superintendent, where it can be shown to be necessary and proportionate.

4.6 We note the requirement to keep the necessity and proportionality of investigative liberation conditions under review has no foundation within Lord Carloway’s Review. Police Scotland would wish to identify that the use of investigative liberation will be a new business practice. Its proposed authorisation and review by a Police Inspector is likely to have a clear impact on police resourcing, specifically the role and responsibility of Police Inspectors within Custody Division.

5. WRITTEN UNDERTAKINGS

5.1 The Criminal Justice Bill proposes some changes to the legislation that currently relates to the liberation of individuals from police custody on a written undertaking to appear at court on some future time and date.

5.2 Currently any police officer can grant an unconditional undertaking or undertaking with standard conditions when releasing an individual from custody.

Standard Conditions (Officer in charge of station or person who charges the accused):

- Not to commit an offence while on the undertaking;
- Not to interfere with witnesses or otherwise obstruct the course of justice in relation to either themselves or any other persons;
- Not to behave in a manner which causes, or is likely to cause, alarm or distress to witnesses;
- Comply with any other special conditions (Imposed by Police Inspector).

Special Conditions can be additionally applied to undertakings (Imposed by Police Inspector) where the officer considers such additional conditions are necessary to secure that the conditions that are referred to in the standard conditions are observed.

5.3 Under the proposed legislation contained within the Bill, the thresholds associated with the application of conditions to a written undertaking have been revised. As proposed they continue to enable any police officer to grant an unconditional undertaking to appear at court on some future time and date.

5.4 Where any further conditions are required to be applied (including a number which are currently standard conditions), this must be authorised by a police officer of at least the rank of Inspector who must believe that they are necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the person does not obstruct the course of justice in relation to the offence for which they are in custody.

5.5 This is likely to significantly increase the role and costs associated with Police Inspectors deployed within Police Scotland Custody Division.

5.6 The proposed undertaking regime is more restrictive than is currently available to the Service as it only applies to ‘obstructing the course of justice’ whereas currently conditional undertakings also limit any behaviour which causes, or is likely to cause, alarm or distress to witnesses catering for conduct by an accused which potentially may fall short of a substantive offence.

5.7 In addition to this the proposed conditional undertaking would only relate to the offence for which the suspect had been charged and would not restrict or potentially moderate further offending behaviour by the accused or protect the wider public interest.

5.8 Our support to the overarching presumption to liberty within the Criminal Justice Bill set against our objective of keeping people safe leads us to suggest it would be helpful in striking a balance if more preventative measures were available to the Service when granting Written Undertakings to seek to prevent the commission of further offences. Further, that the standard conditions currently applied should not be diluted.

6. VULNERABLE SUSPECTS

6.1 There has been an Appropriate Adult Scheme in place within Scotland since 1990. The Scheme has no legal standing but in following advice from Scheme members, police officers and police staff are able to ensure that they meet their obligations imposed by the Equality Act 2010.

6.2 Appropriate Adult Services are expected to follow the guidance and standards issued by the Scottish Appropriate Adult Network (SAAN).

6.3 In 2012 cases were brought to the attention of COPFS in which the suspect has had an appropriate adult present at interview but has waived the right to legal advice. There have been subsequent serious concerns that the accused did not understand the caution or terms of the interview and, accordingly, the admissions made during the interview would be held to be inadmissible. Given the significant impact this can have on a case and the quite proper scrutiny of the fairness of the interview likely to be undertaken by any court in such circumstances, the Lord Advocate has considered the matter and issued the following instruction to be issued to all police officers, from 1 October 2012:
"Any case involving suspects of any age who require the support of an appropriate adult must be provided with access to a solicitor prior to interview. They should not be allowed to waive this right".

6.4 The draft Criminal Justice Bill places the requirement for a vulnerable adult suspect to be provided with the services of an appropriate adult on a statutory basis. Scottish Ministers will have the authority to amend the category of person entitled to support from an appropriate adult, and what that support should consist of. They will also be allowed to specify who may be considered a suitable person to provide support to a vulnerable person and what training, qualifications or experience are necessary to undertake this role.

6.5 Provision of Appropriate Adult Services has not been placed on a statutory basis within the Bill. There is therefore some concern, based on limited reporting, that funding may not be secured or maintained within the constraints facing the public sector as a whole.

6.6 It is of note that year on year there has been a 23.5% increase in the use of appropriate adults by the police service in 2012 – 2013 which has placed considerable additional burden upon the Scottish Appropriate Adult Network.

6.7 The provision of a durable appropriate adult scheme is of critical importance to the protection of the rights of some of the most vulnerable members of society. There are currently 19 Appropriate Adult Services across Scotland in receipt of varying degrees of funding from Local Authorities. Fourteen of these services are provided with appropriate adults from existing social work resources. Given that the provisions of the Bill do not place a duty on Local Authorities to provide Appropriate Adult Services, it is expected they will continue to operate as at present with ad-hoc funding arrangements.

6.8 There appears to be no explicit provision within the Bill (Section 33) for the provision of an appropriate adult to a suspect under 18 who is or appear to be suffering from a mental disorder. This is of some concern to Police Scotland as it presents the situation where a vulnerable 17 year old may choose to waive their right to support from a responsible person.

6.9 While Police Scotland in such circumstances would be required by the legislation to initiate suspect access to legal advice, there appears no legitimate basis for Police Scotland to instigate the services of an appropriate adult in these circumstances.

6.10 Police Scotland would maintain that a properly constituted and resourced Appropriate Adult Network would be better placed to ensure the protection of vulnerable suspects and in many cases expedite their release from police custody.

7.  CORROBORATION

7.1 Police Scotland fully supports the contents of Section 57, ruling that it is open to the Judge (or Jury) to find any fact established in evidence to be proved, regardless of the presence of corroboration, effectively abolishing the requirement for Corroboration in material facts.

7.2 The historical relevance and significance of the Corroboration rule cannot be denied, in the protection of accused persons and the prevention of miscarriages of justice, where a person may have stood accused by a sole witness. However, given the multiple sources of evidence available in courts today, the retention of a requirement for corroboration of every material fact is truly an anachronism. Police Scotland agrees with Lord Carloway where he notes:

“It is an archaic rule that has no place in a modern legal system where judges and juries should be free to consider all relevant evidence.”

7.3 Police Scotland, through thorough and professional investigation, currently do, and always will, seek to present best evidence to the Crown. Indeed, the rules surrounding Disclosure require that all reasonable lines of enquiry are satisfied, be they incriminatory or potentially exculpatory.

7.4 The quality, not quantity, of evidence presented should act as the cornerstone on which the Court and Jury determine guilt or otherwise. In our view, it is the exclusion of such evidence that may deny justice to the victims of particular crime types, such as serious sexual crimes, where, by their very nature, corroboration of all material facts will always present significant challenge.

8. POST CHARGE QUESTIONING

8.1 Police Scotland welcomes the proposals for post charge questioning within the Criminal Justice Bill which we see as a progressive addition to our criminal justice processes. Given that this is a new concept it is difficult to anticipate how frequently it will be utilised during criminal investigations. However instinctively it is our belief that it would prove to be the exception as opposed to the rule and carefully employed when appropriate in consultation with COPFS, in relation to more serious and complex investigations.

9. POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD

9.1 Police Scotland supports the proposals to establish a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland and will provide a more detailed response to the Consultation Document in due course.

10. WEEKEND COURTS

10.1 A central principle of Lord Carloway’s Review and of the Criminal Justice Bill is that persons suspected of an offence are not unnecessarily or disproportionately kept in custody, making a number of recommendations that provisions within the Bill seek to put into practical effect; e.g. the introduction of investigative liberation and a drive for greater use of written undertaking.

10.2 Whilst these will clearly impact on the length of time that persons are kept in custody, we firmly believe that a major opportunity to influence the length of time suspects are kept in custody after charge has been missed through there being no provision within the Bill for weekend courts. We as a service have no desire to keep people in custody longer than is absolutely necessary but the lack of courts at weekends means that Lord Carloway’s desire to minimise the number of persons detained more than thirty six hours has been effectively compromised from the outset. In a modern and efficient criminal justice system the length of deprivation of a person’s liberty ought not to depend on the day of the week they are arrested.

10.3 Police Scotland support Lord Carloway’s view that individual’s rights in terms of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) should not be infringed by being kept in custody for more than 36 hours and believe that the establishment of weekend courts would contribute significantly towards minimising detentions beyond this timescale. We also recognise there remains an opportunity to enhance the use of such a facility through greater use of technology, possibly enabling a limited number of courts to deal with custodies from across the country.

11. POLICE AUTHORISATION OF ENTRY & SEARCH OF PREMISES

11.1 The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill might also present an opportunity to update police powers to support law enforcement activity in the contemporary criminal justice landscape. One such area which is worthy of additional consideration relates to police powers of search, both with and without warrant.

11.2 Police officers in Scotland have no general power, either at common law or under statute, to enter and search private premises without a warrant, excepting in exceptional and urgent circumstances, and as subsequently agreed by courts on a case by case basis.

11.3 Currently where a person is arrested without warrant or detained on premises, the police have a common law power to search the premises where the arrestee/detainee was found. However, unless there is a significant degree of urgency, that power would not extend to the home address unless that is the place of arrest. Where police are seeking specific items current practice would be to seek a warrant to search the premises in question through application to a sheriff or justice of the peace.

11.4 Elsewhere in the United Kingdom, legislation within the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) provides statutory authority for a police officer investigating a serious offence to enter premises and search for a person and evidence in relation to the offence for which that person is sought. A senior police officer can additionally authorise the search of premises where an arrested person is reasonably suspected of having been immediately prior to his arrest. PACE also enables such searches to be conducted without written authorisation where it is necessary for the effective investigation of the offence. The detail of such conduct would be reviewed and retroactively authorised and recorded.
11.5 Police Scotland would propose that consideration should be given within the Bill for similar legislative provision, namely, to enable the authorisation of constables to enter premises to search for and arrest suspects and for senior officers to authorise post arrest search activities by constables. Police Scotland considers that this would better support the diligent and expeditious investigation of offences and further contribute to the reduction of time spent by suspects in police custody.

CONCLUSION

Police Scotland welcomes the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and the opportunities it presents to offer a better balance within our criminal justice system to deliver positive outcomes for victims, while protecting the rights of those suspected or accused of crime.

We look forward to the opportunity of making oral representation to the members of the Criminal Justice Committee and exploring some of the issues raised within this submission.

Malcolm Graham
Assistant Chief Constable
29 August 2013
ARREST & ‘DE-ARREST’

The following are offered as being fairly typical operational examples where the implementation of the Bill provisions may lead to unnecessary and/or disproportionate detentions:

1. SHOPLIFTING

Police are called to a retail establishment regarding a female being detained by staff for shoplifting. On arrival, staff identified the suspect to the officers as the person responsible. It was unclear at that stage exactly what the extent of the evidence was, but it related to the theft of a £2 food item. On seeing the police arrive, the suspect stated that she wished to leave because her elderly mother (or a child) was waiting for her within her car at the car park. She also stated that the staff were holding her unlawfully as she has done nothing wrong. This presented the option of arresting her and taking her to the police station for a £2 theft where she would either subsequently have been charged or released (due to insufficient evidence) alternatively; officers could let her leave the locus and then trace her after full enquiry has been made with staff. She does not want to stay at the locus ‘voluntarily’ and the police have no power to make her do so without arresting her.

In these and similar circumstances it would be helpful if,

(a) The suspect could be arrested & held at the location to enable brief assessment of evidence to establish a prima facie case. Once established and determined that the removal of suspect to a police station was inappropriate, disproportionate or unnecessary the ability to ‘de-arrest’ to report or charge and release would be of benefit, and/or

(b) The proposed review of S 13 Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 affords a constable the power to compel a suspect to remain in their presence at the location while brief enquiries as at (a) could be concluded, without having to proceed to formally arrest to do so.

2. MEDICAL INTERVENTION

Police officers attended outside a nightclub during due to a report from door staff that a male suspect is sitting over the top of another male and apparently assaulting him. An update has been received that the injured male appears to be unconscious and the attack is continuing. On arrival the police see the suspect sitting across an unconscious male, bodily shaking him. The male is arrested as the officers have reasonable cause to suspect that he has been committing an assault. The suspect is placed within the police vehicle and the officers proceed to administer first aid to the injured party. The male eventually recovers consciousness and asks the officers where his brother is. The male states that he is epileptic and relies on his brother to help when he takes fits. Enquiry reveals that the male suspect is the brother of the male and was merely trying to assist him. The grounds for arrest clearly no longer exist as no crime has been committed. The Bill requires that in these circumstances the suspect should be taken to a police station as soon as is reasonably practicable.
Currently Section 14 CP(S) Act 1995 allows the police to release from detention a suspect where grounds no longer exist without the need to return to a police station.

3. MINOR DISORDER

It is a busy Saturday night in a city centre with several licensed premises open and full of patrons. There is a police presence to keep people safe and these officers are called to an incident outside a bar where two males are having a low level brawl. They are separated, arrested and placed within the rear of two police vehicles. On further enquiry, it is revealed that both are friends and the conflict arose from a brief misunderstanding. Both are now calm and on checks confirm their identity and that they have no previous criminal history. By taking the males to the nearest police station it would involve a 40 minute drive and could be seen as disproportionate in the circumstances.

It would also deprive the general public of a police presence during a busy time due to the apparent requirement within the Bill to take them to a police station. It would be helpful in these and similar circumstances if there was derogation within the Bill to enable the charging of such individuals and their release from arrest without the compulsion to take them to a police station.

4. MIS-IDENTIFICATION

Police attend a report of a householder having disturbed a youth breaking in to his car. The householder provides a detailed description of the suspect, including clothing. Shortly afterwards, in a nearby street, police find a male fitting the description of the suspect. Following brief questioning (in line with current Case Law) he is arrested is being placed in the police vehicle when the householder attends and clearly states although there is a similarity, it is not the person who was breaking into his car. The grounds for arrest no longer exist however the Bill requires that in these circumstances the suspect should be taken to a police station as soon as is reasonably practicable.

Currently Section 14 CP(S) Act 1995 allows the police to release from detention a suspect where grounds no longer exist without the need to return to a police station.

Police Scotland believes that it would not be proportionate (in the aforementioned examples) to remove these individuals into custody at a police station and that in doing so it would unnecessarily impinge on their Article 5 human rights. The ability of an officer to exercise discretion and de-arrest in such circumstances would be sought as an amendment to the proposed legislation.

Constables should be able to ‘de-arrest’ individuals to facilitate their unconditional release, report or charge.
Appendix B

MAXIMUM DETENTION PERIOD

The following are anonymised examples where the suspect could not be released back into the community without an extension beyond the 12 hour threshold.

1. MURDER

The deceased and male suspect met up and began drinking early in the morning. They made their way to a secluded wooded area where they continued to drink alcohol and met a further suspect. One of the suspects encouraged the other to assault the deceased. The deceased was injured and left lying at locus by both suspects.

The suspects returned in the early hours of the following day having continued to drink in each others company. They both found the deceased injured at locus and repeatedly assaulted him again, resulting in his death.

The deceased’s body was found several hours later and the Major Investigation Team (MIT) took up the investigation.

Both suspects were identified and one detained later the same day. The suspect was still heavily under the influence of alcohol and removed to police station where the SARF process (Solicitor Access Recording form) was completed. The suspect underwent a full medical examination and also had injuries photographed. Given injuries found by the police casualty surgeon, it was recommended that the suspect be afforded an appropriate adult for support during any interview.

The Senior Investigating Officer (SIO) took the decision not to interview at that time given that it was now in the early hours of the following day and to allow the suspect to get a proper rest before being interviewed.

The investigating officers had also undertaken an extended tour of duty over a 24 hour period and were also in need of a rest before interviewing the suspect. The detention period was reviewed and extension beyond the 12 hour period agreed.

The following afternoon the suspect was interviewed by officers who had been fully briefed by the SIO and an Interview Advisor. Admissions were made which identified a further locus which was examined and forensic evidence recovered. The interview lasted for 4 hours and 20 minutes and the suspect was charged with murder.

Without the ability to extend beyond the 12 hour mark, any interview with the suspect would have been seriously questioned at court given their emotional state due to fatigue, alcohol consumption and vulnerability given the police casualty surgeon recommendation for an appropriate adult to be appointed. There was also the potential for evidence to have been missed due to the fatigue of the investigating officers and matters having to be rushed to interview the suspect within a 12 hour window. The SIO decision to allow the suspect and his interview team time to recover before interviewing was not only considered best practice and in the public interest, but also in fairness to the suspect.

2. REPORT OF MALE IN POSSESSION OF A HANDGUN

An initial report was made to the Police that a male was observed in the street in possession of what appeared to be handgun. A firearms operation commenced and the accused was ultimately traced and detained but not in possession of any weapon. A search by officers near to the locus of his detention resulted in the recovery of an imitation handgun.

The male was found to be extremely drunk and volatile on being detained. On returning to the police station he was afforded his rights as per the SARF procedure, however when the Police attempted to facilitate his initial telephone consultation the accused became aggressive, threatening to smash the phone. It was apparent at this point that the accused would require a significant period before he was sober and compliant enough to have his rights as a detained person facilitated.

He was also assessed by the police casualty surgeon who supported the custody supervisor’s assessment the male was unfit for interview and would require several hours to sober up.

In the interim period further investigations revealed the suspect had been in the company of a number of persons, who would have seen the weapon in his possession. The extension period allowed these witnesses to be sought and further CCTV evidence from nearby business premises to be sought.

As there was not a sufficiency of evidence to arrest the suspect, coupled with his drunken and aggressive demeanour the decision to extend his detention period beyond the 12 hour limit was proportionate and necessary to complete all available lines of enquiry in order to serve the public interest. The male was interviewed regarding the matter on being deemed fit for interview later the following day. He was subsequently arrested and charged with a Breach of the Peace.

3. RAPE OF 16 YEAR OLD FEMALE

Two males were detained in rural Scotland prior to midnight for the rape of a 16 year old who was known to one of them.

The victim was forensically and medically examined by a police casualty surgeon at the nearest medical suite. She was only able to provide a partial statement to a Sexual Offences Liaison Officer (SOLO) trained officer due to the time of night and her traumatic experience. The journey between her home and the police medical suite took approximately 1 hour and 30 minutes.

The locus was stood by for examination until the next day during daylight hours as the circumstances indicated that there may be forensic opportunities on the bed clothes and which is viewed as best practice. A number of witnesses had also to be traced during the detention period in order to corroborate the victim’s statement.
Both suspects had to be removed to another police station to be examined by a Police Casualty Surgeon (PCS). The return journey between the detention office and examination suite is a round trip of approximately 2 hours notwithstanding the time necessary to complete the suspect’s medical examinations.

It was necessary to extend the detention period beyond the 12 hour threshold to allow further enquiries to be concluded and ensure the safety of the victim.

Both suspects were interviewed once the victim had completed her statement the following day and the other witnesses had been traced. A full forensic examination was also completed under the guidance of a Crime Scene Manager (CSM). Both males were subsequently arrested and charged with rape.

Without extending the detention period enquiries could not have been properly concluded and as a result both accused would have had to be released.

The community impact assessment was such that the victim and witnesses were considered potentially at risk if the suspects had been released. In addition the suspects could also have been at risk given the crime under investigation from reprisals. As a result this would not have been suitable for Investigative Liberation.

4. DOMESTIC ASSAULT - RAPE

There was considerable history of domestic violence between the victim and suspect with the former at considerable risk from the suspect had officers not been able to conclude all diligent and necessary enquiries.

The victim and suspect were in a relationship residing together at the locus. Both had consumed alcohol throughout the day at home.

The victim was woken by the suspect in their bed who then raped her. Afterwards she went downstairs and phoned the Police. On police arrival, in addition to being visibly distressed, the victim was found to be under the influence of alcohol.

The suspect was detained and the locus secured and arrangements for forensic examination instigated with the assistance of a Crime Scene Manager (CSM), Forensic Services and a biologist. A forensic medical examination took place of the complainer at Archway while additional enquiries such as door to door, forensic examination of locus, etc were undertaken.

The victim was still clearly distressed and suffering from fatigue and the effects of alcohol in her system. The victim also requested that she be allowed to rest between her forensic examination and her statement being noted.

The suspect was also under the effects of alcohol and police casualty surgeon opined that he was unfit to be interviewed at that time.

As such the decision to extend the detention period beyond the 12 hour threshold was made. Without this ability to extend there would have been insufficient time to complete the necessary police enquiries with the victim and attempts to trace other potential witnesses. The suspect also required to sober up prior to interview and completion of the Solicitor Access process.

Investigative Liberation would have been unsuitable in these circumstances given the gravity of the crime and relationship of those involved.

The victim subsequently provided a full statement to the police allowing the suspect to be interviewed once deemed fit by a police casualty surgeon. He was subsequently interviewed and charged with rape having been arrested.

5. ABDUCTION AND RAPE

The victim and witnesses were within their home address and had retired to bed at various times over the evening. The following morning the victim heard creaking on the stair outside her bedroom and was confronted by the male suspect who was in possession of a knife.

A struggle ensued during which an adult male and his child left their bedroom. All parties were threatened by the accused. The accused cut telephone lines, collected mobile phones and pulled down blinds. A male witness and child were told to stay within their bedrooms or the victims would be killed.

The accused thereafter indecently assaulted and raped a female victim repeatedly before he fled the locus.

Police were called and enquiries commenced. The crime scene was secured for forensic examination by a CSM, assisted by a photographer and Scene of Crime Examiner. The victim underwent a forensic medical examination and provided a statement via a SOLO trained officer.

The male and child were also provided with medical assistance and provided statements over what was a prolonged period as the victims of the crime were extremely traumatised and required a period of rest during their interviews.

A male was identified as a possible suspect and a warrant sought and granted to search his home address. During this search distinctive clothing was found, believed to belong to the suspect.

He was subsequently detained in terms of Section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. During his detention period extensive enquiries were still being undertaken at the locus and with the witnesses. An extension was sought beyond the 12 hour threshold to allow sufficient police enquiries to be completed prior to any interview with him. It was necessary to photograph him whilst detained in order to have him formally identified, as at this stage there had been no identification.

Had there have been no opportunity to extend the detention time to allow the identification, and if the accused had made a ‘no comment’ interview, then he would have had to be released for further enquiries to be completed.
This case would not have been suitable for Investigative Liberation due to the seriousness of the offence, public safety and reassurance issues and the danger of reprisals in the local community.

The male was subsequently arrested and charged with several offences including abduction and rape. He has since been convicted at Edinburgh High Court receiving a substantial custodial sentence.

6. TRAFFICKING

A property landlord reported a possible cannabis cultivation at one of his city properties. Uniform officers attended at this address as a ‘routine’ call and found 3 foreign national females working as suspect prostitutes. They also found 4 foreign national males (of different nationalities), two of whom were to be later identified to be involved in the trafficking, rape, prostitution of the females.

The detention of 5 persons was extended past 12 hours to allow a proper investigation/assessment to be carried out, particularly to determine the status of the females involved i.e. if they were victims or suspects. A lack of appropriate interpreters for witness and suspect interviews was largely a contributory factor in the extension, as was allowing the suspects adequate rest time.

During one interpreter-assisted interview, one of the females disclosed that there was another 2 brothels in the city and a pregnant female was possibly being held against her will. Enquires ultimately identified a network of foreign national males who were trafficking European females up and down Britain for prostitution.

The extended detention period allowed the Senior Investigating Officer to thoroughly complete the initial investigation as well as identification of additional victims of trafficking/sexual abuse. If the detention time had been limited the 3 females may well have been arrested for management of a brothel based on the witness testimony and would not have disclosed their trafficking and sexual abuse to the police. As a consequence, the males responsible for the human trafficking offences would have been released and the offences gone undetected.
INVESTIGATIVE LIBERATION

The following anonymised examples serve to highlight where the proposal to limit the operation of investigative liberation to 28 days, would potentially cause significant difficulties, as any conditions placed upon suspects and designed to moderate their behaviour or conduct would be lost to investigating officers.

1. DOMESTIC ABUSE CASE STUDY

In June 2010 a third party report was made to Police re a female having been assaulted by her partner. They were also informed that the male had stabbed the female’s pet dog twice, killing it. On police arrival the female was found to have been slashed on her foot and was taken to hospital where she received six stitches. Her partner was arrested; however the case was marked as no proceedings by the Procurator Fiscal due to a lack of corroboration.

The Domestic Abuse Task Force (DATF) instigated an investigation to trace previous partners of the perpetrator. This resulted in 5 other victims providing statements which detailed serious sexual and violent assaults by the male over a twenty year period. Their medical records were also traced covering the crime period.

In total, 23 charges ranging from rape, abduction, serious assault and sexual assault to breach of the peace were libelled following a 7 month investigation.

The perpetrator appeared at the High Court in Glasgow in March 2012 and was given a Life Sentence in the form of an Order for Lifelong Restriction and is not eligible to apply for parole for a minimum of six years.

This type of domestic abuse investigation is not uncommon for the DATF and records show the average length of enquiries carried out by the DATF is 3 months to bring a perpetrator to the point of charge. The 28 day Investigative Liberation period would not be beneficial in complex and lengthy enquiries such as this given that the perpetrator will know the victims and their whereabouts. The perpetrator may also be at risk of reprisals once the true extent of their crimes is known in the community.

2. COMPLEX FINANCIAL AND TELECOMMUNICATION ENQUIRIES

Police Scotland have and continue to investigate Serious and Organised crime groups operating throughout the United Kingdom and abroad. These groups area of criminality primarily involve large scale social engineering fraud whereby through complex methodology and group tiers the banking sectors security systems are overcome, resulting in multi millions of pounds being transferred into bank accounts controlled by the group. These receiver accounts can be situated anywhere in the world.
3. SERIOUS AND ORGANISED CRIME GROUP (MONEY LAUNDERING)

During December 2012 executive action was taken against one of the principal subjects of the crime group who at that time was suspected of receiving and transferring £40,000 of criminal money for the group. A Proceeds of Crime warrant was executed at the home address of this subject and substantial amounts of criminal money and telecommunication devices seized.

This subject was detained at this time and interviewed in relation to the above £40,000 Money Laundering.

During his detention a forensic download of numerous telecoms and computer devices was conducted. These contained extensive detail of the subject’s involvement in multi million pound world wide fraudulent activity. Due to the extent of the additional evidence uncovered the subject was interviewed and released from detention to allow the further enquiry to be conducted.

This enquiry identified a complex criminal financial network involving hundreds of members operating all over the world. The investigation required obtaining detailed financial evidence from a high number of financial institutions in addition to extensive forensic evidencing of the telecommunications devices.

As a result of these protracted enquiries the police were not in a position to re interview or charge the subject until August 2013.

This case highlights the timescales involved when conducting enquiries into Serious and Organised financial crime. The enquiry team would not have been in a position to re-interview the subject within a 28 day period after the initial detention, with the investigation likely to have been seriously jeopardised if required to meet this time restraint.

4. FIREARMS AND DNA EXAMINATIONS

During November 2012 intelligence was received to the effect that the controlled drugs were being transported to Scotland from England within a van. A male (A) was subsequently detained under terms of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 in Scotland. Within the rear of the van there was a brown barrel which was found to contain a large quantity of white powder. The van was searched and a quantity of controlled drugs recovered. The driver was then detained under terms of the Criminal Procedure Scotland Act 1995 s14.

As a result of enquiries, a house in Glasgow was searched under powers granted by a Justice of the Peace warrant. One person (B) was within the house at this time and was detained under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 s23.

The search uncovered what appeared to be ammunition and a firearm. As a result of which, the search was stopped and the Procurator Fiscal contacted, seeking a warrant issued under the Firearms Act 1968.
In relation to the items recovered two persons (A & B) were charged in relation to offences under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and the Firearms Act 1968.

The householder (C) was not present at this time. She was subsequently traced during April 2013, arrested and charged.

The items recovered during the initial searches of the van and houses were subject to forensic examinations which were requested at the time of the incident.

During January 2013, DNA analysis of tapings taken from the firearm were received and identified a further suspect (D) from the Liverpool area with a DNA package received that same month. Instruction was consequently made by the Procurator Fiscal in February 2013 to detain this male.

In April 2013, the suspect (D) was traced as a remand prisoner within a prison in England. He was detained under terms of the Criminal Procedure Scotland Act 1995 s14 by officers from Police Scotland. He was then arrested and charged in relation to offences under the Firearms Act 1968.

The case proceeded to trial at the High Court of Justiciary in Edinburgh against A & B only. There were no proceedings against C & D.

Forensic examinations and specifically those in relation to the DNA analysis of the firearm, were crucial to the inquiry and identified a previously unconnected suspect. As revealed, even had Investigative Liberation been available and utilised, the 28 days would not have been sufficient to enable full enquiries to be carried out. If however this period could have been extended and the Police allowed to re-interview the accused in light of new/further information, all four would have appeared on indictment for this incident.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from Police Scotland

I would first wish to thank you for allowing me the opportunity to provide oral evidence to the Justice Committee on 1st October 2013 in support of Police Scotland’s submission on the Criminal Justice Bill. During my submission I undertook to provide some additional data to assist you in your on-going deliberations.

The Committee requested that I provide the number of people initially arrested or detained by the police who are ultimately not the subject of any form of proceedings. Unfortunately consequent inquiry has established that this data is not currently collated, nor is it readily available. I regret therefore that I am unable to provide this information.

Members also asked that I provide data in relation to the number of persons detained in custody by the police for more than 6hrs but less than 12hrs.

The figures in relation to persons detained in terms of Section 14 Criminal Procedure (S) Act are not routinely collated by Police Scotland, however during the period between 4 June and 1 July 2013 these figures were collated to assist in identifying the potential resource and financial implications to the police service arising from the details contained within the Criminal Justice Bill. The figures were as follows:

- 2693 persons were detained up to a maximum of 6 hours – 80.4%;
- 643 persons were detained between 6 and 12 hours – 19.2%; and
- 13 persons were detained beyond the 12 hour threshold – 0.4%.

We strongly believe that the facility to extend the current 12 hour provision to one of 24 hours, subject to appropriate review, is required. We were surprised and concerned at the suggestion made by some participants that we could potentially return to a period of 6 hours. Our view and experience, re-enforced by the above analysis, is that such a regressive step would prove operationally unrealistic, unworkable for critical cases and ultimately have a detrimental effect on our efforts to keep people safe.

I am similarly conscious that the Committee were compelled to seek the views of what was a diverse panel of witnesses across a range of complex matters in a short timeframe. I would therefore take this opportunity to provide further information which members may find of assistance.

Your observations in relation to the possibility of establishing a legislative definition for what constitutes an arrest were particularly helpful. As perhaps revealed in my response to Committee, Police Scotland has not sought a specific definition of arrest to be included within the legislation. Our understanding is that this would enable us to continue to work to the current legal understanding and definition of arrest, which, as commentary from the panel re-enforced, is well understood by the Service and will no doubt continue to be informed by evolving case law.
Police Scotland welcomes and supports many of the provisions within the Bill. We do not however consider that in whatever form it is enacted, it was ever intended to denude our existing powers to the detriment of the effective delivery of justice or provision of policing services to communities across Scotland.

Police Scotland currently, and will continue to, operate within the legislative framework set by Parliament. Should that framework succeed common law, and we recognise that emerging jurisprudence and case law increasingly may require that it does so; we will of course accord with the will of Parliament and shape our operational delivery accordingly.

It would however in our view be regrettable if the introduction of this legislation detrimentally affected our well established practices associated with the interview of witnesses or preliminary questioning of suspects outwith a police station, while trying to establish the veracity of a complaint, basic facts or identity of individuals. If such engagement by the police with individuals were to be considered to be a curtailment of their liberty and as such technically an arrest, the potential exponential increase in persons brought into police custody would be detrimental to our efficiency and effectiveness. More particularly, we consider it would undermine the overarching presumption to liberty enshrined within the Bill.

Police Scotland have also sought assurance from Scottish Government that there will be no erosion of our ability at common law to intervene to protect life and enable us to enter premises and detain or arrest individuals who are posing a risk to their own personal safety or by their conduct, the potential well-being of others. We share and wholly support the desire of the Justice Committee to satisfy itself that there will be no diminution of the ability of Police Scotland to adequately protect public safety consequent to the introduction of the Bill into law.

We consider the Bill will have a real and enduring impact on the Service. We fully recognise the need to consider, amongst other matters, evolving and emerging issues associated with effective training delivery and parallel ICT programme development. Foremost in our mind is the overarching requirement placed on the Service to maintain and sustain operational delivery throughout and beyond the introduction of what will represent a large-scale programme.

The timing and manner of introduction of the Bill is therefore significant to the Service.

As stated within our financial submissions to Scottish Government, the costs to Police Scotland associated with the implementation of the proposed Criminal Justice Bill, (£24m) were broad estimates of the potential costs associated with legislative compliance and adoption of new business practises. The acknowledged reality is that our understanding of costs continues to mature and can only ultimately be established following the implementation of the Act and incorporation of any new ways of working within the operational arena.

We look forward to working with partners as our understanding of these matters continues to improve.
I look forward to the opportunity to continue our discussion at a future meeting with the Committee, when I understand the provisions in the Bill relating to the abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration and related reforms and admissibility of statements (Part 2 and Section 70) will be considered.

I would also take this opportunity to reassure the Justice Committee that whatever decision is ultimately made in relation to the future status of the evidential requirement for corroboration in Scots Law, Police Scotland is, and will continue to ensure that all reports of criminal conduct are comprehensively investigated.

Police Scotland has an enduring obligation to identify and secure ‘best evidence’ to the Crown Office Procurators Fiscal Service. This commitment is not lessened by the amendments proposed within the Bill.

I trust this information is of assistance to the Committee.

Malcolm Graham
Assistant Chief Constable
12 November 2013
I thank the Committee for affording Police Scotland the opportunity to continue to contribute to the parliamentary consultation on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and in particular those proposals in relation to the abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration. I am conscious that the Committee requested that I provide further detail on certain matters discussed during the session of 3 December and would provide the following information.

To be clear, Police Scotland has consistently maintained its support for the proposal contained within Section 57 of the Bill for the abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration in Scots Law and remains so disposed. This is not borne out of some form of self-interest, but rather cultivated over years of operational experience of dealing with victims of some of the most serious and vicious crimes who are currently denied access to justice because of a technical legal barrier.

Communities and their concerns remain at the heart of our operational activity, with this reflected in our ongoing commitment and effort to keep people safe. We consider the maintenance of such a technical barrier, and the devastating effect we see it having on the lives of those affected by it, is inconsistent with those efforts and our core values of fairness and respect.

I am conscious that those who oppose the proposal often appear, perhaps conveniently, to abbreviate it, simply referring to the ‘abolition of corroboration’. I hope that my evidence to the committee assisted in dispelling this popular misunderstanding and clarified that the proposal is to abolish the absolute requirement for corroboration, not corroboration itself.

Corroboration will continue to have a place in Scots Law and feature within court proceedings. It is simply that our law currently requires that certain particular facts must be technically corroborated before any proceedings can be commenced (e.g. the commission of an offence and identification of a suspect). This is irrespective of the weight or quality of other supporting evidence that has been established during any investigation. Our discussions revealed that Committee members already appreciate that there are often a series of essential facts within an offence that require to be evidenced and I shall therefore not rehearse them further.

It is our view that this technical requirement for corroboration is an unfair bar to justice for the victims of many crimes. We recognise that the term ‘access to justice’ may have differing meanings to diverse audiences, however within Police Scotland our view is that it simply means that a victim would have the confidence that the circumstances of their case will continue to be investigated diligently by the police and reported to Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) with a prospect that it would be taken forward into court proceedings.

These include, but as revealed during the evidence session, are not limited to, cases of domestic violence and sexually motivated crimes, where the victims are often some of the most vulnerable and/or defenceless members of society who are often preyed upon by those who often seek to exploit the application of this technical requirement as a protection against prosecution. We do not accept this situation as a ‘fact of life’; where the necessary evidence in certain crimes is difficult to get, or less likely to be available, but as a ‘fact of the legal system’ we currently maintain.

We also believe that victims, having failed to clear the technical bar of corroboration, are unlikely to accept or consider an explanation of the Moorov Doctrine and its dependence on a further victim being claimed or identified prior to any action being capable of instigation on the part of the Crown, as a solution to their concerns, or indeed as being reflective of a criminal justice system which supports their desire to access justice.

Police Scotland believes that by abolishing the absolute requirement for corroboration, a significant number of these victims will be able to gain access to our justice system where that might have previously been denied.

While we believe the removal of the requirement will benefit victims, we do not see this to be at the expense of rights of suspects and accused. Fairness remains at the centre of our investigations and reporting, with statutory duties under Disclosure to investigate potentially exculpatory evidence; case law on the interpretation of fairness and admissibility of evidence and core policies to ensure fairness and well-being, all contribute to, promote and protect the rights of the accused.

We have previously demonstrated that we limit, insofar as possible, the time suspects are deprived of their liberty without charge. We make health and fitness assessments initially and continuously and where a detained person requires assistance it is and will continue to be provided. An individual’s fitness to be interviewed and detained is regularly examined. We consider these principles and practices demonstrate that our actings are not unfair to an accused person.

If and when a case does go to trial, it is important to remember that the existing and over-riding legal safeguard remains; the prosecution have to prove that person is guilty ‘beyond reasonable doubt’.

I note the position of the committee in terms of wishing to support victims and see justice, but consider that in the absence of any changes such as those proposed, there remains a danger that the justice system remains unbalanced against victims of crime and as such prejudices their opportunities. To our knowledge, there are no other measures currently being proposed which are likely to introduce a balance such as that afforded through the provisions of the Bill.

Indeed as highlighted by the Lord Advocate and within the previously reported shadow-marking exercises the numbers involved are not insignificant:
1. An approximate average of 85 additional victims of rape per year would be allowed access to justice - (Lord Advocate – 25th November 2013)

2. Police Shadow-Marking Exercises
   (a) During January 2012 police examined a statistically valid sample of cases not previously reported to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) due to the absence of the technical fulfilment of corroboration. This indicated that the abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration would potentially increase the number of cases reported to COPFS by the Police by 4.77%.

   (b) During January 2013 a larger statistically valid exercise was undertaken by Police Scotland with support from COPFS which indicated a likely percentage increase of between 1.5% and 2.2% in the number of cases reported to the COPFS by the Police. Further detail is available in the accompanying Financial Memorandum and reported to the Scottish Parliament Finance Committee.

Each previously unreported case is potentially representative of a devastating incident befalling a person and the creation of an associated lifetime legacy of distress for them, their family, friends and associates.

I am conscious that the Committee requested that I provide further detail in relation to the significant number of extra cases that would be reported to the Crown were the absolute requirement for corroboration abolished and to this end I would provide the following information.

The estimated figure I mentioned during my oral evidence was extrapolated from the shadow marking exercise conducted by legacy Strathclyde Police, in conjunction with COPFS, during January 2013 and reflected an anticipated 2.2% (2,927) increase in number of cases that Strathclyde Police had reported (133,027). These figures (133,027) had not however been scaled up to reflect an estimate of the number of cases reported nationally by the Scottish police service to COPFS during this sample period.

Given that Strathclyde Police reported 133,027 cases during the sample period (which represented approximately 54% of all case reported by the Scottish police service to COPFS), the national total would have been approximately 246,346 cases. A 1.5% to 2.2% increase in this global figure would equate to between 3,695 (1.5%) to 5,420 (2.2%) extra cases that would potentially have been reported by police to the COPFS for their consideration. As I am sure the Committee will recognise these figures were a snapshot in time and our projections are clearly vulnerable to the effects of future statistical fluctuations in demand and performance.

I would also wish to address, on behalf of every officer and member of staff of Police Scotland, the suggestion made from a number of quarters that, as a result of the proposed abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration, prevailing financial pressures and performance targets that the quality, depth or intensity of police investigations will be somehow diminished.

I would again emphasise on behalf of Police Scotland that the abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration in Scots Law will make absolutely no difference to the levels of diligence we currently demonstrate while investigating crime or otherwise discharging our policing responsibilities. Our obligations in this regard are enshrined in law which requires that all our investigations are conducted with diligence and rigour. As such there is absolutely no prospect of Police Scotland diluting our current standards of practice.

As related to Committee, this expectation is reflected in the following:

Smith v HMA 1952

“It is a duty of the police to put before the Procurator Fiscal everything which may be relevant and material to the issue”

McLeod v HMA 1998

“All material evidence for or against the accused must be disclosed”

McDonald, Blair & Dixon v HMA 2008

“All material evidence which either materially weakens the Crown case or materially strengthens the defence case must be disclosed” of whether the suspected party is innocent or guilty”

It is our duty on every occasion to provide the COPFS with the ‘best evidence’ available in support of any prosecution; this will remain unchanged.

We also have a statutory duty in relation to disclosure under the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010. This requires Police Scotland to reveal to COPFS all relevant information and materials collected during the course of an investigation, including that which might undermine the prosecution or otherwise assist any defence. These obligations are non-negotiable.

The proposal to abolish the absolute requirement for corroboration is perhaps best viewed as part of the natural evolution of Scots Law that has been required over centuries to meet the challenges presented by changing public values and lifestyles; by way of example it is within living memory that rape within marriage did not attract criminal sanction and capital punishment was an acceptable criminal justice disposal.

Police Scotland anticipates that current and future advances in technology and science will continue to provide an increasing wealth of supporting evidence to our enquiries and investigations; much of which will emanate from a variety of global jurisdictions. The abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration will assist in the logistics associated with the legal acquisition of such material evidence and therefore contribute to the collection and availability of supporting evidence.

The prospect of securing and presenting such evidence without a corroborative bar would contribute to our enduring efforts and desire to protect both the interests of suspects and the communities we serve, whilst seeking to protect the latter from some of the contemporary and evolving threats facing society, e.g. sexual exploitation; bullying, harassment and other forms of cyber crime which impact on victims who are often targeted and manipulated due to their vulnerability.

In summary the position of Police Scotland is that it has always been consistent and unequivocal in its support for the broad content of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, including Section 57 and its proposal to abolish the absolute requirement for corroboration.

It is our view that the proposed abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration represents a progressive development of our criminal law which will extend access to justice for victims of crime. We consider this notion will benefit a modern society which aspires to keep its citizens safe.

Malcolm Graham
Assistant Chief Constable
6 December 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Rape Crisis Scotland

1. Introduction

Rape Crisis Scotland welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. We welcome the removal of the requirement for corroboration however we still have some areas of concern in improving access to justice for victims of sexual crime.

2. Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms (Part 2 plus section 70 of the Bill)

2.1 Section 57 Corroboration

Rape Crisis Scotland welcomes the move to abolish the requirement for corroboration. In line with recommendations from Lord Carloway’s considered review we believe that the evidence should be reviewed based on its quality rather than quantity and that lack of corroboration in itself should not be a barrier to justice.

We do not consider that the removal of the requirement for corroboration will result in significant numbers of prosecutions based on a single source of evidence (in sexual offence cases this would normally be the complainant’s statement). The police and prosecution will be continuing to look for all possible supporting pieces of evidence. A case involving a single source of evidence is likely to be rare, as to proceed to court it will still need to be assessed as having a reasonable prospect of conviction.

What we do know is that the requirement for corroboration disproportionately affects complainers in sexual offence crimes, the vast majority of which are committed in secrecy and without witnesses. Lord Carloway’s Review was clear in its evidencing of the impact of corroboration on sexual offence case progression. The Review’s research examined 141 sexual offence cases dropped in the period July to December 2010. It concluded that 95 (67%), of those cases would have had a reasonable prospect of conviction without the requirement for corroboration. This is significantly higher than for other serious crimes. Whilst clearly not all of these would have secured a conviction this is explicit evidence that abolishing the requirement for corroboration would result in improved access to justice for victims of sexual crime.

Whilst some have raised concerns about a possible increase in miscarriages of justice there remains the considerable safeguard of the requirement to prove ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ that the offence took place which in our view is a significant protection against wrongful conviction. In addition there is no evidence to suggest that in other jurisdictions which do not have the requirement for corroboration there is a higher incidence of unsafe convictions.
2.2 Section 59
We are disappointed to note however that the removal of the need for corroboration should not apply retrospectively and would urge the Government to reconsider this. This in effect means survivors of historic child sexual abuse or rape will continue to face this barrier to justice and that regardless of the quality and nature of their evidence their case has no chance of being heard. Given that there is a precedent in applying retrospective application as in the Double Jeopardy (Scotland) Act 2011 we would urge the Government to review this.

3. Court procedures (Part 3 plus section 86 of the Bill)

3.1 Section 70 Jury Majority
Rape Crisis Scotland has some concerns about the raising of the majority required for a jury to reach a guilty verdict from a simple majority of 8 to 10 out of 15. Whilst we are aware of the need to ensure adequate safeguards are in place to maintain a fair and robust justice system we are also keenly aware of the prevalence of prejudicial attitudes and misconceptions around sexual violence and the impact this could have. One of the intentions of this Bill, as we understand it, is about improving access to justice; addressing the considerable barriers for victims of sexual crime and addressing the consistently low conviction rate. One concern we have is that in moving to a higher majority requirement the effect will be a lowering of the conviction rate, given what we know about public perceptions around sexual violence and the likely impact this has on jury decision making.

Research consistently shows that public perceptions are significantly negatively biased and victim blaming, particularly towards women, around a number of key issues in sexual violence cases, such as previous consensual sexual contact, alcohol consumption, the nature of clothing and previous sexual history.

Research commissioned by the Scottish Government\(^1\) shows that nearly a quarter of the Scottish public think women are at least partly responsible for rape if they have been drinking, and 27% of people blame women if they are wearing revealing clothing at the time of the attack. Juries are made up of members of the public and at least some of them are likely to hold these kinds of attitudes. We have real concerns about what this means for jury decision making in rape cases, and particularly so where a larger majority is required to reach a decision.

3.2 Judicial Direction
To assist juries in coming to informed decisions Rape Crisis Scotland would urge the Government to implement its previously stated commitment to introduce judicial direction in sexual offence cases, by giving factual information on delayed disclosure and apparent lack of physical resistance.

925
3.2 Research
Given the extensive research on mock juries’ decision making and the influence of rape myths on this process \(^2\) we would also urge the Government to explore the feasibility of conducting research into the factors influencing the jury’s decision making process in Scotland. Whilst we appreciate the challenges this presents, in terms of addressing fair access to justice this issue merits further consideration.

3.3 Public Attitudes
On a wider note we would also ask that the Scottish Government commits to continuing to address and challenge prejudicial public attitudes, and thus those contained within juries as members of the public.

3.4 Evaluation
Given some of the thrust of the current Bill is to improve access to justice we would also like to stress the importance of ensuring some form of evaluation to address any unintended consequences, as appeared to be the case with the Sexual Offences Scotland Act 2002 – see below.

4. Further considerations

4.1 Not Proven Verdict
Rape Crisis Scotland welcomes the commitment of the Scottish Government to review the future of the ‘not proven’ verdict. The not proven verdict is most commonly used in cases of rape and sexual violence. According to the Scottish government statistical bulletin for criminal proceedings 2010-11 the proportion of people receiving a not proven verdict for rape or attempted rape was 26% with sexual assault at 30%, significantly higher than the overall mean of 16%.

Jury members can be notoriously reluctant to convict in rape cases, even in cases where there is significant evidence, and we are concerned that the not proven verdict could contribute to wrongful acquittals.

An argument which has been used in the past for retaining the not proven verdict is that it at least enables complainers to be reassured that the verdict didn’t mean that the jury didn’t believe them. However, a not proven verdict is still an acquittal, and can be just as devastating as a not guilty verdict. Following an article in the Daily Record about the number of men accused of rape who were acquitted by means of the not proven verdict, a number of rape survivors and their families wrote into the paper to tell of the devastating impact this verdict had on their lives (see for example http://www.dailyrecord.co.uk/news/scottish-news/mum-who-endured-double-rape-1393744). We believe that there is no convincing argument for retaining this verdict, and that it’s removal would lead to a less confusing jury decision making process.

\(^2\) For example BRIT. J. CRIMINOL. (2009) 49, 202 – 219 REACTING TO RAPE
Exploring Mock Jurors ‘Assessments of Complainant Credibility
Louise Ellison and Vanessa E. Munro
4.2 Sexual History Evidence

Whilst it is a matter not expressly covered by the Bill Rape Crisis Scotland would like to highlight our continued concern about the use of Sexual History evidence in Sexual offence cases.

The previous consultation document stated that the provisions of the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2002 relating to sexual history and character evidence “help to ensure that complainers in sexual offence cases cannot be subjected to potentially distressing cross-examination relating to their personal life or sexual history where this is irrelevant to the charge before the court.”

In 2007, the Scottish Government published an independent examination of the effectiveness of these provisions, which found that rather than restricting the introduction of this type of evidence, the legislation had actually led to its increase:

- 72% of trials featured an application to introduce sexual history or character evidence
- Only 7% of these applications were refused
- The Crown rarely objected to defence applications to introduce this type of evidence

We are aware from research that the use of sexual history evidence can have a negative impact both on the experience of the complainant and also on the possible outcome of the case. The research mentioned previously highlights that 15% of the general public believe a woman is at least partly responsible for being raped if she is known to have had many sexual partners.

This evaluation is now 5 years old, and guidance has since been introduced within the Crown Office advocating a ‘robust’ approach to applications to introduce sexual history and character evidence. However, in the absence of any current data about what is happening with the use of this type of evidence, we cannot share the confidence of the Scottish Government in the effectiveness of the legislation in protecting complainers.

We consider that there is a clear need to commission further research in this area, to enable us to obtain an up to date picture of whether or not the legislation is protecting complainers in the manner which the Scottish Parliament intended when it passed the legislation. In the interim we would ask that clear and accurate data is made available on the use of sexual history evidence as well as medical and sensitive records in sexual crimes cases. Research is clear on these and other factors such as mental health concerns or self harm as influential factors in jurors’ perceptions of witness credibility. Having accurate factual information would allow fuller scrutiny of the court process and a clearer understanding of the influential factors in sexual crime cases outcomes.

---

Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Salvation Army

The Salvation Army appreciates the opportunity to respond to the Government’s Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. The Salvation Army is a Christian Church and one of the largest charities in the UK, helping thousands of vulnerable people each day. Our mission statement says that we will ‘meet human needs … without discrimination’. Our services are freely on offer to all, regardless of gender, race or sexual orientation. We have an Equality and Diversity Policy which covers all protected characteristics under equality law and which applies to every of our service provision.

Whilst having no aspect substantive comment to make on the whole of the Bill, we would however wish to respond in support of Part 6, Chapter 1, Sections 83-85 of the proposed Bill. The Salvation Army is pleased to be associated with the comments submitted separately on behalf of the Action of Churches Together in Scotland (ACTS) Anti-Human Trafficking Group, and for ease of identification have appended a copy. However, because of our own work, internationally and within the United Kingdom, we would like to make some additional comments.

Since its inception, the Salvation Army has sought to reduce the worldwide phenomenon of abuse of individuals or groups of people for personal gain, now defined by the United Nations as human trafficking. It has established places of refuge for victims, sought legal challenges that would both prevent trafficking and punish those involved, and it has created alternatives for those vulnerable to trafficking. In particular within the United Kingdom we have made provision for a place of refuge as well as undertaken work with the Ministry of Justice Department United Kingdom Government in the delivery of specialist support services to adult victims of human trafficking in England and Wales since July 2011. It is against this background and from the perspective of direct service provision that we wish to encourage the Scottish Government to ensure a robust enactment of the proposal to introduce a statutory aggravation of people trafficked.

The Salvation Army would welcome the opportunity to continue discussing this and related matters with the Scottish Government and look forward to any such engagement.

26 August 2013
Salvation Army

Appendix 1

Copy of response from the ACTS Anti-Human Trafficking Group (submitted 29th August 2013, on behalf of the group by Revd Lindsey Sanderson)

Submission to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill Consultation by the Scottish Churches Anti-Human Trafficking Group.
As Convener of the Scottish Churches Anti-Human Trafficking Group (membership listed below) I write on behalf of the Group to offer our support for the proposal to make human trafficking a statutory aggravation in law. Specifically we wish to support Part 6, Chapter 1, Sections 83-85 of the proposed Bill.

The Group believes that there is a need to strengthen the legislation concerning human trafficking as part of a package of measures to reduce and prevent human trafficking in Scotland. We see the introduction of the statutory aggravation as a useful and important step in doing so.

The Group welcomes the decision of the Scottish Government to implement the recommendation of the EHRC that human trafficking become a statutory aggravation and we encourage the Government to do all it can to stop the trade in human beings.

Convener, Scottish Churches Anti-Human Trafficking Group
29 August 2013
I welcome the opportunity to submit comments on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill to the Justice Committee.

Although the Bill’s provisions are wide-ranging, I will focus on three issues of particular relevance from a children’s rights perspective: the rights and treatment of child suspects; the removal of the requirement for corroborated evidence in children’s hearings court proceedings; and the statutory aggravation relating to human trafficking offences.

I also wish to comment on three issues that are at present missing from the Bill: raising the age of criminal responsibility; the removal of defences to a charge relating to corporal punishment in the home; and taking into account the best interests of children of offenders and alleged offenders.

I. Comments on the Bill's Provisions

1. The Rights and Treatment of Child Suspects

The Policy Memorandum accompanying this Bill states that the aim of the Bill’s provisions relating to child suspects is:

‘to ensure that the highest standard of protection is offered to children who are involved in the formal criminal justice process.’

Whilst I question whether it is desirable to deal with children through the criminal justice system at all, I am pleased to note that the Bill, if enacted, would make some progress towards the Government's stated aim. There are, however, areas where the Bill could go further.

a. The Definition of Child

The Bill extends existing and new protections for child suspects to all children under 18. This is very welcome. Children who commit offences must be seen as children first and foremost. By virtue of their age and stage of development children are more vulnerable to violations of their rights, less able to assert their rights, and more dependent on adults to ensure that their rights are respected, protected and fulfilled.

Every international human rights instrument to which the UK has opted freely to commit itself and which defines ‘child’ requires or recommends that that definition include any person under the age of 18, as much of Scots child and family law has done for many years. I am therefore in full agreement with Lord Carloway’s conclusion to the effect that every suspect under 18 should be treated as a child, and welcome the Scottish Government’s action on this through the Bill.

\[^1\] Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, Policy Memorandum, p. 18 at para 103.

b. Waiver of Right to Legal Advice and Assistance of Parent/Adult

I note the provisions in s. 25, under which a child under 16 would be unable to waive their right to access to a solicitor at police interview, and a child aged 16-17 would not be able to do so without the consent of a ‘relevant person’\(^2\). This is in line with Lord Carloway’s recommendations on this matter, which was underpinned by the key principle that child suspects are children first and foremost, and generally benefit from support and guidance during a police interview.

I accept that the Bill’s provisions relating to waivers may be seen by some to be based on a degree of paternalism, not least because of the lack of any waiver for under-16s and the requirement for consent of an adult for 16-17 year-olds. However, on balance I support those provisions. It seems to me that it does make the effective protection of the child’s rights more likely and prevents circumstances in which children and young people’s rights are under-protected\(^3\). ECHR case law seems to support such a precautionary approach to providing support to children at police interview with reference to the power imbalance inherent in such situations, and the role of lawyers and others in addressing it\(^4\). The provision of access to a solicitor does of course not oblige the child to engage with the solicitor, should the child not wish to do so.

c. Duty on Police to Consider Child’s Best Interests

I strongly endorse the duty on the police in s. 42 to treat the child’s best interests as a primary consideration in decisions about arrest, detention, interview and charge.

I would add, however, that other decisions taken by the police under this Bill should also be included in the list in s. 42 (1); for example, those concerning any conditions imposed on a child under s. 14 (2) in the context of investigative liberation. Further, the language used in s. 42 is somewhat confused, in that the section title correctly refers to the child’s best interests, as does the Policy Memorandum\(^5\), but s. 42 (2) refers to the child’s ‘well-being’ as that which must be promoted and safeguarded. I suggest that subs. (2) be amended to reflect the requirement in article 3 of the UNCRC, Lord Carloway’s recommendation, and the Government’s apparent policy intention.

Making decisions concerning a child in a manner that regards the child’s best interests as a primary consideration is a clear requirement of the UNCRC and one of its key principles\(^6\). Doing so would be broadly consonant with existing Scots Law in \(^2\) Notably, ‘relevant person’ in this Bill does not have the meaning of the same term in children’s hearings legislation. This may cause some confusion, perhaps suggesting a need to reconsider the terminology.

\(^3\) In Children’s Reporter, Applicant 2012 S.L.T. (Sh Ct) 217, a child aged 12 had no access to a solicitor because their parent waived that right on the child’s behalf.

\(^5\) Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, Policy Memorandum, p. 18 at para 103.

\(^6\) Article 3 (1) of the UNCRC.
related areas\(^7\) as well as major children's policy initiatives such as Getting It Right for Every Child. It would further support the objectives of new diversionary approaches which are backed by our best evidence\(^8\). It would also be an opportunity for Scottish Ministers to demonstrate their stated commitment to the full implementation of the UNCRC in Scotland.

In practice, I would envisage that in order to fulfill the duty in s. 42, frontline decision-makers would assess all known circumstances of the child including the child’s views\(^9\), to establish what course of action may be in the child’s best interest. The result of that assessment would then be given due weight in the decision-making process alongside other relevant factors, and unless there are countervailing factors of ‘considerable force’, the option most in accordance with the child’s best interest should be followed\(^10\). This would require guidance and training for police officers and others who may be involved at the various stages of the process, such as procurators fiscal, as well as effective monitoring and accountability mechanisms overseen by senior officers. I would suggest that there may be considerable synergy with measures already being taken across the police service to embed the principles and processes of Getting It Right For Every Child, which are likely to pick up pace in light of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill currently before Parliament.

2. Removal of Corroboration in Children’s Hearings Court Proceedings

I note the provisions in Part 2 of the Bill abolishing the requirement for corroborated evidence in criminal proceedings, and Schedule 2, Part 2, Paragraph 21 which would have the same effect on proceedings before the sheriff relating to a referral to the Reporter on the ground that the child is alleged to have committed an offence. The likely result of this provision is that the Reporter’s evidential test may be met in cases in which is would currently not be met because of a lack of corroborated evidence.

While many of the children concerned will be vulnerable and likely to benefit from the intervention of the system, this again highlights the need to address the ‘unfinished business’ of the passage through Parliament of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 and the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. I welcomed the limited progress being made on the ‘decriminalisation’ of children through those two Acts and secondary legislation to be made under the 2011 Act. However, it remains my position that the Scottish Government and its justice partners, particularly the police, should do more to ensure that the right balance is struck in terms of the retention of information on children and young people’s offending. This is essential to ensuring that children and young people can ‘move on’ from past

\(^7\) See, for example, s. 16 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, and more recently ss. 25-27 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

\(^8\) For example, the Whole Systems Approach, which appears to heed the conclusion of the Edinburgh Study on Youth Transitions and Crime that an approach characterised by ‘maximum diversion’ is most effective in promoting children’s desistance from offending; cf. McAra, Lesley & McVie, Susan (2007), ‘Youth justice? The impact of system contact on patterns of desistance from offending’, European Journal of Criminology 4 (3), 315-345.

\(^9\) United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (2009), General Comment No 12: The right of the child to be heard, CRC/C/GC/12, para 70f.

\(^10\) ZH (Tanzania) (FC) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2011] UKSC 4, per Lord Kerr at para 46. This judgment contains a very useful judicial discussion on the correct application of the best interest principle, albeit in a different context; especially Baroness Hale’s and Lord Kerr’s judgments.
offending and do not have their life chances curtailed by the data legacy and the stigma associated with it for what in most cases are relatively minor offences.

I therefore call on the Committee to urge the Scottish Government and Police Scotland to intensify their efforts to address this matter.

3. Statutory Aggravation for Human Trafficking-Related Offences

I welcome the statutory aggravation for offences relating to human trafficking in s. 83, which is intended to increase the effectiveness of the Scottish legal framework for the prosecution of this crime. However, I have some concerns that as the overall legal framework remains somewhat fragmented, the aggravation may become the preferred option for the prosecution of traffickers rather that the specific human trafficking offences. I understand this is not the intention, but it remains a possibility. There would therefore appear to be a case for a review of the operation of the specific trafficking legislation and any barriers to its use for police and prosecutors, and how its effectiveness can be improved.

II. Comments on Issues Omitted from the Bill

I also wish to comment on matters which are not currently included in the Bill, but ought to be.

1. Raising the Age of Criminal Responsibility

Scotland’s very low age of criminal responsibility remains a matter of great concern to me. One of the lowest in the world at eight, it has long tarnished Scotland’s international reputation in terms of children’s rights: The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child recommended raising the age in 1995, 2002 and 2008\(^\text{11}\), and its authoritative guidance on the implementation of the UNCRC in the context of youth justice denounces an age of criminal responsibility lower than 12 as ‘not internationally acceptable’\(^\text{12}\).

I therefore welcomed the Scottish Government’s commitment to ‘give fresh consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12 with a view to bringing forward any legislative change in the lifetime of this Parliament’\(^\text{13}\). Prosecution of a child under 12 is no longer competent\(^\text{14}\), and a recognition of the dangers of criminalisation of children is now reflected in law\(^\text{15}\). Policy and practice have been moving away from the discredited approach which relied on justice solutions and criminalisation, towards an approach based on ‘maximum diversion’ and tackling root causes of offending\(^\text{16}\).

\(^\text{12}\) UN Committee on the Rights of the Child (2007), General Comment No. 10: Children’s Rights in Juvenile Justice, para 32.
\(^\text{14}\) Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, s. 52 (2).
\(^\text{15}\) Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, ss. 187f.
\(^\text{16}\) See, for example, the Whole Systems Approach to tackling young people’s offending: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Justice/crimes/youth-justice/reoffending.
As a result, the current age of criminal responsibility at eight seems anachronistic. However, it continues to result in criminalisation of a small number of children whose offending behaviour, while cause for concern, is nearly always minor and is appropriately dealt with informally through Early and Effective Intervention, or through our welfare-based children’s hearings system and the wide range of interventions available to it.

I urge the Committee to press the Scottish Government on this issue, and to adopt an amendment raising the age of criminal responsibility in due course.

2. Equal Protection from Assault for Children

A further issue of significant concern is the continuing legality of corporal punishment against children by their parents/carers in Scotland. Section 51 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 provides a defence of ‘justifiable assault’ to a charge relating to such punishment, except where the assault involved a blow to the head, shaking, or the use of an implement.

The Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill aims to ‘make rights real’ and to promote early intervention, including in the early years. The Scottish Government’s consultation document A Scotland for Children refers to the evidence for attention to the early years such as the large and growing evidence base relating to infant brain development and the destructive impact that trauma and abuse can have on a child’s whole life and their transition to adulthood. The single most important contribution the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill could make to the Scottish Government’s vision to make Scotland ‘the best place in the world for children to grow up’ is to repeal s. 51 of the 2003 Act and any similar common law defences, which have perpetuated the permissibility of the infliction of exactly the kind of childhood trauma that A Scotland for Children highlights. The fact that this Bill and the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill coincide in their parliamentary timetabling presents an ideal opportunity to remove the statutory endorsement of this unjustifiable risk to children’s healthy development and wellbeing, and put in place improved support mechanisms for children and parents, coupled with initiatives promoting positive, non-violent parenting.

Providing equal protection from assault for children would answer a string of recommendations made by International Human Rights Treaty Bodies including the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, the Committee to Eliminate All Forms of Discrimination Against Women and the UN Committee Against Torture, and by

---

17 Please also note the evidence submitted by Children Are Unbeatable, which I endorse.
18 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, s. 51 (3).
21 Ibid, p. 3.
23 UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (2013), Concluding observations on the seventh periodic report of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, para 35.
some of Scotland’s allies such as Norway, Sweden and Finland\textsuperscript{25}, which are frequently cited as models for progressive social policy by Ministers and others.

3. Duty to Consider Best Interest of the Children of Offenders

I have welcomed above the provision in s. 42 of the Bill, which requires the police to consider the child’s best interests in making decisions relating to arrest, charge and other matters. Another long-standing concern in the criminal justice system, which this office and its partners, especially Families Outside and Circle have been highlighting through a series of reports and other work since 2008 is the impact on children of the imprisonment of a parent\textsuperscript{26}.

A recent major study in 4 European countries including the UK confirmed much of our findings, and supported our recommendations\textsuperscript{27}. Chief among those has been the need to consider children’s best interests at various points of their parent’s journey through the criminal justice system including arrest, bail/remand decisions, sentencing and early release/Home Detention Curfew\textsuperscript{28}. We were pleased when the UK, with Scottish Government support, accepted a recommendation made in the course of the UK’s human rights peer review at the UN Human Rights Council asked the UK to ‘Ensure that the best interests of the child are taken into account when arresting, detaining, sentencing or considering early release for a sole or primary carer of the child, bearing in mind that visits of a parent in prison are primarily a right of the child rather than a privilege of the prisoner that can be withdrawn as a disciplinary measure.’\textsuperscript{29}

It is my view that this Bill presents a prime opportunity to make some progress on this important issue, which according to varying estimates affects up to 27,000 children and young people in Scotland each year\textsuperscript{30}.

Tam Baillie
Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People
5 September 2013

\textsuperscript{24} UN Committee Against Torture (2013), \textit{Concluding observations on the fifth periodic report of the United Kingdom}, para 29.
\textsuperscript{25} UN Human Rights Council (2012), \textit{Report of the Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland}, Recommendations 110.78 (Sweden), 110.79 (Norway) and 110.80 (Finland).
\textsuperscript{27} Jones & Wainaina-Woźna (eds.) (2013), \textit{Children of Prisoners: Interventions and Mitigations to Strengthen Mental Health} (COPING), Huddersfield, etc: University of Huddersfield and others.
\textsuperscript{28} Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (2011), op cit, Follow-Up Recommendation 5.
\textsuperscript{29} UN Human Rights Council (2012), Recommendation 110.96 (Slovakia).
Sections 30 to 33

Provision of responsible adults and Appropriate Adults

The extension to the age bracket within which an Appropriate Adult should be used from 16 years to 18 years raises concerns that 16 year and 17 year olds who would previously have been entitled to this kind of support will be disadvantage.

The bill does make provision for a responsible adult to be present for 16 and 17 year olds. However there is no explicit requirement for responsible adults to have the skills or training to address the communication difficulties these young people may present. Subsequently there is real concern that vulnerable adults who would previously had the support of an appropriate adult may now experience difficulties during the police process.

While it may still be possible for local appropriate adult services to provide support to 16 and 17 year olds on a voluntary basis this presents a potential for inconsistent practice across Scotland.

The extension to the age range within which a responsible adult is required from 16 years to 18 years raises resource issue for local authorities. Previously the responsibility for providing a responsible adult where a parent/carer/guardian was not available fell to local authorities.

The extension to the age range and the opportunities for 16 and 17 year old to choose not to have their parent etc informed may result in an increase in demand for input from local authorities in these situations. This raises concerns with regards to the availability of staff to provide the support and the increase in costs associated with providing this service.

Section 25

Consent to interview without a solicitor

The requirement to have a solicitor present in all interviews for adults aged 16 years and over who meet the criteria defined in subsection (6) (a) raises concerns.

The recent changes to legislation giving all suspects who are questioned in police stations the right to legal advice has resulted in lengthy delays in the interview process starting. This is particularly problematic for adults as defined under subsection (6)(a) where it is assessed as necessary for a solicitor to attend to provide advice.
The requirement for the solicitor to present for all interviews involving this group of adults has the potential to exacerbate this problem further if the availability of solicitors is not sufficient to meet the increased demand for the service.

This requirement also raises issues for appropriate adult services. At present Appropriate Adults are present when the person is given their rights to access a solicitor. Appropriate adults, especially in rural areas, are required to remain at the police station until the solicitor arrives to ensure they are available to assist during the police interview. The delay in solicitors attending presents major financial issues for those appropriate adult services that use dedicated, self-employed staff, as it results in Appropriate Adults being paid during a period when they are not actively involved in providing a service. For appropriate adult services that utilise existing local authority staff the delay presents a serious impact on staff resources. Currently there is no reliable system in place to indicate how long it will take for a solicitor to arrive at the police station.

Statutory Responsibility

The bill does not place a statutory responsibility on any agency for the provision of Appropriate Adult Services. This raises concern that some agencies may withdraw from providing the service when faced with having to prioritise statutory responsibilities within current financial restraints.

Ian Wilson
Chairperson
28 August 2013
SAMH is for Scotland’s mental health. Since 1923 we have been working across Scotland to promote mental health and get people talking. We do this through community based services across Scotland, supporting 2,500 people every week; promoting mental health through physical activity, working to prevent suicide, challenging the stigma surrounding mental health issues and tackling bullying; campaigning for positive change – influencing mental health policy and legislation; and raising funds to continue this vital work.

We are grateful for the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. We hope that this legislation will provide the required emphasis to improve the experiences of people with mental health problems who come into contact with the criminal justice system. Estimates for mental health problems and mental disorders within the Scottish prison population vary, given the difficulty in assessment, but the numbers are high. Therefore, ensuring that individuals with a mental disorder receive appropriate support is fundamental to their human rights. It also demonstrates a clear need to legislate in this area.

The Bill contains provisions to ensure that vulnerable adult suspects with a mental disorder (as defined by the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003), are not disadvantaged in comparison to their non-vulnerable counterparts during police procedures. To clarify, the term mental disorder is used in this context to cover mental illness, personality disorders, dementia, autistic spectrum disorder, acquired brain injury and learning disabilities.

SAMH welcomes the intention of these provisions, as we know that historically, people with a mental disorder have not always got a helpful response from the police, and sometimes reported that there was a failure to recognise signs of mental distress. Since the Scottish Government’s 2002 evaluation of the Appropriate Adult Scheme, several measures have attempted to improve the operation and management of the schemes. The Committee will be aware of the National Guidance published in 2007 and the Mental Welfare Commission’s report, Justice Denied, also made a series of recommendations in response to Ms A’s treatment. Subsequent national standards were developed and issued to Appropriate Adult services to demonstrate how the service should be delivered.

---

2Evaluation of the operation of appropriate adult schemes throughout Scotland in 2002. Dr Lindsay Thomson, Viki Galt, Dr RajanDarjee, Division of Psychiatry, The University of Edinburgh
4http://www.mwcscot.org.uk/media/51943/Justice%20Denied%20Ms%20A.pdf
Access to Appropriate Adults

SAMH understands that access to an appropriate adult is a reasonable adjustment specifically to ensure understanding, as much as possible, between a suspect, victim or witness with a mental disorder as defined by the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, who experiences communicative difficulties as a result, and the police. (Appropriate adults are not a stated special measure for court, although SAMH would contend that extending their use could improve communication and understanding in such settings for some people with a mental disorder). Therefore this measure will not be suitable for all people with a mental health problem, nor will it address all the possible needs associated with mental health problems. We would also be concerned that others who might require the service might be overlooked, especially people with autistic spectrum disorder who are high functioning but don’t communicate or process information in the way desired by police processes. As access to an appropriate adult may be required if the individual has a learning disability, dementia or brain injury, as well as a mental health problem, this potentially represents a significant number of people.

Ahead of the formation of regulations, it would be helpful to determine the satisfaction amongst people who have been supported by an appropriate adult; whether there are currently sufficient numbers of Appropriate Adults within Scotland to meet demand for suspects, victims and witnesses; and whether follow up with individuals who felt they were not provided with this support could be achieved.

Appropriate adults – workforce and training

The Bill will give Scottish Ministers regulation-making powers to detail who may provide Appropriate Adult Services and the training necessary to become an Appropriate Adult. We note that the requirements placed on states by Article 13 (Access to Justice) of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities; while the proposed statutory provisions regarding appropriate adult support for vulnerable adults will make progress towards ensuring effective access to justice for persons with disabilities; however, the legislation does not satisfactorily address the requirements on other agencies to be able to identify people with mental health problems, which is necessary to then ensure that the vulnerable person is provided with appropriate support, either as part of the Appropriate Adult scheme, or in terms of medical support. As the Convention states:

‘And in order to help to ensure effective access to justice for persons with disabilities, States Parties shall promote appropriate training for those working in the field of administration of justice, including police and prison staff.’

SAMH hopes that an increase in the numbers of trained Appropriate Adults will also be able to support vulnerable victims and witnesses to communicate with the police, when required. We note that Appropriate Adults are mostly drawn from social work backgrounds, and therefore we highlight the need to ensure that there is adequate workforce capacity within that field to continue to provide this role. In the forthcoming regulations, SAMH recommends that training of Appropriate Adults and service delivery of the Appropriate Adult scheme must be uniform across Scotland; and that it should sit as a funded, staffed, stand-alone service, rather than rely upon extraction from social work departments. We are aware that in areas which have historically relied on social worker extraction, this is the biggest barrier to people getting help, as already stretched departments can rarely afford for a social worker to absent themselves for a significant period of time. The previous approaches of Tayside and Fife should be looked at as good practice, and their approaches should be costed, funded and rolled out nationwide. We look forward to further consultation on the regulations in due course.

According to the Policy Memorandum to the Bill, 'where a person is assessed as vulnerable, the police will endeavour to secure the attendance of an Appropriate Adult as soon as reasonably practicable after detention and prior to questioning. As is current practice, the Scottish Government would expect the police, in deciding whether a person is vulnerable: to be guided by comments from carers or others who know the person, to seek medical advice if necessary, and to keep matters under review in case vulnerability becomes apparent at a later stage.' However, it should also be noted that as Appropriate Adults are to provide impartial communication support, they may not be the most suitable person if the Police suspect the individual is 'vulnerable'. The suspect, victim or witness might require medical attention if they are distressed or unwell.

SAMH’s research with Capability Scotland\(^5\), which involved focus groups of people who had come into contact with the criminal justice system, also described the attitudinal and communication barriers as a major difficulty:

“People with mental health problems and other impairments find attitudinal barriers, and institutional failure to recognise signs of mental distress, PTSD, crisis, mania, psychosis, catatonia, depression or other mental health conditions highly problematic when interacting with the Police, the Courts, Solicitors and Prison staff.”

And recommended:

“Communications by Justice Professionals with (people who have mental health problems) must be respectful, active and inclusive and should seek to include families, peer supporters, advocates, social workers and CPNs where possible. When working with supporters Justice Staff should talk to the supported individual rather than ‘about them’.

These concerns are reinforced by the 2013 HMICS’ thematic inspection of the care and welfare of persons detained in police custody in Scotland\(^6\), where the following points were made:

“10.4 The inspection revealed widespread variation in how forces responded to situations where the mental health of an individual was a cause for concern. This is a challenging and difficult area, particularly when those health concerns are exacerbated by the immediate presence of alcohol and/or drugs.

Accordingly, forces find it difficult to provide definitive guidance which encapsulates the range of possible scenarios facing police officers and staff where there is a concern for the mental state of certain detainees.

10.5 Almost without exception, staff interviewed during the inspection expressed a desire to have clearer processes in place, including protocols with local mental health practitioners. Some of these factors are beyond the scope of resolution by the police service and accordingly the ACPOS Custody Manual of Guidance only offers advice on assessments under the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 2003.

10.6 HMICS is aware that there is currently an ongoing project sponsored by ACPOS, to engage with NHS Scotland, with a view to producing an appropriate healthcare model to support the care and welfare of any person brought into police custody and to reduce the associated costs that are currently borne by the police service. It is anticipated that this will extend to the identification and treatment of any persons coming into police custody with mental health issues. There is therefore an opportunity to introduce some uniformity of approach to ensure a standardised approach throughout Scotland."

The following recommendation was also made:

“Post-reform, the Police Service of Scotland should develop a standard national training course for staff working in the custody setting and that this should include a refresher training programme to support ongoing staff development.”

Our research with Capability Scotland highlighted that staff within the justice sector need to be able to ask sensitive questions that might allow someone to disclose information about their mental health; the national standards for Appropriate Adults also encourages this approach. The Scottish Government evaluation of Appropriate Adults in 2002\(^7\) showed that almost all Appropriate Adults had received training relating to their role, however training amongst other professional groups was low. SAMH is concerned about whether police officers in this position have the skills and have received the required training to meet the role which is being proposed for them; whether police support staff, who would be working in areas involving custody and detention, would have the skills, training and status to determine and question whether someone was potentially vulnerable, and what is the suitable response; and if a solicitor had the necessary training to determine whether the suspect was vulnerable and could therefore not waive their support.

SAMH recognises that evaluating the vulnerability and capacity of an individual is difficult, and can be compounded by the circumstances of being in police custody. Stress and anxiety levels are likely to be raised, and the use of alcohol, drugs and/or prescription medication could all have an impact on the individual’s behaviour.

We are aware that newly qualified police officers currently receive a level of training in mental health at the Scottish Police College – indeed, SAMH delivers suicide prevention training in this setting. However, it might be beneficial for mental health awareness and mental health first aid training to be delivered to new recruits, and for continuing professional development of all officers to include mental health awareness and suicide prevention training. We think it would be beneficial if solicitors and police support staff also received this training. While not everyone with a mental health problem would necessarily qualify for an appropriate adult to support them in communicating to the police, improving training and awareness amongst the staff listed will ensure that the individual is treated appropriately, and this could improve take up of mental health community payback orders or access to diversion schemes.

\(^7\)Evaluation of the operation of appropriate adult schemes throughout Scotland in 2002. Dr Lindsay Thomson, Viki Galt, Dr RajanDarjee, Division of Psychiatry, The University of Edinburgh

To support the rights of vulnerable suspects to the highest attainable standards of mental health, SAMH also proposes that links between the NHS and the Police are strengthened, to ensure that prompt access to a GP, psychiatrist or CPN could be provided if a vulnerable suspect needed medical attention. We know that there are good examples of local partnerships in this regard – best practice needs to be disseminated and built upon, especially given the reforms to the health, social care and criminal justice landscapes.

SAMH
30 August 2013
INTRODUCTION

The Scottish Child Law Centre (SCLC or the Centre) is an independent charity, based in Edinburgh which provides services to the whole of Scotland. The Centre is the only law centre in Scotland dedicated solely to the law as it affects the under 21s. The aim of the Centre is to promote knowledge and use of Scots law and children’s rights for the benefit of children and young people in Scotland. SCLC provides free advice by telephone, email and letter on all aspects of Scots law relating to children and young people. In addition, the Centre provides publications on a range of subjects as well as providing training, conferences and seminars. SCLC also has a consultative and advisory function for local and central government and through this seeks to improve the content and practice of the law as it relates to and affects children.

RESPONSE

The Centre’s response is limited to those sections which affect children and young people. We support the aim of the changes that the bill proposes regarding children and young people, which is to safeguard their interests and extend protection.

Chapter Two: Custody: Person not officially accused

With regard to the time that a person may be kept in custody, we note that le s. 10 (b) provides a test that it must be necessary and proportionate. However we recommend that consideration be given to reducing the time that a child under 16 may be kept in custody.

We also recommend that a child should be kept in custody in a police station only in exceptional circumstances. See comments to Chapter 8, s. 56 below.

Chapter Four: Police interview, rights of suspects

s. 23

The Centre notes that information given before interview is commonly provided by means of a telephone discussion with a solicitor. We are concerned that while this may be sufficient for adults, it is not adequate for children. A telephone conversation is not likely to be sufficient preparation for a child, and does not easily allow the solicitor to be satisfied that the advice has been understood. We recommend that consideration be given to requiring that a child under 16 is able to have face to face information from a qualified solicitor prior to interview.
s. 25(2)

(a) The Centre fully supports the extra protections given to children under 16, by ensuring that they have a solicitor present during a police interview. The calls to the advice line of the Scottish Child Law Centre have revealed too many young people who have waived their right, or have had it waived for them by their parents, and who have struggled as a result. We are also concerned that this protection should include all police interviews, not only those which take place in police stations. We have encountered a number of cases where children have been told that if they have a lawyer, they will have to go to the station and that that would be much harder for them.

(b) The Centre supports the extra protection for those aged 16 and 17, but notes that there is a great responsibility placed upon the constable to identify that the person has a mental disorder.

s. 25(3)

The SCLC welcomes the support given to those aged 16 and 17 by a relevant person. We note that a person to which this subsection applies may waive the right to a solicitor only with the agreement of a relevant person. It has been the experience of our advice service that parents often do not understand the implications of refusing legal advice for their children. A typical example is the belief that if you are innocent you do not need a lawyer during a police interview. We are concerned that it will be necessary for the police to provide relevant persons and young persons aged 16 and 17 with clear information as to the implications of refusing legal advice.

s. 26

The Centre has some concerns that it will be necessary for those under 17 to have clear explanations from the police about the lack of obligation to answer any questions apart from those listed in subsection 3.

Chapter Five: Rights of Suspects in police custody

The SCLC supports the right to have intimation sent to another person, not only for the under 16s, but for those aged 16 and 17. This solves a current problem. It is particularly welcome that the young person may choose the adult who is to be notified. Consideration should be given to ensuring that where the young person is in care intimation is sent to those who have the care of that person.

Chapter Six: Police powers and duties

The SCLC welcomes the requirement that the constable has a duty to consider the best interests of the child, however we are concerned at the use of “well being” in subsection (2). The UNCRC and the rest of Scottish Child Law use “best interests” and “welfare” when referring to children. These have well established legal meanings and considerable case law. “Well being” is proposed in the Children and Young person (Scotland) Bill and has been criticised by the Law Society of Scotland, the Faculty of Advocates, and the SCLC as being unclear, and out of step with the rest of child law. It is not helpful to introduce a concept that is less clear to compete with the rest of established law.

Chapter Eight: General

s. 56

S. 189 of the Children’s Hearing (Scotland) Act places restrictions upon a police station being used as a place of safety. This is for the good reason that a police station is not a suitable environment for a child. The SCLC recommends that similar restrictions be placed upon a child being detained in a police station. Detention in a police station should be for a minimum amount of time, and otherwise only in exceptional circumstances.

Part Two: Corroboration and statements

The requirement for corroboration has been an essential protection for those accused of criminal offences in Scotland for centuries. The SCLC questions whether it is equitable, just or justifiable for this protection to be removed.

The Scottish Child Law Centre has concerns that our court system may not be fully compliant with ECHR and UNCRC in cases where children are facing trial for serious offences. This Bill provides a suitable opportunity for the Scottish Parliament to consider how we can ensure our system is more compliant in these cases. We attach a proposal, contained in an appendix to our response, which may assist in these considerations.

Scottish Child Law Centre
6 September 2013
Scottish Child Law Centre response to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill – appendix

Proposal

Where children have been accused of very serious criminal offences which are dealt with by the High Court, they are facing a complex legal procedure, must instruct not only a solicitor, but counsel, and will be required to face a stressful and often intellectually and emotionally challenging environment. While measures have been taken already to make that environment more “child friendly” there is more that can be done to ensure that a child has a trial that is compliant with the ECHR Article 6 (1) requirement that a trial be fair.

In the case of SC v United Kingdom (2005) 40 E.H.R.R. 10 the court held that Article 6(1) of the ECHR had been breached as the child had “notwithstanding his fitness to plead….was not capable of participating effectively in his trial to the extent required by Art 6(1).” We need to ensure that children in Scotland who are facing trial for serious offences are able to participate effectively in their own defence. In the case of SC it was stated that:

“a defendant should be able to follow what is said by the prosecution witnesses and, if represented, to explain to his own lawyers his version of events, point out any statements with which he disagrees and make them aware of any facts which should be put forward in his defence.”

This requires active participation, and an ability to understand often complex matters. The judgement further states that “it is essential that proceedings take full account of his age, level of maturity and intellectual and emotional capacities, and that steps were taken to promote his ability to understand and participate, including conducting the hearing in such a way as to reduce as far as possible his feelings of intimidation and inhibition.”

Children who become involved in the criminal justice system are often children who have complex difficulties. Studies have shown that a high proportion of young people in secure units and young person’s institutions have significant communication difficulties, and low educational attainment. In contrast to this, in cases involving sexual offences or serious injury, if the same child was a witness, rather than the accused, the presumption would be that they were vulnerable witnesses who would not even attend court to give evidence, but would give it from a remote location as the stress of attendance would be potentially too much to cope with.

In serious criminal cases the child’s capacity to instruct representation appears not given the same consideration as is the case in civil law. In recent years there have been cases in the English system where the children’s capacity to instruct was questionable. It is also the case that while a child may have capacity to instruct at the outset of a court case, the stress of the experience may lead to that capacity being reduced to the point where the child has no functional capacity. While in recent years measures have been adopted with the intention of making the experience of court more “child friendly”, these measures do not fully address the problem of the child with limited or diminished capacity.

The Scottish Child Law Centre recommends that consideration be given to developing options for use in serious criminal cases, which would allow the evidence to be tested, while providing support for child accused to ensure that our criminal courts are further compliant with Article 6 (1) of the ECHR and Article 40 (3) of the UNCRC.

The following is an outline proposal only. Development would require expert criminal law contribution and evaluation.

When the options should be available to a court:

For use when a child is facing a High Court trial, although it should be available to a sheriff if a jury trial and they think circumstances warrant it. To ensure that in these comparatively rare cases that Scottish justice is fully ECHR compliant.

When should a court consider the options

Child should be assessed by suitably qualified professionals such as child psychology/ speech and language therapists for:

- Capacity to instruct legal advice and to participate in their own defence
- Assessed for factors such as: speech/language difficulties, any conditions such as ADHD/autism which may affect ability to participate, emotional age
- The child’s capacity to deal with the stress of attendance during parts of the proceedings

The results of the assessment should be made available to defence, prosecution and judge. If the assessment shows that a child will have difficulty in instructing legal representation, or coping with attendance at court then we suggest that a preliminary hearing could consider which options were appropriate for the child. Training for solicitors, advocates and judges would be needed to ensure they understood the relevant factors for the child. It would, of course, be for the judge to decide what explanation would be given to the jury.

Options open to the court could include:

- The appointment of a specialist curator. The curator should be a criminal law solicitor or advocate. He or she would have the responsibility of ensuring that the child understands what is going on, and assisting them to participate in instruction as much as possible. The curator would represent the interests of the child in proceedings, and would assist the child in following the evidence, and instructing legal representation. It would be necessary for he or she to attend the proceedings. The curator would be appointed for the child and their role with the child’s family should be limited, to avoid any conflict of interest.
- As with safeguarders in the children’s hearing system, government would need to set standards and training requirements for those acting in this capacity.

- Excusing the child from attendance during parts of the proceedings if it was considered that the child will not cope and that there would be no risk to the fairness of the trial.

- Allowing the child to attend by video link from another location if it was in their best interests.

The courts can already take steps to adapt some of the provisions for vulnerable witnesses in the case of vulnerable accused, but the SCLC believes that consideration should be given to the development of clearer rules and procedures.

It may be necessary to reassess the capacity of a child during a trial, as the stress of the experience may lead to loss of capacity. It may be also be necessary to reassess the ability of the child to cope with the stress of the trial. It would be the responsibility of the curator, or in the absence of a curator, the defence to bring this to the attention of the court and ask for a hearing, similar to the preliminary hearing proposed above, to consider the matter.

Cost

The proposal would increase the cost of a criminal case, but as these cases are comparatively uncommon there should not be a disproportionate cost to the public purse.

Scottish Child Law Centre
6 September 2013
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration

Background
The Children's Hearings System is Scotland’s distinct system of child protection and youth justice. Among its fundamental principles are:

- whether concerns relate to their welfare or behaviour, the needs of children or young people in trouble should be met through a single holistic and integrated system
- a preventative approach, involving early identification and diagnosis of problems, is essential
- the welfare of the child remains at the centre of all decision making and the child’s best interests are paramount throughout
- the child’s engagement and participation is crucial to good decision making

SCRA operates the Reporter service which sits at the heart of the system. SCRA employs Children's Reporters who are located throughout Scotland, working in close partnership with other professionals such as social work, education, the police, the health service, the legal profession and the courts system.

SCRA’s vision is that vulnerable children and young people in Scotland are safe, protected and offered positive futures. We will seek to achieve this by adhering to the following key values:

- The voice of the child must be heard
- Our hopes and dreams for the children of Scotland are what unite us
- Children and young people’s experiences and opinions guide us
- We are approachable and open
- We bring the best of the past with us into the future to meet new challenges.

Response

Corroboration
We recognise the complexities of this issue and the need to balance a number of different considerations. As in the adult criminal justice system, it is likely that the removal of corroboration would make it easier for the Reporter to establish grounds for referral that involve a child committing an offence. This is mitigated to some extent as the Children’s Hearings System is designed to promote the welfare of the child and the case of S v Miller confirmed that a child referred to a hearing on these grounds is not considered to be a person charged with a criminal offence. However, we recognise that, due to legislative provision in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act and the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act (as modified by the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011), acceptance/establishment of offence grounds within the Hearings System can result in potentially significant consequences for the child (e.g. retention of DNA and forensic evidence or matters appearing in disclosure checks). On balance, we consider that if the requirement for corroboration is being removed for criminal proceedings, it should be removed in relation to our offence proofs as well.

In terms of potential impact, part of the Reporter’s decision making when considering whether to bring a child to a hearing is about the sufficiency of evidence. They are required to anticipate whether, if the case went to proof, they could establish the grounds to the necessary standard of evidence. Clearly the removal of the requirement for corroboration would factor in to the decision at that stage. So, it is possible that more children might come to hearings on offence grounds as a result of this change and this is likely to relate most commonly to offences that are committed in private, such as sexual offences. However we do not expect the numbers to be significant.

We understand that there have been some discussions in the context of the criminal system around potential additional safeguards. In relation to the Children’s Hearings System, we would make the following points.

Firstly, decision making within the hearings system takes place on a different basis than within the criminal system. For example, the test for referral to a children’s hearing is not simply based on the sufficiency of evidence, but also on whether or not compulsory measures of supervision are necessary for the child. In doing so, Reporters will take account of the welfare of the child. This is arguably therefore a higher test than that applied by the Procurator Fiscal when deciding whether or not to prosecute.

Furthermore, we understand that one of the additional safeguards under consideration for the criminal system is the introduction of a power for the sheriff to rule, on application by the accused, that there is no case to answer. We note that in relation to children’s hearings court proceedings, Rule 3.47(2) of the Child Care and Maintenance Rules requires the sheriff to consider whether sufficient evidence has been led of the offence at the close of the Reporter’s evidence, with all parties being entitled to make submissions on the point. Effectively this is a “no case to answer” test to be applied by the sheriff, even though it is not expressed in these terms. We do not therefore consider that there is a need for additional safeguards within the hearings system if the requirement for corroboration is removed. However, we are more than happy to consider any suggestions that might be brought forward by anyone else, with a view to ensuring that they fit within the overall ethos and structure of the system and that they would not have any adverse unintended consequences.

Child suspects

We are supportive of the provisions in Chapter 5 of the Bill, in relation to child suspects. In particular, the provisions which enshrine the need to make the best interests of the child a primary consideration in all decision making are to be welcomed. However, we note that there is some terminological inconsistency across legislation. The Children and Young People Bill, for example, refers to wellbeing.
While in practical terms there may be little difference in interpretation, some consistency would be welcome.

The definition of a child as being under 18 years of age is a positive step, as is the Bill’s recognition that children’s capacity evolves as they grow older and that there is a need for different provision for children aged 16 or 17 in relation to waiving their right to legal assistance or to the presence of an appropriate adult. We would suggest however that consideration is given to whether children aged 16 or 17 who are subject to compulsory measures of supervision, or who are subject to an open referral to the Reporter, should be granted additional protection as both are currently defined as “children” in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Investigative liberation
While we welcome the policy intention of this provision, we have some concerns about how widely the power is drawn. Our understanding is that the power would apply to all children, in relation to any offences (although the policy memorandum says it will be used only in more serious offences), that the conditions imposed could include a curfew, and that the only way to seek to vary or remove the conditions would be for the child to apply to sheriff. We believe that further consideration is needed to define the scope of the power and to restrict its application only to more serious offences, otherwise there is a risk that children will be drawn into formal court processes unnecessarily. A possible starting point would be for investigative liberation to only be an option where the offence is one of those in the Lord Advocate’s Guidelines to Chief Constables reporting to Procurators Fiscal of offences alleged to have been committed by children, in which case the child would be potentially subject to prosecution and the court would have a role.

In relation to the curfew power, we note that similar conditions imposed on children by a Children’s Hearing would be accompanied by support for the child by the local authority. We do not believe that such restrictive conditions should be an option for the police if that kind of support is not available to sit alongside the curfew condition.

Other issues
Section 43 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 makes provision for situations where children are arrested and either kept in custody by the police or released on an undertaking to appear at court. Despite a clear link between this section and various provisions of the bill, it would appear that section 43 is not amended by the bill. We consider that the “necessary and proportionate” test should apply to the continued decision making by the police about keeping a child in custody (and about where the child should be kept) and that section 43 should be amended accordingly. We also consider that further thought should be given to ensure that section 43 “fits” appropriately and consistently with the provisions of the bill.

Conclusion
We welcome the Bill and, subject to our comments above, the provisions that focus specifically on children and on the Children’s Hearings System. We look forward to further discussions as the legislation progresses through the parliamentary scrutiny process.

SCRA
30 August 2013
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Churches Anti-Human Trafficking Group

Scottish Churches Anti-Human Trafficking Group support for the proposal to make human trafficking a statutory aggravation in law. Specifically we wish to support Part 6, Chapter 1, Sections 83-85 of the proposed Bill.

The Group believes that there is a need to strengthen the legislation concerning human trafficking as part of a package of measures to reduce and prevent human trafficking in Scotland. We see the introduction of the statutory aggravation as a useful and important step in doing so.

The Group welcomes the decision of the Scottish Government to implement the recommendation of the EHRC that human trafficking become a statutory aggravation and we encourage the Government to do all it can to stop the trade in human beings.

Revd. Lindsey Sanderson
Convener, Scottish Churches Anti-Human Trafficking Group
28 August 2013

Annexe

Membership of the Scottish Churches Anti-Human Trafficking Group

Baptist Union of Scotland – awaiting confirmation Care for the Family
Catholic Church in Scotland
Church of Scotland
Methodist Church
Religious Society of Friends
Salvation Army
Scottish Episcopal Church
United Reformed Church
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission

1.0 Introduction
1.1 In June 2013 the Scottish Government presented a Bill to Parliament (the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill 2013) based upon the recommendations contained within the Carloway Report and issued a call for stakeholders and interested parties to submit written evidence on the content of the Bill. The Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (“the SCCRC”) welcomes this opportunity and is pleased to provide its short response which is by way of an update on the position outlined previously in its written responses both to the initial Carloway Review and to the subsequent Scottish Government Consultation Paper “Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice: The Carloway Report”. As with previous responses, it has restricted its written evidence to the issues which directly relates to the function of the SCCRC.

2. Response
2.1 The SCCRC notes that the relevant provision in the Bill is contained within section 82 as follows:-

82 (1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.
(2) In section 194B—
(a) in subsection (1), for “section 194DA of this Act” there is substituted “subsection (1A)
(b) after subsection (1) there is inserted—
“(1A) Where the Commission has referred a case to the High Court under subsection (1), the High Court may not quash a conviction or sentence unless the Court considers that it is in the interests of justice to do so.
(1B) In determining whether or not it is in the interests of justice that any case is disposed of as mentioned in subsection (1A), the High Court must have regard to the need for finality and certainty in the determination of criminal proceedings.”.
(3) The title of section 194B becomes “References by the Commission”.
(4) Section 194DA is repealed.

2.2 The SCCRC is pleased to note the intention to repeal section 194DA of the 1995 Act, as indicated in section 82(4) of the Bill. In the recent case of RMM v HMA, on the interpretation of section 194DA as presently enacted, the (current) Lord Justice General made the following comments:

“[33] An independent body specifically entrusted with considering cases of possible miscarriages of justice has decided that it is in the interests of justice that it should make these references (1995 Act, s 194C(1). In making that decision the Commission has considered the interests of finality and certainty (s

2 2012 SCL 1037
194C(2)). Although this court has been given the power to reject a reference in language that replicates the provision applicable to the Commission (s 194DA(1), (2)), it cannot be right for us simply to duplicate the Commission’s function and give effect to our own view. In light of the impressive record of the Commission, it is unlikely that we will have cause to differ from its judgment on this point. I think that we are entitled to assume, unless the contrary is apparent, that the Commission has considered the criteria set out in section 194C and has duly made its independent and informed judgment on them. In my view, we should reject a reference only where the Commission has demonstrably failed in its task; for example, by failing to apply the statutory test at all; by ignoring relevant factors; by considering irrelevant factors; by giving inadequate reasons, or by making a decision that is perverse.”

2.3 The Commission notes that the opinion of the Lord Justice General was supportive of the Commission’s previous written submissions on this matter to the effect that there is no empirical basis to conclude that the Commission has in the past applied its interests of justice test unreasonably, or that it is likely to do so in the future.

2.4 The Commission is opposed to the provision contained within section 82(2) of the 2013 Bill to insert the new subsections (1A) and (1B) into section 194B of the 1995 Act. In light of the sensitive relationship between the SCCRC and the High Court, it would be highly unsatisfactory for the High Court to refuse to consider a reference where the Commission, in the exercise of its powers, has concluded that there may have been a miscarriage of justice and that it is in the interests of justice that the conviction or sentence, or both, be reconsidered at an Appeal. The Commission remains of the view that there should be no veto of a referral at either stage of the appeal process. By introducing the new subsections (1A) and (1B) Parliament is retaining the “gatekeeping role” of the High Court which was the subject of so much criticism when originally introduced by S194DA of the 1995 Act. Simply shifting the implementation of that role from the start of the appeal process to the end of the process appears to be counter-intuitive and makes little pragmatic sense. If the Carloway reforms were intended to save time and expense and to reduce complexity, the changes now proposed in section 82 of the Bill flies in the face of them. It is entirely possible that the proposed reform will, in comparison to the currently prevailing scheme, result in greater expense to the justice system, slower processing of Commission referrals and, as a consequence of the proposed changes, a weakened Commission in the eyes of the public. This would appear to be contrary to the Government’s stated aim, in the policy memorandum which accompanies the present Bill, “to enhance efficiency and bring the appropriate balance to the justice system…”.

2.5 Of greater concern however is the shift in the construction of the proposed test from negative to positive. Whereas under 194DA the court is enjoined to reject the reference if it believes that it is not in the interests of justice to allow it to continue the new provision makes clear that the court may only quash a conviction or sentence if it believes that to do so is in the interests of justice. One might argue that these are two sides of the same coin. To do so, however, is to overlook the degree to which the decision in RMM placed certain restrictions on any application of section 194DA by the appeal court. Out of adherence to constitutional principle, the court has taken what is, it is submitted, a most restrictive interpretation of that section. It was assisted in this task by the framing of the issue in terms of whether the interests of justice are served by allowing the appeal to continue rather than whether it is in the interests of justice to quash the conviction or sentence. The proposed amendment is, one might reasonably argue, constructed in such a way as to convey the impression that Parliament expects the court to consider the matter again. That is not to say that the court will not interpret the section more restrictively once more, but such an outcome is not guaranteed. When the Commission, having considered a case in full, concludes that there may have been a miscarriage of justice and it is in the interests of justice that a referral be made, there is no logical reason to place in statute a provision which allows the High Court to reject the case on the basis that it does not consider it in the interests of justice to allow the appeal.

2.6 It is worth stressing again that, at page 368 of his report, Lord Carloway suggested that the High Court might choose to bring a Commission reference to a conclusion by considering and applying, “in whatever order it deems appropriate in the particular case”, either leg of the proposed new two-tier test to be applied by the High Court under subsection (1A). Accordingly, whilst this new provision entitles an applicant to a full hearing of his appeal, the court may choose to address the second leg of the test first; and if the court is not satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to proceed the appeal could be dismissed, notwithstanding the fact that the Commission believes that a miscarriage of justice may have occurred. The Commission is of the view that such an outcome would seriously undermine both the independence of the Commission and its role in strengthening public confidence in the ability of the Scottish criminal justice system to address miscarriages of justice.

2.7 When considering the provision of an appropriate remedy for addressing historic miscarriages of justice the Sutherland Committee³ considered, and rejected, the possibility of giving additional powers to the High Court to carry out its own investigations into potential miscarriages of justice. As it stated at para 5.45 of its Report “…We doubted whether petitioners or the public would regard it as a satisfactory arrangement that the body which had already refused an appeal should be given the responsibility of considering and investigating whether there were any grounds in effect for a further appeal and should then determine it. We do not regard this as a sensible solution in relation to miscarriages of justice.” The Commission believes that the same principles can be applied to the present provisions which seek to introduce an “interests of justice” element to Commission appeals. It seems contrary to the raison d’etre for the creation of a Commission to create a new statutory provision whereby an appeal court can decide to ignore the grounds established for a possible miscarriage of justice by introducing a default position which entitles the court to reject an appeal “in the interests of justice” and applying the criteria of finality and certainty at this stage. As has previously been identified, Commission referrals can occur many months (sometimes many years) after a case has been concluded. A referral may be made in a case where the High Court has already considered an appeal, and on a ground that the High Court has already rejected or refused to allow as it failed to be raised within the time limits which applied during the original appeal. All of these matters would be considered by the Commission in applying its own “interests of justice” test. If a decision is subsequently taken to refer the case then the matter should proceed as a normal appeal and there is no reason why the High Court should apply a different test in Commission referrals.

³ Sutherland Committee, “Report by the Committee on Criminal Appeals and Miscarriages of Justice Procedures” (Cm 3245, 1996)

2.8 The only matter which should concern the High Court is whether the appellant has suffered a miscarriage of justice. Whilst the SCCRC agrees and has publicly stated that matters such as finality and certainty, or the rights of the victim of crimes, should be fully addressed in any comprehensive, effective and fair criminal justice system, it does not believe that it is appropriate that, when hearing an appeal, the High Court should carry out some form of balancing exercise in deciding whether that appeal should be allowed. The SCCRC knows of no other modern criminal justice system where such a balancing exercise is carried out at the appellate stage.

Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission
2 September 2013
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission

For the period 1 April 1999 to 31 October 2013, there have been 29 cases in which the Commission has concluded there may have been a miscarriage of justice but it is not in the interests of justice to refer the case to the High Court.

The total number of referrals in that period was 120. The total number of cases concluded after a full review was 1064.

Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission
25 November 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Legal Aid Board

The Board

1. The Scottish Legal Aid Board (the “Board”) is a non-departmental public body established by the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986. The Board is responsible for the administration of legal aid in Scotland in terms of the Act and has the general function of:
   - securing that legal aid and advice and assistance are available in accordance with the Act;
   - administering the Scottish Legal Aid Fund (“the Fund”); and
   - monitoring the availability and accessibility of legal services in Scotland.

2. As a key partner agency in the justice sector, the Board has been involved in the work undertaken by Scottish Government prior to the drafting of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (the “Bill”). Additionally, submissions by the Board on a range of financial aspects of the implementation of the bill were included in the Financial Memorandum.

Legal Aid

3. There are several different types of legal aid. The current consideration of the Bill principally engages with legal aid in the context of Scottish criminal law and procedure. There are two forms of legal aid relevant in the context of criminal proceedings although one of these types is sub-divided further into two forms – see paragraph 4 below. All solicitors who provide criminal legal assistance have to be registered with the Board so to do. Most, if not all, such solicitors undertaking criminal work provide both forms of legal aid relevant to the criminal context. Together, the forms of legal aid relevant in the context of criminal law are grouped together under the collective name criminal legal assistance, and in this paper, criminal legal assistance simply means one or other or both forms of legal aid relevant in criminal proceedings.

4. Criminal legal assistance comprises:
   I. Criminal Advice & Assistance
      (a) General Criminal Advice & Assistance
         Legal assistance which covers general work other than representation in a court, such as meetings, correspondence. This currently include work done by solicitors at police stations.
      (b) (Criminal) Assistance by Way of Representation (“ABWOR”)
         Legal aid for representation for certain specified hearings or types of case before a court or tribunal for which criminal legal aid is not available. Typically this covers proceedings where a plea of guilty is accepted, and other proceedings such as breach of existing court orders.
II. Criminal Legal Aid

The main form of legal aid for representation before a court. This form applies where an accused pleads not guilty, whether or not there is then a change of plea. There are different arrangements for summary criminal legal aid and solemn criminal legal aid.

Availability of Advice at Police Stations

5. The Board has a statutory obligation to ensure that suspects detained under s14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act have access to a solicitor. For this purpose, the Board operates the 24/7 Solicitor Contact Line ("SCL") which is a one-stop point of contact for all police stations in Scotland. If the suspect has their own solicitor, the SCL notify the solicitor that advice is needed. If that solicitor is unavailable or the suspect does not have their own solicitor, the SCL solicitor can provide advice by telephone. This ensures that a suspect can receive advice quickly and effectively. If an attendance by a solicitor in person is required, the Board operates a duty solicitor scheme. The solicitors attending can be solicitors from the SCL, the Public Defence Solicitors’ Office or private solicitors.

RESPONSE TO THE CALL FOR EVIDENCE

6. The Board proposes to follow the suggestion of structuring the response in accordance with themes suggested in the call.

A Police Powers and Rights of Suspects

Part 1 Chapter 1 - Arrest

7. The Board recognises that the Bill adds to the provisions applying to persons suspected of involvement in crime, and their rights. It is anticipated that the changes will now lead to an increase in those seeking police station advice, given that arrest will not just apply to suspected crimes punishable by imprisonment as detention does now.

8. With the right to solicitor consultation being extended by Section 36\(^1\), and the right to have a solicitor present at interview (Section 24\(^2\)) there will be a significant increase in recourse to solicitors. In relation to Section 24 it is not clear that the natural meaning of the phraseology used in the Bill of “having a solicitor present” includes solicitor participation by video. Lord Carloway\(^3\) recognises that in many situations a video-based link will be as effective as physical presence. If there is no ability to have solicitor participation by video, this may create significant logistical and cost challenges especially in more rural areas. In that connection, the Bill could facilitate further recourse to video technology, beyond that provided for in the context of courts in Section 86 (and see separate remarks in connection with that section below).

---

\(^1\) In terms of the Bill the right will become the right of any person in custody to consult with a solicitor. Currently this is restricted to those in custody who are interviewed or to be interviewed.

\(^2\) In terms of the Bill the right will become the right to presence of a solicitor at interview whether in custody, or voluntarily attending a police station or another place. Currently this is restricted to those in custody.

\(^3\) At 6.1.40 of his Review
9. As well as the frequency of solicitor involvement at police stations increasing (per observations at paragraph 8 above), it is also likely that the duration of such involvement will increase in line with the need for the police to give more information. Under the current law only very basic information need be provided. Under the Directive the phrase “all the information on the accusation necessary to enable them to prepare their defence and to safeguard the fairness of the proceedings” is used and this information requirement is likely to increase the scope of information given by the police, and the subsequent consideration by the suspect with their solicitor.

10. The Board, as the body responsible for ensuring that legal advice is available to suspects in police stations, and as administrators of the public funding of legal advice, assistance and representation, anticipates that the general effect of such further provision will be to increase the cost of legal services as a result of increased recourse by suspects to legal advice and assistance. However, these services can be delivered in different ways. We are working with the Scottish Government on how these services could best be delivered. For example, the current model of the SCL and duty solicitor provision could be expanded. Solicitors could be located in busy police stations to provide advice. The current system operates well and is highly regarded by Police Scotland and many solicitors within the legal profession. It ensures that advice is given quickly and effectively to suspects.

11. Much of this work will be covered under arrangements that can be made under the existing regime for criminal Advice & Assistance, which is essentially a time-based charging system. However, increases in frequency and duration of the involvement of solicitors at police stations both drive time-based charges up. Further comment on the changes to legal aid structures are made under our comments on Part 1, Chapter 2.

Part 1 Chapter 2 - Custody

12. Investigative liberation, police liberation and questioning are all areas that will challenge the existing arrangements for criminal legal assistance as well as give rise to increased costs for the Fund, particularly through the increase in solicitor police station work. The Financial Memorandum for the Bill contains estimated figures based on the current legal aid structures, but any projections are open to substantial variation.

13. While the ability to seek a review of a police bail condition to the Sheriff is an entirely new and welcome step, it can be predicted with some certainty that this will occur often in situations involving allegations of domestic violence and the resulting legal work may be significant.

14. The new regime will see an increase in both non-court advice and assistance, and court representation for hearings in relation to the various applications that can be made to court, and for which there is currently no real parallel. It is not just an

---

4 Section 5(3) bases further information requirements on Articles 3 and 4 of Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on the right to information in criminal proceedings

5 E.g. Application to the sheriff to review conditions of release under Section 17 or application to the sheriff for review of conditions of an undertaking under Section 22, etc.
issue, consequently, of scaling-up existing provision and costs. There will be completely new processes, and the possibility that the processes could occur more than once during a case. In turn, there may be significant cost ramifications. There may be a significant benefit from looking at overall restructuring of criminal legal assistance, and further remarks are made below.

15. As far as the legal aid mechanisms to deal with the changes are concerned “bolt-on” solutions, whilst simplest to articulate, may not be the best approach in the long term, and indeed are likely to be costly. Such bolt-on solutions might include providing for additional Advice & Assistance and additional criminal ABWOR (in relation to court hearings). A more considered approach may be for the Scottish Government to consider this as an opportunity for substantial simplification of criminal legal assistance, recognising that in essence the processes for which legal aid needs to be available start with the first involvement with the police at the police station, rather than the current system which although making some provision for preliminary processes, is based on the later service of prosecution papers as the procedural trigger for legal aid, and the subsequent court procedures. This would require primary legislative change.

16. The Board is of the clear view that a range procedures under the current heading/theme of “Custody” are susceptible to increased use of both (a) electronic communications to produce time, resource and cost efficiencies for such processes as would previously have been susceptible to paper-based steps, and (b) to video-technology for processes for which face to face meetings or court attendances might have previously been appropriate.

17. In addition, based on our experience of arranging legal advice and representation under the current system, the 12 hour maximum custody period envisaged by Section 11 may be very challenging in some cases, especially having regard to the geography of Scotland and practical difficulties such as bad weather and the availability of solicitors.

Part 1 Chapters 3 & 4 - Rights of suspects, etc.
18. In relation to police procedures quoad children and vulnerable adults, the safeguards need to be robust. Normally face to face interviews would be indicated where a child is involved, but especially in rural situations, it may be that provision for being able to facilitate interview by video would be useful as a failsafe.

19. We note that the safeguard provisions relating to waiver of the right to have a solicitor present at interview (other than those relating to those under 16) appear to be restricted to mental disorder and do not cover the position of poor literacy, other limitations on capacity or the fact that the accused does not speak English at all. We also note that in contrast with the position in England & Wales where a different approach is taken, and Code C of PACE6 applies, the suggestion from the Bill7 is that it is left, ultimately, to the decision of a police constable whether the person understands, and if they are over 18, whether the person has a mental disorder or

---

6 Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which applies to England & Wales not. This leaves the matter open to challenge and risks failing to achieve the ECHR test of effective participation. Under Code C of PACE the position is that:
7 Section 25

1.4 If an officer has any suspicion, or is told in good faith, that a person of any age may be mentally disordered, or otherwise mentally vulnerable, in the absence of clear evidence to the contrary to dispel that suspicion, the person shall be treated as such for the purposes of this Code.

1.6 If a person appears to be blind, seriously visually impaired, deaf, unable to read or speak or has difficulty orally because of a speech impediment, they shall be treated as such for the purposes of this Code in the absence or clear evidence to the contrary.

20. The PACE provisions go a significant way to reduce the risk of the vulnerable suspect being interviewed without a solicitor and the Bill may be an opportunity for the position in Scotland to be put on the same footing. While it sets the bar higher for the police, it is more likely to ensure that proper regard is given to vulnerabilities which may not necessarily present easily for assessment by a police constable. It also reduces the risk of difficulty for the suspect or their solicitor where there is information as to mental disorder (or other vulnerability) but the police may not have given appropriate cognisance to it. Adopting the PACE provisions in this area would also reduce the risk of challenges to the admissibility of the interview on the grounds of fairness.

B Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms
21. We have no submission to make in respect of this part of the Bill. The Board have provided estimates of what increased costs might look like, wholly based on views from the Crown, as to what increased levels of prosecutions might be. Expenditure in this regard will be directly driven by prosecution policy.

C Court Procedures and Video usage
22. As the Financial Memorandum relates, there will be increased costs of the front end procedure in solemn cases, but these could be at least partially controlled by the use of an inclusive fee (as opposed to time and line fees) for the work. The emphasis on front end work is designed to create efficiencies in terms of whether and how later procedure takes place, and there should be savings in that respect, but these are difficult to predict.

23. The Board considers that the use of electronic communication and video and/or telephone conferencing should be encouraged and that this would be assisted if a statutory footing was given to the option for use of video or telephone conferencing for all hearings or proceedings susceptible thereto, so as to enable and encourage the use of such facilities where ever possible, and to help achieve the attendant cost effectiveness. Section 86 (see below) addresses participation of a detained person in a specified hearing, but the use of video for other participants, beyond those who are detained, merits wider provision in the Bill.

Part 6 Section 86 - Live Television Link
24. The proposed arrangements to introduce an optional pre-hearing to clear the use of video before the substantive hearing threatens to make the system less efficient rather than more. There are currently court cases involving detained persons being heard via video in Scotland that do not have the formality of such a pre-hearing in place, but nonetheless proceed effectively and efficiently. Additionally, other jurisdictions across Europe use video in an increasing number of cases without the need for such a hearing.

25. There is also good reason to make the provisions for use of the technology more permissive to as to encourage, as well as permit, wider use. In order to ensure that the introduction of new technology brings the foreseen benefits, but at the same time safeguards the accused’ rights, a more permissive wording for the (new) Section 288H(1) would be:

“The court may, on application to it by any of the parties to the case or ex proprio motu, determine that arrangement be made whereby any due participation, at any diet, hearing or examination of an accused who is a person detained in any place in Scotland is through a live television link from that place, the accused not being brought to the court-room.”

26. The (new) sub-section 228(2) would be retained, but sub-section 288H(3) could be removed as unnecessary.

27. It is also felt that the Bill should go further in the development of the potential for the use of television links and digital technology and the benefits and costs savings this will bring in the longer term. By enabling the use of such technology now, further opportunities can be explored within the justice community, including the legal profession.

28. Further use of video would be the giving of evidence in some diets, particularly more formal or uncontentious evidence, or evidence which is in short compass. Police evidence particularly could be susceptible to such treatment in a number of situations, and the efficiencies and resource advantages achievable by not having officers attend court are very significant. There are already precedents for the taking evidence from child and vulnerable witnesses as well as some witnesses outside Scotland, and nothing from that experience suggests that more extended use of video is anything other than advantageous. The procedural model given by Section 86 (and the new Section 288H of the 1995 Act) could fairly simply be applied to be available to the court for such hearings or in such circumstances as the court considers appropriate ex proprio motu or on application of a party to the case.

29. In relation to further use of digital technology the critical areas are in the permissions to serve and present necessary and important documentation digitally and to ensure that digital signatures are permissible.

D Appeals, Sentencing & Aggravations

30. The Board have no submissions to make in relation to these provisions of the Bill other than to record formally that the provisions of the Bill by increasing efficiencies and sifting out poor appeals should result in a concomitant saving on the Fund.
Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

31. We have no submissions to make in respect of this part of the Bill

Scottish Legal Aid Board
30 August 2013
Corroboration:

Sexual crimes – particularly historical cases or cases involving child witnesses – are complex and challenging. The sequelae of behaviour that so often accompanies sexual offending adds additional burdens on the management of these cases within the criminal justice system.

We are of the view that the consequences for civil liberties and the rights of the accused are vital and it is ill-advised to compromise these particularly where there may be an elevated risk of wrongful conviction. We acknowledge that current law on corroboration makes it more difficult to secure convictions in rape cases although we are of the view that a major issue may be the prejudicial views sometimes held by juries and there is no strong evidence to suggest that they would be more likely to convict where it is a case of one person's word against another.

However, we consider that removing the law on corroboration is a sweeping move. We would like much wider definitions of corroboration to be permitted in cases of rape, sexual assault, child sexual abuse and domestic violence where it is regularly a feature that there is unlikely to be witnesses. Widening the definitions and the types of corroboration that could be used would still maintain the principle in fairness to the accused. It seems disproportionate to do away with corroboration for all crimes when it only impedes justice in some crimes.

We would like further consideration of the introduction of more 'circumstantial' evidence to support the application of corroboration where this may help to complete the chain of evidence.

We would consider it important (in some cases such as those cited above) for the Court to carefully consider the accused previous offending history (if any) and modus operandii where sexual crimes (including child sexual abuse) are the subject of proceedings. In such cases we advise more systematic and constructive use of expert testimony which can enable the Court to fully understand the complex features of a victim's pattern of behaviour and traumatic reaction as well as the conduct and potential motivating factors of the accused. We have no difficulty with the current law on corroboration but feel very strongly that it's application and definition needs revision and tightening up.

We do understand that the introduction of previous offending histories and modus operandii information to juries may be seen as likely to cause them to become presumptive and closed minded. Nonetheless we think that, properly managed by the Court, in such cases where an approach of this nature is determined as an effective way to improve the administration of justice, this information should be accessible to the Court in criminal cases.

The Moorov doctrine has offered a real opportunity for justice to many people in Scotland - particularly in crimes of interpersonal violence where the execution of the offences has relied on secrecy and concealment. The difficulty with it however is in its application. In our view the doctrine is generally applied by Fiscals with a ‘time period’ element - that is, not only do they need to be satisfied that the two separate alleged offences occurred with a similar MO but they also apply a time limit to the period between their occurrence and also the time that has elapsed since. This can dilute the application of the doctrine considerably and may deny justice when otherwise it may have had a chance of proceeding. Supporting circumstantial evidence may strengthen the application of Moorov in such circumstances but equally a more informed and ‘flexible’ stance by Procurators Fiscal in marking cases may also enhance the administration of justice in such cases.

Furthermore, single eyewitness testimony (where no other corroboration exists), for example, supported by compelling ‘circumstantial’ evidence in such cases should permit greater flexibility in determining whether proceedings might be taken and how such proceedings are managed by the Court.

We would also like to see the Crown put far more cases of child sexual abuse before juries to let them judge the integrity of victims, adults or children, for themselves rather than deciding that only a small minority of cases should come to court. Child witnesses are heard in a multiplicity of other cases involving serious crime so, in our view, supported by the provisions of the Vulnerable Witness (Scotland) Act 2004, if child witnesses are properly supported and wish to go ahead they should be allowed to.

In our view the Crown should therefore allow more cases to proceed to Court allowing the Judge/Sheriff and Jury to become more protagonist in determining the strength or weakness of particular evidential information. This is a risky strategy of course but we think that where the basic considerations for corroboration exist then the court should be the place to determine - this is far more in the public interest than ‘no-proving’ cases where corroboration clearly exists but is not perhaps strong enough for a sure fire conviction.

It is our considered view that doing away with the current law on corroboration is “throwing the baby out with the bathwater”. As with so many things we do not need to actually change the law of Scotland but improve the ways in which people apply the law. We need instead to take a more proportionate and considered approach. This would greatly improve the chances for victims and survivors to get access to justice in criminal proceedings. A clearer and more modern definition of corroboration would help. Improved regulations on the application of the law on corroboration (including advice on greater flexibility in cases of interpersonal violence or where the MO renders straightforward corroboration less likely such as those where grooming, intimidation, coercion etc. is present) would help. Greater and more informed use of expert testimony by the Court would also be of assistance (for example where the features of witness or accused behaviour need explanation/clarification and which allow this to be taken into account by the Court).

It is also common police practice for two officers to be present at witness or suspect interviews in order to sustain ‘corroboration’ for criminal purposes. We are concerned about the burden of trust that this places, without dispute, on the shoulders of the police. While we are certain that in the vast majority of cases, police testimony is above and beyond doubt or reproach, we think it consistent with a modern criminal justice system to ensure that police corroboration in and of itself is not the single determinant in moving the burden of evidence ‘beyond a reasonable doubt’ when other evidence has no equal impact.

We are further concerned that the removal of corroboration per se could result in a greater preponderance of ‘plea bargaining’ with a knock-on effect on disposals reached by Courts and on sentencing policy.

In summary, we do not support the abolition of corroboration in criminal cases but recommend better application of the law on corroboration; greater flexibility by the Crown; improved use of expert testimony; greater admissibility of ‘circumstantial’ evidence to support corroboration where and as necessary; and improved definitions and regulations concerning the application of corroboration.

CPG on Adult Survivors
2 October 2012
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Police Federation

Part 1
Chapter 1 - Essentially removes Detention and replaces it with a general power of arrest. Whilst this may appear relatively straightforward it will have significant training implications for the Service. Every police officer and special constable will require to be trained which will present a major resourcing challenge. There will be cost implications in relation to this training and may also be a requirement for some work to be done on IT systems to accommodate the proposed changes at a time when the service budget is under extreme pressure.

Some clarity is required as to the requirement to obtain warrants for arrest and questioning, given the high volume of low level crime not punishable by imprisonment there may also be resourcing implications for the Courts which as we know are reducing in number. If as a consequence vast numbers of warrants are sought.

Chapter 2 - The issue of police bail will also have significant training implications and may well be an area of significant challenge in the Courts. The release and requirement to return will also present some challenge in managing times around officer’s shifts and other duty commitments etc may well prove to be an administrative nightmare and again may require some investment in IT to manage the proposed changes.

The capacity of both the service and the Courts to cope with this demand is also questionable.

The requirement for investigative liberation not to exceed 28 days will also present a significant challenge, what happens when this cannot be accommodated?

Chapter 3 - There does not appear to be any provision to add further conditions to an undertaking which may be required if circumstances change after the undertaking was made. If this is not in place undertakings are likely to have a vast number of conditions attached, just in case!

Chapter 4 - If a solicitor is requested the time taken for their attendance at a police station should be discounted from the 12 hour period.

Again these provisions will have significant training and resourcing implications and will be an administrative challenge and burden.

Chapters 5 - 8 - No specific comments.
Part 2
Corroboration - The SPF are not opposed to making some amendments in relation to corroboration and its application but hold the strong view that there should be no blanket abolition of the requirement for corroboration. In relation to some matters such as the service of legal documents or evidence relating to the transportation of productions or forensic and medical evidence the requirement for two witnesses may be unnecessary and costly.

Corroboration serves as a safeguard for the general public who come under suspicion of committing a criminal act, the accused and also for police officers who are on occasion subject to false or malicious complaints as a consequence of executing their duty.

Blanket removal of corroboration would risk exposing police officers to more spurious and malicious allegations which would be harder to refute and similarly so for every other member of the public.

Corroboration is an important safeguard against miscarriages of justice or wrongful conviction; a witness who is convinced their evidence is accurate may be mistaken. This is particularly pertinent to issues surrounding identification.

In other countries where corroboration does not exist there is a greater use of technology to enhance the quality of cases reported and to protect the police and suspects from injustices and oppression. This would require to be addressed here. Corroboration is also particularly important in maintaining public confidence in the criminal justice system.

The quality of evidence may be reduced and as a consequence the scrutiny applied to a single source of evidence must be increased. Other jurisdictions have established methods of weighing and scrutinising this type of evidence and it is possible that miscarriages of justice may occur in the interim while we adjust.

The abolition of corroboration will inevitably result in the lower end cases being subject to appeal. This could cause practical difficulties for an already stretched appeal court.

Under our system evidence from a single witness would receive far greater focus from defence agents. Greater effort will be made to discredit these witnesses and undermine their testimony. This could result in reluctance for witnesses to give evidence willingly.

The assertion that there is a link between corroboration and low conviction rates is something that in our view needs further detailed research and analysis before a decision to make a critical change in Scots Criminal Law and that this should be made publicly available. In the Carloway Review Report it was 'accepted and agreed that the number of areas which could be examined in detail was limited.' We would therefore encourage much more detailed analysis on the wholesale abolishment of corroboration.
In England where there is no requirement for corroboration, conviction rates are only fractionally higher. The Scottish Law Commission also rejected the proposal to remove corroboration for sexual offences in its 2007 report which culminated in the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009.

The majority verdict of juries would in our view have to be reconsidered as a removal of the requirement for corroboration would undermine and weaken our jury system.

In the civil system where there is no requirement for corroboration there is widespread use of skilled (and expensive) expert witnesses to substantiate uncorroborated claims in relatively modest actions.

The fact that our system is unique among other systems is of no relevance. All legal systems have procedural rules developed over time to fit within their specific requirements.

It is unsafe to look at the European model as these are inquisitorial systems and their approaches to corroboration are distinct to the adversarial system in Scotland.

Fundamentally the principle of corroboration provides some balance between the protection of individuals from wrongful prosecution and/or conviction and miscarriage of justice by the Crown who has significant power and resources at its disposal.

There is no doubt that there is a scope for change but not the wholesale abolition of one of the key safeguards in Scots Criminal Law.

Part 3 - No comment

Part 4 - We support the increase of sentence for carrying of offensive weapons and the provisions relating to offences committed by persons on early release.

Part 5 - No comment.

Part 6
Chapter 1 - We support the introduction of aggravations of offences relating to people trafficking.

Chapter 2 - Traditionally it was understood that PNB dealt with negotiable subjects and the Police Advisory Board (PAB) dealt with non-negotiable subjects. But as it states in 55B(4)(c), the issue, use and return of police clothing and equipment, was in legislation covering the PNB UK. However it was never discussed at PNB as it was not considered a negotiable subject.

There is an important principle here that there should be no connection between negotiable subjects and non-negotiable subjects. For example, a situation where improved safety equipment was offered in return for a reduced pay award would be entirely unacceptable.
SPF believes this should be removed from the PNB remit and placed on the agenda of whichever body takes over the role of the PAB.

General Comment - Whilst supportive of some of the proposals laid out in the Bill we believe that some have significant practical, cost and resourcing implications not just for the Police Service but also for COPFS and the Courts.

We are not convinced that there will be significant benefits from the introduction of these proposals and when balanced against the costs and other implications believe that there introduction may cause significant difficulties for all partners in the Criminal Justice System and require much more detailed analysis before progression.

Scottish Police Federation
30 August 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from the Scottish Police Federation

Meeting of Justice Committee on 1 October 2013

I refer to the above and to the invitation from the Convenor to submit any additional information for the Committee’s attention that was not able to be covered during the evidence session.

Before getting to the principal point of this correspondence I have observed a flow chart has been prepared to assist the Committee understand the differences in the arrest/detention process as they are now compared to how they will be under the provisions of the Bill.

Whilst this flowchart is generally useful, I must express my concerns as to its accuracy and indeed the weighting of the language used against the process as currently exists. Specifically in the processes shown on the left a person detained is not referred to as an “accused” as quite simply, at that stage in the process there is insufficiency of evidence to make such a determination. They are merely a suspect. Indeed if the evidence existed to determine the person was indeed to be “an accused” that would render the detention unlawful. It is also worth pointing out that at the parallel point in proceedings to the right hand side, the reference is to neither “suspect” or “accused” but simply to “person”. Quite simply if they are a suspect in the process shown on the left, they will similarly be a suspect in the process shown on the right. It is unclear to me why this different wording is used at what will be exactly the same stage in the process.

Turning now to the main purpose of this correspondence.

I appreciate the time did not allow for full scrutiny of the proposals for a Scottish Police Negotiating Board and I am sure the Committee Members will be made aware of the separate and detailed Staff Side submission on this issue. I would however like to emphasise a number of key points that the Scottish Police Federation believes are required to make the new body a success.

The SPF is wholly supportive of a negotiating body for police officers in Scotland (PNBS). We believe that it is only by sitting down and negotiating in a fair and transparent manner that police officers can have confidence their unique employment status is being properly considered and compensated. The SPF would despair if the mistakes that dogged the PNB in recent years were permitted or indeed if the structure, composition and remit of the PNBS was such as to permit them to be repeated in the future. We cannot emphasise enough how important this is and we have covered this in some detail in the Staff Side response. Quite simply if the foundations of the new PNBS are effectively a mirror of those we are leaving behind (bar some tinkering at the margins) the body will ultimately fail or be such that its members lose confidence in it.
It is for these reasons we believe the issue of arbitration and its binding nature (save in some aspects of overall pension policy) needs significantly enhanced. No one has yet given any reason why this wholly reasonable request should not be included in the arrangements for the PNBS. Staff Side raised a number of questions in our response to the separate consultation on the PNBS and I believe these are worth reiterating here. Why would a government not want to give police officers a fair crack of the whip here? Why would it be acceptable to be able to railroad police officer negotiations when the industrial relations landscape prevents such railroading of any other worker? We will ask these questions time and again if need be but believe the underlying message this approach sends to other collective bargaining organisations and trade unions in Scotland is one of the greatest concern.

The SPF, whilst welcoming the Cabinet Secretary’s oration on being bound on matters of pay, believe this does not go anywhere near far enough and believe a significant amendment is required to the Bill to ensure that such a binding is indeed statutory and not one merely self-imposed. We would seek similar statutory binding on any arbitration decision. We are overwhelmingly of the view that the prospect of a fully binding arbiter’s decision as an end point in the process will make negotiation and agreement more likely than not in almost every single instance.

The SPF also wishes the Committee to consider the fundamental importance of both an independent secretary and independent chairman. In the new Police Service of Scotland (PSoS) it is almost inevitable the bulk of the data required for the PNBS to do its work effectively will come from the PSoS. And it is only by having independence that the usefulness of that data, for both sides, can be guaranteed. The SPF does not support the notion that on occasions these roles should be performed by any of the constituent members.

The SPF and indeed the wider Staff Side will no longer have access to the part funded valuable PNB research located within the Police Federation for England & Wales as it is inconceivable this funding will continue one a Pay Review Body is introduced. This places SPF and Staff Side at considerable disadvantage when compared against the collective resourcing might of the PSoS, the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Government and its agencies and we consider it essential this gap is at least part bridged with some additional funding to permit us to overcome this lost resource.

Calum Steele
General Secretary
4 October 2013
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from the Scottish Police Federation

Corroboration

Thank you for the opportunity to give evidence to the Committee on 3 December 2013.

Some members of the Committee considered that the Scottish Police Federation (SPF) had changed its position and I would like to ensure that our position in relation to ‘corroboration’ is clear.

The SPF has never supported a position which would allow the evidence from one single source to be sufficient to secure conviction. We do not believe that this is the intention of the Bill and further believe that sufficient safe guards are in place to ensure this could not happen.

The SPF has always believed that much of the duplication of largely non contentious evidence to satisfy the law in relation to corroboration is unnecessary and wasteful of time and money.

We are persuaded by debate and discussion on this issue to support the removal of the general requirement for corroboration in the knowledge that there will still be a requirement for a sufficiency of corroborative evidence across the evidential chain to satisfy the burden of proof. The SPF believes that this will not only improve the efficiency of the criminal justice system but more importantly will provide easier access to it for the victims of crime.

The police will always gather and report all available evidence to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) irrespective of the outcome of this Bill. It is a matter for COPFS and the Courts to determine the sufficiency and quality of this evidence.

I trust this clarifies our position.

David Ross
SPF Vice Chairman
5 December 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Women’s Aid

Foreword
Scottish Women's Aid ("SWA") is the lead organisation in Scotland working towards the prevention of domestic abuse. We play a vital role in campaigning and lobbying for effective responses to domestic abuse.

We provide advice, information, training and publications to members and non-members. Our members are local Women’s Aid groups which provide specialist services, including safe refuge accommodation, information and support to women, children and young people.

An important aspect of our work is ensuring that women and children with experience of domestic abuse get both the services they need, and an appropriate response and support from, local Women’s Aid groups, agencies they are likely to contact and from the civil and criminal justice systems.

Introduction
SWA welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. We welcome the removal of the requirement for corroboration but have grave concerns about the operation of the proposals on investigation liberation and liberation on undertakings.

We would comment that the provisions of this Bill cannot be developed in isolation from the provisions of the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill also before the Committee. The latter seeks to strengthen support for victims and witnesses and also comply with, and implement, the requirements of the EU Directive establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime ("the EU Directive"), which came into force on 15th November 2012. The UK as a Member State, and thus, the Scottish Government too, has 3 years to translate the requirements into law/procedure or ensure that existing law and procedure complies.

Specifically, certain proposals under this Bill in sections 3, 14-17 and 19-22 dealing with liberation of suspects and accused persons have to be compliant, and cross-referenced with general principles set out in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill, which confer certain rights and protections on victims and witnesses and place duties on bodies such as Police Scotland and the Lord Advocate.

Section 1 (3) of the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill states that these principles are

(a) that a victim or witness should be able to obtain information about what is happening in the investigation or proceedings,

(b) that the safety of a victim or witness should be ensured during and after the investigation and proceedings,
(c) that a victim or witness should have access to appropriate support during and after the investigation and proceedings,
(d) that, in so far as it would be appropriate to do so, a victim or witness should be able to participate effectively in the investigation and proceedings.

The rights of the suspect/accused have to be balanced with those of the victim, a position supported by the EU Directive on victims, Article 13 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (“the ECHR”) and Article 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, which gives the victim a right to an effective remedy and to a fair trial. In considering the accused’s rights under Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention, the rights of victims of crime must also be considered, specifically

- Article 2- Right to life, liberty and security of person which has been interpreted to refer to a state’s obligation to protect through an effective system for the prevention, investigation and prosecution of crime
- Article 3- Prohibition of torture- in relation to victims, breaches occasioned by a failure of police procedure/investigation or a failure to prosecute
- Article 8- Right to respect for Private and Family Life
- Article 13- Right to an effective remedy, including that there be a proper investigation of alleged crime

It is important that the proposals contained within this Bill are implemented correctly, to protect and improve the experience of women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse who become involved with the criminal justice system as a result of such abuse.

Section 3- Information to be given on arrest

When a constable arrests a person (or as soon afterwards as is reasonably practicable), they must inform that person of the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested and of the reason for the arrest. However, there is no requirement for the complainer to be so informed and the section must state this.

Women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse, as complainers, must be made aware of what the police investigation and any resultant prosecution will focus on. Identifying the offence as involving domestic abuse will name the behaviour and make it clear to the abuser and complainer that the abuser’s behaviour is recognised as such by the criminal justice system, which also means that the provisions of the Joint Protocol between the police and the Crown on the investigation and prosecution of domestic abuse, currently under revision, (“the DA Protocol”) will be invoked and must be followed by police and prosecution.

This is also important in relation to the police investigation and their work in evidence gathering and risk assessment in relation to domestic abuse, particularly

---

2 "In Partnership, Challenging Domestic Abuse” since it is proposed that suspects may be released on investigative liberation or undertakings by the police.

It will provide clarity for complainers in relation to the eventual charges brought and situations where either the prosecution proceeds in a different direction or no prosecution is taken, particularly given the rights that victims have under the EU Directive to receive information on the proceedings generally and to challenge decisions.

Further, providing women, children and young people who have experienced offences involving domestic abuse with information to this effect will both allow them to access both targeted and specialised support provided by Women’s Aid groups and also signpost and passport them to specific domestic abuse-advocacy court support.

Investigative Liberation
Section 14- Release on conditions
Section 15- Conditions ceasing to apply
Section 16- Modification or removal of conditions
Section 17- Review of conditions

SWA has concerns about the operation of the proposals on investigation liberation in relation to the risk posed to complainers in cases involving domestic abuse and how this is assessed. Police Scotland share some of these concerns and we would urge the Committee to seek their views and observations on these matters.

Section 14- Release on conditions
There is no requirement in this section that the complainer be notified of the suspect’s release on investigative liberation, and, more importantly, whether or not this is subject to conditions and what these are. There is also no provision for the complainer to comment on whether any condition(s) is appropriate and sufficient for their protection.

In consideration of the latter, the second important point is how the appropriate constable (Inspector or above) assesses whether or not to impose a condition and whether a condition is necessary and proportionate. This test refers to “proper conduct of investigation” only and there is no wording to indicate that this encompasses the protection of victims and witnesses and consideration of the risk that the suspect poses to them. It will be necessary to gather the views of the victim in relation to this liberation, given the rights of victims under the EU Directive to obtain information.

Further, since the perpetrator has not been charged with any crime, we understand that this precludes the recording of these conditions on certain police databases, which means that a system will have to be created to allow circulation of details of special conditions within, and across, Police Scotland Divisions.

Section 16- Modification or removal of conditions
Our comments on section 15 also apply here. Section 16 does not provide that the victim is to be informed and consulted before any modification or removal of a condition; how their views and safety are to be taken into account or how they are able to challenge decisions to modify or remove conditions; nor does it provide that a condition can be increased if not adequate to protect victim/witness.

The section also does not contain any provision for the procurator fiscal to be consulted and make representations before the police take a decision to modify or remove a condition.

Section 17- Review of conditions
This allows the suspect, at any time, to apply to the sheriff to have the condition reviewed and requires that the sheriff must give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations.

Again, there is no duty to inform the victim and take their views and safety into account before a decision is made.

This section poses a particular problem to women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse as it may interfere with the accurate assessment of the risk that the abuser poses and therefore, how they are supported and their engagement with the Multi-Agency Risk Assessment Conferences (“MARAC”). There is no mechanism for them to challenge the suspect’s application to have a condition reviewed or provision for the Fiscal to seek the imposition of a more onerous condition if those already in place are not adequate to protect the victim and/or witnesses. This is an issue of concern where offences involving domestic abuse are involved given the risk that abusers pose to women, children and young people.

The legislation, therefore, should explicitly state that an assessment must be carried out on the risk posed to the victim by the suspect not being detained. It is therefore crucial that the Lord Advocate continues to specify, through Lord Advocate’s Guidelines and the DA Protocol, that domestic abuse is a special case in these circumstances and that a detailed risk assessment must be carried out in every domestic abuse case where release from detention is considered.

Police Liberation
Section 19- Liberation by police
Section 20- Release on undertaking
Section 21- Modification of undertaking
Section 22 Review of undertaking

These sections represent a widening of the existing police powers to liberate an accused on an undertaking to appear in court on a specified date, sometimes referred to colloquially as ‘police bail’. We would reiterate the comments made in relation to sections 14-17 above on the risk posed to complainers in cases involving domestic abuse and how this is assessed. However, the issues are more serious here because the accused will be at liberty for a much longer period of time, and so the imposition of appropriate and adequate conditions and the maintenance of these until the court date are of high importance.
Again, we would urge the Committee to seek the views and observations of Police Scotland on these matters.

Sections 19 and 20
Sections 19 and 20 allow the police to liberate the accused with or without conditions, such conditions being “…necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring that the person does not obstruct the course of justice in relation to the offence…” It is not clear whether this wording includes protection of witnesses and an assessment of any risk that the accused poses or that it would specifically prohibit interfering with witnesses, as per section 25 (5) (c) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act.”)

Again, the section does not provide the following: that victims be informed of the release of the accused and the nature of the conditions; that their views be taken of the risk that the accused poses and whether the conditions will be adequate; how these matters are taken into account in determining decisions to liberate and how victims can challenge conditions or seek the imposition of more appropriate and adequate protection.

As we have stated above, the legislation should explicitly state that an assessment must be carried out on the risk posed to the victim by the suspect not being detained. In this regard, a detailed risk assessment must be carried out in every domestic abuse case where release from detention is considered.

Sections 21 and 22
These sections are of particular concern. Section 21 allows the Fiscal to modify, remove, or alter any condition imposed under section 20 but section 21(2) specifically provides that any alteration to a condition in an undertaking should not make a condition more onerous on the accused. This prohibition is likely to compromise the safety of women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse in situations where either the risk posed by the abuser was not adequately assessed at the time the original conditions were imposed or the conditions require to be enhanced to cover additional areas or a change in circumstances of complainers. This prohibition, therefore, should be removed from the section.

We recognise that the accused must sign the undertaking and therefore, would have to agree to the imposition of a more onerous condition. However, since the Fiscal is obliged to give the accused notice of any application under this section, it is possible to amend section 22 so that it also allows the accused to be heard by the sheriff where the Fiscal gives notice of an intention to impose a more onerous condition.

Under section 21(3), an undertaking will expire at the end of the day on which the accused is required to appear in court. There is potential for delays in the court process to be a problem here. If the case calls in court, and for any reason has to be continued at another date, we understand that the Fiscal would ask the Sheriff to reinstate the conditions. However, if the case does not call, it appears that the conditions fall and the accused would no longer be subject to any restrictions, a matter which requires further investigation.
Section 22 provides that the accused may apply to the sheriff to have the condition reviewed and that the sheriff must give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations. Again, there is no duty to inform the victim and take their views and safety into account before a decision is made; no mechanism for them to challenge the suspect’s application to have a condition reviewed; no provision for the Fiscal to consider a risk assessment and no details as to the process by which the Sheriff will obtain the views of the victim as to the efficacy of any review.

We have serious concerns about the exercise of this power in relation to domestic abuse incidents as it constitutes a departure from the agreed procedure set out in the DA Protocol. While the police can currently liberate on an undertaking, this is a power used in limited circumstances and not routinely for domestic abuse, since, as a consequence of the Lord Advocate’s Guidelines and the DA Protocol, most domestic abuse cases result in custody if there is sufficient evidence to charge. There is already a problem with accused persons released on bail committing further offences and this would be exacerbated by the numbers likely to be afforded temporary release.

Detaining abusers
- gives them a very specific message in terms of the unacceptability and criminal consequences of their current and future offending behaviour
- gives women breathing space
- gives police and Fiscals a longer and better opportunity to properly risk assess in terms of release on bail and bail conditions.

It is therefore crucial that the Lord Advocate continues to specify, through Lord Advocate’s Guidelines and the DA Protocol, that domestic abuse is a special case in these circumstances and that a detailed risk assessment must be carried out in every domestic abuse case where release from detention is considered.

A further issue is how this process would be administered in terms of advising victims of the suspect’s liberation, a matter of significant importance in domestic abuse cases where the woman must be told as soon as possible that the abuser is being released and returning home. This is usually done by the police or VIA, where appropriate, but it is not clear how the police could continue to carry out this function in the face of increased numbers.

We would draw the Committee’s attention to the Scottish Government-commissioned research\(^3\) on the use of undertakings in summary criminal proceedings, the findings of which support our concerns, namely:-
- The biggest issue is that offenders released on undertakings felt that they had not been arrested “on a bad charge” and that the offence was minor and a lesser offence. There is a concern that abusers will begin to regard, or further regard in some cases, incidents involving domestic abuse as a “lesser offence” which is completely inappropriate.

---

• Concerns amongst police that they were not able to devote adequate time into a decision on whether to release an accused on an undertaking. This means that a proper risk assessment for domestic abuse offenders may not be done, especially for those who are perceived as “first time” offenders.

• Generally, undertakings were not said to be pro-actively policed. Police officers reported that there were not enough resources to monitor compliance with undertakings conditions as effectively and adequately as the monitoring done on bail conditions. Undertakings conditions would only be pro-actively policed if the accused was reported for another offence while on an undertaking.

• A notable increase in the number of convictions for breach of undertakings in the period since April 2006 both nationally and in each of the case study areas, possibly due to increased use of undertakings for more complex offences.

• Factors cited as a reason to release someone on an undertaking were cell capacity or whether the accused had a medical condition. There is therefore a substantial concern that abusers who pose a risk would be inappropriately released simply because there was no room for them.

Section 51- Abolition of requirement for constable to charge
Paragraph 37 of the Policy Memorandum states that “The existing requirement that the police must charge a person upon arrest and prior to reporting the person to the procurator fiscal is removed.”

In terms of the right to information that will be given to victims of crime under the new EU Directive, complainers will have a right to information on decisions made by the police in relation to any incident reported to them. This will include access to information and an explanation as to why a suspect was not charged, a particular charge was proffered and a report not sent to the Fiscal. Either this Bill or the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill will also require to set out a procedure whereby a complainer can challenge the basis of any police decision not to report to the Fiscal or not to charge a suspect.

If the decision on charging is delayed until a report is sent to the Fiscal, this will result in uncertainty for the victims as to whether proceedings are to be taken and the basis on which this will happen. There will be additional issues relating to protection for complainers and witnesses and accurate assessment of risk that the accused presents if there is no clarity and early determination of the severity of the offence committed.

To ensure consistency across Police Scotland, the Lord Advocate will require to issue guidance defining and containing the exercise of police discretion on how and when police will charge and/or report to the Fiscal because this discretion cannot be unfettered. In particular, this guidance must refer to the instructions in the DA Protocol on the investigation and reporting of offences involving domestic abuse to the Fiscal and the presumption that these will be reported where the evidence is sufficient to do so.
These instructions should be contained in the Police Scotland Domestic Abuse Toolkit, an operational guidance document for all officers on the practical elements of policing domestic abuse.

Section 57- Corroboration
SWA welcomes the move to abolish the requirement for corroboration. We support Lord Carloway’s view that evidence should be reviewed based on its quality rather than quantity and that lack of corroboration in itself should not be a barrier to justice. Courts should have the opportunity to consider cases that previously would not have come before them solely due to a binary rule of counting evidence.

This is not to say that if corroborating evidence exists that it should not be gathered and submitted to the Crown, a position that should be supported by guidelines from the Lord Advocate, as referred to in the Report at paragraph 7.3.2, on page 288, viz “… It would also not detract from the need for the police to follow up all reasonable lines of investigation, including detecting corroboration if it can reasonably be found. “. A more robust evidence-gathering culture and process to inform and support prosecution decisions is required, with the police being instructed to carry out a thorough investigation. For domestic abuse, it is important that the DA Protocol remains resolute on the obligations on police and the COPFS in terms of securing the best possible quality and variety of evidence to support a prosecution for crimes involving domestic abuse

There has been concern raised in some quarters that removal of the requirement for corroboration would result in an increase in miscarriages of justice. Firstly, there is no evidence to suggest that this is an issue in other jurisdictions that do not have this requirement. Most importantly, the requirement to prove “beyond reasonable doubt” that the offence took place is a significant protection against wrongful conviction.

In relation to domestic abuse, changing to a requirement for an adequate quality, and not simply quantity, of evidence will:-

- Address the issue of domestic abuse cases not going forward due to technicalities, or cases collapsing, both of which deter women from seeking redress through the criminal law
- Redress the balance where, currently, a very persuasive and credible witness with no other evidence is being disadvantaged; this refers to women who have all the hallmarks of exposure to prolonged domestic abuse and have come forward for the first time to be heard, only to be told that there is not enough evidence for the case to be heard, that there is no corroboration
- Serve as both a preventative and punitive measure in terms of awareness of the criminal justice response to domestic abuse; by allowing greater numbers of women to come forward, there is more scope for perpetrators to be brought before the court and they, the public at large and women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse will be aware of this fact.

We are clear that the removal of the requirement for corroboration as an access to justice reform in order to allow more cases to come to court is not the same as securing more convictions, nor should it be regarded as such. Convictions are the sole preserve of the judge or jury and it is of vital importance that this independent consideration of the evidence continues.

Further support for the removal of the requirement for corroboration has come from the United Nations. The UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (“CEDAW”) has published its Concluding Observations on the Seventh Periodic Report of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, which called for the “burdensome requirements of corroboration” in sexual offence cases in Scotland to be removed.

CEDAW said the Scots criminal law requirement for corroboration “impedes” the prosecution of rape and other sexual violence cases, commenting, “The committee is concerned that, following the findings of the Carloway Review of criminal law and practice in Scotland, the burdensome requirements of corroboration impede the prosecution of rape and other sexual violence cases... The committee urges the State party to consider implementing the recommendations of the Carloway Review regarding the removal of the corroboration requirement in criminal cases related to sexual offences...”

Provisions on early release- sections 72 -73
Under section 16 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993, the court has a power to be able to punish a person who commits an offence while on early release. Section 72 provides that where the court has determined that a person was on early release at the time the offence was committed, the court must consider making an order under section 16; this power is separate and additional to the normal powers of the court to sentence the person for having committed the offence. SWA supports these proposals.

People trafficking- sections 83- 85
While we support these proposals as a useful tool to further combat human trafficking in Scotland, existing legislation, which carries up to 14 years imprisonment, should continue to be used and not ignored in favour of the simpler aggravated offence.

Legislation on human trafficking in Scotland has been criticised as being fragmented, and inconsistent with UK law and there is, currently, no legal definition of Human Trafficking within Scots Law. These matters should be further explored and it would also be useful to monitor the UK Government’s proposals to introduce a Modern Slavery Bill and how this legislation, if enacted, is implemented and the impact.

Issues not covered in the Bill
SWA support Rape Crisis’ Scotland position in relation to
- Seeking judicial direction for juries in sexual offence cases on delayed disclosure and apparent lack of physical resistance.
- Exploring the feasibility of conducting research into the factors influencing the jury’s decision making process in Scotland.
- Commissioning further research into sexual history evidence in sexual offence cases.
CONCLUSION

The successful implementation of the proposals in the Bill is not solely dependent upon the legislation.

The first step is to ensure that the police are completely clear as to what standard the COPFS will apply and how it is defined. In relation to domestic abuse, advances in police evidence-gathering should be built upon, to develop further tactics and opportunities and employ a more forensic style. This will also support judicial decision-makers in cases involving domestic abuse.

The new procedures must take into account the rights given to complainers under the new EU Directive and proposed Scottish legislation for victims, in terms of their entitlement to receive information as to why a case was not reported by the police to the COPFS and/or why a case was not subsequently prosecuted.

The new system and codes of decision-making will have to be strong, well-defined and transparent, to both face challenges, and to allow any such challenges to be made, in furtherance of complainers’ rights under the Directive and the ECHR.

For domestic abuse, it is important that the DA Protocol continues to clearly set out the obligations on police and the COPFS in terms of securing the best possible quality and variety of evidence to support the robust prosecution for crimes involving domestic abuse. The DA Protocol will also be the ideal vehicle for setting out to complainers in domestic abuse cases their rights under the new EU Directive and proposed Scottish legislation for victims we refer to above.

In the light of the radical changes proposed by the Bill across several areas of criminal procedure, it is important to ensure that a process of evaluation is put in place to identify and deal with, as soon as possible, any unintended consequences.

Having the relevant national and local protocols and procedures in place and enforced, along with the appropriate training and partnership working with local Women’s Aid groups, will help ensure that the legislation is used in a way that supports and protects women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse. SWA welcomes the opportunity to work with the Scottish Government, the Lord Advocate and the new Police Service of Scotland in this.

Scottish Women’s Aid
20 August 2013
The Scottish Human Rights Commission is a statutory body created by the Scottish Commission for Human Rights Act 2006. The Commission is a national human rights institution (NHRI) and is accredited with ‘A’ status by the International Co-ordinating Committee of NRHIs at the United Nations. The Commission is the Chair of the European Network of NRHIs. The Commission has general functions, including promoting human rights in Scotland, in particular to encourage best practice; monitoring of law, policies and practice; conducting inquiries into the policies and practices of Scottish public authorities; intervening in civil proceedings and providing guidance, information and education.

INTRODUCTION

The Commission welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

The decision of the Supreme Court in Cadder v HMA was welcomed by the Commission. It confirmed that the Scottish practice of detaining and questioning suspects without providing the right to legal assistance was contrary to the right to a fair trial under the European Convention. This deficiency in the protection of detainees had also been highlighted by the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture in two prior reports on the United Kingdom.\(^1\)

Following the Cadder judgement, the Scottish Government introduced, via emergency procedures, the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) Act 2010 (“2010 Act”). While legislation enshrining the right to legal assistance is to be applauded, the Commission is on record as expressing serious reservations about other aspects of this Act, and on the use of emergency procedures to introduce it.\(^2\) In particular the Commission opposed the extension of periods of detention from 6 to 12 (and 24 hours) in the absence of empirical evidence that this was necessary to facilitate access to a solicitor. The Commission was also concerned about proposals for telephone consultations; the reasons for which detention periods could be extended beyond 12 hours; the potential restriction on access to justice as a result of the appeals provisions; and the interference with the statutory independence of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission.

During the passage of the 2010 Act, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice described the legislation as “a temporary fix that allows us to deal with the consequences of

\(^1\) CPT/Inf(96) 11, 5 March 1996, para 291; CPT/Inf(2005) 1, 4 March 2005, para 53

The Commission therefore welcomes the opportunity for the Bill to act as a “sunset clause” on that legislation.

In approaching its task, it is important that the Scottish Government recognises that the decision in Cadder did not provide a suspect with some added extra or advantage. The effect of the decision and the legislation which followed was to provide those suspected of crime in Scotland with the minimum protection necessary to secure a fair trial. The notion that some sort of “rebalancing exercise” requires to be carried out in the form of removal of other procedural safeguards, such as corroboration, is mistaken and the provisions abolishing corroboration without providing an adequate alternative safeguard are of considerable concern to the Commission.

It is essential that, so far as possible, Scots law does not repeat the experience of Cadder. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill provides an opportunity to make sure that Scots law is fit for purpose in terms of meeting all relevant international human rights obligations. It is therefore important that the Bill properly identifies the rights and duties at stake, as well as anticipating developing trends across the ECHR contracting states.

Legal Framework

- European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR)
- International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR)
- Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC)
- Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD)
- Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT)
- United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (The Beijing Rules)
- United Nations Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty (the JDL Rules)
- Scotland Act 1998
- Human Rights Act 1998
- Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995
- Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) Act 2010

Under the Scotland Act, the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill must be compatible with Convention Rights. The following articles of ECHR are relevant to the provisions of the Bill:

- Article 2 – Right to life
- Article 3 – Prohibition on Torture, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment
- Article 5 – Right to liberty and security of person
- Article 6 – Right to a fair trial
- Article 8 – Right to private and family life
- Article 14 – Non-discrimination

---

PRINCIPLES

In line with the spirit of Article 5, the Carloway Review had at its core the presumption of liberty. While that presumption may be reflected in certain provisions of the Bill, the Commission believes that the Bill would be strengthened by making an express statement at the outset, to the effect that the presumption, albeit rebuttable, must be in favour of liberty. This would serve as the overarching principle in which light all provisions must be considered.

PART 1 ARREST & CUSTODY

Arrest without warrant (s.1 & 2)

In relation to section 1, the Commission recommends that the power of arrest without warrant apply only to offences punishable by imprisonment. This would more closely align with Article 5. Section 1(2) extends the power of arrest beyond imprisonable offences on the basis of “interests of justice”. While section 1(3) provides some assistance, it is not an exhaustive definition and therefore the provision is apt to give rise to uncertainty both for the police and for those suspected of non-imprisonable offences. The effect of arrest is to deprive a person of their liberty. Under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (detention powers), this could only be done in relation to imprisonable offences. The Commission is not aware of any evidence of a need to alter the basis upon which a person can be deprived of their liberty. Non-imprisonable offences are at the lowest end of the scale of gravity. Further, taking a person into custody engages Article 8, as well as Article 5, ECHR. Under Article 8, the obligation is on the State to justify interference with the individual's private life. Such interference must be proportionate. In respect of non-imprisonable offences, deprivation of liberty will be much harder to justify in Article 8 terms. In such circumstances, the judicial oversight of the warrant procedure provides a safeguard against potential breaches of Convention rights.

The Commission agrees with Lord Carloway’s view that certain key terms should be defined in statute. Such definitions would assist in clarifying the purposes and the limits of Article 5. In particular, the Commission would encourage a statutory definition of the reason for arrest and subsequent detention. The purposes for which persons can be taken into custody should be strictly defined - such as interview, search, or recovery of evidence that might otherwise be destroyed.

In addition, the Commission would encourage a statutory definition of who is a suspect. This provides clarity for both individuals being investigated for crimes as well as for police officers carrying out inquiries. Such a provision guards against the danger of inconsistent police practice and maximises the opportunity to ensure that Convention rights are respected in every case. If a person’s status and their rights are properly and comprehensively defined, this will assist in ensuring that evidence obtained from a suspect in compliance with the statutory procedures will be admitted at the trial.
Information to be given on arrest and information to be given at police station (s.3 & 5)

The information to be provided in Sections 3 and 5 of the Bill does not provide sufficient information to fully protect the right to silence in Article 6 terms. The information contained in the common law caution includes the suspect being informed that anything he says will be taken down and might be used in evidence. This form of caution is fuller and more adequate in terms of providing the suspect with sufficient information to decide whether he wishes to waive his right to silence. While the terms of the common law caution may generally be used in practice, failing to include these in provisions enshrining a caution in statute increases the risk that a suspect will be told only this more limited information and thus not afforded their full Article 6 rights.

It is important to recognise that while the provisions of Part 1 envisage taking people to the police station, there may be other situations in which Article 5 is engaged but in which the person deprived of their liberty is not taken to the police station or “other premises”. An example of such a situation which may engage Article 5 is found in Gillan & Quinton v UK. This was a case challenging stop and search powers under s.44 of the Terrorism Act 2000. Although the ECtHR did not need to determine whether Article 5 was engaged (it disposed of the application by finding a violation of Article 8), the judgement suggests it would have concluded that there was a deprivation of liberty.

In Ambrose v Harris, the Supreme Court held that, in the case of G who was detained under section 23 of the Misuse of Drugs Act, there was “significant curtailment of his freedom of action” and therefore Article 6 was engaged and he was entitled to legal assistance before questioning.

Thus it can be seen that if the effect of the measure (arrest or other measure) employed in reality deprives the suspect of liberty, and if questioning is undertaken by the police at that time, then it is likely that the ECtHR would hold that the suspect is entitled to legal assistance.

In chapter 4 the Bill provides for legal assistance before interview for those in “police custody”. This appears to mean those arrested in terms of section 1 or by virtue of a warrant. The cases highlighted above demonstrate that there may be a number of mechanisms (other than arrest) which arguably deprive a person of their liberty and may trigger certain other rights (such as the right to legal assistance). The Bill does not make provision for legal assistance in such situations (discussed further below with regard to section 24). The Commission recommends that in order to avoid creating “grey areas”, suspects should be told of their right to legal assistance at the time of first caution (per Lord Carloway’s recommendation), whether questioning is to take place in a police station or not. This should be facilitated even if the person is not being arrested, but is going to be questioned.

---

4 (2010) 50 EHRR 45
5 [2011] UKSC 43
Information to be given at police station (s.5)

The rights afforded by EU Directive 2012/13/EU are not clearly reflected by Section 5. Article 3 of the Directive requires that a suspect be provided with information about their rights either orally or in writing. Thereafter, Article 4, requires that suspects are provided promptly with a written Letter or Rights, which they must be allowed to retain while in custody. The Letter of Rights covers additional information to that which must be provided under Article 3. These are not alternative provisions; rather both the initial information and the Letter of Rights must be provided. Section 5(3) is unclear regarding this distinction. The provision should make clear that a suspect must be provided with both the initial information (verbally or in writing) as well as a written Letter of Rights.

Custody (s.7-13)

The Commission welcomes the abolition of the 24 hour detention period. The Commission’s view is that the period for which a person can be held in custody should be 6 hours and any extension of time beyond 6 hours should be allowed only in exceptional circumstances and only for the purposes of facilitating Article 6 rights.

The Commission criticised the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010 (the 2010 Act) for doubling (and potentially quadrupling) detention periods across the board in the absence of proper evidence that this was necessary in order to secure the provision of legal assistance.

Taking someone into custody engages Article 8 of ECHR and as such has to be justified under Article 8(2). This justification must be on the basis of evidence, not anecdote. It has not, to date, been shown to be necessary to keep a suspect in custody for longer than 6 hours in order to furnish him with legal assistance. In fact, the evidence is to the contrary and the vast majority (83.5%) of people are able to be released from detention within 6 hours. The Commission therefore recommends that the Scottish Government restore 6 hours as the standard detention period. Extensions of time should be allowed only in exceptional circumstances where a lawyer cannot be provided within the normal period or for other Article 6 requirements (such as provision of an interpreter).

The doubling of detention times under the 2010 Act, it might be suggested, was not intended to allow sufficient time to provide legal assistance, but rather to give the police longer to carry out inquiries. The Commission would be concerned if investigations which could equally be carried out while a suspect is at liberty resulted in extensions of the detention period. That would, in our view, not be justified. The Commission is unaware of any evidence which suggested that prior to October 2010 the police were systematically hampered in their efforts to investigate crime by the limits of the 6 hour detention period. Unless such evidence is produced, the greater interference with individual’s private lives involved in longer detention periods may not be justified.

The length of time and the purposes for which a child can be taken into custody should be tightly controlled. The Scottish Government should consider whether it is appropriate to keep a child in custody for investigations beyond 6 hours in any circumstances.

It is important that the state ensures that data are collected about all detentions across Scotland. This will assist in identifying any systemic issues which may arise, for example, failure to provide sufficient legal assistance in any particular area or at any particular time. The state has a positive obligation to address such systemic problems and accordingly the situation should be kept under review.

The test for continued detention in section 10 should be expanded to include consideration of the probable disposal if convicted which, as Lord Carloway pointed out, serves to emphasise that only in exceptional circumstances should a person be detained where the charge is for a non-imprisonable offence.

The Commission recommends that s.10(2)(a) should impose a test of whether the person’s presence is “necessary” to enable the offence to be investigated, rather than “reasonably required”. The application of a test of necessity better comports with both a presumption of liberty and the requirements for justifying any Article 8 interference.

Investigative liberation (s.14-17)

Such a measure potentially provides an opportunity for greater respect for Article 8 rights by ensuring that people are only in custody when the aspect of the investigation being carried out requires them to be there.

It is essential to respect the presumption of innocence and the presumption that suspects should not be in custody unless it is necessary. Accordingly, it is necessary that limits on the exercise of this power are clearly delineated.

The Commission agrees with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the police should be required to specify the nature of any enquiries which they intend to carry out under these provisions, unless doing so would compromise the investigation. In addition, as in the case of the general power of arrest, the purposes for which persons can be taken into custody should be strictly defined - such as interview, search, or recovery of evidence that might otherwise be destroyed. Any conditions imposed upon a suspect must be proportionate to the need to protect potential victims, witnesses and evidence.

Given that such suspects are not yet subject to court proceedings, there should be protections put in place to ensure that information about the suspect is not disclosed and Article 8 rights are respected. The Carloway review makes reference to this issue at para 5.3.12 in terms of the practical problems that such a suspect may face such as suspension from his/her job even though he/she is eventually cleared of all suspicion.

Any conditions need to be proportionate and respect Article 8 rights. Account should be taken, for example, of a suspect’s work and family commitments. Consideration should also be given to the availability of the suspect’s instructed solicitor to ensure consistency of representation if possible.
It is not clear from the current proposals whether the suspect is expected to return to the police station at a specified time, albeit this could be included in any conditions imposed. The proposals allow for broad discretion on the part of the constable who can impose “any condition” considered necessary and proportionate. In order to ensure that this provision meets Article 8 requirements, consideration should be given to defining in statute the standard conditions for investigative liberation. These standard conditions should be based on the minimum restriction necessary for the legitimate purpose being pursued. Any extra conditions should only be necessary to secure compliance with standard conditions. It may therefore be useful to specify the requirement to return to the police station at a specified time within these conditions, in circumstances where there is to be a charge or intimation that the matter is being reported to the procurator fiscal. The specified time would provide a clear point in time when investigative liberation ceases. This condition may not, however, be necessary in all circumstances and it is essential that the imposition of such a condition is considered in light of the presumption of liberty and respect for Article 8 rights.

While limited by an overall time period of up to 28 days, the provisions permit a person to be arrested repeatedly in respect of the same offence. Repeated arrest represents an interference with Article 5 and Article 8 rights. There is a risk of harassment if no further boundaries on the use of this power are put in place. The addition of principles emphasising the presumption of liberty (as discussed above at p.2) would be of particular assistance in relation to powers such as this.

Person to be brought before court (s. 18)

Anyone who is arrested or detained has the right to prompt access to judicial proceedings. In determining the meaning of ‘promptly’, regard must have been given to the circumstances of the case but some cases have shown that somewhere around four days may be considered the maximum period of detention before being brought before Court.\(^6\) The issue arising over bank holidays, where a person can be detained until the next sitting day up to five days later, risks reaching the threshold of being unacceptable under Article 5, a matter clearly identified by Lord Carloway. Section 18 does not, however, address this issue. While Lord Carloway recommended that the maximum period a person should be thirty six hours, the requirement set out by Section 18 makes no headway in ensuring that this time limit is met. The Commission believes that a time limit which meets the requirements of Article 5 should be introduced. If a time limit is not introduced, the Commission considers it essential that Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the period of time during which suspects are kept in custody for court should be kept under review by the COPFS be followed through and the issue of a statutory time limit revisited if necessary.

Liberation by police (s.19)

While section 41 stipulates a general duty for the police not to detain persons unnecessariliy, the relevant factors relating to those who have been officially accused

---

6 Brogan & Others v UK Application no. 11209/84, Tas v Turkey (2001) 33 EHRR 15 at para 86 but have not yet appeared in court are not outlined. In order to strengthen protection of the presumption of liberty, this provision should outline appropriate factors for consideration by a constable when considering whether or not to release an accused from custody. Those factors should echo those under section 10; whether the person (if liberated) would be likely to interfere with witnesses or evidence or otherwise obstruct the course of justice, the nature and seriousness of the offence and the probable disposal if convicted (as discussed above). They should also include the factors identified by Lord Carloway, namely whether the accused is liable to escape, will not appear at an appointed court diet or is likely to commit further crimes. Specification of these factors in statute will assist in ensuring that any interference with Article 8 rights is necessary and proportionate.

Release on undertaking (s.20)

The Commission has some concerns regarding the availability of a condition of curfew in the terms of a release on an undertaking. This change in practice has implications for both Article 5 and Article 8. A curfew represents a restriction on the accused’s Article 8 rights. In addition, there is a risk that a curfew could lead to a de facto deprivation of liberty if used disproportionately. The Commission would suggest that a number of steps could be taken to mitigate these risks.

Firstly, confirming the overarching principle of the presumption of liberty in the Act, as suggested above, would serve to highlight the need to keep this under consideration in decisions such as these.

Secondly, this provision raises similar concerns as those in relation to the conditions attached to investigative liberation, as discussed above. Accordingly, consideration should again be given to defining standard conditions based on the minimum restriction necessary, with extra conditions, such as curfew, only available if necessary to secure compliance with standard conditions.

Finally, the dissemination of guidance as to the operation of this discretion would be beneficial, in order to highlight to constables the appropriate considerations to be taken into account. The existing guidelines from the Lord Advocate regarding conditions which can be attached to post-charge liberation should be expanded to include guidance on the use of curfews and the implications for deprivation of liberty.

Review of undertaking (s.22)

Given that the conditions of liberation constitute an interference with Article 8 rights, the Commission recommends that a time limit be introduced within which a review by the Sheriff must be carried out. The Commission would suggest that a hearing take place within 24 hours.

Information to be given before interview (s.23)

The Commission welcomes the requirement for the information to be given on arrest, set out in Section 3. However, the Commission is of the opinion that the suspect and his solicitor should be informed prior to interview of the content of the “reasonable grounds for suspicion”. Article 6(3)(a) requires that the suspect be informed of the nature of the allegation against him. Article 6(3)(b) guarantees him adequate time and facilities to prepare his defence. Under the Scots system, his decision whether and how to respond to questioning by police is part of his defence. The police need to provide sufficient disclosure to ensure that Article 6(1) is respected and that the constituent rights under Article 6 are practical and effective. What is necessary for that depends on other matters such as rules of evidence and the circumstances of a particular case. However, a requirement to disclose the content of the grounds for suspicion would allow the suspect and his lawyer to make an informed decision as to how to proceed.

Right to have a solicitor present (s.24)

While the jurisprudence of the ECtHR is not yet clear on whether/when the right to legal assistance arises for those not in police custody\(^7\), as discussed above\(^8\), there are situations where measures other than arrest deprive the suspect of his liberty. The jurisprudence of the ECtHR appears to be moving towards recognising a right to legal assistance in situations where there is “significant curtailment of [his] freedom of action”\(^9\).

In order to pre-empt the likely development of this right by the ECtHR, the Commission takes the view that it would be sensible to consider that a curtailment of freedom of action, short of deprivation of liberty such as to engage Article 5, could trigger Article 6(3)(c). Similarly a measure that amounts to a deprivation of liberty, but which does not involve being held in police custody (meaning, in the police station or similar) could trigger Article 6(3)(c).

The Commission is anxious to ensure that any new regime for the questioning of suspects does not create new grey areas in which rights may not be properly respected. The most obvious grey area is where the police have grounds to arrest a suspect and take him to the police station for questioning, but choose not to do so. Instead they decide to question him where they find him – for example his home. Whether that suspect can have the right to legal assistance is currently subject to the whim of the police officers in deciding whether or not to take him into custody. Under the amendments to the 1995 Act introduced by the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) Act 2010, a suspect who attends voluntarily at the police station has the right to legal assistance. It would seem that Parliament, in providing such a right, has recognised that while a voluntary attendee may strictly be free to leave the station at any time, in reality if he stops co-operating, he will be arrested. This implied measure of compulsion or coercion or curtailment of freedom of action has been recognised by the legislature, as it is in the Bill (which proposes the same measure). There would seem little logical difference between the voluntary attendee being questioned at the police station, and the suspect questioned elsewhere whom the police could arrest but choose not to do so.

---

\(^7\) as discussed in SHRC’s Response to the Carloway Review Consultation at http://www.scottishhumanrights.com/publications/consultationresponses/article/carlowayresponsejune2011

\(^8\) See above at pages 3 & 4

\(^9\) Zaichenko v Russia App. No. 39660/02, Judgement 18 February 2010 at para 48
Some may say that the issue is one of practicality. It may be said that the right to legal assistance cannot be offered or facilitated by the police other than in a police station or similar premises. Against that, it can be said that requiring every suspect who wants to avail himself of legal assistance to go to the police station in order to do so may be an unnecessary interference with his private and family life.

There are other jurisdictions in which the right to legal assistance arises at an early stage and can be facilitated without being taken to the police station. For example, there is reference to this occurring in practice in Canada where a police officer, at a roadside stop, offered the driver the opportunity to phone a lawyer and offered him use of a mobile phone.\textsuperscript{10} A similar practice exists in New Zealand.\textsuperscript{11} It would appear that the practicalities are not a bar. There may be an issue of availability of a lawyer to provide advice at the necessary time. That is no different to the problem which may arise if the individual is taken into custody. It is part of the state’s positive obligations under Article 6 to ensure that there is a sufficient system in place to provide timely legal assistance for those who require it.

The Commission welcomed the recognition by Parliament of the need for legal assistance by a suspect who attends voluntarily at the police station, not just for those arrested. The Commission is of the opinion that any suspect, whatever his location, who is to be questioned under caution should be afforded the right to legal assistance, be advised of that right at the time he is first cautioned, and be given an opportunity to avail himself of that right prior to questioning. Practically speaking, it would not seem an insurmountable challenge to facilitate the provision of advice over the telephone. Thereafter, if the suspect wishes to exercise his right further by receiving assistance in person, he will be able to choose to attend voluntarily at the police station. Such a regime would allow the individual greater control over the level of interference with his private life and liberty. It will also protect the police from criticism that might otherwise arise where they could have taken a suspect to the police station (thereby triggering his right to legal assistance) but chose not to do so (for reasons which may be the subject of later dispute).

Statutory protection should be in place to ensure all suspects are treated fairly. It is important to recognise that in assessing whether a trial is fair, regard must be had to the entirety of the proceedings including the questioning of the suspect before trial.

This is particularly relevant in relation to access to legal advice and representation. The Commission notes and commends the dissenting opinion of Lord Kerr in \textit{Ambrose} which sets out that the “features of a fair trial lead inexorably to the conclusion that where an aspect of the proceedings which may be crucial to their outcome is taking place, effective defence by a lawyer is indispensable. When one recognises, as Strasbourg jurisprudence has recognised for quite some time, that the entirety of the trial includes that which has gone before the actual proceedings in court, if what has gone before is going to have a determinative influence on the result of the proceedings, it becomes easy to understand why a lawyer is required at the earlier stage.”

\textsuperscript{10} \textit{R v Orbanski, R v Elias} [2005] 2 SCR 3, 2005 SCC 37, para 6, judgement of majority delivered by Charron, J.
\textsuperscript{11} s 23(1)(b) New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990; \textit{MOT v Noort, Police v Curran} [1992] 3 NZLR 260
It is important to bear in mind that the purpose of legal assistance is not only to protect the right against self-incrimination but also to provide a check on conditions of detention and any potential vulnerability of the suspect.

In addition, the requirement set down by Salduz is that a suspect must be provided with access to a lawyer from the time of the first interview unless there are compelling reasons, in light of the particular circumstances of the case, to restrict that right (emphasis added). Any restriction on that right must not result in prejudice to the right to a fair trial, which even a justified restriction can do. The Commission is concerned that the level of discretion allowed to a constable by section 24(4) is too great and may not, therefore, meet the necessary standard. In order to assist in assessing whether “exceptional circumstances” exist that would constitute sufficiently compelling reasons to restrict the right, it would be beneficial for exceptional circumstances to be more precisely defined. Further the Commission recommends that the approval of an inspector or higher be required for such a restriction. It is essential that the police record the reasons for their decision, to ensure that they are valid.

Consent to interview without solicitor (s.25)

The Commission welcomes the requirement for the police to record the reasons for a suspect’s waiver of the right to legal assistance. This will enable proper scrutiny as to whether the waiver is valid – meaning whether it is informed in the sense of being knowing and intelligent; and that it is unequivocal. In practice it will provide consistency by the police. It can serve to minimise subsequent challenges to the circumstances in which a waiver was said to have been given.

It is essential that the reasons for waiver are recorded but there are also strong arguments in favour of requiring a full record of the entire discussion around waiver.

There are, however, challenges in codifying provisions for waiver. In the context of rights, one size does not fit all. When procedural rights are at issue, any waiver must be attended by minimum safeguards commensurate with the importance of the right being waived. In the context of the right to legal assistance, the necessary safeguards will also depend on the vulnerabilities of the suspect. For example, the ECtHR has held that where the detainee was illiterate and a non-native speaker of the Turkish language, the right to legal assistance was not sufficiently safeguarded by accepting a pro-forma waiver in Turkish marked by the accused’s fingerprint in signature. Any statutory provision on the waiver of rights must take into account such differing vulnerabilities.

In order for a waiver to be knowing, intelligent and unequivocal, a suspect must be fully informed of the right, and the consequences of waiving it. A suspect should therefore receive the necessary advice to enable him/her to be “fully informed”. Such advice could be given in a variety of ways, such as by way of the information to be provided in terms of sections 3 and 5. At present, there would seem to be no means

---

12 para 55
13 Pishchalnikov v Russia App. No. 7025/04, Judgement 24 September 2009
14 Salman v Turkey App. No. 35292/05, Judgement 5 April 2011
by which the consequences of the decision are communicated to a suspect prior to him being asked whether he wants to exercise or waive his right to legal assistance.

The provision of legal assistance to children has been held by ECtHR to be of fundamental importance. There is no Strasbourg authority to the effect that a child cannot waive the right to legal assistance. However, the ECtHR considers that the vulnerability of an accused minor is such that “a waiver by him or on his behalf of an important right under Article 6 can only be accepted where it is expressed in an unequivocal manner after the authorities have taken all reasonable steps to ensure that he or she is fully aware of his rights of defence and can appreciate, as far as possible, the consequences of his conduct.” While this does not differ substantially from what is required for waiver by an adult, the case does suggest that the Court will look particularly critically at the circumstances in which a waiver is given by a child or the guardian of a child.

The validity of allowing waiver of the right to legal assistance by or on behalf of a child may be called into question having regard to Articles 3 and 37 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Article 3 is the “best interests” provision. Article 37 provides the right to legal assistance. It is questionable whether it is ever in a child’s best interests to waive the right to legal assistance given their vulnerabilities.

The Commission is of the view that children should always have legal representation, with no option to waive that right and welcomes the provisions of the Bill regarding under 16s. If children aged 16 and 17 are able to waive their right of access to a lawyer then it must only be allowed when it is a fully informed decision. The Commission considers that this would only be possible after obtaining legal advice, rather than the advice of a relevant person.

The role of the parent, carer or responsible person should not be to advise on whether to waive the right of access to a lawyer. The role of the parent should be clearly defined as providing support for the child to understand and cope with the pressure of the situation. It should not be confused with the role of the legal representative. Parents/carers/responsible persons are not legally qualified, and may be as inexperienced in police investigations as the child and should not be put in the position of having to guide the child through their rights and the legalities of questioning.

Questioning of persons “officially accused” (s.27-29)

There are no rules under ECHR that an accused person cannot be questioned beyond a particular point in proceedings, provided his rights under Article 6 are met. This reflects the fact that there are very different legal systems which exist among the Convention states, including inquisitorial systems.

---

15 Salduz v Turkey; Halil Kaya v Turkey App. No. 22922/03 Judgement 22 September 2009; Adamkiewicz v Poland App. No. 54729/00 Judgement 2 March 2010

16 Panovits v Cyprus App. No. 4268/04 Judgement 11 December 2008 [emphasis added]
Scots law traditionally has prohibited any questioning following police charge. It views the individual then as an accused person under the protection of the court. The origins of this rule may lie in respect for the right to silence at trial.

Under Article 6, the right against self-incrimination applies at all stages of proceedings. The ECtHR jealously guards this right, especially during trial proceedings. The prosecution must prove its case without the assistance of the accused.

In deciding whether or not questioning following official accusation would be compatible with Convention rights, it is important to consider its purpose and how it might be done. If it is designed to obtain incriminating evidence from an accused, then it may fall foul of ECHR in that it may operate so as to extinguish the very nature of the right against self-incrimination.

Once proceedings are underway, there are many ways in which an accused person can provide further information if he wishes to do so in light of newly disclosed evidence or material. He can provide a voluntary statement to independent police officers. In solemn proceedings he can make a judicial declaration. He can give evidence at his trial. He can change his plea to one of guilty at any time. It would seem, therefore that there is no need to allow questioning of an officially accused person in order to provide him with the opportunity to exculpate himself or admit the allegation.

In solemn proceedings, an accused can be compelled to submit to judicial examination. In light of the existing system, careful consideration should be given to the purpose and necessity of allowing questioning after someone is officially accused. There is a danger that it may, in certain circumstances, fall foul of Article 6.

If there is to be any form of questioning after a person is officially accused it must be accompanied by relevant protections including the right to legal assistance, to proper disclosure and that no adverse inference be drawn.

Child suspects (s.31 & 32)

There are a series of international instruments in relation to children in the criminal justice system that must be considered, including the UNCRC, UN Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice: the 'Beijing Rules' (1985) and UN Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty : the ‘JDLs’ (1990).

The Commission notes that the age of criminal responsibility has important implications regarding how early a child can come into contact with the justice system. In Scotland the age of criminal responsibility is 8, albeit that due to recent changes a child cannot be prosecuted for an offence committed when they were under the age of 12.

The Beijing Rules ask states to ensure that the age of criminal responsibility is not set too low and that emotional, mental and intellectual maturity are taken into account. The United Nations (UN) Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its authoritative interpretation of Article 40 of the CRC recommends that States:
“increase their lower minimum age of criminal responsibility to the age of 12 years as the absolute minimum age and to continue to increase it to a higher age level”.

The Committee reiterated this in relation to Scotland in its Concluding Observations on the United Kingdom. The Government should take the opportunity presented by this Bill to raise the age of criminal responsibility from 8.

It is important that the role and responsibilities of parents, carers and responsible persons is clearly set out. Part 1 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 sets parental responsibilities and rights, such as to direct and guide the child until age 16 and to guide until age 18. In the context of a child arrested, detained or questioned, it is important that there is clarity that the role is to support the child, not to make decisions on the child’s behalf or act as a legal representative.

Vulnerable persons (s.33 & 34)

There is a problem in providing a comprehensive definition of a vulnerable adult. The definition of “vulnerable persons” in the Bill considers vulnerability as being a consequence of mental disorder, however, vulnerability may exist for a variety of reasons. From an ECHR perspective, what matters is that anyone charged with a criminal offence is able to exercise their rights effectively. Some people will require support in order to be able to do that. The nature of that support will vary according to the particular vulnerability. The support required by someone with a learning disability will be very different to that needed by a person with a physical disability. The support needed by someone who does not speak English will be very different to the needs of, for example, a drug addict in withdrawal. The definition in the Bill covers only those who are vulnerable by way of mental disorder and as a consequence, there may be cases where the necessary support and advice to secure Article 6 rights is not provided.

Given that the Bill provides that it will be for police to identify vulnerability, it is important that police are adequately trained and supported to be able to identify vulnerability and that mechanisms are available to provide the necessary support to the suspect. Adequate training is the best means to avoid both failing to identify a vulnerable suspect as well as wrongly labelling a suspect as vulnerable. Such training should take into account the developing case law on legal capacity which increasingly refers to the rights set out in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, particularly Article 12. The rights of personal autonomy under Article 8 ECHR must be respected and the Government should ensure that, in applying this provision, the right to legal capacity is respected.

Right to consultation with a solicitor (s.36)

It is important that a suspect is properly and fully advised of their right to legal assistance, including what the purpose and benefit of legal assistance is. That enables the suspect to make an informed choice as to whether to exercise his right.

Where a suspect decides to exercise his right to legal assistance, the Commission has previously expressed concern about cases in which legal assistance is limited to a short telephone conversation with a solicitor. In order to comply with Article 6(3)(c) it is not necessarily enough simply to appoint a lawyer. The right must be effective. Given that the purposes behind the right to legal assistance extend beyond protecting the right not to incriminate oneself, it would appear self-evident that cases will arise where a telephone call is inadequate to protect the suspect’s right to a fair trial. In particular concerns arise where a suspect is vulnerable in some way beyond simply being in custody. This may not become apparent to the solicitor during a short phone call. In addition, there is no opportunity to check on the conditions of detention and to guard against ill-treatment if the lawyer does not attend in person. Attendance in person provides greater opportunity to learn more about the investigation (in particular via presence at interview) in order properly to be able to advise the suspect on how best to proceed. It may not always be that the best advice is to remain silent particularly where it becomes clear there is sufficient evidence and there is a stateable defence or answer to the allegation.

There are obviously greater resource implications if in person assistance becomes the norm and this may be the argument against it. However, the state has a positive obligation to ensure the right to legal assistance is practical and effective. While the state cannot be held responsible for every shortcoming on the part of a legal aid lawyer, there will be an obligation to intervene if inadequacies in the availability of proper legal assistance are systemic or sufficiently brought to its attention, for example in police non-disclosure practices which prevent informed and professional legal assistance being capable of being provided to the suspect.

The terms of section 36 of the Bill are unclear as to who is to determine the appropriate means of consultation. The Commission would be concerned if this is a matter for the police rather than for the suspect and his legal advisor to determine.

Best interests of the child s.42

Scotland has a strong tradition in relation to the protection of the rights of the child. The Children (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that the welfare of the child concerned should be the paramount consideration when making decisions about them. This goes further than the minimum requirement set out in Article 3 of UNCRC of requiring the best interest of the child to be a primary consideration. The Commission’s view is that section 42(2) should use the higher standard of “paramount”.

The deprivation of the liberty of a child should be a disposition of last resort and for the minimum necessary period and should be limited to exceptional cases. The Commission recommends that this should be explicitly stated in the terms of Section 42.

Abolition of requirement for constable to charge (s.51)

The process of charge under Scots law serves a useful function in terms of informing an individual of the reasons why they are being held and taken to court as required by Article 5(2) and Article 6(3)(a) of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). It can also help towards providing the individual with adequate time and facilities to prepare their defence as guaranteed under Article 6(3)(b), which includes such things as the preservation of evidence.
Under the current system, the process of charge marks a clear point in the proceedings when a decision must be made about whether it is necessary and proportionate to continue to hold a person in custody. It also clearly marks the point when a suspect’s status changes so that suspects are aware they can no longer be subjected to unauthorised questioning or certain other evidence gathering procedures against their will. Thus it serves a useful purpose in protecting the right against self-incrimination. Under the proposals, any further questioning or gathering of evidence from the suspect (accused) will be subject to independent scrutiny by the courts.

Section 51 means that the benefits described above may not be retained. Under the proposals, a person may be charged by a constable or they may be informed that a report is to be submitted to the procurator fiscal. This dual route provides less clarity as to the point at which the suspect’s status changes and has the potential to create “grey areas”. The requirement for police charge provides clarity for the suspect, the police and the courts as to the suspect’s status, allowing clear triggers for Article 6 rights to be identified by all parties.

PART 2 CORROBORATION & STATEMENTS

Corroboration (s.57-61)

In its response to the Scottish Government’s earlier consultation on Reforming Scots Criminal Law and Practice, the Commission expressed its view that corroboration acts to safeguard the quality of evidence. It is a means by which the reliability and credibility of evidence can be tested by the fact finder. It plays an important role in Scots law in preventing an accused from being convicted on evidence of insufficient quality. Thus it assists in preventing violations of fundamental rights.

It is the Commission’s view that if corroboration is abolished and insufficient additional safeguards are introduced, there is a danger that Scots law will have inadequate measures in place to allow for effective challenge to the quality of evidence. The Commission’s concern is therefore that the risk of violation of Article 6 may be increased.

The Commission emphasises that, in light of the Government’s unnecessarily hasty response to the Cadder judgement, sufficient time needs to be taken to properly address the concerns of a wide range of stakeholders in order to ensure that the additional safeguards are fit for purpose and are sustainable. Failure to do so poses the risk of further adverse judgements, miscarriages of justice, disruption of the administration of justice and reduction of public confidence. To this end it is therefore necessary to fully understand the objective and consequent potential development of the interpretation of Article 6 so as to determine how to replace corroboration with adequate additional safeguards and so not, although unintentionally, create difficulties due to taking a more minimalist compliant approach.

---

In deciding whether there has been a violation of Article 6, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) considers whether the proceedings as a whole were fair. It is possible to identify certain key features of a fair trial. Of particular relevance to the present context are the need for proceedings which are adversarial in character, and the need for fair rules of evidence.\textsuperscript{19}

Generally the ECtHR leaves the regulation of rules of evidence and procedure to the national systems. However, in considering whether the trial as a whole is fair, the ECtHR may require to consider broader issues relating to evidence and procedure, including the basis on which evidence has been obtained, the use to which evidence may be put, and the extent to which evidence may be relied upon.\textsuperscript{20}

In determining whether a trial is fair, ECtHR has regard to whether the rights of the defence have been respected. In particular, the ECtHR will have regard to the quality of evidence, including whether the circumstances in which it was obtained cast doubt on its reliability or accuracy, whether an accused has the opportunity to challenge the authenticity of evidence and oppose its use, and with the quality of evidence relied upon for conviction. The ECtHR has confirmed that the stronger the evidence is, the less requirement for supporting evidence. By way of corollary, the weaker the evidence, the more important the requirement for supporting evidence.\textsuperscript{21}

The ECtHR recognises the existence of corroborating evidence as a procedural safeguard of a fair trial. There are many examples of cases in which the availability (or not) of corroborating evidence has played a role in determining whether a trial has been fair. Where there is a risk of evidence being unreliable, the need for supporting evidence (in other words, corroboration) is greater in order to secure a fair trial.\textsuperscript{22}

Corroboration performs a “quality control” function, whether it exists as a legal requirement for sufficiency in every case, or because it exists as a matter of fact in a particular case. Where there is a source of evidence being relied upon for conviction which attracts concern about its quality (whether in terms of how it was obtained, its authenticity, its reliability or its accuracy), corroboration provides a means by which one can assess whether basing a conviction wholly or partly upon such evidence is unfair. It is a very practical tool which assists in the assessment of reliability of evidence.

There are certain types of evidence which give rise to concerns about reliability and accuracy and which otherwise disadvantage the rights of the defence. These include dock identification, evidence admitted under section 259 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, evidence of anonymous witnesses or undercover

\textsuperscript{19} The other features are the principle of legal certainty, and the issuing of a fair and reasoned judgment. Reed & Murdoch: Human Rights Law in Scotland, 3\textsuperscript{rd} ed., pp 598-638

\textsuperscript{20} \textit{Gafgen v Germany} (22978/05)(Grand Chamber 1/6/12), para.162-163

\textsuperscript{21} \textit{Gafgen}, para.164 \textit{et seq}.

\textsuperscript{22} For example, \textit{Allan v United Kingdom} (App. No. 48539/99), para.43 police officers, and unlawfully obtained evidence. In relation to dock identification, corroboration has been considered an important protection (in combination with other safeguards) against a violation of Article 6.\textsuperscript{23} For other types of evidence, corroboration may not always provide a sufficient safeguard.\textsuperscript{24} If the legal requirement for corroboration is abolished, there need to be sufficient other potential safeguards in place to ensure that the fairness of the trial is not compromised. Otherwise, whether or not a trial is fair may be determined by whether there happened to be corroborative evidence – that is, determined by a matter of fact rather than because of legal safeguards. The Commission is concerned that the consequences of abolition and the alternative safeguards needed in cases involving particularly problematic types of evidence have not been adequately taken account of.

In considering what other measures the ECtHR recognises as performing a “quality control” function, it is notable that the court has recognised exclusionary rules of evidence as providing such a safeguard.

In \textit{Khan v United Kingdom},\textsuperscript{25} the applicant alleged a violation of Article 6 because his conviction was based on evidence which had been obtained in violation of Article 8. It had been the only real evidence against the applicant. The ECtHR held that there was no violation of Article 6. The reason for doing so was that the applicant had the opportunity to challenge the authenticity and use of the evidence, and could have availed himself of the exclusionary rule under section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. That section provides:

(1) In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution propose to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of proceedings that the court ought not to admit it.

Scots law has no equivalent of section 78 of PACE. The Scots common law rule allowing unfairly obtained evidence to be excluded is arguably a much stricter test and confers a far narrower discretion on a trial judge.

The ECtHR identified several other “strong procedural safeguards” in addition to corroboration, in the context of the use of hearsay evidence. In \textit{Al-Khawaja and Tahery v United Kingdom},\textsuperscript{26} the ECtHR had to consider the fairness of trials in which hearsay evidence was admitted and formed the basis of conviction. Strong procedural safeguards are necessary in this context because of the inherent danger of unreliability of hearsay evidence and the fact that it offends against the fundamental right of the accused to cross examine witnesses (and thus challenge the accuracy and reliability of the evidence).

The safeguards highlighted by the Court included\textsuperscript{27}:

\begin{itemize}
\item \textit{Holland v HMA} 2005 1 SC(PC) 3, para.57
\item for example, \textit{N v HMA} 2003 JC 140, para.26, per LJC
\item App. No. 35394/97
\item Applications nos. 26766/05 and 22228/06, Grand Chamber judgment 15 December 2011, para.147
\item Ibid at paras.148-151
\end{itemize}
• Safeguards contained in section 23 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 and section 116 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 (which provide limited exceptions to the use of hearsay);
• The right of the defence to lead evidence challenging the credibility and reliability of the statement, which would have been inadmissible if the maker of the statement was giving evidence in the usual way. There is no equivalent safeguard in the Scottish legislation.
• The power of a trial judge under section 125 of the 2003 Act to stop proceedings which was based wholly or partly on a hearsay statement where he is satisfied that the statement is so unconvincing that, considering its importance in the case, a conviction would be unsafe. This power does not exist in the equivalent Scottish legislation;
• The discretion of the trial judge in terms of section 126 of the 2003 Act to refuse to admit hearsay evidence if the case for its exclusion substantially outweighs the case for inclusion. This discretion does not exist in the equivalent Scottish legislation.
• The general discretion to exclude evidence under section 78 of PACE, which does not exist in Scotland;
• Jury directions on the burden of proof and directions on the dangers of relying on a hearsay statement.

It is important to note that, even with these strong procedural safeguards in place in England, the existence (or absence) of corroboration was the decisive factor for the ECtHR in determining whether or not there had been a violation of Article 6 in each case.

The ECtHR has recently confirmed that whatever the procedural safeguards may be, they must provide a real chance of effectively challenging the reliability of decisive evidence.
While in Scots law an accused person can challenge the reliability of evidence in a variety of ways, most often through cross-examination, the Commission is concerned that the absence of an express statutory discretion on the part of the trial judge to exclude a particular piece of evidence of such poor quality that relying upon it for a conviction would be unsafe or might render the trial unfair, may be a deficiency.

For example, in N v HMA, dealing with whether a trial judge could exercise a common law power to exclude evidence that would otherwise be admitted under section 259 of the 1995 Act (hearsay), the Lord Justice Clerk (Gill) concluded that the trial judge had no such discretionary power.
The Justice Clerk went on to commend the legislative safeguards in the equivalent English legislation as “prudent”.

The court has an obligation to ensure a fair trial under Article 6. If the court considers that the admission of certain evidence would render the trial unfair, it should exclude it or if it has already been admitted, it should stop the proceedings. It appears to

28 Papadakis v The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, App. No. 50254/07
29 2003 JC 140, para.22
30 Ibid at para.27
31 per Lord Gill, ibid at paras. 35-36.
the Commission that N v HMA remains one of the only cases in which the court has recognised the connection between excluding evidence and protecting a fair trial under Article 6. The Commission therefore considers that it may be valuable to provide judges with clear statutory powers both to exclude particular pieces of evidence where they consider that to admit them may render the trial unfair, and to stop proceedings which are based wholly or partly on evidence that is so unconvincing that, given its significance to the case, the trial would be unfair.

Allowing a jury to consider convicting an accused on the basis of very poor evidence, or evidence where the ability of the defence to challenge it has been significantly restricted, jeopardises a fair trial.

The requirement to ensure a fair trial is a matter of law. It is therefore an obligation that rests with the judge. The Commission disagrees with Lord Carloway’s view that all cases ought to be left to juries. Juries are masters of fact. The question of whether a verdict based on poor evidence is compatible with Article 6 in any given case is a legal question. The judge has to ensure the fairness of proceedings and protect the accused’s Article 6 rights.

Given the State’s positive duty under Article 6 to put in place a domestic system that meets the requirements of a fair trial, there must be adequate measures in place to allow the judge to give effect to his duty to prevent an unfair trial.

The introduction of a power to allow a judge to withdraw a case from the jury if no reasonable jury could convict on the basis of the evidence before it, would be a good procedural safeguard. It is a safeguard that addresses the quality of evidence, which in the absence of corroboration, is particularly important. Further, since the Appeal Court applies a “no reasonable jury” test in determining miscarriages of justice, it would seem to strengthen that safeguard if the same power is given to the trial judge who has had the benefit of seeing and hearing the whole of the case. The Commission would recommend such a power be introduced.

It should be noted, however, that the introduction of a “no reasonable jury” test would not, of itself, guarantee a fair trial. In Al-Khawaja & Tahery, in respect of Mr Tahery, the ECtHR considered that the English system (which includes an analogous power) did not prevent the trial from being unfair. The Court stated, “The absence of any strong corroborative evidence in the case meant the jury in this case were unable to conduct a fair and proper assessment of the reliability of T’s evidence [which was admitted through the statutory provisions allowing exceptions to hearsay]. Examining the fairness of the proceedings as a whole, the Court concludes that there were not sufficient counterbalancing factors to compensate for the difficulties to the defence which resulted from the admission of T’s statement.”

Again the Commission notes the importance which ECtHR attaches to a fact finder’s ability to conduct a fair and proper assessment of the reliability of evidence. As has been stated, corroboration is a useful practical tool for that purpose.

---

32 Al-Khawaja & Tahery v United Kingdom, para.165
The Commission considers that the introduction of a “no reasonable jury” test should allow the judge to stop a case going to the jury where the conviction would be partially based on evidence that is of very poor quality. It should also allow the judge to apply the same qualitative assessment to a particular piece of evidence prior to it reaching the jury’s ears. In the absence of measures to allow judges to exclude individual pieces of evidence upon which no reasonable jury could rely for conviction, the potential strength of this safeguard is reduced. Such evidence ought not to be heard by the jury at all, hence the need for the power to exclude it. The Commission has recommended the introduction of a discretionary power for judges similar to that in section 78 of PACE. That, combined with the “no reasonable jury” test, would provide a better matrix of procedural safeguards.

While the Commission acknowledges that in the majority of cases it is likely that corroborative evidence will be led (and will act as a procedural safeguard), the system of criminal law needs to have measures in place to provide sufficient procedural safeguards for those cases in which there is no corroboration. Further in respect of types of evidence which give rise to concerns about reliability or which restrict the rights of the defence, it has already been noted by Scotland’s now most senior judge, that additional procedural safeguards (such as those in England) are “prudent”.

Exculpatory and mixed statements (s.62)

The Commission welcomes this provision. The content of a statement by an accused should be available as proof of the truth of its contents whether it is exculpatory, incriminatory or mixed, provided the statement has been lawfully and fairly obtained. The Commission notes that the provision could, perhaps, be more clearly expressed.

PART 3 SOLEMN PROCEDURE

Increase to jury majority required for conviction (s.70)

The ECtHR has not spoken directly on the question of simple jury majorities.

In Pullar v United Kingdom, the majority did appear to consider that a jury comprised of 15 people was a procedural safeguard in the context of considering whether one of the jury’s number may not have been independent and impartial. In the partly dissenting judgment, reference was made to the fact that there was a majority verdict to support the dissenting judge’s position that Mr Pullar was objectively justified in having doubts about the impartiality of the jury.

It is obvious that requiring a greater than simple majority for a guilty verdict provides a stronger procedural safeguard. However, the Commission does not consider that 33 Albeit in Mr Tahery’s case, such a matrix was still insufficient to guarantee a fair trial because of the absence of corroboration.

---

34 N v HMA, per Lord Gill
35 App. No. 22399/93
36 ibid at para.40-41
37 See Partly Dissenting Joint Opinion of Judges Ryssdal and Makarczyk joined by Judges Spielmann and Lopes Rocha this is an adequate safeguard to balance the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, as more fully described above. That is because jury majorities do not play any part in securing that only evidence of sufficient quality can form the basis for a conviction.

PART 5 APPEALS & SCCRC

References by SCCRC (s.82)

The Commission welcomes the approach that there will be no further statutory listing of the criteria included in the “interests of justice” test for SCCRC references. The Commission also recommends that s194C(2) of the 1995 Act be repealed. It is clear that SCCRC already took account of finality and certainty in applying the interests of justice test. The continued existence of the provision carries the danger that, in time, finality and certainty will be taken to have some greater weight than other considerations. While finality is important for the rule of law, it is able to be interfered with for good reasons.

The Commission welcomes the repeal of section 194DA. However, the Commission opposes the introduction of an additional hurdle in the determination of an appeal for those whose cases have been referred by the SCCRC. The proposal that the test should include “it is in the interests of justice that the appeal be allowed” constitutes such an additional hurdle. There is no reason in principle or in practice to distinguish between victims of miscarriages of justice simply based on the route by which their case happens to have arrived at the appeal court.

This constitutes a barrier to access to justice without apparent justification. The Commission accepts that it may be justified to impose a higher test in cases occasioned by a change in law, such as those arising from Cadder, however, this reasoning does not apply to the broader category of cases referred by the SCCRC. The court will only have occasion to apply the test set out in s. 194B in cases where it has found that a miscarriage of justice has occurred. In these circumstances, the justification for imposing a further hurdle in the determination of the appeal has not been made out.

Scottish Human Rights Commission
29 August 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Sheriffs’ Association

The Sheriffs’ Association has responded to a number of consultation documents relating to the topics you mention. Rather than attempt to distil our responses down, which we do not have the resources to undertake, we thought it might be helpful to draw your attention to the responses we have made and particular parts of those responses. To that end, I attach three documents previously prepared by the Sheriffs’ Association as its comments on the Government’s consultation on the Carloway Report, on the Criminal Justice Bill, and the proposals for reform of sheriff and jury procedure.

In relation to the themes which the Justice Committee is to consider, the Association draws the Committee’s attention to the following.

(1) Police powers and rights of suspects.
   See our response to questions 1 to 26 of the consultation on the Carloway Report. And response to the Criminal Justice Bill.

(2) Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms.
   See our response to questions 31 to 35 of the consultation on the Carloway Report. And response to the Criminal Justice Bill.

(3) Court procedures
   See our response to the consultation on reform of sheriff and jury procedure.

(4) Appeals, sentencing and aggravations

See our response to questions 36 to 41 of the consultation on the Carloway Report. And response to the Criminal Justice Bill.

I also attach some further comments by way of an additional response.

Gordon Liddle
Secretary, Sheriffs’ association.
30 September 2013
THE CARLOWAY REPORT - CONSULTATION QUESTIONNAIRE

ARREST AND DETENTION (Chapter 2 of the consultation paper)

Question 1

What are your views on the move to a power of arrest on ‘reasonable suspicion’ of having committed a crime, replacing the common law and statutory rules on arrest and detention?

We agree. The new system must be easily understood by the public and police. This test is easy to understand and conforms to international standards.

Question 2

What are your views on Lord Carloway’s recommendations for the police no longer to be required to charge a suspect with a crime prior to reporting the case to the Procurator Fiscal? How is this best achieved in practice?

The majority view of the Association is that such a change is acceptable. However, if such a change were to be introduced, we think that there ought to be safeguards to protect the suspect from unfairness.

The minority view is that there is a strong basis for retaining the importance of the significance of the stage of charge in the present system. A charge tells the suspect that his status has changed, that he cannot be questioned further, except before a sheriff. It tells the accused what crime or offence he or she is in fact accused of having committed and, if held in custody, why. Even though to some extent the point of charge is in the discretion of the police, it is an important point, being one after which the suspect cannot be questioned and at which point his status as a person to be released on an undertaking, on bail or remanded in custody has to be considered. At that point the suspect must be told what it is that he is to be reported for prosecution for.

Question 3

Do you agree that a suspect in a criminal investigation, who has not been detained or arrested, does not require any statutory rights similar to those conferred had that person been arrested and detained?

Yes. As we understand the Convention jurisprudence, the Convention provides protection from the point that there has been some significant curtailment of the suspect’s freedom of liberty. We see no reason why Scottish domestic legislation should go further than that.

Question 4

What are your views on the recommendation that a suspect should only be detained if it is necessary and proportionate having regard to the nature and seriousness of the crime and the probable disposal if convicted?
We agree, subject to the proviso that regard needs also to be had to the interests of justice, such as the prevention of interference with the course of justice by destroying evidence, interfering with witnesses and so on. Further, the police must always be permitted to detain if the offence being investigated is sufficiently serious.

CUSTODY (Chapter 3 of the consultation paper)

Question 5

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the maximum time a suspect can be held in detention (prior to charge or report to the Procurator Fiscal) should be 12 hours?

Yes. It appears from the data provided in the Report that in practice, in the vast majority of cases, no longer than 12 hours is usually required by the police to complete investigations and that in fact, the large majority of detentions in custody are for periods of less than 6 hours. The requirement that detention be reviewed after 6 hours is an additional safeguard.

Question 6

What are your views on whether this 12 hour period could be extended in exceptional circumstances? How could this be regulated appropriately?

There are bound to be some exceptional circumstances where an extension to the time limit is required. We think that a single extension of a fixed number of hours, perhaps 12, should require judicial authority.

Question 7

What are your views on the need for the proposed 12 hour period of detention to be reviewed after 6 hours by a senior police officer?

Yes, by a senior police officer unconnected with the investigation.

Question 8

What do you consider the most effective way of ensuring that no person should be detained in custody beyond 36 hours before appearing before a Court, i.e. over the weekend period?

  - Are there any practical difficulties to be overcome in delivering a model that achieves this?

We agree that it is undesirable in principle for any person to be unnecessarily detained in custody and that periods in custody before being brought before a court ought to be kept within reasonable bounds. We note that there is no rule in either domestic or Convention jurisprudence which sets 36 hours as a limit, but rather, a period of up to four days has been found to be Convention compliant.
It appears to us that at present, current arrangements for court sittings (which include Saturday sittings where a holiday succeeds a weekend) taken together with extensive powers available to the police to release suspects on an undertaking are also Convention compliant.

Increased powers of the police and Crown (proposed at para 5.3.18) would permit a much greater number of releases on bail and undertaking before the first court hearing which would be an improvement. Further improvement would result from increased and earlier Crown involvement with liberation decisions concerning those in custody who have not yet appeared in court. Greater consistency in the application of pre-Court liberation policies and closer liaison between the prosecution authorities and the police on such matters, would be desirable in itself. The result should be that the police, with the involvement of the Crown, should only keep in custody over a weekend those where there is no realistic alternative at that time, or where it can reasonably be thought that a court would refuse bail when the case first calls in court.

We believe that the establishment of regular Saturday Courts, whether on a regional basis or not, would impose an unacceptable degree of extra strain and excessive extra costs on an already overburdened criminal justice system which is already suffering major reductions in expenditure and would be quite unnecessary, especially if increased liberation powers are exercised by the Crown and police prior to court appearance.

- Bearing in mind the desire for suspects to be held for as short a period as possible, current ECHR case law which indicates a limit of 4 days and affordability issues do you consider there to be an alternative time period to the 36 hour recommendation before suspects appear before a Court?

We have nothing further to add.

Question 9

What are your views on the police having the ability to hold an accused for court and report a case to the procurator fiscal without first charging the suspect?

If we understand the proposal correctly, this would mean that the police would be entitled to arrest a person on suspicion of an offence, detain him for investigation and questioning, decide that they are unsure whether to charge him and advise the suspect that he will be reported to the procurator fiscal, but then continue to detain him until the next lawful court day, bring him before the court and the procurator fiscal could then oppose a bail application. We consider that as wrong in principle. If a person is to be detained for an extended period, whether by the police or the court, that should be on the basis of an explicit charge, rather than mere suspicion and the awaiting of a decision of the procurator fiscal.
LIBERATION FROM POLICE CUSTODY (Chapter 4 of the consultation paper)

Question 10

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendations that the police should be able to liberate a suspect from custody on conditions, referred to as investigative liberation?

Yes.

What are the practical issues with this and what comments do you have about conditions and safeguards?

We see the potential value, in some cases, of investigative liberation if, and only if, that is an alternative to prolonged detention. The principal safeguards would be a strict limit on the time of such liberation and the right of the suspect to challenge that decision by application to a court. This is a sensible way to deal with volume in appropriate cases. It mirrors the English position. It is imperative that the suspect understands the procedure for being called back for questioning.

Question 11

Lord Carloway suggests that a limit of 28 days be set on the period that the police can liberate a suspect on investigative liberation. Do you think that 28 days is sufficient in all cases? Please explain.

We note that there seems to be no explanation or justification for this period in the Report. We would prefer a clearer explanation of why this figure is proposed. Nonetheless, it does not seem an unreasonable period of time for this purpose as a starting point. It seems to us however that there could be many types of cases where this period would be too short: in cybercrime cases where computer forensics may well take longer. The period should be renewable on good cause shown on application to the Court.

Question 12

Are there practical issues with the police advising the suspect of a time and place for a return to the police station, at the point investigative bail is granted?

We have no comment.

LEGAL ADVICE (Chapter 5 of the consultation paper)

Question 13

What are your views on the recommendation for access to a lawyer to begin as soon as practicable after the detention of the arrested suspect, regardless of questioning?

- What do you see as the purpose of access to a lawyer when questioning is not anticipated?
As a deterrent to abuse of power by the police. To provide the suspect with information about his/her rights: see Dayanan v Turkey 2009. To enable a suspect positively to assist his defence, when matters are still fresh.

- What do you consider to be the best way of providing legal advice for suspects as soon as practicable after detention, whilst ensuring it is effective, practical and affordable?

By telephone or video-call to a lawyer: either a solicitor identified by the suspect, if available, or to a duty solicitor.

Question 14

_Do you foresee any difficulties with the recommendation that the standard caution prior to the interviewing of suspects outwith a police station includes information that they have a right to access a solicitor if they wish? If so, please explain what these are._

No.

Question 15

Lord Carloway recommends that it is for the accused to decide on the way legal advice is provided (by telephone, in person etc.) and whether their solicitor is present during a police interview. Do you agree with this approach? If not, please give reasons.

Yes.

- Are there any additional considerations for the form of legal advice when questioning is not anticipated?

In principle, we agree. However, the choice of method and identification of lawyer must be subject to practical considerations. For example, a suspect should not be permitted to insist on impracticable or impossible demands or deliberately to frustrate legitimate investigation of crime.

Question 16

_It is proposed that the right to waive access to legal advice, and the expression and recording of this, should be set out in legislation – do you agree? If not, please give reasons._

Yes. We agree with the recommendations.

- Lord Carloway also proposes that this right can only be waived once a person is fully informed of the right – what are your views on this?

We agree with the recommendations.
Question 17

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the practice of only enrolled solicitors giving advice to suspects should continue? If you disagree, please set out an alternative approach.

Yes.

Please comment on the reason(s) for your answer.

We agree with the recommendations for the reasons given in the Report.

QUESTIONING (Chapter 6 of the consultation paper)

Question 18

Do you agree that the police should be allowed to question a suspect after charge (subject to the permission of the court and any conditions they apply), as outlined in the recommendations? Please explain.

The majority of the Association disagree with this proposal. After charge a person’s status changes. See further our remarks at Answer 2. From that point the right to silence and the right against self-incrimination cannot be breached. The only way of ensuring this is for there to be no exception to the rule. Once charged, an evidential sufficiency should exist. Further questioning would bring no further benefit. The accused is free to make a voluntary statement post-charge.

If such questioning were allowed, we believe that there would be additional difficulties. An order from a sheriff would be required. Even with the use of email, it may be some time before it is possible for a sheriff to give attention to such an application. That would mean the accused remaining in custody during that time. The Report states that an application for questioning after charge would not be to extend the period of custody, but we rather suspect that will be the practical effect and that such applications would be likely to be accompanied with applications for extensions of the 12 hour custody period. Increased periods in custody runs counter to the principle in the report of custody being kept to a minimum. Further, we note that such an application would not be intimated to the accused. That seems wrong in principle as does the idea that, therefore, the accused would be unable to make representations to the sheriff.

However, a minority of the Association believe that in some circumstances, questioning after charge ought to be permitted in certain limited circumstances, such as where new evidence has emerged. In that case, the suspect will continue to have the right to legal assistance and has the usual Convention protections. It is unlikely that such a power would be often used, especially in summary cases which form the vast bulk of all criminal matters coming before the courts.
Question 19

Do you agree that the procedure of Judicial Examination should be removed, whilst introducing provisions to allow the Crown to apply to the court to question a suspect after charge, as outlined in the recommendations? Please explain.

Judicial Examination is now somewhat of an anachronism and is not often employed and should be abolished. Similarly anachronistic is the procedure whereby a person on petition may emit a declaration, which rarely if ever happens in practice. We agree that petition procedure should be modernised and that in solemn cases, the accused be brought before the sheriff on petition but not for “examination”. However, we reiterate the concerns about police questioning after charge expressed above.

Question 20

Do you agree that the present common law rules of fairness concerning the admissibility of statements by suspects should be abolished in favour of the more general Article 6 test, as outlined in the recommendations? Please explain.

Yes, for the reasons expressed in the Report. However, we do not believe that in practice there would be much difference regardless of which test is applied.

CHILD SUSPECTS (Chapter 7 of the consultation paper)

Question 21

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that, for the purposes of arrest, detention and questioning, a child should be defined as anyone under the age of 18 years? Please explain why.

Yes. In light of current international conventions, the age which should define a child should be 18, for these purposes only.

Question 22

Do you agree that there should be a general statutory provision that, in taking any decision regarding the arrest, detention, interview and charging of a child, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration?

Yes.

- How would such a provision work in practice?

We agree, so long as it is understood that the best interests of the child are one of many primary considerations in this context and it is also understood that this primary consideration will not in all cases be the most important consideration. The need to protect others and the public interest in the apprehension, prosecution of suspects may often outweigh this consideration. The interests of justice should be paramount.
Question 23

Do you agree with the terms of the Report that the general role of the parent, carer or responsible person should be to provide any moral support and parental care and guidance to the child and to promote the child’s understanding of any communications between the child, the police and the solicitor?

Yes. We agree with the general role of the parent, carer or responsible person.

- Should the responsibilities of a parent, carer or responsible person be provided for in statute or achieved through guidance and the possible provision of support or in some other way?

In the first instance we consider that it should be sufficient to provide for the responsibilities through guidance. Legislation should only be considered if guidance is unsuccessful.

Question 24

Do you have comments on the recommendation for children aged 16 or 17 years to be able to waive their right of access to a lawyer only with the agreement of a parent, carer or responsible person?

In order to avoid problems of admissibility at trial, the best solution is that there can be no waiver of the right of access to a lawyer where the suspect is under 18.

Question 25

Do you have comments on the recommendation for children aged 16 or 17 years to be able to waive their right of access to a parent, carer or responsible person, but that in such cases they must be provided with access to a lawyer?

We suspect that there may be some 16 and 17 year olds, perhaps those most likely to come into contact with the criminal justice system, who have no competent parent or carer or responsible person. And there will be some who will refuse to have such a person with them. We agree that 16 and 17 year old children should be permitted to given fully informed consent to waiver of this right. However, as we say above, we consider that those under 18 should not be entitled to waive access to legal assistance regardless of whether they have a parent etc with them.

Question 26

What are your views on the recommendation that children under 16 should not be able to waive their rights to legal advice?

We agree.
VULNERABLE ADULT SUSPECTS (Chapter 8 of the consultation paper)

Question 27

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that there should be a statutory definition of a “vulnerable suspect”

Yes.

  o Do you agree with the definition proposed by Lord Carloway?

Yes.

  o If not, what do you think the definition should be?

We agree that there should be such a definition, especially since there exists already a definition of vulnerable in relation to witnesses. We agree that the definition of vulnerable in relation to a witness is cumbersome and should not simply be carried over to a definition of vulnerable suspect. We agree the definition should be more clearly expressed. We agree that it should include those suffering from a mental disorder. However, we consider also that that may be some suspects who are vulnerable through some aspect of their psychology or recent experience who may be vulnerable for a reason falling short of mental disorder or because of a physical condition. It might be wise to provide a catch all addition to the definition.

Question 28

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the role of an Appropriate Adult should be defined in statute?

   o Do you agree with the definition proposed by Lord Carloway?

   o If not, what do you think the definition should be?

The issue here is similar to that raised at question 23. We think that a similar approach should be adopted for both. Therefore, in the first instance we consider that it should be sufficient to provide for the responsibilities through guidance. Legislation should only be considered if guidance is unsuccessful. There may be a role for mental health officers as appropriate adults.

Question 29

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that statute should provide that a vulnerable suspect must be provided with the services of an Appropriate Adult as soon as practicable after detention and prior to any questioning?

Yes.
If so, do you agree that the current role of an Appropriate Adult should be extended so that a vulnerable suspect can only waive their right of access to a lawyer if the appropriate adult also agrees to this?

No. The vulnerable adult must be provided with the services of an appropriate adult. In order to avoid problems of admissibility at trial, the best solution is that there can be no waiver of the right to access to a lawyer.

Question 30

Do you agree with Lord Carloway’s recommendation that statutory provision should be made to define the qualifications necessary to become an Appropriate Adult?

Yes.

If so, what steps do you think are required to decide what these qualifications should be?

We have no further comment.

CORROBORATION (Chapter 9 of the consultation paper)

Question 31

Lord Carloway concludes that the requirement for corroboration has no place in a modern legal system and should be abolished. Setting aside any question about whether this would require other changes to be made, do you agree with that conclusion?

There are concerns about this proposal. Some of the arguments in favour of retaining the rule are set out in the Report at paragraphs 7.2.36 to 7.2.40. It is unnecessary therefore to repeat them here. It is worth emphasising however, the difficulties that do exist in practice in deciding whether a witness is credible and reliable. Skilful liars and the honestly mistaken but apparently convincing witnesses are no strangers to the courts. Those difficulties will not be assisted by removing the corroboration requirement. While the corroboration requirement does not prevent wrongful convictions, it is likely to reduce the risk since the Court has support for its assessment of a single piece of evidence. Without corroboration, there is a risk of increased wrongful convictions. There would also be a risk of poorer investigation of crime by the police (especially in times of economic austerity), a risk that investigations are cut short (which might otherwise have revealed corroborating or exculpatory evidence) and a greater risk of accusations of improper conduct against police officers. It is undesirable that a person should be convicted on the word of a police officer or other witness alone. There would be a substantial increase in prosecutions and a greater number of defended cases going to trial since an accused may often think that if there is just one witness, his chances of acquittal are fair. More attacks will be made on the character of witnesses. The end result may well be more prosecutions but without a corresponding increase in convictions or perhaps even a fall in successful prosecutions. There would be a serious and substantial extra burden placed on the whole criminal justice system. The Courts and other parts of the criminal justice system are already suffering considerable strains which are very likely to increase in any event. This is not the time to precipitate further stresses. The rule is a tool, well used by all in the criminal justice system. If that tool is removed, it is unclear what will replace it.

However, there are arguments in favour of abolition of the corroboration requirement which are well summarised at paragraphs 7.2.41 to 7.2.50 of the Report. It is unnecessary therefore to repeat them here. It is worth emphasising that it is undoubtedly true that there are many crimes which are not prosecuted because of the rule, despite the existence of one clear and convincing source of evidence and justice is therefore not done because of the rule. That may be especially true of some types of cases involving women and children, but it is also true of other common types of cases, such as assault and theft. It is also worth noting, as the Report clearly states, that the existence of the rule has led to a considerable amount of elaborate legal theories and intricate exceptions and qualifications to the rule so that there are many cases where it may be quite unclear how to apply the rule and judges may disagree among themselves as to its application. Further, it is worth noting how far out of line this rule of evidence is when compared with other legal systems. No other Western legal system has a quantitative standard of evidence: the argument is that Scotland should be moving to a qualitative model.

That all said, the corroboration requirement is an ancient part of Scottish evidential law. It is, as the Report correctly says, a rule with deep roots in all parts of the criminal justice system. Its abolition has only very recently been mooted. With great respect to the author of the Report and those who contributed to it, we do not believe that this Report is a sufficient basis on which a conclusion as to retention or abolition of the rule should be reached. We believe that before such a decision is reached, much more study, research and analysis needs to be undertaken on the question, the consequent effects of abolition on the rest of the criminal justice system and what other changes might be required as a consequence of abolition. We therefore recommend that whatever is done with regard to the rest of the recommendations of this report, determination of this question be deferred until that further work is done and further public debate takes place.

Question 32

If the requirement for corroboration is removed, do you think additional changes should be made to the criminal justice system?

Yes.

- If you think additional changes should be made, what specific changes would you suggest and why? For example, if altering the size of jury majority required or verdicts what would a new system require or include?

- What evidence do you have to support your position?

We believe that abolition of the corroboration rule would almost certainly entail changes to many other aspects of the criminal justice system. As we note above, we believe that much more analysis on this question needs to be done before a clearer answer could be given. However, we believe that the following changes might well be necessary.

- Introduction of the qualitative test of evidence at trial before verdict.
- Warnings to juries about conviction on uncorroborated evidence
- Increase in size of the majority needed for a guilty verdict

Consideration of safeguards as to admissibility of evidence

OTHER CRIMINAL EVIDENCE ISSUES (Chapter 10 of the consultation paper)

Question 33

Do you agree that the test for sufficiency of evidence at trial and on appeal should remain as it is now? If not what do you believe should change?

If the corroboration rule were abolished, there would need to be changes. There would need to be a qualitative test for sufficiency of evidence. The test in a jury trial would, therefore, have to be along the lines of “whether, assessing the evidence as a whole, the Crown case, taken at its highest, is such that a jury properly directed could not properly convict”. The judge would need to have the power to remove the case from the jury where the evidence does not reach the required standard.

In a summary trial, as the judge sits alone, the test would have to be “whether, assessing the evidence as a whole, the Crown case, taken at its highest, would entitle a reasonable sheriff [or stipendiary magistrate or justice of the peace] to convict”.

Question 34

Do you agree the rules distinguishing treatment of incriminatory, exculpatory and mixed statements should simplified allowing the courts to assess them more freely? If you do not agree, should any other change be made regarding these statements?

Yes. We agree with the analysis in the Report and its conclusion that the rules of admissibility as regards such statements are now far too complex and unlikely to be fully understood by juries however carefully framed the directions given to them are. We agree that all statements given to police and other public officials during the course of investigation should be generally admissible at trial, at the instance of any party, whether as proof of fact or otherwise. That must be subject to the right of any party, and the judge, to make comment on them as regards the circumstances in which the statements were made, their content and what inferences could legitimately be drawn from the statement.

Question 35

Currently no adverse inference can be taken from an accused person failing to answer police questions. Do you agree that this should not change?

Yes. This is entirely consistent with the right to silence and the presumption of innocence enjoyed by the accused.
APPEAL PROCEDURES (Chapter 11 of the consultation paper)

Question 36

Do you agree that time limits in appeal cases should be enforced? What sanctions do you consider might be appropriate?

Yes. Time limits in appeals should be enforced. The sanctions should be as noted in the recommendations of the Report. They include denial of the appeal.

Question 37

Do the amendments Lord Carloway recommends to sections 74 and 174 of the 1995 Act, together with the retention of the nobile officium, cover all situations in which Bills of Advocation and Suspension might reasonably be used? If not, what other situations can you envisage?

Yes. We agree in principle that the present modes of appeal ought to be modernised and simplified. We agree in principle that the appeal route via Bills of Advocation and Suspension ought to be abolished providing that the revised modes of appeal permit the bringing under review the same types of decisions as are presently challenged using such appeal routes. We are not aware of any types of decisions where the proposed amended right of appeal, taken together with the petition to the nobile officium would not provide an effective remedy. We agree that such petitions should be used only for exceptional cases and that provision should be made to prevent such petitions being employed as a means of avoiding the statutory appeal procedure or the consequences of having failed to use the statutory appeal procedure.

Question 38

Do you have any comments on Lord Carloway’s other recommendations for appeals?

We do not consider that the Crown should have a right of appeal under section 74 or 174 of the 1995 Act without leave but the convicted person requires leave. In the interests of fairness, both should be subject to the same law.

FINALITY AND CERTAINTY (Chapter 12 of the consultation paper)

Question 39

Do you agree that section 194C(2) of the 1995 Act should be retained and that there should be no further statutory listing of the criteria included in the “interests of justice” test for SCCRC references?

Yes. The need for finality and certainty is an important consideration which ought to be taken into account by the SCCRC and it is worth enshrining that consideration in statute for the avoidance of doubt. We agree also that the SCCRC ought to be permitted to take into account whatever other considerations it considers amount to the interests of justice and enumerating them would not be helpful.

Question 40

What are your views on Lord Carloway’s recommendation that section 194DA of the 1995 Act should be repealed?

We agree. It is wrong in principle that the very body whose decisions are being challenged can veto that challenge. The evidence is that the SCCRC performs an important role responsibly and we believe that its independence ought to be preserved. The evidence of its decisions on the Cadder cases referred to the SCCRC tends to show that there is no need for the restriction introduced by section 194DA. We think that consideration could be given to providing the SCCRC with a right of appeal against decisions of the Court.

Question 41

Do you agree with the recommendations that, when considering appeals following upon references from the SCCRC, the test for allowing an appeal should be:

   (a) there has been a miscarriage of justice; and

   (b) it is in the interests of justice that the appeal be allowed.

   o If not, what do you think the criteria should be?

Yes. Although we agree with this recommendation, we do see the strength of the argument that the only test ought to be miscarriage of justice.

REFORM OF SHERIFF AND JURY PROCEDURE - CONSULTATION QUESTIONNAIRE

Statements to Accused

Question 1

a) Do you agree in principle with the proposals for statements to an accused?

b) If not please give reasons

c) What will be the potential benefit to the system?

d) What potential problems could arise?

1(a) No.

(b) We consider the problems as set out in our Answer to Question 1(d) are such as to render the proposal potentially unworkable in practice and ill advised.
(c) We have, in any event, doubts as to whether there will be any noticeable benefit to the system. Agents should be telling their clients this anyway. The Case Law regarding discount makes it very clear that the discount clock starts ticking from the first appearance.

(d) The Consultation Paper states” it is not intended that these reforms should usurp the basic principle that the accused is entitled to require the Crown to prove their case.” Lord Carloway in his review endorses the right to silence.

It may be argued that the terms of the statement reflect what a solicitor should be advising his/her client in any event. Does the statement therefore encroach on that relationship?

The proposed wording is “full engagement with their solicitor”. What does “engagement” mean? It is unclear how the Sheriff will subsequently ascertain whether or not there has been such engagement without encroaching upon the solicitor/client relationship? What is the Sheriff to do if the solicitor submits that all his dealings with his/her client are confidential and privileged.

If through oversight the statement is not made by the Sheriff what happens? We pose this question as it is unclear whether or not “the discount of sentence” will be in some way affected.

There is no sanction proposed in the event of lack of “engagement” on the part of the accused. Is it to be inferred that failure to “engage” will be a factor the Sheriff is permitted to take into account when determining the level of discount of sentence to be afforded?

There is a further potential problem. It could be argued that the statement, particularly in referring to discount, is an attempt to influence an accused to plead guilty. In other words, full engagement should properly result in a plea of guilty. That assumption may not be well founded. Aside from anything else, whether an accused should be pleading to a charge depends on the strength of the prosecution case. Initial disclosure may not reveal a strong Crown case thus it would be perfectly proper and indeed appropriate advice to maintain a plea of not guilty. It will not matter in those circumstances whether there is engagement or not. It is all very well to say that an accused knows whether the offence was committed, the majority of accused persons do not however plead to charges until there is no realistic alternative option.

(e) We consider an amendment to section 196 will be required.

The Compulsory Business Meeting (CBM)

Question 2

a) Do you agree in principle to the proposal of a new compulsory business meeting procedure?

b) If not, please outline your reason(s)
c) What would be the potential benefits to the system?

d) What potential problems may arise?

2(a) Yes, although we have reservations about the proposed timescale.

2(c) It may result in earlier resolution of matters and also reduce the number of adjournments.

2(d) It is dependent upon the accused giving appropriate instructions to his solicitor.

Our concerns over the timescale centre upon the existing failure, under the present procedure, of COPFS to make timeous disclosure of evidential material to the Defence necessitating adjournments. Leaving aside what may be set out in the Rules as opposed to primary Legislation, any continuation or repetition of such failings by COPFS, whether due to lack of resources or otherwise, will simply frustrate the purpose of the CBM and result in an additional layer of procedure being prescribed for no real benefit.

Question 3

a) Do you agree in principle that the CBM take place before service of the indictment?

b) If not, please outline your reason(s)

c) What would be the potential benefits to the system?

d) What potential problems may arise?

3(a) Yes. If it does not take place prior to service, then there is no real change in the present system.

3(c) and 3(d) as in 2 above.

Question 4

a) Should sanctions be available if parties fail to comply with a requirement to hold a CBM?

b) If so, what should these be?

4(a) Yes. Without some form of sanction the CBM may amount to nothing more than another ineffectual and rather meaningless part of the Procedure. Defence Statements, without any sanction for failure to comply, are a case in point.

4(b) While it may be thought failure on the part of the accused should be a factor the Sheriff is entitled to take into account when considering discount on sentence, the majority view of the Association would be against this being provided for. The potential for “conflict” between Agent and accused, resulting in Agents withdrawing from acting, is obvious. It is unclear how such a “reduced” discount would be calculated, nor what is to occur if it is the Crown who has failed to comply.

Further amendment to Section 196 would in our view be required.

The Written Record of the CBM

Question 5

a) Do you agree in principle to the proposal for a written record of the CBM?

b) What would be the potential benefits to the system?

c) What potential problems may arise?

5(a) Yes.

5(b) It would provide information to the presiding sheriff at the First diet as to what had been discussed/agreed at the CBM and may mean that more is achieved at the First diet.

5(c) As it is a written record Defence representatives may be reluctant to commit themselves. Questions of what authority did representatives have at such a meeting may arise. Accused can change their minds. What will the status of such a record be? For example, would the record contain any information regarding negotiation of pleas? If it did and the accused subsequently did not plead to these offences, could the record be put to him in cross examination at a trial?

A fuller Minute of what takes place at the First diet is likely to be required. Although it is preferable that the same sheriff presides at the First diet, any continuation thereof and any subsequent Trial, this can cause programming issues in larger courts and is not always achieved.

Question 6

a) Do you agree with the proposal that the duty to lodge the written record of the CBM with the court be placed with the Crown?

b) If not please provide alternative proposals with reasons.

c) Is the time-scale for lodging with court appropriate?

d) If not please provide alternative time-scale proposals with reasons.

6(a) and 6(c) Yes
Service of Indictments and First Diets

Question 7

a) Do you agree in principle that cases should be indicted to a first diet only as outlined in the proposals?

b) Do you agree with the proposal to amend the time scale in section 66 (6) of the 1995 Act to facilitate the proposed new procedure?

c) Do you have any comments on the proposals for amendment of section 71 with regards to parties’ responsibilities?

7(a) and 7(b) Yes.

7(c) No. We are unable to assess the full impact of the proposed amendments to primary Legislation at this stage. The form and content of the written record of the CBM is to be prescribed by Act of Adjournal. We reserve the right to comment upon it in due course.

Time Limits

Question 8

a) Do you agree in principle that the current time bar (section 65 (4)(b) of the 1995 Act) requires to be amended to facilitate the proposed new procedures?

b) Do you agree the 110 day period (section 65 (4)(b) of the 1995 Act) should be amended to 140 days as outlined in the proposals?

8(a) and 8(b)

There is no real justification put forward for the proposed increase. The only point in favour of increasing the period from 110 to 140 days is that it would be administratively convenient for the Crown for there to be the same period in Sheriff Court solemn procedure as in High court cases.

The majority of the Association consider there are, however, more important concerns which point to it being both appropriate and proportionate to retain the period of 110 days in Sheriff Court proceedings:

(i) The Consultation Paper proposes that there should be more preparation time at an early stage. That is the purpose behind the creation of the CBM. At this point the Paper is advocating the proposed extension because “more time is needed to prepare between the First Diet and Trial Diet”. Surely the Crown cannot have it both ways. The purpose of the First Diet is to establish inter alia that the Crown is prepared. If the Crown is not going to actively prepare its case until shortly before or after the First diet an extension to 140 days is unlikely to suffice.
(ii) It must be acknowledged that, particularly in these difficult financial times with numerous constraints upon the public finances, it is very expensive to keep accused on remand for another 30 days.

(iii) A number of cases in the Sheriff Court under Solemn procedure do not attract either a custodial sentence or a sentence of great length. Without considering the matter of "discount" a period of remand of 140 days represents a sentence of over 9 months.

(iv) The experience in the High Court suggests that the "140 day period" is frequently exceeded. This would be unconscionable in many Sheriff Court cases.

The majority accordingly favour retaining the period of 110 days.

TV Links

Question 9

a) Do you agree in principle to the proposal for amendment to section 77(1) of the 1995 Act?

b) What are the potential benefits to the system?

c) What potential problems could arise?

9(a) In principle yes, although as it is apparently a precursor to "changes being made in the future" we consider it may be premature to remove the requirement that the accused must sign the guilty plea.

9(b) Cost of transporting an accused.

9(c) Lack of reliable technology. Until reliable technology is available in ALL criminal Courts Section 77(1) should remain in its present form.

Written Narrations

Question 10

a) Do you agree in principle with the proposal to introduce written narrations in sheriff court solemn cases, where a plea of guilty is tendered (no evidence having been led)?

b) What are the potential benefits to the system?

c) What potential problems could arise?

10(a) In principle.

10(b) Those highlighted in the consultation document. Such a document would provide the sheriff with advance notice of the circumstances of the offences.
10(c) Written narrations are likely to be more practically achievable when the accused is pleading to a Section 76 indictment. Where no adequate notice of a plea has been given to the Crown, particularly in a busy First Diet Court or even at a Trial sitting, such narrations, containing mitigating factors by the Defence, are unlikely to be available. Mandatory written statements will result in a further calling of the case which may not otherwise be required if reports are unnecessary. If reports are however to be called for, the narrative can be prepared in the intervening period, in which event it would assist the Sheriff if the written narration is made available in advance of the sentencing diet.

SHERIFFS’ ASSOCIATION
RESPONSE TO THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF THE SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT REGARDING THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL, INTRODUCED 20 JUNE 2013

[1] Sheriffs have no responsibility for costs or budgeting in the courts where they sit. In those circumstances, we have considered it appropriate to make only some general comments in response to the questions headed ‘WIDER ISSUES’. However it seems self-evident that if any reform leads to more court time being expended on cases, then there will be the following consequences:

- If courts have to sit late, then there is likely to be a requirement to pay staff overtime or give them time of in lieu of extra hours worked.

- There will be an increase in collateral costs, such as police, custody officers, legal aid.

- If courts are expected to spend more time on individual cases, then there will inevitably be delays in the processing of the cases through the courts.

[2] We would have thought it a very difficult task to predict the savings in time, if any, to be gained from the implementation of, for example, the Bowen provisions regarding sheriff and jury procedure. We consider that it will take some time for prosecutors and defence lawyers to become familiar with new concepts such as the compulsory ‘business meeting’ prior to the first diet and it is difficult to predict how effective that will be in saving time. An analogy might be thought to lie in the ‘defence statement’ introduced into solemn procedure by Section 124 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 (becoming section 70A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995). Experience shows that perhaps less information is imparted in these statements than might have been expected or hoped for.

[3] It is therefore perhaps over-optimistic to attach any particular figure to any savings which it is hoped will flow from the changes set out in the Bill.

[4] The sheriffs have no control whatsoever over the number of prosecutions brought or the level (summary or solemn) or court in which they are to be brought. We therefore cannot comment on the effect of the Carloway provisions, i.e. the removal of the requirement for corroboration, on the number of cases brought.
[5] Similarly, we would have thought that it would simply be speculative to predict whether more or less cases will go to trial once the requirement for corroboration is removed.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from South Lanarkshire Council

Please find attached South Lanarkshire Council's response to the consultation request on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I would like to take this opportunity to contribute to the formulation of the proposed legislation.

Overall, it is our view that the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill represents an important opportunity to improve the delivery of justice to victims of certain offences, who have previously not been able to access court due to the need for corroborating evidence.

The other measures relating to knife crime, people trafficking and the role of the appropriate adult are also welcomed.

There is however great concern that the effect of the expected increase in nominated council officers undertaking the role of appropriate adult has been underestimated and will place a burden on local authorities.

Harry Stevenson
Executive Director
Social Work Resources
Children and Justice Services
23 August 2013

RESPONSE

South Lanarkshire Council, Social Work Resources provides a wide range of community services which will be affected by the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. The Council in partnership with Lanarkshire Criminal Justice Authority provides supervision, guidance and support to offenders throughout South Lanarkshire. South Lanarkshire Council also provides a service to three sheriff courts within the Lanarkshire area.

In addition to this South Lanarkshire Council is at the forefront of developing strategies to tackle domestic abuse. This work is co-ordinated through Doorway - a multi-agency partnership involving social work, Women's Aid and other partners. This work provides and implements a strategic framework that promotes and supports multi-agency response to domestic abuse and provides improved protection for women, children and young people.

As such we would like to express our thanks for the opportunity to contribute to a statutory provision which will have an effect on our service provision.

This submission has been structured thematically, in the suggested format.

Police powers and rights of suspects (Part 1 of the Bill)
It is our view that overall the provisions made in the bill are reasonable and provide adequate protection for accused persons, while allowing the police adequate opportunity to make investigation.

The provision of immediate access to a solicitor is now a requirement and in our view will reinforce the rights of the accused while safeguarding victims and witnesses.

We have no view on the reduction time that accused persons can be kept in police custody without charge, provided this is sufficient time for the police to make their investigations. It is noted that this part of the bill follows the recommendation of Lord Carloway and therefore we would on balance support this.

The inclusion of children up to the age of 18 and the provision for questioning children and vulnerable adults is welcomed, and it is hoped that it will lead to a more accessible and fairer system for accused persons within those categories. This provision however is likely to lead a substantial rise in the number of requests for officers of the local authority to act as appropriate adults. Disappointingly it is clear from the figures published that this has not been taken account of and the suggestion that Local Authorities will be able to manage this provision from existing resources is unrealistic and in our view requires revising.

It is proposed that the final say in whether or not a young person retains access to a solicitor will lie with the appropriate adult. This is very much welcomed by us as it takes account of intra familial offending and will enhance the rights of certain accused persons in particular circumstances. Again though this is likely to lead to an increase in demand for officers of the local authority to act as appropriate adults.

Corroboration, admissibility of statements and related reforms (Part 2 plus section 70 of the Bill)

In our view the abolition of the corroboration rule in criminal proceedings is to be welcomed. This measure will assist the victims of domestic and personally violating crimes to have a better opportunity to have their voice heard. The current system places an unreasonable and unrealistic burden on those responsible for the prosecution of these offences and it sets the bar so high as to deny meaningful justice to the victims of these crimes. The nature of these offences means that corroboration is often not available and while it is recognised that not every case can be convicted, victims are currently being denied justice unnecessarily. As an organisation which works in partnership to support the victims of these offences we have experience of the trauma and distress caused by these cases and therefore we would support the proposal.

Court procedures (Part 3 plus section 86 of the Bill)

The increase in the length of time which an accused person can be remanded for is not something that is to be welcomed, however in our view it is a better development than justice being denied to the victims of crime or those accused of a crime due to a lack of preparedness by either the prosecution or defence.

The increase in the majority required for a guilty verdict to be recorded is an understandable counterbalance to the abolition of the rule of corroboration. We have some concerns that certain offences which by their nature will always require a jury to assess the credibility of a witness, will on too many occasions become subjects of unnecessarily intrusive questioning. It is our concern that in cases such as these where a victim of a crime has been subject to needless and invasive questioning Jurors will confuse trauma with unreliability and unduly find defendants not guilty.

Therefore we would ask that consideration be given to an evaluation of the efficacy of Sexual Offences (Procedure and Evidence) (Scotland) Act 2002. It is our view that the removal of the corroboration requirement, coupled with an increase in jury majority may lead to an increase of incidences whereby victims of certain crimes are targeted by the defence and unduly traumatized.

Overall despite these reservations, we would support the increase from simple majority to two thirds.

Appeals, sentencing and aggravations (Parts 4 and 5 and sections 83 to 85 of Part 6 of the Bill)

We welcome the proposal to raise the maximum sentence for handling knives and offensive weapons from four to five years. It is our view that this will reinforce to both the public and those who commit this offence the seriousness of the offence.

The proposals for prisoners on early release is to be welcomed and recognises the breach of public trust committed by people who are on early release when they commit an offence. It is our view that this provision should be extended to include all community-based disposals. This would underline to the public at large and offenders the importance of complying with community-based punishments. By not including all community-based disposals within this legislation, it is our view that there is a subconscious devaluation of these disposals within a court setting and to the public at large.

We welcome the proposal to make people trafficking an aggravated offence factor. Scotland’s status as a destination country for trafficked people is unwelcome and it is important to recognise the role that we all have to play in the eradication of people trafficking. Making people trafficking an aggravating offence factor sends a message to those involved in this activity about the priority that will be given to their detection, prosecution and punishment.

The additional provision of television links for court is also a welcome development as it will allow vulnerable victims and witnesses of crime, to give evidence in a less intimidating atmosphere. Presumably it will increase the number of children and vulnerable adults willing to give evidence which can only be a good thing.

Closure

In summation we are supportive of a number of the proposals made in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, however we are concerned about the unintended consequences of some of the provisions such as:

- A large increase in the number of nominated Council officers undertaking the role of appropriate adult
- An increase in intrusive questioning of witnesses in certain cases
- An indirect devaluation of community based court disposals.
Overall though we welcome the abolition of the corroboration rule, the introduction of greater use of TV links and People Trafficking being made an aggravating factor.
Survivors Empowering, Educating and Supporting Abused Women (SEESAW) is a user-led group of women survivors of rape and child abuse. We set up the group in November of last year, empowered by having had one-to-one and group counselling at the Rape Crisis Centre in Glasgow.

The aims of the group are:

- to remain a user-led group of women survivors of sexual violence
- to offer support, empowerment, education and awareness raising for ourselves and other women survivors of sexual violence
- to support women survivors whether they have gone through the ‘justice system’ or not
- to campaign for an improvement in conviction rates and a cultural shift in attitudes to crimes of sexual violence

We are still closely involved with Rape Crisis Scotland (RCS) and have read their briefing paper (July 2013) on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. We are indebted to RCS for bringing the bill to our attention and for the comprehensive background they provide to the Bill.

As survivors of sexual violence, we would like to add our voice to that of Rape Crisis Scotland to highlight areas of concern we have with aspects of the Bill relating to crimes of sexual violence.

1. We agree with Rape Crisis Scotland that removing the requirement for corroboration would result in improved access to justice for victims of sexual crime but, because it will not be implemented retrospectively, survivors of historic child abuse or rape will not have their cases heard.

   If retrospective application can be applied to the Double Jeopardy (Scotland) Act 2011, why not to the abolition of corroboration?

2. Another concern is the raising of the simple majority verdict from 8 out of 15 to 10 out of 15. 8 out of 15 is a simple majority, so why not stick to that?

   One of our aims as members of SEESAW is to change society’s attitude to crimes of sexual violence. This is because public perceptions are largely negative and apportion blame to the victim when background information on the victim is allowed (in the vast majority of cases). If the simple majority is increased, so is the likelihood of unenlightened attitudes to be represented on the jury. The conviction rate for perpetrators of rape and sexual violence is already shockingly low. We don’t see how this change will help raise the conviction rate.

3. The Scottish Government has previously indicated its commitment to introduce judicial direction in sexual offence cases by giving factual information on aspects such as delayed disclosure and apparent lack of physical resistance. Because of the lack of information and understanding surrounding crimes of sexual violence, we would very much welcome this guidance being introduced.

We hope you take into account the concerns we have before this Bill becomes an Act.

Margaret Airlie
Secretary, SEESAW
August 2013
Introduction

Together welcomes the opportunity to respond to this Stage 1 Call for Evidence on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. This response specifically focuses on the extent to which the provisions in the Bill will succeed in achieving the Scottish Government's policy aim of 'making rights real' for children and young people, as outlined in the Children & Young People (Scotland) Bill currently being scrutinised by the Education and Culture Committee. In producing this response, Together is drawing from its 2012 State of Children's Rights report and consultation with children's organisations through its 2013 State of Children's Rights seminars. The 2012 report is based on research evidence, views and opinions gathered from over 100 professionals working with and for children who attended Together's 2012 seminars and seventy-nine children's organisations who completed an online survey.

Together would like to concentrate on three specific issues in this response: the best interests of the child, equal protection from assault for children and the age of criminal responsibility. Together's key messages to the Justice Committee are that:

- The policy intention of section 42 to place a duty on constables to consider the best interests of the child when holding, arresting, interviewing or charging a child is welcome. Together seeks assurance that the use of the word 'wellbeing' in the Bill would achieve this policy intention.
- Together also urges the Justice Committee to ensure that the best interests of the child are also taken into consideration when holding, arresting, interviewing or charging a parent.
- Together calls on the Justice Committee to take heed of international calls to give children equal protection from assault and bring this forward through the Bill.
- The Bill provides an opportunity for the Scottish Government to fulfil its commitment to consider raising the age of criminal responsibility. Together urges the Justice Committee to take this forward through the Bill.

The best interests of the child

1. Together welcomes the policy intention of section 42 of the Criminal Justice Bill to place a duty on constables to consider the best interests of the child when holding, arresting, interviewing or charging a child. However, Together notes that the wording of the duty in section 42 (2) is to "treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration" and seeks assurance that the use of the word 'wellbeing' would achieve the policy intention of considering the 'best interests' of the child.
2. Considering the best interests of the child helps to progress a recommendation made by the UN Committee of the Rights of the Child to the UK in 2008 to “take all appropriate measures to ensure that the principle of the best interests of the child, in accordance with article 3 of the Convention, is adequately integrated in all legislation and policies which have an impact on children, including in the area of criminal justice and immigration”. Article 3 of the UNCRC states that “the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration in all actions affecting children”.

3. Together would be keen that the Scottish Government takes into consideration the best interests of the child throughout the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill and not only within section 42. The adult criminal justice system can often fail to acknowledge the wider impact that decisions can have on children. For example, the decision to send a parent to prison is likely to have a tremendous impact on a child. Together would like to bring the Justice Committee’s attention to a recommendation made to the UK in the 2012 Universal Periodic Review process by Slovenia to "ensure that the best interests of the child are taken into account when arresting, detaining, sentencing or considering early release for a sole or primary carer of the child..."

4. Each year in the UK, more children experience a parent's imprisonment than a parent's divorce. Children's experience of a family member's imprisonment can be similar to experiencing bereavement, and its effects may include the child 'acting out' or becoming withdrawn, deterioration in performance at school, being bullied or becoming the bully, and increased risk of substance misuse. Children with a family member in prison suffer from serious mental health issues at three times the rate of other children and are at higher risk of offending and of ending up in prison themselves.

5. Following its Day of General Discussion in September 2011, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child reiterated that children of prisoners have the same rights as other children and that State parties should “…ensure that the rights of children with a parent in prison are taken into account from the moment of the arrest of their parent(s) and by all actors involved in the process and at all its stages, including law enforcement, prison service professionals, and the judiciary”. Decisions that have a direct impact on children, such as the imprisonment of a parent, fail to take the child’s best interests into account as a primary consideration. Together would urge the Justice Committee to consider ensuring that the best interests of the child are also taken into consideration when holding, arresting, interviewing or charging a parent.

---

Equal protection from assault

6. In Scotland, the continued acceptance of hitting children is detrimental to attempts to protect children from physical abuse. The current acceptability of physical punishment within Scots’ law means that children do not have the same level of protection from violence under the law as adults. Section 12(i) of Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act 1937 preserved the rights of parents, teachers and others with lawful charge of or control over the child to administer punishment. The Children (Scotland) Act 1995 requires that, in exercising this right, adults must act in ‘the interests of the child’. While outlawing the assault, ill-treatment or neglect of a child, the 1937 Act therefore permitted the physical punishment of children as ‘reasonable chastisement’. In 2003, the Scottish Parliament passed the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act. Section 51 of that Act prevents adults using implements, delivering blows to the head and shaking children as a physical punishment. While these specific practices are now prohibited, parents are still protected by the law when they physically punish a child.

7. Together would like to bring the Justice Committee’s attention to one of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child’s recommendations to the UK in 2008 to “prohibit as a matter of priority all corporal punishment in the family, including through the repeal of all legal defences”5. This recommendation has recently been repeated by a number of countries through the 2012 review of the UK through the Universal Periodic Review:

“Take measures to ensure the freedom of children from physical punishment in accordance with the Convention on the Rights of the Child.” (Norway)

“Introduce a ban on all corporal punishment of children as recommended by the CRC and other treaty bodies” (Finland)

“Reconsider its position about the continued legality of corporal punishment of children”6. (Sweden)

In addition, in May 2013, the UN Committee Against Torture recommended that “the State party prohibits corporal punishment of children in all settings…repealing all legal defences currently in place, and further promote positive non-violent forms of discipline via public campaigns as an alternative to corporal punishment.”7

8. Despite these repeated calls from UN treaty bodies and the UK’s examination under the Universal Periodic Review, children in Scotland still do not have the same protection from assault as adults in law. Children’s organisations continue to raise the need for the removal of the defence of ‘justifiable’ assault and for the promotion of positive, non-violent parenting methods. Together’s 2011 State of Children’s Rights report recommended that any form of physical violence against a person under 18 should be a criminal offence and that the Scottish Government should remove the defence of ‘justifiable assault’.8 Together’s 2012 State of Children’s

---

7 Para 27 http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/cat/cats50.htm
Rights report recommended that children be given equal protection from assault in law.9

9. The current ‘justifiable assault’ defence undermines the work that professionals are doing with families on positive parenting. The Scottish Government needs to promote positive approaches to discipline within their ongoing policy programmes and public information campaigns. Parents and carers need to be equipped with alternative forms of behaviour management techniques in order to allow them to support and manage difficult behaviour.

10. More than half of the Council of Europe’s 47 member states have either achieved full prohibition or committed themselves to do so soon. Among the 27 EU states, just four – the UK among them – have neither prohibited nor committed themselves to do so.10 If the Scottish Government is serious about its commitment to make Scotland “the best place to grow up”, it needs to give children equal protection from assault in law.

Age of criminal responsibility

11. Together would like to bring the Justice Committee’s attention to one of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child’s recommendations to the UK in 2008 to “raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility in accordance with the Committee’s General Comment n° 10.”11 This recommendation has recently been repeated by a number of countries through the 2012 review of the UK through the Universal Periodic Review:

"Consider the possibility of raising the minimum criminal age". (Belarus)
"Consider the possibility of raising the age of criminal responsibility for minors“12.(Chile)

12. As reported in the 2011 State of Children’s Rights report, the age of criminal responsibility in Scotland currently remains one of the lowest in Europe.13 The introduction of a minimum age for prosecution set at 12 through the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 reflects a recognition that the children’s hearings system is the appropriate place to do so, rather than the criminal justice system. However, Scotland’s very low age of criminal responsibility remains in statute and the ‘criminal justice consequences’ of referral to the children’s hearings system on the offence ground, such as a criminal record, will persist for a number of children as young as 8 even after further changes made in the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 come into force.

---

10 Within the EU, 17 states have banned it completely and another 6 are committed to doing so. Only four countries in the EU have neither achieved this reform nor committed to it: France, Belgium, the UK and Malta.
13. In the Do the Right Thing progress report, the Scottish Government has committed to give ‘fresh consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12’. This proposal, which addresses a recommendation from the UN Committee, is strongly supported by children’s organisations. It is hoped this change could lead to an increased emphasis on addressing the specific needs of children within the justice system which can often include issues such as neglect or abusive treatment. It is therefore welcome that the Scottish Government has pledged to take a fresh look at the issue, and Ministers should take action now.

14. Together was one of a number of children's organisations to write a joint letter to the Minister for Children & Young People following the Bill’s publication to raise concern about the omission in the Bill to raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility. The Scottish Government's commitment to give fresh consideration to raising age of criminal responsibility is with a view to bringing legislative change within the lifetime of this Parliament (2016). Its omission from this Bill would be a missed opportunity to fulfil the Scottish Government's commitment. Together urges the Justice Committee to consider raising the age of criminal responsibility through this Bill.

About Together
Together (Scottish Alliance for Children’s Rights) is an alliance of children's charities that works to improve the awareness, understanding and implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in Scotland. We have 233 members including large international and national non-governmental organisations (NGOs) such as UNICEF UK, Save the Children, Barnardo's and CHILDREN 1st through to volunteer-led playgroups and after school clubs. Our activities include:

• Collating an annual State of Children’s Rights report to set out the progress made to implement the UNCRC in Scotland.
• Working in partnership with the Scottish Government and Scotland's Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) on the Scottish Children's Rights Implementation Monitoring Group to develop a common understanding on progressing the UNCRC.
• Submitting the NGO alternative report to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child to provide an independent NGO perspective on the extent to which Scotland is meeting its UNCRC obligations.

Together (Scottish Alliance for Children's Rights)
30 August 2013

---

Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from UNISON

Thank you for the opportunity for UNISON Police Staff at the Justice Committee on 2 October.

As you intimated during the meeting, there was insufficient time during the hearing for the role of the Police Custody and Security Office (PCSO) to be discussed.

Section 1 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill deals with custody. However, the main body of staff who deal with custody has been, with one exception, omitted from the Bill.

The role of the PCSO is defined in Section 28 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

This section gives the PCSO clear authority to carry out roles as prescribed by that Act.

However, it would appear that the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill does not reflect the duties and roles of the PCSO. Referring to “Constable” throughout the document and not allowing the use of PSCO’s as an alternative.

The only reference to Police Staff is in paragraph 33(5) which is very specific in that it refers to communicating with vulnerable people. It does not specifically relate to the role of the PCSO as it refers to Section 26(1) of the Act which is the Police Authorities general ability to appoint Police Staff. Examples of where it would be prudent to make specific reference to PCSOs are Chapter 6: paragraph 37: use of reasonable force; paragraph 40(2): power of search on arrest. These are specified in Section 28 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

We would be grateful if the Justice Committee would consider amendments to the Bill to reflect the PCSO role.

Stevie Diamond
UNISON Police Staff Branch
11 October 2013
INTRODUCTION

1. Victim Support Scotland welcomes the introduction of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Victim Support Scotland regards the Bill as an important and progressive step towards achieving equitable and effective access to justice for victims of crime in a 21st century Scotland.

POLICE POWERS AND THE RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS

2. Victim Support Scotland welcomes the grounds for arrest being clearly set out in section 1; the concept of arrest on grounds of reasonable suspicion, with an investigation continuing beyond that, is likely to be more straightforward and easily understood by the general public.

Decision on charge – victims’ right to information

3. The Bill provides that the police may report a case to the Procurator Fiscal without charging the suspect. If a decision on charge isn’t taken until the Procurator Fiscal formally charges a suspect in court, this may result in a long delay for the victim – in some cases up to a year – before the victim is informed of the official evaluation / seriousness of the case, which can result in uncertainty and confusion on the part of the victim.

4. Whether the police decide to charge a suspect or report the case to the Procurator Fiscal without charge, it is pertinent that victims are informed at the earliest possible opportunity of any decisions taken. Victims’ right to information, set out in the EU Directive establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime,\(^1\) includes a right to receive information “enabling the victim to know about the state of affairs of the criminal proceedings.” In Scotland, this would certainly apply to decisions made on charges or reports to the Procurator Fiscal, but also to the nature of any charges brought.

5. Furthermore, both the aforementioned EU Directive and the proposals contained in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill give victims the right to receive information about any decision not to proceed with or to end an investigation or not to prosecute, and the reason for that decision.

6. The need for the dissemination of this information is further emphasised by the victim’s right to review a decision not to prosecute, also introduced by the EU

Directive establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime[2]; it is crucial that the victim is informed of any decision taken regarding the prosecution of a suspect in order for them to timeously act on this right, as this would form an initial reference point for review.

Liberation from custody
7. Section 6 sets out the information that is to be recorded by police in relation to any arrest. Section 6 (4) (a) provides that if a person is released from custody there must be information recorded regarding details of the conditions imposed.

8. Any decision to liberate a suspect from custody must, as a priority, take the safety and security of the victim(s) and any witnesses into consideration. It is also pertinent that the victim is informed of the decision as quickly as possible.

9. Learning that a suspect will be released from custody may be a great source of anxiety and distress for a victim; they may be fearful that the suspect may get in contact or that they may run into the suspect in the local community. At the stage of release, with the investigation ongoing and the police gathering witness statements etc., there may be an increased risk of threat and intimidation towards the victim and other witnesses.

10. If a suspect is released and conditions are set, for instance that the suspect must refrain from contacting the victim, it is vital that the victim is informed of these conditions and where he/she should turn to report a breach.

11. Victim Support Scotland would welcome provision included in the Bill to ensure that the safety and security of victims and witnesses is routinely addressed, and that victims are timeously informed, when a decision is taken to release a suspect.

Period of custody
12. Victim Support Scotland notes that the Bill does not provide for an extension of custody without charge beyond the maximum 12 hours in exceptional circumstances.

13. Victims of any type of crime, no matter how ‘serious’ it is considered to be, may be vulnerable to threats and intimidation from the suspect. Therefore any decision about releasing a suspect must, in our view, consider first and foremost the safety and security of the victim, in addition to other factors mentioned such as seriousness of the crime and possibility that the suspect will attempt to destroy evidence.

Investigative liberation
14. It is stated that these powers are most likely to be of use in the investigation of serious crime (Policy Memorandum, page 12, para 58).

15. Again, the safety and protection of the victim and other witnesses must be the priority consideration when deciding whether or not to liberate a person from custody.

Where investigative liberation is granted, it is vital that the victim is informed of the liberation, any conditions and where he/she should turn to report a breach of conditions.

16. The Bill provides that a suspect can apply to a sheriff to have any conditions amended and/or terminated. Victims should be kept informed of any amendments or terminations, particularly those which relate to them directly.

17. Victim Support Scotland welcomes the provisions in section 14(3) setting out that a breach of any condition may be penalised by a fine or a prison sentence. The bill provides that any breach which would constitute an offence were the person not subject to liberation conditions may be taken into account in sentencing for that offence. Victim Support Scotland calls for stronger provision to ensure breaches are penalised and routinely taken into account in sentencing.

Questioning
18. Victim Support Scotland welcomes the provision allowing the police to question a suspect after charge. In so far as the rights of the suspect are protected, and further questioning would offer benefits to the investigation of crime, we believe this provision is justified and indeed conducive to an effective justice system.

CORROBORATION, ADMISSIBILITY OF STATEMENTS AND RELATED REFORMS

19. Corroboration represents an unfair and unnecessary barrier to justice for many victims of crime, particularly those for whom the crime was committed against them in private, such as many crimes of sexual or domestic violence. One likely consequence of the Cadder decision giving a suspect access to legal advice is that it will become even more difficult for police and prosecutors to provide corroboration of evidence as it will be less likely that a suspect will admit to a crime or provide corroborating statements. We are concerned and compelled by the statement on page 24 of the Policy Memorandum (para 137) that “it [corroboration] plays a major part in the solicitor’s decision to advise the client to say nothing for fear of the client inadvertently corroborating other evidence and thereby creating a sufficiency, which would otherwise not exist. As a result, whether a person is prosecuted for and convicted of an offence conviction which would be inevitable in other jurisdictions can depend entirely on whether the person elects to respond to questioning by the police.” The likely consequence is that fewer cases will proceed to court.

20. Victim Support Scotland therefore strongly agrees with and supports the Scottish Government’s assertion, stated on page 7 of the Policy Memorandum, that:

21. “abolition of the requirement for corroboration is a necessary step towards a system which is able to take account of all fairly obtained evidence, respecting not only the accused but also victims and their families”.

22. Removing the requirement for corroboration whilst retaining the ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ test required for a conviction will enable more cases to be prosecuted in court on the basis of quality of evidence, as opposed to only those which pass the current rigid and bureaucratic quantitative test of the evidence. This means more victims will be granted access to justice, as is their right.

23. It is important to acknowledge that this does not mean that in practice the judge or jury will not take account of corroboration, or lack thereof, when determining how much weight should be given to the testimony of a witness. Even without requirement for corroboration, cases will still need to carry, according to the Crown’s judgment, a ‘reasonable prospect of conviction’ in order to proceed to court. Additionally, the judge or jury will still need to be satisfied that the evidence presented convinces them ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ that the accused committed the crime.

24. We are compelled by the findings of Lord Carloway’s research which found no evidence to support the argument that the requirement for corroboration protects against unsafe convictions. Victim Support Scotland wants to see a criminal justice system which acquits the innocent and convicts the guilty. It is important to remember that miscarriages of justice do not only occur when an innocent person is wrongly convicted,

25. “They also occur when the guilty are acquitted or when it’s impossible to prosecute when there is sufficient evidence there to convict.”

26. Victim Support Scotland would wish to reiterate the point made in the Policy Memorandum (page 23, para 134):

27. “It is not clear why, on the one hand, a case where there is a single independent and impartial eye-witness to an offence could not be prosecuted, while one involving a number of witnesses who may be unreliable (e.g. rival gang members in a street fight or feuding neighbours in a dispute) should be subject to this artificial restriction.”

COURT PROCEDURES

Increase to jury majority required for conviction

28. If the requirement for corroboration is removed, juries will still need to take into account the quality of all the evidence that has been led and to believe that the case has been proven ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ in order to convict. Moreover, a case will still require to pass the prosecutorial test to enable it to reach the stage of a trial; and the current provision to uphold a claim from the defence that there is ‘no case to answer’ will still be available to judges who believe there is insufficient evidence to prove a case after all evidence from the prosecution has been led. As such, we would welcome further information as to why there is a need to increase the jury majority required to convict in order to provide an additional ‘safeguard’ in light of the removal of the requirement for corroboration. The inference seems to be that the current majority required to convict is unsafe. Victim Support Scotland is concerned that the ultimate outcome is that one barrier to justice (requirement for corroboration) is simply being replaced by another (an increased jury majority required to convict).

3 Frank Mulholland, Lord Advocate. European Victims Week Conference, Glasgow 20 Feb 2012.

29. Because the contempt of court legislation effectively bans research into how juries reach their decisions, it is impossible to produce evidence to support any particular formulation of the number required to reach a majority verdict. But Victim Support Scotland would suggest that it should not be so high as to act as an impediment to certain and swift decision-making in the interests of victims and accused persons.

30. In conclusion, Victim Support Scotland agrees with Lord Carloway\(^4\) in his initial consideration of increasing the majority required for conviction, as he

31. “did not...regard such an alteration as either necessary or desirable. [The review] did not consider that the system of majority verdicts was directly comparable with those in common law countries where unanimity, or near unanimity, is required for either a “guilty” or a “not guilty” verdict. Thus in these countries, failure to have a majority in favour of guilty does not lead automatically to acquittal, as it does in Scotland. Rather the elaborate process of a retrial may follow with all the implications that such a process might have on accused, witnesses and victims...The Review has been presented with no material to suggest that the majority verdict presents a problem or indeed that it results in a greater conviction rate than in other common law jury systems.”

Solemn procedure – implementation of Sheriff Bowen’s recommendations

32. Victim Support Scotland supports the provision requiring early communication between the defence and prosecution through the Compulsory Business Meeting.

33. Too often witnesses at Sheriff and Jury level are cited to appear on the first day of a sitting despite the fact that they will not be needed on that day. The resolution at an early stage relieves witnesses from having to attend a trial, protecting them from the potentially stressful and traumatic experience of giving evidence.

34. It is pertinent that victims are kept informed if/when a plea is accepted. If a plea has been accepted, the victim should be informed at the earliest possible stage by the appropriately assigned agency.

35. While many victims and witnesses do not want to go through the ordeal of having to attend court and give evidence, there are others who will want the opportunity to have their story heard and acknowledged. Where an early guilty plea is made, it is imperative that in eligible cases victims are at the very least given sufficient time and opportunity to provide a victim impact statement to the court. The victim impact statement should be considered an important source of information, particularly in regards to the gravity and impact of the offence, as well as allowing the victim an opportunity to have their voice heard by the court.

APPEALS, SENTENCING AND AGGRAVATIONS

Increase in maximum sentences for handling offensive weapons offences
36. Victim Support Scotland welcomes the increase in maximum sentences for handling offensive weapons offences. However, it will only be an effective deterrent in so far as it is part of a wider policy approach encompassing education and support aimed at promoting positive attitudes and choices to discourage people from placing themselves and others at risk of harm through the carrying and/or use of offensive weapons.

Sentencing prisoners on early release
37. Committing an offence while on early release should be treated as a serious offence in its own right, demonstrating an abuse of trust, and should be punished accordingly. Victim Support Scotland therefore welcomes the provision placing a duty on the court to consider imposing a section 16 Order in relevant cases, the aim of which is to raise awareness of the existence of these important powers for the courts.

Appeals and SCCRC
38. Victims involved in appeal cases may find that the process brings back many traumatic memories and experiences suffered as a result of the crime. Victim Support Scotland supports any reforms which will reduce any source of unnecessary delay in the appeals process whilst ensuring the process remains fair both to the accused and to the victim. It is also important that victims are kept informed and supported throughout the appeal process.

Aggravations as to people trafficking
39. Victim Support Scotland welcomes the provision introducing a statutory aggravation of people trafficking where it can be linked to other offences, for instance fraud, immigration offences, brothel keeping, drugs offences etc., bringing Scottish legislation into line with obligations under Article 4.3 of EU Directive 2011/36/EU on preventing and combating trafficking in human beings.

Nicola Merrin
Policy Officer
29 August 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from WAVE Trust

1. WAVE Trust welcomes the opportunity to comment on the proposed Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill now under Stage 1 consideration by the Justice Committee. This brief submission will focus only on those areas in which WAVE Trust has significant knowledge and expertise. WAVE staff members are willing and able to provide additional information and offer testimony to the Justice Committee, if requested to do so.

2. This submission will be supplemented by making available to the Committee copies of WAVE Trust's report: Violence and what to do about it. That report and the conclusions summarised here are based upon more than a decade's work to identify, analyse and summarise the crucial lessons from hundreds of relevant research studies (and other credible sources of evidence) from Scotland, the UK and internationally.

3. There are three fundamental points that WAVE offers for this Committee's deliberations:

   a) WAVE Trust strongly supports the proposed Bill's intent to give priority to the 'best interests' of children. Scotland’s leaders have repeatedly expressed a commitment to making children’s rights 'real' in accordance with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC). Successive Scottish Governments have also promoted the wellbeing of children. Both should be reflected in every relevant provision of this Bill. This means ensuring children are always accorded at least equal protection to that given to adults – and almost always accorded greater protection than adults (commensurate with their inherent vulnerability as children).

   b) WAVE fully agrees with, and encourages the Committee to act favourably upon, the specific recommendations contained in the submission by the Children Are Unbeatable alliance about this Bill. This proposed legislation is the appropriate vehicle to repeal the current Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act’s “justifiable assault” defence when children are subjected to corporal punishment by parents or those acting in loco parentis. This would bring this Bill into greater harmony with Scotland’s commitment to ‘Getting it right for every child’ (GIRFEC) and the Parliament’s recent cross-party vote in favour of Scotland becoming the best place to grow up.

   c) WAVE’s research – spanning decades and continents -- reveals that there is not a credible evidence base for either the benefits of corporal punishment, or for physical discipline serving the best interests of the child. On the contrary, there is a great deal of robust international evidence from a variety of perspectives and disciplines that undermines the rationale for a 'justifiable assault' defence for adults in relation to children.
4. In its Violence and what to do about it report, WAVE Trust extensively reviewed the research on the root causes of interpersonal violence. It also presents evidence-based recommendations for how best to prevent it from happening in the first place, as well as to keeping it from becoming an intergenerational problem for children, families, society and the public purse. This evidence base has grown and become more nuanced in the years since the publication of WAVE’s original report. Upon request, WAVE can provide key examples of the latest research.

5. To summarise, WAVE’s extensive review of the evidence showed that interpersonal violence requires an internal, personal propensity to react violently to the varied external, societal events that trigger such reactions. Without that propensity, such ‘triggers’ rarely result in violent behaviour. That propensity is not an inherent part of ‘human nature’. Instead, it is a learned behaviour/response. The social, emotional and neurological propensity to violence is usually learned – or, hopefully, avoided -- in response to the treatment and experiences of very young children in the earliest part of their lives.

6. The prime cause of a child developing a propensity to violence is absence of empathy; itself a result of the failure of parents or primary carers to attune and positively/securely attach with infants. Absence of such parental attunement/attachment, combined with harsh discipline, is a recipe for violent, antisocial offspring. The above findings flow from a body of research evidence tracing violent behaviour to parental competence and methods of family discipline; poor child rearing; and, “unskilled parenting”.

7. The same international, interdisciplinary research indicates that some parents unwittingly develop a propensity toward violence in their young children. Such parents use little positive reinforcement, while effective punishment for deviant behaviours is missing or erratic, and “dozens of daily interactions” reinforce coercive, negative behaviour. Poorly skilled parents often themselves respond by shouting or hitting, which can escalate in an upward spiral of aggressive interactions. The net result is that the child learns both the techniques and the moral justification for violence from the parents.

8. Most relevant to repealing the ‘justifiable assault’ defence is all the research indicating that a key predictor of future interpersonal violence is harsh family discipline. A plethora of studies indicate that harsh or explosive discipline of children leads to violence and criminality -- and that discipline styles typically run in families over many generations (as people tend, consciously or unconsciously, to copy the parenting styles of their own parents). These child victims of harsh and physical discipline are the ones most likely to grow up and perpetrate domestic violence, commit violent crimes and suffer mental health problems, both as young people and as adults. This process helps explain the truth of the famous remark by Professor David Farrington: "Anti-social children grow up to become anti-social adults who go on to raise anti-social children".

9. Three final points should be taken into account. First, parents (even in fairly extreme cases) rarely see or describe themselves as abusing or maltreating their children; rather, they are merely disciplining them. Second, some parents are simply “doing what comes naturally” by following the pathways laid down in their own early learning, which is how the cycle of violence is perpetuated from generation to generation. And third, Scotland can, and must, break this negative cycle by properly supporting: positive parenting; alternatives to corporal punishment; and, secure, healthy attachment/attunement between babies (and young children) and their mothers/fathers/carers.

10. ‘Justifiable assault’ of children, in fact, has no justification. Therefore, this Bill presents a wonderful opportunity to adjust Scottish legislation in light of what has been learned about what does – and does not – actually result in effective discipline, thriving children, successful families and safe communities. Instead of perpetuating the slippery slope of ‘justifiable assault’, the Scottish Parliament now has the chance to draw a clear line marking the disapproval of corporal punishment within Scots law. Taking this action would benefit children, society and the public purse.

WAVE (Worldwide Alternatives to ViolencE Trust)
30 August 2013
1. The long title of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill mentions its purpose as being to make provision about criminal justice. This includes provision about the rights of suspects in police custody.

2. In determining an appeal from the Divisional Court in Northern Ireland, the House of Lords confirmed in 2009\(^1\) that covert surveillance by public authorities of legally privileged consultations in prisons and police stations could in principle be authorised under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, but that enhanced authorisation procedures were necessary in order for such surveillance to be compliant with the European Convention on Human Rights.

3. The UK Government responded to the judgment by making statutory instruments\(^2\) which required, among other things, that any such surveillance be authorised by a Surveillance Commissioner rather than a senior officer of the relevant public authority. Different arrangements operate in the case of the intelligence agencies who now apply to the Secretary of State for authorisation.

4. In Scotland the relevant statute is the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000 which is an Act of the Scottish Parliament. It has the same lack of enhanced authorisation procedures for legally privileged consultations that was identified as a problem by the House of Lords in respect of the UK statute. However, corresponding provision to that made by the UK Government to rectify these defects has not been made to date by the Scottish Government.

5. It is submitted that the Government has been unacceptably slow in responding to this issue, potentially calling into question the legality of any such surveillance activity that has taken place to date. It therefore calls for Parliamentary intervention. Such intervention can usefully take place by making amendments to this Bill to provide for at least the same safeguards to be applied in Scotland as provided for in the UK statutory instruments.

6. The Committee is invited to recommend that such amendments be made.

Robert Wyllie
17 July 2013

---

\(^1\) In re McE (Appellant) (Northern Ireland), In re C (AP) and another (Appellants) (Northern Ireland), In re M (Appellant) (Northern Ireland) [2009] UKHL 15.
About Zero Tolerance

Zero Tolerance is a national charity working to end men’s violence against women (VAW) in all its forms. We promote a primary prevention approach, believing that changing societal attitudes, values and structures is the key to ending gender-based violence. We also believe that pervasive gender inequality in our society creates a culture in which VAW is prevalent and tolerated and that this must change. More information about our work can be found on our website, www.zerotolerance.org.uk

Our comments on the Bill

We wish to comment on the aspects of the Bill which we believe will most affect people who have experienced sexual crime or domestic abuse. We are pleased that the Bill includes provision to abolish to requirement for corroboration; but concerned about the increase in the jury majority from 8 to 10 jurors.

We are concerned that changes to investigative liberation may have a negative impact on victims of domestic abuse, of whom at least 82% are female. (Reported incidents are the tip of a very large iceberg, and some forces seem to operate a dual arrest policy around domestic abuse incidents, so the real proportion of women victims may be much higher than 82%).

We agree with paragraph 278 of the policy memorandum that “The abolition of the requirement for corroboration will remove a potential barrier to the prosecution of domestic violence and sexual offences.” and with the statement in para. 136 that “The practical effect of the requirement for corroboration can be to deny access to justice for victims of [some] types of crime.” such as crimes often committed in private with no witnesses.

We share the concerns of Rape Crisis Scotland expressed in its evidence on the Bill that other aspects of the Criminal Justice system not covered by this Bill are not working well and need review or that more research and social campaigning is needed. For example:

- We would like the Scottish Government to act on its commitment to introduce judicial direction in sexual offences cases
- We believe that research into juries’ decision making processes is needed
- We believe there is a need for continued efforts to change public attitudes to sexual crime and domestic abuse (as all members of the public are potential jurors)
- We’d like a robust evaluation scheme
- We have concerns about the validity and value of the ‘not proven’ verdict and its use in rape cases
• We are concerned that sexual history and character evidence is still widely used despite provisions in the 2002 sexual offences act.

Zero Tolerance
30 August 2013
Justice Committee

Letter from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to the Convener

Automatic early release of prisoners

This letter provides further background to the Scottish Government’s intention to end the system of automatic early release for certain categories of prisoners.

During his announcement today on the Scottish Government’s Programme for Government for 2013-14, the First Minister confirmed our intention to bring forward legislation to end the automatic early release of serious offenders. The proposals will affect serious offenders sentenced to serve prison sentences of 10 years or more, such as violent offenders, and sexual offenders sentenced to 4 years or more. These legislative changes, if approved by Parliament, will affect prisoners being sentenced after the legislative changes have been commenced.

We have stated clearly our aim to end the system of automatic early release once the conditions set by the McLeish Commission are met. The changes announced by the First Minister show we are committed to fulfilling that pledge.

The legislative basis for the current statutory system of early release has been in force since the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 was enacted. The automatic element of the system applies to all offenders who receive a fixed (i.e. non-life) length of custodial sentence. Individuals sentenced to life imprisonment or who receive an Order for Lifelong Restriction are not released automatically, but on a discretionary basis after they have served the punishment part of their sentence set by the court and only as directed by the Parole Board taking account of public safety. Today’s announcement does not affect life or Order for Lifelong Restriction sentence prisoners.

The automatic element of the system of early release for fixed length sentenced prisoners operates in different ways depending on the length of fixed sentence imposed:

- Prisoners who receive a sentence of less than 4 years are called short-term prisoners and are released automatically and unconditionally at the half-way point of their sentence with the Parole Board having no role in the process.

- Sex offenders who receive a sentence of between 6 months and 4 years are subject to the above automatic early release rules at the half-way point, but are released on licence and liable to recall to custody for the remainder of their sentence if they breach their licence conditions.

- Prisoners who receive a sentence of 4 years or more are called long-term prisoners. They are entitled to be considered by the Parole Board for release between the half-way point and the two-thirds point of their sentence. If a long-term prisoner reaches the two-thirds point of their sentence and the Parole Board has not directed release by that point, they are released automatically. Long-term prisoners are always released on a licence.
Relevant provisions exist for the recall to custody of long-term prisoners who breach their licence conditions and the return to custody (by the courts) for both long-term and short-term prisoners who commit a further offence whilst released early as a punishment for abusing the trust placed in them after being released early.

Proposals – overview

Our announcement today is designed to help bring the focus back firmly on consideration of risks to public safety and public harm when our most serious fixed length sentence prisoners are being considered for early release.

For the first time since the current regime was brought in back in 1993, we will be empowering the independent Parole Board to take decisions about whether potentially dangerous prisoners should be released early with there being no longer automatic early release for the most dangerous fixed length sentenced prisoners. By empowering the Parole Board in this area, where a prisoner in this category is deemed (by the Parole Board) to pose an unacceptable risk to public safety, they will serve their entire sentence in prison.

Automatic early release will be ended for long term prisoners who are dangerous, such as violent offenders, who have received sentences of 10 years or more. The type of offences which would be covered includes culpable homicide, serious assault, attempted murder and robbery. In addition, automatic early release will be ended for sex offenders who have received sentences of 4 years or more. Full details will be included with the legislative provisions which are planned to be introduced, subject to its progress through Parliament, by way of amendments to the current Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

Proposals – detail

By definition, automatic early release happens at present regardless of the risk to the public safety, i.e. even where a prisoner might be deemed an unacceptable risk to public safety, they are still released automatically. As a result of our proposed change to these arrangements, serious offenders, such as violent offenders, sentenced to 10 years or more will no longer be released automatically at the two-thirds point of their sentence. Instead, the Parole Board’s current role from the halfway point to the two-thirds point of sentence in assessing risks to public safety in terms of deciding early release will be expanded so that the Parole Board will be empowered from the half-way point of sentence all the way through to the end of sentence to decide whether a prisoner poses an unacceptable risk to public safety and, therefore, should not be granted early release.

Applying the policy to serious offenders receiving a sentence of 10 years or more will ensure a focus on those offenders who pose the highest risk to public safety. The vast majority of (non-life) offenders sentenced to prison for 10 years or more are convicted of serious crimes of violence such as serious assault.

There will be no change to the current system whereby if a long term prisoner is granted early release, the Parole Board will impose licence conditions on them. A breach of licence conditions can result in a prisoner being recalled to prison.
Subject to new provisions relating specifically to sex offenders (which are detailed below), long-term prisoners receiving sentences of between 4 and 10 years will continue to be treated under the present arrangements i.e. consideration for parole at half-way point of sentence, automatic early release at the two-thirds point.

Proposals – sex offenders

Sex offenders pose a particular risk to the public. This is already reflected in the special arrangements that apply for sexual offenders sentenced to 6 months to 4 years in prison who, when released early, are released on licence (in contrast with other short-term prisoners who, when released, are not released with licence conditions).

Given the special risks posed by sex offenders and in addition to the general policy of ending automatic early release for serious offenders sentenced to 10 years or more, we propose also to end the automatic early release of sexual offenders sentenced to prison for 4 years or more. As with serious offenders sentenced to 10 years or more, the Parole Board will have a new expanded role from the half-way point of sentence all the way through to the end of a sentence in assessing whether a sexual offender should be released with appropriate licence conditions. If the Board considers that a sexual offender poses an unacceptable risk throughout their sentence, the prisoner will serve his or her full sentence in prison.

As at present, the Parole Board, SPS and community justice services will ensure effective pre-release planning for those long term prisoners either being released early or reaching the end of their sentence.

Timing

We do not consider it possible to introduce these changes to the system of automatic early release retrospectively for those individuals already sentenced and serving their sentences under the existing system. The new system will apply, therefore, for offenders sentenced after the necessary legislative changes have been commenced.

Changes to the 1993 Act require primary legislation and the earliest opportunity to introduce such legislation will be through Scottish Government amendments to the current Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, subject to the Bill’s progress through Parliament. The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill already includes provisions to clarify the law on the powers of courts to impose additional sentences on offenders who commit offences while on early release from prison.
Impact of Proposal

The financial and other implications for justice bodies of the proposed changes to the system of automatic early release will be set out fully for Parliament when legislative amendments are introduced. The primary impact will be on the Scottish Prison Service, in terms of increased prisoner numbers, and the Parole Board for Scotland, through increased parole casework. As the changes will be applied to sentences only once necessary legislation is in place, the impact will take a number of years to feed through. The changes should be considered within the wider context of the overall reduction in crime and set of measures the Scottish Government is taking to reduce re-offending and ensure robust community-based alternatives to prison.

There will also be offsetting savings for community justice services in having to manage fewer high risk individuals in the community.

Summary

We consider that these proposals represent a practical and proportionate step towards our aim of completely ending the system of automatic early release, when the conditions set by the McLeish Commission are met. The change will ensure that for long-term serious offenders capable of causing serious harm to the public, such as violent offenders and sexual offenders, the risks to the public will assessed by the Parole Board and such offenders will only ever be released early if the Parole Board is satisfied that the risk to public safety of an early release is acceptable.

These changes will help ensure public safety is at the forefront of our system of early release for those who generally pose the biggest risks to the public, helping reassure victims, witnesses and communities.

Officials will engage with relevant stakeholders over the coming months to further clarify how these changes will operate in practice before, as noted above, it is our intention to bring forward Stage 2 amendments to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill for the Committee to consider in due course.

I hope this is helpful.

Kenny MacAskill MSP
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
3 September 2013
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Scottish Government to the Convener

I thought it would be helpful to write to you following the evidence session for the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill on 7 January 2014 to expand on some points that were discussed with regard to police powers of arrest in the Bill.

New power of arrest and existing powers

In line with the recommendations of Lord Carloway’s review, section 1 of the Bill will confer on the police the power to arrest a person without a warrant on suspicion that the person has committed, or is committing, a crime.

Currently the police have the power to arrest without warrant under the common law. In addition to their common-law power, the police also have powers to arrest conferred on them by various statutes. These powers are exercisable in relation to particular offences and are expressed in different ways in different Acts.

The Bill will simplify this landscape, making the law around arrest clearer for both police and citizens alike. Once the general power of arrest under section 1 of the Bill is in place, section 50 and schedule 1 will sweep away the present jumble of common-law and offence-specific statutory powers.

Section 1 of the Bill reflects what is reasonably understood to be the essence of the common-law power of arrest. With regard to non-imprisonable offences, section 1(3) lists examples of circumstances in which arresting someone for such an offence without waiting for a warrant can be considered to be in the interests of justice. The opening words clarify that it is not an exhaustive list and it ends with a catch-all reference to the risk of the person otherwise obstructing the course of justice unless arrested immediately.

Other than the abolition of the common law power of arrest, the Bill does not affect the existing powers of the police. This means that the police can continue to act to deal with cases arising from the need to protect people and property, for example when a person is threatening to commit suicide, or where a missing child is found and returned to her home address.

There was discussion during the evidence session about the powers available to the police to arrest a person in order to prevent a crime from being committed. Police constables have general duties under section 20 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 in relation to preventing crime, maintaining order and protecting life and property. They can intervene in situations in fulfilment of those duties. Frequently the appropriate intervention will not be arresting a person, bearing in mind that arrest is the term used for taking a person into the police’s custody. It would be a very serious erosion of civil liberties if the police were given a general power to take people into their custody merely on the strength of a suspicion that a person might be about to commit an offence.
Of course this does not mean that the police need to stand by and watch an offence being committed. As mentioned, they can intervene in ways other than arresting a person. Moreover, as I said in my evidence, attempting or conspiring to commit a particular offence can itself be an offence for which a person can be arrested. Arrest in that circumstance is entirely consistent with the normal character of arrest as the person is taken into police custody not to stop the person doing something (or at least not just for that reason) but in order that the person can be dealt with in accordance with the law for committing an offence through attempt or conspiracy.

Detention and arrest

In the Bill, ‘arrest’ is the only label used for the act by which the police take a suspect into their custody with or without a warrant. At present the police can also take a person into their custody without a warrant by ‘detaining’ the person under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Under the Bill as introduced the distinction between being in police custody having been detained, rather than arrested, will disappear. Like the move to a single statutory arrest power, this too gives effect to a recommendation of the Carloway Review.

The Government shares Lord Carloway’s view that it no longer serves any real purpose to use the distinct labels ‘arrest’ and ‘detention’ to describe the act of taking a person into custody on the strength of a suspicion that the person has committed a crime. Again, in the interests of simplicity and clarity, the Bill uses only one word to describe the act of taking a suspect into custody, i.e. arrest.

The committee has expressed concern that unless the label ‘detention’ is retained, the public and press will be unable to distinguish between the position of a person who is merely being questioned by the police and a person who is being held in custody to be brought before a court. The first point to be made in response to this concern is that all suspects are presumed innocent unless and until their guilt is proved to the satisfaction of a court of law. It is just as wrong to assume that a person who has been arrested is guilty as it is to assume the guilt of a person who has merely been detained.

The second point to be made is that, both in the present system and the system the Bill would create, it is the point of charge, not the shift from detention to arrest, which marks the important change in a suspect’s position. There will therefore still be an official vocabulary available to the press and public capable of expressing the different stages which an investigation against a person may reach.

Officially accused

Finally, having mentioned the word ‘charge’ it might be helpful if I say something about the expression ‘officially accused’. In colloquial usage, and in some legislation, the word ‘charge’ is often used to describe what the police do when they tell someone they are charging them with an offence. It is also sometimes used to describe what the procurator fiscal does in raising proceedings against a person by libelling a charge against the person on a complaint, petition or indictment. In some legislation the word is used loosely to mean either one of those things. In the interests of clarity, the Bill uses the word ‘charge’ only in relation to the police charging a suspect.

In some places though, there is a need to refer in the Bill to any person who has been charged by the police and also to any person against whom proceedings have been raised. Conversely there are provisions in Part 1 of the Bill (including the whole of Chapter 2) which are to operate only in relation to a person who has neither been charged by the police nor been made the subject of a prosecution. This is necessary because certain things follow from the fact that an agency of the State has taken the formal step of saying it believes a particular person has committed a particular crime and that can be proved in court.

Rather than repeatedly writing out in section after section that it does, or does not, apply to any person who has been charged by the police or against whom proceedings have been initiated, it is more convenient to use a label to describe the status of those to whom the section applies. Since the relevant shift in a person’s status occurs when someone in an official position (be it a constable or a prosecutor) levels a formal accusation against the person, the label the Bill uses is ‘officially accused’.

I hope that this further explanation of key points will assist with your consideration of Part 1 of the Bill.

Kenny MacAskill
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
16 January 2014
The attached flowchart compares the current system of police detention against the powers which are proposed in the Bill.

The items marked in red are the proposed new processes.
Reasonable Suspicion

“Detention”

Charge Desk Officer determines if detention is necessary

Accused informed of legal right to access a lawyer

Detain

Liberation on Undertaking

Charge/Report

Release

Court

Release

Charge/Report

Reasonable Suspicion

“Arrest”

Charge Desk Officer determines if “detention” is necessary and proportionate and if approved commences the 12 hour detention period

Person informed of right to access and have solicitor present during interview

At approx. 6 hours continuous detention an Inspector not involved in the enquiry reviews if detention is still necessary & proportionate

Possible Release on Investigative Liberation - 28 days maximum if released on conditions which require an Inspector to authorise. If no conditions then no time limit applies

Charge/Report - ‘Officially Accused’

Detain

Liberation on Undertaking

Release without condition

Potential for Post-Charge Questioning with Sheriff’s Approval

Release

Court

Release

PROPOSED BILL PROVISIONS

‘Not Officially Accused’

Total maximum time in detention: 12 hours

CURRENT SYSTEM

Liberation on Undertaking

Release without condition

Court

Release

‘Officially Accused’

Release

Court

Release

‘Not Officially Accused’

Release

Court

Release

‘Not Officially Accused’

Release

Court

Release

‘Not Officially Accused’
Email exchange: Rt Hon Lord McCluskey and the Committee

I am offering to give evidence to the Committee, particularly on the matter of Corroboration.

John McCluskey
24 January 2014

Thank you for your email, which I have discussed with Christine Grahame, the Convener of the Justice Committee. She has asked me to thank you for your kind offer to give evidence in relation to the corroboration provisions in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. However, the Committee concluded its evidence-gathering at Stage 1 of the Bill on 14 January and we are now in the process of considering and agreeing our Stage 1 report.

It would be unusual for the Committee to take any further evidence during the passage of the Bill. However, if for any reason, the Committee does decide to do so, the Convener will of course alert Members to your kind offer.

Clerk
Justice Committee
24 January 2014

I am dismayed to receive this deeply regrettable answer.

- I am probably better qualified, by direct experience, to give evidence on this matter than almost everyone whose evidence has been received. I had stayed out of the matter because, having retired some years ago, I thought that others would demonstrate that the proposal to abolish the need for corroboration in ALL criminal cases in Scotland would have been dismissed without difficulty or abandoned in the face of the near unanimous opinion of the Judiciary.

- Additionally, when I came to read the evidence presented to the Committee, I realised that there have been serious errors in that evidence, including, I believe, evidence given by the Lord Advocate himself.

- The evidence of the Justice Secretary raised new matter, namely the idea that "supporting evidence" would be sought. The Lord Advocate said the same. This new matter raised important issues not properly canvassed.

- I am convinced that the Committee has not been given the whole picture, particularly about the practical alternatives to the drastic step of abolishing the need for corroboration.
• There has been a lively correspondence in The Scotsman since that newspaper published my article on Wednesday 15th January: is this material also to be ignored because it is out of time? Will it be formally before the Committee? Will my article itself before the Committee?

• It has also been suggested to me (though I am quite unable to speak to it from my own knowledge) that the Committee, or at least some members of it, may have received briefing from civil servants on this issue, being briefing material that has not been published: is this so?

• In these circumstances, I ask the Committee Convener to reconsider the matter urgently and agree to accept the evidence that I can offer.

• I am not sure that my request to be heard will have been intimated to other members of the Committee. Accordingly I am COPYING this email to all members of the Committee. For their information, the original email that I sent to the Clerk of the Committee (not then in her office) read as follows: -

“Dear Ms Fleming, I have recently contributed to the debate on Corroboration via The Scotsman newspaper. I should be willing to give evidence to the Committee, particularly with a view to correcting some errors – as I see it – in evidence already presented to the Committee. The article and the letters that I have written (in The Scotsman) may serve as my ‘papers’ for such an appearance.”

• I am able to provide copies of my article and subsequent Letters to the Editor in electronic form to any member of the Committee who would like to receive them.

• I have also prepared notes on the point raised in the last paragraph of my article, viz “There are other ways of dealing with the problems that the Lord Advocate suggested to the Committee” I do not believe that the Committee has had the opportunity to consider fully these alternatives.

• The pre-legislative scrutiny ought to be comprehensive. The timetable for the Committee’s scrutiny of the Bill (19 December 2013) does not appear to me to state that the last evidence session was to be on 14 January 2014.

• I sincerely hope that you will give this the most urgent and careful attention. I would not intend to let the matter rest if I were denied the opportunity to put my evidence before the Committee.

John McCluskey
24 January 2014
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Convener to Rt Hon Lord McCluskey

I write in response to your email to the Justice Committee on 24 January reiterating your request to give evidence to the Committee on the proposed abolition of the requirement for corroboration.

The Committee understands that this issue is controversial and that it is vitally important to ensure that the Parliament, as a whole, scrutinises the Government’s proposals. The Committee recognises your experience and expertise in this area and welcomes the continuing debate on the abolition of corroboration both inside and outside of Parliament, to which you are making a valuable contribution.

The Committee discussed your email at its meeting on Tuesday 23 January. We would have been happy to have received a written submission from you on the subject while we were taking evidence, and we would have been able to draw upon it when drafting our report. Furthermore, we could have discussed the possibility asking you to give evidence in person had we received your request to do so earlier. However, in our view, there has been ample opportunity for anyone to provide evidence to us. We are currently discussing and agreeing our Stage 1 report and to reopen the evidence at this stage is therefore not possible.

I note that you have particular concerns about the evidence provided by the Cabinet Secretary to the Committee on 14 January. It might be helpful to explain that it is customary for the Cabinet Secretary or Minister in charge of a Bill to provide the final evidence session of a Committee’s Stage 1 inquiry. This enables the Committee to use the evidence it has gathered, in the previous sessions and in writing, to question and scrutinise the Government. This is not, however, the last opportunity to scrutinise the Bill and I am sure that there will be robust debate at every stage of its passage through Parliament.

I have noted previously that we may take further evidence on the Bill at Stage 2 and if it covered the areas of policy that you are particularly concerned about, we would welcome your input.

Christine Grahame MSP
Convener
30 January 2014
CORROBORATION

Introduction

This is a completely rewritten version of notes that were originally prepared by Lord McCluskey in anticipation of his giving evidence to the Justice Committee. The Committee decided that it was too late to hear his evidence in the Stage 1 process but announced that the Committee might entertain additional evidence at the next stage on the Bill.

The original version of the notes was in two parts.

Part 1 Misleading material before the Justice Committee

1.1 The first part of the original version dealt with misleading statements about the legal character of “corroboration” in Scottish Criminal Law that were made to the Committee by the Lord Advocate and the Justice Secretary. A full copy of the notes detailing the errors in the misleading statements was sent to the Lord Advocate and to the Justice Secretary. Neither has responded in any way whatsoever to defend what they told the Committee or to criticise my critique of their representations to the Committee. I do not propose to repeat those criticisms in the main text of this document. Instead, I append them in Appendix 1. They are nonetheless important.

1.2 One continued important aspect of the failures by ministers to understand or express the law on corroboration is that it is reflected in what appears to be the practical everyday failure of the police to understand the law or apply it properly in practice. Thus, for example, the Justice Secretary repeated on many occasions the nonsensical view (presumably obtained from the police) that the law of corroboration required that two policemen had to go to London to collect a CD Rom (discussed fully later). Against that background of police misunderstanding, it is hardly surprising that assaulted women are mis-informed – by the police - as to the alleged reason why their cases are not going to be taken to court (viz “No corroboration”) and are thus led to support the false notion that abolishing the rule requiring corroboration is going to increase the prospects of justice for women. Because the diagnosis of the causes of the problem is mistaken, the wrong remedy (abolition of corroboration) has been chosen and the real causes are neglected. One has only to look at England – where corroboration is not required\(^1\) – to see that the problem of poor conviction rates in sexual assault cases there is as bad as, or even worse than, it is in Scotland. So ministers should have sought examples of jurisdictions where such cases are more satisfactorily dealt with than in Scotland and asked themselves if there were lessons to be learned from those countries.

\(^1\) As in much of the USA
Meaning of corroboration

1.3 The nature of corroboration was simply expressed by Lord Justice General Rodger in Smith v Lees\(^2\): “In order to corroborate an eye witness’s evidence on a crucial fact, the corroborating evidence must support or confirm that what the eye witness said happened did actually happen. So if a complainer says that she did not consent to intercourse ... then evidence of her distress will tend to confirm her evidence because a jury will be entitled to infer that the complainer was distressed because she was forced to submit and did not agree to it”\(^3\). In Fox v H.M. Advocate Lord Rodger added “The starting point is the direct evidence. So long as the circumstantial evidence is independent and confirms or supports the direct evidence on the crucial facts, it provides corroboration and the requirements of legal proof are met.”

These highly authoritative and plain words, explaining what corroboration is, will have to be kept clearly in mind when the Justice Committee comes to examine any proposed amendments to give effect to what ministers have said, namely that corroboration will be replaced by a requirement for “supporting evidence: at present it is really impossible to understand the distinction between corroboration as traditionally understood and “supporting evidence” of the kind that ministers have said will take its place. I simply do not believe that ministers have thought this through. If they had done so, the necessary provisions to give substance to the concept of “supporting evidence” would have been in the Bill as drafted and presented 27 February 2014 to Parliament for the vote on.

1.4 Imperfect understanding of the role of judges in ‘defining’ corroboration or assisting juries to apply it in cases

It is quite incorrect to suppose, as the ministerial witnesses before the Justice Committee implied, that judges have to define corroboration\(^4\). The Justice Secretary said, “It is quite clear that the judiciary find it difficult to agree what corroboration is... academics and the judiciary have difficulty with announcing what corroboration is”. The truth is this: when trial judges come to ‘direct’ the jury, they have to apply their well-honed understanding of the concept – because it is the judge, not the jury, to decide in the first place if evidence CAN be properly characterized as “corroborative”\(^5\). So the trial judge does not go into a long lecture on the nature of corroboration in every possible case. He/she does not define corroboration; the judge looks at the context and facts of the case before the jury and at the evidence that is said by the Crown to be corroborative; and then decides if any piece of evidence founded upon by the Crown as corroborative can, as a matter of law, be treated as such. The trial judge may get submissions from the lawyers on that issue – which is first a question of law. He/she then decides that question of law in the jurors’ absence; and (if he/she agrees with the Crown submission) says to the Jury: “the Crown/PF has suggested that you should treat XX as a piece of evidence that

\(^2\) 1997

\(^3\) It is no longer necessary to prove that force was used.

\(^4\) Appeal Courts may have to do so.

\(^5\) In appeal cases, judges have to analyse and re-examine the essence of rape in unusual cases (e.g. sleeping woman penetrated). But the complexities of their analyses are elementary compared with the verbal jungle seen in the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009.
corroborates the evidence of NN (the “complainer”) to the effect that XYZ….. I direct you that that evidence is capable of being corroborative in character and, if you accept that it is reliable, can be used by you to corroborate the evidence of NN to the effect that…."

1.5 Corroboration, like many other everyday legal terms, is difficult to define for ALL purposes – but, in a trial, it is quite unnecessary to attempt to do so. Appeal Courts may have to discuss the application of the law in unusual cases – as do Academics writing about the development of the law. The same applies to other vocabulary/terms of art used in courts every day: for example, familiar terms like: ‘reasonable doubt’, ‘satisfied’, ‘reliable’, ‘sufficient’, ‘consent’/no consent’, ‘dangerous (driving), ‘special reasons’, ‘cruelty’, ‘private’, ‘family’ etc. These terms are necessarily somewhat flexible and incapable of precise “definition”. The judge’s task is to recognize the concept when he/she sees it in the context of the trial evidence. In my experience, juries appear to have no difficulty in applying the law relating to corroboration when it is presented in this way. Jurors do not need, and do not get, a lecture on “The law applicable to corroboration in Scotland”. So the alleged concern about problems arising from alleged difficulties in “defining” corroboration is a red herring. Juries decide issues of fact not issues of legal definition. As I said in my judgment in Smith v Lees (1997), “In relation to common law crimes where the alleged victim is the only eyewitness, it is the daily practice of judges to direct juries that they cannot convict unless they find corroborative evidence, namely reliable evidence from an independent source… which separately points to the truth of the facts which constitute the essential ingredients of the crime”. Difficulties can arise when a novel set of circumstances comes before the court. That happens in all legal systems when they have to grapple with new and unforeseen circumstances. The genius of the Common Law countries has been the capacity of experienced and impartial judges (and Academics), when faced with unforeseen situations or new perceptions of injustice, to take a principled approach and reason their way to a solution that achieves justice. The Moorov decision is a good example of that. So is the gradual development of the law of corroboration by distress in the law of rape. New developments in the law governing fraud have followed new electronic and online methods of deceiving citizens. There are countless examples of that outstanding tradition. I thought that we all understand that: sadly it is not apparent that the Justice Secretary does.

1.6 The second part of the previous notes6 outlined some steps that I suggested should be considered in order to improve both the conviction rate in rape and other sexual crime cases, and indeed the ability of the prosecution authorities to bring such cases to court, without abolishing the centuries-old law governing corroboration. More sensible amendments to the law deserve consideration before the revolutionary step of abolishing the requirement for corroboration. I sent a note of these suggestions to Lord Bonomy as they may be considered relevant to the deliberations of the group that he is to chair. Others will no doubt suggest others. Matters of this kind might also be considered as suitable material for proposed amendments to the Bill.

---

6 Copies were sent to members of the Justice Committee in February.
Meantime, I have made some revisals to the original discussion of such measures, particularly in the light of recent reported developments that again demonstrate clearly that the retention of corroboration in the Scots law of criminal evidence is essential to avoid the relatively infrequent – but nevertheless real – risk that errors and worse by the Police, and even by prosecutors and Judges, can result in cruel injustices. The frequent and egregious errors by the police that have come to light, especially in the wake of the Jimmy Savile scandal, highlight this point. The Scottish Police claim that they are somehow immune to the canteen culture that has characterized so many of these scandals in England, Wales and Northern Ireland: those who believe that are living in cloud-cuckoo land.

1.7 Policing failures – examples

It is clear that there are serious and continuing problems, especially with the police, in investigating and preparing cases where “domestic” violence, sexual or otherwise, is reported to the police. And police failures in other fields of activity are also blatant and alarming. The response of the police in Scotland has been to claim that notorious police failures in England, Wales and Northern Ireland (mirrored in the Republic of Ireland also) are not happening in Scotland and are anyway out of date. So, instead of facing up to the problems, their answer has been to spend £100,000 on videos to show what a splendid job the police do\(^7\). Clips of those videos shown on TV seem to emphasize the problems faced by uniformed police constables on the street. The real problem that arises in the context of the present Bill is not a problem of uniformed constables dealing with street hooliganism: it is more a problem of unsatisfactory investigation, after a “domestic” case has been reported, and also of investigative and prosecutorial judgments made by others, not necessarily by officers on the beat, as to disposal of the cases.

1.8 I have mentioned elsewhere some of the most notorious police failures in so many fields that have come to light elsewhere in the UK. In short, I list some of them:

- The Report by HMIC (Tom Winsor) on failures in the policing of domestic violence: 27 March 2014
- The continuing Hillsborough cover-up: proceedings pending
- The ‘plebgate’ saga – continuing
- The Jimmy Savile and Sir Cyril Smith cases
- The ‘monstering’ of Christopher Jeffries
- The “Cardiff Three” fabrication of evidence (Wales)
- The Stephen Lawrence case
- Numerous cases in Northern Ireland
- “119 Scottish police officers accused of crime’ (6/1/2014)
- “Innocent 91-year-old handcuffed, & held for 6 hours”: 23/3/14
- There are Scottish cases – though the fact that they do not always come to light is perhaps a reflection of the relatively impoverished nature of investigative journalism in Scotland.

Almost every day brings news of fresh discoveries of failures followed by attempts by police forces in the UK to cover up the wrongdoing. The common element in the reluctance to admit failure is the powerful sense that loyalty outweighs admitting the truth, a feature of the most recent police scandals in the Irish Republic, and apparently in the Hillsborough case. In Scotland, the Lord Advocate has power to give directions to the police. The Committee should consider how effectively that power is being used, especially in relation to “domestics”.

\(^7\) The Scotsman 28/3/14

1.9 It is not my intention to criticize the police. They have a difficult task and generally perform it well. However, it is clearly unwise to discard the slow, considered judgment of centuries of judges and others and instead place our faith in the competence and reliability of what we know from ongoing experience to be flawed police practices. All our history – like that of other countries - shows that, in the administration of justice, it is infinitely preferable to rely on an independent, skilled judiciary, conducting its work transparently and with reasoned judgments and appeal reviews, rather than to put our faith in the competence and reliability of police forces that are significantly less transparent and accountable and have put shown to put other considerations before the pure interests of justice. The Justice Secretary has not been successful in demonstrating that his judgment is to be preferred to that of generations of judges.

The original paper concluded with more general notes: they too have been rewritten here. 8

2.0 Some suggestions for improving the conviction rate in rape and other sexual crimes without abolishing the centuries-old rules on corroboration.

(This is a revised version of the original Part 2)

(Note: References to s.18 or s. 270, or the like, are references to sections of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as amended.)

2.1 Previous convictions

We should consider allowing proof of analogous previous convictions if they point to the propensity of the accused person to engage in similar criminal sexual conduct: this would be a development – a real extension – of the thinking that led to Moorov. It needs careful assessment and thorough preparation and drafting (not least in the Human Rights Act context – as do all suggestions about altering rules of evidence) – but it is well worth thinking about. The right to admit such evidence could, and should, be made subject to Judicial Decision in any particular case – as is the case now when s. 270 (allowing proof of previous convictions) or s.274, is invoked. The Judge would have to decide if such evidence was likely to risk prejudicing a fair trial and also if it was capable of providing corroboration; then the jury (if the evidence was admitted by the judge) would decide if it was reliable, persuasive etc. and if it was corroborative in the circumstances. The jury would also be free (and specifically directed to this effect) that they were perfectly entitled to ignore the evidence of previous misconduct/convictions etc. if they thought that it unfairly prejudiced the accused or had no corroborative value. The test both for the judge in deciding the “admissibility” question and the Jury in deciding the reliability questions would – as always in such matters of admissibility – be the test of fairness. We have in Scotland the excellent technique of serving a “narrative indictment” on the accused: that means that the essential facts of the actus reus must be clearly narrated\(^9\), plus notice of the evidence that the Crown intends to lead. Amending the law, to allow the possibility of revealing a relevant course of previous analogous criminal conduct, would require the Lord Advocate to think carefully about the form and content of the Indictment so as to show the relevance of any earlier conviction. In due course, this form of Indictment could become routine in appropriate cases and the framing of the Indictment would follow a fairly standard model, as in a Moorov-type case.

8 This paper uses the statutory term “complainant” rather than “victim” when personal assault (including Rape) cases are being discussed, for the reason previously mentioned by the Convener.

I understand that English legal procedure allows proof previous convictions in some cases\(^{10}\). That appears true in at least some Continental jurisdictions. I am not very familiar with practice in Continental countries but it should be examined (preferably by the Scottish Law Commission rather than by civil servants seeking to do their ministers’ bidding). The law of the European Convention on Human Rights does not appear to prevent such a course: but that obviously requires careful study\(^{11}\). It is not clear that the proposed change to our centuries-old law on Corroboration has had any such study.

2.2 The Right of Silence (Self-incrimination not compellable)

We should consider some departure from the near-absolute right of silence.

Given the modern – effective - controls against abuse of interrogation (behind closed doors) by police, why should the accused in a rape case have the right to remain silent from start to finish? I give some examples of relatively recent changes in this once necessary right.\(^{12}\) There are many Human Rights cases on this topic\(^{13}\)

- I suggest that we could properly undertake a reconsideration of the whole Judicial Examination procedure (ss.35 et seq). At present, post Cadder, the Lord Advocate says that suspects are advised by their lawyers to say nothing at JE - thus frustrating the hopes of the PF at the JE – and that this may well rob the Crown of possible corroboration of sexual penetration in a suspected Rape case\(^{14}\).

- Accordingly, why should we not introduce a rule that the judge who presides at the JE should have a discretion, at the JE or any adjournment thereof, to require the accused to answer a very limited number of well-defined questions, provided the questioning itself is fair and completely under judicial control? The PF would present a written application to the presiding judge, intimated to the defence, that the Crown is seeking \(^9\) I have never seen the contents of a CR Rom narrated as an essential fact.

---

\(^{10}\) as does the 1995 Act.
\(^{11}\) See Lord Reed’s book, supra
\(^{12}\) until 1898 the accused was not even allowed to give evidence in court.
\(^{13}\) see A Guide to Human Rights Law in Scotland, by Lord Reed, Article 6
\(^{14}\) That is no doubt true: but experience shows that, Cadder or no Cadder, experienced criminals have never needed advice from a lawyer to keep their mouths shut until they saw how the land lay: they don’t need to be told by a lawyer how to play the system.
answers\textsuperscript{15} (possibly just YES or NO answers) to “the following questions, being matters clearly within the personal knowledge of the accused” (e.g. Did YOU have sexual intercourse with X on/at DATE/PLACE?) After hearing submissions from the PF and the defence lawyer, the judge, if the PF’s submission was accepted, would say to the accused: “The question that you are about to be asked appears to be a question that is within your personal knowledge…” (This would obviously apply to a question about whether or not the accused had sexual intercourse with the named ‘complainer’ on the occasion in question)... “If you refuse to answer, any court before which you appear to answer the charge in the Petition may treat your refusal as evidence indicating that you did have sexual intercourse with the ‘complainer’ on that occasion”\textsuperscript{16}. (The wording of this would, of course, depend on how the law had been amended) The answer to the question, if YES, might justify the obvious follow-up question: “Did she (the complainer) consent to that intercourse?” The answers to these questions would make it clear to all what were to be the real issues of fact at the trial: this could result in considerable savings as well as removing what is seen as an obstacle to justice. Cross-examination of the accused would not be allowed at the JE: it could even be prescribed by law that such questions would be asked by the judge, not by the prosecutor, so as to provide an additional, important protection against unfairness.

- This procedure would be said to amount to “corroboration by silence”: but is it not worth a careful re-examination in the light of modern conditions? It would be a big step, but not as big as enacting section 57. The interests of justice are not served by the silence of a material witness on an essential fact that the judge rules must be within his knowledge. The rule against self-incrimination (which is not absolute) derives from a time when prisoners were subjected to torture, deception and cruel threats to get them to confess. That danger would not exist in a reformed JE procedure if great care were taken to avoid anything that would run counter to the developing jurisprudence of the ECtHR.

- The current law is that if the accused chooses to go into the witness box he voluntary forgoes that ‘right’: he will be open to questions directly asserting his guilt and that his evidence on particular matters consists of deliberate lies Yet in recent years the courts have concluded that if the accused chooses, before the trial begins, to make a voluntary statement that exculpates him or in any way contradicts the Crown evidence, the jury must be allowed to accept that evidence as evidence of fact, even although the accused cannot be cross-examined on it, because he declines to go into the witness box. Thus the current law allows the accused to give exculpatory evidence on vital facts without any risk of being challenged in court \textsuperscript{17}. The contrast with the position of the complainant is stark: she can be cross-examined harshly and at length.\(^\text{18}\) The law has become quite unbalanced in this important respect – against the complainant, and indeed against the interests of justice. One less dramatic reform would be to compel the accused to enter the witness box to allow him to be cross-examined in court on the contents of any exculpatory extra-judicial statement made by him.

\textsuperscript{15} Just as the accused must do now if he proposes to introduce evidence of the complainer’s sexual history.
\textsuperscript{16} OR “If you refuse to answer, you will be barred in court from challenging any evidence from the complainer that you did.”
\textsuperscript{17} As with the U.S. President: “I did not have sexual relations with that woman”.

- The right to silence, which is not mentioned in the European Convention on Human Rights, is not an absolute right. It has been derived by Judges as ancillary to the right to a fair trial (Article 6). The reasoning of the European Court of Human Rights rests upon the principle that evidence obtained from an accused person by means of coercion and oppression, or other unfair means, in defiance of the will of the accused should not be admitted. This was a clear principle of Scots Law long before the Convention was written.\(^\text{19}\) The traditional, absolute right arose, not least in the Common Law countries, out of the practice of police, security forces etc. of using improper methods to obtain answers – methods such as threats, physical abuse, coercion, deception and the like – commonly behind closed doors and with no access to lawyers or judges. But if a person is brought before an independent judge, having had prior access to legal advice, and is asked questions (of which he and his lawyer have been given written notice) on matters of fact that are bound to be within his personal knowledge, then what is “unfair” about that in the whole context of a Scottish trial? If the JE proceedings are all properly recorded (with video cameras) – so that a jury may make a final judgment about whether or not the process was fair, then why should that not be allowed in any jurisdiction where all the safeguards against abuse are very strong and written into law? The use of the replies by the accused at such a JE could properly be regulated by the legislature of the jurisdiction that established such a system. The JE would be properly seen as “judicial” – similar in broad character to the kind of thing that happens on the Continent with examining magistrates. Incidentally, the Justice Secretary referred to how “fair” European systems of justice were: there is no sign that he has given any thought to examining how these systems can obtain admissible evidence from the accused person?

- It is also at least anomalous, and at worst absurd, that, while a self-incriminating statement, allegedly made by an accused person to the police when apprehended, (even if the accused subsequently denies the making of the alleged statement) is admissible as evidence of guilt if the Court judges that it was fairly obtained, the accused is allowed a right of silence even in open court, with his lawyers and an impartial judge present to ensure that any questioning is “fair”. In the former situation, the question becomes simply, “Do you believe his denial or the assertions by the police?” and the court has no independent and reliable means of testing fairness; in the latter situation, everything is open for the Court to make a fully informed judgment.

\(^{18}\) Legislation in recent years has restricted the cross-examination to some extent.\(^{19}\) Cf. the powerful Opinion of Lord Cooper in HMA v Rigg 1946 JC 1.
• Note also s.18, which allows samples of saliva, fingerprints etc to be taken from a person arrested and in custody for the purpose of criminal proceedings. The statute obliges the arrestee to comply. That procedure is obviously an invasion of the absolute right of a suspect not to provide evidence against himself. Reed discusses these and other cases that depart from any absolute rule.

• Note also the terms of the English caution: "{State name}, I am arresting you on suspicion of {State offence}, You do not have to say anything, But it may harm your defence if you do not mention, when questioned something which you later rely on in court. Anything you do say may be given in evidence". This goes some way to attaching weight to an unjustified refusal to answer a question the answer to which lies clearly within the knowledge of the arrested person.

• The suggestion that we should re-visit the law governing self-incrimination would be opposed by those who believe that the so-called right of silence is prescribed by some legal deity: but it is not. It is a product of a history that we have left far behind. So it is surely worth careful re-consideration in the light of modern developments before throwing away the carefully developed rules governing corroboration that Scotland has had for centuries. It really is time that the rules about self-incrimination and the so-called right of silence were re-considered in the light of the totally changed circumstances that now prevail in relation to the investigation of crime and the rights of a suspect. However, no such change should be made just because some elected politician in a unicameral legislature gets a fixed idea into his head: such important changes should be the subject of extremely careful study and widespread consultation and consensus.

2.3 Hearsay evidence

Is it not time to look again at the rules about hearsay evidence in criminal proceedings? There are already rules permitting hearsay evidence to be admitted in some circumstances: see s.259. Instead of an (near) absolute ban on hearsay evidence, it could be made effectively a matter of reliability, with particular attention paid to recency and spontaneity – as happens with evidence of "distress", which is currently founded upon as supplying corroboration. Distress, if recent, is relevant AND can be treated by the jury as CORROBORATIVE, despite the undeniable fact that the distress originates from the ‘complainer’ (and is thus not truly ‘independent’); the observation of the signs of distress will be from an independent source, but it is the complainer who exhibits those signs, such as sobbing, hysteria, incoherence. They can be feigned, fabricated, exaggerated: so, in traditional terms, they barely pass the test of being independent. But the jury are free to accept that they do: so why shouldn’t the same tests, of spontaneity, reliability, be applied to de

---

20 Hearsay evidence is admissible in civil cases.
21 Unless the witness is dead
22 The late Lord Hunter, sometime Chairman of the Scottish Law Commission and a very experienced criminal lawyer, was particularly supportive of admitting hearsay evidence. I believe he wrote about this; but I have not yet traced any such writing.)
recenti statements by the complainer, particularly if they are able to be seen by the jury as contemporary with, and as manifestations of, the same phenomenon as the distress itself? Evidence of a de recenti statement may be admissible under the current law governing evidence, but may be used by the jury only for a limited purpose, i.e. to test the credibility of the person making the statement; yet it may well be possible even under ECtHR jurisprudence to allow the jury to treat it as “supporting” the evidence of the person making the statement, viz the complainer. Corroboration is NOT such a strictly defined and pure concept that it cannot be adjusted - provided we retain the over-riding tests of fairness, reliability and reasonable doubt. Hearsay evidence is not prohibited under convention law: the test is fairness. The use of “distress” for corroborative purposes in sexual assault cases is a clear example of the capacity and the willingness of the Scottish Judiciary to use reason and commonsense to adjust the application of principles to the needs of Justice23.

2.4 Further encouragement of early complaints and investigation

Many of the problems encountered in practice derive from a failure to investigate the complaint at once and thoroughly – often because the complainer does not report it at once24. Forensic evidence (esp. semen/pubic hair), and injuries disappear; clothing is destroyed or lost or cleaned; potential witnesses cannot be traced; doubt is cast upon the complainer’s evidence because she remained silent for so long. We need to campaign actively to change the culture, of the police and of complainers: the two are inter-related. And it is not only the complainer who may suffer from delay. If there is no complaint to the police for a couple of weeks, valuable forensic and medical evidence (blood, age and character of alleged injuries, absence of the accused’s DNA, recollection of genuine alibi etc.) may be lost, to the detriment of justice.

A good deal has already been done in this respect, especially by the Law Officers, Elish Angiolini and Frank Mulholland, and police practice also improved during my career (1949 – 2004) and since. The changes introduced have improved markedly the treatment of complainers and increased greatly the chances of a conviction in sexual assault cases. (Indeed my impression is that we are now doing better than England & Wales in relation to that conviction rate: the up-to-date statistics should be made available to Parliament.) The poisonous legacy of Jimmy Savile has done one good thing: it has encouraged victims to complain and assured them of more understanding treatment. Our efforts should be concentrated on building on these changes in practice and ‘culture’, rather than just attempting to satisfy some complainers by granting their “wish for the opportunity to be heard in court” [3733].

It is also to be noted, however, that police forces in many countries, including our own, do not enjoy a good reputation for investigating such cases thoroughly25. One

23 Yates v HM Advocate 1977 SLT (n) 42; Smith v Lees 1997 JC 73.
24 This situation is likely to get worse as more police stations close.
suspects that some complainers have been fobbed off with the bland excuse that the inability to pursue the case is down to the law requiring corroboration; it is too easy to pass the buck in this way. The police/prosecution practice of blaming “absence of corroboration” is compounded by the apparent misconception – referred to earlier in the Introduction – as to the character and quantity of what is required by the law governing corroboration, properly understood.

OTHER MATTERS (originally in Part 3)

3.1 Most attention has been focused on sexual assault cases

Relatively little attention has been paid to the fact that Section 57 applies to all cases, including murder, assaults, fraud, theft, and countless Statutory Offences, including drugs cases with severe penalties. This is a revolution. Its far-reaching consequences have simply not been explored. It is a huge change based on the view of one judge, the police and the public prosecutor, with support from lobbyist groups mostly concerned with sexual crimes, (and whose members have often relied on police-based assertions that such cases have had to be dropped for “lack of corroboration”). There has been no examination of the likely effect on non-sexual cases. In areas of policing other than domestic violence there have been too many cases in which credible allegations have been made, and accepted by juries, that the police have planted evidence, not least in drugs cases. There has been no Royal Commission or the equivalent to try to assess the consequences, financial and in terms of the administration of justice. The revolutionary proposal overturns the wisdom and practice of centuries during which the outstanding Scottish Judiciary, and the Institutional writers developed pragmatically a system of justice that owed almost nothing to interventions by Parliament. It has been given very little attention in public discussion or elsewhere. And all of a sudden our whole system of justice is to be dramatically altered. There has been no calculation of the likely effect on the capacity of the Courts, the prosecution service or the cash-strapped, largely Legal-Aided, defence branch of the legal profession. The debate in the Scottish Parliament on 27 February 2014 was woefully inadequate in this respect. Even the Justice Committee paid relatively little attention to the extent and consequences of the change beyond the sexual assault cases. This is simply no way to make sweeping and massive changes to a mature legal system. That legal system recognizes that judges also make mistakes: but if one judge makes a decision it can be appealed to a higher court. If Lord Carloway’s judgment on this issue were to be referred to a higher court of appeal, it would be overturned by a vote of 33 to 1.

3.2 Continental Jurisdictions

The Justice Secretary’s assertion that the other continental countries have no requirement for corroboration, but have fair and balanced systems for administering the criminal law, is astonishing. Are Russia, Italy, Bulgaria, Greece and Turkey (all following new CPS guidelines”: The Independent, 4 February 2014: it is suggested there that the drop “may be linked to cutbacks in police and CPS resources”.

26 NOTE the call of the Police & Crime Commissioner for Greater Manchester for a re-think about approaches to such cases: The Guardian, 6 February 2014.

27 At present, the only exceptions to the need for corroboration are found in relation to offences such as poaching, fishing and hunting, plus some Road Traffic Offences.
Council of Europe members) included in this generalization? What, if anything does the Justice Secretary claim to know about the administration of justice in such countries (some of which are in the EU)? Does his knowledge of the notorious case in Perugia, Italy (murder of Meredith Kercher), or the rich forensic history of Snr. Berlusconi not cause him to doubt if our system of investigation and trial is inferior to the system there? This former Prime Minister claims that the Italian State Legal Service is dominated by politically-motivated left-wingers? Do the claims by former Presidents Sarcozy and Chirac that the French state prosecution service are conducting political witch hunts not give him pause to qualify his desire to emulate the practices of other jurisdictions? My experience as a member for many years of the International Bar Association, and Vice-Chair (for 7 years) of its Human Rights Institute is also quite different from that asserted by the Justice Secretary. Our legal system is widely admired and envied round the world. Even when referring to the English law of evidence, it is far from clear that the Justice Secretary has made any in-depth study of the pluses and minuses of that system, especially in relation to sexual assault cases. The Jimmy Savile scandal again should give us pause for thought: the English system allowed Savile to get away with a lifetime of serious abuse without so much as a caution. Nor does our system of criminal justice owe anything to the continental traditions that developed following the Napoleonic reforms 200 years ago. We do not have examining magistrates or single-career judges. Our jury system is unique. Our trials proceed de die in diem NOT in the desultory fashion common on the Continent. Our judiciary is recruited from experienced independent and highly respected practitioners: by contrast, in much of Europe, recruits to the judiciary join as young professionals and make their whole career as judges. The high standing of judges in this country is entirely different from that of judges elsewhere, in, for example, Italy, Russia, Spain, even in Scandinavia. Some of our insights into Jurisprudence were indeed gained in Holland but that was some four centuries ago when that country followed Roman-Dutch law; and the law in question was civil.

3.3 Police resources

It may be - though I have yet to be persuaded of it – that, despite the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, the police would still look exhaustively for corroboration in sexual assault cases. But in more routine cases, especially where there is little media publicity, the temptation will be to cut the corners: the thinking is bound to be, “Why not effect some savings in the boring, resource-consuming search for corroboration when we don't need it?” That approach will pose an additional threat to justice and will also put more cases before the court that depend on the word of one person against that of another. This point should be considered against the current background in Scotland of reducing police resources and drastically cutting Legal Aid. Even the reduction in the number of police stations is bound to make it more difficult for victims to complain.

3.4 “Domestic” cases

It is fully appreciated that the principal drive for this change comes from a genuine wish not to deprive the victims of private sexual and ‘domestic’ abuse of the right to have their abusers brought to justice. No one can properly deny that that concern is real and worthy of respect. But huge advances have been made, and are still being made, in dealing with this problem. Indeed Scotland has already had real success in effecting great improvements. We should continue to evolve improvements by methods such as those suggested here (and there are surely others); and should not sweep aside the long-standing law of corroboration across the whole field of criminal justice. Of course, there is injustice if a person who commits a crime is not brought to justice; but that already happens in a very great number of crimes and offences that go unsolved, for reasons that have nothing to do with the need for corroboration.

A pragmatic approach

The Scottish system of criminal justice has developed and evolved in a pragmatic way based on a case-by-case approach. To effect a revolution in our system of criminal justice, one that is opposed by almost all who practise in the courts of Scotland, is to risk an even greater injustice, that of convicting the innocent.

3.5 The announcement\(^{28}\) that Lord Bonomy has been appointed to lead an independent reference group in considering other areas of criminal law where reforms may be recommended in light of the proposed abolition of the corroboration requirement has no bearing on the real issue as to the “scrapping” of the long-standing law. The Justice Secretary has repeatedly stated his firm resolve to “scrap” the rule. It is clear that what the Minister now seeks is to find a few sweeteners to placate those who have sought to protect this vital aspect of the Rule of Law in Scotland. In an adversarial system, the interests of justice are not served by awarding token sops to one side or the other; the administration of justice is not a game in which free kicks are given to one side as compensation for the perpetration of fouls that advantage the other.

3.6 The proposal to abolish corroboration is an ill-considered and widely condemned proposal supported by arguments that betray an imperfect understanding of what the law requires; and promoted on the bizarre basis that we can learn lessons from the “fair and reasonable” imperfect foreign legal systems about how to administer criminal justice. If the proposal to enact section 57 is a model of how the Scottish legal system would be run after Independence then we have reason to be fearful for the future of Scots Law.

John McCluskey
31 March 2014

\(^{28}\) On 4\(^{th}\) February 2014
INACCURACIES IN EVIDENCE SUBMITTED

A 1.1 Corroboration of mens rea

On 20/11/13, the Lord Advocate, in evidence to the Justice Committee, stated (at col.3734):

“….in a charge of rape there are three crucial facts: first, we need to corroborate penetration; secondly, we need to corroborate lack of consent; and thirdly, we need to corroborate mens rea, which is the accused’s intention. Those are the three crucial facts that we must corroborate”.

The Lord Advocate repeated this at Col 3755 where he said:

“Recent distress is obviously a piece of evidence. In a non-forceful rape, it only corroborates the lack of consent; it does not corroborate penetration and it does not corroborate mens rea. It will only take you some distance regarding the three crucial facts that you must consider or corroborate in a charge of rape”.

A 1.2 The highlighted statements do not, in my view, reflect the current law accurately, and might therefore mislead the Committee. Mens rea is the “guilty mind” element of common law crimes: (statutes tend to use the word “intention” in some form). In a common law rape case, mens rea was not corroborated by evidence from witnesses saying they saw, heard or otherwise perceived mens rea: indeed it could hardly be, because evidence is led from witnesses about things/events/happenings that they have perceived with their senses. Witnesses are asked what they saw, heard, touched or smelled. Mens rea, being a state of mind, is not a matter of observable fact that a witness can say he saw, heard, touched or smelled. Mens rea, being a state of mind, is not a matter of observable fact that a witness can say he saw, heard, touched or smelled. Although suitably qualified experts are allowed to give Opinion evidence, no witness is allowed to express an opinion as to the accused’s guilt or innocence of the charge that he faces in Court. Subject to the special Exception noted below, evidence from witnesses describing or “corroborating” mens rea is not adduced at a criminal trial.

A 1.3 In a criminal trial of the common law crime of rape, the Crown had to prove the actus reus (the accumulation of the essential facts that constitute the crime). In a rape case that meant that the Crown had to lead evidence that the accused sexually penetrated the female’s vagina and did so without her consent. The primary evidence on each strand of that evidence came (usually) from the complainer.

29 Exceptions: If there was reason to believe that the accused was insane at the time when he committed the criminal acts, and thus incapable of forming the necessary evil intention, then opinion evidence could be led (e.g. from psychiatrists) in support of a plea of “insanity in bar of trial”. (Similarly, if the accused in a case pleads compulsion or sonambulism that made him act without mens rea). The absence of mens rea might thus be established by evidence, which did not need to be corroborated.

30 When the offence is one that is created/defined by statute, then “intention” has to be established – but not by witnesses saying, “I saw his intention: it looked evil to me”.

31 Not, of course, if she had been murdered.
Each strand of her evidence on these two matters had to be corroborated. The jury was then invited to draw the obvious and natural inference that the accused, when he performed the acts that constituted the actus reus, did so with mens rea; that is a matter of inference, not of sensory perception. So the Crown did not lead evidence from witnesses to the effect that they had ‘observed’ the accused’s intention to commit a crime (though witness evidence of observed motive, or of words uttered at the time, might assist the court to draw the inference that he possessed evil intention; but such evidence was not necessary). Thus the accused’s intention had to be implied/inferred from what he did, in performing the acts that constituted the actus reus. It follows that no evidence at all (and certainly no corroborative evidence) was led to show that the accused possessed evil intention (mens rea) when performing the acts that constitute the actus reus.

A 1.4 This field of law has been the subject of much legislation. In particular, the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009 defined rape differently and more widely (mens rea was not mentioned). Absence of consent (plus absence of reasonable belief that there was consent) and penetration (also freshly defined) were made the essential elements of the crime – the crucial facts - to which there was added that the penetration had to be by a person who was intending the penetration or reckless in effecting it [S. 1(1)]. So the elements of intention or recklessness (replacing mens rea) can be seen as facta probanda after the 2009 Act. However, because intention (like mens rea) is a state of mind, and recklessness is a judgment, what is required, in each case, is evidence - in the ordinary sense of reliable observations by witnesses – from which the intention or the recklessness may be inferred. The material from which the intention can properly be inferred would be the observational, factual evidence that the accused penetrated the complainer without her consent: that evidence would have to be corroborated in both particulars. From that evidence the jury can legitimately infer the intention or the recklessness. If the jury makes the necessary inference, then conviction should follow. It is not necessary to have additional, far less corroborative, evidence from eyewitnesses or experts saying that the accused intended to penetrate (or did so recklessly). Of course, direct evidence that the accused uttered words or expressions at the time that plainly inferred an intention to penetrate (or his recklessness) would be relevant and helpful; but such separate evidence is not necessary. So it is difficult to see what is meant by saying that mens rea needs to be corroborated, as if it were a separate, distinct element in the constitution of the crime needing to be separately proved by evidence in addition to the evidence that establishes the actus reus: if the defined elements of penetration and no consent are corroborated, no further corroborative evidence is needed. Obviously the necessary inference, or judgment (of intention or recklessness), cannot be made except on the basis of corroborated evidence that establishes those two crucial facts (facta probanda); but that is all. The corroborated proof of the crucial facts is enough, without more, to warrant the inference of intention or recklessness required by S. 1(1). What the Lord Advocate calls mens rea does not erect a third evidential hurdle and does not require additional evidence to corroborate it.

As the standard text book (Walkers on Evidence, 2008 edn.) says:

---

32 the facta probanda
“7.15 GUILTY KNOWLEDGE AND INTENTION
Mens rea, dole or intention is a necessary element in crimes at common law....In all crimes requiring such proof, mens rea may be inferred from proof of the crime itself, and does not need to be separately established.” So to say that mens rea needs to be “corroborated” misleadingly suggests that evidence beyond that establishing the crucial facts (the facts constituting the actus reus) is necessary. To give a simple, relevant and classic, example (to which I return later), if the complainer states that the accused sexually penetrated her vagina, her evidence of penetration can be corroborated by forensic evidence that her vagina was found, shortly after the event, to contain sperm of the accused (demonstrated by the presence of his DNA). If she gives evidence that she refused consent to the intercourse, that refusal can be corroborated by evidence, e.g. of assault injuries judged to be contemporaneous with the intercourse. In each instance, the evidence from the independent witness consists of observable fact: the corroborating witness is not an eyewitness. But that evidence is properly described as corroborative. Nothing more is necessary to entitle the jury to hold, by legitimate inference, that the necessary intention is established. The corroborating witness does not need to be corroborated.

A 1.5 Errors as to what the law of corroboration requires

Both the Lord Advocate and the Justice Secretary made a similar error in relation to what the law governing Corroboration requires in everyday practice: the Justice Secretary repeated it several times.

The Lord Advocate said:

“Can I tell you what effect corroboration has? We have to corroborate the taking of buccal swabs from alleged offenders, so two police officers are required for that. We have to corroborate the taking of intimate swabs from a complainer in a rape case. That may involve a child and injuries to the sexual parts... .We have to corroborate forensic analysis, so two forensic scientists have to speak to the results of forensic examination, and transmission of samples is required to be corroborated. That seems completely unnecessary. That is where I am coming from.”

The Justice Secretary said more than once:

“At present, two forensic scientists have to speak to a sample and two police officers have to speak to the collection of a CD-ROM from London. All that has to be done because such evidence is part of the integral thread of the case”.

Leaving aside the meaningless phrase “the integral thread of the case”, these assertions are misleading: the law requires corroboration only of ‘the essential facts’, the facts that constitute the crime. The presence of the accused’s semen on a swab is not an essential fact in a rape case: ejaculation of semen in the course of intercourse is not an element of rape.

I seek to demonstrate the difference between evidential facts and essential facts with reference to the common alleged rape case in which the complainer says that she was sexually penetrated by the Accused, and that he ejaculated\textsuperscript{33}. In such a case, the Crown will inevitably ask for an intimate (usually vaginal) swab, to see if there is semen there, and a buccal (mouth) swab from the accused to obtain his DNA for comparison. The evidence to be corroborated is the complainer’s statement that she was penetrated\textsuperscript{34}. The corroboration consists of the evidence that the accused’s semen/DNA was found in the swab. If that corroborative evidence is accepted, the essential fact of penetration is proved. \textbf{One witness can provide that corroborative evidence.} That would happen e.g. if one forensic scientist, acting alone, obtained the vaginal swab, then obtained the buccal swab and finally examined both, finding that the accused’s DNA was in the semen. His/her evidence to that effect would be clear evidence corroborating the primary evidence, of the complainer, that she was sexually penetrated by the accused. It would clear, independent evidence of the \textit{factum probandum}, viz penetration. \textbf{There is no need in law to corroborate the corroboration:} corroborative evidence does not need to be corroborated.

Exactly the same applies even if \textit{A} takes the intimate swab, \textit{B} takes the buccal swab and \textit{C} discovers the accused’s DNA therein: none of those three involved \textit{corroborates} either of the others; and the evidence of no one of them is itself incriminating, but the combined evidence of all of the three, provides a continuous, coherent, linked chain of ‘adminicles’ (≡ pieces or scraps) of evidence which, if accepted by the court, amount to one single piece of corroboration, viz that the accused’s penis penetrated the complainer’s vagina: which is the \textit{factum probandum}.

I repeat, because it is fundamental and elementary: evidence from someone - other than the complainer - that is corroborative of (clearly supportive of) the complainer’s evidence of a crucial fact does not need to be corroborated.

\textbf{A 1.6} I believe that I may understand why the practice of duplicating witnesses (whether policemen or forensic scientists) has grown up: if only one witness witnessed each of the three links in the chain and one of the three single witnesses died or went missing, the chain would be broken and vital evidence might be lost. But that has nothing to do with corroboration. So, having two witnesses to each link may be prudent to guard against losing evidence. But, quite apart from corroboration, \textit{even that precaution is unnecessary}. For it is standard practice for each such witness to sign a police label, narrating where the sample came from, whose person it was taken from, when it was taken and so on. That whole process could be filmed; and the film, plus the signed labels, would be usable to complete the ‘chain’ of evidence if any of the three was not available for the trial. There are also certain statutory provisions in the Act that given valuable evidential status to a document etc. that is signed by two witnesses: but these provisions are nothing to do with the common law about corroboration: the statute could be amended to require one only: a whole host of such evidential innovations have been introduced by statute since 1981. There is no reason not to rationalise and improve them further.

\textsuperscript{33} Clearly, if that statement is true, corroboration should be easy to find. If the complainer says there was no ejaculation, swab evidence is less likely to corroborate her evidence – so corroboration of the (negative) swab evidence does not help to prove the crime.

\textsuperscript{34} Ejaculation itself is \textit{not} a necessary element in \textit{proof of rape}.
The other reason why two witnesses are used is to anticipate and meet a possible challenge to the reliability of one witness, e.g. an expert scientist. But that is to do with reliability, not with corroboration.

A. 1.7 Finally, to put the matter another way: clearly it is not criminal for a man to insert his penis into a woman’s vagina and to ejaculate semen there: so proof that that happened does not prove a crime. All that it demonstrates is that the man sexually penetrated the woman. Other evidence (of no consent) is required to make it criminal. Having several witnesses to each swab obviously sheds no light on the absence of consent. But the evidence obtained from the swabs is sufficiently corroborative of the direct evidence of sexual penetration.

A. 2.1 The Justice Secretary (col. 4098) repeated several times his assertion and belief that if a CD Rom had to be brought from London it had to be collected and brought by two Police Officers, for corroboration purposes - and spoke of a “duplication of resources” [4101]. For the reasons already explained this is simply wrong. Such duplication is entirely unnecessary. It is difficult to conceive of a common law crime in which the contents of a CD or DVD constitute the essential facts constituting the actus reus, though they may provide evidence. The Justice Secretary did not explain what he meant or what kind of statute-based case could require the contents of a CD or DVD to be proved by the evidence to two witnesses.

If, of course, the offence (statutory) itself were to be in possession of a particular disc, then two witnesses could be required to prove and corroborate possession. But it becomes very difficult to relate that to the idea of two policemen having to go to London to collect the disc. If the disc was in London, then it is not explained how that would constitute an offence in Scotland. This example by the Justice Secretary betrays the same error discussed in the earlier paragraphs. Whatever the reason why the police have adopted this practice, the law does not require it; it is very costly in terms of manpower and other resources; and there are various ways of achieving the safeguard of having a substitute witness if one falls by the wayside. The notion that abolition of corroboration would save “resources” is absurd: the government says the number of prosecutions, and therefore trials, will increase significantly; the calls upon the legal aid fund will increase correspondingly\(^{35}\). The cost of the administration of criminal justice is bound to rise as a result. As it is, the police cannot keep up with the demands imposed by the recent laws “stalking” law: only 32% of stalking cases have resulted in conviction.\(^{36}\) \(^{35}\) The Crown Office recruited 60 extra legal staff last year: The Scotsman 10/2/14 p 10.

JMC 31/3/14

\(^{36}\) National Prosecutor for Domestic abuse: The Scotsman 10/2/14: Criminal Justice and Licensing Act 2009.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Scottish Government to the Convener

I understand that the Justice Committee is currently considering its formal response to the Stage 1 evidence you received on the above Bill. It has been clear to me that the Committee has undertaken a thorough consideration of all the proposals contained within this significant piece of legislation and I look forward to receiving your Committee’s recommendations in due course.

One of the many important reforms within the Bill is the proposal to remove the corroboration requirement. I am still fully committed to this reform and consider it is only right that Parliament is given the opportunity now to vote on the principle of such an important change. In my view abolishing the requirement would set a solid and fair foundation for the way in which cases proceed to court i.e. moving the focus to the overall quality of the evidence available. As I indicated to the Committee when I gave evidence I consider, however, that there is time for further work to be undertaken. I have recently approached a highly respected senior judge to lead an independent reference group in considering other areas of criminal law where reforms may be recommended in light of the proposed abolition of the corroboration requirement. I am currently agreeing the details of the remit for this group and we are taking the Lord President’s views into account in that process. I will update the Committee further once the remit has been finalised.

My intention would be for the Government to then bring forward secondary legislation in light of any recommendations made. If the corroboration reform is passed, it would not be commenced before this secondary legislation has been approved by the Scottish Parliament. I think that this can be done without significant delay to the reform, which was always intended to be implemented in the Financial Year 2015/16. I am sure that the Justice Committee would wish to have a full and robust process for the procedure to be used to ensure thorough scrutiny of any secondary legislation by the Scottish Parliament. I agree this would be a necessity and I would intend to ask my officials to liaise with the Clerks of both your Committee and the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, in order that we can be sure that any procedure proposed is satisfactory to the Parliament.

I hope this information on the Scottish Government’s intended way forward is helpful to you and your Committee.

Kenny MacAskill
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
4 February 2014
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Scottish Government to the Convener

I refer to my letter of 4 February which advised the Committee of my decision that an independent Reference Group is to be set up to consider further reforms which may be necessary in light of the corroboration provisions in the Bill.

I am now pleased to announce that The Right Hon Lord Bonomy has agreed to lead this group and that a remit for the issues to be considered has been agreed with him. The Committee will be well aware of the calibre of Lord Bonomy’s previous contributions to Scots Law. He was appointed as Senator of the College of Justice in January 1997, serving with great distinction and retiring in 2012. He also has international experience, serving as a judge of the UN International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia between June 2004 and August 2009 where he presided over many high profile war crimes cases. In 2001 Lord Bonomy conducted a comprehensive review of the practices and procedure of the High Court of Justiciary. Lord Bonomy’s report was published in 2002 and resulted in significant set of reforms to High Court practices and procedures. Lord Bonomy’s extensive knowledge and expertise on Scots Criminal Law makes him the ideal person to lead this important Reference Group.

Please find attached a copy of the remit for your Committee’s information. Membership of the Reference Group is still being considered, but arrangements are being made for the work of the group to commence as soon as possible.

I hope this further information is helpful.

Kenny MacAskill
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
5 February 2014
TERMS OF REFERENCE

In the context of provisions in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill which propose the removal of the general requirement for corroboration in criminal cases, recognising that this is considered by many to be an integral requirement of the criminal justice system, to consider what additional safeguards and changes to law and practice are necessary to maintain a fair, effective and efficient system, to report, and to draft any legislation required to give effect to these changes.

In making its assessment, the review would be expected to consider the issues highlighted in the following, non-exhaustive, list:

- Whether a formal statutory test for sufficiency based upon supporting evidence and/or on the overall quality of evidence is necessary,
- Whether any proposed prosecutorial test (or a requirement for publication of any such test) should be prescribed in legislation,
- The admissibility and the use of confession evidence,
- The circumstances in which evidence ought to be excluded,
- The practice of dock identification,
- Jury majority and size,
- The future basis and operation for a submission that there is no case to answer at the end of the prosecution case,
- Whether a judge should be able to remove a case from a jury on the basis that no reasonable jury could be expected to convict on the evidence before it,
- Whether any change is needed in the directions that a judge might give a jury (including a requirement for special directions in particular circumstances),
- Whether any additional changes are required in summary proceedings.

Appeals are not expected to be considered by the review as they are for wider consideration, not related specifically to corroboration.
DELEGATED POWERS AND LAW REFORM COMMITTEE

5th Meeting, 2014 (Session 4)

Tuesday 4 February 2014

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Response from the Scottish Government

Background

1. The Committee reported on the delegated powers in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill on 30 October 2013 in its 53rd report of 2013.

2. The response from the Scottish Government to the report is reproduced at the Annex.

Scottish Government response

Section 86 – Use of live television link

3. Section 86(1) of the Bill inserts new sections 288H – 288K into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). The new provisions allow the court to determine that a detained person is to participate in a specified court hearing by use of a live television link. In making such a determination, the court is to have regard to any representations made by the parties as well as the interests of justice.

4. The new section 288(J)(1) of the 1995 Act, as inserted by section 86(1) of the Bill, provides that the Lord Justice General may, by directions, specify the types of hearing in which a detained person may participate by live television link. The power of the court to determine that a hearing should take place by television link only operates in respect of “specified hearings” which are those types of hearing which have been the subject of a direction made by the Lord Justice General. Under section 288(J)(2), such directions may specify types of hearing by reference to the venues at which they take place, particular places of detention or categories of cases or proceedings to which they relate.

5. Whilst content with the power in principle, the Committee drew some matters relating to section 288(J) to the attention of the Parliament in its stage 1 report.

---

1 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill [as introduced] available here: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Criminal%20Justice%20(Scotland)%20Bill/b35s4-introd.pdf
6. The power at section 288(J)(1) is exercisable by directions made by the Lord Justice General rather than by subordinate legislation. The directions made will therefore not be subject to any form of Parliamentary procedure or scrutiny. While the Committee agreed that the courts are best placed to specify the types of hearings which may take place by television link, it did not accept the Scottish Government’s view that the function of specifying hearings is purely operational in nature. The Committee considered the power to have legal significance and accordingly was of the view that the Parliament should be given the opportunity to have notice of and scrutinise its exercise.

7. Further to this, the Committee was of the view that parties who could potentially be affected by a specification should be afforded fair notice of the arrangements that are being made, and that such information should be available publicly in advance of the specification taking effect. The Committee considered that this could be best achieved by making the specifications using subordinate legislation, which would have to be laid before Parliament and therefore made publicly available before coming into force.

8. In its response to the Committee’s report, the Scottish Government adheres to the view that specifications of types of hearing at which appearance by television link may be appropriate should be made by directions. The Scottish Government does not consider it appropriate for specifications of hearings to be made by way of subordinate legislation given the procedures and timescales associated with the making of subordinate legislation as well as the likelihood that specifications may require to be made frequently and, in some circumstances, varied or revoked at short notice. The Government also makes reference to section 80 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, which gives both the High Court and Sheriff Courts a wide discretion to allow a detained or imprisoned person to appear by means of television link at hearings in criminal proceedings, without regard to a prescribed test such as that imposed by the Bill, where the Court must consider both the representations of the parties and the interests of justice before determining that the hearing can take place.

9. In response to the particular concern the Committee had at directions being made at short notice, the Government has explained that its view is that any directions made at short notice are more likely to be directions varying or revoking existing directions, for example where the Lord Justice General becomes aware of a concern in relation to the use of television links in particular types of hearing. The Government does not envisage the making of directions at short notice which specify new types of hearing, although the power as drafted could still be used in that way.

10. In its report, the Committee was concerned with the manner in which the Scottish Government proposes that this power should be exercised i.e. by the making of directions not subject to Parliamentary scrutiny, as opposed to by subordinate legislation. The Scottish Government does not propose to alter this approach following the Committee’s report and members may wish to consider whether they accept the response on this point, or whether they wish to comment further.
11. The Committee was also concerned in its response that those who would be affected by the specification of hearings which could take place by television link ought to be afforded fair notice of any directions made, and that the laying of subordinate legislation before the Parliament would achieve that fair notice requirement. In its response, the Government has agreed to consider bringing forward an amendment at stage 2 to require the publication of any directions that are made, although it is not clear from the response what that amendment would be. The Committee may wish to consider whether it is satisfied that a commitment to consider the issue of publication further at Stage 2 is sufficient to alleviate the Committee’s concerns about fair notice and the protection of the rights of those who may be affected by directions made.

Conclusion

12. Unless amendments that will substantially affect the delegated powers provisions are made to the Bill at Stage 2, the Committee will not consider it again. Members are therefore invited to make any comments they wish on the Bill at this stage in light of the Scottish Government’s response to the Committee’s Stage 1 report.

Recommendation

13. Members are invited to note the Scottish Government’s response on the Bill and to make any comments they wish at this stage.
Correspondence from the Scottish Government, dated 17 January 2014:

28. The Committee therefore accepts the principle that the specification of hearings in which an accused person may be required to participate by live television link is a matter which should be regulated by the Lord Justice General as head of the Scottish court service. However, the Committee considers that the Parliament retains a separate interest in the exercise of this particular function. It is not persuaded that the function should be exercised without affording notice to the Parliament and the public in advance. Accordingly the Committee draws the power in section 288J(1) of the Bill to the attention of the Parliament and recommends that the Scottish Government consider bringing forward an amendment at Stage 2 to make the power to specify types of hearings which may be conducted by live television link exercisable by way of subordinate legislation to which section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 would apply.

The Scottish Government preface this responses by explaining that, since the coming into force of section 80 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, both the High Court and the sheriff court have had the power to permit a detained or imprisoned person to appear by means of live television link at hearings in criminal proceedings other than a first appearance from custody, or a hearing at which evidence is led. Under the existing provisions the court is not required to apply any prescribed test and therefore has a wide measure of discretion. The provisions inserted by section 66 of the Bill innovate upon the existing law by only giving courts the power to make determinations for appearance by live television link where the hearing in question is of a type that has been specified for that purpose by the Lord Justice-General, and by prescribing an "interests of justice" test to be applied by the court.

The provisions are therefore designed to afford better protection of the right of accused persons to effective participation in proceedings by ensuring that appearance by live television link is only permitted both when the Lord Justice-General has been satisfied that the hearing in question is of a type that is suitable for that purpose, and when the court is satisfied, having heard representations, that the use of a live television link would not be contrary to the interests of justice in the circumstances of the particular case.

Whether the power to specify hearings is to be exercised by the Lord Justice-General by directions, or by the High Court by Act of Adjournment, it will be up to that person or body to decide on the approach to be adopted. However, as the proposed section 288J of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides, hearings can be specified with reference to a number of different factors. Rather than specifying all hearings of a particular type, what is specified may therefore be hearings of a particular type, when conducted in a particular court, and when the accused is appearing by live television link from certain specified places of detention. There is therefore the possibility of types of hearing being specified with some frequency as and when the decision maker is satisfied that the live television link facilities available at particular courts and places of detention are of a requisite standard.
In their letter to the Committee dated 03 October 2013, the Scottish Government alluded to the possibility that a direction under section 288J might require to be made at short notice. The scenario the Scottish Government had in mind was not a direction specifying hearings, but a direction varying or revoking an earlier direction, for example if the Lord Justice-General became aware of concerns regarding the use of live television links for a particular purpose.

While the Scottish Government understands and respect the Committee’s view that the power to specify hearings should be exercisable by way of subordinate legislation to which section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 would apply, they still consider that this would not be appropriate having regard to the nature of the function in question, the procedures and timescales involved in promulgating Acts of Adjournal, the potential frequency with which hearings would be specified, and the possible requirement for directions to be varied or revoked at short notice.

The Scottish Government has also noted the Committee’s particular concerns in relation to the notice of specification of particular types of hearing. As stated in their previous response, the Scottish Government considered that directions would be published in accordance with the Scottish Court Service standard procedure and that this did not require to be included in primary legislation. However, in view of the Committee’s comments, the Scottish Government will consider whether to bring forward an amendment in this regard at Stage 2.
Present:

Richard Baker       Nigel Don (Convener)
Mike MacKenzie      Margaret McCulloch
Stuart McMillan (Deputy Convener)  John Scott
Stewart Stevenson

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered the Scottish Government's response to its Stage 1 report.
11:38

The Convener: We come to agenda item 7. This item is consideration of the Scottish Government’s response to the committee’s stage 1 report on the bill. Members have seen the briefing paper and the response from the Scottish Government. Do members have any comments?

John Scott: Again, I am content; but there possibly should be amendment at stage 2.

The Convener: Is the committee content to note the response and, if necessary, reconsider the bill after stage 2?

Members indicated agreement.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Scottish Government to the Convener on the Committee’s Stage 1 Report and further information on Lord Bonomy’s Review

I write in response to the Justice Committee’s Stage 1 Report on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I would like to thank the Committee for its careful consideration of the Bill and all those who contributed to that consideration by giving evidence.

Please find attached the Scottish Government Response to the report.

I also wanted to take this opportunity to provide further information for your Committee on the Right Hon Lord Bonomy’s review to consider further reforms which may be necessary in light of the corroboration provisions in the Bill. My letter of 5 February to your Committee included the terms of reference for this work. The Secretary to Lord Bonomy’s review has now confirmed on behalf of Lord Bonomy that the following individuals have agreed that they are willing to participate as members of his Reference Group:

- Rt Hon Lady Dorrian
- Sheriff Michael O’Grady QC
- Sheriff Norman McFadyen
- Ian Cruickshank
- David McKenna, Victim Support Scotland
- Joe Moyes, Scottish Court Service
- DCC Iain Livingstone, Police Scotland
- Shelagh McCall, Scottish Human Rights Commission
- J D Murray Macara QC
- Murdo MacLeod QC
- Jane Farquharson, Advocate
- Frances McMenamin, SCCRC
- Sir Gerald Gordon
- Charles Stoddart
- Professor James Chalmers
- Professor Pamela Ferguson

The above list does not preclude changes in the composition of the Group in light of the development of the work of the Review.

I hope this additional information is helpful.

Kenny MacAskill
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
25 February 2014
PART 1 ARREST AND CUSTODY

1. The Committee accepts that there might be some benefit in simplifying the powers of arrest along the lines proposed in Part 1 of the Bill. However, we do have concerns regarding the possible consequences of this change and we therefore make a number of recommendations aimed at improving the provisions in Part 1 of the Bill under the relevant sections below.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s comments in relation to Part 1 of the Bill regarding the benefits of simplifying the process of arrest. We have responded on the specific issues raised below.

2. The Committee has concerns that use of the term “arrested” in relation to a suspect who has been taken into police custody for questioning but has not been charged may, amongst members of the public, be more suggestive of guilt than is currently the case for a suspect who is “detained” for questioning.

We consider the terminology in the Bill concerning arrest to be somewhat confusing and are not convinced that members of the public, the accused or the media will be able to distinguish between a “person officially accused” and a “person not officially accused”. We also have similar concerns relating to the proposal to allow the police to “de-arrest” a person when the grounds for arrest no longer exist (see paragraph 120 of this report).

The Scottish Government considers that the terminology used in the Bill is clear and accurately describes the new regime. Whether a person is guilty of committing the offence is a matter for the court. The presumption of innocence remains.

As to the ability of the press and public to talk about and understand the stage which an investigation has reached, it is already the case that it is the point at which the suspect is charged that marks the important change in the person’s position. This will remain the case under the system set out in the Bill.

The Government agrees with Lord Carloway, and the large number of witnesses who gave evidence to the Committee, that having a single process for taking a suspect into custody (called “arrest”) makes for a clearer system.

The terms “not officially accused” and “officially accused” have been used to differentiate between two distinct categories of persons, first people who are suspected of an offence but who have not been charged (“not officially accused”) and second, those who have been formally charged with an offence, which includes accused on petition, indictment or complaint (“officially accused”).

The term “de-arrest” is not used in the Bill and the Government has no intention of using it.

3. While we accept assurances from the police that, as with the current position, they do not intend to release a suspect’s name to the media until they have been formally charged with an offence, i.e. “officially accused”, we consider that every effort should be made to ensure that the reputation of the accused is not detrimentally affected by these provisions. The Committee considers that the issue of suspects' anonymity is problematic, but merits further and careful consideration.

The Scottish Government is confident that the police will make every effort to avoid disclosure of a suspect’s identity to the media. The principle of “innocent until proven guilty” is well understood. Moreover, the police and the prosecutorial authorities in Scotland are aware both of the Scots law on presumption of innocence and the requirement under the European Convention of Human Rights that no public official reflects an opinion that a person charged with a criminal offence is guilty prior to trial.

There are no current plans to make changes in respect of suspects’ anonymity but the Government is willing to engage with interested parties with views on the matter.

4. The Committee is concerned that police officer training and adaptations to the new i6 programme required to effectively implement the provisions in Part 1 of the Bill may place a significant burden on an already stretched police service and individual officers. While we accept the Cabinet Secretary’s assurances that sufficient time will be given to Police Scotland to implement a training programme and to update the new ICT system before giving effect to the Bill, we ask the Scottish Government to ensure that adequate resources are made available to Police Scotland to carry out these tasks without further strain on its shrinking budget.

The Financial Memorandum was developed through close consultation and discussion with key partners, including Police Scotland. This process took place alongside the development of police plans for the i6 programme. The Government recognises the particular pressures on the police: for example, we have already agreed that due to pressures on the force during 2014, implementation of the Bill’s changes to police powers should be planned for 2015. We continue to discuss implementation and delivery with Police Scotland, to ensure that the timetable and programme is achievable.

The Scottish Government has undertaken to monitor the actual financial impact of the Bill during and after its implementation and maintain discussions with delivery bodies. If it becomes clear that there are additional financial costs as a result of the Bill, that will be considered in future funding discussions. The Scottish Government will ensure that delivery bodies have adequate resources to implement these reforms.

5. The Committee notes that the Bill does not give effect to Lord Carloway's recommendation that “arrest” be defined in the Bill. We further note that there was no consensus from witnesses as to whether arrest should be defined and, if so, whether this legislation was the best vehicle to do so. On balance, the Committee is not content with the Scottish Government’s decision to exclude such a definition in the Bill.

The word “arrest” is not defined in the Bill because, after considering the matter carefully, the Government concluded that no elaboration of the expression’s meaning is required, and any attempt to elaborate it could be counter-productive.
In one sense, the whole of Part 1 of the Bill defines what arrest by the police entails in the normal case. Part 1 sets out the circumstances in which someone can be arrested (with the use of reasonable force if necessary), that an arrestee is to be taken to a police station, given certain information, afforded certain rights and so forth. Picking a handful of those elements and simplifying them for the sake of concision would produce a partial and potentially misleading definition of what it means to be arrested. On the other hand, defining arrest to mean all the consequences set out in Part 1 of the Bill (and other enactments) would be circular and serve no purpose.

Similarly, trying to define arrest by reference to its purpose rather than its consequences is not without its difficulties. In his report, Lord Carloway proposed that arrest should be defined as bringing a person into custody with a view to bringing the person before a court. There is a risk that this could jeopardise the employment of widely-used alternatives to court proceedings, such as Police Fixed Penalty Notices.

In short, defining arrest poses difficulties for the smooth operation of the new system created under the Bill. Leaving the term to take its natural meaning within the context of the provisions in the Bill, ensures that this Bill will operate effectively alongside other legislation which makes provision regarding arrest and “arrested persons”.

6. The Committee notes the Scottish Government’s position that the power of arrest contained in the Bill combined with common law rules would be sufficient in allowing the police to arrest a person attempting or conspiring to commit an offence. However, we heard from the police that they were not yet convinced by the reassurances given, and from the SHRC that it would have serious concerns if the police were able to arrest a person “who has done nothing contrary to the criminal law”. We therefore call on the Scottish Government to further engage with both the police and the SHRC with a view to providing adequate reassurances on this matter.

The Bill will deliver the Carloway recommendation of having a single police power of arrest, under which a person can be brought into custody on suspicion of having committed an offence. There is nothing in the Bill which will permit the police to arrest anyone who has done nothing contrary to criminal law. The Government is continuing to engage with stakeholders on this matter.

7. The Committee notes the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward an amendment to allow a person to be quickly released from arrest (“de-arrested”) when the grounds for arrest no longer exist. While we recognise that there may be situations where de-arrest could be a reasonable option, we have concerns that this should not lead to a situation where people are arrested without a proper assessment by police officers as to whether such action is appropriate. We would therefore welcome further details of the types of situation and expected frequency in which de-arrest would be used. The Committee also has concerns regarding use of the term “de-arrest” and consider the words “released” or “liberated” to be more appropriate.

The Government understands the Committee’s concern. However, having listened to the evidence presented to the Committee, the Government is persuaded that it should be possible for the police to release an arrested person, prior to arrival at a police station, in certain circumstances. The Government will bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to make provision for this.

An example has been provided by Police Scotland where such a liberation from initial arrest may be used:

Police attend a report of a householder having disturbed a youth breaking in to his car. The householder provides a detailed description of the suspect, including clothing. Shortly afterwards, in a nearby street, police find a male fitting the description of the suspect. Following brief questioning he is arrested and on being placed in the police vehicle, the householder attends and clearly states although there is a similarity, it is not the person who was breaking into his car. The grounds for arrest no longer exist, but as the male has been arrested the Bill as introduced requires that the arrested person must be taken to a police office.

In recognition of the Committee’s concern about the potential for misuse of the arrest power, the amendment will allow a person to be released prior to arriving at a police station only if there are no longer grounds to suspect the person of committing an offence. The police have an equivalent power at present in relation to people they detain under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and its use is very limited. On this basis, the Government would not expect the power to release an arrestee before arriving at a police station to be used often in practice.

It will also continue to be possible to release a suspect where a constable charges the person with an offence and having done so decides that the person’s presence at the police station will not be required.

The Government’s amendments to the Bill at stage 2 will include a requirement to keep a record of the reasons where an arrestee is released before arriving at a police station.

8. The Committee welcomes the recent introduction of a “Letter of Rights” for those in custody, in accordance with the EU Directive on the Right of Information in Criminal Proceedings. We ask the Scottish Government to respond to the suggestion of some witnesses that information to be given to suspects at a police station should be provided both verbally and in writing with a view to ensuring that they clearly understand their rights.

The effect of section 5 of the Bill is that a person will be provided with information on their basic rights, verbally, on arrival at the police station. This information includes the right to silence, the right of access to a lawyer and the right of intimation to a third person. In addition to this, a person is provided with a written Letter of Rights which they are able to keep with them. The Scottish Government considers it is more appropriate for the decision whether to hand the letter to the person or read it to them to be made depending on the specific circumstances of each person. Section 5(3) of the Bill does provide this appropriate level of flexibility and where the person requires assistance to understand the letter it can be read to them.

9. The Committee heard a divergence in views amongst witnesses regarding the appropriate maximum detention limit. However, we note the statistics provided by Police Scotland relating to the period of 4 June to 1 July 2013 which show that, although the majority of persons (80.4%) were detained for up to six hours, a not unsubstantial number (19.2%) were detained for between six and 12 hours. Given these statistics, there are mixed views on the Committee as to whether detention beyond six hours is necessary.

The Scottish Government considers that the evidence makes it clear that the provision in the Bill is appropriate. It is clear from the evidence that a six hour period of detention is not sufficient for every case.

The fact that a person can be kept in custody for up to 12 hours has not meant that most detainees are. The Bill will formalise current practice to ensure that detentions do not go on longer than necessary by creating a mandatory custody review, performed by a senior officer not directly involved in the investigation (see section 9 of the Bill).

10. We note the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to consider whether the detention limit should be extended in exceptional circumstances. While we recognise that there may be situations, particularly in relation to complex and serious crimes, where it may be necessary to consider extending the detention limit, we remain to be convinced whether this is really necessary, particularly when, under the Bill, the police would have the option of releasing a person on investigative liberation. We therefore seek further information on the types of “exceptional circumstances” in which the Scottish Government envisages that an extension to the detention limit would be granted, how often they are likely to be applied for, who would approve any extension, and how the Scottish Government intends to ensure that such extensions do not become commonplace over time.

The Scottish Government is continuing to consider whether to bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to allow the 12 hour detention limit to be extended in exceptional circumstances.

Police Scotland has provided the Committee with written evidence detailing the circumstances in which the 12 hour period of detention has proved insufficient and when they have had to extend it under the existing powers in section 14A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The examples given by Police Scotland provide strong evidence for the view that in rare but important cases, a 12 hour detention period is too short, for example when dealing with complex serious cases with suspects and potentially victims and witnesses under the influence of drink and/or drugs who are deemed by medical professionals to be unsuitable for interview.

The Government would expect that, should the police retain the power to extend the detention period, its use would continue to be rare. Any amendment would include similar safeguards against inappropriate use of the power as presently exist (eg. a requirement that the period can only be extended with the authorisation of a senior police officer). This would ensure the same high-level scrutiny of decisions and appropriate protection for those in police custody as presently exists. A copy of the examples provided by Police Scotland of the types of cases whereby an extension to the 12 hour detention period has been necessary is attached to this report.

Investigative Liberation is a new tool which police will utilise to manage their inquiries. It is, however, not an appropriate tool to use in the examples provided by the police. Investigative Liberation cannot be used in all cases. When a person presents such a risk that no conditions set could mitigate that risk (for example, a very violent disposition) then investigative liberation is not appropriate. It should also be noted that it will not be possible to liberate a person, whether with or without conditions, when they remain heavily under the influence of drink or drugs and are deemed by a doctor to be not fit for interview. If the person is not fit for interview they cannot be safely released from custody and have an understanding of any conditions which have been attached to their release. The extension to the 12 hour detention period would serve a separate purpose to that of Investigative Liberation.

11. The Committee seeks assurances that investigative liberation will not have an unnecessary impact on the suspect’s private life, whilst allowing the police to conduct complex investigations which could not be completed while the person is initially detained. We note that a person may apply to the courts to have any conditions imposed either removed or altered, which we believe is a welcome protection against disproportionate conditions being applied.

Investigative liberation will provide an alternative to prolonged detention of suspects in certain cases, and as such is itself a method of reducing an investigation’s impact on the suspect’s private life.

The Bill requires that any conditions set must be “necessary and proportionate” (section 14(2)), thus there is an in-built legal requirement for the conditions not to have an unnecessary impact on the suspect’s private life. As the Committee notes, if the suspect feels the police have imposed a condition that is unnecessary or disproportionate the Bill provides a mechanism for that to be reviewed by the courts (section 17).

12. The Committee also notes suggestions from victims’ groups that the Bill should include a specific requirement for complainers to be notified of a suspect’s release on investigative liberation and of any conditions attached, however, we are unsure as to whether such a requirement needs to be placed on the face of the Bill. We ask the Scottish Government to work with the COPFS to ensure that, where they may be at risk, complainers are always informed timeously of the suspect’s release and of any relevant conditions applied.

Upholding the rights of victims in a criminal case is crucial to ensuring a fair criminal justice system. The Scottish Government is discussing with stakeholders, including Police Scotland and COPFS, the processes which will be required as a result of the Bill. These discussions include the process for notifying complainers where a suspect is released on investigative liberation.

13. The Committee notes that there are likely to be resource implications relating to investigative liberation.

Investigative liberation is a new procedure for Police Scotland and indeed COPFS and other key stakeholders.

The operational aspects of the administration of investigative liberation are a matter for Police Scotland. The anticipated resource implications are set out in the Financial Memorandum, which was developed through consultation with key stakeholders, including Police Scotland. The Scottish Government will monitor the resource implications of implementing the Bill, and will ensure that Police Scotland have adequate resources to deal with investigative liberation.

14. Like many witnesses, the Committee is concerned that suspects are sometimes held in custody for unacceptably long periods before their first appearance in court. We believe that court sitting times must be extended to reduce such lengthy periods in custody and the backlog of cases. We also recognise that there are implications for police time and resources in holding people in custody.

Where the volume of custody cases on any given day requires a court to sit for extended hours, both SCS and COPFS facilitate that. Court programmes are regularly monitored and amended, under the authority of the sheriffs principal, to ensure that they allow for the efficient disposal of business and meet the needs of court users. Any permanent change in court sitting times, however, would have resource implications for Scottish Court Service, COPFS, and others involved in the criminal justice system, and would need to be considered carefully.

15. We are not however convinced that specifying time-limits for periods in custody in legislation is necessary at this stage, particularly when a working group is actively considering options for Saturday courts. We recommend that this work be completed in a timeous manner to allow any recommendations of the working group to be implemented as quickly as possible. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s assurances that he will “take a keen interest in the issue” and requests details of the timescale for meetings and completion of the work of the group.

The working group is presently meeting on a monthly basis, and reports regularly to the Justice Board. The group is evaluating the nature and scale of what will be required to introduce Saturday or weekend courts. At this stage, however, it seems clear that this will be a significant and complex piece of work involving process and policy changes across all criminal justice organisations, with considerable and ongoing consequences for the resources of those organisations, and implications for the employment terms and conditions of existing staff which will need to be addressed. It is hoped that the group will be able to report its initial conclusions by late summer 2014.

16. The Committee is content that sufficient safeguards are provided in the Bill regarding liberation of those officially accused from custody, in particular the right to apply to the sheriff to have any conditions imposed by the police reviewed.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee's view in this regard.

17. The Committee notes the different experiences of witnesses from the legal profession in relation to when the caution is given to suspects by the police under current arrangements. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to respond to the specific suggestion made by the Faculty of Advocates that the Bill should specify that the caution, which must take place not more than one hour before any interview, should also be repeated at the commencement of the interview.

The Bill recognises the importance of a person being reminded about their rights prior to the commencement of questioning. As currently drafted, the Bill is sufficiently flexible to allow for a suspect to be reminded of their rights at an appropriate stage prior to interview, including at the commencement of the interview. The timing within the Bill enables a suspect to consider these rights and make decisions such as whether they wish to seek legal advice where they had not sought it initially, for example, with sufficient time to make arrangements prior to interview.

As is the practice at present, the police will continue to caution a person at the start of an interview, under common law. In addition to this, a Letter of Rights is, and will continue to be, provided to a person on arrival at the police station and they will be able to keep it with them.

The Scottish Government recognises the importance of ensuring that a person is aware of their rights at all times and we consider that the Bill delivers this, and that no further provision is required.

18. The Committee welcomes the extension of the right of access to a solicitor to all suspects held in police custody, regardless of whether the police intend to question the suspect, and that suspects are entitled to face-to-face contact with a solicitor. We recognise that there would be difficulties in specifying in the Bill that a suspect should be entitled to receive assistance from a solicitor of their choice, particularly in the more remote areas of Scotland, and we therefore agree with the Scottish Government on this matter.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support of the extension of the right of access to a solicitor.

19. The Committee is content with the procedure specified in the Bill allowing a constable to question a person not officially accused following arrest.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support of this provision.

20. The Committee is persuaded that post-charge questioning may be required in certain complex and lengthy investigations. We also note that the majority of witnesses were content that the requirement on the police to apply to the court for approval for post-charge questioning provides sufficient judicial oversight to minimise the risk of miscarriages of justice.

21. However, post-charge questioning should only be used when absolutely necessary. To this end, we ask the Scottish Government to maintain a record of the circumstances and frequency in which post-charge questioning is used, including details of the applications that are refused by the courts. We further seek confirmation from the Scottish Government that existing rules providing that no adverse inference may be drawn from a suspect’s refusal to answer police questions would apply equally to post-charge questioning.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support for the post-charge questioning provisions. We will discuss with criminal justice organisations the detail of how the post-charge questioning provisions will be implemented. This will include: estimates of how often such applications will come before the courts, what systems can be put in place for the recording of the information required, and what the resource implications for those organisations would be.
The specific statutory provision which allowed comment on a failure to answer questions at a judicial examination is being abolished by this Bill, together with the judicial examination procedure itself.

As the Committee may be aware, Lord Carloway specifically considered the issue of “adverse inference from silence” as part of his review. Lord Carloway’s recommendation was that no change should be made “to the current law of evidence that prevents inferences being drawn from an accused’s failure to answer questions during the police investigation” (chapter 7.5). The Scottish Government accepts that recommendation and also agrees that there should not be a rule in place which would permit an adverse inference to be drawn from a refusal to answer questions during post-charge questioning. We can confirm that no rule to permit adverse inference in relation to post charge questioning is being introduced in this Bill.

22. The Committee notes that the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill defines a child as a person up to the age of 18. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to explain why there is inconsistency between the protections for under-18s in this Bill compared with this recent legislation.

The provisions in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014 and this Bill serve entirely different purposes. In the context of this Bill, the Scottish Government does not consider it is appropriate to apply blanket provisions for all under 18s. Also, we consider it is important to provide protection up to the age of 18 whilst recognising the rights of 16 and 17 year olds to self-determination.

In considering the age distinctions within the Criminal Justice Bill, we recognise the importance of distinguishing between the different needs, stages of development and potential circumstances of older and younger children. While it might appear attractive to treat all individuals under 18 years consistently, the age-based laws which allow for seventeen year olds to be living independently and marry reflect the quite different contexts and degrees of self-determination that can exist between a 10 and a 17 year old. The Scottish Government prefers an approach which would allow children aged 16 and 17 years to make their own decisions with safeguards in place to support them in this.

23. The Committee has concerns regarding the lack of consistency in use of the terms “welfare”, “best interests” and “well-being” of the child in this and other legislation. While we make no comment on which is the most appropriate term, we ask the Scottish Government to ensure consistency in the language used in section 42 of the Bill.

The term “well-being” in the context of this Bill is understood by the police and is consistent with their wider assessments of the needs of children. It is this wider scope of primary consideration that we seek they take in relation to the arrest, detention, interview and charging of a child. The factors that they will consider will be dictated by the circumstances of the investigation they are dealing with, therefore, the term has not been defined in relation to any other statute or Bill to ensure that the holistic needs of the child are a primary consideration in relation to the decisions the police take.

The Scottish Government notes the comments made by the Committee in relation to section 42 of the Bill, and will seek to adjust the heading of this section to ensure consistency of language. This may not require a formal amendment.
24. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s undertaking to give consideration to raising the age of criminal responsibility and would welcome regular updates on this work.

The Scottish Government will provide the Committee with regular updates.

25. The Committee has concerns that the definition of vulnerable person in the Bill may not capture all individuals needing additional support when in custody. We also note comments from the police that there are difficulties in identifying vulnerable persons. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to give further consideration to the definition of vulnerable persons in the Bill and to reflect on whether this is consistent with the definition in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014. We also ask that the Scottish Government ensures that sufficient resources are provided to the police to undergo training in this important area.

The Scottish Government notes the Committee’s concerns in relation to the definition of vulnerable person. The definition is in line with Lord Carloway’s recommendations which expressly link the definition of “vulnerable suspect” to a person who is not able to understand fully the significance of what is said to them, the questions posed or of their replies because of an apparent mental illness, personality disorder or learning disability. This is consistent with current practice whereby access to an appropriate adult is linked to “mental disorder” (which is defined as mental illness, personality disorder or learning disability), which is a tried and practiced criterion on which police have been assessing the vulnerability of suspects, accused, victims and witnesses for many years.

In relation to consistency with the definition in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014 (the 2014 Act) we would emphasise that the 2014 Act and this Bill serve very different purposes. However, mental disorder is one of the criteria used in assessing vulnerability for the purpose of entitlement to use special measures to give evidence to the court.

On the issue of training, police are already familiar with the need to identify whether a person suffers from a “mental disorder” and, where they do, to make arrangements for an Appropriate Adult to be present during police procedures. The resource implications of police training as a result of the Bill are covered in the Financial Memorandum, which was developed through consultation with key stakeholders, including Police Scotland. We will continue to work with Police Scotland on implementation and delivery of the Bill’s reforms, and will monitor the actual financial impact.

26. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to respond to concerns raised by witnesses that its decision not to place the provision of appropriate adult services in the Bill could lead to a lack of funding by local authorities already facing significant financial challenges.

The Scottish Government expects that under the Bill, provision of appropriate adults will continue to operate as at present. It is on this basis that we agreed with COSLA that there are likely to be no additional costs for local authorities as a result of the Bill.

We have made a specific commitment to COSLA to review the impact of the Bill in relation to vulnerable adults after implementation. We will examine data collected by the Scottish Appropriate Adult Network and the police, and continue to liaise with key stakeholders including COSLA and Police Scotland in order to identify any financial impact.

PART 2 (CORROBORATION AND STATEMENTS) AND SECTION 70 (GUILTY VERDICT)

27. The majority of Committee Members are of the view that the case has not been made for abolishing the general requirement for corroboration and recommend that the Scottish Government consider removing the provisions from the Bill.

The Government notes the view of the majority of the Committee, but it remains convinced that the case for abolition of the corroboration requirement has been made. It agrees with the opinion of a minority of Committee Members, as expressed in paragraph 413 of the Report, that:

“access to justice will be improved by such a reform, in particular, for victims of crimes which often occur in private.”

The extensive public debate since Lord Carloway reported in 2011 has exposed a system that simply does not operate as we would wish for victims in whole categories of crime. It does not adequately respond to crimes committed in private.

The Government has a duty to provide an effective justice system for all citizens, both victims and accused.

The Committee’s Report recognises the need to ensure that our system features appropriate protections for suspects at the same time as addressing the well-known problems in prosecuting sexual offending and other crimes typically committed in private. The Government would in particular highlight two of the Report’s observations in paragraph 412 of the Report. Firstly, the need to ensure:

“that the system as a whole is properly balanced and gives due weight to the interests of those facing criminal allegations, complainers and society”

And secondly, that we must:

“improve ‘access to justice’ in a meaningful way for victims of crimes, such as rape and domestic abuse, which are often difficult to successfully prosecute”.

Both of these statements accord with the principles of the Criminal Justice Bill, which seeks to deliver the rights of victims of crime as well as enhancing the rights of accused persons.

Substantial evidence on the cases affected by the requirement was presented by those responsible for investigating and prosecuting crime. The research assessments undertaken for the Carloway Report and for the Bill’s Financial Memorandum were made by prosecutors and police officers: the professionals responsible for investigating and assessing cases on a day to day basis. Their research consistently indicates that a substantial number of cases do not proceed to court because of the technical corroboration rule: cases which would progress in other jurisdictions. The Government considers that it is not acceptable in a modern society to have victims across whole categories of crime denied access to justice.

The Government considers that sufficient evidence has been presented for Parliament to make a decision on the principle of removing the requirement for corroboration, and that the case has been made for abolishing the requirement for corroboration.

28. The Committee is convinced that, if the general requirement for corroboration continues to be considered, this should only occur following an independent review of what other reforms may be needed to ensure that the criminal justice system as a whole contains appropriate checks and balances.

The Government has listened to the evidence presented and the views expressed to the Committee. It accepts that many of the issues aired and identified in the Committee’s Report are based on genuine concern about the future operation of our system following abolition of the corroboration requirement. There is universal agreement on the need to ensure any new system does not increase the risk of wrongful conviction. The Government’s aim is to move Scottish criminal justice to a system where prosecutions proceed based upon the overall quality of evidence in a case, not on whether or not a narrow, technical, rule has been complied with.

It was in recognition of the concerns expressed to the Committee that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice asked Lord Bonomy to conduct a further review, the terms of which were set out in his letter to the Committee of 5 February.

The Government, along with many others, is convinced that the case for abolition has been made and that Parliament should vote this year on the overall principle. As a consequence, the provisions removing the requirement will remain in the Criminal Justice Bill for Parliament to consider this year.

However, abolition of the requirement should only occur once Lord Bonomy’s Reference Group has reported and Parliament has a full opportunity to deliberate upon its findings. As the Cabinet Secretary for Justice acknowledged in his evidence session on 14 January, there is a need to take time to ensure that we have the right landscape for the future without the corroboration requirement. Lord Bonomy will fulfil that role in considering areas of criminal law and practice where reforms may be required.

29. The majority of Committee Members do not believe, in the event that the requirement for corroboration is abolished, that concerns relating to the need for further reform can be adequately explored during the passage of the Bill. The Cabinet Secretary’s proposal that the commencement of the provisions abolishing the requirement for corroboration be subject to a parliamentary procedure requires further explanation and consideration, which the Committee requires before Stage 2.

The Government expects Lord Bonomy’s Reference Group to take a year to recommend any reforms it considers necessary. It will proceed on the basic principle that criminal cases should be assessed on the overall quality of evidence. It will carefully assess the overall balance of our system once the corroboration requirement is to be removed, looking at any additional safeguards and changes to law and practice thought necessary to maintain a fair, effective and efficient system.
The Government is convinced that this process will answer and address the concerns aired around abolition of the corroboration requirement.

The Cabinet Secretary made clear in his letter of 4 February that commencement of the corroboration reform will not occur until any legislation proposed in light of the Bonomy review is approved by the Scottish Parliament. Parliament will be afforded a full opportunity to ensure that it is satisfied that the new system will be in balance and that it will not increase the risk of wrongful convictions. To that end, the Government intends to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to specify that commencement of section 57 of the Bill will not occur until Parliament has approved any such reforms.

The Government will discuss the details of procedure with Parliamentary authorities, but the intention is for a draft order based on the Reference Group’s recommendations to be published and consulted upon, with ample time allowed for Committee evidence-taking. The Order would then be amended following the results of this consultation and evidence gathering process and laid in final form for the usual Parliamentary scrutiny under affirmative procedure. The intention is that this would have to be passed before the provisions abolishing the requirement could be commenced. The Government is confident that arrangements can be agreed to permit full Parliamentary scrutiny and legislation passed by the end of 2015.

30. The Cabinet Secretary’s letter dated 4 February 2014 came in the late stages of consideration of this report, and therefore cannot form part of this report. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide, prior to the Stage 1 debate, further information on any review of additional safeguards (including the proposed remit, who might be involved, likely timescales and options for implementing recommendations).

31. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide more information on how any requirement for supporting evidence would differ from the current need for corroboration.

The Government has made it clear that no person should be convicted on one source of evidence alone (however reliable and credible it may be). All parties agree that something more is necessary, and the Government wants to move to a quality based system.

In the Government’s view, a court should be free to look at all relevant surrounding circumstances, considering all the admissible evidence, in deciding whether it is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that a crime has been committed, and that the accused committed the crime. This approach would usually include, but not be limited to, cases that meet the current rules of corroboration. Such an approach would also allow cases like the real cases submitted by the Crown Office in its written evidence to the Committee (which could not proceed under the rules of corroboration) to be taken forward.

However, the whole area of sufficiency of evidence will be considered in depth by Lord Bonomy’s Reference Group. The Government looks forward to the outcome of those considerations.
32. The Committee also notes the Cabinet Secretary’s willingness to consider placing a revised “prosecutorial test” on the face of legislation. The Committee accepts that such a step might form part of new checks and balances in response to the proposed abolition of the requirement for corroboration, but recommends that the matter should be included for full consideration in any review process.

The Committee’s position is noted. Lord Bonomy’s Reference Group is indeed expected to consider whether any proposed prosecutorial test (or a requirement for publication of any such test) should be prescribed in legislation.

33. The Committee is fully aware of continuing concerns relating to how the justice system responds to cases of rape, domestic abuse and other offences which often happen in private. Members note ongoing efforts to improve the situation for victims of such offences and agree that further steps need to be taken, including measures aimed at addressing low prosecution and conviction rates.

The Committee’s position is noted.

34. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to actively review all evidence relating to how improvements with regard to offences such as rape and domestic abuse may be achieved. This should include consideration of public attitudes as well as the justice system. In relation to the latter, all stages must be included, from initial contact with the police to the giving of evidence in court (e.g. whether victims of such offences should have access to legal advice and support where their personal or medical details may be revealed in court).

The Government notes the Committee’s comments. It agrees that there are many concerns on this issue and many strands of work. A range of activity is underway and further detail can be provided if wished by the Committee. However, none of these initiatives address the problem identified in our system of a rule that prevents many cases of rape, sexual assault and domestic abuse from making it to court. Abolition of the corroboration requirement is not by itself the answer to difficulties inherent in pursuing offences such as rape and domestic abuse. But it is a key element in allowing such cases to make it to prosecutors and to our courts.

35. The Committee agrees that, if the requirement for corroboration is abolished, it should not apply retrospectively.

The Committee’s position is noted.

36. On balance, the Committee considers that there is a case for a review of the role of hearsay evidence in the criminal justice system but that this should be included in any wider review of the law of evidence.

The Committee’s position is noted.

PART 3 SOLEMN PROCEDURE

37. On balance, the Committee accepts the need to extend the pre-trial time limits as proposed in the Bill. However, we do have some reservations as to whether the proposal to extend the current 110 day limit within which the trial of an accused person held in custody must commence to 140 days is proportionate. We are therefore pleased that the Scottish Government plans to monitor the implementation of this proposal, in particular to ensure that trials are started as soon as possible and that any extensions to the 140 day limit are rare. We seek updates from the Scottish Government on any findings and outcomes arising from its monitoring of implementation of this pre-trial limit.

The Scottish Government will be setting up monitoring arrangements with justice organisations and will ensure that the Committee is kept updated on the outcome of this process.

38. While the Committee considers that achieving effective communication must, at least in part, be dependent upon the availability of adequate resources (discussed further below), we are persuaded of the potential benefits of this measure, in particular, in reducing the possibility of victims and witnesses having to attend court when their cases are not ready to proceed.

39. The Committee supports the proposals in the Bill for statutory communication between the prosecution and defence to take place after the indictment is served and for there to be flexibility in the method of communication to be used.

The Scottish Government welcomes the support of the Committee on the solemn procedures provisions of the Bill.

40. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to work with the COPFS and the Law Society of Scotland in seeking to resolve current difficulties in rolling out the secure email system to all defence solicitors, with a view to resolving such difficulties by the time the Bill comes into force.

The principle of effective communication is an integral part of the reforms to solemn procedure. We understand that COPFS are currently reviewing communication methods with defence agents with the aim of further improving the exchange of information necessary to allow the most efficient resolution of cases. COPFS have advised that they are working with defence solicitors locally to explain the revised processes they are putting in place and detail the benefits of using the secure email system. The secure email system is appropriately a matter for COPFS but we will seek updates on how this work is progressing. The Scottish Government is content to be part of any discussions between COPFS and the Law Society on any difficulties in rolling out the secure email system, if they so wish.

41. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to review whether the Bill could usefully be amended to allow individual written records on the state of preparedness of cases to be submitted by the defence and prosecution.

The Scottish Government notes the Committee’s comments.

42. The Committee agrees with witnesses that both the prosecution and defence solicitors must be adequately resourced for the duty to communicate to work effectively as planned. We note that the Scottish Government has worked with criminal justice partners to anticipate the costs and savings that may arise from this proposal, but we recommend that the Scottish Government closely monitors the resource implications during implementation to ensure that resources are in place where and when needed.

The Scottish Government has undertaken to monitor the actual impact of the Bill as part of our ongoing management of the implementation of the Bill, and will maintain discussions with delivery bodies. If it becomes clear that there are additional financial costs as a result of the Bill, that will be considered in future funding discussions. The Scottish Government will ensure that delivery bodies have adequate resources to implement these reforms.

43. The Committee notes that the Bill does not impose any sanctions if the written record is not submitted timeously.

The Scottish Government notes the Committee’s comments. As the Justice Committee will be aware, Sheriff Principal Bowen in giving evidence to the Committee indicated that he had given serious consideration to this issue but concluded that it was “virtually impossible to come up with an appropriate sanction”. Parties will be well aware of their professional obligations and it is for sheriffs to determine how to deal with those who do not comply.

44. The Committee agrees that the proposal in the Bill for a trial only to be scheduled once the sheriff dealing with the first diet is satisfied that the case is ready to proceed will reduce inconvenience to witnesses, and give certainty to both the prosecution and defence regarding the date of the trial.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support in this regard.

PART 4 SENTENCING

45. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s continued focus on knife crime and its efforts to change the culture of carrying knives. The Committee is content with the increase in maximum sentences for offences relating to the possession of a knife or offensive weapon from four to five years.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support in this matter.

46. The Committee welcomes the provisions in sections 72 and 73 on sentencing offenders on early release.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support in this matter.

PART 5 APPEALS AND SCCRC

47. The Committee welcomes the policy objective to speed up appeals and understands that there are practical reasons why appeals ought to be lodged timeously. We note the concerns that, in applying a higher test for allowing late appeals, cases with merit may not be heard unless they meet an exceptional circumstances test. We ask the Scottish Government to consider the Law Society of Scotland’s recommendation that sections 76 and 77 be redrafted with an emphasis on the interests of justice. The Committee also notes that Lord Carloway made other recommendations in relation to the speeding up of appeals.
The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support for the policy objective of speeding up appeals.

The Scottish Government proposes that when deciding whether to allow an appeal late the test that the High Court should apply is to ask itself whether there are exceptional circumstances for doing so.

The alternative suggestion of an “interests of justice” test would fail to get across that it is only exceptionally that an appeal should be allowed to proceed in breach of the time limits. The High Court is already insisting that there must be exceptional circumstances before it will allow an appeal to proceed late (see eg. Toal v Her Majesty’s Advocate [2012] HCJAC 123, para [117]; Duncan v Her Majesty’s Advocate [2013] HCJAC 2012, para 6). The provisions as drafted support the Court’s approach to late appeals.

48. The Committee welcomes the removal of the gate-keeping role of the High Court when dealing with referrals from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC).

The Scottish Government notes the Committee’s position in this regard.

49. However, we are concerned that the Bill retains the High Court’s interests of justice test, albeit during the determination of an appeal resulting from a referral from the SCCRC. Given that, according to Lord Carloway, despite the occasional lapse, the SCCRC has been a “conspicuous success in discharging its duties conscientiously and responsibly”, we are not convinced that the arguments for the High Court replicating the duties of the SCCRC in this respect have been made. Consequently, we recommend that the High Court should only be able to rule on whether there has been a miscarriage of justice in these cases, and if there has been, the appeal should be allowed.

In looking at this area, it is important to assess the wider role of the SCCRC and the High Court in the area of miscarriages of justice.

It is appropriate that the SCCRC is required to consider interests of justice when deciding whether to refer a case to the High Court for a further appeal. This is because the type of case the SCCRC investigates can often give rise to wider considerations than emerge through cases taken on appeal at first instance. This can be due to, for example, the passage of time or changes in the law since a case was originally considered by the court. This Bill does not change the SCCRC’s responsibility to consider interests of justice.

The SCCRC has an important role as part of the checks and balances within our justice system. However, the SCCRC is, and always has been, a review body rather than a decision body. It is the High Court that makes the decision as to whether a miscarriage of justice has occurred in any given case.

The Scottish Government considers it is appropriate that the High Court, as the decision maker, should be able to consider interests of justice as part of the test they apply for cases originating from a SCCRC reference, given:

- considerations of interests of justice are accepted as often being relevant in SCCRC referred cases,
- the SCCRC itself has to consider interests of justice, and
• the High Court has a fundamental constitutional role as final decision maker with Scotland’s criminal justice system.

MISCELLANEOUS

50. The Committee welcomes the two aggravations with regard to people trafficking proposed in the Bill. The Committee requests that the Scottish Government keeps it updated on progress with the Modern Slavery Bill and its extension to cover Scotland.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support for the statutory people trafficking aggravations contained in the Bill. Any proposal for the UK Modern Slavery Bill to cover devolved matters in Scotland would, of course, be subject to the approval of the Scottish Parliament and as progress is made on this matter the Scottish Government will update the Committee.

51. The Committee welcomes the establishment of a separate Police Negotiating Board for Scotland which will include participation from all ranks of police officers.

The Scottish Government welcomes the Committee’s support for the establishment of the PNBS.

52. The Committee supports the general principles of the Bill. However, this is with the exception of proposals regarding the corroboration provisions. Our recommendations on this issue are set out in the main body of this report.
MAXIMUM DETENTION PERIOD

The following are anonymised examples provided by Police Scotland where the suspect could not be released back into the community without an extension beyond the 12 hour threshold.

1. MURDER

The deceased and male suspect met up and began drinking early in the morning. They made their way to a secluded wooded area where they continued to drink alcohol and met a further suspect. One of the suspects encouraged the other to assault the deceased. The deceased was injured and left lying at locus by both suspects.

The suspects returned in the early hours of the following day having continued to drink in each other’s company. They both found the deceased injured at locus and repeatedly assaulted him again, resulting in his death.

The deceased’s body was found several hours later and the Major Investigation Team (MIT) took up the investigation. Both suspects were identified and one detained later the same day. The suspect was still heavily under the influence of alcohol and removed to police station where the SARF process (Solicitor Access Recording form) was completed. The suspect underwent a full medical examination and also had injuries photographed. Given injuries found by the police casualty surgeon, it was recommended that the suspect be afforded an appropriate adult for support during any interview.

The Senior Investigating Officer (SIO) took the decision not to interview at that time given that it was now in the early hours of the following day and to allow the suspect to get a proper rest before being interviewed.

The investigating officers had also undertaken an extended tour of duty over a 24 hour period and were also in need of a rest before interviewing the suspect. The detention period was reviewed and extension beyond the 12 hour period agreed.

The following afternoon the suspect was interviewed by officers who had been fully briefed by the SIO and an Interview Advisor. Admissions were made which identified a further locus which was examined and forensic evidence recovered. The interview last for 4 hours and 20 minutes and the suspect was charged with murder.

Without the ability to extend beyond the 12 hour mark, any interview with the suspect would have been seriously questioned at court given their emotional state due to fatigue, alcohol consumption and vulnerability given the police casualty surgeon recommendation for an appropriate adult to be appointed. There was also the potential for evidence to have been missed due to the fatigue of the investigating officers and matters having to be rushed to interview the suspect within a 12 hour window. The SIO decision to allow the suspect and his interview team time to recover before interviewing was not only considered best practice and in the public interest, but also in fairness to the suspect.
2. REPORT OF MALE IN POSSESSION OF A HANDGUN

An initial report was made to the Police that a male was observed in the street in possession of what appeared to be a handgun. A firearms operation commenced and the accused was ultimately traced and detained but not in possession of any weapon. A search by officers near to the locus of his detention resulted in the recovery of an imitation handgun.

The male was found to be extremely drunk and volatile on being detained. On returning to the police station he was afforded his rights as per the SARF procedure, however when the Police attempted to facilitate his initial telephone consultation the accused became aggressive, threatening to smash the phone. It was apparent at this point that the accused would require a significant period before he was sober and compliant enough to have his rights as a detained person facilitated. He was also assessed by the police casualty surgeon who supported the custody supervisor’s assessment the male was unfit for interview and would require several hours to sober up.

In the interim period further investigations revealed the suspect had been in the company of a number of persons, who would have seen the weapon in his possession. The extension period allowed these witnesses to be sought and further CCTV evidence from nearby business premises to be sought.

As there was not a sufficiency of evidence to arrest the suspect, coupled with his drunken and aggressive demeanour the decision to extend his detention period beyond the 12 hour limit was proportionate and necessary to complete all available lines of enquiry in order to serve the public interest. The male was interviewed regarding the matter on being deemed fit for interview later the following day. He was subsequently arrested and charged with a Breach of the Peace.

3. RAPE OF 16 YEAR OLD FEMALE

Two males were detained in rural Scotland prior to midnight for the rape of a 16 year old who was known to one of them. The victim was forensically and medically examined by a police casualty surgeon at the nearest medical suite. She was only able to provide a partial statement to a Sexual Offences Liaison Officer (SOLO) trained officer due to the time of night and her traumatic experience. The journey between her home and the police medical suite took approximately 1 hour and 30 minutes.

The locus was stood by for examination until the next day during daylight hours as the circumstances indicated that there may be forensic opportunities on the bed clothes and which is viewed as best practice. A number of witnesses had also to be traced during the detention period in order to corroborate the victim’s statement. Both suspects had to be removed to another police station to be examined by a Police Casualty Surgeon (PCS). The return journey between the detention office and examination suite is a round trip of approximately 2 hours notwithstanding the time necessary to complete the suspect’s medical examinations.

It was necessary to extend the detention period beyond the 12 hour threshold to allow further enquiries to be concluded and ensure the safety of the victim. Both suspects were interviewed once the victim had completed her statement the following day and the other witnesses had been traced. A full forensic examination was also completed under the guidance of a Crime Scene Manager (CSM). Both males were subsequently arrested and charged with rape.

Without extending the detention period enquiries could not have been properly concluded and as a result both accused would have had to be released.

The community impact assessment was such that the victim and witnesses were considered potentially at risk if the suspects had been released. In addition the suspects could also have been at risk given the crime under investigation from reprisals. As a result this would not have been suitable for Investigative Liberation.

4. DOMESTIC ASSAULT - RAPE

There was considerable history of domestic violence between the victim and suspect with the former at considerable risk from the suspect had officers not been able to conclude all diligent and necessary enquiries. The victim and suspect were in a relationship residing together at the locus. Both had consumed alcohol throughout the day at home.

The victim was woken by the suspect in their bed who then raped her. Afterwards she went downstairs and phoned the Police. On police arrival, in addition to being visibly distressed, the victim was found to be under the influence of alcohol.

The suspect was detained and the locus secured and arrangements for forensic examination instigated with the assistance of a Crime Scene Manager (CSM), Forensic Services and a biologist. A forensic medical examination took place of the complainer at Archway while additional enquiries such as door to door, forensic examination of locus, etc., were undertaken.

The victim was still clearly distressed and suffering from fatigue and the effects of alcohol in her system. The victim also requested that she be allowed to rest between her forensic examination and her statement being noted. The suspect was also under the effects of alcohol and police casualty surgeon opined that he was unfit to be interviewed at that time. As such the decision to extend the detention period beyond the 12 hour threshold was made. Without this ability to extend there would have been insufficient time to complete the necessary police enquiries with the victim and attempts to trace other potential witnesses. The suspect also required to sober up prior to interview and completion of the Solicitor Access process.

Investigative Liberation would have been unsuitable in these circumstances given the gravity of the crime and relationship of those involved.

The victim subsequently provided a full statement to the police allowing the suspect to be interviewed once deemed fit by a police casualty surgeon. He was subsequently interviewed and charged with rape having been arrested.

5. ABDUCTION AND RAPE

The victim and witnesses were within their home address and had retired to bed at various times over the evening. The following morning the victim heard creaking on the stair outside her bedroom and was confronted by the male suspect who was in possession of a knife. A struggle ensued during which an adult male and his child left their bedroom. All parties were threatened by the accused. The accused cut telephone lines, collected mobile phones and pulled down blinds. A male witness and child were told to stay within their bedrooms or the victims would be killed.

The accused thereafter indecently assaulted and raped a female victim repeatedly before he fled the locus.

Police were called and enquiries commenced. The crime scene was secured for forensic examination by a CSM, assisted by a photographer and Scene of Crime Examiner. The victim underwent a forensic medical examination and provided a statement via a SOLO trained officer. The male and child were also provided with medical assistance and provided statements over what was a prolonged period as the victims of the crime were extremely traumatised and required a period of rest during their interviews.

A male was identified as a possible suspect and a warrant sought and granted to search his home address. During this search distinctive clothing was found, believed to belong to the suspect. He was subsequently detained in terms of section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. During his detention period extensive enquiries were still being undertaken at the locus and with the witnesses. An extension was sought beyond the 12 hour threshold to allow sufficient police enquiries to be completed prior to any interview with him. It was necessary to photograph him whilst detained in order to have him formally identified, as at this stage there had been no identification.

Had there have been no opportunity to extend the detention time to allow the identification, and if the accused had made a ‘no comment’ interview, then he would have had to be released for further enquiries to be completed. This case would not have been suitable for Investigative Liberation due to the seriousness of the offence, public safety and reassurance issues and the danger of reprisals in the local community.

The male was subsequently arrested and charged with several offences including abduction and rape. He has since been convicted at Edinburgh High Court receiving a substantial custodial sentence.

6. TRAFFICKING

A property landlord reported a possible cannabis cultivation at one of his city properties. Uniform officers attended at this address as a ‘routine’ call and found 3 foreign national females working as suspect prostitutes. They also found 4 foreign national males (of different nationalities), two of whom were to be later identified to be involved in the trafficking, rape, prostitution of the females.

The detention of 5 persons was extended past 12 hours to allow a proper investigation/ assessment to be carried out, particularly to determine the status of the females involved i.e. if they were victims or suspects. A lack of appropriate interpreters for witness and suspect interviews was largely a contributory factor in the extension, as was allowing the suspects adequate rest time.

During one interpreter-assisted interview, one of the females disclosed that there was another 2 brothels in the city and a pregnant female was possibly being held against her will. Enquires ultimately identified a network of foreign national males who were trafficking European females up and down Britain for prostitution.

The extended detention period allowed the Senior Investigating Officer to thoroughly complete the initial investigation as well as identification of additional victims of trafficking/sexual abuse. If the detention time had been limited the 3 females may well have been arrested for management of a brothel based on the witness testimony and would not have disclosed their trafficking and sexual abuse to the police. As a consequence, the males responsible for the human trafficking offences would have been released and the offences gone undetected.
EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

Vol. 3, No. 83 Session 4

Meeting of the Parliament

Thursday 27 February 2014

Note: (DT) signifies a decision taken at Decision Time.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill) moved S4M-09160—That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

Margaret Mitchell moved amendment S4M-09160.1 to motion S4M-09160—

Insert at end—

“but, in so doing, calls on the Scottish Government to lodge an amendment at stage 2 to remove the provisions abolishing the general requirement for corroboration.”

After debate, the amendment was disagreed to ((DT) by division: For 61, Against 64, Abstentions 1).

The motion was then agreed to ((DT) by division: For 64, Against 5, Abstentions 57).

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Financial Resolution: The Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth (John Swinney) moved S4M-09149—That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in Rule 9.12.3(b) of the Parliament’s Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.

The motion was agreed to (DT).
On resuming—

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): The first item of business this afternoon is a debate on motion S4M-09160, in the name of Kenny MacAskill, on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill): I am delighted to open this stage 1 debate on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. The bill contains a significant package of wide-ranging reforms to our criminal justice system, so I record my appreciation of the time and consideration that the Justice Committee gave it. I also formally record my thanks to the many stakeholders and individuals who gave evidence to the committee.

Today's debate is of course about seeking agreement to the general principles of the bill. There are three general principles that underpin all the progressive reforms that are contained in the proposed legislation. First, the bill will modernise and enhance our justice system and update our procedures from the point of arrest onwards. Human rights are at the heart of the bill. It will ensure that people who are suspected or accused of criminal offences have improved and enhanced rights and protections.

Secondly, the bill makes necessary efficiency changes to our justice system. For example, there are changes to our system of appeals and changes to enable greater use of technology by our courts.

The third but equally fundamental principle is about bringing fairness for those who fall victim to criminal acts and the wider duty to protect our society. That includes providing for greater access to justice for victims by ensuring that cases can go forward based on the overall quality of evidence, and creating a statutory aggravation for offences that are linked to the appalling activity of people trafficking.

I will highlight some of the positive effects that I believe the reforms in the bill will have in meeting those principles. Part 1 sets out a new and modernised power of arrest for the police. It creates a single power of arrest on suspicion of having committed an offence. The current two-tier system of detention and arrest is complex and covers a myriad of powers that are spread across common law and statute. The bill provides for a more streamlined and effective process. The provisions will improve the law and will make it easier for the police to apply and the public to understand. The single power of arrest will also bring the Scottish system more into line with the European convention on human rights.

The bill enhances provisions on a suspect’s right of access to a solicitor, whether or not they are going to be questioned, and it puts the letter of rights on a statutory footing. It also protects the rights of children and vulnerable people. Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People has welcomed the fact that the bill defines a child as someone under 18. Additionally, the bill allows a protected level of self-determination for 16 to 17-year-olds, in recognition of the fact that those young people are, in other circumstances, entitled and able to make their own decisions.

The bill also reflects the fact that modern policing needs modern powers. Today’s investigations are often complex and protracted. In part, that is down to recent developments in technology. Police now regularly have to extensively examine electronic data, which takes time. The bill seeks to balance the needs of the modern investigation and the rights of a suspect to liberty. As part of that, the bill introduces investigative liberation, which will enable the police to continue to investigate incidents while allowing a suspect to be at liberty, with or without conditions.

I am aware of calls by the police to allow for possible extensions, in exceptional cases, to the 12-hour detention limit for keeping people in custody. Extensions are used very rarely but can be essential for the investigation of some of the most serious criminal acts, or, for example, where the suspect is intoxicated. There is a particular issue here about balancing an individual’s right to liberty against the public’s right to be protected. I would like to hear members’ views on the potential for an extension to the 12-hour detention limit in exceptional circumstances.

The bill also includes a number of provisions that will improve the efficient operation of our justice system, reducing unnecessary delays and wasted court time. Efficiency in solemn procedure will be enhanced, for instance by the creation of a duty on the prosecution and the defence to communicate before a trial to ensure that the case is ready to proceed.

As part of the package of reforms, the bill increases the pre-trial time limit from 110 days to 140 days, in line with that for the High Court. I am pleased that the Justice Committee has accepted the need for that change, and I confirm that we will monitor its implementation. In addition, the bill takes forward many of Lord Carloway’s recommendations on ensuring that appeals are handled in a timely manner. It is in everyone’s interests that appeals proceed in good time. That will mean faster resolution for both appellants and victims.

However, the bill’s scope goes beyond the modernisation of practice and extending the rights of suspects, as it also seeks to improve how we as a society respond to criminal behaviour. For example, by increasing the maximum term for handling offensive weapons, we will send a clear message about the consequences of carrying knives on our streets.

The bill also seeks to improve the way in which we pursue criminal cases. The past three years of debate have brought home the obligation on the Government—and indeed the Parliament—to protect all our citizens. We must answer the concerns that have been aired by brave individuals, support groups and campaigners that justice is not being delivered for victims across whole categories of crime. I acknowledge that there are legitimate concerns about how our system will work without the requirement for corroboration. The committee has done its duty in giving the matter full consideration. For my part, I have listened, I have reflected and I have acted. Lord Bonomy will undertake a thorough review of the changes that might be required as a consequence of abolition. He has assembled a veritable powerhouse of expertise on Scots criminal law.

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): What does the Government have to fear from including consideration of whether or not to abolish corroboration in the remit of the Lord Bonomy review?

Kenny MacAskill: I say to Ms Mitchell that I am quite clear that, as I will go on to say, the case for abolition has been made. It has been made and supported by prosecutors and by the police, but it has been made and articulated most effectively by Victim Support Scotland, Scottish Women’s Aid and Rape Crisis Scotland. I stand with and I stand for those organisations.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at the moment.

The work of the distinguished experts in the review will allow us to modernise our system and ensure that it is in balance. I have complete confidence that the review will answer any and all of the legitimate points of concern that have been raised.

To be clear, the corroboration reform will not take effect until any legislation that is introduced in light of the Bonomy review is approved. The Parliament will be afforded a full opportunity to ensure to its satisfaction that the new system will be in balance. To that end, I will lodge amendments at stage 2 to tie abolition to any reforms that are brought in light of Lord Bonomy’s review. We will discuss the exact mechanism with the parliamentary authorities, but at the very least I would expect a draft order to be published and consulted on, with sufficient time for committee evidence taking and a chamber debate. That process would result in an amended order being put to the Parliament.

Patrick Harvie (Glasgow) (Green): Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at the moment.

All of us here share the same goal: a balanced and effective criminal justice system, and one that is safe and secure. Lord Bonomy’s review will give the Parliament an historic opportunity to remake our system. In doing that, we cannot forget the many voices that have raised concerns about the miscarriages of justice that occur now, under our current system. Too many compelling cases—often involving crimes that have been committed in private—cannot even make it to our courts because of this outdated rule.

Alison McInnes: The cabinet secretary, the Lord Advocate and, indeed, Scottish Women’s Aid have all openly admitted that the removal of corroboration will not in itself result in more convictions. Why is the Government proceeding with the proposal and raising false hopes? [Interruption.]

Kenny MacAskill: One of our most distinguished judges said that we cannot have a whole category of victims who are routinely denied access to justice. We cannot have those who suffer rape or domestic offences, those who suffer domestic abuse behind closed doors, those who are young, those who are vulnerable and those who are elderly preyed upon, picked upon and routinely denied access to justice.

Margaret Mitchell: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at the moment.

The voices of brave individuals have been echoed by those of the professionals who see the very personal and devastating impact that the corroboration rule can have in practice—not only our police and prosecutors but groups such as Victim Support Scotland, Rape Crisis Scotland and Scottish Women’s Aid, all of which play such a vital role in supporting the victims of crime. On Wednesday, I visited the Glasgow-based advice, support, safety and information services together project, which does great work to support the victims of domestic abuse.

Patrick Harvie: Will the minister give way?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at the moment.

The difficulties posed by the corroboration rule to the pursuit of individual real cases could not be more apparent. We have heard from Police Scotland that there are more than 3,000 cases every year that it cannot send to prosecutors because of the corroboration rule. Those are cases where there is quality evidence that, in other systems, would merit further consideration.

We cannot refuse to listen. We are talking about not just hundreds but potentially thousands of compelling cases in which people are being denied justice in this country under the current system. Those are not just numbers; real people’s lives are affected.

Patrick Harvie: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Margaret Mitchell: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Kenny MacAskill: After so much debate, we must now act. The bill sends a clear message that Parliament has listened and is acting to address that injustice.

The corroboration reform must stay in the bill. Commencement must wait until Lord Bonomy reports, but there must be no unnecessary delay. The reform must go forward now in this legislation. If members vote to take the provisions out of the bill, they are voting to continue that injustice in Scotland for so many people.

Willie Rennie (Mid Scotland and Fife) (LD): Will the minister give way?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at the moment.

Willie Rennie: Outrageous!

The Presiding Officer: Order, Mr Rennie.

Kenny MacAskill: The extent of that injustice is clear. Research for the Carloway review identified that, in 2010, 268 serious cases were dropped after the initial court appearance—cases in which there would have been a reasonable prospect of successful prosecution. The Lord Advocate has said that there were 170 rape allegations in the past two years where no proceedings were taken because of insufficient evidence. Crown Office research from last year suggested that around 60 per cent of domestic abuse cases—2,210 cases—could have progressed under the new prosecutorial test.

I have listened and I have acted on the legitimate concerns that have been raised.

Willie Rennie: Will the minister give way?

Kenny MacAskill: I now ask Parliament to listen to the voices of those representing some of the most vulnerable people in our society and to support the general principles of the bill in its entirety. I repeat that abolition will not occur until Parliament has approved any additional reforms brought forward in light of Lord Bonomy’s review. With that assurance, I invite Parliament to approve the new guiding principle for our system—that cases in future will go forward based on the overall quality of evidence.

Willie Rennie: Will the minister give way now?

The Presiding Officer: The minister is in his final minute.

Kenny MacAskill: We need to set that important principle now and move discussion on to how to ensure a modern, efficient and fair justice system that is fit for 21st century Scotland.

The bill contains many important reforms. I look forward to a constructive debate.

I move,

That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

14:44

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): I thank the numerous witnesses who gave evidence and the Justice Committee clerks for their work in helping committee members to compile the stage 1 report on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I also pay tribute to the convener of the committee and my fellow committee members for their efforts and for the spirit in which that powerful and compelling report was produced.

The bill will implement recommendations that were made in two separate expert reviews: those from Sheriff Principal Bowen, on sheriff and jury procedure, and those from Lord Carloway, on criminal law and practice. The Carloway review was set up in the wake of the Cadder case, which resulted in the provision that suspects have the right to legal representation when they are detained for questioning by the police.

Part 3 of the bill, on solemn procedure, was welcomed by the committee. It includes the proposal to introduce meetings between prosecutors and the defence and others to reduce unnecessary delays in criminal trials.

Part 1 contains provisions on arrest and custody. In attempting to simplify powers of arrest, there is a real danger that the proposed changes have instead done little more than confuse the situation. For example, at present the general public realise that, when a suspect has been detained for questioning, they have not been charged, and the presumption of innocence is still very much evident. I believe that, by changing the term to “arrest”, the public perception will be that the person is, to use the cabinet secretary’s phraseology, “officially accused”.

Indeed, the cabinet secretary’s response to the report and the introduction of terms such as “officially accused” and “not officially accused” do little to allay those fears. In giving evidence, the cabinet secretary also introduced the somewhat unhelpful term “de-arrest”, and said that he would bring forward a provision on that in an amendment at stage 2. I am glad that he has decided to drop that rather ridiculous wording.

The cabinet secretary’s deafness to the justified concerns about part 2 of the bill and the provision in section 57 to abolish the general requirement for corroboration has caused a storm of controversy. He has consistently attempted to misrepresent and polarise the debate, with victims on one side and the legal profession on the other. That is not only a complete distortion; it insults all those who oppose that move, including those who signed my amendment.

I do not doubt the cabinet secretary’s concern for victims; equally, I do not doubt the concern of leading judges, the Law Society of Scotland, the Faculty of Advocates, the Scottish Human Rights Commission and the cross-party group on adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse. All those organisations oppose section 57 not because they have an axe to grind but because they do not believe that it would be in the interests of the criminal justice system or victims of crime.

Kenny MacAskill: Margaret Mitchell missed out the police and prosecutors. Do they not have a say?

Margaret Mitchell: I listed the people who have expressed their opposition. As the cabinet secretary knows, for one reason or another the police gave very confused views and changed their position during the evidence sessions.

The views of those who have expertise and in-depth practical experience of the operation of the criminal justice system cannot and should not be dismissed, but the cabinet secretary has attempted to do that with well-rehearsed assertions, including the assertion that corroboration is archaic. In fact, as Lord Gill eloquently explained when he gave evidence to the Justice Committee,

“The rule of corroboration is not some archaic legal relic from antiquity. We did not get where we are by accident. The fact that our law has this rule—a rule that I regard as one of its finest features—is the result of centuries of legal development, legal thought and the views of legal writers, politicians and practitioners down through the ages. It has been found to be a good rule. I simply ask the committee to listen to the wisdom of the ages—it has a lot to tell us.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3730.]

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): Will the member give way?

Margaret Mitchell: Not just now.
Furthermore, a key part of the Government’s argument for abolition of the requirement is that access to justice will be improved, especially for the victims of interpersonal crimes, such as rape and domestic abuse.

Kenny MacAskill: Will the member take an intervention?

Margaret Mitchell: I want to make some progress.

More prosecutions does not mean more convictions, and there is nothing just in putting victims through the ordeal of gruelling interrogation by the defence when, under the Government’s proposal, their evidence could be the only source available and they would just end up seeing the accused acquitted.

Corroboration is not an overly onerous requirement, particularly in the light of the increasing availability of closed-circuit television and DNA evidence.

Kenny MacAskill: Will the member take an intervention on that point?

Margaret Mitchell: No, I am sorry—I must make progress.

Furthermore, corroboration does not require each and every single fact to be backed up with additional evidence. The rule applies only to the essential facts of a case: namely, that a crime was committed, and that the accused committed it.

Kenny MacAskill: Will the member take an intervention on that point?

Margaret Mitchell: In that regard, there is a definite need to look at how the Crown applies the requirement and whether the belt-and-braces approach, in which every fact is corroborated, is necessary or whether it is preventing cases in which there is a realistic prospect of conviction from going to trial.

Kevin Stewart (Aberdeen Central) (SNP): Will Mrs Mitchell give way?

Margaret Mitchell: Not just now, Mr Stewart—I may be able to give way as I progress with my speech.

In the meantime, the introduction of independent legal representation for rape victims to help to stop the use of irrelevant prejudicial information in court has the potential to make a difference in tackling the low conviction rates for rape.

As the legitimate arguments against abolition have mounted, the cabinet secretary’s handling of the issue has not been his finest hour. In one evidence session he contradicted himself, first telling the committee that the abolition of the general requirement could not be removed from the bill as it must be implemented immediately to give access to justice for victims of rape and domestic abuse, but then stating that it was necessary to take time to get the legislation right.

In general, the cabinet secretary has been on the back foot, and he has reacted to mounting criticism of the section 57 proposal with yet another consultation. Even on the day on which the committee signed off its stage 1 report, the cabinet secretary announced a further review. The membership of the review group, which is to be led by Lord Bonomy, was revealed only two days ago.

As a result of the mishandling of the issue, the Scottish Government is now in the ludicrous position of promising a review after corroboration is abolished. The Carloway review, on which the cabinet secretary has relied, was fundamentally flawed as it looked only at the options of retaining or abolishing corroboration. The third option of retaining corroboration but including it in a wider review of the law of criminal evidence was not considered.

The criminal justice system needs to be examined as a whole. When he was asked directly by Sandra White, Lord Gill told the Justice Committee that the corroboration proposal should be taken out of the bill and examined as a separate entity. He said that that "would not be a way of avoiding the problem; it would be a positive way of getting a better outcome."—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3721.]

I do not believe that the cabinet secretary truly believes that retaining section 57 is the best way to legislate.

Kenny MacAskill: Will the member take an intervention now?

Margaret Mitchell: I will make progress.

The cabinet secretary is asking the Scottish Parliament to pass bad law and to vote to abolish corroboration before we know what system will replace it on a promise that the review, about which little is known, may fix the issue.

The Parliament’s integrity is at stake. The Justice Committee is not convinced by the Scottish Government’s proposal, and the Government should listen. For the Scottish National Party-led committee to take that view should give the cabinet secretary pause for thought, and the fact that the reasoned amendment in my name has been lodged with support from the Opposition parties and independent members John Finnie and Margo MacDonald indicates the strength of feeling among members of the Parliament about the Government’s proposal in section 57. Margo MacDonald has confirmed in no uncertain terms
The bill is, as we know, significant and complex, and covers a wide range of areas, although almost all the proposed reforms have been buried, understandably, by the focus on the reform relating to corroboration. As Margaret Mitchell has already said, the bill broadly implements the recommendations of Lord Carloway's review of Scottish criminal law and practice relating to police powers of arrest, holding suspects in custody, and corroboration; and the recommendations of Sheriff Principal Bowen's independent review of sheriff and jury procedure that was aimed at increasing the efficiency and cost effectiveness of solemn proceedings in the sheriff court.

The bill also introduces new measures on: weapons offences; offenders on early release; appeals; the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission; people trafficking; and a police negotiating board for Scotland. It is a huge bill. That substantive list evidences—some might say corroborates—my earlier point about the depth and width of the bill. It is worth saying at the outset that on most of those matters the committee was in agreement. However, we were unable, as is well known and understood, to reach agreement on the proposal to abolish the mandatory requirement for corroboration. I will address that in due course.

Part 1 of the bill aims to simplify police powers of arrest by removing common law and statutory rules on arrest and detention, and replacing them with a general power of arrest on "reasonable suspicion". The committee agreed that there might be some benefit in simplifying the powers of arrest but, as alluded to by Margaret Mitchell, the term "arrested", when used to refer to someone who has not been charged with an offence, may appear more suggestive of and give the perception of guilt to the public than the term "detained". Terms such as "person not officially accused" for someone who has been arrested bewildered me, and I kept forgetting the definition, as did some other members. We considered some terms, and the idea of "de-arrest", as confusing enough for some committee members, never mind the general public.

I somehow cannot see those terms becoming the stuff of newspaper reports. Accordingly, we were concerned that the reputation of the accused might be detrimentally affected by the provisions in the bill, and we have asked for assurances on that issue. We were all concerned about the no-smoke-without-fire syndrome and trial and conviction by the media.

Prior to the emergency Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, suspects could be detained for a maximum period of six hours. Currently, under the 2010 act, a person can be held in custody for up to 12 hours, with the possibility of an extension to 24 hours. The bill proposes a maximum 12-hour limit without any extension. The cabinet secretary told the committee that he was also considering whether to allow an extension to that period in exceptional circumstances.

We heard a mix of views on that issue. Police witnesses argued that 12 hours might not be sufficient in the most complex of cases, and the Scottish Human Rights Commission told us that six hours would be more proportionate. The committee had mixed views on whether detention beyond six hours was necessary. We have requested examples of exceptional circumstances in which an extension might be granted, particularly as the bill also provides the option of investigative liberation.

What is investigative liberation? It would allow the police to release from custody for a maximum of 28 days and on conditions suspects who have not been charged while the police carry out further investigations into the suspected crime. The committee has asked for assurances that investigative liberation will not have an unnecessary impact on the suspect’s private life, while allowing the police to conduct complex investigations that could not be completed during the person’s initial detention. Witnesses assured us that it would not be used for a fishing expedition for evidence. We also noted that this and other aspects of the bill could have resource implications for the police that would need to be considered.

I come to the subject of corroboration. I make it clear that all committee members wanted more successful prosecutions, particularly for crimes of a sexual nature such as rape. As we understand it, that and other similar offences provided the momentum for reform.

Part 2, which aims to abolish the general requirement for corroboration, has quite rightly proved the most difficult part of the bill for the committee, with strong views on both sides of the debate. I must emphasise the phrase “general requirement”, because although the debate has focused on the crime that I just mentioned, the abolition of the requirement for mandatory corroboration would apply to all crimes for which corroboration is currently a requirement, such as shoplifting and vandalism. I ask members neither to lose sight of that nor to misunderstand—

Ruth Davidson (Glasgow) (Con): Will the member give way?

Christine Grahame: I really cannot respond to the member because I have to keep to the report. I hope that she understands.

Ruth Davidson: I understand that the member is speaking as the committee convener. However, she is also speaking as a member of the class of ‘99 in this chamber. Can she tell a new member like me whether she can recall a time in the history of the Parliament when members were asked to vote for a fundamental change in the law in the knowledge that they would find out only afterwards what they were being asked to change it to? How can she recommend that?

Christine Grahame: That is very naughty of Ms Davidson. I like to have a rammie in a debate as much as anyone else, but I made it plain from the very start that in fairness to all committee members I would be speaking as convener. I will not enter into a discussion on those points—another day, perhaps.

Going back to the general requirement for corroboration, I should not have to say this but I will say it anyway: corroboration does not mean the requirement for an eyewitness other than the alleged victim.

Some witnesses argued that removing the corroboration requirement would achieve access to justice for more victims of crime by allowing more victims of rape, sexual offences and domestic abuse to have their day in court and have their say.

Others argued that corroboration—

Sandra White: Will the member give way?

Christine Grahame: I am coming to my point. The member’s views will be reflected in it.

Others argued that as corroboration was a vital safeguard against wrongful conviction the requirement for corroboration was itself such a safeguard. There were mixed views among committee members and witnesses about what is meant by corroboration; indeed, that mixed view extended to a difficulty in understanding the legal or technical distinction between supporting evidence and corroboration. The Lord Advocate and the cabinet secretary gave some indication that supporting evidence could be required in cases in which corroboration is not available. However, we received limited information on how that might work in practice and have therefore asked the Scottish Government to provide specific information on how any requirement for supporting evidence would differ from the current need for corroboration.

The same issue arose with regard to the meaning of the term access to justice. For some, it meant getting the case to court; for others, it meant getting a successful conviction. That is another problem for the committee. As a result, although all members had serious concerns about the particularly low prosecution and conviction rates for sexual offences, rape and domestic abuse, we could not reach agreement on whether removing such an integral part of the criminal justice system would improve for victims of those crimes access to justice—whatever that means to members—in a meaningful way.

If we read what we actually said—

Alison McInnes: Will the member give way?
Christine Grahame: I have only one minute to read what the committee said about the issue, and it is important to get it on the record.

The committee concluded:

“The Committee is convinced that, if the general requirement for corroboration continues to be considered, this should only occur following an independent review of what other reforms may be needed to ensure that the criminal justice system as a whole contains appropriate checks and balances.

The majority of Committee Members do not believe, in the event that the requirement for corroboration is abolished, that concerns relating to the need for further reform can be adequately explored during the passage of the Bill. The Cabinet Secretary’s proposal that the commencement of the provisions abolishing the requirement for corroboration be subject to a parliamentary procedure requires further explanation and consideration, which the Committee requires before Stage 2.”

Those are the two points that the committee made, and I have tried as fairly as possible—

Alison McInnes: The main conclusion of the committee—

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): Order.

Christine Grahame: I have done it as fairly as possible. I hoped that I could square the circle by saying that the majority of members are not convinced that the requirement for corroboration should be abolished and also by reading out the conclusions to the committee’s report.

I say to the other members of the committee that I hope that I have reflected our feelings about an extremely difficult issue that, I know, splits groups across the Parliament. It splits the Labour Party, it splits the SNP and it splits others. I know that for a fact, but I speak to the committee report.

I look forward to the debate, which, unfortunately, I cannot join.

15:05

Graeme Pearson (South Scotland) (Lab): I commend the convener of the Justice Committee for the fairness with which she has reported its deliberations. I am not a member of the committee, but I believe that she gave a just account of the deliberations that took place on the days on which I attended.

I also commend the committee, the clerks and the witnesses for the work that has been done.

I remind the chamber that the entire bill deserves thought and consideration. There are significant elements in the bill that affect police powers in relation to suspects; solemn procedure, with regard to improvements in the preparation of cases; sentencing, including the provision relating to the possession of knives and maximising sentences to five years; changes to appeal processes; and a number of provisions that deal with trafficking and the use of live television links between prisons and courts. It also includes provisions to establish a police negotiating board, which touches on important considerations around police conditions of service and so on. Those important issues are worthy of consideration.

As we anticipated, this afternoon’s debate has focused on the necessity or otherwise for corroboration in Scots law, but it is important that members do not neglect or lose sight of the other important changes while that consideration is going on.

Corroboration is the headline issue, and is extremely contentious. I come to the issue of corroboration as someone who had no prior conviction about the way forward. From the outset, I was determined to hear the Government’s proposals, listen to the evidence and, thereafter, decide my position.

Kenny MacAskill: Did the member not bear in mind Labour’s manifesto commitment to remove corroboration with regard to rape?

Graeme Pearson: My next sentence will address that, if the cabinet secretary will allow me to get to it.

The Scottish Labour Party’s 2011 manifesto committed us to considering the arguments on corroboration, and I am delivering fully on that commitment today. Following that deliberation, I agree with the Justice Committee’s recommendation regarding corroboration, and I will explain why.

I welcome the very late creation of Lord Bonomy’s reference group, but I note with extreme interest that neither Rape Crisis nor Scottish Women’s Aid is represented on the group. I find that surprising, given the significance that the cabinet secretary attached to the importance of dealing with sex crimes, such as rape, and domestic violence in particular, when demanding the removal of the requirement for corroboration. Lord Bonomy’s group should have been tasked much earlier and should have reported long before now in order to provide MSPs and the public with robust Government proposals in the event of the abolition of the need for corroboration.

The cabinet secretary is in effect asking us to allow him to put his plans out to tender now and to write us a blank cheque, with the promise that we will receive the goods sometime in the future. I would not do that at home, and I will not do it on behalf of victims.

In light of the one-year delay that he anticipates before any empowerment in relation to the abolition of corroboration, it would be prudent for the cabinet secretary to remove that part of the bill that deals with corroboration. That would allow him to bring back a comprehensive and considered proposal at the conclusion of Lord Bonomy’s work and would allow the bill, with its remaining significant issues, to progress. After all, it is important that any changes focus on ensuring that victims and witnesses are provided with every opportunity to deliver their evidence effectively.

The Government should provide whether it will maintain the current system of 15 jurors alongside corroboration and the three verdicts that are the heart of our system, or whether it will move wholesale to an English system in which there will be two verdicts and 12 jurors who will be expected to deliver a unanimous verdict except in exceptional circumstances. Tinkering solely with corroboration and not dealing with the not proven and proven verdicts is short-sighted.

What will the Government propose for post mortem pathology and forensic examinations? Will those continue to require corroboration? What checks and balances will there be for the huge number of summary cases that are dealt with without juries? What is the impact of warning juries in those cases in which there is no corroboration of the essential facts? There is also a need to consolidate legislation, given the volume of changes that have already occurred over the decades and the changes that are now taking place. Will the cabinet secretary consider codifying our law in that respect?

Lord Carloway accepts that, although he had a group involved in the recommendations, he was solely responsible for the recommendation on corroboration. There are alternative views. Justice for the victims of rape and domestic violence requires a cultural change in public attitudes—it cannot be dealt with simply by removing one part of the justice system. Under the proposal, the requirement for corroboration would be abolished for all crimes, not only one-to-one crimes. It would apply, for instance, to trade unionists on a picket line or a youngster who was accused of shoplifting.

Other safeguards that need to be considered include what we would do about dock identifications and allowing judges to dismiss cases in which no reasonable jury could convict. Those matters are not fully dealt with in the bill. In any case, changing the jury verdict requirements as proposed in the bill would be no safeguard in the 96 per cent of cases that are heard without a jury.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Draw to a conclusion, please.

Graeme Pearson: There are several key issues. How will we protect victims, their medical histories and their private lives? How will we defend victims from hostile and inappropriate cross-examinations in the new environment? How will we decide jury verdicts? What will we do with judicial examination, and how will we empower our judges for the future?

I implore the Government to take time to reconsider and allow that part of the bill to be held in abeyance, to be considered in the round in a year’s time when it can come back to the chamber fully considered.

15:13

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): I thank my fellow members of the Justice Committee, the convener, the clerks and everyone who was involved in putting together the stage 1 report.

As members have heard, the committee agreed to support the general principles of the bill. We might have gone further and supported Lord Carloway’s recommendation to abolish the requirement for corroboration but, to my surprise, after months of taking evidence, the majority of the committee chose not to back Lord Carloway’s recommendation at our last meeting at stage 1, when Graeme Pearson joined us to write the conclusions of our report.

I will concentrate on why the minority of committee members, including myself, after listening to months of evidence from judges, prosecutors, the police and victim support organisations, concluded that we must trust our police, prosecutors, judges and juries to deliver equal justice for all. The case has been made and we must move forward, not sit on our hands. We must vote today to support the bill, including the provisions on corroboration.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Did the member change his view on the police approach to the matter when the police themselves changed their view?

Christian Allard: I will come on to that issue.

We all recognise that the situation in which we find ourselves is not of our making. In October 2010, the Cadder ruling started the process to reform our criminal justice system. The cabinet secretary wasted no time in responding, and emergency legislation followed.

In December 2010, Lord Carloway was asked to head a review team. The review process involved a range of evidence gathering, research, analysis and consultation. The consultation process ran from April to June 2011. The Justice Committee considered Lord Carloway’s report, which was followed by more consultations—the Scottish Government carried out two consultations during 2012 and 2013—before the bill came to the committee.

How many more consultations and reports do we need? The evidence is there and it is time to move forward. The justice secretary did not sit on his hands; nor should we.

We took evidence from many in the criminal justice system. In our report, members can read that the Lord President, Lord Gill, agreed that there is a concern to ensure that sexual crime and domestic abuse are properly and effectively prosecuted. He added that he was also concerned that abolishing the requirement for corroboration would result in weak cases with uncorroborated evidence brought forward but, to my disappointment, Lord Gill did not suggest any alternative, except that we should sit on our hands.

We heard that the focus should be on the quality not the quantity of evidence.

Margaret Mitchell: Will the member take an intervention?

Christian Allard: Not just now.

The Lord Advocate has made it clear that, after removing the corroboration rule, supporting evidence will always be sought before criminal cases go to court. The Lord Advocate said:

“I would not—and prosecutors would not—take up a case without any supporting evidence. However, that is different from a legal requirement for corroboration. Of course, when reaching a decision, we would want to look at evidence that supports what the complainer or victim is saying and we would apply the reasonable prospect of success test and look at issues of credibility and reliability.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3736.]

I trust prosecutors, judges and juries to deliver justice for all after we remove that barrier to justice. That barrier is not only for women who are denied access to justice but for victims of other crimes that take place in private. Sitting on our hands is not an option.

I also trust the police who gave evidence. The Scottish Police Federation, the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents and Police Scotland all came to the same conclusion, and they all support the abolition of the requirement for corroboration.

Members might have read that some changed their minds during our consideration of the bill; some even mentioned that fact to us. They changed their minds because, like many others, they looked at the evidence and reached the conclusion that sitting on our hands was not an option.

Others also changed their mind during the process. When I asked the Lord President, on the principle of access to justice, whether abolishing the requirement for corroboration would increase the number of cases that are brought to prosecution, his first answer was no. When I pressed him on his answer, he changed his mind and said that that might increase the number of prosecutions, but that he was not convinced that it would increase the number of convictions. The debate had moved on; indeed, the debate keeps moving on.

I leave it to other members to tell us why victim support organisations—many of which came to give evidence to our committee—are asking us to vote to abolish the requirement for corroboration. The justice secretary has been listening to the voices in the committee and others who came before us who want some safeguards to come with the change. I trust Lord Bonomy’s review on the matter.

Let us give Scotland a criminal justice system fit for the 21st century. The case has been made. Scotland is not on pause. The choice today is not to sit on our hands as the majority of the committee did on the day that we wrote the report’s conclusions. The choice is to vote on the opportunity to move forward and support the bill.

15:19

John Pentland (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): The media attention on the bill has mostly centred on corroboration, and that is clearly the most contentious aspect today.

Along with my Scottish Labour colleagues, I am absolutely committed to tackling the abysmally low level of cases of rape and sexual assault taken to court and successfully prosecuted. The question is how that can best be done.

Kenny MacAskill: The Lord Advocate has stated that, in the past two years, 170 cases could not be brought because of the lack of corroboration. Will Mr Pentland tell me how Labour proposes to address that?

John Pentland: It would help to secure an answer from us if you would allow the review that Lord Bonomy is undertaking to be part of the measures on corroboration when the bill comes before us again. Corroboration should be removed from the bill, we should allow Lord Bonomy to come back with his review, and then we can make a judgment. Do not try to play with words. We are as serious about helping people as you are, cabinet secretary.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): Speak through the chair, please.

John Pentland: The solution must be right, not something that has the appeal of simplicity but fails to address the complexity of the problem.
I sat and listened carefully to a lot of conflicting evidence on the issue. On one hand, we have the legal establishment closing ranks and resisting any change. It has depicted the proposal as an attack on fundamental human rights that would lead to miscarriages of justice. On the other hand, we have the victims who are denied access to justice because their cases, which might otherwise be strong enough to secure convictions, do not meet the strict rules of corroboration.

To address those cases, the Scottish Government wanted to remove corroboration across the board. At first sight, that seemed an attractive solution to me. After all, cases would still need to be proven beyond reasonable doubt and there should be appropriate safeguards, with corroboration continuing to be sought wherever possible.

However, as I considered the pros and cons of removing corroboration, a number of things became clear. One is that the evidence advanced by both sides of the argument is, to say the least, patchy and inconclusive. Comparisons do not compare like with like. Evidence such as that about additional and wrongful convictions varies from speculative to hypothetical, and some of it would not be admissible in court. Indeed, it was admitted that the assertions about the dangers of wrongful conviction were impossible to prove. Although that might not always be an obstacle in politics, it is a serious matter in a legal debate.

The Scottish Government’s majority in the Parliament enables it to bulldoze through reform, but I detected that there were signs of movement in the legal establishment’s position. Lords Cullen and Hamilton conceded that allowing exemptions from the requirement for corroboration in certain cases might be preferable to outright abolition.

With a back-bench rebellion becoming a prospect because the whole legal establishment was against abolition, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice offered a review. People can be forgiven for thinking that that was just an act of tokenism or a ruse to buy off back-bench opposition because he is still determined to push ahead with abolition regardless and he does not anticipate the review causing any significant delay in that.

What the cabinet secretary offers by way of safeguards still leaves a lot to be desired. Although most countries do not require corroboration, they require greater majorities than the 10 out of 15 proposed for Scotland. Most require at least 10 out of 12.

What are the alternatives? We could examine whether the refusal to give evidence could be taken into account when considering a verdict. We could also examine how we define corroboration. Unfortunately, there is no definitive definition. There have been a few definitions and, in practice, it is often a case of considering the precedents for how the principle has been applied.

Over the years, various modifications have been proposed, including evidence of bad character, similar-fact evidence and the Moorov and Howden doctrines, in which there is mutual corroboration between cases based on time, character and circumstance. Moorov is already used in Scots law, but there are issues with its use that could be considered, especially in the context of crimes such as rape and sexual assault. Indeed, its incorporation into general statutory rules was considered by the Scottish Law Commission less than two years ago, but that report was bypassed by the proposal to remove corroboration.

Rather than seek to clarify or extend the concept of corroboration, the cabinet secretary chose to enter the fray with his own alternative—supporting evidence. Some thought that that was corroboration by another name, but attempts to compare the two soon revealed that the concept of supporting evidence also suffers from a lack of clarity.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You must conclude, please.

John Pentland: Far from helping, it muddied the waters. Frankly, the more we look into the debate, the messier it becomes. I do not think that the proposal should be used as a political football and pushed through just to tick a few boxes.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I am afraid that you need to close.

John Pentland: I hope that the suggested amendment will give us the time that is needed to give careful consideration to all the issues and options. We need to get this right, because hundreds of people every year are deprived of justice.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You need to close, please.

John Pentland: To do that, we all need to work together to help find the best solution.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I advise members that we do not have extra time for interventions. If members take interventions—even interventions from the front bench—they must do so within their own time.

15:26

Christina McKelvie (Hamilton, Larkhall and Stonehouse) (SNP): Before I come to the crux of my speech, I commend the cabinet secretary for the new aggravation that relates to human trafficking, which I am sure that all members welcome.
Article 7 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights says:

“All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.”

If a person is raped or subjected to any kind of sexual or domestic abuse, as the law stands in Scotland they will not be treated equally. That assault on basic human rights is not the fault of the police or even of the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, its judges, its QCs or its lawyers. It is the fault of our failure, until now, to alter the legislation so that it can take into account the need to bring to trial the brutal and vicious men—virtually all of them are men—whose idea of a cosy night in is to get drunk, rape their partner and then batter her into unconsciousness before going back down the pub to tell their pals.

I appreciate that that is a stereotypical image, but if members talk to the police or Rape Crisis Scotland, they will—sadly—discover that the model is stereotypical because that is, in fact, usually how it happens. Depressingly, as co-convenor of the cross-party group on men’s violence against women, I see time and again just how accurate that stereotype is. It sounds like cavemen fighting over their spoils. The women, they will say, asked for it or provoked them so much that they had to hit out. They are 21st century cavemen indeed. “I gave her a good doing” is not just the language of cavemen; it is alive and thriving in certain favoured drinking dens across Scotland and—more important—in the private homes of too many women. As George Orwell put it, “All animals”—and perhaps cavemen—“are equal, but some animals are more equal than others.”

In my opinion, Napoleon the pig is well titled.

Deservedly, we see ourselves as a progressive, forward-thinking nation. We have a wealth of history to support us in our ambitions as we continue to push forward towards a fairer and more egalitarian society. I am absolutely astonished at the position that Labour has taken. The Bain principle is alive and well in the Scottish Parliament.

Patrick Harvie rose—

Christina McKelvie: Why is it that some of us seem to be so reluctant to change legislation that is outmoded, lacking in credibility and out of place—much like Labour’s position?

Patrick Harvie rose—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Mr Harvie, the member is not giving way.

Christina McKelvie: Corroboration is a legal principle in Scots law that demands that two different forms of evidence must be in place before a decision is made on whether a case can go to trial. In a rape case, it is necessary to have two forms of evidence that penetration took place, two forms of evidence that there was no consent and that the accused acted with malintent, and two forms of evidence that it was the accused who committed the crime. The complainant has to prove that the accused understood that the act was not consensual. How does she do that? If the accused says, “Oh, she likes it that way,” how can she prove that she did not and does not like it that way?

Ruth Davidson rose—

Christina McKelvie: A legal worker from Scottish Women’s Aid, Louise Johnson—I had a phone call with her yesterday—told me recently:

“It is profoundly shocking and demeaning how women who are victims of sexual or domestic abuse are treated in our courts. For example, a request to look at previous sexual history may help turn up previous offences but it is often used as a way of attacking the victim’s morality.”

She also said:

“It is very rare that if a case gets to court at all it is a single event. There will almost always be a background of coercive, controlling and violent behaviour”.

There is no question but that we need robust evidence to be gathered to put before procurators fiscal so that cases can go to court and have a reasonable chance of a successful outcome, but it is not good enough just to say that there is not enough evidence so the cases should not get to court. Removing the need for corroboration in abuse cases will in no way undermine the demand for that evidence. On the contrary, it will allow women—who have been denied the opportunity to go to court—the chance to get justice and move on with their lives. Many have attempted and committed suicide because they have not had that access to justice. That is an indictment on all of us.

There is a significant number of victims of sexual violence and domestic abuse whose cases do not go to court. In the past two years, that has affected 2,800 cases of domestic abuse and 170 rape cases. The Tories, the Liberals and—astonishingly—the Labour Party might be happy with that, but I will not have that on my conscience. [Interruption.]

John Finnie: Will the member take an intervention?

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order.
Christina McKelvie: This is not some airy-fairy notion of correcting an imbalance. Under the Council of Europe’s Convention on Preventing and Combating Violence against Women and Domestic Violence—the Istanbul convention—the action of preventing and combating such violence is no longer a matter of good will but a legally binding obligation. The steps that the Government has proposed are a moral imperative.

Some Governments, including our own, are implementing at least some elements of the convention, but we must do more. We must implement all its demands, to reduce and ultimately to eliminate the obstacles that limit women’s opportunities to claim their rights in court.

The burden of proof for rape in Scotland is extremely high—the Crown has to prove and corroborate not only that sexual intercourse took place and that the complainer did not consent to it but that the accused knew that the complainer did not consent. The fact that we have always done it in that way is not an adequate reason for continuing the corroboration requirement. We have a duty to victims in Scotland to seek actively to remove—as far as legislation can do so—the barriers that limit access to justice for them. On top of the fear, the shame, the lack of awareness about official procedures and about available assistance, economic dependence and concern for children, women face an additional and unnecessary burden in the judicial process.

Until 1982, women in Scotland could not be raped in a marriage. Equal marriage was agreed to only recently in the Scottish Parliament. Sometimes, we need to be bold in the face of opposition and to do what is morally right to ensure equality and justice. The proposal is morally right, and I ask all my colleagues to search their consciences before pressing their voting buttons at 5 o’clock.

15:32

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD):
The bill contains a number of welcome reforms. There is a clear need to ensure that Scotland’s criminal law and practice comply with the European convention on human rights. At stage 2, we should carefully consider many issues that the committee identified, including investigative liberation, the appropriate detention limit, the use of the term “arrest” and the basis on which all those activities are conducted.

To turn briefly to matters that are not in the bill, I share the belief of children’s charities including Barnardo’s that the Scottish Government has missed an opportunity to raise the age of criminal responsibility from eight to 12. I hope that we can return to that at stage 2.

In the short time that is available to me, I must focus on the part of the bill that has—rightly—attracted the most attention. I am of course talking about section 57, which proposes to scrap the requirement for corroboration.

When Parliament first debated Lord Carloway’s review back in 2011, the justice secretary told us that he wanted to “hear the views of those who disagree in whole or in part” with what “would clearly be a momentous reform.”

He claimed:

“There is no political dogma”.—[Official Report, 1 December 2011; c 4248, c 4246 and c 4249.]

Since then, the justice secretary has been patently partial and has relentlessly pursued only one outcome. He has been unwilling to act as the guardian of the wider justice system. The reasoned pleas of Scotland’s top judges, including the Lord President, and of legal professionals and human rights organisations have been ignored.

The justice secretary cites emotive cases and anecdotal evidence to make his case. I do not doubt that he speaks of genuine grievances and wrongs; I find it insulting when people think—wrongly—that we do not care about those genuine grievances. However, the proposal is a sweeping change that will impact on every criminal case—summary and solemn. Choosing to portray the debate as a contest between some sort of primitive justice system and the blood and tears of victims is disingenuous and misleading, and it devalues the debate.

I agree that we must strive to enable the victims of rape, sexual assault and domestic abuse to secure justice. However, it is because I am entirely sympathetic to their plight that I am concerned about the proposal. In the absence of corroboration, more prosecutions could rest on the credibility of the alleged victim. Victims could increasingly be subjected to the already unbearable cross-examinations that Christina McKelvie talked about. The “He said, she said” scenarios will make juries reluctant to convict.

Also, the Lord Advocate, the justice secretary himself and Rape Crisis Scotland have all openly admitted that they do not believe that the measure will result in more convictions, but simply increasing the number of cases that reach court is not enough; if we do not also endeavour to improve conviction rates, we are offering victims nothing more than false hope. The committee concluded that abolition of the requirement for corroboration will not improve access to meaningful justice, which is why we need a wide-ranging inquisitorial examination of how the entire system can better respond to offences that occur behind closed doors.

I do not defend corroboration because of tradition; it is so much more than tradition. It protects against miscarriages of justice, false accusations, wrongful convictions and the erosion of the presumption of innocence. That pillar of our justice system cannot be removed without making the whole structure unstable. In the absence of checks and balances that are equivalent to those that exist in other jurisdictions, corroboration is central to ensuring that our courts secure the right conclusions through fair means.

After months of meticulously exploring detailed evidence, the Justice Committee concluded that the case has not been made for abolishing the general requirement for corroboration, and recommended its removal from the bill. That is an unequivocal message to the justice secretary. The reasoned amendment that has been lodged by Margaret Mitchell and signed by many of us is further testament to the gravity of what is at stake today.

Having failed to quell fears and disquiet, at the 11th hour the justice secretary has stumbled into the offer of a review. I do not know whether he finally got it or whether that was merely a fig leaf to cover his embarrassment.

The review group in itself demonstrates the scale of the problem. The justice secretary is recklessly urging members to pass legislation that he knows is so defective that it needs a 17-strong panel of distinguished minds to patch things up afterwards. The new dean of the Faculty of Advocates, James Wolffe QC, has described this approach as asking MSPs “to buy a pig in a poke”.

Lord McCluskey condemned placating opponents with “sweeteners” and said that “the interests of justice are not served by awarding sops to one side or another”

That is no way to legislate. Secondary legislation should establish comparatively minor details—it should not define how we prevent miscarriages of justice, or prevent the problems that the bill invites. Despite the justice secretary’s assurances, everyone here should know that an instrument that is subject to affirmative procedure leaves no scope for proper parliamentary scrutiny. In proposing the use of secondary legislation for such a momentous reform, the justice secretary demeans his office and reveals his contempt for Parliament.

The matter is now no longer only about whether we think corroboration should be abolished. It is also about how Parliament is regarded in terms of how seriously we take our role as legislators. I appeal to SNP members from the class of ’99 to think carefully about that.

The existing case for abolishing corroboration is deficient and unsubstantiated in so many respects. In this situation, there can be only one logical next step for the justice secretary: accede to the committee’s recommendations and remove section 57 from the bill, and allow Lord Bonomy’s group to conduct its review completely unfettered, after which Parliament could rightly return to the matter afresh. It is obstinate and absurd to suggest any other course of action.

15:39

Annabelle Ewing (Mid Scotland and Fife) (SNP): I am pleased to have been called to speak in the stage 1 debate on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I refer to my entry in the register of interests, which states that I am a member of the Law Society of Scotland and that I hold a current practising certificate.

The bill that is before us today, like many criminal justice bills that have preceded it, deals with a number of important reforms to the criminal justice system, including corroboration, to which I will return. Key among the other provisions are the sections that deal with arrest and custody. Following the action that was taken as a result of the Cadder judgment, it has been recognised that there is no longer merit in having a discrete power of detention. The bill provides, in effect, that the only general power to take a person into custody is the power of arrest on reasonable suspicion that the person has committed a crime. That is a great step forward.

On custody, the bill will place on a statutory footing a 12-hour time limit, with review after six hours. There are provisions on investigative liberation, which offers an alternative to protracted custody, with safeguards to ensure that conditions are proportionate and necessary.

There are other protections in relation to the rights of suspects in custody. Section 25 provides that a person under 16 “may not consent to being interviewed” by the police “without having a solicitor present”. That is an important provision.

It is right and proper that the bill provides many important safeguards for persons in custody. However, an imperative of any properly functioning criminal justice system is the need to balance the rights of the accused with the rights of victims of crime—[Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I am sorry to stop you, Ms Ewing, but your microphone is picking up the conversation that is going on behind you.

Annabelle Ewing: The need to balance the rights of the accused with the rights of victims of crime is a fundamental principle of our criminal legal system. That brings me to the issue on which I think most members have focused—the proposal to remove from Scots criminal law the general requirement for corroboration.

I speak as a member of the legal profession when I say that the law cannot and should not stand still. We must keep our criminal justice system under review in order to ensure that the balance of rights to which I referred is maintained. In all conscience, I cannot—as a lawyer or as a politician—accept a status quo that denies access to justice to so many people who are, as we have heard, the victims of sexual crimes, domestic abuse and other crimes that are committed in private.

We heard the dreadful statistic that in the past two years 170 cases of rape have had no proceedings taken, because of, inter alia, a lack of corroboration. I will cite an example—

Margaret Mitchell: Will Annabelle Ewing give way?

Annabelle Ewing: I think that I am about to deal with the subject of Margaret Mitchell’s intervention.

In the case of Lee Cyrus, in Perth, there were charges of rape and assault and robbery, but there was no prosecution. I wrote to the Solicitor General for Scotland, whose reply to me is dated 31 December 2013. She said, inter alia:

“Crown Counsel instructed that because of a lack of corroboration there was insufficient evidence to prosecute Lee Cyrus for the crimes reported.”

Graeme Pearson: Will Annabelle Ewing give way?

Annabelle Ewing: I need to make progress.

Scots criminal law is unique among the ECHR states’ law in hanging on to corroboration as a general requirement. We removed the requirement from civil cases some time ago. Moreover, if members ask two or more lawyers to give their precise definition of corroboration, they will get two or more definitions.

The law must evolve. I can think of no more highly regarded representatives of the legal profession than the people who, with others, will form part of Lord Bonomy’s review group. Those people are at the pinnacle of the criminal legal system of Scots law. We can place our confidence in their ability to come up with the appropriate balances and safeguards, which will be subject to the scrutiny of the Parliament.

Graeme Pearson: Will Annabelle Ewing give way?

Annabelle Ewing: I have just over a minute left and I want to use it, I am afraid.

The time to act is now, in the bill, by taking the approach that the cabinet secretary set out clearly again today, so that we can see the full effect of the reform in 2016.

To members who say that parliamentary process is key above all other considerations, I say that the delay that would be created if we took the provision out of the bill would result in our Parliament in effect condoning the denial of access to justice in hundreds, if not thousands, of cases between now and some indeterminate date in the future. It is sad that that appears to be the Labour Party’s position.

That is simply not good enough, if members believe, as I do, that there should be no second-class citizens when it comes to access to justice in Scotland. I urge all fair-minded members to think carefully about what they will do at decision time today. I hope that they will come to the conclusion that the way that has been proposed by the cabinet secretary is the best way forward to ensure that all our citizens have access to justice.

15:45

Rhoda Grant (Highlands and Islands) (Lab): The bill is wide ranging, but I will concentrate on corroboration.

For a number of years, I have been concerned that the requirement for corroboration in cases involving rape and domestic abuse has prevented people from receiving justice. I was therefore delighted when a proposal came forward to remove the need for corroboration. If I am honest, even when a number of people in the justice system and legal profession started to question the policy, I thought that that was simply because of fear of change rather than because of concern about the policy itself. However, as the clamour became louder, I began to become concerned. I was therefore pleased when the cabinet secretary set up a review group to examine the policy and the required safeguards.

Although I want to abolish corroboration for cases whose very nature means that corroboration will be difficult to find, we owe it to victims to do that properly so that it works and gives access to justice for those who are involved. A day in court is just not enough. At the least, it is traumatic, so it has to be followed by a conviction that provides a degree of closure. Surely we all want real justice for victims.

I ask the cabinet secretary to explain in winding up the debate why Rape Crisis and Scottish Women’s Aid have not been included in the review group. Many groups exist to support women who have experienced violence and abuse, but all members will acknowledge that Rape Crisis and Scottish Women’s Aid hold the expertise in that area.

Kenny MacAskill: I am pleased to tell Rhoda Grant that I have spoken to Sandie Barton and have made it clear to her that I will make representations on the issue. The selection of the members of the group is up to Lord Bonomy, but I am happy to advise that I think that he should at least consider engagement with those organisations.

Rhoda Grant: I would be pleased if Lord Bonomy were to include them in the review group. If we are to introduce changes using subordinate legislation, we will not get the full impact of the information that those groups hold and we will not be able to consult them properly on the findings of the review. That is because subordinate legislation does not receive the same scrutiny in Parliament as primary legislation receives, and it does not provide an opportunity for stakeholders to be involved to the same extent.

Therefore, I ask the cabinet secretary to reconsider the proposed removal of the requirement for corroboration, so that he can build consensus and introduce primary legislation on the issue that can be properly scrutinised by the Parliament, that can involve the stakeholders and that we can all unite around.

Sandra White: Will Rhoda Grant take an intervention?

Rhoda Grant: I have taken an intervention, so I am struggling for time.

The review group has been asked to look at evidence that is admissible in court. Currently, in cases regarding violence against women, courts consider evidence that has no bearing whatever on the case; for example, victims have their sexual history examined, which has no bearing on their right to protection under the law. To allow such questioning creates the impression that the victim, having engaged in sexual activity in the past, cannot be raped. Therefore, evidence that involves someone’s sexual history should never be admissible in a court of law.

To be cross-examined in that way is devastating for the victim, who should be protected. It creates a barrier to justice by introducing evidence that should have no bearing whatever on the case, and it is a barrier to victims pursuing their cases. It is also a problem for wider society because it creates gender inequalities and promotes stereotyping. What steps can the cabinet secretary take to stop that practice? Judges continue to allow such lines of questioning. The only discouragement to it is that the judge can allow prosecutors to examine the perpetrator’s history, but no one in the court protects the victim from that type of questioning. The fact that people experience such an ordeal is likely to deter other victims from coming forward in the first place.

Another aspect of so-called evidence that should never be allowed in court is somebody’s medical history. Often, a defence will spend time going over someone’s medical records, and they will often highlight mental health issues. Again, that can be devastating for the victim, and again it has no bearing on the case. Being mentally ill does not mean that it is okay to be raped or abused—in fact, more protection should be afforded to people who are vulnerable. Again, there are wider implications for our society in that mental illness is being stereotyped.

Both of those types of evidence can repeat the abuse that the victim has already experienced. I very much hope that the Bonomy review will deal with those issues and take a clear stance on them.

I also hope that the review will consider what constitutes supporting evidence. Many people do not report rape and abuse immediately, and it is therefore important that behavioural changes and the like are admissible as evidence of a victim’s having suffered trauma. In cases of domestic abuse, the victims often cover up the crimes and believe that they are in some way responsible. Evidence that takes account of that must be admissible in court. I argue that it should be admissible now as corroboration, but the training of the people who operate our justice system is woefully inadequate in this area.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You must conclude.

Rhoda Grant: I have had cases where the court has been used to perpetrate domestic abuse. Surely that is not right. I hope that the cabinet secretary will listen to the Parliament’s concerns, take the opportunity to build consensus and change the justice system to one that protects, rather than abuses, victims.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Once again, I point out that interventions must be taken within the time that members have for their speeches.

15:51

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): I refer to my entry in the register of members’ interests as a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

Although the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is substantial, public attention has tended to concentrate almost exclusively on the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration. The Justice Committee was divided on the matter, and the witnesses who gave evidence to us had very different views. It is clear that many victims of sexual and domestic abuse and, indeed, other crimes, theft in particular, may well be denied access to justice by the rule. Indeed, the now-retired eminent judge Lord Hope, in his Holyrood article, accepted that we have a rule that impedes us in a particular class of case. However, I also take on board the evidence of James Wolfe QC, the new dean of the Faculty of Advocates, who told us that what really counts is access to effective justice.

I note the figures that have been produced in the Carloway report and by the Crown and police to support contentions on the number of additional cases that might proceed if the requirement is abolished, but I also bear in mind Lord Carloway’s point that there are cases that proceed at present but will not proceed under the new test. It would serve no useful purpose to seek to quantify those, but it is as well to be aware of that.

Whatever the increase in the number of cases that might proceed under the new test, no one can say with certainty how many will result in a conviction and what they will do to conviction rates. The Lord Advocate said in evidence:

“the justice system is not about conviction rates”. — [Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3737.]

I agree with the convener that no one should regard appearing in court as a complainer or victim as therapy. In traumatic cases, even lawyers can find the process stressful. Nevertheless, it is at the very least deeply unfortunate to deny individuals the opportunity to obtain justice and the right to tell their story, to be tested before their peers. I also reflect on the comments that the distinguished lawyer Maggie Scott QC—nowLady Scott—made to our committee in 2011, when she said:

“I understand people’s desire to have a day in court—that applies to accused people as well. However, I do not feel that, if there is little likelihood of a conviction, that particularly helps anyone in the process.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 December 2011; c 790.]

I hope that the new prosecutorial test will tackle that, at least in part, with its requirement that there be a reasonable prospect of conviction before proceeding.

The Lord Advocate advised us in evidence that questions of credibility and reliability are not considered against a reasonable prospect of conviction test at the present time. The Crown will have to consider carefully in respect of each case whether it is in the public interest to proceed. The new prosecutorial test will not change that.

Lord Carloway’s original recommendation to abolish the requirement for corroboration with no attempt to rebalance the system by introducing further safeguards has had scant support. The Government recognised that following its first consultation, and it took the view that a second consultation on safeguards was required, but it then proceeded with only one safeguard in the bill—to increase the majority required for a guilty verdict. Like the Faculty of Advocates, the Scottish Human Rights Commission and others, I strongly believe that a judge ought to have the ability to withdraw a case from a jury where he or she forms the view that no reasonable jury could convict on the evidence presented.

Despite the Government’s attempts to engage in discussion about appropriate safeguards, perhaps the strongest call we heard in evidence was for the whole question of the requirement for corroboration to be removed from the bill and considered by the Scottish Law Commission or a similar body.

However, even the Scottish Law Commission can get it wrong, particularly on corroboration. Those of us with very long memories should be aware that, back in 1965, the SLC consulted widely on the abolition of corroboration in personal injury cases only. Subsequently, it changed its mind and recommended the abolition in all civil cases. That recommendation was incorporated in a Government bill. Following a political and legal outcry, the Government of the day agreed to Opposition demands to abolish it for personal injury cases only. The bill was amended and it became law in 1968. It took a further 20 years, following a further SLC report, before it was abolished in civil cases altogether. Some of the concerns about reliance on one smooth-talking but apparently credible witness were heard then, but we have moved on and no one now would seek its return for civil matters. Controversy around corroboration is not new.

The Government has taken on board concerns. I would say that it has listened, reflected and acted on its proposal. I very much welcome Lord Bonomy’s appointment and the wide terms of reference for the group, which I am pleased to say go well beyond those for the Government’s second consultation.

I am pleased that Lord Bonomy will be looking at summary proceedings, under which the vast majority of cases proceed. I am pleased that he will look at whether a formal statutory test for sufficiency, based on supporting evidence and the quality of the evidence, is required. I am pleased that the question of whether a prosecutorial test should be placed in statute will also be considered.
What is absolutely clear is that it is vital that we have in place a system that provides appropriate balances to prevent miscarriages of justice, so that we do not replace one set of injustices with another.

Lord Bonomy needs time to carry out his work and we as a committee in Parliament will need to absorb that work and to consider and scrutinise it before any proposals pass into law. Most of all, we need sufficient time to build a new consensus. I accept that this might be optimistic, but I hope that this time that will include not only the Crown, police and witness groups but legal practitioners, judges and academics, too.

However, the bill is not just about corroboration. I note and agree with the Government’s comments on arrest provisions, particularly on a record of reasons where an arrestee is released before arriving at a police station. I agree with the Government on the time limit for detention. I emphasise that the bill provides a valuable extension of the right of access to a solicitor to all suspects held in custody. I welcome also the Government’s commitment to discuss with relevant stakeholders how post-charge questioning will operate.

We as a committee welcomed the proposed administrative and procedural changes to solemn procedure in the sheriff court, which I think are largely uncontroversial.

This is a substantial bill, which ought now to proceed.

15:57

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): I thank the convener of the Justice Committee for the way in which she has chaired the committee and for her delivery of the report today—it must have been a challenging position for her.

Someone talked early on in the debate about putting party differences aside. Sadly, we have not heard that on either side of the debate. This debate should not be about personalities; it should be about the merits of the case. We should all accept that we can have different views and hold them in good faith.

Having said that, I remain absolutely resolute in my belief that a case has not been made that supports the abolition of corroboration. Corroboration is a fundamental building block of Scots law.

The cabinet secretary said that the group would be balanced and effective.

The group has wide terms of reference, but I am disappointed that the status quo has been ruled out; it seems to me that the Government is limiting the scope of the group, which is not helpful.

Having said that, I think that the group is comprised of very good folk. I am grateful to my colleague Rhoda Grant for raising that. If the group could be broadened to include the likes of Rape Crisis Scotland, it would be all the richer for that.

However, I have some disquiet about the parliamentary process; I do not think that this is how we should transact business.

In the committee, Lord Gill told us:

“If there is a good solid ... case for abolishing corroboration, there should be no need for any safeguards. The moment we say that there have to be safeguards, we are conceding that the change creates a risk of miscarriage of justice, which, in my view, it will.” — [Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3727.]

That is a very powerful source of evidence.

What we heard in evidence from the Scottish Human Rights Commission is that corroboration—

Sandra White: I know that it has mentioned miscarriages of justice, but is there not a miscarriage of justice for victims who cannot get heard at all and cannot get access to justice?

John Finnie: If there is one phrase that has characterised the debate and which has just become meaningless, it is “access to justice”. I want everyone—the accused and victims—to have access to justice. That is very important. Characterising the debate in any other terms is extremely unhelpful.

The Scottish Human Rights Commission told us that corroboration is a form of protection. Other forms of protection are available. I will certainly welcome the Bonomy review and read with interest what it comes up with. However, I stress again that this is not the way in which we should go about business.

Some protections have been offered, but they, of course, relate to solemn procedure, which represents only 10 per cent of the cases that are tried. That makes it clear that the 90 per cent of summary cases do not have those protections. This is a time when we have a record number of police officers and there have been great advances in technology. We have heard about some of the advances. Many advances in technology that are often cited as frustrating police operations actually enhance them, too. I say to my colleague Sandra White that a person can be a victim one day and an accused another day. We want the highest standards to apply for everyone.

It is certainly the case that the failure to prosecute is not always down to corroboration. There is a public interest to be served and the interests of the complainer have to be served. I had some disquiet—I have shared this information with the cabinet secretary—about some of the examples that we were given; there were very emotive cases. We cannot understand the minutiae of a case in two sentences. Some of the representation was less than helpful.

I want to move on to other aspects of the bill. I am not convinced that there is a need to change the terms of detention and arrest. If we do so, arrest should have a definition. That is not only my view; it is a view that is shared with Lord Carloway and the Scottish Human Rights Commission. We have heard about the legal debates that will take place. We can be assured that there will be plenty around that in stated cases, notwithstanding the cabinet secretary’s assurances that the process will be streamlined.

I thought that the suggestion in the Scottish Government’s response that providing a definition would

“jeopardise the employment of ... alternatives to court proceedings”

was very peculiar and strange. The idea that defining “arrest” would somehow impact on the issuing of parking tickets seems to me to be way off the mark. I welcome the word “de-arrest” not being used.

I am delighted that the letter of rights is on a statutory footing. Given what we know about the communication and literacy skills of people who find themselves in custody, it should be read out to people.

I am not convinced about the call for an extension of detention time by the police, and welcome the abolition of the 24 hours. I speak as a former police officer and the reality is that if the police were offered 48 hours’ detention, they would bid to get 72 hours’ detention. Again, I support the Scottish Human Rights Commission’s position that there should be six hours, with extension only in exceptional circumstances and only to facilitate rights under article 6 of the European convention on human rights, on the provision of a lawyer or interpreter.

Depriving someone of their liberty is a very important issue. As has been said, doing so must be based on evidence, not anecdote.

The idea of keeping a child in custody for more than six hours is from the dark ages. We need to look at that and issues to do with the age of criminal responsibility.

We are told in the Scottish Government’s response on the detention provisions that it is “creating a mandatory custody review, performed by a senior officer not directly involved in the investigation”.

Good grief. Is that not happening already? If it is not, it certainly should be.

Investigative liberation cannot be summed up in 10 seconds, but it will be very problematic in rural areas, and I think that there are many challenges to come from that.

I am not convinced that there is a need to change the terms of detention and arrest. If we do so, arrest should have a definition. That is not only my view; it is a view that is shared with Lord Carloway and the Scottish Human Rights Commission. We have heard about the legal debates that will take place. We can be assured that there will be plenty around that in stated cases, notwithstanding the cabinet secretary’s assurances that the process will be streamlined.

I thought that the suggestion in the Scottish Government’s response that providing a definition would

“jeopardise the employment of ... alternatives to court proceedings”

was very peculiar and strange. The idea that defining “arrest” would somehow impact on the issuing of parking tickets seems to me to be way off the mark. I welcome the word “de-arrest” not being used.

I am delighted that the letter of rights is on a statutory footing. Given what we know about the communication and literacy skills of people who find themselves in custody, it should be read out to people.

I am not convinced about the call for an extension of detention time by the police, and welcome the abolition of the 24 hours. I speak as a former police officer and the reality is that if the police were offered 48 hours’ detention, they would bid to get 72 hours’ detention. Again, I support the Scottish Human Rights Commission’s position that there should be six hours, with extension only in exceptional circumstances and only to facilitate rights under article 6 of the European convention on human rights, on the provision of a lawyer or interpreter.

Depriving someone of their liberty is a very important issue. As has been said, doing so must be based on evidence, not anecdote.

The idea of keeping a child in custody for more than six hours is from the dark ages. We need to look at that and issues to do with the age of criminal responsibility.

We are told in the Scottish Government’s response on the detention provisions that it is “creating a mandatory custody review, performed by a senior officer not directly involved in the investigation”.

Good grief. Is that not happening already? If it is not, it certainly should be.

Investigative liberation cannot be summed up in 10 seconds, but it will be very problematic in rural areas, and I think that there are many challenges to come from that.

16:03

Linda Fabiani (East Kilbride) (SNP): Although I have been a member of the Scottish Parliament for a long time, I have never been a member of the Justice Committee or had anything to do with any of the justice portfolios. I am not a lawyer and have never served in the police force or anything like that. Therefore, I come at the issue entirely from a layperson’s view, which is the way in which the vast majority of people in this country come at it.

I will start on the corroboration issue, because that is what all the fuss has been about. I went out of my way to look at the issue, and to try to study and understand it.

It strikes me that an awful lot of nonsense is being talked about the issue, and I have heard some of that this afternoon. It is in the phraseology too: I keep hearing that we are abolishing corroboration, but when I look at what is in the bill, I see that we are actually abolishing the requirement for corroboration that is mandatory to get a case to court.

John Finnie: You talk about needing to explain things in layman’s terms, which is clearly shorthand for what the layman understands. You are just playing about with words.

Linda Fabiani: No, and you should not insult the layman—that is an appalling thing to say. I tell you what: I read the bill and it was fairly straightforward. I understood it, and most people could read the truth if it was given to them.

There is a big difference between saying that the Government is abolishing corroboration and saying that it is abolishing the requirement for corroboration. If there is corroborating evidence, it will be used. It seems to me that the requirement for corroboration is preventing a lot of people from gaining access to justice.

Linda Fabiani: No, and you should not insult the layman—that is an appalling thing to say. I tell you what: I read the bill and it was fairly straightforward. I understood it, and most people could read the truth if it was given to them.

There is a big difference between saying that the Government is abolishing corroboration and saying that it is abolishing the requirement for corroboration. If there is corroborating evidence, it will be used. It seems to me that the requirement for corroboration is preventing a lot of people from gaining access to justice.

I have read many of the differing views that have been expressed. The Lord Advocate, for whom I have huge respect, said:
“We heard a little bit there are other issues that are important to people back here mentioned some of those issues, but we are ignoring an awful lot of other things that are important to people trafficking.

That applies not only in sexual cases. Age Scotland says that “Elder abuse can take place behind closed doors”, which of course it does, and that “sometimes there may be little or no supporting evidence. In many cases this involves ‘hidden harms’ such as mental or emotional abuse, making threats or withholding food or medicine. Changing the corroboration rule for these cases might help to make prosecutions possible.”

As a layperson, that last part sounds like a heck of a good thing to me. I fail to see why there should be a problem, unless we take the terribly old-fashioned view that the law on corroboration is sacrosanct and should not be changed.

Of course the law should be changed when it is no longer fit for purpose, and I do not believe that the law on this particular issue is fit for purpose.

Patrick Harvie: Even if I was to accept that the law should be changed if it is not fit for purpose, should we not know what we are changing it to before we change it?

Linda Fabiani: I will speak again as a layperson. It seems to me that we are looking at doing away with the mandatory need for corroboration before a case can be taken to court and we can have it properly judged by a sheriff, judge or jury. That seems to be fairly straightforward.

As a result of the big argument on corroboration, we are ignoring an awful lot of other things that are in the bill. Rod Campbell raised some of those issues as a lawyer—I do not know if it is all right to call an advocate a lawyer, is it?

Roderick Campbell: Yes, it is okay.

Linda Fabiani: Okay. Well, our advocate at the back here mentioned some of those issues, but there are other issues that are important to people that are not being mentioned. We heard a little bit about people trafficking.

The need to reduce inconvenience for witnesses is a major issue, given the number of people I hear talking about the ridiculous nonsense that sometimes go on when they go to local courts as witnesses or to give evidence. Provisions for witnesses need to be upgraded, and I am glad that the issue is addressed in the bill.

Another issue that has not been mentioned is sentencing. Part 4 of the bill increases the maximum sentences for handling offensive weapons to ensure that courts have appropriate powers to sentence effectively persons who commit possession offences with knives or other offensive weapons.

Not that long ago in Parliament we heard Opposition members screaming at the cabinet secretary that he was not doing anything to stop knife crime and that he was not being hard enough. After successful campaigns to reduce the carrying of knives, we have before us a bill that says that there should be powers to increase the sentence for carrying an offensive weapon. Therefore, that part of the bill is certainly worthy of note.

On child suspects—

The Deputy Presiding Officer (John Scott): You are in your last 10 seconds.

Linda Fabiani: —the fact is that the rights of those under 16 cannot be waived, but 16 and 17-year-olds have a degree of autonomy, so theirs can be waived unless a person is considered vulnerable.

There is an awful lot in the bill, and I have a real worry that some of it—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You must close now, please.

Linda Fabiani: —is being sidelined. Let us not do that.

16:10

Margaret McCulloch (Central Scotland) (Lab): Parliament will divide when we vote later this evening, and when we do many of us will be thinking about the requirement for corroboration and how many changes arising from the bill could shape our criminal justice system for years to come. As we have heard, the bill includes welcome measures on human trafficking and a more efficient appeals process, but its proposals on corroboration are controversial. Corroboration is a central tenet of Scots law. It is a unique and historic feature of our legal system, which those who defend it say prevents miscarriages of justice. Critics, however, say that it is an abnormality and that focusing on the quantity of evidence over quality is a barrier to justice.
Like others, I have concerns about whether the requirement for corroboration prevents victims of particular offences not just from having their day in court but ultimately from getting justice. That case has been made by Scottish Women’s Aid and Rape Crisis Scotland, which are speaking up for women affected by rape, sex crimes and domestic violence.

I stood on a manifesto that sought to give greater emphasis to the rights of victims in our justice system. We said that there should be a charter of victims’ rights, setting out what victims can expect from the law before, during and after their time in court. We said that there should be an independent victims commissioner to defend that charter. We said that it was wrong that rape conviction rates here are among the lowest in the western world, and that we wanted a renewed focus on improving the treatment of victims of rape in the justice system. Crucially, we said that the time has come to review corroboration in rape cases and that we would consider the findings of the Carloway review. We considered the Carloway review recommendations and, while we remain sceptical about blanket changes without corresponding safeguards, we feel that there is still a case for reform.

What does it say about the way in which the bill has been handled when a proposal that has found some measure of support, at least, in the two largest parties in the Parliament is about to go to a knife-edge vote that the Government might lose? What does it say about this Government when it has to announce a last-minute review—potentially a year long—of a bill just weeks before the stage 1 debate but still expects Parliament to vote for it?

Lord Bonomy’s review is undoubtedly welcome, even if many of us believe that its scope is still too limited. Its recommendations could well set out how confidence in the justice system is sustained if the Scottish Parliament does indeed abolish the general rule of corroboration. The review’s findings might well determine the future shape of the Government’s legal reforms. However, we are still being asked to vote on the bill tonight without having any idea of what Lord Bonomy’s conclusions will be, and then deal with the matters of primary importance at a later date through secondary legislation. As James Wolfe, the new dean of the Faculty of Advocates, has said, “It’s a pig in a poke.”

There are people in the chamber with an open mind about the abolition of corroboration in rape cases who will vote this evening to remove the provision from the bill because the Government has failed to get the basics right. The Scottish Government must provide clarity about the implications of abolishing the requirement for corroboration now, not after the stage 1 vote; it must go further by satisfying the Parliament that victims will not just get their day in court, but will be supported through the whole process.

Given the Government’s failure to find consensus, I believe that the section on corroboration should be removed from the bill and that we should return to corroboration when the case on it has been made and we have a thought-through proposal to vote on.

16:14

Gil Paterson (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP): Before I make my main contribution to the debate, I want to put two thoughts to the chamber—I, too, speak as a layperson and not as a lawyer. First, corroboration has been in place in Scotland for centuries and those who support it claim that it is essential for preventing miscarriages of justice, so why has no other country adopted it? Secondly, are all those who defend corroboration saying to other jurisdictions that do not use this practice that their jails are filled with innocent people?

John Finnie: Will the member give way?

Gil Paterson: I apologise to John Finnie and, indeed, the rest of the chamber but although I would like to take an intervention I really want to finish this speech. To be quite honest, I might get a bit emotional and might not be able to finish it.

I was, until recently, a board member of Central Scotland Rape Crisis & Sexual Abuse Centre—indeed, I had that position for more than 10 years—but I want to make it clear that I am not speaking on its behalf this afternoon. However, I would like to pay tribute to that organisation and the countless other women’s organisations who, to a person, are in favour of scrapping corroboration. In fact, if we look at the history of those groups, we will see that one of the main drivers for their formation was the consequences of corroboration; now, ironically, they have to deal with the aftermath of its failures on a daily basis.

I want to dedicate my speech to a woman called Jean by telling her story—and I should tell the chamber that Jean is not her real name. Her story will in many ways be familiar to those in women’s groups who have had similar experiences and who have to deal with the wreckage when personal tragedy strikes.

Jean was overpowered and raped by a person she knew. The incident was very quickly reported to and acted on by the police. They did not collect the evidence at that time; they did even better than that by using their valuable training and escorting Jean to a hospital where a forensic surgeon immediately examined her and expertly collected the evidence. While the examination was taking place, the surgeon was quietly counselling Jean and offering advice about where she could find and who could offer the vital early services that could support her over what the surgeon knew would be a protracted and traumatic period. Jean was supported through this time by her husband and assisted by Rape Crisis, and she was also sympathetically dealt with by the police while at the same time questioned in detail by them.

The process lasted months and months. The fiscal service was extremely sympathetic to Jean’s situation, but the time that it took to reach a conclusion about whether a trial would proceed took its toll. The second worst day of Jean’s life happened when the fiscal service declared that it could not proceed to trial. The word “corroboration” was never used but, as matters unfolded, it became clear that the case had failed because of the lack of corroboration.

The day that Jean was raped, her life changed but she had others’ support to help her meet the challenges that arose. Sadly, when it was announced that the case would not be brought to court, Jean’s life as she had known it came to an abrupt end. Although her husband had been supportive throughout, he could not get over the fact that after the attack on Jean and the subsequent thorough investigation there would be no trial. For him, no trial meant no rape. The accusations and mistrust started; the fights became frequent as the blame was put on Jean; and then the marriage ended.

The depression that had started shortly after the rape deepened into chronic depression as Jean turned to alcohol for comfort. Soon after, her child was taken from her. She became so low and so full of self-loathing that she attempted suicide. In just a few short but horrendous years, Jean had lost everything in her life and although, thankfully, she and her daughter were reunited she wonders what might have been had she lived in another jurisdiction. She had early and excellent forensic evidence; her story was believed entirely by the police; the fiscal service supported her claims; and she was supported through this time by her husband and offering advice about where she could find and who could offer the vital early services that could support her over what the surgeon knew would be a protracted and traumatic period. Jean was supported through this time by her husband and assisted by Rape Crisis, and she was also sympathetically dealt with by the police while at the same time questioned in detail by them.

Jean, if you are listening, I know that you were not heard in your time of need but I pray that, today, this Parliament hears your voice. I urge all members to think of Jean and all the other Jeans and support the Government’s bill.

16:20

Patrick Harvie (Glasgow) (Green): I suspect that the speech that we have just heard will have had an effect on every member in the chamber, whatever position they take tonight on the motion and amendment that are before us; on the detail of the legislation that the Government is working on; and on the prospect of recommendations from the Bonomy review.

The fact that such a speech can have that effect on members who take different views on the matter needs to be recognised. The debate has benefited from some calm, reflective but passionate speeches on both sides. It does not benefit from anyone claiming a monopoly of concern—few have done that in this debate, but, sadly, not none. There is no monopoly of concern in relation either to the specific instance that Mr Paterson has raised, very articulately, or to the wider issue.

Those of us who have concerns about the prospect of miscarriages of justice or of trials coming to court that have no prospect of safe conviction do not claim that we have a monopoly on that concern. I am certain that Rape Crisis and the other organisations that campaign on these issues and work in this area every day do not want an increase in convictions for the sake of it. They want an increase in safe convictions, not in wrongful convictions, which benefit nobody.

Christian Allard: I want the member to realise that the debate is about an increase in prosecutions, not convictions.

Patrick Harvie: I am sorry, but an increase in prosecutions without an increase in convictions would worry me very much, in terms of the expectations that that would raise and the stress that it would cause the accused persons and the victims without justice coming out of it. We all want an increase in justice. We want safe convictions, not wrongful convictions.

As I said, we do not claim a monopoly of concern on the issue. I ask members who support the Government’s position, similarly, not to claim a monopoly of concern about the impact of the offences and the lack of access to justice that, undoubtedly, exists. I say that as someone who is not yet convinced that we should remove the requirement for corroboration but who will be open to the arguments once I see what the Government proposes in its place.
I like the cabinet secretary and admire his position on a number of issues, but I am sorry to say that his demeanour on the front bench today, openly laughing at the arguments of Opposition members, does him no credit.

The cabinet secretary says, “Out with the old and in with the new.” I can only ask myself why Parliament may not vote on both matters on the same day. Why can the Parliament not take evidence on both matters at the same time and reach its decision once we know what the proposals will be?

The cabinet secretary and the Government accept that a new system of safeguards will be required. If we are to move from a position that places greater emphasis on the quality of evidence than the quantity, I am open to those arguments. However, those arguments have not yet been laid out in detail, and I think that it is unreasonable for the Parliament to be asked to pass legislation on that basis, especially given that the change is not specific to rape and sexual offences but applies to the whole of our criminal justice system. That approach—to put it mildly—is not a safe basis on which to pass such substantial legislation.

The cabinet secretary argues that if we defer—if we wait until we know what is proposed in place of the requirement for corroboration—that will cause too much delay in the implementation. However, if we pass the bill without knowing what is to come or when the provisions on the requirement for corroboration will be introduced, implementation can still be only tentative implementation of a hypothetical change. Those who are preparing the way will still not know if or when the Parliament will finally pass secondary legislation to make the change come about. If tentative preparation for a hypothetical change is what is about to happen, there is no reason for our not saying that we will take both decisions at the end of the process, once we know what the proposals are.

I will vote for the amendment in the name of Margaret Mitchell, which bears my name in support, but I am open to arguments in the future about what will be proposed. If Scottish law in this area is going to evolve, into what will it evolve? I want to be able to judge that, see the detail of it and hear the evidence of those on whom it will impact and who will work with the consequences of our decision. I want to know all that before we make our decision, and that is why I will support the amendment this evening.

16:26

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): I thank all the members who have spoken previously, particularly Gil Paterson, whose speech was very moving. I also thank Linda Fabiani for her measured, down-to-earth contribution, which was a breath of fresh air. I would be more than happy to welcome her to the Justice Committee.

Many of the measures in the bill have been welcomed by every party—the arguments have been well rehearsed—but there is one that has not been welcomed by every party, and it is to that issue that I turn. The reform of corroboration has generated more heat and discussion than any other aspect of the bill, although in my mind it is long overdue not only for the victims of rape and sexual assault—whose case was put so powerfully by my colleague Christina McKelvie—but for the elderly, as Linda Fabiani mentioned, and other vulnerable groups.

Many members who have spoken against the reform of corroboration cite miscarriages of justice and the need for justice for all. However, as I asked John Finnie earlier, what about the victims who see it as a miscarriage of justice that they do not have access to justice? It is disparaging of John Finnie to treat access to justice as though it should not be spoken about and does not exist. It exists in the minds of victims, and access to justice is what it is to them. We have also heard the phrase “having their day in court” bandied about, but this is nothing to do with people having their day in court; it is to do with people having access to justice. Victims do not like the phrase “having their day in court” and I think that people should stop using it. Members should think before they say such things.

John Finnie: Will the member take an intervention?

Sandra White: I am sorry, but I do not have time.

There has also been talk about members changing their minds, and a number of members who are in the chamber have changed their minds. I will give a couple of examples. The 2011 Labour Party election manifesto stated:

“We believe that the time has come to consider the arguments for reforming the need for corroboration in rape cases and will consider the recommendations of the Carloway Review.”

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): Will the member take an intervention?

Sandra White: Please let me go on.

On 1 December 2011, in a debate on the Carloway review, James Kelly said:

“Lord Carloway’s report sets out the history of why corroboration was incorporated into Scots law. It is important to remember that it was incorporated at a time when the legal system and the country were very different ... There have been many advances since that time, not only in technology but in the skill and expertise of prosecutors and defence agents. Times have moved on ...
Labour has previously made its position clear on rape cases, in relation to which we feel that corroboration should be abolished.”—[Official Report, 1 December 2011; c 4250.]

What are you waiting for?

Elaine Murray: Will the member take an intervention on that point?

Sandra White: No, I am sorry. In your 2011 manifesto you spoke about the Carloway review and when you saw the evidence you said, “corroboration should be abolished”; yet you still say that you do not have enough information. I really cannot understand that at all.

Graeme Pearson said:

“the requirement for corroboration goes back so far that it is difficult to remember why and how it all began ... We should also bear in mind that, although the recommendation is to abolish the requirement for corroboration, it is not to ban corroboration.”—[Official Report, 1 December 2011; c 4258-59.]

Please get this right.

Then we have Claudia Beamish who, only a couple of weeks ago on 7 February, on “Brian Taylor’s Big Debate”, said:

“I respect the fact that there is now the Bonomy Review”.

Scottish Labour is “supportive of the review and I think we have to see what that review does ... I do understand the concerns of women’s groups at the moment that this must not be kicked into the long grass”.

That is exactly what will happen if you vote for the amendment—it will be kicked into the long grass. Annabelle Ewing and the cabinet secretary very eloquently made that point in their speeches.

Let us look at why the reform of corroboration would be kicked into the long grass. If we have to wait for Lord Bonomy’s report to bring forward primary legislation, we run the very great risk that we will be unable to bring this matter before Parliament before the 2016 elections. I ask everyone, including Patrick Harvie, to understand that that is why we cannot support the amendment. I am not saying that everyone who says that they do not support the issue at stage 1 and supports the amendment does not support the abolition—or the moderation—of corroboration; I am saying that they are very misled. That is particularly true of the Labour Party. The quotes that I have cited make clear that you support the abolition of corroboration yet you are prepared to vote with the Tories and the Lib Dems and kick this into the long grass. You should think again, because this will not be progressed any quicker if you vote for the amendment. Think of all the victims who will not get access to justice while we sit and deliberate even further down the line.

Let us vote for the motion and reject the amendment because otherwise you would be rejecting the opportunity for the thousands of people out there who are denied justice and who would be denied it in the future.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to closing speeches. I invite members to speak through the chair when they can, please.

16:32

Murdo Fraser (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con): It has been an excellent debate, with some very good speeches. In particular, I single out those made by Alison McInnes, John Finnie, Gil Paterson and Patrick Harvie. As Margaret Mitchell said, the bill is wide ranging, with much in it that we welcome. It contains measures to reduce unnecessary delays in progressing cases, a proposal to increase the maximum custodial sentence for knife crime from four to five years, a fairly minor but nevertheless welcome change to automatic early release—it affects 2 per cent of offenders—and other worthy provisions.

The major controversy is the proposal to abolish the rule of corroboration. As we have heard, concerns have been raised about that proposal by the Law Society—I declare an interest as a member—every senior judge, apart from Lord Carloway, including Lord Gill, the Lord President and every single living previous Lord President; the Faculty of Advocates; the Scottish Human Rights Commission; the cross-party group on adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse; Lord Carloway’s own expert reference group; Justice Scotland; and many other experts and academics.

I struggle to understand from the cabinet secretary and his colleagues on the SNP benches why the change is required. The case seems to be that more victims would get their day in court. However, it would not be the case that the change would increase the rate of conviction, because in England and Wales the conviction rate for sexual offences, despite the lack of a corroboration rule, is almost identical to that in Scotland. The Lord Advocate in evidence to the Justice Committee made the point that there would not necessarily be an increase in convictions. Indeed, in this very debate, Mr Allard made precisely that point.

Christian Allard: I am not sure that the member listened to my speech. The issue is not about the rate of conviction—that will come later. Rather, it is about the rate of prosecution and access to justice. We need cases to be prosecuted. No miscarriages of justice are taking place at the moment because cases are not being prosecuted.

Murdo Fraser: I thank Mr Allard for confirming that what I said about his earlier intervention was entirely correct. If abolishing the requirement for corroboration does not increase the rate of conviction, I cannot see what it does for victims of crime. They want to see those who they claim have assaulted them being convicted. Surely that is the point.

Lord Carloway and the Cabinet Secretary for Justice both described the rule of corroboration as “archaic”. It is certainly an ancient rule of law. So, of course, is the presumption of innocence. I dare say that there are prosecutors and people in the police who would be quite happy to scrap what they would describe as the archaic law of the presumption of innocence and I dare say that that would increase convictions. There is no doubt about that.

However, our role in Parliament is not to do everything that the police and prosecutors ask for. As Alison McInnes said in an excellent speech, our role is to strike a balance—sometimes, it is a difficult balance—to ensure that the innocent are protected. Scrapping the requirement for corroboration tips the balance too far, in my opinion.

I will say something about the Justice Committee. Those of us who are involved in committees in the Parliament know how unusual it is, since 2011, for SNP-dominated committees to say anything critical of a measure that the SNP Government proposes. We have all sat there and seen lines that are in any way critical of anything that the Government is doing being excised by SNP members.

What makes the Justice Committee’s report remarkable is that it is the first instance that I can think of in the past three years in which an SNP-dominated committee has disagreed with a proposal from the Scottish Government. The cabinet secretary should take note of that. In particular, he should take note of the views of the committee convener, Christine Grahame. She is a well-regarded convener and a lawyer like me. When she decides that what the Government is doing is not correct, the cabinet secretary, the Government and Parliament should listen to that.

Even the cabinet secretary himself has concerns. We know that because he has conceded a review under Lord Bonomy. It is an extraordinary approach to say that we should pass the measure into law and thereafter have the review. That is the wrong way round. We should not be asked to pass a law until we have full scrutiny of the proposal and have the review first.

Let us make an offer to the cabinet secretary. We will not be unreasonable on the issue. We are happy to consider the case for scrapping the general corroboration rule as part of a wider review of the laws of evidence. That is precisely what Lord Gill proposed to the Justice Committee.

The cabinet secretary can take that away, take the measure out of the bill and bring back fresh primary legislation following the review. It will get proper parliamentary scrutiny and he will get support from us if he does that job properly.

The cabinet secretary has a simple choice. He is a fair-minded man and I have a lot of respect for him as Cabinet Secretary for Justice. He can either do the right thing, listen to the Justice Committee, its esteemed convener, all the Opposition parties in the Parliament and all the various outside bodies that have raised concerns about abolition and take the provision out of the bill, rethink it, review it and bring it back to Parliament for proper consideration; or he can railroad it through on a tightly whipped vote with, inevitably, a narrow majority at best and show contempt for the view of the Justice Committee. This is his chance to show his mettle. I hope that he will not disappoint me or the people of Scotland.

16:38

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): There are several parts of the bill that Scottish Labour members agree with and want to proceed. We support the reduction of the number of hours for which a person can be kept in custody to 12. There is, perhaps, a case for occasionally allowing that to be extended beyond 12 hours in exceptional and difficult cases.

We welcome the focus on knife crime, which increases the maximum sentence for carrying a knife from four years to five. Scottish Labour has taken knife crime extremely seriously for many years. Indeed, in office, we took action to strengthen sanctions on the carrying of knives.

We agree that the appeals process should be speeded up and we are also pleased to see Sheriff Bowen’s recommendations—in particular, the requirement for effective communication between the prosecution and defence in sheriff and jury cases—being reflected in legislation.

We welcome sections 83 and 84, which create two statutory aggravations relating to people trafficking. Of course, we hope that that will be followed by Government support for Jenny Marra’s member’s bill. Indeed, it is disappointing that the SNP is the only party that has failed to have one single MSP sign in support of the bill being heard—a bill that has been described as world leading and which has attracted the backing of more than 50,000 members of the public.

We have concerns about some proposals. As Christine Grahame said, the use of the term “arrest” to cover questioning by the police without charge could lead to a misunderstanding of people’s status, and the term “person not officially accused” might be difficult to introduce into common parlance. If those changes are to be introduced, focused efforts will need to be made to ensure that the media and the public understand them. It is important that they understand that the fact that someone has been arrested will no longer indicate that the police have sufficient evidence to press charges against them.

We agree that the police should be able to release a suspect for a period of investigative liberation before any charges are pressed, but consideration needs to be given to how that may be interpreted by the person’s employers and by members of the public, and the effect that it may have on the suspect’s private life. I also have much sympathy with the view that the complainer—particularly in the case of person-to-person crimes—should be advised of the period of investigative liberation and any conditions that are attached. We can pursue that at stage 2.

As others have said, the most contentious issue is the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, which, unsurprisingly, has dominated the debate. I make it quite clear that I do not oppose its abolition out of any desire to give the Government a kicking. The question whether one of the cornerstones of Scots law should be abolished is far too serious to be used for transitory political gain. Indeed, it was with deep regret that I concluded—having listened to the 11 evidence sessions to which the convener referred and read the 57 pieces of written evidence and the 11 pieces of supplementary evidence—that the cabinet secretary has not yet made the case for the abolition of the requirement for corroboration. I wanted him to convince me that it would make a difference to the lives of victims of person-to-person crimes such as rape, sexual assault and domestic abuse without compromising the civil liberties of those suspected of other crimes but, unfortunately, he has failed to do so.

Sandra White: I am a wee bit confused by what the member has said about corroboration. How come James Kelly said, when he had read the Carloway report, that Labour supported the abolition of corroboration? How can a party change its mind quite so quickly?

Elaine Murray: I had never made up my mind on that, and I do not think that Sandra White has given a correct account of what James Kelly said. I would like to continue, especially as Sandra White did not take an intervention from me.

We understand the frustration of organisations that represent the victims of such crimes, such as Women’s Aid, Victim Support and Rape Crisis, about the difficulty of getting cases to court but, as Murdo Fraser said, there is no evidence from systems in which corroboration is not required, such as the English system, that the rate of successful conviction for sexual crimes is any higher than it is in Scotland. Unfortunately, there is evidence from England that, across the system as a whole, the miscarriage of justice rate is higher.

As Alison McInnes said, if the requirement for corroboration is abolished, it might be easier to get a case to court but, once that happens, it will be one person’s word against another’s and the victim is likely to be subjected to very robust examination by the defence counsel, and juries or sheriffs may be reluctant to convict on the basis of one person’s word against another’s. The experience of an unsuccessful trial could be horrific for a victim and could leave her exposed and, indeed, endangered if the accused is not convicted.

All Labour members agree with Rhoda Grant, Sandra White and others that domestic and sexual violence must be taken extremely seriously, but the problem of achieving justice for victims goes far wider than the prosecution system. The terrible case that Gil Paterson described shows how bad the whole justice system is and indicates that the whole system, and the attitudes of society, need to be reviewed, not just corroboration.

I turn to the effect of the abolition of corroboration on people who are accused of other crimes. What about the trade unionist on the picket line, the protestor at a demonstration or the youngster who is accused of shoplifting? What will protect them if their face does not fit, the cause that they support is not popular with the establishment or they have already had a brush with the police? Who will protect them if corroboration is removed?

The cabinet secretary has made some concessions. He and the Lord Advocate have stated that no case will be taken to court without supporting evidence. It could be a way forward to put that on the face of the bill, but I am not sure that that is not corroboration by another name.

Margaret McCulloch, John Finnie, John Pentland and Patrick Harvie all mentioned the fact that the cabinet secretary has convened a review group under Lord Bonomy to look at additional safeguards. That is an admission that the cabinet secretary did not do his homework before introducing the bill. As all those members said, enacting the recommendations through secondary legislation is the wrong way to put the situation right.

Scottish Labour’s plea to the cabinet secretary and others in the chamber is this: please withdraw from the bill the provisions to abolish the corroboration requirement; widen the reference group’s scope so that it can consider the range of problems that face victims of person-to-person crime; widen the group’s membership to include representatives of those victims; look at removing the corroboration requirement, or at defining corroboration or putting a definition of supporting evidence in a bill; and look at the additional safeguards that might be required to protect civil liberties.

When all that has been done and the process is concluded, I ask the Government to bring back robust and well-evidenced legislation to the Parliament. By all means set a timescale for the process—it does not need to be kicked into the long grass and it can be achieved in a defined timescale—but let us pass the legislation properly.

If the cabinet secretary does what I have proposed, he and his Government will have the full support of Labour members and, I think, members across the chamber, because we all want to make a difference to victims who do not get justice at the moment, but we do not want to do that at the expense of the civil liberties of other vulnerable people in our society.

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): I call Kenny MacAskill to wind up the debate. I would be obliged if he continued until 4.59.

16:46

Kenny MacAskill: I put on record my gratitude to all who have taken part in the debate and especially to those whose comments extended beyond corroboration. It is important to deal with those other aspects, which I will also comment on. We will reflect on the many points that have been made, and we will seek to work with the Justice Committee, groups and individuals to address those points. I am grateful to them for that work.

We have heard outstanding speeches, such as those from Annabelle Ewing and Gil Paterson. I think that Patrick Harvie was eloquent, as ever, although I disagreed with the points that he made.

I again thank Lord Carloway for his comprehensive report, which took him approximately a year to produce. I am grateful for all his efforts and studies. We should also thank Sheriff Principal Bowen, who did considerable work that parts of the bill are based on and which will improve justice for Scotland. I am also grateful to all the members of the Justice Committee, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee and the Finance Committee for their work.

I will deal with matters that have been raised. The charge is being dealt with by the Conservative Party, which is supported by its helpers—as is becoming the norm—in the Labour Party and the Liberal Democrats. We know that the better together campaign extends beyond the constitutional remit to other aspects.

John Finnie rose—

Patrick Harvie: Would the cabinet secretary like to take an intervention?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at the moment.

Let me say that Margaret Mitchell said—[Interruption.]

The Presiding Officer: Order.

Kenny MacAskill: Margaret Mitchell said that corroboration is not about non-essential aspects, that the position does not need to be beefed up and that it is all to do with important aspects. I will give her examples of aspects that require corroboration.

Two police officers are required for the taking of mouth swabs from alleged offenders. The taking of intimate swabs from a complainer in a rape case must be corroborated; that might involve a child and injuries to sexual parts. In child pornography cases, the Crown must corroborate that children are under 16. Two witnesses are required to prove that a child is a child; a birth certificate is inadequate. It is not simply a waste of police resources—

Margaret Mitchell: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Kenny MacAskill: Let me finish, and then I will give way.

It is not simply a waste of police resources—

Margaret Mitchell: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

The Presiding Officer: Ms Mitchell—

Margaret Mitchell: I did not hear the cabinet secretary’s reply.

The Presiding Officer: Ms Mitchell, sit down.

Kenny MacAskill: It is not simply a waste of police resources but an infringement of the civil liberties of the child or the rape victim that two people must be present for something that is so intimate, harsh and personal when they have been traumatised. Perhaps Ms Mitchell would like to clarify why that should be the case.

Margaret Mitchell: What I would like to do is say that the cabinet secretary has just made a point that explains why corroboration should be taken out of the bill and looked at, to see how situations such as that are working in practice.

Kenny MacAskill: What that proves is that the cabinet secretary has just made a point that explains why corroboration should be taken out of the bill and looked at, to see how situations such as that are working in practice.

We expected that from the Tory Party: it is the Conservative and Unionist Party; that is what we expect from it. We did not expect that from those who have had a lifetime of experience. Mr
Pearson was a very lengthy police officer for many years. [Laughter.] To be fair, he served with distinction and I worked with him. His position has changed. His position now is not the position that he had when he was a police officer. He stands now full square against not just Police Scotland but the Scottish Police Federation and the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents.

Graeme Pearson rose—

Kenny MacAskill: I will take Graeme Pearson in a minute.

I do not know what has changed other than Mr Pearson’s taking on the mantle for Labour, but I defer to Mr Pearson.

Graeme Pearson: I am saddened that the cabinet secretary is making this a political issue, instead of considering victims. Let me confirm for him that my concern is that we are putting victims on a footing that is no better than the footing that they are on currently. If he would just take time, as I implored him to earlier, to allow the whole of the avenue to be looked at properly and a comprehensive proposal to be brought back, I would be glad to support him.

Kenny MacAskill: I would take that with more credibility if the member—and other members in this chamber—had not received communications from Victim Support Scotland, Rape Crisis Scotland and Scottish Women’s Aid. They are clear and they are unequivocal: they are saying not to support the Tory amendment lodged by Margaret Mitchell. There is no equivocation there; the equivocation comes from Mr Pearson.

We know that Labour members take their cue from Cameron and Osborne. [Interruption.]

Murdo Fraser: Unworthy.

The Presiding Officer: Order.

Kenny MacAskill: I did not think that they took their view from Richard Keen. It seems that it does not matter whether it is a minimum price for alcohol or free school meals—[Interruption.]

The Presiding Officer: Order!

Kenny MacAskill: If Labour has a policy, if Labour knows that it benefits the community—[Interruption.]

The Presiding Officer: Cabinet secretary, will you sit down?

I will not have speakers being barracked in the chamber.

Members: Oh!

The Presiding Officer: I recognise that this is a very heated debate, but people are watching the debate and members are not doing the Scottish Parliament any favours by their behaviour.

Kenny MacAskill: There are aspects where Labour had clear, principled positions, which now seem to have been stood on their head.

I accept that Patrick Harvie has a different view, and I am prepared to discuss and engage with him. I think that he does not believe that the case against corroboration has been made; I believe that it has. The important thing is that the Labour Party believed that the case against corroboration had been made.

Patrick Harvie: Will the cabinet secretary give way on that point?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at the moment. I have to deal with Labour.

That is why the Labour Party manifesto was clear that Labour wished to consider the issue with regard to rape.

Elaine Murray: Will the cabinet secretary give way?

Kenny MacAskill: No—let me deal with the position before. On 1 December 2011, James Kelly, who is whipping Labour at the moment, was a justice spokesman. He said:

‘Labour has previously made its position clear on rape cases, in relation to which we feel that corroboration should be abolished.’—[Official Report, 1 December 2011; c 4250.]

On 25 September 2012, in a parliamentary debate on Carloway, Mary Fee, who I have the greatest admiration and respect for, said:

‘I agree with Lord Carloway that corroboration should be abolished. Corroboration is an ancient and archaic law that is preventing justice from being served in some of the most heinous crimes, such as rape and serious assault.’—[Official Report, 25 September 2012; c 11848.]

We have heard today from Rhoda Grant. When she addressed my colleague Fergus Ewing, who was then the community safety minister, she made it clear that, in cases of domestic abuse,

‘there are no corroborating witnesses to the crime—it happens within the home. That is what makes domestic abuse different from any other crime.’—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 9 November 2010; c 3744.]

What has changed since Rhoda Grant had that position, Mary Fee spoke and the Labour Party stood on that manifesto? What information have they received? They have received the information that has been forthcoming.

Elaine Murray: For clarification, the manifesto said that we would consider the removal of the requirement for corroboration in rape cases. I pursued the matter with Lord Gill and with Scottish Women’s Aid and Rape Crisis Scotland during evidence taking, and no one was interested in removing the requirement only in relation to certain crimes. All said that it should be done across the board or not at all.

Kenny MacAskill: That is what the Government is seeking to do, because we recognise that the issue does not affect only the victims of rape or other sexual offences. As Rhoda Grant knows better than anyone, and as Lily Greenan said in evidence, the issue affects victims of domestic abuse. We know that it affects the elderly, as Age Scotland said and as members have said today.

Rhoda Grant: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not have time, I am afraid.

We know that it affects children. We have heard how children suffer behind closed doors.

Evidence has come in since Labour made its manifesto commitment. We heard the testimony of Colette Barrie and Mary Ann Davidson. We have heard the victims of Lee Cyrus speak out—in that respect, Mr Fraser seems to ignore points that he has taken before. He has been told by the Solicitor General for Scotland that the decision in the Lee Cyrus case was down to corroboration, but he wants the status quo to continue, which creates situations such as the one he has been correct to complain about.

Murdo Fraser: The cabinet secretary knows perfectly well, because I have corresponded with the First Minister and the Solicitor General on the case, that my concern was the lack of application of the Moorov doctrine and had nothing to do with the general rule of law on corroboration. The cabinet secretary should know that.

Kenny MacAskill: I take the view of the Solicitor General on the matter much more than I take Murdo Fraser's view. The impediment to access to justice in that case was the law of corroboration, as it has been in 170 rape cases over the past two years and as it is in 3,000 cases annually.

At new year I watched Jonathan Watson's parody of Johann Lamont—[ Interruption.] I never thought that I would see Johann Lamont play Jonathan Watson. “Mibbees aye, mibbees naw” appears to be Labour's position on corroboration, despite its manifesto commitment and despite Labour members going on record—[ Interruption.]

The Presiding Officer: Order. [ Interruption.] Order!

Kenny MacAskill: Thank you, Presiding Officer.

The burden of proof remains: beyond reasonable doubt is the standard that has to be proven by the Crown.

The evidence is clear. It is clear in the court of public opinion. It has been put forward in the Parliament by organisations that have represented victims of crime for years and years, by the people who have to wipe away the tears and mop up the blood, by the people who are involved in policing and prosecution and—I reiterate, in letters to every member—by Scottish Women's Aid, Rape Crisis Scotland and Victim Support Scotland. Those people have given us clear, unambiguous advice that we should ensure that the law of corroboration, which has harmed access to justice, is dealt with.

I said that there seemed to be a parody in terms of Labour's position with regard to—[ Interruption]—Labour's position on corroboration. Let us be clear: it is only an excuse for Labour, which is selling out on its principles. We accept that that is the norm for the Conservative Party, but for years the Labour Party, especially under Johann Lamont, prided itself on tackling domestic abuse and addressing issues to do with sexual offences. Labour has sold its soul and is in danger of selling out the victims of crime. I commend the motion in my name.

The Presiding Officer: That concludes the debate. I ask all members in the chamber to reflect on their behaviour this afternoon. [ Interruption.] I ask all members to reflect on their behaviour this afternoon, which, quite frankly, was unacceptable.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Financial Resolution

16:59

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): The next item of business is consideration of motion S4M-09149, in the name of John Swinney, on the financial resolution for the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

Motion moved,

That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in Rule 9.12.3(b) of the Parliament's Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.—[John Swinney.]

The Presiding Officer: The question on the motion will be put at decision time.
Decision Time

17:00

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): There are five questions to be put as a result of today’s business. The first question is, that amendment S4M-09160.1, in the name of Margaret Mitchell, which seeks to amend motion S4M-09160, in the name of Kenny MacAskill, on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

For

Bailie, Jackie (Dumbarton) (Lab)
Baker, Claire (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Baker, Richard (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Baxter, Jayne (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Beamish, Claudia (South Scotland) (Lab)
Bibby, Neil (West Scotland) (Lab)
Boyack, Sarah (Lothian) (Lab)
Brown, Gavin (Lothian) (Con)
Buchanan, Cameron (Lothian) (Con)
Carlaw, Jackson (West Scotland) (Con)
Chisholm, Malcolm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab)
Davidson, Ruth (Glasgow) (Con)
Dugdale, Kezia (Lothian) (Lab)
Fee, Mary (West Scotland) (Lab)
Ferguson, Patricia (Glasgow Maryhill and Springburn) (Lab)
Ferguson, Alex (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con)
Findlay, Neil (Lothian) (Lab)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Fraser, Murdo (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Goldie, Annabel (West Scotland) (Con)
Grant, Rhoda (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)
Gray, Iain (East Lothian) (Lab)
Griffith, Mark (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Harvie, Patrick (Glasgow) (Green)
Henry, Hugh (Renfrewshire South) (Lab)
Hilton, Cara (Dunfermline) (Lab)
Hum, Jim (South Scotland) (LD)
Johnstone, Alex (North East Scotland) (Con)
Johnstone, Alison (Lothian) (Green)
Kelly, James (Rutherglen) (Lab)
Lamont, Johann (Glasgow Pollok) (Lab)
Lamont, John (Ethtrick, Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (Con)
Macdonald, Lewis (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Macintosh, Ken (Eastwood) (Lab)
Malik, Hanzala (Glasgow) (Lab)
Marr, Jenny (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Martin, Paul (Glasgow Provan) (Lab)
McArthur, Liam (Orkney Islands) (LD)
McCulloch, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McDougall, Margaret (West Scotland) (Lab)
McGrigor, Jamie (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
McMahon, Michael (Uddingston and Bellshill) (Lab)
McManus, Siobhan (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McNeil, Duncan (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab)
McTaggart, Anne (Glasgow) (Lab)
Milton, Nanette (North East Scotland) (Con)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Pearson, Graeme (South Scotland) (Lab)
Pentland, John (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab)
Rennie, Willie (Mid Scotland and Fife) (LD)
Rowley, Alex (Cowdenbeath) (Lab)
Scanlon, Mary (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
Scott, John (Ayr) (Con)
Scott, Tavish (Shetland Islands) (LD)
Simpson, Dr Richard (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Smith, Drew (Glasgow) (Lab)
Smith, Elaine (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab)
Smith, Liz (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Stewart, David (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)

Against

Adam, George (Paisley) (SNP)
Adamson, Clare (Central Scotland) (SNP)
Allan, Dr Alasdair (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP)
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Beattie, Colin (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP)
Biagi, Marco (Edinburgh Central) (SNP)
Brodie, Chic (South Scotland) (SNP)
Brown, Keith (Clackmannanshire and Dunblane) (SNP)
Burgess, Margaret (Cunninghame South) (SNP)
Campbell, Aileen (Clydesdale) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Coffey, Willie (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP)
Constance, Angela (Almond Valley) (SNP)
Crawford, Bruce (Stirling) (SNP)
Cunningham, Roseanna (Perthshire South and Kinross-shire) (SNP)
Dey, Graeme (Angus South) (SNP)
Don, Nigel (Angus North and Mearns) (SNP)
Doris, Bob (Glasgow) (SNP)
Dornan, James (Glasgow Cathcart) (SNP)
Eddie, Jim (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP)
Ewing, Annabelle (Mid Scotland and Fife) (SNP)
Ewing, Fergus (Inverness and Nairn) (SNP)
Fabiani, Linda (East Kilbride) (SNP)
FitzPatrick, Joe (Dundee City West) (SNP)
Gibson, Kenneth (Cunninghame North) (SNP)
Gibson, Rob (Gairness, Sutherland and Ross) (SNP)
Hepburn, Jamie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (SNP)
Hyslop, Fiona (Linlithgow) (SNP)
Ingram, Adam (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP)
Keir, Colin (Edinburgh Western) (SNP)
Lochhead, Richard (Moray) (SNP)
Lyle, Richard (Central Scotland) (SNP)
MacAskill, Kenny (Edinburgh Eastern) (SNP)
MacDonald, Angus (Falkirk East) (SNP)
MacDonald, Gordon (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP)
Mackay, Derek (Renfrewshire North and West) (SNP)
MacKenzie, Mike (Highlands and Islands) (SNP)
Mason, John (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP)
Matheson, Michael (Falkirk West) (SNP)
Maxwell, Stewart (West Scotland) (SNP)
McAlpine, Joan (South Scotland) (SNP)
McDonald, Mark (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP)
McKelvie, Christina (Hamilton, Larkhall and Stonehouse) (SNP)
McLeod, Aileen (South Scotland) (SNP)
McLeod, Fiona (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (SNP)
McMillan, Stuart (West Scotland) (SNP)
Neil, Alex (Airdrie and Shotts) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)
Robertson, Dennis (Aberdeeneshire West) (SNP)
Robison, Shona (Dundee City East) (SNP)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)
Salmund, Alex (Aberdeenshire East) (SNP)
Stevenson, Stewart (Banffshire and Buchan Coast) (SNP)
Stewart, Kevin (Aberdeen Central) (SNP)
Sturgeon, Nicola (Glasgow Southside) (SNP)
Swiney, John (Perthshire North) (SNP)
Thompson, Dave (Skye, Lochaber and Badenoch) (SNP)
Torrance, David (Kirkcaldy) (SNP)
Urquhart, Jean (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Watt, Maureen (Aberdeen South and North Kincardine)
The Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 61, Against 64, Abstentions 1.

Amendment disagreed to.

The Presiding Officer: The next question is, that motion S4M-09160, in the name of Kenny MacAskill, on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

For

Adam, George (Paisley) (SNP)
Adamson, Clare (Central Scotland) (SNP)
Allan, Dr Alasdair (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP)
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Baker, Claire (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Baker, Richard (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Baxter, Jayne (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Beamish, Claudia (South Scotland) (Lab)
Bibby, Neil (West Scotland) (Lab)
Boyack, Sarah (Lothian) (Lab)
Brown, Gavin (Lothian) (Con)
Buchanan, Cameron (Lothian) (Con)
Carlaw, Jackson (West Scotland) (Con)
Chisholm, Malcolm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab)
Davidson, Ruth (Glasgow) (Con)
Dugdale, Kezia (Lothian) (Lab)
Fee, Mary (West Scotland) (Lab)
Ferguson, Patricia (Glasgow Maryhill and Springburn) (Lab)
Ferguson, Alex (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con)
Findlay, Neil (Lothian) (Lab)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Fraser, Murdo (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Goldie, Annabel (West Scotland) (Con)
G grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Grant, Rhoda (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)
Gray, Iain (East Lothian) (Lab)
Griffin, Mark (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Harvie, Patrick (Glasgow) (Green)
Henry, Hugh (Renfrewshire South) (Lab)
Hilton, Caru (Dunfermline) (Lab)
Johnstone, Alex (North East Scotland) (Con)
Johnstone, Alison (Lothian) (Green)
Kelly, James (Rutherglen) (Lab)
Lamont, Johann (Glasgow Pollok) (Lab)
Lamont, John (Ettrick, Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (Con)
Macdonald, Lewis (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Macintosh, Ken (Eastwood) (Lab)
Malik, Hanzala (Glasgow) (Lab)
Marra, Jenny (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Martin, Paul (Glasgow Provan) (Lab)
McCulloch, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McDougall, Margaret (West Scotland) (Lab)
McGrigor, Jamie (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
McMahon, Siobhan (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McNeil, Duncan (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab)

Against

Hume, Jim (South Scotland) (LD)
McArthur, Liam (Orkney Islands) (LD)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Rennie, Willie (Mid Scotland and Fife) (SNP)
Scott, Tavish (Shetland Islands) (LD)

Abstentions

Baillie, Jackie (Dumbarton) (Lab)
Baker, Claire (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Baker, Richard (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Baxter, Jayne (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Beamish, Claudia (South Scotland) (Lab)
Bibby, Neil (West Scotland) (Lab)
Boyack, Sarah (Lothian) (Lab)
Brown, Gavin (Lothian) (Con)
Buchanan, Cameron (Lothian) (Con)
Carlaw, Jackson (West Scotland) (Con)
Chisholm, Malcolm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab)
Davidson, Ruth (Glasgow) (Con)
Dugdale, Kezia (Lothian) (Lab)
Fee, Mary (West Scotland) (Lab)
Ferguson, Patricia (Glasgow Maryhill and Springburn) (Lab)
Ferguson, Alex (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con)
Findlay, Neil (Lothian) (Lab)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Fraser, Murdo (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Goldie, Annabel (West Scotland) (Con)
Graham, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Gray, Iain (East Lothian) (Lab)
Griffin, Mark (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Harvie, Patrick (Glasgow) (Green)
Henry, Hugh (Renfrewshire South) (Lab)
Hilton, Caru (Dunfermline) (Lab)
Johnstone, Alex (North East Scotland) (Con)
Johnstone, Alison (Lothian) (Green)
Kelly, James (Rutherglen) (Lab)
Lamont, Johann (Glasgow Pollok) (Lab)
Lamont, John (Ettrick, Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (Con)
 Macdonald, Lewis (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Macintosh, Ken (Eastwood) (Lab)
Malik, Hanzala (Glasgow) (Lab)
Marra, Jenny (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Martin, Paul (Glasgow Provan) (Lab)
McCulloch, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McDougall, Margaret (West Scotland) (Lab)
McGrigor, Jamie (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
McMahon, Michael (Uddingston and Bellshill) (Lab)
McMahon, Siobhan (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McNeil, Duncan (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab)
The Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 64, Against 5, Abstentions 57.

Motion agreed to,

That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

The Presiding Officer: The next question is, that motion S4M-09149, in the name of John Swinney, on the financial resolution for the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, be agreed to.

Motion agreed to,

That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in Rule 9.12.3(b) of the Parliament's Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

4. Annabel Goldie (West Scotland) (Con): To ask the Scottish Government what steps it is taking to address the reported criticism of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. (S4O-03119)

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill): The Scottish Government remains firmly committed to all aspects of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, including our proposals to abolish the requirement for corroboration, which—as I have said time and again—is a barrier to justice for too many victims of crimes that are committed behind closed doors, such as rape and domestic abuse.

When we announced the creation of Lord Bonomy’s review group in February, there were calls—including from the Law Society of Scotland and the Faculty of Advocates—for us to remove the corroboration reform from the bill and to introduce a separate bill later in the session once Lord Bonomy had reported. That was not acceptable, because it is one of the key reforms in the bill and is vital to improvement of the criminal justice system for vulnerable victims.

However, we have also made clear our willingness to listen to constructive proposals in relation to this key legislation. That is why we gave careful consideration to—and, in the spirit of cooperation, have accepted—the suggestion from Opposition members that stage 2 commence after Lord Bonomy’s review has been completed.

As the majority of the bill’s provisions were already due for implementation in 2015-2016, today’s move will have minimal impact on the overall timetable for the legislation, while allowing detailed and full scrutiny of the bill in its entirety and enabling any changes that are agreed in the light of Lord Bonomy’s recommendations to be included.

Most important, I hope that the move will allow the whole Parliament to get behind the progressive reforms in the bill, including the modernising of police powers, enhancement of the rights of people in police custody and removal of the corroboration requirement.

Annabel Goldie: I do not know whether it is the spring sunshine, the Easter recess or my question, but this is certainly a very welcome change of position by the Scottish Government. It has made the right decision to allow more opportunity for informed opinion to be extended on the bill’s provisions. I thank the cabinet secretary for reflecting a degree of political courage in making that decision and for adopting that changed position.

Can I tempt the cabinet secretary further down the path of righteousness? The Scottish Government is to amend the bill at stage 2 to address the nonsense of automatic early release. We have waited seven years for that: better late than never.

However, the proposed changes will affect only a minuscule proportion of prisoners—2 per cent. That is not change—it is glacial progress. Given the manifestation of the benevolent mood that the cabinet secretary appears to be in at the moment, I ask him to consider extending abolition of automatic early release to a broader range of prisoners than just that 2 per cent.

Kenny MacAskill: I thank Annabel Goldie for her kind comments. I am grateful for the suggestion that came from her and other political parties regarding the innovative procedure that we are using. I very much welcome it.

On the specific matter of automatic early release, we require primary legislation to make the necessary changes. This Administration will consider whether that should be delayed or whether it can be dealt with in other legislation that is in train. With regard to the principal aspects, we believe that the changes will deal with the most serious offenders—those who are given sentences that reflect the courts’ concerns—and will take on board our concerns about automatic early release of sexual offenders being at a significantly lower level in order to ensure the protection of the public.

I am happy, given the spirit of generosity in which Miss Goldie asked her question, to reflect on her points as we consider the best method of proceeding, in order to ensure that we make long-overdue changes to automatic unconditional early release.

The Presiding Officer: Given the statement that the cabinet secretary has made, and given the importance that I attach to such important statements being made first to the Parliament, I intend to allow sufficient time to call supplementary questions from each of the political parties.

Neil Findlay (Lothian) (Lab): On a point of order, Presiding Officer. Given the significance of what the cabinet secretary has said, would not it have been more relevant for him to come and make a statement to Parliament?

The Presiding Officer: I have to say, Mr Findlay, that that is precisely what the cabinet secretary has done; this is one of the methods that we encourage the Scottish Government to use to make announcements to Parliament. My point is that I appreciate that an important statement has been made to Parliament and fully intend, as I said, to ensure that all the political parties have an opportunity to ask supplementary questions of the cabinet secretary.

I call Alison McInnes.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): Thank you, Presiding Officer. I also thank the cabinet secretary for responding so positively to the suggestion from the Opposition business managers on a sensible way to legislate on an important part of our criminal justice system. The stage 1 debate was, to be fair, a low point for the whole Parliament, because it demonstrated that we had lost sight of how we should legislate. The appointment of Lord Bonomy’s review panel meant that the cabinet secretary knew that the bill as drafted was deficient, although at that point he was unable to say that we ought to stop and take stock, so I am grateful that he now recognises that we need to wait for Lord Bonomy to report before we consider in detail all the matters in the round.

Kenny MacAskill: I am grateful for the suggestion and I welcome the input from Alison McInnes. We were not always going to wait for Lord Bonomy’s review, but what has been proposed is a welcome and innovative procedure. I thank Alison McInnes, as I did Annabel Goldie.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): I express pleasure that the cabinet secretary has listened to the Opposition. We do not always expect the Government to do that, but in this case it has done so. It would have been inappropriate to pass legislation without seeing how it was to be amended, and I am pleased that we are not going to be expected to do that now. Can he give us further information about the timescale in which he expects Lord Bonomy to report to him, and therefore the timescale for the commencement of stage 2?

Kenny MacAskill: First, allow me to record my gratitude to Lord Bonomy. I welcome his actions in extending the membership of the review group. I will be seeking a meeting with Lord Bonomy to update him in due course. I understand that the first meeting of the group has taken place. We anticipate that Lord Bonomy will report in April next year, which he thinks is a timetable that is perfectly deliverable, based on previous discussions. As I have said, that is a matter that we will factor in with the Parliamentary Bureau and with Elaine Murray’s colleagues.

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): I welcome the announcement that stage 2 is to be postponed, which takes cognisance of real concerns throughout Scotland—that is not to overstate the case—about the proposal to abolish the requirement for corroboration. However, I feel that there is nothing for the Government now to fear in including in Lord Bonomy’s review consideration of whether to abolish it or not. In fact, I consider it to be crucial that that be done, so I would very much appreciate the cabinet secretary’s confirming that he is willing to include that in the Bonomy remit.

Kenny MacAskill: I welcomed Annabel Goldie’s comments and I am grateful that the Tories, along with Labour and the Liberal Democrats, came up with the proposal, which the Government is happy to accept. However, I have to record that there will be no change to the remit for Lord Bonomy’s review. We have met him to discuss the remit, and he has signed up to it, as has everyone who will serve with him on his group.

As far as the Government is concerned—and as Parliament made clear at stage 1—the case against the requirement for corroboration has been made. It is failing victims throughout Scotland, so it has to go. On that basis, we are prepared to allow greater scrutiny of some matters so that Parliament can have more clarity about them, but the principle of removal of the requirement for corroboration remains.
Justice Committee

Proposals to end the automatic early release of certain categories of prisoner

Letter from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to the Convener

Thank you for your letter of 23 April in relation to the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward legislative changes to end the automatic early release of certain categories of prisoner.

I can advise that it is our intention to bring forward a Bill shortly that will contain provision on this issue. Subject to the normal process of pre-legislative scrutiny, I would expect the Bill to be introduced into Parliament in August 2014. It is likely the Bill will also include provision on release dates relating to helping ensure appropriate access to support services can take place for prisoners leaving custody.

I hope this is helpful.

Kenny MacAskill
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
27 May 2014
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Scottish Government to the Convener

Thank you for your letter of 30 April on behalf of the Justice Committee seeking an update in light of the announcement on the new timing for Stage 2 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

I can confirm that the Scottish Government’s intention is that nearly all of the provisions currently in the Bill will still be taken forward by this legislation.

We do, however, intend to lift the people trafficking provisions from the Criminal Justice Bill and to take them forward instead in the planned Human Trafficking Bill. We therefore intend to remove these provisions from the Criminal Justice Bill at Stage 2.

With regard to your specific question on the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (PNBS), transitional arrangements were already in place to allow for different commencement dates for the abolition of the Police Negotiating Board (PNB), through the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, and the formation of the PNBS, through the Criminal Justice Bill. We are working with the Home Office to ensure that the commencement provisions, set out in the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, will enable the PNB to function appropriately with only its Scottish members, until the PNBS is set up.

Letter of Rights

The Bill was also originally going to transpose provisions relating to the Letter of Rights provided to suspects in police custody, which is a requirement of the EU Directive on the Right to Information in Criminal Proceedings. These provisions were discussed at the Justice Committee Meeting on 7 January 2014. Following the rescheduling of Stage 2 of the Bill, I now intend to transpose these provisions by a SSI until the Bill comes into force. The SSI will also transpose Articles 7(1) and 7(5) of the Directive, with which Scotland is already operationally compliant. I wanted to highlight this particular issue, as regulations will be laid imminently, in order to transpose these obligations as quickly as possible.

The Letter of Rights was also a recommendation of the Carloway Review. It conveys information about the right of access to a lawyer, and is provided to every suspect who is in a police station. In July 2013, a non-statutory Letter of Rights was introduced, available in 34 languages. This will be placed on a statutory basis by the regulations.

At the January meeting, I undertook to update the Committee on progress in improving and developing the Letter of Rights. In March two stakeholder meetings were held to discuss enhancing the Letters of Rights to ensure that it meets the needs of children and people with learning disabilities. The groups provided input on content and presentation of the Letters to best meet the needs of the relevant groups. A separate operational delivery meeting was held with the Law Society, Police and SLAB, to get a view on how the Letter is working in practice. Officials are now considering whether amendments should be made to further improve the Letter of Rights, in light of comments from all these groups. This may require developing alternative versions of the Letter. The text of the Letter will also be updated to reflect the EU Directive on the Right to Information in Criminal Proceedings.

I will keep the Justice Committee updated on further progress, and will provide you with updated copies of the Letter of Rights.

Stage 2 Amendments

As you are aware, the Scottish Government had been planning to propose amendments to the Bill at Stage 2 in relation to automatic early release. I have written to you separately to explain our plans to end automatic early release for certain prisoners.

It had also been the Government’s intention to bring forward Stage 2 amendments to the Criminal Justice Bill designed to ensure transposition of the following two EU Framework Decisions by 1 December 2014:

a) Council Framework Decision on the Mutual Recognition of Decisions on Supervision Measures 2009/829/JHA (generally referred to as the ‘European Supervision Order’ Framework Decision); and Alternative implementation routes for both of these measures are being considered and I will further update the Committee on this.

Kenny MacAskill
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
4 June 2014
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to the Convener

As you know, Lord Bonomy has been leading the Post-corroboration Safeguards Review since February 2014. Lord Bonomy and his Reference Group have now completed their review, and published the full report with recommendations on the review’s website: http://www.gov.scot/Resource/0047/00475400.pdf

This is a substantial piece of work, with significant commitment not just from Lord Bonomy, but also from his 18-strong Reference Group, which is made up of respected figures from across the justice system. You will be aware that there has been public consultation and a detailed academic study undertaken as part of the review.

This afternoon I made a statement to Parliament in light of the review’s publication, and I wanted to ensure that the Justice Committee is aware of impact on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

Lord Bonomy’s recommendations are substantial and complex, and I want to take the time to consider them fully. I also recognise that we have not achieved a consensus on whether the corroboration requirement is the best way to improve access to justice for victims, and I have considered the Justice Committee’s comments in the Stage 1 report on this.

I intend to look at Lord Bonomy’s detailed recommendations as a package, alongside the corroboration requirement itself, and form a view on the best way forward. I do not believe there is sufficient time to complete this work before the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill resumes its Parliamentary passage. Therefore the Government is now proposing, subject to Stage 2 consideration, that Bill should therefore proceed without the provisions abolishing the corroboration requirement, and without the related increase in the jury majority required for conviction.

I will consider whether any of the Review’s recommendations could be taken forward this Parliamentary session, as I am aware that some of the recommendations are relevant to Part 1 of the Bill. If we are intending to take forward any changes in the Bill, I will ensure we give the Committee as much notice as possible of any amendments. However, I believe that the majority of Lord Bonomy’s recommendations will require longer consideration.

Michael Matheson
Cabinet Secretary for Justice
21 April 2015
Ar faidhle/Our ref: KM/CJBill

25 August 2015

Dear Christine,

CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL

Parliamentary scrutiny of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill will re-commence in September and I am writing to provide an update to the Committee on the Bill, given the period of time which has elapsed since Stage 1.

Overview of the Bill’s content

As set out in the Policy Memorandum, the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is the legislative vehicle to take forward the next stage of essential reforms to the Scottish criminal justice system. The Bill achieves this by taking forward and further developing the majority of the recommendations of two independent reviews of key aspects of the criminal justice system. The Bill also includes a number of other key provisions which the Scottish Government considers also assist in meeting its overall objectives of ensuring a Safer and Stronger Scotland in which public services are high quality, continually improving, effective and responsive to local people's needs.
The Bill comprises three elements:

- Provisions which have been developed from the recommendations of Lord Carloway’s Review of Scottish Criminal Law and Practice (these reforms would modernise arrest, custody and questioning procedures, enhance protections for the accused);
- Provisions which have been developed from the recommendations of Sheriff Principal Bowen’s Independent Review of Sheriff and Jury Procedure (to enable and promote the efficient and effective management of sheriff and jury cases including enabling earlier communication between the prosecution and defence and help active judicial case management); and
- A number of additional relevant provisions which take forward a range of key justice priorities.

The additional provisions which are being taken forward by the Bill are intended to complement the reforms which are based on Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s recommendations by implementing a key range of justice priorities or efficiency measures. On introduction the additional provisions contained in the Bill were:

- Raising the maximum custodial sentences available to courts for handling offensive weapons offences, including knife possession, from four to five years;
- Making clearer the law on court powers to impose sentences on offenders who commit offences while on early release;
- Introducing a people trafficking criminal aggravation when sentencing for other crimes with a connection to people trafficking (this has now been superceded by the recent Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Bill);
- Enabling increased use of live TV links;
- Changing the method of juror citation; and
- Retaining a collective bargaining mechanism in Scotland for the negotiation of police officer pay, following the Home Secretary’s decision to abolish the UK Police Negotiating Board.

Parliamentary Process to date

The Bill was introduced to Parliament on 20 June 2013. Your Committee took evidence on the Bill over the course of 11 sessions, and on 6 February 2014 published its report on the Bill. I note that the Committee’s Stage 1 Report supported the general principles of the Bill, with the exception of the corroboration reform, where a majority of the Committee recommended these provisions be removed. The Bill was then debated on 27 February 2014, and Parliament approved its general principles.

As you will recall alongside the Stage 1 consideration of this Bill, on 6 February 2014 Kenny MacAskill, the former Cabinet Secretary for Justice, announced that Lord Bonyon would head an independent reference group to consider what additional safeguards and changes to law and practice may be needed to Scotland’s criminal justice system following the then planned abolition of the corroboration requirement in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Lord Bonyon published his final report in April 2015 and this is available on the Scottish Government website.
The Scottish Government proposed abolishing the corroboration requirement to improve access to justice for victims of crimes committed in private, including domestic abuse and sexual offences. Following completion of Lord Bonomy’s Post-corroboration Safeguards Review, it was clear that substantial additional changes would be required alongside abolition. Given this, and the lack of consensus on this reform, I announced to Parliament on 21 April 2015 that the Scottish Government accepted that abolition should not go forward in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, and I would instead consider and work with stakeholders towards a greater degree of consensus on a package of reforms. This work will begin later this year and will include consideration of Lord Bonomy’s recommendations alongside the corroboration requirement itself.

I will now move on to address the parts of the Bill in order and provide an update to the Committee on the Scottish Government’s position on the points raised in your Stage 1 report and advise on the amendments which I intend to lodge for the Committee’s consideration at Stage 2.

Part 1 – Police powers

Part 1 of the Bill creates a new regime for arrest, custody and questioning of suspects. The underlying purpose of the changes is to:

- modernise and clarify the system of arrest, custody and questioning to ensure the rights of accused persons and the victims of crime remain appropriately balanced;
- simplify and clarify the process of arrest;
- ensure people are not unnecessarily or disproportionately held in custody;
- create flexibility to manage criminal investigations, balancing the needs of the enquiry, public safety and the fundamental human rights of suspects;
- set out clearly when a person’s right to access a solicitor arises, how it is communicated and when these rights can be waived;
- provide powers to question a person after they have been officially accused of an offence;
- provide the highest standard of protection for children involved in the formal criminal justice process; and
- ensure vulnerable adult suspects are not disadvantaged during police procedures

Implementation – Training and i6

The Committee raised concerns at Stage 1 about the burden Part 1 of the Bill could place on Police Scotland, particularly alongside the implementation and roll-out of i6.

The Scottish Government continues to work closely with Police Scotland and the Scottish Police Authority on the practicalities and financial impact of implementing the Bill and its interaction with the i6 programme to ensure the timetable for implementation is achievable.

Implementation had previously been planned for April 2016. Work is already well under way on developing the Police Scotland training programme. Taking into account the scale of the training exercise required – alongside the training requirements for the i6 roll-out, which is commencing this year – the Scottish Government believes it would be more appropriate to work towards implementation in autumn 2016.
Chapter 1 – Arrest

Terminology

In its Stage 1 report, the Committee accepted the benefit of simplifying the powers of arrest but commented that the new terminology could be confusing. In particular, the Committee said the public and the media may not be able to distinguish between a person who has been arrested but not “officially accused” and a person who has been arrested and has been “officially accused”. Concerns were also expressed about the term “de-arrest” in relation to proposals to allow the police to release a person when the grounds for arrest no longer exist.

We continue to believe the terminology used is clear. The presumption of innocence remains after someone is arrested and whether a person is guilty, of course, is a matter for the courts. The Government agrees with Lord Carloway that having a single process – arrest – for taking a suspect into custody makes for a clearer system. The term “de-arrest” is not used in the Bill and the Government does not intend to take this forward in the amendments planned for Stage 2.

Suspect anonymity
The Committee recognised that the issue of suspect anonymity is problematic but considered it merits further consideration and every effort should be made to ensure the reputation of the accused is not detrimentally affected by the provisions in the Bill.

The Scottish Government remains confident the police will make every effort to avoid disclosure of a suspect’s identity to the media. The principle of innocent until proven guilty is well understood. There are no current plans to make changes to the current position.

Defining arrest
The Committee noted there was no consensus from witnesses on whether to define arrest but decided on balance they would rather have a definition in the Bill, and I am aware John Pentland has lodged an amendment which would define arrest.

The Scottish Government remains convinced that attempting to define arrest in the Bill is unnecessary. The Scottish Government believes leaving the term to take its natural meaning within the context of the Bill will allow the new system to operate smoothly and alongside other legislation which makes provision about arrest.

Arrest for attempts/conspiracy
In its Stage 1 report, the Committee highlighted the differing viewpoints of the police and the Scottish Human Rights Commission on scope for the police to arrest people who have done nothing wrong and called on the Scottish Government to further consider this issue.

We have continued to engage with stakeholders on this. The Bill as introduced only allows a police officer to arrest a person if they have reasonable grounds for suspecting that person has committed or is committing an offence. This would be sufficient to arrest a person on suspicion that they have attempted or are conspiring to commit an offence because attempts and conspiracies to commit offences are criminal offences in their own right.

There is nothing in the Bill which will permit the police to arrest a person without grounds for suspecting that person has committed an offence.
Release from arrest
The Committee wanted to ensure “de-arrest” does not lead to a situation where people are arrested without a proper assessment on whether arrest was appropriate.

The Scottish Government is persuaded that it should be possible for the police to release an arrested person, prior to arrival at a police station in certain circumstances. I intend to lodge amendments at Stage 2 to make provision for this. The amendment will allow a person to be released prior to arriving at a police station only if there are no longer reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing the offence for which they were arrested or an offence arising from the same circumstances. The amendments will include a requirement to record the reasons why an arrestee is released before arriving at a police station.

The police have an equivalent power at present in relation to people they detain under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and its use is very limited. On this basis, I would not expect the power to release an arrestee before arriving at a police station to be used often in practice.

It will continue to be possible to release a suspect where a constable charges the person with an offence and having done so decides that the persons presence at the police station will not be required.

Letter of rights
The Committee, in their Stage 1 report asked the Scottish Government to respond to the suggestion of some witnesses that information to be given to suspects as police stations should be provided both verbally and in writing with a view to ensuring that they clearly understand their rights.

Section 5 of the Bill places, on a statutory footing, that such information required to satisfy the EU Directive on the Right of Information in Criminal Proceedings, must be provided verbally or in writing as soon as reasonably practicable.

Since July 2013, a letter of rights, conveying information about the right of access to a lawyer has been provided to every suspect who is in a police station. The letter of rights was consulted on ahead of its introduction in July 2013. It was also welcomed by the Justice Committee at Stage One. This letter has been drafted in accessible language and is also available translated into 34 languages. In order to strengthen and simplify the advice that is given to all suspects, and to ensure compliance with the Directive, the Scottish Government worked with key stakeholders since 2013 to improve the letter of rights, and to also create separate versions designed to be accessible for children and those with learning difficulties and disabilities. Copies of all the letters can be found on the Scottish Government website.

In the course of discussions with stakeholders, various representatives made clear their opposition to requiring the police to verbally read the letter to all suspects. Police Scotland have indicated that they already endeavour to ensure all suspects understand their rights, reading the letter to suspects where necessary. However, they have estimated that reading the letter to all c.200,000 suspects processed each year would equate to an additional 16,666 hours of police time per annum.

I consider that the key issue is that individuals are provided with an effective and appropriately drafted letter of rights and given the opportunity to read and absorb the information.
An officer having to read through the whole letter, may add to what is already a confusing and stressful situation. My view is that having the letter read out to all suspects would not represent an additional safeguard. However, as part of the development of 16, Police Scotland have now built in an additional question which they will ask suspects during the booking in process. Suspects will be asked whether or not they wish the letter of rights to be read out to them. In my view, this is a proportionate way to address the understandable concerns that has been raised of the need to ensure all suspects fully understand their rights.

Given the above, I am convinced that the Bill offers the necessary safeguards and retains the flexibility to enable officers to read the letter of rights to suspects who wish them to do so.

Chapter 2 – Custody

Detention limits
The Bill as introduced allows a person to be kept in custody for a maximum of 12 hours. During Stage 1, the Scottish Government made a commitment to consider extending that in exceptional circumstances.

The Committee noted there were mixed views among members on whether detention beyond six hours is necessary. It recognised, however, there may also be situations where it could be necessary to consider extending beyond the 12 hour limit and sought further information on the exceptional circumstances in which such an extension might be granted, how often such extensions are likely to be granted and how the Scottish Government intends to ensure that extensions do not become the norm.

The Scottish Government listened to the evidence at Stage 1 and has continued to consider the appropriate detention limits. The purpose of the custody provisions is to strike an appropriate balance, ensuring no one is held unnecessarily or disproportionately, protecting the rights of suspects and victims while giving flexibility to carry out effective investigations. When the custody provisions are considered as a package, I believe it is clear the detention limit is not a target but the absolute maximum and the system is designed to ensure unnecessarily prolonged detentions cannot become the norm.

There are several safeguards built into the process. These include requirements for the initial custody authorisation to be given by a police officer who has not been involved in the investigation and for a mandatory custody review by an Inspector after six hours. In both cases, custody can only be authorised if the statutory test in section 10 of the Bill is satisfied. The provisions should also be read with the general duty on the police in section 41 to take every precaution to ensure a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

As the Committee noted in the Stage 1 report, statistics from June 2013 show the 80.4 per cent of people detained under the current legislation are held for up to six hours. 19.2 per cent of persons were detained for between six and 12 hours. Only 0.4 per cent of detainees (13 people in the month of June 2013) were held for a further period of up to 12 hours. Those 0.4 per cent of cases are the exceptional cases under the current legislation. The Stage 1 written evidence from Police Scotland includes detailed case studies of when such extensions are needed (see Appendix B of the written evidence submitted by Police Scotland in August 2013).

The Bill will create the new option of releasing a person on investigative liberation part way through the 12 hour custody period and arresting them again at a later stage. Investigative liberation will provide vital flexibility in investigations, allowing time for complex and technical examinations of documents, telephones and computers to take place. In order to balance the interests of justice and protect the public, investigative liberation will be limited to taking place over a 28 day period, and a person may be released subject to conditions.

Police Scotland have made the case that several factors can combine to create exceptional cases where extensions to the 12 hour period may be required. These factors tend to affect the timing of when interviews can start, rather than the length of the interviews required. Police Scotland have also provided assurances that the purpose of extensions is to ensure interviews are conducted in circumstances fair to suspects – and victims – and to allow the police to conclude enquiries properly and gather sufficient evidence in order to charge a suspect. Some possible factors include:

- Suspects and victims may be too exhausted, traumatised, drunk or under the influence of drugs to be interviewed immediately after an arrest takes place and the suspect is brought to a police station. This is more likely when people are arrested late at night. In such cases, best practice in the public interest – and the interest of fairness – is to allow people a period to sober up or rest before interview.

- Urgent work may be needed to interview victims, trace witnesses and conduct other investigations – for example, examine a crime scene – before or at the same time as interviewing a suspect. It may not be in the interests of public safety to release a person suspected of a serious and violent offence on investigative liberation while such investigations take place.

- In some cases, it is considered best practice to examine a crime scene during daylight hours, even if an initial arrest took place at night. This may apply, for example, to examination of bed clothes at a rape scene. Releasing a suspect on investigative liberation in these circumstances, immediately after a suspected murder or rape may not be safe for the victim or the suspect.

- Forensic medical examinations may be required before interviews can take place. In areas of rural Scotland, victims and suspects may need to travel to specialist police medical suites or for examination by a Police Casualty Surgeon. These examinations and the travel times involved may reduce the time remaining for conducting interviews within the 12 hour detention limit.

- Other people – for example, interpreters and appropriate adults – may be required before interviews can commence. It is in the interests of justice and human rights that such people are present at interviews but it may take time to assess what support is required for an individual suspect and then arrange for the specialists to attend. Delays are possible if a suspect’s needs are not immediately evident because they are also drunk or on drugs. These factors can reduce the time available for conducting interviews and, in complex cases extending the detention period beyond 12 hours may become necessary.

It is possible to extend detention periods by a further 12 hours under the current legislation, but not under the Bill as introduced. Suspects in serious and complex cases affected by the factors I have set out above would therefore have to be released under the Bill if the 12 hour period expired before the police had obtained sufficient evidence to charge them with an offence.
This is a complex issue and one where, as the Committee has noted, there is a range of views amongst stakeholders. I am therefore giving further consideration to the approach the Government wishes to take at Stage 2.

Investigative liberation – impact on private life

The Committee sought assurances that investigative liberation will not have an unnecessary impact on a suspect's private life.

The Scottish Government has considered this matter further. In addition to the existing safeguards in the Bill, I plan to lodge amendments to ensure investigation liberation conditions can only be imposed for 28 consecutive days and cannot include curfews.

Investigative liberation – notification of victims

The Committee asked the Scottish Government to work with COPFS to ensure that, where they may be at risk, complainers are always informed timeously of the suspect's release on investigative liberation and of any conditions applied.

The Scottish Government continues to discuss with stakeholders the processes which will be required as a result of the Bill, including the process of notifying complainers where a suspect is released on investigative liberation.

Investigative liberation – resource implications

The Committee noted there were resource implications relating to investigative liberation.

The Scottish Government will continue to work closely with Police Scotland in relation to implementation of the Bill to ensure Police Scotland has adequate resources to deal with investigative liberation.

Custody cases – times in custody/court sitting times

The Committee was not convinced that specifying time-limits for periods in custody was not necessary at this Stage in light of the Police Scotland led working Group that has been set up to consider the issue. This working group continues to report regularly to the Justice Board and is now developing possible options, involving a limited number of courts being open seven days a week supplemented by video conferencing for some first appearances, for possible piloting. I will of course keep the Committee informed once any final decision is taken with regard to these potential options.

Chapter 4 - Police interview

The Committee welcomed the extension of the right to access to a solicitor to all suspects held in police custody. As Committee members will be aware, Lord Bonomy's Post-corroboration Safeguards Review Final Report recommended that “Scottish Ministers should forthwith abolish the requirement for some suspects to pay a contribution towards the cost of legal advice and assistance provided to them while they are in a police office”. I have considered this recommendation and will bring forward regulations which will remove the requirement for suspects to pay a contribution towards the advice they receive at a police station.

I also intend to lodge an amendment to section 23 of the Bill. Section 3 of the Bill deals with information to be given on arrest. This is that a person must be informed that the person is under arrest; the reason for the arrest; that the person is under no obligation to say anything other than to give the information specified in section 26(3) (outlined above); that they have a right to have intimation sent to a solicitor under section 35 and access to a solicitor under section 36. Section 3 however also provides that a person must be informed of the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested. Section 23 as currently drafted does not contain the requirement to tell a suspect what offence they are suspected of committing. It is proposed therefore that an amendment be brought forward to section 23 to provide for this. The amendment will ensure consistency with section 3 and will act as an additional safeguard for suspects.

Post Charge Questioning
I remain of the view that, as recommended by Lord Carloway, post-charge questioning has an important role to play in the investigation of crime. I intend to introduce amendments to put beyond doubt that the suspect in this position is entitled to the same rights and protections as the suspect who is being questioned before charge; and, on top of that, to provide that the suspect must be informed of any conditions attached by the court to its authorisation of post-charge questioning (such as restrictions on the nature of the questions, or a time limit).

Chapter 5 - Child Suspects

In its Stage 1 report, the Committee noted that the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill defines a child as a person up to the age of 18 and asked the Scottish Government to explain why there appears to be inconsistency between the protections for under-18s in this Bill compared with this recent legislation. In our response we said:

"While it might appear attractive to treat all individuals under 18 years consistently, the age-based laws which allow for 17 year olds to be living independently and marry reflect the quite different contexts and degrees of self-determination that can exist between a 10 and a 17 year old. The Scottish Government prefers an approach which would allow children aged 16 and 17 years to make their own decisions with safeguards in place to support them in this."

After further consideration following discussions with Police Scotland and the Scottish Children's Reporter Administration, we now believe amendments are required to improve the protections afforded to children in custody as the current Bill provisions are inconsistent with existing requirements set out in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Amendments will therefore be lodged at Stage 2 and relate to:

- young people aged 16 and 17 years of age who are subject to a Compulsory Supervision Order (or Interim Compulsory Supervisions Order) under the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. It has been proposed the Bill should specifically set out that all children who are subject to such Orders, and specifically those aged 16 and 17 years of age, should be treated in the same way as those aged under 16 years of age. Most significantly, this will remove their right to waive access to a solicitor.

- the need for the Bill to make specific provisions for the protection of child suspects whilst in police custody. The inclusion of those provisions will necessitate the repeal of certain provisions currently set out in the 1995 Act, specifically in relation to children being held in a place of safety pending their appearance at court. The new provisions propose to retain the use of places of safety with the continued provision of the rights of access to a parent, guardian or responsible person and access to a solicitor.
Chapter 5 – vulnerable persons

The Bill makes provision relating to the support arrangements for certain vulnerable persons in police custody, at section 33. This was intended to reflect Lord Carloway’s recommendations in relation to vulnerable adult suspects and, as he defined those under 18 as children, this section currently applies only to those over that age.

At Stage 1, however, it was suggested by organisations including Police Scotland and the Scottish Appropriate Adult Network that this provision be extended to include 16 and 17 year olds, to reflect current practice whereby appropriate adult support is available to vulnerable suspects aged 16 and over.

As the Bill already makes important distinctions between those under 16 years of age and those aged 16 and 17, and to avoid creating a potential disparity between the support provided for vulnerable suspects over 16 and those over 18, I consider that this safeguard should be extended. Amendments to apply section 33 to those over the age of 16 will be lodged at Stage 2.

Part 2 – Corroboration

As mentioned above, at this time, the Scottish Government accepts a consensus has not yet been reached about removing the requirement for corroboration in criminal cases. I am mindful members of your Committee have previously expressed concerns about this reform going ahead in this Bill and Margaret Mitchell has lodged amendments to remove the relevant sections from the Bill. The consideration of these amendments is, of course, now a matter for the Committee but I can confirm the Government is supportive of removing the reform from this Bill. We also plan to lodge an amendment to remove the increase to the jury majority provision from the Bill as we consider this reform to be linked to the abolition of the corroboration reform. As I mentioned in my statement to Parliament in April, we will, however, begin further work on creating a wider package of reforms and Lord Bony’s recommendations and the corroboration rule will be considered in this context.

In the meantime, I have considered whether any of the other suggestions made by Lord Bony can be taken forward at this stage. One of Lord Bony’s recommendations was that the prosecutorial test – the criteria applied by prosecutors when deciding whether or not to initiate proceedings – should be published by the Lord Advocate. It seems reasonable to me that it should, and I am therefore considering whether to bring forward an appropriate amendment at stage 2.

Part 3 – Solemn Procedure

The Bill as introduced places a duty on the prosecution and the defence to prepare joint written record, advising on the state of preparedness of a case. This joint written record must be submitted to the court no less than two days before the first diet by the Procurator Fiscal. The purpose of the written record is to ensure cases proceed to trial in an orderly fashion with such matters as can be agreed in advance having been resolved.

There were concerns from a number of stakeholders that separate written records should instead be lodged by both the defence and the Procurator Fiscal. The Committee in their Stage 1 report commented: “The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to review whether the Bill could usefully be amended to allow individual written records on the state of preparedness of cases to be submitted by the defence and prosecution.”
Since Stage 1, there have been ongoing discussions with Scottish Courts and Tribunals Service and the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service on this issue. As a result of these discussions, the Scottish Government plans to bring forward amendments to the Bill to allow for a written record to be lodged separately by the Procurator Fiscal and the defence. I also intend to lodge amendments to provide the Criminal Courts Rules Council with the power to enable a joint written record to be a requirement in the future should that become necessary in light of experience with the separate written record.

Part 4 – Sentencing

The Bill includes provisions relating to the maximum penalties for handling offensive weapons and the sentencing of prisoners who commit new offences while on early release from existing sentences. These provisions were generally welcomed during Stage 1 scrutiny and no Scottish Government amendments are planned in this area at Stage 2.

Part 5 – Appeals and SCCRC

The Bill has a policy objective of speeding up appeals and it proposes that, when deciding whether to allow an appeal late, the test the High Court should apply is to ask itself whether there are exceptional circumstances for doing so.

The Committee noted concerns that, in applying a higher test for allowing late appeals, cases with merit may not be heard unless they meet an exceptional circumstances test. The Committee asked the Scottish Government to consider the Law Society of Scotland’s recommendation that sections 76 and 77 be redrafted with an emphasis on the interests of justice.

The Scottish Government has considered these recommendations but remains of the view an “interests of justice” test would fail to get across that an appeal should be allowed to proceed in breach of the time limits in exceptional circumstances.

This part of the Bill also includes provisions relating to the powers of the High Court when considering appeal cases that originate by way of a reference from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC). We note the Stage 1 report recommendation in this area to change the provisions so that the High Court would no longer consider ‘interests of justice’ when deciding SCCRC referred appeal cases.

Part 6 – Miscellaneous

Human trafficking

I intend to lodge amendments to remove Chapter 1 of Part 6 as these have now been superceded by provisions contained in the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Bill, which is currently before Parliament.

Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

This legislation will establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland, which will retain collective bargaining for police officer terms and conditions in Scotland, which has been abolished in the rest of the UK. In addition to the amendments I intend to lodge relating to the general operation and administration of the new body, I will also lodge amendments to enable arbitration on matters under the remit of the PNBS, to be binding on the Scottish Ministers. This will be under specific circumstances as set out in regulations and in the PNBS constitution (the constitution will also be brought in to effect by regulations and therefore subject to Parliamentary scrutiny).

TV links and electronic signatures

The Bill includes provisions intended to allow for the greater use of TV links in court proceedings. Since stage 1, the Scottish Government has launched its Digital Strategy for Justice, which provides a framework for the greater use of digital technology throughout the justice system. So as well as minor amendments in respect of the provisions on TV links, I intend to lodge amendments to permit more widespread use of electronic signatures in criminal proceedings, which will assist in ensuring that organisations can realise the full benefits of conducting business electronically.

Other Issues

The Committee asked to be kept updated on work in relation to the possibility of raising the minimum age of criminal responsibility. We note that Alison McInnes has lodged an amendment which would raise the age from eight to 12.

I can advise that policy in relation to the minimum age of criminal responsibility remains under active consideration and the underlying issues - including disclosure of criminal records, forensic samples, police investigatory powers, victims and community confidence - are complex. It is our view therefore that it is not appropriate to add such a substantial, complex and potentially controversial issue to the Bill without properly assessing these important underlying issues which are not addressed at all through Alison McInnes’ amendment. Stage 2 of the Bill is also not the appropriate vehicle to address the issues.

We therefore intend to oppose the amendment on the basis that the underlying issues need to be fully worked through and there is a strong argument for further consultation before any change is committed to.

Police Investigation Review Commissioner (PIRC)

I also intend to rectify an omission in legislation to extend certain provisions under the Police Act 1997 to apply to directly employed staff rather than only "staff officers" of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner. The definition of "staff officers" is a police officer seconded from the police service. The omission creates a problem for property interference authorisations by the PIRC under that legislation as the Commissioner does not have any seconded staff from the police service.

Stop and Search

An independent Advisory Group, chaired by John Scott QC, is examining the use of stop and search powers in Scotland, in particular whether consensual stop and search should continue, whether the practice overall should be subject to a code of practice and whether any additional steps require to be taken, including any consequent legislation or change in practice that may be necessary. The group will make its recommendations by the end of August.

Alison McInnes has already lodged amendments which would end consensual stop and search and introduce a statutory code of practice.
Once I have considered the Advisory Group's report and recommendations, I intend to lodge any appropriate amendments at Stage 2. As the Advisory Group is not due to report until the end of August, it would be helpful if the Committee could take this into account when scheduling its consideration of Stop and Search.

I hope this detailed update on the Bill is helpful to you and members of the Committee.

With Best Wishes,

[Signature]

MICHAEL MATHESON
Present:
Christian Allard  Jayne Baxter
Roderick Campbell  John Finnie
Christine Grahame (Convener)  Margaret Mitchell
Elaine Murray (Deputy Convener)  Gil Paterson

Apologies were received from Alison McInnes.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Christine Grahame (Convener) moved—

S4M-14094--That the Justice Committee considers the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at Stage 2 in the following order: Part 2 (with schedule 2 being taken after section 61), Parts 3 to 5, Part 6 (with schedule 3 being taken after section 87), Part 1 (with schedule 1 being taken after section 52), Part 7 and the long title (with any amendment inserting a new Part before or after an existing Part being taken before or after the existing Part in accordance with this order).

The motion was agreed to.
Ar fàidhle/Our ref:

2nd September 2015

Dear Christine,

STOP AND SEARCH ADVISORY GROUP REPORT - CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL

In my letter to you of 25 August I provided the Committee with an update on the Criminal Justice Bill. I said that an independent Advisory Group, chaired by John Scott QC, was examining the use of stop and search powers in Scotland and that the group would make its recommendations by the end of August. I said that once I had considered the Advisory Group’s report and recommendations, I intended to lodge any appropriate amendments at Stage 2.

I thank the Committee for taking the timing of this report into account when scheduling its consideration of Stop and Search.

The Advisory Group has now reported to me, and I wish to give the Committee advance notice that I intend laying this report in Parliament at 10am on Thursday 3 September. A copy of the report will also be sent to Committee members and all MSPs.
As expected, the report has made recommendations that will require amendments to the Criminal Justice Bill. For example, it recommends that there should be a statutory code of practice, and that a draft code of practice should be consulted on before implementation. I therefore intend lodging the necessary amendments to give effect to the report's recommendations at Stage 2 of the Bill.

I hope this letter is helpful to you and members of the Committee.

Best wishes,

MICHAEL MATHESON
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

1st Marshalled List of Amendments for Stage 2

The Bill will be considered in the following order—

- Sections 57 to 61 Schedule 2
- Sections 62 to 87 Schedule 3
- Sections 1 to 52 Schedule 1
- Sections 53 to 56 Sections 88 to 91
- Long Title

Amendments marked * are new (including manuscript amendments) or have been altered.

Before section 57

Graeme Pearson

9* Before section 57, insert—

<PART

SCOTTISH CRIMINAL EVIDENCE AND PROCEDURE COMMISSION

Scottish Criminal Evidence and Procedure Commission

(1) There is established a body to be known as the Scottish Criminal Evidence and Procedure Commission ("the Commission").

(2) The purpose of the Commission is to report to the Scottish Parliament by 31 December 2015 on the matters specified in subsection (3).

(3) The matters referred to in subsection (2) are—

(a) to review the law relating to evidence and procedure in criminal cases in Scotland,
(b) to consider the need for the requirement for corroboration in criminal proceedings, and
(c) to consider changes to the law relating to evidence and procedure in criminal cases that would be required if the requirement for corroboration is removed.

(4) The Commission—

(a) is not a servant or agent of the Crown, and
(b) has no status, immunity or privilege of the Crown.

(5) Any property held by the Commission is not property of, or property held on behalf of, the Crown.

(6) The Commission is to consist of not fewer than 5 members.

(7) Members of the Commission are to be appointed by Her Majesty on the recommendation of the First Minister, following approval by the Scottish Parliament of the proposed nomination.

(8) At least one third of the members must be persons who are—
(a) members of the Faculty of Advocates, or
(b) solicitors who are enrolled in the roll of solicitors kept under section 7 of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980, of at least 10 years’ standing.

(9) At least one third of the members must be persons who appear to the First Minister to have practical knowledge of the rights of, and support for, victims and witnesses in criminal proceedings.

(10) One of the members mentioned in subsection (9) is to be appointed by Her Majesty, on the recommendation of the First Minister, to chair the Commission.

Section 57
Margaret Mitchell
Supported by: Alison McInnes
1 Leave out section 57

Section 58
Margaret Mitchell
Supported by: Alison McInnes
2 Leave out section 58

Section 59
Margaret Mitchell
Supported by: Alison McInnes
3 Leave out section 59

Section 60
Margaret Mitchell
Supported by: Alison McInnes
4 Leave out section 60

Section 61
Margaret Mitchell
Supported by: Alison McInnes
5 Leave out section 61

Schedule 2
Margaret Mitchell
Supported by: Alison McInnes
6 Leave out schedule 2
Section 62

Michael Matheson
66 Move section 62 to after section 85

After section 62

Alison McInnes
54 After section 62, insert—

<PART

AGE OF CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

Age of criminal responsibility
In section 41 (age of criminal responsibility) of the 1995 Act, for the word “eight” there is substituted “12”.>

Michael McMahon
102 After section 62, insert—

<PART

REMOVAL OF THE NOT PROVEN VERDICT

Removal of the not proven verdict
After section 292 of the 1995 Act insert—

“Available verdicts

292A Available verdicts
There are only two verdicts available in criminal proceedings, guilty and not guilty.”>

Section 66

Michael Matheson
67 In section 66, page 28, leave out lines 22 to 25

Section 70

Michael McMahon
103 In section 70, page 31, line 38, leave out from <the> to end of line and insert <for “subsection (2)” substitute “section 90ZA”,>

Michael McMahon
104 In section 70, page 32, line 11, leave out from <is> to end of line 16 and insert <must return a verdict of not guilty if it is unable to return a verdict of guilty.”>

Michael Matheson
68 Leave out section 70
After section 71

Margaret Mitchell

After section 71, insert—

Commission to review prisoner release arrangements

(1) The Scottish Ministers are to establish a commission for the purpose of reviewing the rules governing the release of offenders from prison (in particular any arrangements under which prisoners are automatically released at a particular point in, or after serving a specified proportion of, their sentence).

(2) The commission to be established under subsection (1) is to consist of no fewer than six members, who are to have such experience in relation to the criminal justice system and matters to do with offenders and offending (and reoffending) behaviour as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) The commission to be established under subsection (1) is to make a final report to the Scottish Parliament no later than 31 December 2016.

After section 72

Margaret Mitchell

After section 72, insert—

Release of prisoners other than life prisoners

For section 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 there is substituted—

“1 Release of prisoners other than life prisoners

(1) This section applies to all prisoners other than life prisoners.

(2) As soon as a prisoner has served the term of imprisonment specified in the prisoner’s sentence, the Scottish Ministers must, unless the prisoner has already been released under subsection (3) or section 3(1), release the prisoner unconditionally.

(3) As soon as a prisoner has served five-sixths of the term of imprisonment specified in the prisoner’s sentence, the Scottish Ministers must, if recommended to do so by the Parole Board, release the prisoner on licence.”

Section 82

Christine Grahame

In section 82, page 37, line 18, leave out from <for> to end of line 27 and insert <the words “, subject to section 194DA of this Act,” are repealed.>

Christine Grahame

In section 82, page 37, line 28, at end insert—

( ) In section 194C, subsection (2) is repealed.
After section 82

Mary Fee

107 After section 82, insert—

<PART

CHILDREN AFFECTED BY PARENTAL IMPRISONMENT

National strategy on the impact of sentencing on children affected by parental imprisonment

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, before the end of the period of one year beginning with the day of Royal Assent, lay before the Parliament draft regulations making provision for the development and implementation of a national strategy focusing on—

(a) the use of child and family impact assessments,

(b) the types of custodial and non-custodial sentences which should be considered by the courts where a person who is responsible for a child has been convicted of an offence,

(c) the appropriateness and effectiveness of different types of custodial and non-custodial sentences which could be imposed where a person who is responsible for a child has been convicted of an offence, and

(d) the impact of custodial sentences on children affected by parental imprisonment.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(3) Before laying draft regulations before the Parliament, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) local authorities,

(b) the Scottish Police Authority,

(c) Health Boards,

(d) children and families affected by parental imprisonment,

(e) organisations working for and on behalf of children,

(f) organisations working for and on behalf of—

(i) prisoners,

(ii) children and families affected by parental imprisonment, and

(g) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(4) For the purposes of such a consultation, the Scottish Ministers must—

(a) lay a copy of the proposed draft regulations before the Parliament,

(b) publish in such manner as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate a copy of the proposed draft regulations, and

(c) have regard to any representations about the proposed draft regulations that are made to them within 60 days of the date on which the copy of the proposed draft regulations is laid before the Parliament.

(5) In calculating any period of 60 days for the purposes of subsection (4)(c), no account is to be taken of any time during which the Parliament is dissolved or is in recess for more than 4 days.
(6) When laying regulations before the Parliament under subsection (1), the Scottish Ministers must also lay before the Parliament an explanatory document giving details of—

(a) the consultation carried out under subsection (3),

(b) any representations received as a result of the consultation, and

(c) the changes (if any) made to the proposed draft regulations as a result of those representations.

(7) In this Part—

“child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years,

“Health Board” means a board constituted by an order under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978.

(8) In this Part—

(a) references to children affected by parental imprisonment are references to children, a person with responsibility for whom has been—

(i) remanded in custody awaiting trial,

(ii) found by a court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment and has been remanded in custody awaiting sentence, or

(iii) sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention,

(b) references to a person with responsibility for a child are references to—

(i) a person who has parental responsibilities (within the meaning of section 1(3) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995) in relation to a child,

(ii) a person who—

(A) is otherwise legally liable to maintain a child, or

(B) has care of a child.

Mary Fee

108 After section 82, insert—

Annual report: sentencing and the impact of parental imprisonment

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after the end of each reporting period, lay before the Parliament a report outlining, in respect of the reporting year to which it relates—

(a) the total number of people who have responsibility for a child who have been remanded in custody or sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention,

(b) the total number of people who have responsibility for a child who have been convicted of an offence and sentenced to a non-custodial sentence,

(c) the total number of child and family impact assessments undertaken where people who have responsibility for a child have been remanded in custody or were sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention, and

(d) confirmation of the total number of children who, following a child and family impact assessment being undertaken, required a child’s plan under section 33 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.
(2) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after laying a report under subsection (1) before the Parliament, publish the report in such manner as they consider appropriate.

(3) In this section, “reporting year” means each period of one year beginning on 1 April, with the first such period beginning on the 1 April first occurring after Royal Assent.

Mary Fee

109 After section 82, insert—

Duty to undertake a child and family impact assessment

(1) Subsection (2) applies where a person who has responsibility for a child—

(a) has been remanded in custody awaiting trial,

(b) has been found by a court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment and has been remanded in custody awaiting sentence, or

(c) has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention.

(2) The court must ensure that an assessment (a “child and family impact assessment”) is carried out to determine the likely impact of the imprisonment or other detention on the wellbeing of the child, and to identify any support and assistance which will be necessary to meet the child’s wellbeing needs.

(3) A child and family impact assessment must be undertaken as soon as reasonably practicable after the period of imprisonment or other detention has been imposed on the person.

(4) A child and family impact assessment must—

(a) consider how the imprisonment or other detention is likely to affect the wellbeing of any child for whom the person is responsible,

(b) identify the wellbeing needs of any child arising from the imprisonment or other detention,

(c) confirm any actions to be taken, as a result of the child and family impact assessment, to ensure that the child’s wellbeing needs are met,

(d) confirm who is to be responsible for taking those actions,

(e) provide advice and information about what can best be done to address the wellbeing needs of the child, and

(f) specify arrangements for a future review of the child and family impact assessment.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision requiring such persons (or descriptions of persons) as may be prescribed in the regulations to undertake a child and family impact assessment under subsection (2).

(6) Regulations under subsection (5) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Before section 83

Michael Matheson

69 Before section 83, insert—
CHAPTER

Publication of prosecutorial test

(1) The Lord Advocate must make available to the public a statement setting out in general terms the matters about which a prosecutor requires to be satisfied in order to initiate, and continue with, criminal proceedings in respect of any offence.

(2) The reference in subsection (1) to a prosecutor is to one within the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

Section 83
Michael Matheson
70 Leave out section 83

Section 84
Michael Matheson
71 Leave out section 84

Section 85
Michael Matheson
72 Leave out section 85

Section 86
Michael Matheson
73 In section 86, page 39, line 24, leave out <, a detained person is to participate in a specified> and insert <at any time before or at a specified hearing, a detained person is to participate in the>

Michael Matheson
74 In section 86, page 39, line 32, leave out <an ad hoc hearing held> and insert <any proceedings at a specified hearing or otherwise in the case>

Michael Matheson
75 In section 86, page 39, line 35, leave out  and insert <any specified hearing or other proceedings>

Michael Matheson
76 In section 86, page 39, line 37, after <hearing> insert <or other proceedings>

Michael Matheson
77 In section 86, page 40, line 1, after <hearing> insert <or other proceedings>

Michael Matheson
78 In section 86, page 40, line 6, leave out  insert <any specified hearing or other proceedings>
In section 86, page 40, line 9, after <charge> insert <on any complaint or indictment>

Michael Matheson
80 In section 86, page 40, line 16, leave out from beginning to <where> in line 21 and insert—

<(3) The court may postpone a specified hearing to a later day if>

Michael Matheson
81 In section 86, page 40, leave out lines 26 to 28

Michael Matheson
82 In section 86, page 40, line 28, at end insert—

<Effect of postponement

(1) Except where a postponement under section 288I(3) is while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, the following do not count towards any time limit arising in such a person’s case if such a postponement in the case is to the next day on which the court is sitting—

(a) that next day,

(b) any intervening Saturday, Sunday or court holiday.

(2) Even while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, that section does not prevent a postponement under section 288I(3) in the person’s case.

(3) In section 288I and this section, “postpone” includes adjourn.>

After section 86

Michael Matheson
83 After section 86, insert—

<Electronic proceedings

(1) In section 305 (Acts of Adjournal) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) Subsection (1) above extends to making provision by Act of Adjournal for something to be done in electronic form or by electronic means.”.

(2) These provisions of the 1995 Act are repealed—

(a) in section 141—

(i) subsection (3A),

(ii) in subsection (5), the words “(including a legible version of an electronic communication)”,

(iii) subsection (5ZA),

(iv) in subsection (5A), paragraph (b) together with the word “or” immediately preceding it,
(v) subsections (6A), (7A) and (7B),
(b) section 303B together with the italic heading immediately preceding it,
(c) section 308A.

(3) In the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007, section 42 is repealed.

Michael Matheson

84 After section 86, insert—

<CHAPTER

AUTHORISATION UNDER PART III OF THE POLICE ACT 1997

Authorisation of persons other than constables

In section 108 (interpretation of Part III) of the Police Act 1997, after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) A reference in this Part to a staff officer of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner is to any person who—

(a) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7A of schedule 4 to the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, or

(b) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7 of that schedule to whom paragraph 7B(2) of that schedule applies.”.

Margaret Mitchell

105 After section 86, insert—

<CHAPTER

EVIDENCE RELATING TO SEXUAL OFFENCES: LEGAL REPRESENTATION

Evidence relating to sexual offences: legal representation

In section 275 (exception to restrictions under section 274) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (5), insert—

“(5A) Where an application under subsection (1) is made, the complainer must in respect of that application—

(a) be informed of the right of the complainer—

(i) to seek legal advice,
(ii) to appoint a legal representative,

(b) be given the opportunity—

(i) to seek such advice,
(ii) to appoint such a representative.

(5B) Where the complainer appoints a legal representative—

(a) a copy of the application must be sent to the legal representative, and
(b) the legal representative must be given an opportunity to—

(i) submit written evidence on the matters set out in the application in accordance with subsection (3),
(ii) represent the complainer at any hearing in relation to the application.

(5C) The Scottish Ministers must by regulations make provision for fees incurred by a legal representative appointed under subsection (5B) to be paid out of the Scottish Legal Aid Fund.”.

Section 87

Michael Matheson

85 In section 87, page 42, line 12, leave out  and insert <or extend a time limit>

Michael Matheson

86 In section 87, page 42, leave out line 18

Michael Matheson

87 In section 87, page 42, line 27, at end insert—

<55CA Steps following arbitration

(1) If representations under section 55B(1) are made in terms settled through arbitration in accordance with the PNBS’s constitution, the Scottish Ministers must take all reasonable steps appearing to them to be necessary for giving effect to those representations.

(2) However, this—

(a) requires the Scottish Ministers to take such steps only in qualifying cases (see paragraph 4C(2) of schedule 2A),

(b) does not require the Scottish Ministers—

(i) to take such steps in relation to representations that are no longer being pursued by the PNBS, or

(ii) where such steps would comprise or include the making of regulations under section 48, to make regulations under that section more than once with respect to the same representations.>

Michael Matheson

88 In section 87, page 42, line 34, leave out from <subsection> to end of line and insert <this Chapter, “reporting year” is as defined in the PNBS’s constitution.”.>

Michael Matheson

89 In section 87, page 43, line 3, at end insert—

<( ) In section 125 (subordinate legislation) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, after subsection (3) there is inserted—

“(3A) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) of schedule 2A are subject to the affirmative procedure if they include provisions of the kind mentioned in paragraph 4B(2) or 4C(2) of that schedule.”.>
Schedule 3

Michael Matheson

91 In schedule 3, page 50, leave out line 6

Michael Matheson

92 In schedule 3, page 50, line 12, leave out <and deputy chairperson>

Michael Matheson

93 In schedule 3, page 50, line 18, leave out <or deputy chairperson>

Michael Matheson

94 In schedule 3, page 50, line 21, at end insert—

<Temporary chairperson>

(1) The PNBS may have a temporary chairperson if (for the time being)—

(a) there is no chairperson, or

(b) the chairperson is unavailable to act.

(2) A reference in this Chapter to the chairperson is to be read, where appropriate to do so by virtue of sub-paragraph (1), as meaning or including (as the context requires) the temporary chairperson.>

Michael Matheson

95 In schedule 3, page 50, line 24, leave out <chairperson or deputy chairperson> and insert <the chairperson>

Michael Matheson

96 In schedule 3, page 50, line 34, leave out from second <the> to end of line 35 and insert <consensus to be reached among the members of the PNBS on the terms of representations to be made under section 55B(1) or 55C(1).>

Michael Matheson

97 In schedule 3, page 51, leave out lines 1 and 2 and insert—

<( ) The constitution—

(a) may require a dispute on representations to be made under section 55B(1) to be submitted to arbitration by agreement among the members to do so, and must not prevent such a dispute from being submitted to arbitration on such agreement (except prevention by way of limitation as allowed below),

(b) may—

(i) authorise the chairperson to submit such a dispute to arbitration without such agreement,

(ii) limit how often within a reporting year such a dispute can be submitted to arbitration (including limitation framed by reference to particular matters or circumstances).>
Michael Matheson

98 In schedule 3, page 51, line 18, at end insert—

\(\text{(6) The constitution, or any revision of it, has effect only when brought into effect by the Scottish Ministers by regulations.}\)

Michael Matheson

99 In schedule 3, page 51, line 18, at end insert—

\(<\text{Process of arbitration}\)

4A(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies where—

(a) a dispute is submitted to arbitration in accordance with the constitution, and

(b) no arbitration agreement relating to the dispute is in place.

(2) A document submitting the dispute to arbitration is deemed to be an arbitration agreement.

(3) For the application of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010, a reference in this paragraph to an arbitration agreement is to such an agreement as defined by section 4 of that Act.

4B(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of arbitration in accordance with the constitution (whether such arbitration arises by reason of a real or deemed arbitration agreement).

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions disapplying or modifying the mandatory rules in schedule 1 to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010.

4C(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of the operation of section 55CA.

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions specifying, by reference to particular matters or circumstances, what are qualifying cases.

Michael Matheson

100 In schedule 3, page 51, line 21, leave out <and deputy chairperson>

After section 87

Michael Matheson

90 After section 87, insert—

\(<\text{Consequential and transitional}\)

(1) In connection with section 87—

(a) in schedule 1 to the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, after paragraph 50A there is inserted—

“50B The Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.”,

(b) in schedule 2 to the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003, at the appropriate place under the heading referring to offices there is inserted—

“Chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland”.

13
(2) On the coming into force of section 87—

(a) a person then holding office as the chairman of the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom by virtue of section 61(2) of the Police Act 1996 is to be regarded as if appointed as the chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland under paragraph 2(2) of schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,

(b) any agreements then extant within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom (so far as relating to the Police Service of Scotland) of the kind for which Chapter 8A of Part 1 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 includes provision are to be regarded as if made as agreements within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland by virtue of that Chapter.

Before section 1

Alison McInnes

50 Before section 1, insert—

<PART
SEARCH BY POLICE OF PERSON NOT ARRESTED

Police powers of search where person not arrested

(1) A constable must not search—

(a) a person,

(b) a vehicle, or

(c) anything which is in or on a vehicle,

without a warrant, unless subsection (3) applies.

(2) It is immaterial whether the person consents to being the subject of a search.

(3) This subsection applies where the search is conducted in accordance with—

(a) a power conferred by an enactment, and

(b) the terms of a code of practice issued by the Scottish Ministers under section (Police powers of search where person not arrested: code of practice).

(4) This Part applies to a vessel, aircraft or hovercraft as it applies to a vehicle.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4), “vessel” includes any ship, boat, raft or other apparatus constructed or adapted for floating on water.

Alison McInnes

51 Before section 1, insert—

<POLICE POWERS OF SEARCH WHERE PERSON NOT ARRESTED: CODE OF PRACTICE

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, by regulations, set out a code of practice in connection with the exercise by constables of powers under any enactment to search a person who has not been arrested in connection with an offence.

(2) The code of practice must set out—

(a) the circumstances in which any such power may be exercised,

(b) the procedure to be followed in the exercise of any such power.
(c) the record to be kept, and the right of any person to receive a copy of the record, of the exercise of any such power, and
(d) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) Regulations for the first code of practice under subsection (1) must be laid before the Parliament no later than the end of the period of one year beginning with the day of Royal Assent.

(4) The Scottish Ministers must—
(a) keep the code of practice under review, and
(b) lay regulations for a revised code of practice before the Parliament no later than 4 years after the day on which regulations for the previous code of practice are laid.

(5) Before making regulations under subsection (1) setting out the first or a revised code of practice, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) the chief constable,
(b) the Scottish Police Authority,
(c) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
(d) Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, and
(e) such other persons as they consider appropriate, on a draft of the code of practice.

(6) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Alison McInnes

52

Before section 1, insert—

<Police powers of search: annual reporting
In subsection (3) of section 39 (the Scottish Police Authority’s annual report) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012—
(a) the word “and” at the end of paragraph (a) is repealed, and
(b) after paragraph (b) there is inserted “and
(c) a record of the number of searches without a warrant of persons not arrested carried out by the Police Service during the reporting year, including in particular and where practicable a record of—
(i) the number of instances where an individual has been searched on more than one occasion,
(ii) the profile, as regards age, gender and ethnic or national origin, of those searched,
(iii) the proportion of searches that resulted in anything being found,
(iv) the proportion of searches that resulted in a matter being reported to the procurator fiscal, and
(v) the number of complaints made to the Police Service about the conduct of searches.”.>
Section 5

John Finnie

10 In section 5, page 2, line 28, leave out <(verbally or in writing)>

John Finnie

11 In section 5, page 2, line 30, at end insert <(and, regardless of whether those Articles allow or require information to be provided in writing only, the person must be provided with all such information both verbally and in writing).>

Section 7

John Finnie

12 In section 7, page 4, line 13, after <who> insert—

< ( ) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and ( )>

Section 8

John Pentland

13 In section 8, page 4, line 23, at end insert <, and

( ) the circumstances in which the 12 hour limit may be extended to 24 hours under section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances).>

Section 10

Mary Fee

39 In section 10, page 5, line 12, at end insert—

< ( ) the effect of keeping the person in custody on a child for whom the person has responsibility,>

Section 11

John Pentland

14 In section 11, page 5, line 21, at beginning insert <Subject to section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances).>

After section 11

John Pentland

15 After section 11, insert—

<Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances

(1) Section 11(2) does not apply if the conditions in subsection (2) are met.

(2) The conditions are that a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above is satisfied—

(a) that the test in section 10 is met, and>
(b) that there are exceptional circumstances that justify continuing to hold the person in police custody.

(3) A person may continue to be held in police custody by virtue of subsection (2) for more than a continuous period of 24 hours only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

(4) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2)(b), “exceptional circumstances” includes circumstances—

(a) where a doctor certifies that the person is, whether due to the influence of alcohol or drugs or for some other reason, not fit to be interviewed before the end of the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11,

(b) where the constable mentioned in subsection (2) considers that—

(i) access to another person in accordance with section 32, or

(ii) support from another person in accordance with section 33,

cannot be provided in sufficient time before the end of the 12 hour period,

(c) where the constable mentioned in subsection (2) considers that continuing to hold the person in police custody is essential to ensure the safety of the person or another person.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by regulations subject to the affirmative procedure, modify subsection (4) to further define, add to, remove or otherwise modify circumstances that may constitute “exceptional circumstances” for the purposes of subsection (2)(b).

Section 12

John Pentland

16 In section 12, page 5, line 33, after <11> insert <, and as the case may be the 24 hour period mentioned in section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances),>

Section 13

John Pentland

17 In section 13, page 6, line 17, at end insert <and as the case may be the 24 hour period mentioned in section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances).>

Section 14

John Finnie

18 In section 14, page 6, line 32, leave out from <and> to end of line 33

Elaine Murray

47 In section 14, page 6, line 35, leave out from <ensuring> to end of line 36 and insert <securing—

(a) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,

(b) that the person does not commit an offence while released,

(c) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into a relevant offence,

(d) the protection of the person, or
(e) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.

John Finnie

19 In section 14, page 6, line 36, at end insert—

(2A) When imposing a condition under subsection (2), the constable is to specify the period for which the condition is to apply.

(2B) The period specified under subsection (2A) is to be such period, not exceeding 28 days, as the appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(2C) In any case where a person has previously been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, the reference in subsection (2B) to 28 days is to be read as a reference to 28 days minus the number of days on which the person was so subject.

John Finnie

20 In section 14, page 6, line 39, leave out from <(1)(c)> to end of line 3 on page 7 and insert <(2C)>

Section 15

John Finnie

21 In section 15, page 7, line 15, leave out <28 day period described in section 14(4)> and insert <period specified under section 14(2A)>

Section 17

John Finnie

22 In section 17, page 8, line 17, at end insert <, ( ) to have the period for which the condition applies reduced.>

John Finnie

23 In section 17, page 8, line 20, after <condition> insert <or, as the case may be, the period specified under section 14(2A)>

John Finnie

24 In section 17, page 8, line 21, after <imposed> insert <or, as the case may be, specified>

John Finnie

25 In section 17, page 8, line 23, after <condition> insert <or, as the case may be, specify an alternative period>

John Finnie

26 In section 17, page 8, line 25, after <imposed> insert <or period specified>

John Finnie

27 In section 17, page 8, line 26, at end insert <or, as the case may be, specified under section 14(2A)>.>
Section 18

Michael Matheson

101 In section 18, page 9, line 6, at end insert <(by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means)>.

Section 20

Elaine Murray

48 In section 20, page 9, line 32, leave out from <ensuring> to end of line 33 and insert <securing—>

(i) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,

(ii) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody,

(iii) the protection of the person, or

(iv) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.>

Section 23

John Finnie

28 In section 23, page 11, line 10, after <committing> insert <and again immediately before the interview commences>.

Section 24

John Finnie

29 In section 24, page 12, line 2, leave out from <if> to end of line 5.

Section 25

Elaine Murray

55 In section 25, page 12, line 15, leave out <Subsections (2) and (3) apply> and insert <Subsection (2) applies>.

Elaine Murray

Supported by: Alison McInnes

56 In section 25, page 12, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>.

Elaine Murray

Supported by: Alison McInnes

57 In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <16> and insert <18>.

John Finnie

30 In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <, owing to mental disorder,>.
Elaine Murray
58  In section 25, page 12, line 22, leave out subsections (3) to (5)

John Finnie
31  In section 25, page 12, leave out lines 36 and 37

Section 30

Elaine Murray
59  In section 30, page 16, line 9, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Elaine Murray
60  In section 30, page 16, line 13, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Section 31

Elaine Murray
61  In section 31, page 17, line 2, leave out from second <or> to end of line 5

Section 32

Elaine Murray
62  In section 32, page 17, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Elaine Murray
63  In section 32, page 17, line 23, leave out subsection (2)

Elaine Murray
64  In section 32, page 17, line 28, leave out <or (2)>

Section 33

John Pentland
38  In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out from beginning to <over,>

Elaine Murray
32  In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out <18> and insert <16>

John Finnie
33  In section 33, page 18, line 2, leave out <owing to mental disorder,>

John Finnie
34  In section 33, page 18, leave out lines 17 and 18
After section 34

Mary Fee

40 After section 34, insert—

<Persons with responsibility for a child

Duty to contact named person: persons with responsibility for a child

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody has responsibility for a child.

(2) With a view to facilitating the provision of care and support to the child while the person is in police custody, the constable must send intimation of the matters specified in subsection (3) to an individual identified in relation to the child under section 20 or 21 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

(3) The matters are—

(a) the fact that the person is in custody,
(b) the place where the person is in custody,
(c) the time limits for keeping the person in custody that apply under Chapter 2 of this Part.>

Mary Fee

110 After section 34, insert—

<Persons with responsibility for a child

Duty to contact named person: persons with responsibility for a child

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody has responsibility for a child.

(2) With a view to ensuring the wellbeing of the child, the constable must send information of the type specified in subsection (3) to an individual identified in relation to the child under section 20 or 21 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

(3) The information to be sent is to contain details of any matters relevant to the child’s wellbeing, and to the child’s wellbeing needs.

(4) Information falls within subsection (3) if the constable considers that—

(a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,
(b) it is necessary or expedient for the purposes of the exercise of any of the named person functions,
(c) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and
(d) the provision of the information would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(5) In considering for the purpose of subsection (4)(c) whether information ought to be provided, the constable is, so far as reasonably practicable, to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child.

(6) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (5), the constable is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.
(7) For the purpose of subsection (4)(c) the information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision relating to the sending of information under subsection (2) above.

(9) Regulations under subsection (8) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 42

Alison McInnes
53 In section 42, page 20, line 18, at end insert—
<( ) search a child,>

Mary Fee
41 In section 42, page 20, line 19, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
42 In section 42, page 20, line 20, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
43 In section 42, page 20, line 21, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
44 In section 42, page 20, line 22, after <child> insert <or person>

Mary Fee
45 In section 42, page 20, line 23, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Elaine Murray
65 In section 42, page 20, line 25, leave out <well-being> and insert <best interests>

After section 42

Elaine Murray
35 After section 42, insert—

<Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused>

(1) Subject to section (Disclosure of information: person released under section 14), a constable must not without reasonable cause release the information specified in subsection (2) to any person other than an authorised person.

(2) The information is information relating to a person not officially accused of an offence which—

(a) identifies that person, or

(b) is likely to be sufficient to allow that person to be identified, as having been arrested in connection with an offence.
(3) For the purposes of subsection (1), an “authorised person” means—
   (a) a constable,
   (b) a person to whom intimation must or may be sent under Chapter 5 of this Part,
   (c) a person other than a constable to whom the information must be disclosed for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into the offence.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (1), a determination that there is reasonable cause to disclose information must be made—
    (a) only if it is in the public interest to do so, and
    (b) by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

Elaine Murray

36 After section 42, insert—

<Disclosure of information: person released under section 14

(1) Without prejudice to the generality of section (Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused), a constable may disclose qualifying information relating to an alleged offence to a person mentioned in subsection (2) where the conditions in subsection (3) are met.

(2) The persons are—
   (a) a person—
       (i) against whom, or
       (ii) against whose property,
           the acts which constituted the alleged offence were directed,
   (b) in the case where the death of a person mentioned in paragraph (a) was (or appears to have been) caused by the alleged offence, a prescribed relative of the person,
   (c) a person who is likely to give evidence in criminal proceedings which are likely to be instituted against a person in respect of the alleged offence,
   (d) a person who has given a statement in relation to the alleged offence to a constable.

(3) The conditions are that disclosure of the information —
   (a) is in the public interest or is otherwise likely to promote the safety and wellbeing of a person mentioned in subsection (2), and
   (b) is authorised by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

(4) In this section—
    “prescribed” means prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by order subject to the negative procedure,
    “qualifying information” means information that—
    (a) identifies a person as having been arrested in connection with an alleged offence and subsequently released under section 14, and
(b) sets out such information relating to any conditions imposed on the person under section 14(2) as the constable authorising the disclosure considers appropriate.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by order subject to the negative procedure, modify the definition of “qualifying information” in subsection (4).>

Before section 54

John Pentland

37 Before section 54, insert—

<Meaning of arrest

In this Part, “arrest” means—

(a) depriving a person of liberty of movement for the purpose of the purported investigation or prevention of crime, and

(b) taking the person to a police station in accordance with section 4.>

After section 56

Mary Fee

46 After section 56, insert—

<Meaning of responsibility for a child

(1) In this Part, “child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years.

(2) In this Part, references to a person who has responsibility for a child are references to—

(a) a person who is a parent or guardian having parental responsibilities or parental rights under any enactment in relation to a child,

(b) a person who—

(i) is otherwise legally liable to maintain a child, or

(ii) has care of a child.>
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

1st Groupings of Amendments for Stage 2

This document provides procedural information which will assist in preparing for and following proceedings on the above Bill. The information provided is as follows:

- the list of groupings (that is, the order in which amendments will be debated). Any procedural points relevant to each group are noted;
- the text of amendments to be debated on the first day of Stage 2 consideration, set out in the order in which they will be debated. THIS LIST DOES NOT REPLACE THE MARSHALLED LIST, WHICH SETS OUT THE AMENDMENTS IN THE ORDER IN WHICH THEY WILL BE DISPOSED OF.

Groupings of amendments

Corroboration
9, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 66, 68

Age of criminal responsibility
54

Removal of not proven verdict (and jury verdicts)
102, 103, 104

Written record of state of preparation
67

Automatic early release of prisoners
106, 49

References by SCCRC to High Court: test for quashing convictions
7, 8

Detention or imprisonment of person with responsibility for a child
107, 108, 109

Publication of prosecutorial test
69

Aggravations as to people trafficking
70, 71, 72

Participation of detained person in proceedings through TV link
73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 101
Electronic proceedings
83

Authorisation under Part III of Police Act 1997
84

Evidence relating to sexual offence: legal representation
105

Police Negotiating Board for Scotland
85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 90

Police powers to stop and search
50, 51, 52, 53

Provision of information on rights to suspects
10, 11, 28

Authorisation to keep person in police custody
12

Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances
13, 14, 15, 16, 17

Arrest and custody of person with responsibility for a child
39, 40, 110, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46

Release on conditions: power to specify period for which conditions to apply
18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27

Release on conditions or on undertaking: purposes for which conditions may be imposed 47, 48

Circumstances in which interview may take place without solicitor present
29

Rights of persons aged under 18
55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 38, 32

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 38 pre-empts amendment 32

Persons unable to understand what is happening or communicate effectively
30, 31, 33, 34

Duty to consider child’s best interests
65

Disclosure of information relating to person not officially accused 35, 36
Meaning of “arrest”
Present:

Christian Allard
Roderick Campbell
Christine Grahame (Convener)
Alison McInnes
Elaine Murray (Deputy Convener)

Gavin Brown (Committee Substitute) (item 9)
John Finnie
Margaret McDougall
Margaret Mitchell
Gil Paterson

Also present: Michael Matheson, Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Mary Fee and Michael McMahon (item 7).

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered the Bill at Stage 2 (Day 1).

The following amendments were agreed to (without division): 66, 67, 68 and 8.

The following amendments were agreed to (by division)—
   1 (For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1)
   2 (For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1)
   3 (For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1)
   4 (For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1)
   5 (For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1)
   6 (For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1)
   7 (For 5, Against 3, Abstentions 1)
   109 (For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0).

The following amendments were disagreed to (by division)—
   54 (For 4, Against 4, Abstentions 1; amendment disagreed to on casting vote)
   107 (For 4, Against 4, Abstentions 1; amendment disagreed to on casting vote)
   108 (For 3, Against 4, Abstentions 2).

The following amendments were moved and, no member having objected, withdrawn: 102 and 106.

The following amendments were not moved: 9, 103, 104 and 49.

The following provisions were agreed to without amendment: sections 62, 63, 64, 65, 67, 68, 69, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80 and 81.

The following provisions were agreed to as amended: sections 66 and 82.
The Committee ended consideration of the Bill for the day amendment 109 having been disposed of.

Margaret McDougall declared an interest as a member of the Cross-Party Group on Families Affected by Imprisonment. Gil Paterson declared an interest as a member of Rape Crisis Scotland.
On resuming—

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener: I move on to item 8.

I welcome Michael Matheson, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice. I also welcome the officials who are here to support the cabinet secretary, but who are not permitted to participate in stage 2. I understand that officials may change over as we progress through the bill. When that happens, I will briefly suspend the meeting.

Members should have their copies of the bill, the marshalled list and groupings of amendments for today’s consideration. The committee agreed on 1 September to change the order of stage 2 consideration of the bill. We will begin consideration at part 2 and go no further than part 6 today. As I have indicated, we will consider part 1 at a later date. We move straight to the marshalled list.

Before Section 57

The Convener: We start with the group on corroboration, which consists of amendments 9, 1 to 6, 66 and 68. Amendment 9 is in the name of Graeme Pearson, who I know does not intend to move that amendment today. I take it that no other member wishes to move that amendment.

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: Thank you.

Amendment 9 not moved.

Section 57—Corroboration not required

The Convener: I therefore call amendment 1, which is grouped with amendments 2 to 6, 66 and 68. I call Margaret Mitchell to move amendment 1 and to speak to the other amendments in the group.

Margaret Mitchell: Section 57 provides for the abolition of the requirement for corroboration—a provision that triggered a storm of controversy that was aggravated by the intransigence of the then Cabinet Secretary for Justice and the confused and, at times, contradictory responses from him to the concerns that were raised during scrutiny of the provision and the debate that followed.

It was, to be frank, a travesty that the concerns that were raised by various stakeholders—including High Court judges, senators of the College of Justice, the Law Society of Scotland, the Faculty of Advocates, the Scottish Human Rights Commission, the cross-party working group on adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse, and learned academics—were consistently misrepresented by the former justice secretary as a polarised argument between the legal profession and victims.

Let us be quite clear: the attempt to trivialise that crucial debate and to bulldoze the provision through Parliament undermined the fundamental right to a fair trial that every individual who comes into contact with Scotland’s criminal justice system has a right to expect.

As Lord Gill stated, “The rule of corroboration is not some archaic legal relic from antiquity” but is, in fact, one of our law’s “finest features”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 20 November 2013; c 3730.]

Others went further and pointed out that if the requirement for corroboration were to be abolished without any additional safeguards being put in place, that would lead to “many more wrongful convictions” and would create a “new category of victims”. It is totally unacceptable that a decision of this magnitude was crammed into the miscellaneous provisions of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, based on the fatally flawed recommendation of the Carloway commission, which failed to consider that, rather than there being just two options available—namely, the retention or abolition of the requirement for corroboration—there was also a third way, which would include examination of the requirement for corroboration within a wider review of the law of evidence.

I believe that it will remain a stain on this majority Government’s tenure in office that, in the face of opposition from all the other parties, from independent members and from the aforementioned stakeholders, at stage 1 it whipped its members into supporting the abolition of the requirement for corroboration, and later decided that although there would be a review under Lord Bonomy, retention was not to be an option in the review’s remit and abolition would still go ahead—a move that struck at the democratic competence of this devolved Parliament.

Without doubt, the new cabinet secretary’s announcement earlier this year, following Lord Bonomy’s review, that the decision to abolish the requirement for corroboration would be reversed was widely welcomed, not least by the majority of members of this committee and by the aforementioned stakeholders.

Today, I am relieved and gratified that the Scottish Government has expressed a willingness to support my amendments 1 to 6, which will remove from the bill the provisions that would abolish the requirement for corroboration.

I move amendment 1.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson): Good morning, convener. Not only has it been quite some time since the Justice Committee last considered the bill, but there have been significant developments in the intervening period. It is perhaps appropriate that this stage 2 debate is starting with an issue that has been the subject of much debate over the past few years: reform of the requirement for corroboration.

When I took up post as Cabinet Secretary for Justice last November, I said that I would await the outcome of Lord Bonomy’s review before reaching any decision on how to proceed. I was at that time very much aware of concerns that had been raised by members of this committee, among others, on whether the reform should proceed under the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill in advance of consideration of what other safeguards may be needed for our system. The Government has continued to be concerned about the practical effect that the requirement-for-corroboration rule can have on victims of crimes that are committed in private, many of whom are among the most vulnerable citizens in our society.

I undertook to listen to views on the reform and to take account of Lord Bonomy’s recommendations before I made a decision, which is what I have done. As I said to Parliament on 21 April, Lord Bonomy’s recommendations are substantial and complex, and taking all of them forward will have a major impact on the justice system. Given the timing for the bill’s consideration by Parliament and the fact that we have not yet achieved a consensus in favour of the reform, I took the view that it should no longer go forward in the bill. On that basis, I support Margaret Mitchell’s amendments to remove the provisions from the bill.

Although I understand why some people may question why the Government did not reach this decision sooner, I consider that rushing to a judgment without awaiting Lord Bonomy’s report would not have been appropriate. As I have mentioned previously, I am very grateful to him and his expert group for the considered and collaborative approach that they undertook in the review. I needed to await their recommendations in order to ascertain whether it would be feasible, within the proposed legislation’s timetable, to take forward the reform alongside the report’s proposals. As it has turned out, that has not been possible. I hope that members understand why the Government considered awaiting Lord Bonomy’s report to be the most appropriate course of action.

I also want to pay tribute to the committee’s detailed stage 1 scrutiny of the reform, among the other provisions in the bill. The Government’s decision to progress the safeguards review was very much informed by the further evidence that the committee elicited during its stage 1 consideration. Although this meeting may bring to an end the reform of the requirement for corroboration that was proposed under the bill, I hope that a platform will have been created on which to build future reforms to our evidence and procedure laws.

As I mentioned when I made my statement to Parliament in April, we will in due course start to consider Lord Bonomy’s recommendations, the reform of the requirement for corroboration and any other relevant issues, with the aim of creating a balanced and cohesive package of reforms.

Throughout the course of the debate on abolition of the requirement for corroboration, we have all heard powerful testimony from organisations that represent victims. Now may not be the time for this reform, but I am sure that none of us is complacent and believes that our system should stay the same forever.

I will now move on to discuss amendment 66 in my name, which proposes moving section 62 to the start of part 6 of the bill. Amendment 66 is a consequential and technical amendment that has been prompted by the removal of all the other provisions in part 2. Section 62 is being moved to a better home among the provisions found in part 6.

Finally, the Government’s amendment 68 provides for the deletion from the bill of the jury-majority provisions. That reform is very much related to the reform of the requirement for corroboration, as it was intended to provide a further additional safeguard if the requirement-for-corroboration rule was abolished.

Lord Bonomy’s review group, as members will be aware, has recommended that jury research should take place to ensure that decisions about what, if any, changes to jury size, majority and verdicts may be appropriate are made on an informed basis”.

I have decided that it is appropriate for that recommendation to be taken forward. It should provide a very important evidence base for any future changes to jury size and verdicts. The Scottish Government will now consider the exact remit and the methodology for such research. In that work, my officials will continue to engage with justice sector partners, organisations and academics.

Lord Bonomy’s reference group specifically recommended research on the effects of jury sizes of 12 and 15, on the verdicts of not proven and not guilty, and on the effect of requiring unanimity. I want consideration of the remit to start with those issues, and to add others as is considered necessary. I hope that the research will commence before the end of this parliamentary session. I will keep the committee informed of progress.

I consider that it is preferable to retain the current jury system until the jury research has been completed. Amendment 68, if agreed to, will mean that Scotland will continue with the present system of a simple majority being required for a guilty verdict. Alongside the jury research, we will consider holistically all of Lord Bonomy’s proposed reforms, the requirement-for-corroboration rule and the other relevant reforms, and we will take our time in developing a future package of reforms, which I hope can attract a general consensus.

Gil Paterson (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP): I intended to come here today and not say too much. I am a reluctant participant, cabinet secretary. However, I am forced to speak. First, I need to declare to the committee that I am a former board member of Rape Crisis Scotland, where I served for 12 years. I want to speak on behalf of the people on whom today’s decision will have an impact. People should not, to be frank, be crowing too loudly today, because others will definitely be affected by the decision.

Some women, in particular—and sometimes children—are denied access to justice because they cannot even get their case past the procurator fiscal because of the lack of corroboration. Things happen in private; in those circumstances, no one can come forward and stand up for those people. People who work in the area often know when people are lying and how it affects them. For me, the sooner the requirement for corroboration goes, the better. It is wrong that people are treated so badly and that the system has no answer for them.

10:45

I believe that we have the only justice system in the world in which there is such a barrier for people who have been raped or seriously sexually assaulted. Therefore, we should be silent and not make big statements on how it affects the legal profession, who have been guarding the requirement for corroboration as if it were holy, when no other jurisdiction in the world has such a method.

I hope, cabinet secretary, that at some point very soon the Government will be in a position to bring another proposal back to Parliament, so that people—women and children—can get their day in court and be judged by their peers, rather than by the requirement for corroboration.

Roderick Campbell: I will make a few brief points. Despite the negativity of Margaret Mitchell’s comments, we ought to pay tribute to Lord Bonomy’s reference group for the sterling work that it has done, and we should also recognise the swift way in which the cabinet secretary responded to that. I think that that is positive, not negative.

I echo the eloquent comments that Gil Paterson made about some victims. There is clearly an access to justice issue that will remain until we can advance the issue further.

Finally, jury research is novel in Scotland: we await the findings with great interest. The cabinet secretary’s amendments on that subject are sensible.

Alison McInnes: There is no doubt that the proposal to remove the requirement for corroboration was the most contentious element of the bill. As it was drafted—and is still drafted this morning—it risked bringing our legal system into disrepute through miscarriages of justice and wrongful convictions.

Lord Bonomy’s recommendations have made it clear that there is no doubt that removing the requirement for corroboration would have had profound implications for our justice system. As the cabinet secretary said, Lord Bonomy proposes substantial and complex changes that are all interrelated. It is worth remembering that Kenny MacAskill, the previous Cabinet Secretary for Justice, wanted to press ahead even after he recognised that he needed to ask Lord Bonomy to look at the issues, and he asked us to somehow do that and deal with the issues afterwards. Michael Matheson’s comments this morning on how substantial and complex the issues are underline what a reckless plan that was.

We need to reflect that it is only the unprecedented suspension of the bill for 18 months that has allowed us to get to a point where we can address the matter in a much more measured and sensible way, and indeed in the way that the committee recommended in its stage 1 report. That was secured following, not least, my comments this morning on Michael Matheson’s c that I have not changed my mind. The bill is not just about corroboration but, like my colleague Gil Paterson, I want the absolute requirement for corroboration to be removed from the justice system as soon as possible.

John Finnie: I will support Margaret Mitchell’s amendments, although I do not support many of her comments or the personal comments that have been made. This is about process and not about individuals, as I see it.

I think that this proves that our system works. There is scrutiny and people listen, and we should reflect positively on that. There has been a lot of good debate but also a lot of ill-informed and intemperate debate. As someone who supports corroboration, I find the notion that, in so doing, I have a disregard for victims deeply offensive.

Elaine Murray: I, too, will support Margaret Mitchell’s amendments. A lot of things were said, particularly in the stage 1 debate, that would have been better not said. I was personally offended by some of the things that were said. However, that has to be forgiven, I suppose, because we have now made progress, and we need to look to the future.

I welcome what has been said about jury research because, during the stage 1 consideration, the point was made that we need to have some way of doing jury research, although there are difficulties with it. We welcome that, because we need to understand the way in which juries come to decisions if we are to understand how best to address some of the issues around victims.

The Convener: Unusually, I, too, want to speak. The cabinet secretary knows of my long-standing opposition to and concern about the abolition of the requirement for corroboration. That has not been easy, in the face of my party, and I continue to have reservations about the abolition, so I welcome Margaret Mitchell’s amendments. I say to Gil Paterson that that does not mean that I do not have concerns, which John Finnie shares, for the victims of rape or sexual assault. It may be that people say that they just want their day in court, but my concern is that, actually, they want their day in court and a conviction. If we simply have advice that the process will not be quick. It will... take a considerable period of time to carry out that research in a thorough and detailed way. Obviously, there are some legal issues that we have to navigate around, as well, in order to undertake that more fully.

I intend to commission the research in the terms that have been set out by Lord Bonomy in the independent review group’s recommendation, but, as that progresses, I am content to consider whether there are further areas that it can explore and move into. My mind is not closed to the possibility of further research into aspects of the reasoning that goes on in juries in deliberating, but its principal aim at the outset will be to fulfil the recommendation that was made by the review group that was chaired by Lord Bonomy.

Margaret Mitchell: There was no intention to crow in my opening comments, but it was important to set out the situation that brought us to the point at which we almost had the abolition of corroboration de facto by default and it was being pushed through the Parliament. It is important to highlight that if we are to learn from those mistakes.

I reiterate that corroboration is far from archaic, and I concur with the cabinet secretary that the rule of corroboration will continue to evolve in conjunction with the rules of evidence and other measures to ensure access to justice for all. That includes addressing the vexing problem of the low conviction rates for rapes and sexual assaults, which Gil Paterson has rightly raised. I hope that it will give him some comfort that another amendment that has been lodged—I hope that we will get to it today—seeks to address that very issue and has the support of organisations that deal with rape victims.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 1 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Abstentions
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1.

Amendment 1 agreed to.

Section 58—Effect of other enactments
Amendment 2 moved—[Margaret Mitchell].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 2 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Abstentions
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1.

Amendment 2 agreed to.

Section 59—Relevant day for application
Amendment 3 moved—[Margaret Mitchell].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 3 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Abstentions
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1.

Amendment 3 agreed to.

Section 60—Deeming as regards offence
Amendment 4 moved—[Margaret Mitchell].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 4 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 0, Abstentions 1.

Amendment 6 agreed to.

Section 62—Statements by accused

Amendment 66 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

After section 62

Alison McInnes: Amendment 54 would raise the age of criminal responsibility from eight to 12, which would bring it in line with the age of criminal prosecution. That was raised to 12 in 2010 to reflect the extensive body of evidence that children should not come into contact with the justice system at a young age. However, we are left with an anomaly with regard to criminal responsibility. The law is out of touch with our understanding of children’s maturity and their capacity to make decisions and understand the consequences of their actions.

Statistics that I have secured from the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration using freedom of information legislation show that around 1,500 children between the age of eight and 11 were referred to children’s panels on offence grounds during the past four years. Almost all of them automatically received a criminal record because they accepted those grounds of referral.

The children’s hearings system will no doubt subsequently help most of the children to address their offending behaviour and they will mature into responsible adults. After all, that is what we want to achieve. Surely it is perverse to subsequently further punish and disadvantage them as they move into adult life by branding them as criminals? Their childhood convictions will need to be declared for decades or even the rest of their lives. How can that be right? How can we allow a child’s opportunities to be curbed so severely at such a young age? Handing criminal records to eight or nine-year-olds is a destructive, inappropriate response to their offending. I want the law to change.

When very young children display troubling or criminal behaviour it is most often because they are themselves deeply troubled and vulnerable. Many such children will have experienced trauma or neglect or have been victims of abuse. They are first and foremost in need of protection.

Scotland has the lowest age of criminal responsibility in Europe—it trails painfully behind international best practice. The United Nations...
Committee on the Rights of the Child has stated that it expects 12 to be the “absolute minimum” age of criminal responsibility. Tam Baillie, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, was right to say that criminalising children as young as eight has “long tarnished” our international reputation.

Yesterday, members received a joint letter in support of the amendment from 17 organisations, including Barnardo’s, the Aberlour Child Care Trust, Together Scottish Alliance for Children’s Rights, and the Scottish Youth Parliament. The Law Society of Scotland has also backed the amendment. I hope that all members will join me in ensuring that Scotland upholds the human rights of some of the most vulnerable children in our society.

I move amendment 54.

Elaine Murray: I support amendment 54. I see no reason why, when we do not prosecute children under 12, we should be dishing out a criminal record to them. Scotland is behind much of the rest of the world on the issue.

I have seen the Scottish Government’s letter to the convener. I do not understand the argument against the amendment. It says that a lot of “the underlying issues—including disclosure of criminal records, forensic samples, police investigatory powers, victims and community confidence—are complex.”

I cannot understand why increasing the age of criminal responsibility would create all those difficulties, particularly as children under 12 are not being prosecuted anyway. I do not understand that argument.

I appreciate that, at one time, this was a very controversial issue. However, times have moved on and I do not think that this change is as controversial as it once was years ago. It is certainly my intention to support amendment 54.

John Finnie: I commend Alison McInnes for her speech and for her extensive work on the subject. I made several notes. I noted that there is an extensive body of evidence—that is unequivocal. I also noted that we are out of kilter with the UN and with the children’s commissioner, who is the very person we charge with looking after the wellbeing and human rights of children. This is a fundamentally straightforward issue. I will certainly be aligning my support with Alison McInnes.

Roderick Campbell: Alison McInnes has referred to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010. She said that no one under the age of 12 can be prosecuted. I am mindful that a large number of children’s organisations basically suggest that the fact that the age of criminal responsibility has not been raised is unfinished business. The question is whether amending this bill is the right method to do that. How complex would that be to do? We have heard from an academic, Professor Leverick, who thinks that this bill is not the right place to make the change. Clearly, there are disclosure issues. There is also a need for a consultation.

When the previous Cabinet Secretary for Justice gave evidence in January 2014, he said that it is not possible to have too many consultations running at the same time. That may or may not have been a good argument, but we need a consultation. I recognise that we must get on with the issue; it will not go away. I look to the cabinet secretary for reassurance on a timetable for dealing with the issue.

Margaret Mitchell: I have a huge amount of sympathy with the intent behind the amendment and with what Alison McInnes has said. However, I am a little wary of the law of unintended consequences, and I am aware of the fact that we have not taken detailed evidence on the issue. I therefore wait with interest to hear what the cabinet secretary has to say. I am not convinced that this is necessarily the right place to properly scrutinise and debate such a change.

Christian Allard: I just wanted to add my sympathy for the amendment. However, Rod Campbell put it in one word: consultation. Consultation is what we need and that debate has to happen and cannot happen only at a committee. We need to have a good consultation to ensure that the people of Scotland can give their views on what should happen.

The Convener: I agree with Margaret Mitchell. I have huge sympathy for the amendment, but it would be a major change in the law and I would have great concern if we were to proceed with it without testing the evidence that is before us. A consultation may very well make the case even more compelling, and that would be a good thing, but to make a major change in law without a consultation by the Government and without this committee even testing the evidence in front of us would be a mistake and it might, as Margaret Mitchell says, have unintended consequences. For that reason, although I am sympathetic to Alison McInnes’s intent, I will not be supporting the amendment.

Michael Matheson: The minimum age of criminal responsibility is a substantial and complex issue. We remain open to change being made in this area. However, we have serious concerns that amendment 54 does not address the policy, legislative and procedural implications of change, or offer the requisite safeguards. There are significant underlying issues on the disclosure of criminal records, use of forensic samples, police investigatory powers and the rights of victims.
There is, rightly, particular sensitivity where serious violent or sexual behaviour is involved.

We have a strong track record in promoting and safeguarding children’s rights. In 2010, the Government changed the law so that no one under the age of 12 can be prosecuted in the criminal courts. Children aged between eight and 11 facing allegations of having committed an offence can be dealt with by the children’s hearings system, which takes an approach that is centred on the child’s welfare and best interests.

In 2014, via the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014, we introduced a duty on ministers to consider ways to give better effect in Scotland to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. The children’s hearings system is internationally recognised for its child-centred, needs-based approach to children in conflict with the law. The hearings system can be said to provide the “special protective measures” to which the UNCRC refers.

We share concerns about young children potentially having a criminal record that can impact on their life chances as a result of childhood behaviour. I understand that that is one the main reasons why Alison McInnes has brought forward the amendment. Offence grounds established through the children’s hearings system have implications for disclosure. The established policy is that serious violent and serious sexual offences should continue to be disclosed, while reducing the impact on life chances of low-level offending in childhood.

Although such cases are mercifully small in number, serious offending and real harm involving children under the age of 12 does occur. It is vital that police have appropriate powers to establish the facts, including when there is no co-operation from parents. It is important that we have a clear way forward for addressing such issues.

I can therefore advise the committee that an independent advisory group is being established. The group will address the underlying issues in respect of disclosure of criminal records, forensic samples, police investigatory powers, victims and community confidence taking account of the minimum age of prosecution, the role of the children’s hearings system, and UNCRC compliance. The group is expected to meet in the next six weeks and will bring forward recommendations for consultation by early 2016.

I believe that that approach provides a way of allowing us to deal with the complex legal issues in a considered way. I therefore ask Alison McInnes to withdraw amendment 54.

Alison McInnes: I have listened to what the cabinet secretary has explained today and I read what he said in his recent letter to the committee. We have been told over and over again that the issue is under active consideration. I raised the issue with the former Cabinet Secretary for Justice when we took evidence at stage 1, and I was assured yet again that it was under active consideration, but it seems continually to be put off.

The convener said that my amendment would introduce a major change, but I do not believe that it would. A major change happened when the age of criminal prosecution was changed and it seems that we need to follow through and tidy up this anomaly, which leaves children carrying a criminal record and does not seem at all fair.

If there are outstanding issues to do with disclosure of criminal records, forensic samples and police investigatory powers, the cabinet secretary has not adequately explained them to us and I see no reason why they could not be resolved at stage 3, if we agree the principle today. We have an opportunity today to approve the principle once and for all. It seems disproportionate to say that we need to kick the issue into the long grass for another year or so before we can begin to consider it. I do not doubt that the Government could craft an amendment for stage 3 that could allow it to address some of the practicalities via secondary legislation and ensure that the provision in the amendment was implemented after guidelines had been issued.

I will press amendment 54 and I urge the cabinet secretary and all committee members to seize this opportunity.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 54 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
- Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
- McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
- McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (Lab)
- Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
- Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
- Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
- Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
- Paterson, Gill (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Abstentions
- Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 4, Abstentions 1.

I keep to what I said before. I am using my casting vote against the amendment.

Amendment 54 disagreed to.
However, given the Government's proposed look forward to giving evidence to you at stage 1. than remove it, as the Government proposes. retain section 70, with minor modifications, rather proven verdict, I will also try to persuade you to if I can persuade the committee to remove the not minister in the debate on the first group. However, to increase a jury majority, as you heard from the proposal in this bill, it no longer sees a need corroboration. Now that it is no longer pursuing proposal to remove the requirement for majority was a safeguard in the context of its reasons. For the Government, an increased jury Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, but for different proposals are inextricably linked.

I introduced my bill because I have long been convinced that the three-verdict system is no longer defensible in a modern justice system. It causes confusion and uncertainty for victims of crime and the accused person. The principle that all accused persons are innocent until proved guilty entitles them to a straightforward acquittal in every case where the prosecution case against them cannot be established beyond reasonable doubt. Reform is necessary in order to maintain confidence in the judicial system. In effect, a not proven verdict represents another form of acquittal and continues to at best cause confusion and at worst bring the judicial system into complete disrepute.

In addition, as a not proven verdict does not convey the same clarity as a guilty or not guilty verdict, it can leave an accused person stigmatised, particularly as they have no right to a retrial or appeal to clear their name.

Should the not proven verdict be removed, there is a small chance that the number of guilty verdicts could increase. To ensure that such convictions are safe, I propose to increase the majority that is required to convict. As it happens, the Scottish Government made a similar proposal in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, but for different reasons. For the Government, an increased jury majority was a safeguard in the context of its proposal to remove the requirement for corroboration. Now that it is no longer pursuing that proposal in this bill, it no longer sees a need to increase a jury majority, as you heard from the minister in the debate on the first group. However, if I can persuade the committee to remove the not proven verdict, I will also try to persuade you to retain section 70, with minor modifications, rather than remove it, as the Government proposes.

My bill has been referred to this committee and I look forward to giving evidence to you at stage 1. However, given the Government's proposed amendments to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill in relation to the jury majority, it was prudent for me to lodge my own amendment. Today's debate provides a useful opportunity for an initial discussion on these important issues. It is for those reasons that I move my amendment.

I move amendment 102.

Roderick Campbell: I have some sympathy for Mr McMahon, because, in the debate that has included so many other issues in the bill, his argument has not been addressed as fully as it might have been. However, I am conscious of the fact that jury research is about to be embarked on, and, if we are to take a proper view on the question of whether we should retain the not proven verdict, we should come back to the issue after that research has been completed.

11:15

Michael Matheson: I am grateful to Mr McMahon for setting out his reasons for wishing to see a change in the jury system. I know that he has been pursuing the issue for some time, seeking legislative change in the area. I am also aware that there has been support for a change to the verdict system—in particular, for the abolition of the not proven verdict—and I am not unsympathetic to Mr McMahon’s position. However, recent developments must have a significant impact on any reform in the area.

Amendment 68, which we have already debated, would delete the provisions that increase the jury majority that Mr McMahon seeks to amend. As I said when I spoke to amendment 68, I am acting on Lord Bonomy’s recommendation that jury research should take place. Although we are still considering the final remit, I agree with Lord Bonomy’s recommendation that that work should include research on the verdicts that are available to the jury, as well as research on jury majorities and size. In the light of that work, I consider it preferable to retain the current jury system until the research has been completed, when we will have more detailed evidence on which to base any future reform.

I intend to move amendment 68 and, on that basis, I ask Mr McMahon not to press amendment 102.

Michael McMahon: I say to Roderick Campbell that jury research is welcome. Of course, we want to establish what people think when they make their decisions. However, I have consulted on the bill on three occasions and have taken on board the issues that have been brought to my attention by those who have responded. In all circumstances, the link between the size of a jury and the majority required to make a decision has been brought to my attention because of one major factor. In all cases, the purpose of the trial is to prove beyond reasonable doubt whether the case brought by the prosecution has been proved, and someone must be confidently found to be either guilty or not guilty. If, regardless of the severity of the crime that is being tested, one individual’s changing their mind can mean the difference between someone being found guilty and their being acquitted on a verdict of either not proven or not guilty, that hardly suggests that the case has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. A majority of 8:7 would mean that seven people had serious doubt about the case that had been brought by the prosecution.

We know—and the legal profession knows—that a simple majority of a jury of 15 people is not sustainable, and no amount of kicking the issue into the long grass will change that. The evidence that I have received in the consultations that I have had before makes it absolutely clear that a simple majority is not sustainable. Although I respect Lord Bonomy and have huge regard for the legal profession, I also know that the legal profession has a tendency to look for the long grass whenever it is possible to find it. It has already been suggested, in the consideration of the bill, that we find the long grass for a number of major issues that need to be addressed.

I have consulted on the matter extensively, and there is already a lot of work out there on the concerns about the size of a majority. To use my own analogy, the case has already been proved. There is nothing not proven about the size of a majority; the case has been established and it is beyond reasonable doubt that we need to move to two-thirds majorities. Nevertheless, having spoken to those involved in sheriff court procedure, we propose amendment 67 to remove the obligation upon the prosecution to lodge the written record. Rules about how and when written records are to be lodged will be left to court rules. That is to allow the prosecution and defence to lodge their respective parts of the joint written record separately. That will mirror current practice in the High Court and is supported by the Crown Office and the Scottish Courts and Tribunals Service.

I move amendment 67.

Margaret Mitchell: I seek clarification, cabinet secretary. Preparing a joint record suggests that there has been some agreement by both parties, but if the parts are lodged separately, are we creating room for disagreement? I ask that question merely for information.

The Convener: I will let the cabinet secretary answer that point after Roddy Campbell has asked his question.

Roderick Campbell: It is sensible to make each party responsible for providing its own record. That will enable the court to see where the fault line lies if there are problems.

Michael Matheson: The principal change that amendment 67 will make is that, rather than the prosecution being responsible for making the final submission of the joint record to the court—both the part from the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service side and that from the defence agent—it will be the responsibility of each side to submit its own part. The two parts will make up one document for the court—the presiding sheriff or judge—to consider.

That approach will facilitate flexibility to allow the defence to lodge its part of the written record and to allow the prosecutor to lodge its part. The parts will then become a single report, which will be considered by the court.

Amendment 67 agreed to.
Section 66, as amended, agreed to.
Sections 67 to 69 agreed to.

Amendments 103 and 104 not moved.

Amendment 68 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 71 agreed to.
I sincerely hope that the cabinet secretary will support amendment 106, with the aim of getting the new approach to automatic early release right. Individuals with expertise would provide unrivalled insight into our criminal justice system and that aspect of sentencing.

I move amendment 106.

Elaine Murray: I am pleased that Margaret Mitchell does not intend to move amendment 49, which puzzled me because it seemed to propose taking us back to a system of cold release. I am pleased that we will not consider that amendment.

With respect, amendment 106 also seems to be slightly behind the times, because the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Act 2015 has been passed, despite my having reservations about aspects of it. Margaret Mitchell cited Professor Tata, but he and Professor McNeill—and others, I think—said that prisoner release should be considered in the wider context of sentencing policy. A commission to review only prisoner release arrangements would not be sufficient to tackle the entire issue; I would prefer there to be a review of sentencing, alternatives to imprisonment and all the rest of it.

Roderick Campbell: I will be brief, because Elaine Murray has made most of the points that I was going to make. It seems a little as though Margaret Mitchell is rehearsing the arguments that we heard in relation to the 2015 act, which we just passed. One thing that is missing is the cost of her proposed little exercise, which we should bear in mind.

Michael Matheson: Amendment 106 proposes a commission to look at early release of prisoners. The committee will recall that this Government established exactly such a commission when we took office: it was called the McLeish commission, which submitted an excellent report in 2008.

We remain committed to the independent McLeish commission report, which was clear that long-term reform to the system of early release was needed but that such reform could be taken forward only when prisoner numbers were at a long-term lower sustainable level. I am keen to progress policy to help meet the aspirations of the McLeish report on how we use our prisons. That is why I took through the reforms to automatic early release that this committee scrutinised earlier this year, and I will continue to seek to progress policies that will help achieve fundamental reform of our penal policy.

I listened to Margaret Mitchell’s earlier explanation with some interest, although a large part of it appears to be based on rehearsing

Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

After section 71

The Convener: Amendment 106, in the name of Margaret Mitchell, is grouped with amendment 49.

Margaret Mitchell: Automatic early release is a complex issue, as was highlighted in the evidence that the committee took from various academics during scrutiny of the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Bill. A significant body of evidence correctly identified the issue of cold release as problematic. It is essential that we get the release of offenders from prison absolutely right.

That is why I do not intend to move amendment 49, which was prepared last year, before the issue of cold release was raised. It is also why the Scottish Government should be prepared to reconsider the provisions in the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Act 2015.

The 2015 act does not deal effectively with prisoner release. Rather than end automatic early release, it simply changed the timing of automatic early release from the two-thirds point to the final six months of the sentence. Professor Cyrus Tata got to the nub of the problem at stage 2 of the bill, when he pointed out that the bill would not end automatic early release:

“It is the short-term end where there is much more to criticise—where people are released nominally on supervision but do not get supervision or the kind of support that they need.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 27 May 2015; c 5.]

The Law Society of Scotland also described shortcomings in the procedure surrounding the bill:

“To propose such a radical change to penal policy, as that contained within section 1 of the Bill, without the prior consideration of a large body of expert evidence, and to amend proposals significantly when a Bill is already before the Justice Committee is of significant concern.”

The Law Society continued:

“We would further suggest the creation of a body of experts with power to hear evidence from persons with professional knowledge in the field before this Bill progresses.”

I regret that the cabinet secretary did not act on the Law Society’s advice. Amendment 106 would provide for the establishment of a dedicated commission, to examine the rules governing the release of offenders across the board, including short-term and long-term prisoners, and to look at the rules governing post-release supervision.

I am pleased that Margaret Mitchell’s earlier explanation with some interest, although a large part of it appears to be based on rehearsing arguments that were debated during the course of the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Bill, which has since been passed by Parliament.

I am aware that Margaret Mitchell has also stated that she no longer intends to move amendment 49. However, it is worth bearing in mind that, if amendment 49 was passed by the committee, what it proposes would be likely to cost in the region of £100 million per year to implement. We estimate that ending all automatic early release and severely curtailing even the possibility of discretionary early release in the manner provided for would result in an increase in the prison population of around 3,100, which would be approximately a 40 per cent increase in Scotland’s already high prison population.

If the approach proposed by amendment 49 were to be taken—and it is Margaret Mitchell’s view that it should be taken—it is unclear to me where the additional £100 million per year would be found and where the 3,100 additional prisoners would be placed.

I believe that amendments 49 and 106 are unnecessary. The issue to which they refer was considered in great detail by the committee when considering the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Bill earlier this year. On that basis, I would ask the committee to reject amendments 106 and 49.

Margaret Mitchell: The main point is that the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Bill has been passed but will not come into effect for a number of years. Given that it does not abolish automatic early release, there is room to look at the issue again. Clearly, abolishing automatic early release would have cost implications, which is why a commission should be set up to consider all such aspects in an effort to get automatic early release correct.

I will reflect on what has been said on amendments 106 and 49 and might come back with further amendments at stage 3.

The Convener: You need to withdraw from the committee—sorry, not withdraw from the committee but withdraw amendment 106. That was a Freudian slip.

Margaret Mitchell: I seek leave to withdraw amendment 106.

Amendment 106, by agreement, withdrawn.

Section 72 agreed to.

After section 72

Amendment 49 not moved.

Sections 73 to 81 agreed to.
this referral in the interests of finality and certainty.”

It seems to be that before 2010 when the SCCRC was independent and away from politicians and the High Court—we should remember that High Court judges also sit in the appeal court—we were able to say that a case should have another crack of the whip by going to the High Court. Now we say that such a case must pass the test of finality and certainty at the SCCRC and, even if it does, it has to pass another test of finality and certainty at the High Court and the High Court can reject it.

I do not think that that is right. I am asking the committee and the cabinet secretary to consider going back to the situation before the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010.

The 2010 act changed the position because we thought that there would be a flood of applications to the appeal court following Cadder, but there were not. I have the figures here. Between 1999 and 2014, the SCCRC received a total of 1,844 cases, it completed reviews of 1,804 cases, and it referred 122 cases to the High Court. The procedure is tough. If someone makes an application to the SCCRC, it is not an easy path to getting their case heard again. Many cases have been successful in court because the tests that the SCCRC applies are very firm.

I am asking members to ask themselves why we changed the position in 2010. I think it was for political expediency at the time. We should go back to where we were in 1995 and leave the SCCRC with the power to look at cases and say which should be referred to the High Court in the interests of justice but not allow the High Court to refuse to accept those cases. Let us get rid of the test of finality and certainty because it is unjust and let us not leave the High Court with the right to refuse a referral that has already gone through the tests.

I move amendment 7.

John Finnie: Convener, I support your amendment and commend you on your explanation of it. It is a complicated area about the relationship between the various bodies and the High Court’s gate-keeping role around its own workload. I fully support your proposals.

Roderick Campbell: Convener, I have just checked the bill because I was not sure that I agreed with your definition of what the bill seeks to do. We have moved on from the 2010 act. Even though the High Court would no longer have a gate-keeping role, it would still be able to use an interests of justice test and thereby have an ultimate review function.

On the one side we have an array of people who support the great work of the SCCRC, not least of which are the Law Society and the Faculty of Advocates. Against that, we have the comments from the Crown and from Lord Carloway that not having the provision would mean that, if new evidence came to light, they would be powerless to do anything. I am also conscious that, when we took evidence, it was accepted that only those SCCRC appeals have an interests of justice test while normal appeals to the High Court do not, so the arguments are very finely balanced.

I will oppose Christine Grahame’s amendment, but I hope that those finely balanced arguments will prove to be largely academic. If a situation arose in which there had been a reference from the SCCRC on an interests of justice test that was subsequently overturned because the appeal court took the view that the interests of justice should prevent the appeal from proceeding, that would cause public disquiet. Although I accept the provisions, I hope that the debate will prove to be more academic than anything else.

Michael Matheson: The effect of amendments 7 and 8 would be to make changes to how the SCCRC decides whether to refer cases to the appeal court and how the appeal court considers such appeals.

The commission has an important part to play as one of the checks and balances in our system of justice. It has a mix of one third legal members and two thirds lay members with experience of the criminal justice system to ensure that its members can apply a suitable balance of expertise and knowledge to the cases that it considers. It has a special power to refer cases to the appeal court when the normal appeal process has been exhausted, where it considers a miscarriage of justice may have occurred and it is in the interests of justice to have the case considered by the appeal court.

However, the final decision as to whether a miscarriage of justice has occurred is made by the appeal court. That is to ensure that the final decision on the rights of an individual in any case is made by an independent and impartial tribunal, as required under the European convention on human rights.

Given the role of the appeal court in those cases, it would be inappropriate to remove the ability of the appeal court to consider the interests of justice when considering appeals based on a commission referral. It is key to its role as final decision maker that it considers where the interests of justice lie in each and every case. I therefore invite the committee to reject amendment 7.
Amendment 8 seeks to remove the requirement for the SCCRC to consider the need for finality and certainty in criminal proceedings when deciding whether to refer a case to the appeal court.

The commission took the need for finality and certainty into account as part of the interests of justice test even before the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010 came into force. Indeed, it is another ECHR concept that requires to be taken into account when cases are dealt with in our justice system.

It has been noted that the commission does its job very well. To allow it to continue to do its job well, it is important that the commission continues to take the need for finality and certainty into account when reaching a decision on whether to refer a case to the appeal court. I therefore invite the committee to reject amendment 8.

The Convener: I thank you for your comments, cabinet secretary. I wholly disagree with them, and none of that was said in the debate on the emergency legislation that brought in the current provisions. In fact, there was scant information—nobody really knew what I was talking about at the time—so I think that the provision came in very quickly without very much consideration.

I remind my colleague Rod Campbell that the law now in force under the 1995 act, as amended by the 2010 act, states:

“Where the Commission has referred a case to the High Court under section 194B of this Act, the High Court may, despite section 194B(1), reject the reference if the Court considers that it is not in the interests of justice that any appeal arising from the reference should proceed.”

That means that the High Court can overturn a decision on the interests of justice test by the SCCRC. The 1995 act then goes on to say in section 194DA(2):

“In determining whether or not it is in the interests of justice that any appeal arising from the reference should proceed, the High Court must have regard to the need for finality and certainty in the determination of criminal proceedings.”

That makes the High Court judge and jury of its own case and gives it a gate-keeping role that should have been the role of the SCCRC.

As the cabinet secretary said, prior to that amendment being made to the 1995 act, it was the SCCRC that considered finality and certainty in the interests of justice. The 2010 amendment was put in as a more heavy handed way of simply preventing some cases from going forward because of Cadder. That is my concern. We have already passed legislation in haste and there have been unintended consequences, and I think that this bill will have unintended consequences. I know that, when the 2010 act was considered, the SCCRC was unhappy that it was being hamstrung. Therefore, I will press amendment 7.

11:45

Michael Matheson: Convener, can I respond to some of the points that you have made?

The Convener: Yes, you may.

Michael Matheson: Based on a recommendation that was made by Lord Carloway, the bill will change the provisions in the 2010 act to push the gate-keeping process that the convener referred to from the beginning of the consideration of an appeal to the end. Under the bill, the appeal court will not be able to refuse to accept a referral from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission on the basis of that being in the interests of justice until it has actually considered the appeal. The matter of the interests of justice will then be considered after the appeal has been heard before the court.

Therefore, under the bill, the gate-keeping to which the member refers in the 2010 act is shifted from the beginning of the process to the end. It is only right that the appeal court has the power to consider the interests of justice at that particular point, having heard the matter.

The Convener: That does not give me any comfort, because it could mean that someone succeeds at appeal, but the High Court sitting as an appeal court then says, “However, we don’t think that it is in the interests of justice and finality to grant this.” I actually think that that is worse in some respects.

I regret to say that, as you know cabinet secretary, I remain a difficult customer. This is another bee in my bonnet—it is a big bonnet with lots of bees in it. I will press my amendment 7.

The question is, that amendment 7 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For

Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mclnnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against

Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Paterson, Gill (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Abstentions

Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
The Convener: The result of the division is: For 5, Against 3, Abstentions 1.

Amendment 7 agreed to.

Amendment 8 moved—[Christine Grahame]—and agreed to.

Section 82, as amended, agreed to.

After section 82

The Convener: We will deal with Mary Fee’s amendments, because she is here, and we will stop after them.

Amendment 107, in the name of Mary Fee, is grouped with amendments 108 and 109.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): Amendments 107 to 109, in my name, are designed to ensure that children and young people are provided with the necessary support and protection should their parent or carer be sent to prison. Evidence shows that children and young people who are affected by the imprisonment of a parent are particularly at risk of negative outcomes such as stigma, bullying, trauma and mental health problems. The issue has been raised in previous sessions of Parliament and has received cross-party support.

An estimated 27,000 children in Scotland have a parent in prison. Until we can accurately identify those children and the numbers who are affected, their particular needs that arise from parental imprisonment will not be taken into account by local authorities and other public bodies as part of their children’s services planning process. In short, those children will continue to slip through the net. As such, I have included amendments on developing a national strategy and on reporting requirements for ministers.

Amendment 107 would require the Scottish ministers to introduce through subordinate legislation a national strategy on the impact of sentencing on children who are affected by parental imprisonment. A robust system is needed that ensures stronger links between the justice system, statutory services and voluntary organisations that work with children and families who are affected by imprisonment. A national strategy is necessary to ensure that a more strategic, co-ordinated and multi-agency approach is taken by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, the Scottish Courts and Tribunals Service, Police Scotland, the Scottish Prison Service, local authorities, national health service boards and the voluntary sector to identify the wellbeing needs of children who are affected by parental imprisonment and to provide support and assistance to meet those needs.

Amendment 108 would require the Scottish ministers to prepare an annual report on sentencing and the impact of parental imprisonment. As I have stated previously, the impact on children of sentencing and parental imprisonment is often overlooked. Those children are often unseen and their wellbeing needs that have been created by the imprisonment of a parent are overlooked or simply not picked up as part of getting it right for every child. An annual report would support the development of a national strategy, as well as acting as part of the monitoring of the effectiveness of child and family impact assessments, which I will come on to shortly.

The details to be provided would include the total number of people who have responsibility for a child who have been remanded in custody or sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention, the total number of people who have responsibility for a child who have been convicted of an offence and sentenced, the total number of child and family impact assessments undertaken when people who have responsibility for a child have been remanded in custody or sentenced to a term of imprisonment, and confirmation of the total number of children who, following an impact assessment, require a child’s plan under section 33 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

Requiring the Scottish ministers to produce an annual report that focuses on children who are affected by imprisonment would increase the focus on those issues. It would also improve the evidence base by ensuring that key agencies had to provide the Scottish ministers with a wide range of information.

Amendment 109 would ensure that a child and family impact assessment was undertaken when a person was remanded in custody to await trial or sentencing or when a person was sentenced to a period of imprisonment. A child and family impact assessment is vital to ensure that processes are put in place to assess the likely impact on the wellbeing of the person’s dependent child or children in the family. Such assessments will help to identify support and assistance that may be necessary to meet the dependent child’s wellbeing needs that arise from those circumstances, as well as those of the remaining family.

Child and family impact assessments have been recommended by Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People since 2007, by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child in 2011 and by Barnardo’s Scotland and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in their report “An unfair sentence—All Babies Count: Spotlight on the Criminal Justice System”, which has been endorsed by Together Scotland, the SCCYP and Families Outside. The assessments have also been widely supported in responses to the consultation on my proposed member’s bill—the support for children (impact of parental imprisonment) (Scotland) bill.

My member’s bill consultation highlighted the fact that current procedures and processes are not working for such children, as key justice services are not under GIRFEC duties, so the children often remain hidden and unsupported. No robust form of identification or assessment is in place for that group. Criminal justice social work reports are not always requested or conducted and, when they are, they do not touch on the child and family; their intention is to establish what the family can do for the offender to reduce reoffending, not what statutory services can do to support the family. Children’s voices are lost in the justice system, and child and family impact assessments are needed as a trigger to ensure that children who are affected by parental imprisonment are recognised and supported through GIRFEC.

I move amendment 107.

Roderick Campbell: My principal objection to the group of amendments is that the committee has not considered the matters in detail. There may also be an overlap with the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014. In opposition to some of the comments that children’s organisations have made, I remind the committee of evidence that Dame Elish Angiolini gave us in June 2012, when she said that her commission on women offenders

“took some excellent evidence from Dr Nancy Loucks on the impact that family and child impact statements could have. We gave careful consideration to the matter, but I do not believe that any judge who sentenced without reference to the fact that someone had children and the impact that imprisonment would have would be doing their job appropriately.”

Nevertheless, she took the view that “We must move away from creating more bureaucracy—more reports—and look at what would make a difference to the sentencing process. Consideration of children should be critical to that process, but I believe that such issues should arise out of the professionals’ training—it should be their bread and butter. That is how social workers, defence solicitors and judges should approach the matter.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 26 June 2012; c 1582.]

That is in opposition to the pro-assessment lobby, but my main objection is that the committee has not considered the matter in detail, so it would be inappropriate to support the amendments at this stage.

Alison McInnes: Rod Campbell might well be right that things should operate in the way that he described, but it is clear from what Mary Fee and many agencies over the years have said that that is not what happens. There is clear evidence of the impact of parental imprisonment. As Mary Fee said, 27,000 children around the country have a parent in prison, and they are being let down. There is no doubt that they have particular needs. I commend Mary Fee’s enlightened approach and support her amendments.

Margaret McDougall: I should declare that I am a member of the cross-party group on families affected by imprisonment.

I support Mary Fee’s amendments because there is a lack of consistency in how the children of parents who have been taken into custody or imprisoned are dealt with across the country. Impact assessments should be consistent across the country, and a national strategy should be put in place with regular reporting to the Government.

The Convener: John Finnie will be followed by Margaret McDougall—I mean Margaret Mitchell. I knew that I would get my Margarets muddled up.

John Finnie: Like Alison McInnes, I was somewhat surprised by Rod Campbell’s comments. The word “should” was used. I thought from what he outlined that he was making the case in support of Mary Fee’s amendments.

Roderick Campbell: I was quoting—

The Convener: Rod Campbell can come back in with a supplementary later if he wants to.

John Finnie: Mary Fee used the phrase “slip through the net”. The net catches some, and it is not being suggested that there is a complete disregard for the wellbeing of children. I know that a lot of good work takes place in many parts of the country with the active involvement of and a lot of collaboration between the authorities but, as has been highlighted, it is clear that the reports to the sheriff prior to sentencing are not picking up on crucial aspects. I am not necessarily enthusiastic about more annual reports, but I fully support the principle of addressing the obvious gaps that have been highlighted.

Margaret Mitchell: I, too, have a lot of sympathy with amendment 109. I seek clarification—although I think that Mary Fee has given this—that the assessments would kick in at the point of custody and after sentencing. Although the judge should have all the facts, we know that, in practice, they do not. I support the amendment on that basis.

The Convener: I am quite sympathetic to what has been proposed, but I would like to hear what the cabinet secretary has to say. There appears to be a gap in how families and children are taken into account when so much can impact on them. Sometimes children end up on a criminal path because of the way that the parents have been. I would like to hear what the cabinet secretary has to say first.

Michael Matheson: The majority of the amendments in the group focus on the needs of children who are affected by parental imprisonment. I thank Mary Fee for raising those matters, but we believe that a person-centred approach should be taken for all children and young people up to the age of 18 that recognises their differing needs, so we do not believe that the amendments are necessary.

The existing provisions in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 provide appropriate coverage for all vulnerable children, and the law places a duty on local authorities and health boards to make services available. Amendment 107, which seeks to put in place secondary legislation to create a national strategy on the impact of sentencing on children who are affected by parental imprisonment, is not necessary. The 2014 act already contains provision to provide support as appropriate to meet a child’s wellbeing needs. That includes a requirement on services and agencies to work together in a co-ordinated way. A child whose wellbeing is affected by parental imprisonment will receive the support that they need through the implementation of parts 4 and 5 of that act.

Our national parenting strategy recognises the needs of this group of vulnerable families. The strategy sets out a commitment to work with the Scottish Prison Service to encourage involvement between parents in custody and their children. We are also committed to providing targeted support for parents in prison to aid their reintegration and to help them to deter their own children from offending behaviour. In addition, the Scottish Prison Service has recently produced minimum standards for working with the children and families of prisoners, and the Scottish Government is providing support via a number of public-social partnerships.

12:00

Amendment 108 would place a duty on the Scottish ministers to provide an annual report to Parliament on the number of parents who have been remanded or sentenced, the number of convictions, the types of sentences and the number of impact assessments that have been carried out. Part 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 places a duty on each local authority and the relevant health board to jointly prepare a three-year children’s services plan for the local authority’s area. Those plans will be required to provide for children’s services—both universal and targeted—as well as taking into account related services, of which the Scottish Prison Service is one.

In addition, the Scottish Prison Service is examining options to gather information relating to parents in custody. Any formal recording of such information will safeguard the children’s rights and ensure that the relevant and appropriate data collection protocols are met.

Amendment 108 seeks confirmation of the total number of children affected by parental imprisonment who require a child’s plan under section 33 of the 2014 act. I do not consider that collecting and reporting on the number of those plans for such children would be useful or necessary. Rather, we propose that health boards and local authorities should consider whether a child who is affected by a parent’s imprisonment requires a child’s plan to be put in place.

Amendment 109 calls for the introduction of child impact assessments. However, the named person service is for every child and is intended to ensure that concerns are picked up early and that no one, including the vulnerable, is left without support. As Rod Campbell said, the commission on women offenders, which Dame Elish Angiolini chaired, concluded in 2012 that the current arrangements for court social work reports adequately cover any consideration of the impact of imprisonment on children and that an additional report would add to the many reports and papers that a court has to consider.

The existing arrangements already provide for the accused’s parenting or other caring responsibilities to be brought to the court’s attention before they are sentenced, and the defendant’s solicitor can also explain their circumstances in mitigation. The introduction of such an assessment would have a considerable impact on the court and on criminal justice social work processes.

I therefore ask the committee to reject amendments 107 to 109.

Mary Fee: I note the cabinet secretary’s comments, and I am grateful for the committee’s supportive comments. Margaret Mitchell asked when an impact assessment would be carried out. Amendment 109 would require a child and family impact assessment to be undertaken when a person was remanded in custody to await trial or sentencing or when a person had been sentenced. It would take place after that point, not prior to it.

As John Finnie rightly said—to a degree, Rod Campbell picked up the point as well—there is already good practice. However, that good practice is not mirrored across the country. Key justice services are not under GIRFEC duties, so children often remain hidden and unsupported and, too often, children’s voices are not heard. My amendments would allow their voices to be heard and the correct support to be given.

My member’s bill consultation highlighted significant gaps in service provision in practice. Although there is some good practice in working with children, there is no consistent approach—it depends on which part of the country people are in.

I therefore press amendment 107 and I will move my other amendments.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 107 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Abstentions
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 4, Abstentions 1.

I am in the position that I was in before. I hope that the cabinet secretary has taken on board everything that Mary Fee said. I will not support the amendment, but I think that she has brought some essential points to the table.

Amendment 107 disagreed to.

Amendment 108 moved—[Mary Fee].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 108 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Abstentions
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 3, Against 4, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 108 agreed to.

The Convener: That concludes our stage 2 consideration for today. I thank Mary Fee for her attendance and I also thank the cabinet secretary and his officials.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

2nd Marshalled List of Amendments for Stage 2

The Bill will be considered in the following order—

- Sections 57 to 61 Schedule 2
- Sections 62 to 87 Schedule 3
- Sections 1 to 52 Schedule 1
- Sections 53 to 56 Sections 88 to 91
- Long Title

Amendments marked * are new (including manuscript amendments) or have been altered.

Before section 83

Michael Matheson

69 Before section 83, insert—

CHAPTER

PUBLICATION OF PROSECUTORIAL TEST

Publication of prosecutorial test

(1) The Lord Advocate must make available to the public a statement setting out in general terms the matters about which a prosecutor requires to be satisfied in order to initiate, and continue with, criminal proceedings in respect of any offence.

(2) The reference in subsection (1) to a prosecutor is to one within the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.>

Section 83

Michael Matheson

70 Leave out section 83

Section 84

Michael Matheson

71 Leave out section 84

Section 85

Michael Matheson

72 Leave out section 85
Section 86

Michael Matheson
73 In section 86, page 39, line 24, leave out <, a detained person is to participate in a specified> and insert <at any time before or at a specified hearing, a detained person is to participate in the>

Michael Matheson
74 In section 86, page 39, line 32, leave out <an ad hoc hearing held> and insert <any proceedings at a specified hearing or otherwise in the case>

Michael Matheson
75 In section 86, page 39, line 35, leave out  and insert <any specified hearing or other proceedings>

Michael Matheson
76 In section 86, page 39, line 37, after <hearing> insert <or other proceedings>

Michael Matheson
77 In section 86, page 40, line 1, after <hearing> insert <or other proceedings>

Michael Matheson
78 In section 86, page 40, line 6, leave out  insert <any specified hearing or other proceedings>

Michael Matheson
79 In section 86, page 40, line 9, after <charge> insert <on any complaint or indictment>

Michael Matheson
80 In section 86, page 40, line 16, leave out from beginning to <where> in line 21 and insert—
<(3) The court may postpone a specified hearing to a later day if>

Michael Matheson
81 In section 86, page 40, leave out lines 26 to 28

Michael Matheson
82 In section 86, page 40, line 28, at end insert—
<Effect of postponement>

(1) Except where a postponement under section 288I(3) is while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, the following do not count towards any time limit arising in such a person’s case if such a postponement in the case is to the next day on which the court is sitting—
(a) that next day,
(b) any intervening Saturday, Sunday or court holiday.

(2) Even while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, that section does not prevent a postponement under section 288I(3) in the person’s case.

(3) In section 288I and this section, “postpone” includes adjourn.

After section 86

Michael Matheson

83 After section 86, insert—

<Electronic proceedings

(1) In section 305 (Acts of Adjournal) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) Subsection (1) above extends to making provision by Act of Adjournal for something to be done in electronic form or by electronic means.”.

(2) These provisions of the 1995 Act are repealed—

(a) in section 141—

(i) subsection (3A),
(ii) in subsection (5), the words “(including a legible version of an electronic communication)”,
(iii) subsection (5ZA),
(iv) in subsection (5A), paragraph (b) together with the word “or” immediately preceding it,
(v) subsections (6A), (7A) and (7B),
(b) section 303B together with the italic heading immediately preceding it,
(c) section 308A.

(3) In the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007, section 42 is repealed.

Michael Matheson

84 After section 86, insert—

<Chapter

Authorisation under Part III of the Police Act 1997

Authorisation of persons other than constables

In section 108 (interpretation of Part III) of the Police Act 1997, after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) A reference in this Part to a staff officer of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner is to any person who—
(a) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7A of schedule 4 to the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, or

(b) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7 of that schedule to whom paragraph 7B(2) of that schedule applies.”.

Margaret Mitchell

105 After section 86, insert—

<CAPITALISED>

EVIDENCE RELATING TO SEXUAL OFFENCES: LEGAL REPRESENTATION

Evidence relating to sexual offences: legal representation

In section 275 (exception to restrictions under section 274) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (5), insert—

“(5A) Where an application under subsection (1) is made, the complainer must in respect of that application—

(a) be informed of the right of the complainer—

(i) to seek legal advice,

(ii) to appoint a legal representative,

(b) be given the opportunity—

(i) to seek such advice,

(ii) to appoint such a representative.

(5B) Where the complainer appoints a legal representative—

(a) a copy of the application must be sent to the legal representative, and

(b) the legal representative must be given an opportunity to—

(i) submit written evidence on the matters set out in the application in accordance with subsection (3),

(ii) represent the complainer at any hearing in relation to the application.

(5C) The Scottish Ministers must by regulations make provision for fees incurred by a legal representative appointed under subsection (5B) to be paid out of the Scottish Legal Aid Fund.”.

Section 87

Michael Matheson

85 In section 87, page 42, line 12, leave out  and insert <or extend a time limit>

Michael Matheson

86 In section 87, page 42, leave out line 18
Michael Matheson

87 In section 87, page 42, line 27, at end insert—

<55CA Steps following arbitration

(1) If representations under section 55B(1) are made in terms settled through arbitration in accordance with the PNBS’s constitution, the Scottish Ministers must take all reasonable steps appearing to them to be necessary for giving effect to those representations.

(2) However, this—

(a) requires the Scottish Ministers to take such steps only in qualifying cases (see paragraph 4C(2) of schedule 2A),

(b) does not require the Scottish Ministers—

(i) to take such steps in relation to representations that are no longer being pursued by the PNBS, or

(ii) where such steps would comprise or include the making of regulations under section 48, to make regulations under that section more than once with respect to the same representations.>

Michael Matheson

88 In section 87, page 42, line 34, leave out from <subsection> to end of line and insert <this Chapter, “reporting year” is as defined in the PNBS’s constitution.”.>

Michael Matheson

89 In section 87, page 43, line 3, at end insert—

<( ) In section 125 (subordinate legislation) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, after subsection (3) there is inserted—

“(3A) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) of schedule 2A are subject to the affirmative procedure if they include provisions of the kind mentioned in paragraph 4B(2) or 4C(2) of that schedule.”.>

Schedule 3

Michael Matheson

91 In schedule 3, page 50, leave out line 6

Michael Matheson

92 In schedule 3, page 50, line 12, leave out <and deputy chairperson>

Michael Matheson

93 In schedule 3, page 50, line 18, leave out <or deputy chairperson>

Michael Matheson

94 In schedule 3, page 50, line 21, at end insert—
Temporary chairperson

(1) The PNBS may have a temporary chairperson if (for the time being)—
   (a) there is no chairperson, or
   (b) the chairperson is unavailable to act.

(2) A reference in this Chapter to the chairperson is to be read, where appropriate to do so by virtue of sub-paragraph (1), as meaning or including (as the context requires) the temporary chairperson.

Michael Matheson
95 In schedule 3, page 50, line 24, leave out <chairperson or deputy chairperson> and insert <the chairperson>

Michael Matheson
96 In schedule 3, page 50, line 34, leave out from second <the> to end of line 35 and insert <consensus to be reached among the members of the PNBS on the terms of representations to be made under section 55B(1) or 55C(1).>

Michael Matheson
97 In schedule 3, page 51, leave out lines 1 and 2 and insert—

<(  ) The constitution—
   (a) may require a dispute on representations to be made under section 55B(1) to be submitted to arbitration by agreement among the members to do so, and must not prevent such a dispute from being submitted to arbitration on such agreement (except prevention by way of limitation as allowed below),
   (b) may—
      (i) authorise the chairperson to submit such a dispute to arbitration without such agreement,
      (ii) limit how often within a reporting year such a dispute can be submitted to arbitration (including limitation framed by reference to particular matters or circumstances).>

Michael Matheson
98 In schedule 3, page 51, line 18, at end insert—

<(6) The constitution, or any revision of it, has effect only when brought into effect by the Scottish Ministers by regulations.>

Michael Matheson
99 In schedule 3, page 51, line 18, at end insert—

<Process of arbitration

4A(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies where—>
(a) a dispute is submitted to arbitration in accordance with the constitution, and
(b) no arbitration agreement relating to the dispute is in place.

(2) A document submitting the dispute to arbitration is deemed to be an arbitration agreement.

(3) For the application of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010, a reference in this paragraph to an arbitration agreement is to such an agreement as defined by section 4 of that Act.

4B(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of arbitration in accordance with the constitution (whether such arbitration arises by reason of a real or deemed arbitration agreement).

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions disapplying or modifying the mandatory rules in schedule 1 to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010.

4C(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of the operation of section 55CA.

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions specifying, by reference to particular matters or circumstances, what are qualifying cases.

Michael Matheson

100 In schedule 3, page 51, line 21, leave out <and deputy chairperson>

After section 87

Michael Matheson

90 After section 87, insert—

<Consequential and transitional

(1) In connection with section 87—

(a) in schedule 1 to the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, after paragraph 50A there is inserted—

“50B The Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.”,

(b) in schedule 2 to the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003, at the appropriate place under the heading referring to offices there is inserted—

“Chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland”.

(2) On the coming into force of section 87—

(a) a person then holding office as the chairman of the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom by virtue of section 61(2) of the Police Act 1996 is to be regarded as if appointed as the chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland under paragraph 2(2) of schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,
(b) any agreements then extant within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom (so far as relating to the Police Service of Scotland) of the kind for which Chapter 8A of Part 1 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 includes provision are to be regarded as if made as agreements within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland by virtue of that Chapter.

Before section 1

Alison McInnes

50 Before section 1, insert—

<PART
SEARCH BY POLICE OF PERSON NOT ARRESTED

Police powers of search where person not arrested

(1) A constable must not search—
   (a) a person,
   (b) a vehicle, or
   (c) anything which is in or on a vehicle,
without a warrant, unless subsection (3) applies.

(2) It is immaterial whether the person consents to being the subject of a search.

(3) This subsection applies where the search is conducted in accordance with—
   (a) a power conferred by an enactment, and
   (b) the terms of a code of practice issued by the Scottish Ministers under section (Police powers of search where person not arrested: code of practice).

(4) This Part applies to a vessel, aircraft or hovercraft as it applies to a vehicle.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4), “vessel” includes any ship, boat, raft or other apparatus constructed or adapted for floating on water.

Alison McInnes

51 Before section 1, insert—

<Police powers of search where person not arrested: code of practice

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, by regulations, set out a code of practice in connection with the exercise by constables of powers under any enactment to search a person who has not been arrested in connection with an offence.

(2) The code of practice must set out—
   (a) the circumstances in which any such power may be exercised,
   (b) the procedure to be followed in the exercise of any such power,
   (c) the record to be kept, and the right of any person to receive a copy of the record, of the exercise of any such power, and
   (d) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.
(3) Regulations for the first code of practice under subsection (1) must be laid before the Parliament no later than the end of the period of one year beginning with the day of Royal Assent.

(4) The Scottish Ministers must—
   (a) keep the code of practice under review, and
   (b) lay regulations for a revised code of practice before the Parliament no later than 4 years after the day on which regulations for the previous code of practice are laid.

(5) Before making regulations under subsection (1) setting out the first or a revised code of practice, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
   (a) the chief constable,
   (b) the Scottish Police Authority,
   (c) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
   (d) Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, and
   (e) such other persons as they consider appropriate,

   on a draft of the code of practice.

(6) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Alison McInnes

52 Before section 1, insert—

   <Police powers of search: annual reporting

   In subsection (3) of section 39 (the Scottish Police Authority’s annual report) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012—
   (a) the word “and” at the end of paragraph (a) is repealed, and
   (b) after paragraph (b) there is inserted “and

   (c) a record of the number of searches without a warrant of persons not arrested carried out by the Police Service during the reporting year, including in particular and where practicable a record of—

   (i) the number of instances where an individual has been searched on more than one occasion,
   (ii) the profile, as regards age, gender and ethnic or national origin, of those searched,
   (iii) the proportion of searches that resulted in anything being found,
   (iv) the proportion of searches that resulted in a matter being reported to the procurator fiscal, and
   (v) the number of complaints made to the Police Service about the conduct of searches.”.>

Section 1

Michael Matheson

111 In section 1, page 1, leave out lines 18 to 20 and insert—
<( ) continue committing the offence, or
( ) obstruct the course of justice in any way, including by—
    (i) seeking to avoid arrest, or
    (ii) interfering with witnesses or evidence.>

Michael Matheson

112 In section 1, page 1, line 20, at end insert—
<( ) For the avoidance of doubt, an offence is to be regarded as not punishable by imprisonment for the purpose of subsection (2) only if no person convicted of the offence can be sentenced to imprisonment in respect of it.>

Section 2

Michael Matheson

113 In section 2, page 1, line 25, at end insert—
<( ) Where—
    (a) a constable who is not in uniform arrests a person under section 1, and
    (b) the person asks to see the constable’s identification, the constable must show identification to the person as soon as reasonably practicable.>

Section 3

Michael Matheson

114 In section 3, page 2, line 9, at end insert <, and
<( ) of the person’s right to have—
    (i) intimation sent to a solicitor under section 35, and
    (ii) access to a solicitor under section 36.>

Section 4

Michael Matheson

115 In section 4, page 2, line 12, at end insert—
<(2) Subsection (1) ceases to apply, and the person must be released from police custody immediately, if—
    (a) the person has been arrested without a warrant,
    (b) the person has not yet arrived at a police station in accordance with this section, and
    (c) in the opinion of a constable there are no reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed—
        (i) the offence in respect of which the person was arrested, or
(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

(3) For the avoidance of doubt, subsection (1) ceases to apply if, before arriving at a police station in accordance with this section, the person is released from custody under section 19(2).>

Section 5

John Finnie

10 In section 5, page 2, line 28, leave out <(verbally or in writing)>

John Finnie

11 In section 5, page 2, line 30, at end insert <(and, regardless of whether those Articles allow or require information to be provided in writing only, the person must be provided with all such information both verbally and in writing).>

Section 6

Michael Matheson

116 In section 6, page 2, line 32, at end insert <by a constable>

Michael Matheson

117 In section 6, page 3, line 5, at end insert—

<(  ) the time at which the person ceases to be in police custody.>

Michael Matheson

118 In section 6, page 3, line 5, at end insert—

<(  ) Where relevant, there must be recorded in relation to an arrest by a constable—

(a) the reason that the constable who released the person from custody under subsection (2) of section 4 formed the opinion mentioned in paragraph (c) of that subsection,>

Michael Matheson

119 In section 6, page 3, line 9, at end insert—

<(  ) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section (Information to be given if sexual offence),>

Michael Matheson

120 In section 6, page 3, line 14, at end insert—

<(  ) section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s),>

Michael Matheson

121 In section 6, page 3, leave out lines 17 to 21
In section 6, page 3, line 27, after <any> insert <custody>

In section 6, page 3, line 29, at end insert—

If a constable considers whether to give authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit) there must be recorded—

(a) whether a reasonable opportunity to make representations has been afforded in accordance with subsection (4)(a) of that section,

(b) if the opportunity referred to in paragraph (a) has not been afforded, the reason for that,

(c) the time, place and outcome of the constable’s decision, and

(d) if the constable’s decision is to give the authorisation—

(i) the grounds on which it is given,

(ii) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed and reminded of things in accordance with section (Information to be given on authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)), and

(iii) the time at which the person requests that intimation be sent under section (Information to be given on authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit))(3)(a) and the time at which it is sent.

Where a person is held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit) there must be recorded—

(a) the time, place and outcome of any custody review under section 9,

(b) the time at which any interview in the circumstances described in section 13(6) begins and the time at which it ends.

In section 7, page 4, line 13, after <who> insert

is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

Section 7

John Finnie

In section 7, page 4, line 13, after <who> insert—

is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

Section 8

Michael Matheson

In section 8, page 4, line 22, after <reason> insert <that>
In section 8, page 4, line 23, at end insert <and the fact that the person may be kept in custody for a further 12 hours under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit).>

In section 8, page 4, line 23, at end insert <, and the circumstances in which the 12 hour limit may be extended to 24 hours under section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances).>

In section 9, page 4, line 25, leave out from beginning to <consider> in line 29 and insert—

(1) A custody review must be carried out—
(a) when a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of authorisation given under section 7, and
(b) again, if authorisation to keep the person in police custody is given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit), when the person has been held in custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of that authorisation.

(2) A custody review entails the consideration by a constable of—

In section 9, page 4, line 31, leave out <The constable mentioned in subsection (2) must be> and insert <A custody review must be carried out by>.

Move section 9 to after section 12.

In section 10, page 5, line 2, after <7(4)> insert <, (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)(3)(b)>

In section 10, page 5, line 12, at end insert <fully>.

In section 10, page 5, line 12, at end insert—

<( ) the effect of keeping the person in custody on a child for whom the person has responsibility,>
Section 11

Michael Matheson
131 Move section 10 to after section 12

Section 11

Michael Matheson
132 In section 11, page 5, line 17, leave out from  to <(a)> in line 18 and insert—

 a person

Michael Matheson
133 In section 11, page 5, line 20, leave out <time> and insert <period>

John Pentland
14 In section 11, page 5, line 21, at beginning insert <Subject to section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances),>

Michael Matheson
134 In section 11, page 5, line 22, at end insert <, or

( ) authorisation to keep the person in custody has been given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)>

After section 11

John Pentland
15 After section 11, insert—

<Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances

(1) Section 11(2) does not apply if the conditions in subsection (2) are met.

(2) The conditions are that a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above is satisfied—

(a) that the test in section 10 is met, and

(b) that there are exceptional circumstances that justify continuing to hold the person in police custody.

(3) A person may continue to be held in police custody by virtue of subsection (2) for more than a continuous period of 24 hours only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

(4) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2)(b), “exceptional circumstances” includes circumstances—

(a) where a doctor certifies that the person is, whether due to the influence of alcohol or drugs or for some other reason, not fit to be interviewed before the end of the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11,

(b) where the constable mentioned in subsection (2) considers that—
(i) access to another person in accordance with section 32, or
(ii) support from another person in accordance with section 33,
cannot be provided in sufficient time before the end of the 12 hour period,
(c) where the constable mentioned in subsection (2) considers that continuing to hold the person in police custody is essential to ensure the safety of the person or another person.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by regulations subject to the affirmative procedure, modify subsection (4) to further define, add to, remove or otherwise modify circumstances that may constitute “exceptional circumstances” for the purposes of subsection (2)(b).

Section 12

John Pentland

16 In section 12, page 5, line 33, after <11> insert <, and as the case may be the 24 hour period mentioned in section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances),>

After section 12

Michael Matheson

135 After section 12, insert—

<Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit

(1) A constable may give authorisation for a person who is in police custody to be kept in custody for a continuous period of 12 hours, beginning when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(2) Authorisation may be given only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and
(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(3) Authorisation may be given only if—

(a) the person has not been held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under this section in connection with—

(i) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody, or
(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence, and

(b) the constable is satisfied that—

(i) the test in section 10 will be met when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends,
(ii) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody is an indictable offence, and
(iii) the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously.

(4) Before deciding whether or not to give authorisation the constable must—
(a) where practicable afford a reasonable opportunity to make verbal or written representations to—
   (i) the person, or
   (ii) if the person so chooses, the person’s solicitor, and
(b) have regard to any representations made.

(5) If authorisation is given, it is deemed to be withdrawn if the person is released from police custody before the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(6) Subsection (7) applies when—
   (a) by virtue of authorisation given under this section, a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 12 hours (beginning with the time at which the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ended), and
   (b) during that period the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(7) The person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

Michael Matheson

136 After section 12, insert—

<Information to be given on authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)

(1) This section applies when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit).

(2) The person must be informed—
   (a) that the authorisation has been given, and
   (b) of the grounds on which it has been given.

(3) The person—
   (a) has the right to have the information mentioned in subsection (2) intimated to a solicitor, and
   (b) must be informed of that right.

(4) The person must be reminded about any right which the person has under Chapter 5.

(5) Subsection (4) does not require that a person be reminded about a right to have intimation sent under either of the following sections if the person has exercised the right already—
   (a) section 30,
   (b) section 35.

(6) Information to be given under subsections (2), (3)(b) and (4) must be given to the person as soon as reasonably practicable after the authorisation is given.

(7) Where the person requests that intimation be sent under subsection (3)(a), the intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.>
Section 13

Michael Matheson

137 In section 13, page 6, line 17, leave out <section 11> and insert <sections 11 and (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)>

John Pentland

17 In section 13, page 6, line 17, at end insert <and as the case may be the 24 hour period mentioned in section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances).>

Michael Matheson

138 In section 13, page 6, line 18, leave out <time> and insert <period>

Michael Matheson

139 In section 13, page 6, line 21, leave out <to a hospital for that purpose> and insert <as quickly as is reasonably practicable—
(i) to a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, or
(ii) to a police station from a hospital to which the person was taken for the purpose of receiving medical treatment.>

Michael Matheson

140 In section 13, page 6, line 22, leave out <time> and insert <period>

Michael Matheson

141 In section 13, page 6, line 23 after <to> insert <or from>

Section 14

John Finnie

18 In section 14, page 6, line 32, leave out from <and> to end of line 33

Michael Matheson

142 In section 14, page 6, leave out line 33 and insert—
<( )> either—
(i) the person has not been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, or
(ii) it has not been more than 28 days since the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence.>

Elaine Murray

47 In section 14, page 6, line 35, leave out from <ensuring> to end of line 36 and insert <securing—>
(a) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,
(b) that the person does not commit an offence while released,
(c) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into a relevant offence,
(d) the protection of the person, or
(e) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.>

Michael Matheson

143 In section 14, page 6, line 36, at end insert—

< ( ) A condition under subsection (2)—

(a) may not require the person to be in a specified place at a specified time,

(b) may require the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period.>

John Finnie

19 In section 14, page 6, line 36, at end insert—

<(2A) When imposing a condition under subsection (2), the constable is to specify the period for which the condition is to apply.

(2B) The period specified under subsection (2A) is to be such period, not exceeding 28 days, as the appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(2C) In any case where a person has previously been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, the reference in subsection (2B) to 28 days is to be read as a reference to 28 days minus the number of days on which the person was so subject.>

Michael Matheson

144 In section 14, page 6, line 38, leave out <Chapter 7> and insert <schedule (Breach of liberation condition)>

Michael Matheson

145 In section 14, page 6, line 39, leave out subsection (4)

John Finnie

20 In section 14, page 6, line 39, leave out from <(1)(c)> to end of line 3 on page 7 and insert <(2C)>

Michael Matheson

146 In section 14, page 7, line 7, leave out <inspector> and insert <sergeant>
Section 15

Michael Matheson
147 In section 15, page 7, line 15, leave out from \(<last>\) to \(<14(4)>\) and insert \(<\text{day falling 28 days after the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under section 14(2) in connection with a relevant offence}>\)

John Finnie
21 In section 15, page 7, line 15, leave out \(<28 \text{ day period described in section 14(4)>}\) and insert \(<\text{period specified under section 14(2A)>}\)

Section 17

John Finnie
22 In section 17, page 8, line 17, at end insert \(<,\)
( ) to have the period for which the condition applies reduced.>

John Finnie
23 In section 17, page 8, line 20, after \(<\text{condition}>\) insert \(<\text{or, as the case may be, the period specified under section 14(2A)>}\)

John Finnie
24 In section 17, page 8, line 21, after \(<\text{imposed}>\) insert \(<\text{or, as the case may be, specified}>\)

John Finnie
25 In section 17, page 8, line 23, after \(<\text{condition}>\) insert \(<\text{or, as the case may be, specify an alternative period}>\)

John Finnie
26 In section 17, page 8, line 25, after \(<\text{imposed}>\) insert \(<\text{or period specified}>\)

John Finnie
27 In section 17, page 8, line 26, at end insert \(<\text{or, as the case may be, specified under section 14(2A)>}\)

Before section 18

Michael Matheson
148 Before section 18, insert—

<Information to be given if sexual offence>

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—
(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant in respect of a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies, or
(b) a person—
   (i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
   (ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged by a constable with a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies.
(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—
   (a) that the person’s case at, or for the purposes of, any relevant hearing (within the meaning of section 288C(1A) of the 1995 Act) in the course of the proceedings may be conducted only by a lawyer,
   (b) that it is, therefore, in the person’s interests to get the professional assistance of a solicitor, and
   (c) that if the person does not engage a solicitor for the purposes of the conduct of the person’s case at or for the purposes of the hearing, the court will do so.

Section 18

Michael Matheson
149 In section 18, page 9, line 1, leave out subsection (2) and insert—
(2) The person must be brought before a court (unless released from custody under section 19)—
(a) if practicable, before the end of the first day on which the court is sitting after the day on which this subsection began to apply to the person, or
(b) as soon as practicable after that.

Michael Matheson
101 In section 18, page 9, line 6, at end insert <(by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means)>

After section 18

Michael Matheson
150 After section 18, insert—
<Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court
(1) Subsection (2) applies when—
   (a) a person is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), and
   (b) either—
      (i) a constable believes the person is under 16 years of age, or
      (ii) the person is subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings
(Scotland) Act 2011.
(2) The person must (unless released from custody under section 19) be kept in a place of safety until the person can be brought before the court.

(3) The place of safety in which the person is kept must not be a police station unless an appropriate constable certifies that keeping the person in a place of safety other than a police station would be—
   (a) impracticable,
   (b) unsafe, or
   (c) inadvisable due to the person’s state of health (physical or mental).

(4) A certificate under subsection (3) must be produced to the court when the person is brought before it.

(5) In this section—
   “an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of inspector or above,
   “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Michael Matheson

151 After section 18, insert—

<Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court>

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a person who is 16 years of age or over and subject to a supervision order or under 16 years of age—
   (a) is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or
   (b) is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) A parent of the person mentioned in subsection (1) (if one can be found) must be informed of the following matters—
   (a) the court before which the person is to be brought,
   (b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court,
   (c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing, and
   (d) that the parent’s attendance at the court may be required under section 42 of the 1995 Act.

(3) Subsection (2) does not require any information to be given to a parent if a constable has grounds to believe that giving the parent the information mentioned in that subsection may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person mentioned in subsection (1).

(4) In this section—
   “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person mentioned in subsection (1),
   “supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Michael Matheson

152 After section 18, insert—
Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court

(1) The appropriate local authority must be informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) when—

(a) a person to whom either subsection (2) or (3) applies is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or

(b) a person to whom subsection (2) applies is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) This subsection applies to—

(a) a person who is under 16 years of age,

(b) a person who is—

(i) 16 or 17 years of age, and

(ii) subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(3) This subsection applies to a person if—

(a) a constable believes the person is 16 or 17 years of age,

(b) since being arrested, the person has not exercised the right to have intimation sent under section 30, and

(c) on being informed or reminded of the right to have intimation sent under that section after being officially accused, the person has declined to exercise the right.

(4) The matters referred to in subsection (1) are—

(a) the court before which the person mentioned in paragraph (a) or (as the case may be) (b) of that subsection is to be brought,

(b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court, and

(c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (1), the appropriate local authority is the local authority in whose area the court referred to in subsection (4)(a) sits.

Section 19

Michael Matheson

153 In section 19, page 9, line 20, at end insert—

<( ) Where a person is in custody as mentioned in subsection (1)(a), the person may not be released from custody under subsection (2)(b).>

Section 20

Michael Matheson

154 In section 20, page 9, line 28, at end insert <while subject to the undertaking>
Michael Matheson

155 In section 20, page 9, line 30, leave out from <commit> to end of line 33 and insert—

(i) commit an offence,
(ii) interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,
(iii) behave in a manner which causes, or is likely to cause, alarm or distress to witnesses,

(b) any further condition that a constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring that any conditions imposed under paragraph (a) are observed.>

Elaine Murray

48 In section 20, page 9, line 32, leave out from <ensuring> to end of line 33 and insert <securing—

(i) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,
(ii) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody,
(iii) the protection of the person, or
(iv) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.>

Michael Matheson

156 In section 20, page 9, line 34, leave out  and insert—

(a) a condition requiring the person—
(i) to be in a specified place at a specified time, and
(ii) to remain there for a specified period,

(b) a condition requiring the person—
(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and
(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period>

Michael Matheson

157 In section 20, page 9, line 35, leave out subsection (5) and insert—

(5) For the imposition of a condition under subsection (3)(b)—

(a) if it is of the kind described in subsection (4)(a), the authority of a constable of the rank of inspector or above is required,
(b) if it is of any other kind, the authority of a constable of the rank of sergeant is required.>
Offence of breaching condition

1 (1) A person commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, the person breaches a liberation condition by reason of—
   (a) failing to comply with an investigative liberation condition,
   (b) failing to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking, or
   (c) failing to comply with the terms of an undertaking, other than the requirement to appear at court.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) does not apply where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (in which case see paragraph 3).

(3) It is competent to amend a complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under sub-paragraph (1) at any time before the trial of a person in summary proceedings for—
   (a) the original offence, or
   (b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as the original offence.

(4) In sub-paragraph (3), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
   (a) an investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
   (b) an undertaking was given.

Sentencing for the offence

2 (1) A person who commits an offence under paragraph 1(1) is liable on summary conviction to—
   (a) a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or
   (b) imprisonment for a period—
      (i) where conviction is in the justice of the peace court, not exceeding 60 days,
      (ii) where conviction is in the sheriff court, not exceeding 12 months.

(2) A penalty under sub-paragraph (1) may be imposed in addition to any other penalty which it is competent for the court to impose, even if the total of penalties imposed exceeds the maximum penalty which it is competent to impose in respect of the original offence.

(3) The reference in sub-paragraph (2) to a penalty being imposed in addition to another penalty means, in the case of sentences of imprisonment or detention—
(a) where the sentences are imposed at the same time (whether or not in relation to the same complaint), framing the sentences so that they have effect consecutively,
(b) where the sentences are imposed at different times, framing the sentence imposed later so that (if the earlier sentence has not been served) the later sentence has effect consecutive to the earlier sentence.

(4) Sub-paragraph (3)(b) is subject to section 204A (restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners) of the 1995 Act.

(5) Where a person is to be sentenced in respect of an offence under paragraph 1(1), the court may remit the person for sentence in respect of it to any court which is considering the original offence.

(6) In sub-paragraphs (2) and (5), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
(a) the investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
(b) the undertaking was given.

Breach by committing offence

3 (1) This paragraph applies—
(a) where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (“offence O”), but
(b) only if the fact that offence O was committed while the person was subject to the liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(2) In determining the penalty for offence O, the court must have regard—
(a) to the fact that offence O was committed in breach of a liberation condition,
(b) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an investigative liberation condition, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 4(1),
(c) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an undertaking other than the requirement to appear at court, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 5(1).

(3) Where the maximum penalty in respect of offence O is specified by (or by virtue of) an enactment, the maximum penalty is increased—
(a) where it is a fine, by the amount equivalent to level 3 on the standard scale,
(b) where it is a period of imprisonment—
   (i) as respects conviction in the justice of the peace court, by 60 days,
   (ii) as respects conviction in the sheriff court or the High Court, by 6 months.

(4) The maximum penalty is increased by sub-paragraph (3) even if the penalty as so increased exceeds the penalty which it would otherwise be competent for the court to impose.

(5) In imposing a penalty in respect of offence O, the court must state—
(a) where the penalty is different from that which the court would have imposed had sub-paragraph (2) not applied, the extent of and the reasons for that difference,
(b) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.
Matters for paragraph 3(2)(b)

4 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(b), the matters are—

(a) the number of offences in connection with which the person was subject to investigative liberation conditions when offence O was committed,

(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),

(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—

(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),

(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(c)

5 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(c), the matters are—

(a) the number of undertakings to which the person was subject when offence O was committed,

(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),

(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—

(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),

(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Evidential presumptions

6 (1) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), the facts mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) are to be held as admitted unless challenged by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded.
(2) The facts are—
   (a) that the person breached an undertaking by reason of failing to appear at court as required by the terms of the undertaking,
   (b) that the person was subject to a particular—
      (i) investigative liberation condition, or
      (ii) condition under the terms of an undertaking.

(3) In proceedings to which sub-paragraph (4) applies—
   (a) something in writing, purporting to impose investigative liberation conditions and bearing to be signed by a constable, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the investigative liberation conditions imposed under section 14(2),
   (b) something in writing, purporting to be an undertaking and bearing to be signed by the person said to have given it, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the undertaking at the time that it was given,
   (c) a document purporting to be a notice (or a copy of a notice) under section 16 or 21, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the notice.

(4) This sub-paragraph applies to proceedings—
   (a) in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), or
   (b) in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(5) In proceedings in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment, that fact is to be held as admitted unless challenged—
   (a) in summary proceedings, by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, or
   (b) in the case of proceedings on indictment, by giving notice of a preliminary objection in accordance with section 71(2) or 72(6)(b)(i) of the 1995 Act.

Interpretation

7 In this schedule—
   (a) references to an investigative liberation condition are to a condition imposed under section 14(2) or 17(3)(b) subject to any modification by notice under section 16(1) or (5)(a),
   (b) references to an undertaking are to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a),
   (c) references to the terms of an undertaking are to the terms of an undertaking subject to any modification by—
      (i) notice under section 21(1), or
      (ii) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).>

Section 21

Michael Matheson

160 In section 21, page 10, line 11, leave out subsection (3)
After section 21

163 After section 21, insert—

<Rescission of undertaking>

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice rescind an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) (whether or not the person who gave it is to be prosecuted).

(2) The rescission of an undertaking by virtue of subsection (1) takes effect at the end of the day on which the notice is sent.

(3) Notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

(4) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person is likely to fail to comply with the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(5) Where a person is arrested under subsection (4) or subsection (6) applies—

(a) the undertaking referred to in subsection (4) or (as the case may be) (6) is rescinded, and

(b) this Part applies as if the person, since being most recently arrested, has been charged with the offence in connection with which the person was in police custody when the undertaking was given.

(6) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person who is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) is in police custody (otherwise than as a result of having been arrested under subsection (4)), and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has failed, or (if liberated) is likely to fail, to comply with the terms of the undertaking.

(7) The references in subsections (4) and (6)(b) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by—

(a) notice under section 21(1), or

(b) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).

<Expiry of undertaking>

(1) An undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) expires—
(a) at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is required by its terms to appear at a court, or
(b) if subsection (2) applies, at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is brought before a court having been arrested under the warrant mentioned in that subsection.

(2) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person fails to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), and

(b) on account of that failure, a warrant for the person’s arrest is granted.

(3) The references in subsections (1)(a) and (2)(a) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by notice under section 21(1).

Section 23

John Finnie
28 In section 23, page 11, line 10, after <committing> insert <and again immediately before the interview commences>

Michael Matheson
165 In section 23, page 11, line 11, at end insert—

< ( ) of the general nature of that offence,>

Michael Matheson
166 In section 23, page 11, line 24, at end insert—

< ( ) Where a person is to be interviewed by virtue of authorisation granted under section 27, before the interview begins the person must be informed of what was specified by the court under subsection (6) of that section.>

Section 24

John Finnie
29 In section 24, page 12, line 2, leave out from <if> to end of line 5

Section 25

Elaine Murray
55 In section 25, page 12, line 15, leave out <Subsections (2) and (3) apply> and insert <Subsection (2) applies>

Elaine Murray
Supported by: Alison McInnes
56 In section 25, page 12, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>
Michael Matheson
167 In section 25, page 12, line 17, after <age,> insert—
<(aa) the person is 16 or 17 years of age and subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011,>

Elaine Murray
Supported by: Alison McInnes
57 In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <16> and insert <18>

John Finnie
30 In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <, owing to mental disorder,>

Elaine Murray
58 In section 25, page 12, line 22, leave out subsections (3) to (5)

Michael Matheson
168 In section 25, page 12, line 27, leave out <(2)(b)> and insert <(2)(aa) or (b)>

John Finnie
31 In section 25, page 12, leave out lines 36 and 37

Michael Matheson
169 In section 25, page 12, line 36, leave out <328(1)> and insert <328>

Section 30

Elaine Murray
59 In section 30, page 16, line 9, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Elaine Murray
60 In section 30, page 16, line 13, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Michael Matheson
170 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert <, or
  (c) safeguarding and promoting the wellbeing of the person in custody, where a constable believes that person to be under 18 years of age.>

Michael Matheson
171 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert—
<(  ) The sending of intimation may be delayed by virtue of subsection (5)(c) only for so long as is necessary to ascertain whether a local authority will arrange for someone to visit the person in custody under section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s)(2).>

Michael Matheson

172 In section 30, page 16, line 25, leave out  and insert <the person in custody>

Section 31

Michael Matheson

173 In section 31, page 16, line 31, at end insert—

<(  ) Subsection (2) does not apply if—

(a) a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, and

(b) the person in custody requests that the person to whom intimation is to be sent under section 30(1) is not asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held.>

Michael Matheson

174 In section 31, page 16, line 32, leave out <Subsection (4) applies> and insert <Subsections (3A) and (4) apply>

Michael Matheson

175 In section 31, page 16, leave out lines 35 and 36 and insert—

<(b) the person to whom intimation is sent by virtue of section 30(3), if asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held, claims to be unable or unwilling to attend within a reasonable time.>

Michael Matheson

176 In section 31, page 16, line 36, at end insert—

<(  ) a local authority, acting under section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s)(8)(a), has advised against sending intimation to the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3).>

Michael Matheson

177 In section 31, page 16, line 36, at end insert—

<(3A) Section 30(3) ceases to have effect.>

Michael Matheson

178 In section 31, page 16, line 37, after <intimation> insert <to an appropriate person>
Elaine Murray
61  In section 31, page 17, line 2, leave out from second <or> to end of line 5

Michael Matheson
179 In section 31, page 17, line 6, leave out <(4)(a)> and insert <(4)>

Michael Matheson
180 In section 31, page 17, line 12, leave out <30(4)(b)> and insert <30(5)(a) or (b)>

Michael Matheson
181 In section 31, page 17, line 14, leave out <30(4)(b)> and insert <30(5)(a) or (b)>

Section 32

Elaine Murray
62  In section 32, page 17, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Michael Matheson
182 In section 32, page 17, line 20, leave out <at least one> and insert

Michael Matheson
183 In section 32, page 17, line 21, leave out from <who> to end of line 22

Elaine Murray
63  In section 32, page 17, line 23, leave out subsection (2)

Michael Matheson
184 In section 32, page 17, line 24, leave out <at least one> and insert

Michael Matheson
185 In section 32, page 17, leave out line 26

Michael Matheson
186 In section 32, page 17, line 27, at end insert—
<(  ) Access to a person in custody under subsection (1) or (2) need not be permitted to more than one person at the same time.>

Elaine Murray
64  In section 32, page 17, line 28, leave out <or (2)>
In section 32, page 17, line 34, leave out  and insert <the person in custody>

After section 32

After section 32, insert—

Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

(1) Intimation of the fact that a person is in police custody and the place where the person is in custody must be sent to a local authority as soon as reasonably practicable if—
   (a) a constable believes that the person may be subject to a supervision order, or
   (b) by virtue of subsection (5)(c) of section 30, a constable has delayed sending intimation in respect of the person under subsection (1) of that section.

(2) A local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) may arrange for someone to visit the person in custody if—
   (a) the person is subject to a supervision order, or
   (b) the local authority—
      (i) believes the person to be under 16 years of age, and
      (ii) has grounds to believe that its arranging someone to visit the person would best safeguard and promote the person’s wellbeing (having regard to the effect of subsection (4)(a)).

(3) Before undertaking to arrange someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2), the local authority must be satisfied that anyone it arranges to visit the person in custody will be able to make the visit within a reasonable time.

(4) Where a local authority arranges for someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2)—
   (a) sections 30 and 32 cease to have effect, and
   (b) the person who the local authority has arranged to visit the person in custody must be permitted access to the person in custody.

(5) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (4)(b) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—
   (a) in the interests of—
      (i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or
      (ii) the apprehension of offenders, or
   (b) for the wellbeing of the person in custody.

(6) Where a local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) confirms that the person in custody is—
   (a) over 16 years of age, and
   (b) subject to a supervision order,
sections 30 to 32 are to be applied in respect of the person as if a constable believes the person to be under 16 years of age.
Subsection (8) applies where a local authority might have arranged for someone to visit a person in custody under subsection (2) but—
  (a) chose not to do so, or
  (b) was precluded from doing so by subsection (3).

The local authority may—
  (a) advise a constable that the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3) should not be sent intimation if the local authority has grounds to believe that sending intimation to that person may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person in custody, and
  (b) give advice as to who might be an appropriate person to a constable considering that matter under section 31(5) (and the constable must have regard to any such advice).

In this section, “supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Section 33

John Pentland
38 In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out from beginning to <over,>

Elaine Murray
32 In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out <18> and insert <16>

John Finnie
33 In section 33, page 18, line 2, leave out <owing to mental disorder,>

Michael Matheson
189 In section 33, page 18, line 3, leave out <to> and insert—
  <( )>

John Finnie
34 In section 33, page 18, leave out lines 17 and 18

Michael Matheson
190 In section 33, page 18, line 17, leave out <328(1)> and insert <328>

Section 34

Michael Matheson
191 Leave out section 34
After section 34

Mary Fee

40 After section 34, insert—

<Persons with responsibility for a child

Duty to contact named person: persons with responsibility for a child

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody has responsibility for a child.

(2) With a view to facilitating the provision of care and support to the child while the person is in police custody, the constable must send intimation of the matters specified in subsection (3) to an individual identified in relation to the child under section 20 or 21 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

(3) The matters are—
   (a) the fact that the person is in custody,
   (b) the place where the person is in custody,
   (c) the time limits for keeping the person in custody that apply under Chapter 2 of this Part.

Mary Fee

110 After section 34, insert—

<Persons with responsibility for a child

Duty to contact named person: persons with responsibility for a child

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody has responsibility for a child.

(2) With a view to ensuring the wellbeing of the child, the constable must send information of the type specified in subsection (3) to an individual identified in relation to the child under section 20 or 21 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

(3) The information to be sent is to contain details of any matters relevant to the child’s wellbeing, and to the child’s wellbeing needs.

(4) Information falls within subsection (3) if the constable considers that—
   (a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,
   (b) it is necessary or expedient for the purposes of the exercise of any of the named person functions,
   (c) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and
   (d) the provision of the information would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(5) In considering for the purpose of subsection (4)(c) whether information ought to be provided, the constable is, so far as reasonably practicable, to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child.
(6) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (5), the constable is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(7) For the purpose of subsection (4)(c) the information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision relating to the sending of information under subsection (2) above.

(9) Regulations under subsection (8) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 36

Michael Matheson

192 In section 36, page 19, line 16, leave out second <means> and insert <method>

Michael Matheson

193 In section 36, page 19, line 17, leave out <means of>

Section 39

Michael Matheson

194 In section 39, page 20, leave out line 2 and insert—

<(  ) cause the person to participate in an identification procedure.>

After section 40

Michael Matheson

195 After section 40, insert—

<Care of drunken persons

Taking drunk persons to designated place

(1) Where—

(a) a person is liable to be arrested in respect of an offence by a constable without a warrant, and

(b) the constable is of the opinion that the person is drunk,

the constable may take the person to a designated place (and do so instead of arresting the person).

(2) Nothing done under subsection (1)—

(a) makes a person liable to be held unwillingly at a designated place, or

(b) prevents a constable from arresting the person in respect of the offence referred to in that subsection.

(3) In this section, “designated place” is any place designated by the Scottish Ministers for the purpose of this section as a place suitable for the care of drunken persons.>
Section 42

Alison McInnes
53 In section 42, page 20, line 18, at end insert—

\(<(\ )\ search\ a\ child,>\)

Mary Fee
41 In section 42, page 20, line 19, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
42 In section 42, page 20, line 20, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
43 In section 42, page 20, line 21, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
44 In section 42, page 20, line 22, after <child> insert <or person>

Mary Fee
45 In section 42, page 20, line 23, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Elaine Murray
65 In section 42, page 20, line 25, leave out <well-being> and insert <best interests>

After section 42

Michael Matheson
196 After section 42, insert—

\(<\textit{Duties in relation to children in custody}\>

(1) A child who is in police custody at a police station is, so far as practicable, to be prevented from associating with any adult who is officially accused of committing an offence other than an adult to whom subsection (2) applies.

(2) This subsection applies to an adult if a constable believes that it may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the child mentioned in subsection (1) to prevent the child and adult from associating with one another.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

“child” means person who is under 18 years of age,

“adult” means person who is 18 years of age or over.

Michael Matheson
197 After section 42, insert—
Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply if—
   (a) a person is being kept in a place of safety in accordance with section (Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court) (2) when it is decided not to prosecute the person for any relevant offence, and
   (b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence.

(2) The Principal Reporter must be informed, as soon as reasonably practicable, that the person is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3).

(3) The person must be kept in a place of safety under this subsection until the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(4) An offence is a “relevant offence” for the purpose of subsection (1) if—
   (a) it is the offence with which the person was officially accused, leading to the person being kept in the place of safety in accordance with section (Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court) (2), or
   (b) it is an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence mentioned in paragraph (a).

(5) In this section, “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Elaine Murray

After section 42, insert—

Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused

(1) Subject to section (Disclosure of information: person released under section 14), a constable must not without reasonable cause release the information specified in subsection (2) to any person other than an authorised person.

(2) The information is information relating to a person not officially accused of an offence which—
   (a) identifies that person, or
   (b) is likely to be sufficient to allow that person to be identified, as having been arrested in connection with an offence.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (1), an “authorised person” means—
   (a) a constable,
   (b) a person to whom intimation must or may be sent under Chapter 5 of this Part,
   (c) a person other than a constable to whom the information must be disclosed for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into the offence.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (1), a determination that there is reasonable cause to disclose information must be made—
   (a) only if it is in the public interest to do so, and
   (b) by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.
Elaine Murray

36  After section 42, insert—

<Disclosure of information: person released under section 14

(1) Without prejudice to the generality of section (Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused), a constable may disclose qualifying information relating to an alleged offence to a person mentioned in subsection (2) where the conditions in subsection (3) are met.

(2) The persons are—

(a) a person—

(i) against whom, or

(ii) against whose property,

the acts which constituted the alleged offence were directed,

(b) in the case where the death of a person mentioned in paragraph (a) was (or appears to have been) caused by the alleged offence, a prescribed relative of the person,

(c) a person who is likely to give evidence in criminal proceedings which are likely to be instituted against a person in respect of the alleged offence,

(d) a person who has given a statement in relation to the alleged offence to a constable.

(3) The conditions are that disclosure of the information —

(a) is in the public interest or is otherwise likely to promote the safety and wellbeing of a person mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) is authorised by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

(4) In this section—

“prescribed” means prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by order subject to the negative procedure,

“qualifying information” means information that—

(a) identifies a person as having been arrested in connection with an alleged offence and subsequently released under section 14, and

(b) sets out such information relating to any conditions imposed on the person under section 14(2) as the constable authorising the disclosure considers appropriate.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by order subject to the negative procedure, modify the definition of “qualifying information” in subsection (4).>

Section 43

Michael Matheson

198  Leave out section 43
Section 44

Michael Matheson
199 Leave out section 44

Section 45

Michael Matheson
200 Leave out section 45

Section 46

Michael Matheson
201 Leave out section 46

Section 47

Michael Matheson
202 Leave out section 47

Section 48

Michael Matheson
203 Leave out section 48

Section 49

Michael Matheson
204 Leave out section 49

Section 50

Michael Matheson
205 In section 50, page 24, line 27, leave out <relation to> and insert <respect of>

Schedule 1

Michael Matheson
206 In schedule 1, page 44, line 28, at end insert—

<( ) in subsection (3), for the words “he can be delivered into the custody” there is substituted “the arrival”).>
207 In schedule 1, page 45, line 30, at end insert—

<In each of sections 169(2) and 170(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, the words “arrested without warrant and” are repealed.>

208 In schedule 1, page 46, line 2, leave out from <15A> to end of line 3 and insert <17A,>

209 In schedule 1, page 46, line 4, leave out <cross-heading> and insert <heading>

210 In schedule 1, page 46, line 5, at end insert—

<( ) section 43,>

211 In schedule 1, page 46, line 6, at end insert—

<(1) In section 18—

(a) in subsection (1), the words “or is detained under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed,

(b) in subsection (2), the words “or detained” are repealed.

(2) In subsection (2)(a) of section 18B, for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(3) In section 18D—

(a) in subsection (2)(a), the words “or detained” are repealed,

(b) in subsection (2)(b), for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(4) In subsection (8)(b) of section 19AA, the words “or detention under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed.>

212 In schedule 1, page 46, line 6, at end insert—

<In section 42—

(a) subsection (3) is repealed,

(b) subsection (7) is repealed,

(c) in subsection (8), for the words “subsection (7) above” there is substituted “section (Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,

(d) in subsection (9), the words “detained in a police station, or” are repealed,

(e) subsection (10) is repealed.>
Michael Matheson

213 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In section 6D of the Road Traffic Act 1988, for subsection (2A) there is substituted—

“(2A) Instead of, or before, arresting a person under this section, a constable may detain the person at or near the place where the preliminary test was, or would have been, administered with a view to imposing on the person there a requirement under section 7.”.>

Michael Matheson

214 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000—

(a) in paragraph 18—

(i) in sub-paragraph (2), for the words from “and” at the end of paragraph (a) to the end of the sub-paragraph there is substituted—

“(ab) intimation is to be made under paragraph 16(1) whether the person detained requests that it be made or not, and

(ac) section 32 (right of under 18s to have access to other person) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies as if the detained person were a person in police custody for the purposes of that section.”,

(ii) after sub-paragraph (3) there is inserted—

“(4) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)—

“child” means a person under 16 years of age,

“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the child mentioned in sub-paragraph (2).”,

(b) in paragraph 20(1), the words “or a person detained under section 14 of that Act” are repealed,

(c) in paragraph 27—

(i) in sub-paragraph (4), paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) sub-paragraph (5) is repealed.>

Michael Matheson

215 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In the schedule to the Sexual Offences (Procedure and Evidence) (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph 2 is repealed.>

Michael Matheson

216 In schedule 1, page 46, line 33, at end insert—

<In the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011—

(a) in section 65—

(i) for subsection (1) there is substituted—
“(1) Subsection (2) applies where the Principal Reporter is informed under subsection (2) of section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 that a child is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3) of that section.”,

(ii) in subsection (2), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”,

(b) in section 66(1), for sub-paragraph (vii) there is substituted—

“(vii) information under section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, or”,

(c) in section 68(4)(e)(vi), for the words “section 43(5) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46)” there is substituted “section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,

(d) in section 69, for subsection (3) there is substituted—

“(3) If—

(a) the determination under section 66(2) is made following the Principal Reporter receiving information under section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, and

(b) at the time the determination is made the child is being kept in a place of safety,

the children’s hearing must be arranged to take place no later than the third day after the Principal Reporter receives the information mentioned in paragraph (a).”,

(e) in section 72(2)(b), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”.>
After section 53

Michael Matheson

219 After section 53, insert—

<Powers to modify Part

Further provision about application of Part

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part to provide that some or all of it—

(a) applies in relation to persons to whom it would otherwise not apply because of—

(i) section (Disapplication in relation to service offences), or

(ii) section 53,

(b) does not apply in relation to persons arrested otherwise than in respect of an offence.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such modifications to this Part as seem to them necessary or expedient in relation to its application to persons mentioned in subsection (1).

(3) Regulations under this section may make different provision for different purposes.

(4) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.>

Michael Matheson

220 After section 53, insert—

<Further provision about vulnerable persons

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) amend subsections (2)(b) and (6) of section 25,

(b) amend subsections (1)(c), (3) and (5) of section 33,

(c) specify descriptions of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.>

Before section 54

John Pentland

37 Before section 54, insert—

<Meaning of arrest

In this Part, “arrest” means—

(a) depriving a person of liberty of movement for the purpose of the purported investigation or prevention of crime, and

(b) taking the person to a police station in accordance with section 4.>
Section 54

Michael Matheson

221 In section 54, page 25, line 7, leave out <99> and insert <99(1)>

Section 56

Michael Matheson

222 In section 56, page 25, line 15, leave out from <if> to end of line 18 and insert <from the time the person is arrested by a constable until any one of the events mentioned in subsection (2) occurs.>

(2) The events are—

(a) the person is released from custody,
(b) the person is brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2),
(c) the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2)(b) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 that the person continue to be kept in a place of safety.>

After section 56

Mary Fee

46 After section 56, insert—

<Meaning of responsibility for a child>

(1) In this Part, “child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years.
(2) In this Part, references to a person who has responsibility for a child are references to—

(a) a person who is a parent or guardian having parental responsibilities or parental rights under any enactment in relation to a child,
(b) a person who—

(i) is otherwise legally liable to maintain a child, or
(ii) has care of a child.>
2nd Groupings of Amendments for Stage 2

This document provides procedural information which will assist in preparing for and following proceedings on the above Bill. The information provided is as follows:

- the list of groupings (that is, the order in which amendments will be debated). Any procedural points relevant to each group are noted;
- the text of amendments to be debated on the second day of Stage 2 consideration, set out in the order in which they will be debated. THIS LIST DOES NOT REPLACE THE MARSHALLED LIST, WHICH SETS OUT THE AMENDMENTS IN THE ORDER IN WHICH THEY WILL BE DISPOSED OF.

Groupings of amendments

Publication of prosecutorial test
69

Aggravations as to people trafficking
70, 71, 72

Participation of detained person in proceedings through TV link
73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 101

Electronic proceedings
83

Authorisation under Part III of Police Act 1997
84

Evidence relating to sexual offence: legal representation
105

Police Negotiating Board for Scotland
85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 90

Police powers to stop and search
50, 51, 52, 53

Power to arrest without warrant: “offences not punishable by imprisonment” and “not in interests of justice”
111, 112

Provision of information to arrested person
113, 114, 10, 11
Release from police custody prior to arrival at police station
115, 118

Drafting and other minor amendments
116, 117, 121, 192, 193, 194, 205, 221

Information to be given if sexual offence
119, 148

Requirements in relation to and rights of under 18s
120, 150, 151, 152, 55, 56, 167, 57, 58, 168, 59, 60, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 61, 179, 180, 181, 62, 182, 183, 63, 184, 185, 186, 64, 187, 188, 38, 32, 65, 196, 197, 222

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 58 pre-empts amendment 168
Amendment 63 pre-empts amendments 184 and 185
Amendment 38 pre-empts amendment 32

Keeping person in custody: period, authorisation, review etc.
122, 123, 12, 124, 125, 13, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 14, 134, 15, 16, 135, 136, 137, 17, 138, 139, 140, 141

Arrest and custody of person with responsibility for child
39, 40, 110, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46

Release on conditions or on undertaking: when and for how long conditions may be imposed
18, 142, 19, 145, 20, 147, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 154, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 18 pre-empts amendment 142
Amendment 145 pre-empts amendment 20
Amendment 147 pre-empts amendment 21

Release on conditions or on undertaking: purposes for which conditions may be imposed and nature of conditions etc.
47, 143, 146, 155, 48, 156, 157

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 155 pre-empts amendment 48

Breach of liberation condition
144, 158, 159, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204

Time at which officially accused person to be brought before court
149

Circumstances where person may not be released without undertaking
153
Provision of information prior to interview
28, 165, 166

Circumstances in which interview may take place without solicitor present
29

Persons unable to understand what is happening or communicate effectively (including powers to make further provision)
30, 31, 169, 33, 189, 34, 190, 191, 220

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 31 pre-empts amendment 169
Amendment 34 pre-empts amendment 190

Care of drunken persons
195

Disclosure of information relating to person not officially accused
35, 36

Modification of enactments in connection with Part 1
206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216

Power to apply Part 1
217, 218, 219

Meaning of arrest
37
Present:

Christian Allard
John Finnie
Margaret McDougall
Margaret Mitchell
Michael Russell (Committee Substitute)

Roderick Campbell
Christine Grahame (Convener)
Alison McInnes
Elaine Murray (Deputy Convener)

Apologies were received from Gil Paterson.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered the Bill at Stage 2 (Day 2).

The following amendments were agreed to (without division): 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100 and 90.

Amendment 105 was disagreed to (by division: For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0).

The following provisions were agreed to as amended: sections 86 and 87, and schedule 3.

The Committee ended consideration of the Bill for the day, amendment 90 having been disposed of.
The Convener: We move on to day 2 of stage 2 of the bill. I welcome Michael Matheson, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice. I also welcome the officials who are here to support the minister, although they are not permitted to participate in the proceedings.

Members should have copies of the bill, the marshalled list and groupings of amendments for consideration. We will not go beyond part 6 and schedule 3 today.

Before section 63

The Convener: Amendment 69, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is in a group on its own.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson): Amendment 69 will insert a new section into the bill that will place an obligation on the Lord Advocate to publish what is sometimes known as the prosecutorial test.

When Lord Bonomy published his review, I undertook to consider whether any of the recommendations could be implemented during the current parliamentary session. After consulting the Lord Advocate, I am of the view that this is one such recommendation.

Amendment 69 would require the Lord Advocate to publish the prosecutorial test—the matters that prosecutors must take into account when deciding whether to commence and thereafter continue with criminal proceedings. The Crown Office already voluntarily publishes its “Prosecution Code”, which includes its current prosecutorial test. The amendment would place the voluntary arrangement on a statutory basis. Lord Bonomy was of the view that that would assist in ensuring transparency and consistency of decision making in criminal proceedings, and I agree.

The independence of the Lord Advocate is also, however, of vital importance, and I therefore want to stress that the wording of the test will remain entirely a matter for him.

I move amendment 69.

Elaine Murray: I have a question; I am not opposed to the amendment in any way. When we discussed the publication of the prosecutorial test, it was in connection with the abolition of the requirement for corroboration and whether some reassurance would be necessary under those circumstances. Given that that part of the bill has been dropped, why is publication still required?

Alison McInnes: I also have a question. I support the amendment as far as it goes. The public has a real appetite for more transparency in how the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service reaches its decisions, but the cabinet secretary has chosen not to adopt Lord Bonomy’s recommendation in full. The draft legislation set out in the post-corroboration safeguards review also included provisions on regularly reviewing the test and consulting publicly on that. Will the minister say why he has not picked up on those two points?

Roderick Campbell: I support amendment 69. The key thing is to emphasise the distinction between putting the prosecutorial test in the statute and there being a requirement to publish it. I favour the latter. If the test was in the statute, it would be prescriptive. We are moving in the right direction.

Margaret Mitchell: I seek some clarification. As well as looking at initiating and continuing criminal proceedings, will there be an explanation of why a prosecution would not proceed?

Michael Matheson: On why we are placing the publication of the test in statute, the arrangement is voluntary at the moment but Lord Bonomy recommended that it should be put on a statutory footing. The reason behind lodging the amendment is that it will put a legal obligation on the Lord Advocate to publish the prosecutorial test.

We have not chosen to implement the recommendation about consultation for the test because we believe that the test itself should be left to the Lord Advocate to determine. There are important constitutional issues in the role and independence of the Lord Advocate when determining these matters. To provide for a consultation process would be to fetter or to seek to influence the Lord Advocate’s role to a degree. That is why we have not pursued the issue of consultation.

On Roderick Campbell’s point, the amendment will help to improve transparency and accountability in the process that is being put in place for decisions made by the Crown Office to be more open.

Margaret Mitchell will be aware that, earlier this year, new provisions in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014 came into force that place a requirement on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service that, when a victim of a crime wishes to understand a decision not to pursue a case for a particular reason, they have the right to be provided with that information by the Crown and the prosecution.
Amendment 69 agreed to.

Section 83—General aggravation of offence

The Convener: Amendment 70, in the name of Michael Matheson, is grouped with amendments 71 and 72.

Michael Matheson: Amendments 70 to 72 seek to remove sections 83 to 85 in their entirety from the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. Members will recall that part 6 of the bill as introduced included provisions in relation to people trafficking. Given that those provisions have now been included in the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Bill, I am seeking to remove the people trafficking provisions from this bill, as they are obviously no longer needed.

I move amendment 70.
Amendment 70 agreed to.

Section 84—Aggravation involving public official

Amendment 71 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 85—Expressions in sections 83 and 84

Amendment 72 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 86—Use of live television link

The Convener: Amendment 73, in the name of Michael Matheson, is grouped with amendments 74 to 82 and 101.

Michael Matheson: Section 86 of the bill as introduced makes provision in respect of the use of television links for the accused in criminal court cases. An important feature of the provisions is that, even when a case is of a nature that can be dealt with in this way, the court is required to consider whether it is in the interests of justice to do so. That ensures that the rights of the accused are fully protected in each individual case.

The group of amendments is largely technical. It arises as a result of consideration of the way in which the provisions were originally drafted and of further discussion with stakeholders.

Amendment 73 takes account of concerns expressed by stakeholders about the practical implications of convening ad hoc hearings—as distinct from the substantive hearing of a case—for the purpose of allowing the court to determine whether the substantive hearing of a case is to be dealt with using a TV link. The amendment makes it clear that the court can take the decision about the use of TV links before or during the substantive hearing of a case without the need to convene a separate ad hoc hearing.

Amendment 74 is consequential to amendment 73 and it reaffirms that the accused person can be required to participate, by TV link, in the part of the process that determines whether the substantive hearing is to take place by TV link, whether that part of the process occurs before or during a substantive hearing.

Amendments 75 to 78 follow on from amendments 73 and 74, remove the term “ad hoc hearing” from the bill, and make it clear that the provisions of the bill in respect of TV links apply during a substantive hearing of a case “or other proceedings”, which would include the part at which a decision on the use of TV links is taken.

Amendment 79 amends a provision in the bill as introduced that provides that the leading of evidence “as to a charge” is prohibited when the accused is participating by TV link. The effect of the amendment will be to specify that the prohibition applies only when the charge is on any indictment or complaint.

As a result of the amendment, there would be no absolute prohibition against the leading of evidence in other kinds of hearing—for example, one dealing with a breach of a community payback order—at which the person concerned is appearing by TV link. However, as in every other case, the court would still have to be satisfied, on a case-by-case basis, whether it is contrary to the interests of justice for evidence to be led while the accused is appearing by TV link.

Amendments 80 to 82 and 101 deal with the possible consequences of situations in which the court decides not to proceed to deal with the case before it using a TV link. It is anticipated that applications to have the accused appear by TV link will mostly be dealt with immediately before the calling of the substantive case. However, the court could refuse the application, and it will retain a power to revoke an application that it has previously granted. That might happen if, for instance, a technical issue arises with the TV link, or when further information comes to light during the substantive hearing that, in the view of the court, makes it no longer appropriate to proceed with a TV link.

It can be seen that practical difficulties might arise when the court decides not to proceed with the appearance of the accused by TV link. The accused may well need to be brought to court, which might not be readily achievable on the same day, so the postponement of the hearing could be necessary. When the accused is appearing from custody, any difficulty has to be balanced against the accused’s right to be brought promptly before the court. Amendment 80 therefore makes a general provision that, when a court has refused an application to deal with a case by TV link, it may postpone the substantive hearing to a later day, rather than necessarily the next day. The bill as introduced could have been read as providing that the court could postpone a hearing only until the next court day when an application was refused or revoked.

Amendment 81 will remove a now redundant provision from the bill.

Amendment 82 deals with the effect of postponement. When the accused is not in police custody and the postponement is until the next day, that day and any days on which the court is not sitting will not count towards any time limits in the case. However, the provision will not apply when the accused is in police custody and awaiting a court appearance.

The effect of that approach is that, when a postponement is necessary for an accused in custody, the accused still has a right to argue that the requirements—under section 18 of the bill and the European convention on human rights—to be brought promptly to court have not been complied with. For example, if an accused has to spend an extra night in custody solely because an unsuccessful attempt was made to present him for appearance by TV link and there was no back-up plan to bring him to court, it remains open to the accused to argue that it would in fact have been practicable to have brought him before the court in time. It would then be up to the court to decide whether the circumstances provide sufficient justification for the delay.

Amendment 101 amends section 18, which gives effect to the convention right to be brought promptly before a court on arrest for suspicion of having committed an offence. The section provides that an accused who appears from custody by TV link is to be regarded as having been “brought before”—to use the term in the bill—a court by the end of the court’s first sitting day after the arrest. The effect of amendment 101 will be to ensure that someone who appears from custody by TV link is to be regarded as having been “brought before” the court only when the court has made a determination that the substantive hearing is to be dealt with in that way. Therefore, if the court decides that it would not be appropriate to deal with a custody case by TV link, the obligation to bring the accused promptly before the court remains in place, which will generally mean that the accused will be physically brought to court. Together with amendment 82, that ensures that the rights of the accused in custody to a prompt hearing are protected.

I move amendment 73.

Amendment 73 agreed to.
for the purpose of prevention or detection of serious crime. That includes entering or interfering with property or wireless telegraphy. Authorisations may be granted on the application of a staff officer of the commissioner, and the commissioner may also designate a staff officer to grant property interference authorisations in her absence in cases of urgency.

The 1997 act does not, however, contain a definition of a staff officer, and there is therefore a degree of uncertainty as to who may apply for those authorisations or grant them in the commissioner’s absence in urgent cases. The Scottish Government’s intention is that any member of the commissioner’s investigations staff should be capable of applying for property interference or surveillance authorisations and of being designated, if the commissioner considers it appropriate, to grant those authorisations, if they are urgent, in her absence.

The necessary provision was made in respect of surveillance authorisations under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000, but unfortunately no such provision was made in respect of property interference authorisations.

Accordingly, amendment 84 is a clarifying amendment that inserts a definition of “staff officer” in part 3 of the Police Act 1997 for the purposes of property interference authorisations. That will ensure that members of staff who are directly employed by the commissioner and those who are seconded from police forces may apply for property interference authorisations or be designated by the commissioner to grant those authorisations in urgent cases where the commissioner is absent.

I move amendment 84.

John Finnie: As a tidying-up exercise, the change is welcome, as I believe the public want reassurance that the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner has the full range of powers and can act impartially and thoroughly.

Amendment 84 agreed to.

The Convener: I suspend the meeting again briefly for another change of officials.

11:34

Meeting suspended.

11:34

On resuming—

The Convener: Amendment 105, in the name of Margaret Mitchell, is in a group on its own.

Margaret Mitchell: I originally lodged amendments to the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill that would have had an effect similar to that of amendment 105. It is encouraging that the policy intention of those previous amendments gained support from other committee members during stage 2 of that bill.

Amendment 105 would require that independent legal advice be provided to victims of sexual offences at the point of a request for medical information and/or other personal details. Such legal advice would provide victims with information on their rights and would explicitly make them aware that they are able to refuse such requests. I know from the expressions of support for the amendment that have come from victims that the proposal is welcomed.

In some instances, legal aid would be required to be extended to cover such legal representation, although it could also be provided on a pro bono basis. Access to independent legal advice is a routine entitlement across European jurisdictions including France, Belgium, Austria, Finland, Greece, Spain and Sweden. In Ireland, which has an adversarial legal system, sexual offence complainers have a right to independent legal representation if the defence makes an application to the judge to introduce sexual-history evidence.

It is worth noting that, earlier this year, the reference group of the Bonomy review was supportive of provision through legal aid of independent legal representation for victims of crime in relation to issues affecting their rights, including their privacy. It is stipulated that ILR would relate to legal aid funding for legal advice and representation for victims who are not usually legally represented in criminal proceedings, and about whom documentary evidence may be sought by the defence either pre-trial or during the trial process. Representation would be confined to procedural issues and would not involve representation at the trial.

The proposed changes are, therefore, a practical way in which to help rape victims to avoid unnecessary distress during the court process. Currently, they have little opportunity to challenge the legality of use of private personal information in court. Furthermore, I understand that ministers may recently have made a determination that legal aid should not be made available to sexual offence complainers in circumstances in which their private records are being sought. If that is the case, that seems to me to be a great injustice. I would be grateful if the cabinet secretary could address that point.

It is important to stress that the experience of victim support groups is that the Crown is not robust enough in challenging applications under sections 274 and 275 of the 1995 act—a reason that was advanced previously for not supporting such an amendment. However, the real and most vexing issue is that that type of evidence, including medical records and sensitive information, is routinely being used to discredit witnesses and to play to the prejudices and myths that are known to prevail around sexual offences. It is hoped that my amendment 105 would help, in no small measure, to address that issue and consequently to improve the chances of a successful conviction. The amendment is supported by the Law Society of Scotland.

I move amendment 105.

Roderick Campbell: I oppose amendment 105 for a number of reasons. First, we did not deal with the matter in any detail at stage 1, although it is an important issue. I think that we would need to have dealt with it in some detail if we were to agree to the amendment today. Secondly, the amendment would have wide ramifications beyond sexual history. In some jurisdictions—Denmark, for example—the provision was initially restricted to sexual offences but is now applied much more widely, so there is a floodgates issue.

I have some sympathy with the general principle of amendment 105. I recognise all too keenly that many complainers are mystified by the judicial system and do not quite understand that the Crown represents the public interest and not the complainer’s personal interest. I also recognise that there are occasions on which complainers may need legal advice. However, we have moved on a bit since Margaret Mitchell lodged her amendments to the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill, and funding is now being made available—I think that the figure is £215,000—from the Scottish Legal Aid Board to the Scottish women’s rights centre, for provision of legal advice on gender-based violence.

There are wider ramifications. Margaret Mitchell referred to the Bonomy report. It is fair to say that the report said that, as a general principle, it favoured independent legal representation, but it also favoured more work being done on the matter. Evidence on the effectiveness of sections 274 and 275 of the 1995 act has not been looked at since about 2007. If we are concerned about the principle, it seems to me that the effectiveness of those sections needs to be reviewed before we can go down the path of supporting Margaret Mitchell’s amendment 105.

Elaine Murray: We resisted a similar amendment to the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill and I am not yet convinced by the proposal, although Margaret Mitchell has clarified some aspects. There had been a feeling that there might be three different lots of legal representation in court, but Margaret Mitchell has clarified the intention.

Despite also having heard from the Law Society of Scotland on the issue, I am still not convinced that legal advice is what is most important for victims of sexual offences. For example, I heard last week about additional resources being made available to Rape Crisis Scotland and Scottish Women’s Aid to help them to support witnesses throughout the legal process. My feeling is that, when it comes to expenditure from the public purse, more holistic support might be more helpful to victims than additional legal advice at a particular point in the process. I am not yet convinced that the proposal in amendment 105 is the best way of supporting victims.

Alison McInnes: I commend Margaret Mitchell for the work that she has done on amendment 105 and for how she has developed the proposal. There is currently a significant imbalance in the system in relation to rape victims. The release of medical evidence, in particular, can have huge ramifications for the future health of the witness. It should not fall only on the voluntary sector to deal with the problem. There is a real issue that needs to be addressed, and I hope that the Government can do so by either supporting Margaret Mitchell’s amendment 105 or by bringing forward its own proposals. I will support Margaret Mitchell’s amendment.

Michael Matheson: The committee will recall that similar amendments were lodged during its consideration of the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill. Our concerns—then and now—about such amendments have never been about lack of sympathy with the intention behind them; I have every sympathy with the attempt to support alleged victims and to protect them from unnecessary distress.

The reasons for being unable to support the proposed reform remain the same as they were two years ago. Amendment 105 would represent a major innovation in our criminal law by introducing the complainer into the process as a third party separate from the Crown. In addition, giving complainers such rights in cases of one category of offence but not in others would be inconsistent. The committee has rightly, when it has scrutinised other proposed reforms, been very careful to consider practical implications and potential unintended consequences. Although I am sure that many members are as sympathetic as I am to the intentions behind the reform, I also consider that such a substantial change to Scots law and practice requires a great deal of further thought and consideration.

I have a suggested way forward on this important issue for the committee to consider, but before I elaborate on that, it may be helpful to explain the background to the current legal position.
It remains the case—as it was two years ago—that the protection that section 274 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 gives to a complainer in a sexual offence case is comprehensive. The provisions in section 275 of the 1995 act, which allow exemptions to that protection, require the court to consider the appropriate protection of the complainer’s dignity and privacy. Furthermore, the court must have regard to rights under the European convention on human rights that are relevant to the application. They include the complainer’s right under article 8 of ECHR; a court will balance appropriately the rights of the accused with the complainer’s rights to respect for private life. To my knowledge, no evidence has been provided that that is not done properly and that, instead, complainers should submit to further procedure, questioning and delays.

11:45
What has changed in the past two years—I place great emphasis on this—is the level of support that the Government has given to victims of sexual offences and complainers in such trials. The committee will recall that, as a result of debate during the passage of the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill and subsequently, grant funding was made available through the Scottish Legal Aid Board to support the establishment of the Scottish women’s rights centre to provide legal assistance to women who are affected by gender-based violence. That centre was established earlier this year. It provides a legal helpline that is staffed by volunteers from the University of Strathclyde law centre, and which gives information and signposts people to support services and other sources of advice. It has a full-time solicitor who supervises and undertakes the casework and representation of clients. It is also developing advice surgeries, which will eventually be held around Scotland and staffed by the project solicitor or local solicitors.

In a further clear demonstration of the Government’s commitment to making improvements for victims and to providing direct and sensitive support for access to justice for them, on 10 September I announced record funding for Rape Crisis Scotland. That was part of the unprecedented additional £20 million support package that was announced in March to tackle domestic abuse and sexual violence and to provide better support for victims. Some £1.85 million of additional resource is now being provided over three years to support victims of sex crimes across Scotland. The funding will open the first ever rape crisis services in Orkney and Shetland, in partnership with Scottish Women’s Aid.

The Government will also provide 80 per cent extra funding to each rape crisis centre until 2018. That will ensure consistency of provision across the country for victims. It will support those who have made the decision to report the crime to police as well as those who may be considering reporting. The additional funding will provide vital support for victims at the time when they most need it, and recognises that that support might be needed well beyond their experience of court.

That unprecedented package was announced after Margaret Mitchell had lodged amendment 105. The difficulties with independent legal representation have been debated before. The new package and the provision that is already in place for access to legal advice and other support give in a concrete fashion the kind of support that amendment 105 seeks to provide.

I have mentioned that there is a lack of evidence for such a major reform. However, I want to ensure that existing arrangements are operating as effectively as possible. I therefore propose a review of whether there is any cause for concern about the way that the courts deal with recovery and disclosure of confidential information relating to complainers. It would be timely to undertake that work alongside consideration of the effects in practice of the package of reforms that I mentioned earlier.

During a previous stage 2 meeting I referred to our plans to develop a holistic and balanced package of future reforms. That would cover consideration of Lord Bonomy’s recommendations, the requirement for corroboration reform and any other relevant issues. I consider the proposed review of disclosure of confidential information to be one of the relevant issues that should be included.

In the interests of clarity, it is important to recognise that Lord Bonomy’s review group did not make a recommendation on independent legal representation in this particular area.

I also reassure members that we intend to work closely with stakeholders when we undertake the work, in order to achieve consensus on future reforms. As I have mentioned, that work will begin later this year. I will, of course, keep this committee informed about its progress.

In the new circumstances that I have described, and with the possibility of gathering real evidence, I hope that I have been able to provide reassurance that amendment 105 is neither necessary nor appropriate at this time. I therefore ask Margaret Mitchell not to press it.

Margaret Mitchell: I will address a few of the points that have been made. The cabinet secretary, along with other members, referred to the £1.85 million for support for sexual offence victims which, he pointed out, will be used partly to fund dedicated advocacy workers. However, Rape Crisis Scotland has confirmed that advocacy workers will not be lawyers and will not provide legal assistance. That is a totally separate issue, which amendment 105 would address.

On whether Lord Bonomy has addressed the specific issue that amendment 105 concerns, he has spoken about legal representation in relation to issues that affect a complainer’s privacy, which covers the point that I have raised.

In response to the concern about setting a rule or giving complainants in this area rights that would not be available to others, I note that that is surely how the law develops. We look at case law, and at where it is falling down and not working as fairly as it should do for victims of rape and sexual assault, who still routinely experience information being used to discredit them and to play to the prejudices of a jury. It is clear—as victim support groups will tell the committee clearly—that the Crown is not robust enough in challenging the so-called protections that are currently in place under sections 274 and 275 of the 1995 act.

Rather than defer the issue again, we could do something now to help those victims. If the Government is sincere in asserting that it wants to improve the conviction rates for rape and sexual assault, who still routinely experience information being used to discredit them and to play to the prejudices of a jury. It is clear—as victim support groups will tell the committee clearly—that the Crown is not robust enough in challenging the so-called protections that are currently in place under sections 274 and 275 of the 1995 act.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 105 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 105 disagreed to.

Section 87—Establishment and functions

The Convener: Amendment 85, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 86 to 89, 91 to 100 and 90.

Michael Matheson: The amendments in this group relate to the establishment of a police negotiating board for Scotland. The body will negotiate pay and conditions of service for police officers in the Police Service of Scotland.

Unlike the Westminster Government, which abolished the Police Negotiating Board covering the United Kingdom in favour of a pay review body, I believe that police officers in Scotland should have the opportunity to negotiate their terms and conditions directly with those who manage and fund the service. The aim in establishing the PNBS is to create a modern negotiating body in which consensus on matters under its remit is the norm. Arbitration should be used only where all other options are exhausted and when both sides agree to it.

Following consultation with stakeholders, I propose Government amendments to the bill that relate to the functions and procedures of the PNBS in order to ensure that it can operate effectively. Amendments 87, 89, 96, 97 and 99 represent the most significant changes. They will deliver a commitment that was made by my predecessor to make arbitration on police pay legally binding on ministers. Together, those amendments provide a framework to ensure that, when the PNBS makes representations to ministers based on an arbitration award, ministers will be bound to take all reasonable steps to give effect to those representations.

However, I propose that binding arbitration should apply to pay and all pay-related matters under the remit of the PNBS. The detail of that will be set out in regulations subject to affirmative procedure. Essentially, there will be a maximum of two referrals to binding arbitration within a reporting year, one of which must automatically include the main annual pay award. My officials have discussed and agreed that approach with the official and staff sides of the PNBS.

Amendments 91 to 93, 95 and 100 remove the post of deputy chair, but amendment 94 allows for a temporary chair to be appointed if that is ever necessary.

Amendment 88 allows the constitution to define the PNBS’s reporting year in a way that suits its purposes, and amendment 98 ensures that regulations are required to bring the constitution into effect. I am sure that the committee will welcome the parliamentary scrutiny that amendment 98 provides for.

Amendment 85 will allow greater flexibility when ministers have required the PNBS to make representations, and amendment 86 removes police clothing and accoutrements from the remit of the PNBS in line with stakeholders’ wishes.
Finally, amendment 90 sets out the consequential and transitional provisions for the PNBS. The PNBS will come under the provisions of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, and its chairperson will be regulated under the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc (Scotland) Act 2003. To allow the seamless transition from a UK body to a Scotland-only body, we are making provision for the recently appointed independent chair of the PNB to be chair of the PNBS and to ensure that all previous agreements made by the PNB UK are regarded as agreements within or involving the PNBS.

I move amendment 85.

The Convener: John Finnie, Margaret Mitchell and Roderick Campbell wish to comment on the amendment.

John Finnie: I will be brief, convener. Members will not be surprised to hear that I strongly welcome this development.

Roderick Campbell: I, too, strongly welcome it, and I think that it strikes an appropriate balance. I should, however, emphasise that arbitration should be the last resort, and that it is hoped that negotiation and conciliation will prevent any need for it from arising.

Margaret Mitchell: I seek some information from the cabinet secretary, who referred to the abolition of the Police Negotiating Board in England and Wales. That was a result of the Winsor report, and it happened because it was found that, when police pay moved from being index linked to another system, there was a failure to reach agreement. Is police pay at the moment index linked or is there another method of remuneration in place?

Secondly—picking up on what Rod Campbell said—I believe that arbitration was supposed to be the last resort, but the failure to reach agreement led to its becoming the norm. The Police Negotiating Board was therefore viewed as time consuming, costly and not in the best interests of either the police or the public. Can the cabinet secretary reassure me that he has looked at the issue and that he is quite confident that the same thing will not happen here in Scotland?

The Convener: I think that the issue went further than just the negotiating board, but do you wish to respond, cabinet secretary?

Michael Matheson: On the latter question, it would be fair to say that, from our discussions with the police, it is clear that they are very keen on having this type of provision facilitated in Scotland, and I detect no concern from them about the system being unduly bureaucratic or not being an effective way of dealing with these issues. I cannot speak for police officers in England and Wales, but I recall that significant concerns were expressed when the UK Government indicated that it wanted to move to a pay review system.

As for your first question, police pay is not index linked but negotiated with officials.

Amendment 85 agreed to.

Amendments 86 to 89 moved—[Michael Matheson] and agreed to.

Section 87, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 3—Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

Amendments 91 to 100 moved—[Michael Matheson] and agreed to.

Schedule 3, as amended, agreed to.

After section 87

Amendment 90 moved—[Michael Matheson] and agreed to.

The Convener: Members will be delighted to hear that that ends consideration of amendments for today. I thank the cabinet secretary and his officials for their attendance and I suspend the meeting for a couple of minutes to allow them to clear the room.

11:59

Meeting suspended.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

3rd Marshalled List of Amendments for Stage 2

The Bill will be considered in the following order—

- Sections 57 to 61 Schedule 2
- Sections 62 to 87 Schedule 3
- Sections 1 to 52 Schedule 1
- Sections 53 to 56 Sections 88 to 91
- Long Title

Amendments marked * are new (including manuscript amendments) or have been altered.

Before section 1

Michael Matheson

223 Before section 1, insert—

<PART
POLICE PROCEDURES
CHAPTER 1
SEARCH OF PERSON NOT IN POLICE CUSTODY
Lawfulness of search by constable

Limitation on what enables search

(1) This section applies in relation to a person who is not in police custody.

(2) It is unlawful for a constable to search the person otherwise than—

(a) in accordance with a power of search conferred in express terms by an enactment, or

(b) under the authority of a warrant expressly conferring a power of search.>

Michael Matheson

224 Before section 1, insert—

<Cases involving removal of person

(1) A person who is not in police custody may be searched by a constable while the person is to be, or is being, taken to or from any place by virtue of any enactment, warrant or court order requiring or permitting the constable to do so.

(2) A search under this section is to be carried out for the purpose of ensuring that the person is not in, or does not remain in, possession of any item or substance that could cause harm to the person or someone else.
(3) Anything seized by a constable in the course of a search carried out under this section may be retained by the constable.>

Michael Matheson

225 Before section 1, insert—

<Duty to consider child’s best interests

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a constable is deciding whether to search a child who is not in police custody.

(2) In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a child is a person who is under 18 years of age.>

Michael Matheson

226 Before section 1, insert—

<Miscellaneous and definitions

Provisions about possession of alcohol

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend section 61 (confiscation of alcohol from persons under 18) of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997 so as to confer on a constable a power, exercisable in addition to the power in subsection (1) or (2) of that section—

(a) to search a person for alcoholic liquor,

(b) to dispose of anything found in the person’s possession that the constable believes to be such liquor.

(2) Prior to laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations under this section, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly on the regulations that they are proposing to make.

(3) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.>

Michael Matheson

227 Before section 1, insert—

<Matters as to effect of sections (Limitation on what enables search), (Cases involving removal of person) and (Provisions about possession of alcohol)

(1) The day appointed for the coming into force of sections (Limitation on what enables search) and (Cases involving removal of person) is to be the same as the day from which a code of practice required by section (Contents of code of practice)(1) has effect by virtue of the first regulations made under section (Bringing code of practice into effect).

(2) If no regulations under section (Provisions about possession of alcohol) are made before the end of the 2 years beginning with the day from which a code of practice required by section (Contents of code of practice)(1) has effect by virtue of the first regulations made under section (Bringing code of practice into effect), section (Provisions about possession of alcohol) is to be regarded as repealed at the end of that period.>
Michael Matheson

228 Before section 1, insert—

<Meaning of constable etc.

In this Chapter—

“constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,

“police custody” has the same meaning as given for the purposes of Part 1 (see section 56).>

Michael Matheson

229 Before section 1, insert—

<Chapter 2

Code of practice

Making and status of code

Contents of code of practice

(1) The Scottish Ministers must make a code of practice about the carrying out of a search of a person who is not in police custody.

(2) A code of practice is to apply to the functions exercisable by a constable.

(3) In this section—

“constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,

“police custody” has the same meaning as given for the purposes of Part 1 (see section 56).

(4) In this Chapter, a reference to a code of practice means one required by subsection (1) (but see also section (Review of code of practice)(4)).>

Alison McInnes

Supported by: Margaret Mitchell

229A* As an amendment to amendment 229, line 7, at end insert—

< A code of practice must set out—

(a) the circumstances in which such a search may be carried out,

(b) the procedure to be followed in carrying out such a search,

(c) the record to be kept, and the right of any person to receive a copy of the record, of such a search,

(d) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.>

Michael Matheson

230 Before section 1, insert—
Review of code of practice

(1) The Scottish Ministers may revise a code of practice in light of a review conducted under subsection (2).

(2) The Scottish Ministers must conduct a review of a code of practice as follows—
   (a) a review is to begin no later than 2 years after the code comes into effect,
   (b) subsequently, a review is to begin no later than 4 years after—
       (i) if the code is revised in light of the previous review under this subsection, the coming into effect of the revised code, or
       (ii) otherwise, the completion of the previous review under this subsection.

(3) In deciding when to conduct a review in accordance with subsection (2), the Scottish Ministers must have regard to representations put to them on the matter by—
   (a) the Scottish Police Authority,
   (b) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland, or
   (c) Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland.

(4) For the purposes of—
   (a) section (Contents of code of practice)(2) and this section (except subsection (2)(a)), and
   (b) sections (Legal status of code of practice) to (Bringing code of practice into effect), a reference to a code of practice includes a revised code as allowed by subsection (1).

Alison McInnes
Supported by: Margaret Mitchell

230A As an amendment to amendment 230, line 10, at end insert—

<( ) Each review conducted under subsection (2) must be completed within 6 months of the day it begins.>

Michael Matheson

231 Before section 1, insert—

<Legal status of code of practice

(1) A court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings must take a code of practice into account when determining any question arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant.

(2) Breach of a code of practice does not of itself give rise to grounds for any legal claim whatsoever.>

Michael Matheson

232 Before section 1, insert—
<Procedure applying to code

Consultation on code of practice

(1) Prior to making a code of practice, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly on a draft of the code.

(2) When preparing a draft of a code of practice for public consultation, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the Lord Justice General,
(b) the Faculty of Advocates,
(c) the Law Society of Scotland,
(d) the Scottish Police Authority,
(e) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
(f) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
(g) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
(h) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.>

John Finnie

232A As an amendment to amendment 232, line 14, after <Scotland,> insert—

< ( ) the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner,>

Michael Matheson

233 Before section 1, insert—

<Bringing code of practice into effect

(1) A code of practice has no effect until a day appointed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(2) When laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations bringing a code of practice into effect, the Scottish Ministers must also lay a copy of the code.

(3) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.>

Alison McInnes
Supported by: Margaret Mitchell

233A As an amendment to amendment 233, line 4, at end insert—

<( ) As soon as practicable after the completion of each review under subsection (2) of section (Review of code of practice) the Scottish Ministers must appoint a day by regulations for the coming into effect of a revised code of practice (whether or not the code of practice has been revised in light of the review).>

Alison McInnes
Supported by: Margaret Mitchell

233B As an amendment to amendment 233, line 7, at end insert—
A draft of an instrument containing regulations bringing the first code of practice into effect must be laid before the Scottish Parliament no later than one year after the day of Royal Assent.

Alison McInnes
Supported by: John Finnie

50 Before section 1, insert—

<PART
SEARCH BY POLICE OF PERSON NOT ARRESTED

Police powers of search where person not arrested

(1) A constable must not search—

(a) a person,
(b) a vehicle, or
(c) anything which is in or on a vehicle,
without a warrant, unless subsection (3) applies.

(2) It is immaterial whether the person consents to being the subject of a search.

(3) This subsection applies where the search is conducted in accordance with—

(a) a power conferred by an enactment, and
(b) the terms of a code of practice issued by the Scottish Ministers under section (Police powers of search where person not arrested: code of practice).

(4) This Part applies to a vessel, aircraft or hovercraft as it applies to a vehicle.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4), “vessel” includes any ship, boat, raft or other apparatus constructed or adapted for floating on water.

Alison McInnes
Supported by: John Finnie

51* Before section 1, insert—

<Police powers of search where person not arrested: code of practice

(1) The Scottish Ministers must, by regulations, set out a code of practice in connection with the exercise by constables of powers under any enactment to search a person who has not been arrested in connection with an offence.

(2) The code of practice must set out—

(a) the circumstances in which any such power may be exercised,
(b) the procedure to be followed in the exercise of any such power,
(c) the record to be kept, and the right of any person to receive a copy of the record, of the exercise of any such power, and
(d) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) Regulations for the first code of practice under subsection (1) must be laid before the Parliament no later than the end of the period of one year beginning with the day of Royal Assent.
(4) The Scottish Ministers must—
   (a) keep the code of practice under review, and
   (b) lay regulations for a revised code of practice before the Parliament no later than 4 years after the day on which regulations for the previous code of practice are laid.

(5) Before making regulations under subsection (1) setting out the first or a revised code of practice, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
     (a) the chief constable,
     (b) the Scottish Police Authority,
     (c) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
     (d) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
     (e) such other persons as they consider appropriate,
     on a draft of the code of practice.

(6) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

John Finnie

51A* As an amendment to amendment 51, line 24, after <Scotland,> insert—
   <( ) the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner,>

Alison McInnes
Supported by: John Finnie

52 Before section 1, insert—
   <Police powers of search: annual reporting
   In subsection (3) of section 39 (the Scottish Police Authority’s annual report) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012—
   (a) the word “and” at the end of paragraph (a) is repealed, and
   (b) after paragraph (b) there is inserted “and
         (c) a record of the number of searches without a warrant of persons not arrested carried out by the Police Service during the reporting year, including in particular and where practicable a record of—
             (i) the number of instances where an individual has been searched on more than one occasion,
             (ii) the profile, as regards age, gender and ethnic or national origin, of those searched,
             (iii) the proportion of searches that resulted in anything being found,
             (iv) the proportion of searches that resulted in a matter being reported to the procurator fiscal, and
             (v) the number of complaints made to the Police Service about the conduct of searches.”.>
Section 1

Michael Matheson

111 In section 1, page 1, leave out lines 18 to 20 and insert—

<(  ) continue committing the offence, or
(  ) obstruct the course of justice in any way, including by—
    (i) seeking to avoid arrest, or
    (ii) interfering with witnesses or evidence.>

Michael Matheson

112 In section 1, page 1, line 20, at end insert—

<(  ) For the avoidance of doubt, an offence is to be regarded as not punishable by imprisonment for the purpose of subsection (2) only if no person convicted of the offence can be sentenced to imprisonment in respect of it.>

Margaret Mitchell

234 Leave out section 1

Section 2

Michael Matheson

113 In section 2, page 1, line 25, at end insert—

<(  ) Where—
    (a) a constable who is not in uniform arrests a person under section 1, and
    (b) the person asks to see the constable’s identification,
    the constable must show identification to the person as soon as reasonably practicable.>

Margaret Mitchell

235 Leave out section 2

Section 3

Michael Matheson

114 In section 3, page 2, line 9, at end insert <, and

(  ) of the person’s right to have—
    (i) intimation sent to a solicitor under section 35, and
    (ii) access to a solicitor under section 36.>

Margaret Mitchell

236 Leave out section 3
Section 4

Michael Matheson

115 In section 4, page 2, line 12, at end insert—

<(2) Subsection (1) ceases to apply, and the person must be released from police custody immediately, if—

(a) the person has been arrested without a warrant,
(b) the person has not yet arrived at a police station in accordance with this section, and
(c) in the opinion of a constable there are no reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed—

(i) the offence in respect of which the person was arrested, or
(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

(3) For the avoidance of doubt, subsection (1) ceases to apply if, before arriving at a police station in accordance with this section, the person is released from custody under section 19(2).>

Margaret Mitchell

237 Leave out section 4

Section 5

Alison McInnes

238 In section 5, page 2, line 22, at end insert—

<( ) section 24,>

Alison McInnes

239 In section 5, page 2, line 24, at end insert—

<( ) section 33,>

John Finnie

10 In section 5, page 2, line 28, leave out <(verbally or in writing)>

John Finnie

11 In section 5, page 2, line 30, at end insert <(and, regardless of whether those Articles allow or require information to be provided in writing only, the person must be provided with all such information both verbally and in writing).>

Margaret Mitchell

240 Leave out section 5
Section 6

Michael Matheson

116 In section 6, page 2, line 32, at end insert <by a constable>

Michael Matheson

117 In section 6, page 3, line 5, at end insert—

<( ) the time at which the person ceases to be in police custody.>

Michael Matheson

118 In section 6, page 3, line 5, at end insert—

<( ) Where relevant, there must be recorded in relation to an arrest by a constable—

(a) the reason that the constable who released the person from custody under subsection (2) of section 4 formed the opinion mentioned in paragraph (c) of that subsection,>

Michael Matheson

119 In section 6, page 3, line 9, at end insert—

<( ) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section (Information to be given if sexual offence),>

Michael Matheson

120 In section 6, page 3, line 14, at end insert—

<( ) section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s),>

Michael Matheson

121 In section 6, page 3, leave out lines 17 to 21

Michael Matheson

122 In section 6, page 3, line 27, after <any> insert <custody>

Michael Matheson

123 In section 6, page 3, line 29, at end insert—

<( ) If a constable considers whether to give authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit) there must be recorded—

(a) whether a reasonable opportunity to make representations has been afforded in accordance with subsection (4)(a) of that section,

(b) if the opportunity referred to in paragraph (a) has not been afforded, the reason for that,

(c) the time, place and outcome of the constable’s decision, and

(d) if the constable’s decision is to give the authorisation—
(i) the grounds on which it is given,

(ii) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed and reminded of things in accordance with section (Information to be given on authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)), and

(iii) the time at which the person requests that intimation be sent under section (Information to be given on authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit))(3)(a) and the time at which it is sent.

( ) Where a person is held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit) there must be recorded—

(a) the time, place and outcome of any custody review under section 9,

(b) the time at which any interview in the circumstances described in section 13(6) begins and the time at which it ends.

Margaret Mitchell

241 Leave out section 6

Section 7

John Finnie

12 In section 7, page 4, line 13, after <who> insert—

< ( ) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

( )>

After section 7

Alison McInnes

242 After section 7, insert—

<Time limit for keeping in custody: children and vulnerable adults

(1) Subsection (2) applies where authorisation has been given under section 7 to keep in custody—

(a) a person under 18 years of age, or

(b) a person 18 years of age or over who appears to a constable to have a mental disorder.

(2) A person to whom this subsection applies may not be held in police custody for a continuous period of more than 6 hours.

(3) In subsection (1)(b), “mental disorder” has the meaning given in section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.>
Section 8

Michael Matheson
124 In section 8, page 4, line 22, after <reason> insert <that>

Michael Matheson
125 In section 8, page 4, line 23, at end insert <and the fact that the person may be kept in custody for a further 12 hours under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)>

John Pentland
13 In section 8, page 4, line 23, at end insert <, and
   ( ) the circumstances in which the 12 hour limit may be extended to 24 hours under section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances)>

Section 9

Michael Matheson
126 In section 9, page 4, line 25, leave out from beginning to <consider> in line 29 and insert—
   <(1) A custody review must be carried out—
      (a) when a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of authorisation given under section 7, and
      (b) again, if authorisation to keep the person in police custody is given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit), when the person has been held in custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of that authorisation.
   (2) A custody review entails the consideration by a constable of>

Michael Matheson
127 In section 9, page 4, line 31, leave out <The constable mentioned in subsection (2) must be> and insert <A custody review must be carried out by>

Michael Matheson
128 Move section 9 to after section 12

Section 10

Michael Matheson
129 In section 10, page 5, line 2, after <7(4)> insert <, (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)(3)(b)>

Michael Matheson
130 In section 10, page 5, line 12, at end insert <fully>
Mary Fee

39* In section 10, page 5, line 12, at end insert—

<( ) the effect of keeping the person in custody on the wellbeing of a child for whom the person has responsibility,>

Michael Matheson

131 Move section 10 to after section 12

Section 11

Michael Matheson

132 In section 11, page 5, line 17, leave out from  to <(a)> in line 18 and insert—

<(a) a person>

Michael Matheson

133 In section 11, page 5, line 20, leave out <time> and insert <period>

John Pentland

14 In section 11, page 5, line 21, at beginning insert <Subject to section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances),>

Michael Matheson

134 In section 11, page 5, line 22, at end insert <, or

( ) authorisation to keep the person in custody has been given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)>

After section 11

John Pentland

15 After section 11, insert—

<Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances

(1) Section 11(2) does not apply if the conditions in subsection (2) are met.

(2) The conditions are that a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above is satisfied—

(a) that the test in section 10 is met, and

(b) that there are exceptional circumstances that justify continuing to hold the person in police custody.

(3) A person may continue to be held in police custody by virtue of subsection (2) for more than a continuous period of 24 hours only if a constable charges the person with an offence.>
(4) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2)(b), “exceptional circumstances” includes circumstances—

(a) where a doctor certifies that the person is, whether due to the influence of alcohol or drugs or for some other reason, not fit to be interviewed before the end of the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11,

(b) where the constable mentioned in subsection (2) considers that—

(i) access to another person in accordance with section 32, or

(ii) support from another person in accordance with section 33, cannot be provided in sufficient time before the end of the 12 hour period,

(c) where the constable mentioned in subsection (2) considers that continuing to hold the person in police custody is essential to ensure the safety of the person or another person.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by regulations subject to the affirmative procedure, modify subsection (4) to further define, add to, remove or otherwise modify circumstances that may constitute “exceptional circumstances” for the purposes of subsection (2)(b).>

Section 12

John Pentland

16 In section 12, page 5, line 33, after <11> insert <, and as the case may be the 24 hour period mentioned in section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances),>

After section 12

Michael Matheson

135 After section 12, insert—

<Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit

(1) A constable may give authorisation for a person who is in police custody to be kept in custody for a continuous period of 12 hours, beginning when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(2) Authorisation may be given only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(3) Authorisation may be given only if—

(a) the person has not been held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under this section in connection with—

(i) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody, or

(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence, and

(b) the constable is satisfied that—

(i) the test in section 10 will be met when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends,
(ii) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody is an indictable offence, and
(iii) the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously.

(4) Before deciding whether or not to give authorisation the constable must—
   (a) where practicable afford a reasonable opportunity to make verbal or written representations to—
      (i) the person, or
      (ii) if the person so chooses, the person’s solicitor, and
   (b) have regard to any representations made.

(5) If authorisation is given, it is deemed to be withdrawn if the person is released from police custody before the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(6) Subsection (7) applies when—
   (a) by virtue of authorisation given under this section, a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 12 hours (beginning with the time at which the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ended), and
   (b) during that period the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(7) The person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

Michael Matheson

136 After section 12, insert—

<Information to be given on authorisation under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)

(1) This section applies when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given under section (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit).

(2) The person must be informed—
   (a) that the authorisation has been given, and
   (b) of the grounds on which it has been given.

(3) The person—
   (a) has the right to have the information mentioned in subsection (2) intimated to a solicitor, and
   (b) must be informed of that right.

(4) The person must be reminded about any right which the person has under Chapter 5.

(5) Subsection (4) does not require that a person be reminded about a right to have intimation sent under either of the following sections if the person has exercised the right already—
   (a) section 30,
   (b) section 35.

(6) Information to be given under subsections (2), (3)(b) and (4) must be given to the person as soon as reasonably practicable after the authorisation is given.
(7) Where the person requests that intimation be sent under subsection (3)(a), the intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.

Section 13

Michael Matheson

137 In section 13, page 6, line 17, leave out <section 11> and insert <sections 11 and (Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit)>

John Pentland

17 In section 13, page 6, line 17, at end insert <and as the case may be the 24 hour period mentioned in section (Extension of 12 hour limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances).>

Michael Matheson

138 In section 13, page 6, line 18, leave out <time> and insert <period>

Michael Matheson

139 In section 13, page 6, line 21, leave out <to a hospital for that purpose> and insert <as quickly as is reasonably practicable—

(i) to a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, or

(ii) to a police station from a hospital to which the person was taken for the purpose of receiving medical treatment.>

Michael Matheson

140 In section 13, page 6, line 22, leave out <time> and insert <period>

Michael Matheson

141 In section 13, page 6, line 23, after <to> insert <or from>

Section 14

John Finnie

18 In section 14, page 6, line 32, leave out from <and> to end of line 33

Michael Matheson

142 In section 14, page 6, leave out line 33 and insert—

<( ) either—

(i) the person has not been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, or

(ii) it has not been more than 28 days since the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence.>
Elaine Murray

47 In section 14, page 6, line 35, leave out from <ensuring> to end of line 36 and insert <securing—

(a) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,
(b) that the person does not commit an offence while released,
(c) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into a relevant offence,
(d) the protection of the person, or
(e) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.>

Michael Matheson

143 In section 14, page 6, line 36, at end insert—

<(  ) A condition under subsection (2)—

(a) may not require the person to be in a specified place at a specified time,
(b) may require the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and
(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period.>

John Finnie

19 In section 14, page 6, line 36, at end insert—

<(2A) When imposing a condition under subsection (2), the constable is to specify the period for which the condition is to apply.

(2B) The period specified under subsection (2A) is to be such period, not exceeding 28 days, as the appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(2C) In any case where a person has previously been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, the reference in subsection (2B) to 28 days is to be read as a reference to 28 days minus the number of days on which the person was so subject.>

Michael Matheson

144 In section 14, page 6, line 38, leave out <Chapter 7> and insert <schedule (Breach of liberation condition)>

Michael Matheson

145 In section 14, page 6, line 39, leave out subsection (4)

John Finnie

20 In section 14, page 6, line 39, leave out from <(1)(c)> to end of line 3 on page 7 and insert <(2C)>
Michael Matheson
146 In section 14, page 7, line 7, leave out <inspector> and insert <sergeant>

Section 15

Michael Matheson
147 In section 15, page 7, line 15, leave out from <last> to <14(4)> and insert <day falling 28 days after the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under section 14(2) in connection with a relevant offence>

John Finnie
21 In section 15, page 7, line 15, leave out <28 day period described in section 14(4)> and insert <period specified under section 14(2A)>

Section 17

John Finnie
22 In section 17, page 8, line 17, at end insert <, ( ) to have the period for which the condition applies reduced.>

John Finnie
23 In section 17, page 8, line 20, after <condition> insert <or, as the case may be, the period specified under section 14(2A)>

John Finnie
24 In section 17, page 8, line 21, after <imposed> insert <or, as the case may be, specified>

John Finnie
25 In section 17, page 8, line 23, after <condition> insert <or, as the case may be, specify an alternative period>

John Finnie
26 In section 17, page 8, line 25, after <imposed> insert <or period specified>

John Finnie
27 In section 17, page 8, line 26, at end insert <or, as the case may be, specified under section 14(2A).>

Before section 18

Michael Matheson
148 Before section 18, insert—
<Information to be given if sexual offence>

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant in respect of a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies, or

(b) a person—

(i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and

(ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged by a constable with a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies.

(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—

(a) that the person’s case at, or for the purposes of, any relevant hearing (within the meaning of section 288C(1A) of the 1995 Act) in the course of the proceedings may be conducted only by a lawyer,

(b) that it is, therefore, in the person’s interests to get the professional assistance of a solicitor, and

(c) that if the person does not engage a solicitor for the purposes of the conduct of the person’s case at or for the purposes of the hearing, the court will do so.>

Section 18

Michael Matheson

149 In section 18, page 9, line 1, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

<(2) The person must be brought before a court (unless released from custody under section 19)—

(a) if practicable, before the end of the first day on which the court is sitting after the day on which this subsection began to apply to the person, or

(b) as soon as practicable after that.>

Michael Matheson

101 In section 18, page 9, line 6, at end insert <(by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means)>

After section 18

Michael Matheson

150 After section 18, insert—

<Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court>

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), and

(b) either—

(i) a constable believes the person is under 16 years of age, or
(ii) the person is subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

10 (2) The person must (unless released from custody under section 19) be kept in a place of safety until the person can be brought before the court.

(3) The place of safety in which the person is kept must not be a police station unless an appropriate constable certifies that keeping the person in a place of safety other than a police station would be—

(a) impracticable,

(b) unsafe, or

(c) inadvisable due to the person’s state of health (physical or mental).

(4) A certificate under subsection (3) must be produced to the court when the person is brought before it.

15 (5) In this section—

“an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of inspector or above,

“place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.>

John Finnie

150A As an amendment to amendment 150, line 21, leave out <inspector> and insert <superintendent>.

Michael Matheson

151 After section 18, insert—

<Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court>

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a person who is 16 years of age or over and subject to a supervision order or under 16 years of age—

(a) is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or

(b) is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) A parent of the person mentioned in subsection (1) (if one can be found) must be informed of the following matters—

(a) the court before which the person is to be brought,

(b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court,

(c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing, and

(d) that the parent’s attendance at the court may be required under section 42 of the 1995 Act.

(3) Subsection (2) does not require any information to be given to a parent if a constable has grounds to believe that giving the parent the information mentioned in that subsection may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person mentioned in subsection (1).

(4) In this section—
“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person mentioned in subsection (1),
“supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Michael Matheson

152 After section 18, insert—

Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court

(1) The appropriate local authority must be informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) when—

(a) a person to whom either subsection (2) or (3) applies is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or

(b) a person to whom subsection (2) applies is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) This subsection applies to—

(a) a person who is under 16 years of age,

(b) a person who is—

(i) 16 or 17 years of age, and

(ii) subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(3) This subsection applies to a person if—

(a) a constable believes the person is 16 or 17 years of age,

(b) since being arrested, the person has not exercised the right to have intimation sent under section 30, and

(c) on being informed or reminded of the right to have intimation sent under that section after being officially accused, the person has declined to exercise the right.

(4) The matters referred to in subsection (1) are—

(a) the court before which the person mentioned in paragraph (a) or (as the case may be) (b) of that subsection is to be brought,

(b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court, and

(c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (1), the appropriate local authority is the local authority in whose area the court referred to in subsection (4)(a) sits.

Section 19

Michael Matheson

153 In section 19, page 9, line 20, at end insert—
Where a person is in custody as mentioned in subsection (1)(a), the person may not be released from custody under subsection (2)(b).

Section 20

Michael Matheson

154 In section 20, page 9, line 28, at end insert 'while subject to the undertaking'

Michael Matheson

155 In section 20, page 9, line 30, leave out from 'commit' to end of line 33 and insert—

(i) commit an offence,

(ii) interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,

(iii) behave in a manner which causes, or is likely to cause, alarm or distress to witnesses,

(b) any further condition that a constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring that any conditions imposed under paragraph (a) are observed.

Elaine Murray

48 In section 20, page 9, line 32, leave out from 'ensuring' to end of line 33 and insert 'securing—

(i) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,

(ii) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody,

(iii) the protection of the person, or

(iv) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.

Michael Matheson

156 In section 20, page 9, line 34, leave out '<curfew>' and insert—

(a) a condition requiring the person—

(i) to be in a specified place at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain there for a specified period,

(b) a condition requiring the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period

Michael Matheson

157 In section 20, page 9, line 35, leave out subsection (5) and insert—
<(5) For the imposition of a condition under subsection (3)(b)—
(a) if it is of the kind described in subsection (4)(a), the authority of a constable of the rank of inspector or above is required,
(b) if it is of any other kind, the authority of a constable of the rank of sergeant is required.>

Michael Matheson
158 In section 20, page 9, line 38, leave out <Chapter 7> and insert <schedule (Breach of liberation condition)>

Michael Matheson
159 Before schedule 1, insert—

<SCHEDULE
(introduced by sections 14(3) and 20(6))
BREACH OF LIBERATION CONDITION

Offence of breaching condition

1 (1) A person commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, the person breaches a liberation condition by reason of—
(a) failing to comply with an investigative liberation condition,
(b) failing to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking, or
(c) failing to comply with the terms of an undertaking, other than the requirement to appear at court.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) does not apply where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (in which case see paragraph 3).

(3) It is competent to amend a complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under sub-paragraph (1) at any time before the trial of a person in summary proceedings for—
(a) the original offence, or
(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as the original offence.

(4) In sub-paragraph (3), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
(a) an investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
(b) an undertaking was given.

Sentencing for the offence

2 (1) A person who commits an offence under paragraph 1(1) is liable on summary conviction to—
(a) a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or
(b) imprisonment for a period—
   (i) where conviction is in the justice of the peace court, not exceeding 60 days,
   (ii) where conviction is in the sheriff court, not exceeding 12 months.
(2) A penalty under sub-paragraph (1) may be imposed in addition to any other penalty which it is competent for the court to impose, even if the total of penalties imposed exceeds the maximum penalty which it is competent to impose in respect of the original offence.

(3) The reference in sub-paragraph (2) to a penalty being imposed in addition to another penalty means, in the case of sentences of imprisonment or detention—
   (a) where the sentences are imposed at the same time (whether or not in relation to the same complaint), framing the sentences so that they have effect consecutively,
   (b) where the sentences are imposed at different times, framing the sentence imposed later so that (if the earlier sentence has not been served) the later sentence has effect consecutive to the earlier sentence.

(4) Sub-paragraph (3)(b) is subject to section 204A (restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners) of the 1995 Act.

(5) Where a person is to be sentenced in respect of an offence under paragraph 1(1), the court may remit the person for sentence in respect of it to any court which is considering the original offence.

(6) In sub-paragraphs (2) and (5), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
   (a) the investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
   (b) the undertaking was given.

Breach by committing offence

3 (1) This paragraph applies—
   (a) where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (“offence O”), but
   (b) only if the fact that offence O was committed while the person was subject to the liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(2) In determining the penalty for offence O, the court must have regard—
   (a) to the fact that offence O was committed in breach of a liberation condition,
   (b) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an investigative liberation condition, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 4(1),
   (c) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an undertaking other than the requirement to appear at court, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 5(1).

(3) Where the maximum penalty in respect of offence O is specified by (or by virtue of) an enactment, the maximum penalty is increased—
   (a) where it is a fine, by the amount equivalent to level 3 on the standard scale,
   (b) where it is a period of imprisonment—
      (i) as respects conviction in the justice of the peace court, by 60 days,
      (ii) as respects conviction in the sheriff court or the High Court, by 6 months.
(4) The maximum penalty is increased by sub-paragraph (3) even if the penalty as so increased exceeds the penalty which it would otherwise be competent for the court to impose.

(5) In imposing a penalty in respect of offence O, the court must state—
(a) where the penalty is different from that which the court would have imposed had sub-paragraph (2) not applied, the extent of and the reasons for that difference,
(b) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(b)
4 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(b), the matters are—
(a) the number of offences in connection with which the person was subject to investigative liberation conditions when offence O was committed,
(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—
(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(c)
5 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(c), the matters are—
(a) the number of undertakings to which the person was subject when offence O was committed,
(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),
(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—
(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).
(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Evidential presumptions

6 (1) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), the facts mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) are to be held as admitted unless challenged by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded.

(2) The facts are—

(a) that the person breached an undertaking by reason of failing to appear at court as required by the terms of the undertaking,

(b) that the person was subject to a particular—

(i) investigative liberation condition, or

(ii) condition under the terms of an undertaking.

(3) In proceedings to which sub-paragraph (4) applies—

(a) something in writing, purporting to impose investigative liberation conditions and bearing to be signed by a constable, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the investigative liberation conditions imposed under section 14(2),

(b) something in writing, purporting to be an undertaking and bearing to be signed by the person said to have given it, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the undertaking at the time that it was given,

(c) a document purporting to be a notice (or a copy of a notice) under section 16 or 21, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the notice.

(4) This sub-paragraph applies to proceedings—

(a) in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), or

(b) in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(5) In proceedings in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment, that fact is to be held as admitted unless challenged—

(a) in summary proceedings, by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, or

(b) in the case of proceedings on indictment, by giving notice of a preliminary objection in accordance with section 71(2) or 72(6)(b)(i) of the 1995 Act.

Interpretation

7 In this schedule—

(a) references to an investigative liberation condition are to a condition imposed under section 14(2) or 17(3)(b) subject to any modification by notice under section 16(1) or (5)(a),

(b) references to an undertaking are to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a),

(c) references to the terms of an undertaking are to the terms of an undertaking subject to any modification by—

(i) notice under section 21(1), or
(ii) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).>

Section 21

Michael Matheson
160 In section 21, page 10, line 11, leave out subsection (3)

Michael Matheson
161 In section 21, page 10, line 13, leave out subsection (4)

Michael Matheson
162 In section 21, page 10, line 22, leave out <or (3)>

After section 21

Michael Matheson
163 After section 21, insert—

<Rescission of undertaking

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice rescind an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) (whether or not the person who gave it is to be prosecuted).

(2) The rescission of an undertaking by virtue of subsection (1) takes effect at the end of the day on which the notice is sent.

(3) Notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

(4) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person is likely to fail to comply with the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(5) Where a person is arrested under subsection (4) or subsection (6) applies—

(a) the undertaking referred to in subsection (4) or (as the case may be) (6) is rescinded, and

(b) this Part applies as if the person, since being most recently arrested, has been charged with the offence in connection with which the person was in police custody when the undertaking was given.

(6) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person who is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) is in police custody (otherwise than as a result of having been arrested under subsection (4)), and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has failed, or (if liberated) is likely to fail, to comply with the terms of the undertaking.

(7) The references in subsections (4) and (6)(b) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by—

(a) notice under section 21(1), or
(b) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).>

Michael Matheson

164 After section 21, insert—

<Expiry of undertaking>

(1) An undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) expires—

(a) at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is required by its terms to appear at a court, or

(b) if subsection (2) applies, at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is brought before a court having been arrested under the warrant mentioned in that subsection.

(2) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person fails to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), and

(b) on account of that failure, a warrant for the person’s arrest is granted.

(3) The references in subsections (1)(a) and (2)(a) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by notice under section 21(1).>

Section 23

John Finnie

28 In section 23, page 11, line 10, after <committing> insert <and again immediately before the interview commences>

Michael Matheson

165 In section 23, page 11, line 11, at end insert—

<( ) of the general nature of that offence,>

Michael Matheson

166 In section 23, page 11, line 24, at end insert—

<( ) Where a person is to be interviewed by virtue of authorisation granted under section 27, before the interview begins the person must be informed of what was specified by the court under subsection (6) of that section.>

Section 24

John Finnie

29 In section 24, page 12, line 2, leave out from <if> to end of line 5

Alison McInnes

243 In section 24, page 12, line 2, leave out second <the> and insert <an appropriate>
In section 24, page 12, line 3, leave out from <in> to end of line 5 and insert <as a result of an urgent need to prevent—
(a) interference with evidence in connection with the offence under consideration, or
(b) interference with or physical harm to a person.>

In section 24, page 12, line 13, at end insert—

( ) In this section, “appropriate constable” means a constable who—
(a) is of the rank of superintendent or above, and
(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

Section 25

In section 25, page 12, line 15, leave out <Subsections (2) and (3) apply> and insert <Subsection (2) applies>

Supported by: Alison McInnes

In section 25, page 12, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Supported by: Alison McInnes

In section 25, page 12, line 18, after <age,> insert—

(aa) the person is 16 or 17 years of age and subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011,

Supported by: Alison McInnes

In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Supported by: Alison McInnes

In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <, owing to mental disorder,>

Supported by: Alison McInnes

In section 25, page 12, line 22, leave out subsections (3) to (5)

In section 25, page 12, line 27, leave out <(2)(b)> and insert <(2)(aa) or (b)>
John Finnie
31 In section 25, page 12, leave out lines 36 and 37

Michael Matheson
169 In section 25, page 12, line 36, leave out <328(1)> and insert <328>

Section 30

Elaine Murray
59 In section 30, page 16, line 9, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Elaine Murray
60 In section 30, page 16, line 13, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Alison McInnes
246 In section 30, page 16, line 19, leave out  and insert <an appropriate>

Michael Matheson
170 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert <, or
   (c) safeguarding and promoting the wellbeing of the person in custody, where a constable believes that person to be under 18 years of age.>

Michael Matheson
171 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert—
   <( ) The sending of intimation may be delayed by virtue of subsection (5)(c) only for so long as is necessary to ascertain whether a local authority will arrange for someone to visit the person in custody under section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s)(2).>

Alison McInnes
247 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert—
   <( ) In this section and section 32, “appropriate constable” means a constable who—
      (a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and
      (b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.>

Michael Matheson
172 In section 30, page 16, line 25, leave out  and insert <the person in custody>
Section 31

Michael Matheson

173 In section 31, page 16, line 31, at end insert—

<( ) Subsection (2) does not apply if—

(a) a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, and

(b) the person in custody requests that the person to whom intimation is to be sent under section 30(1) is not asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held.>

Michael Matheson

174 In section 31, page 16, line 32, leave out <Subsection (4) applies> and insert <Subsections (3A) and (4) apply>

Michael Matheson

175 In section 31, page 16, leave out lines 35 and 36 and insert—

<(b) the person to whom intimation is sent by virtue of section 30(3), if asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held, claims to be unable or unwilling to attend within a reasonable time.>

Michael Matheson

176 In section 31, page 16, line 36, at end insert—

<( ) a local authority, acting under section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s)(8)(a), has advised against sending intimation to the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3).>

Michael Matheson

177 In section 31, page 16, line 36, at end insert—

<(3A) Section 30(3) ceases to have effect.>

Michael Matheson

178 In section 31, page 16, line 37, after <intimation> insert <to an appropriate person>

Elaine Murray

61 In section 31, page 17, line 2, leave out from second <or> to end of line 5

Michael Matheson

179 In section 31, page 17, line 6, leave out <(4)(a)> and insert <(4)>

Michael Matheson

180 In section 31, page 17, line 12, leave out <30(4)(b)> and insert <30(5)(a) or (b)>
In section 31, page 17, line 14, leave out <30(4)(b)> and insert <30(5)(a) or (b)>

Section 32

In section 32, page 17, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>

In section 32, page 17, line 20, leave out <at least one> and insert

In section 32, page 17, line 21, leave out from <who> to end of line 22

In section 32, page 17, line 23, leave out subsection (2)

In section 32, page 17, line 24, leave out <at least one> and insert

In section 32, page 17, leave out line 26

In section 32, page 17, line 27, at end insert—

<(  ) Access to a person in custody under subsection (1) or (2) need not be permitted to more than one person at the same time.>

In section 32, page 17, line 28, leave out <or (2)>

In section 32, page 17, line 29, after <as> insert <an appropriate constable considers that>

In section 32, page 17, line 34, leave out  and insert <the person in custody>

After section 32

After section 32, insert—
Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

(1) Intimation of the fact that a person is in police custody and the place where the person is in custody must be sent to a local authority as soon as reasonably practicable if—
   (a) a constable believes that the person may be subject to a supervision order, or
   (b) by virtue of subsection (5)(c) of section 30, a constable has delayed sending intimation in respect of the person under subsection (1) of that section.

(2) A local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) may arrange for someone to visit the person in custody if—
   (a) the person is subject to a supervision order, or
   (b) the local authority—
      (i) believes the person to be under 16 years of age, and
      (ii) has grounds to believe that its arranging someone to visit the person would best safeguard and promote the person’s wellbeing (having regard to the effect of subsection (4)(a)).

(3) Before undertaking to arrange someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2), the local authority must be satisfied that anyone it arranges to visit the person in custody will be able to make the visit within a reasonable time.

(4) Where a local authority arranges for someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2)—
   (a) sections 30 and 32 cease to have effect, and
   (b) the person who the local authority has arranged to visit the person in custody must be permitted access to the person in custody.

(5) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (4)(b) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—
   (a) in the interests of—
      (i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or
      (ii) the apprehension of offenders, or
   (b) for the wellbeing of the person in custody.

(6) Where a local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) confirms that the person in custody is—
   (a) over 16 years of age, and
   (b) subject to a supervision order,
sections 30 to 32 are to be applied in respect of the person as if a constable believes the person to be under 16 years of age.

(7) Subsection (8) applies where a local authority might have arranged for someone to visit a person in custody under subsection (2) but—
   (a) chose not to do so, or
   (b) was precluded from doing so by subsection (3).

(8) The local authority may—
(a) advise a constable that the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3) should not be sent intimation if the local authority has grounds to believe that sending intimation to that person may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person in custody, and

(b) give advice as to who might be an appropriate person to a constable considering that matter under section 31(5) (and the constable must have regard to any such advice).

(9) In this section, “supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Section 33

John Pentland

38 In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out from beginning to <over,>

Elaine Murray

32 In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out <18> and insert <16>

John Finnie

33 In section 33, page 18, line 2, leave out <owing to mental disorder,>

Michael Matheson

189 In section 33, page 18, line 3, leave out <to> and insert—

<( )>

John Finnie

34 In section 33, page 18, leave out lines 17 and 18

Michael Matheson

190 In section 33, page 18, line 17, leave out <328(1)> and insert <328>

Section 34

Alison McInnes

249 Leave out section 34 and insert—

<Provision of appropriate adults

Each local authority must ensure the provision of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection 3 of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).>
Duty to contact named person: persons with responsibility for a child

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody has responsibility for a child.

(2) With a view to ensuring the wellbeing of the child, the constable must send information of the type specified in subsection (3) to an individual identified in relation to the child under section 20 or 21 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

(3) The information to be sent is to contain details of any matters relevant to the child’s wellbeing, and to the child’s wellbeing needs.

(4) Information falls within subsection (3) if the constable considers that—
   (a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,
   (b) it is necessary or expedient for the purposes of the exercise of any of the named person functions,
   (c) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and
   (d) the provision of the information would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(5) In considering for the purpose of subsection (4)(c) whether information ought to be provided, the constable is, so far as reasonably practicable, to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child.

(6) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (5), the constable is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(7) For the purpose of subsection (4)(c) the information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision relating to the sending of information under subsection (2) above.

(9) Regulations under subsection (8) are subject to the affirmative procedure.>
Alison McInnes

251 In section 36, page 19, line 13, leave out from <in> to end of line 15 and insert <as a result of an urgent need to prevent—
   (a) interference with evidence in connection with the offence under consideration, or
   (b) interference with, or physical harm to, a person.>

Alison McInnes

252 In section 36, page 19, line 16, leave out from second <consultation> to <example)> in line 17 and insert <, except in exceptional circumstances, consultation in person but may include initial>

Michael Matheson

192 In section 36, page 19, line 16, leave out second <means> and insert <method>

Michael Matheson

193 In section 36, page 19, line 17, leave out <means of>

Alison McInnes

253 In section 36, page 19, line 18, at end insert—
   <( ) In subsection (2), “appropriate constable” means a constable who—
   (a) is of the rank of superintendent or above, and
   (b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.>

Section 39

Michael Matheson

194 In section 39, page 20, leave out line 2 and insert—
   <( ) cause the person to participate in an identification procedure.>

After section 40

Alison McInnes

254 After section 40, insert—
   <Powers in relation to biometric information
   (1) Section 18 (prints, samples etc. in criminal investigations) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.
   (2) After subsection (7A)(d) there is inserted—
      “(e) other biometric information.”.
   (3) After subsection (7B) there is inserted—>
“(7C) In subsection (7A)(e) “biometric information” means any information (in any form and produced and stored by any method) about a person’s physical or behavioural characteristics or features which—

(a) is capable of being used in order to establish or verify the identity of the person, and

(b) is obtained or recorded with the intention that it be used for the purposes of a biometric recognition system.

(7D) Biometric information may, in particular, include images or recordings of or information about—

(a) the features of an iris or any other part of the eye,

(b) the features of any other part of the face,

(c) a person’s voice, handwriting or gait.

(7E) In subsection (7C) “biometric recognition system” means a system which, by means of equipment operating automatically—

(a) obtains or records information about a person’s physical or behavioural characteristics or features, and

(b) compares the information with stored information that has previously been so obtained or recorded, or otherwise processes the information, for the purpose of establishing or verifying the identity of the person, or otherwise determining whether the person is recognised by the system.

(7F) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations subject to the affirmative procedure modify subsection (7D) by—

(a) adding a physical or behavioural characteristic or feature to, or removing such a characteristic or feature from, that subsection, or

(b) modifying the description of a physical or behavioural characteristic for the time being included in that subsection.”.

Michael Matheson

195 After section 40, insert—

"<Care of drunken persons

Taking drunk persons to designated place

(1) Where—

(a) a person is liable to be arrested in respect of an offence by a constable without a warrant, and

(b) the constable is of the opinion that the person is drunk,

the constable may take the person to a designated place (and do so instead of arresting the person).

(2) Nothing done under subsection (1)—

(a) makes a person liable to be held unwillingly at a designated place, or

(b) prevents a constable from arresting the person in respect of the offence referred to in that subsection."
(3) In this section, “designated place” is any place designated by the Scottish Ministers for the purpose of this section as a place suitable for the care of drunken persons.

Section 42

Alison McInnes
53 In section 42, page 20, line 18, at end insert—
   <(  ) search a child.>

Mary Fee
41 In section 42, page 20, line 19, at end insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
42 In section 42, page 20, line 20, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
43 In section 42, page 20, line 21, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee
44 In section 42, page 20, line 22, after <child> insert <or person>

Mary Fee
45 In section 42, page 20, line 23, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Elaine Murray
65 In section 42, page 20, line 25, leave out <well-being> and insert <best interests>

Alison McInnes
255 In section 42, page 20, line 25, at end insert—
   <(  ) A decision under subsection (1)(b) or (c) must be exercised for the shortest possible period of time.>

After section 42

Michael Matheson
196 After section 42, insert—
   <Duties in relation to children in custody

   (1) A child who is in police custody at a police station is, so far as practicable, to be prevented from associating with any adult who is officially accused of committing an offence other than an adult to whom subsection (2) applies.
(2) This subsection applies to an adult if a constable believes that it may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the child mentioned in subsection (1) to prevent the child and adult from associating with one another.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

“child” means person who is under 18 years of age,

“adult” means person who is 18 years of age or over.

Michael Matheson

197 After section 42, insert—

<Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply if—

(a) a person is being kept in a place of safety in accordance with section (Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court)(2) when it is decided not to prosecute the person for any relevant offence, and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence.

(2) The Principal Reporter must be informed, as soon as reasonably practicable, that the person is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3).

(3) The person must be kept in a place of safety under this subsection until the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(4) An offence is a “relevant offence” for the purpose of subsection (1) if—

(a) it is the offence with which the person was officially accused, leading to the person being kept in the place of safety in accordance with section (Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court)(2), or

(b) it is an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence mentioned in paragraph (a).

(5) In this section, “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Elaine Murray

35 After section 42, insert—

<Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused

(1) Subject to section (Disclosure of information: person released under section 14), a constable must not without reasonable cause release the information specified in subsection (2) to any person other than an authorised person.

(2) The information is information relating to a person not officially accused of an offence which—

(a) identifies that person, or

(b) is likely to be sufficient to allow that person to be identified, as having been arrested in connection with an offence.
(3) For the purposes of subsection (1), an “authorised person” means—
   (a) a constable,
   (b) a person to whom intimation must or may be sent under Chapter 5 of this Part,
   (c) a person other than a constable to whom the information must be disclosed for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into the offence.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (1), a determination that there is reasonable cause to disclose information must be made—
   (a) only if it is in the public interest to do so, and
   (b) by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

Elaine Murray

36 After section 42, insert—

<Disclosure of information: person released under section 14>

(1) Without prejudice to the generality of section (Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused), a constable may disclose qualifying information relating to an alleged offence to a person mentioned in subsection (2) where the conditions in subsection (3) are met.

(2) The persons are—
   (a) a person—
      (i) against whom, or
      (ii) against whose property,
           the acts which constituted the alleged offence were directed,
   (b) in the case where the death of a person mentioned in paragraph (a) was (or appears to have been) caused by the alleged offence, a prescribed relative of the person,
   (c) a person who is likely to give evidence in criminal proceedings which are likely to be instituted against a person in respect of the alleged offence,
   (d) a person who has given a statement in relation to the alleged offence to a constable.

(3) The conditions are that disclosure of the information—
   (a) is in the public interest or is otherwise likely to promote the safety and wellbeing of a person mentioned in subsection (2), and
   (b) is authorised by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

(4) In this section—
   “prescribed” means prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by order subject to the negative procedure,
   “qualifying information” means information that—
   (a) identifies a person as having been arrested in connection with an alleged offence and subsequently released under section 14,
(b) sets out such information relating to any conditions imposed on the person under section 14(2) as the constable authorising the disclosure considers appropriate.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by order subject to the negative procedure, modify the definition of “qualifying information” in subsection (4).>
Section 50

Michael Matheson

205 In section 50, page 24, line 27, leave out <relation to> and insert <respect of>

Margaret Mitchell

256 Leave out section 50

Section 51

Margaret Mitchell

257 Leave out section 51

Schedule 1

Michael Matheson

206 In schedule 1, page 44, line 28, at end insert—

<( ) in subsection (3), for the words “he can be delivered into the custody” there is substituted “the arrival”>,

Michael Matheson

207 In schedule 1, page 45, line 30, at end insert—

<In each of sections 169(2) and 170(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, the words “arrested without warrant and” are repealed.>

Margaret Mitchell

259 In schedule 1, page 46, line 2, leave out <14> and insert <15>

Michael Matheson

208 In schedule 1, page 46, line 2, leave out from <15A> to end of line 3 and insert <17A,>

Michael Matheson

209 In schedule 1, page 46, line 4, leave out <cross-heading> and insert <heading>

Michael Matheson

210 In schedule 1, page 46, line 5, at end insert—

<( ) section 43,>

Michael Matheson

211 In schedule 1, page 46, line 6, at end insert—

<(1) In section 18—>
(a) in subsection (1), the words “or is detained under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed,
(b) in subsection (2), the words “or detained” are repealed.

(2) In subsection (2)(a) of section 18B, for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(3) In section 18D—
(a) in subsection (2)(a), the words “or detained” are repealed,
(b) in subsection (2)(b), for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(4) In subsection (8)(b) of section 19AA, the words “or detention under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed.

Michael Matheson

212 In schedule 1, page 46, line 6, at end insert—

<In section 42—
(a) subsection (3) is repealed,
(b) subsection (7) is repealed,
(c) in subsection (8), for the words “subsection (7) above” there is substituted “section (Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,
(d) in subsection (9), the words “detained in a police station, or” are repealed,
(e) subsection (10) is repealed.>

Michael Matheson

213 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In section 6D of the Road Traffic Act 1988, for subsection (2A) there is substituted—
“(2A) Instead of, or before, arresting a person under this section, a constable may detain the person at or near the place where the preliminary test was, or would have been, administered with a view to imposing on the person there a requirement under section 7.”.>

Michael Matheson

214 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000—
(a) in paragraph 18—
(i) in sub-paragraph (2), for the words from “and” at the end of paragraph (a) to the end of the sub-paragraph there is substituted—
“(ab) intimation is to be made under paragraph 16(1) whether the person detained requests that it be made or not, and
(ac) section 32 (right of under 18s to have access to other person) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies as if the detained person were a person in police custody for the purposes of that section.”,

(ii) after sub-paragraph (3) there is inserted—

“(4) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)—

“child” means a person under 16 years of age,

“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the child mentioned in sub-paragraph (2).”,

(b) in paragraph 20(1), the words “or a person detained under section 14 of that Act” are repealed,

(c) in paragraph 27—

(i) in sub-paragraph (4), paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) sub-paragraph (5) is repealed.

Michael Matheson

215 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In the schedule to the Sexual Offences (Procedure and Evidence) (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph 2 is repealed.>

Michael Matheson

216 In schedule 1, page 46, line 33, at end insert—

<In the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011—

(a) in section 65—

(i) for subsection (1) there is substituted—

“(1) Subsection (2) applies where the Principal Reporter is informed under subsection (2) of section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 that a child is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3) of that section.”,

(ii) in subsection (2), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”,

(b) in section 66(1), for sub-paragraph (vii) there is substituted—

“(vii) information under section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, or”,

(c) in section 68(4)(e)(vi), for the words “section 43(5) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46)” there is substituted “section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,

(d) in section 69, for subsection (3) there is substituted—

“(3) If—
(a) the determination under section 66(2) is made following the Principal Reporter receiving information under section (\textit{Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted}) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, and

(b) at the time the determination is made the child is being kept in a place of safety,

the children’s hearing must be arranged to take place no later than the third day after the Principal Reporter receives the information mentioned in paragraph (a).”,

(c) in section 72(2)(b), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”.

\textbf{After section 52}

\textbf{Alison McInnes}

258 After section 52, insert—

\textit{<Code of practice about investigative functions>}

\textbf{Code of practice about investigative functions}

(1) The Lord Advocate must issue a code of practice on—

(a) the questioning, and recording of questioning, of persons suspected of committing offences, and

(b) the conduct of identification procedures involving such persons.

(2) The Lord Advocate—

(a) must keep the code of practice issued under subsection (1) under review,

(b) may from time to time revise the code of practice.

(3) The code of practice is to apply to the functions exercisable by or on behalf of—

(a) the Police Service of Scotland,

(b) such other bodies as are specified in the code (being bodies responsible for reporting offences to the procurator fiscal).

(4) Before issuing the code of practice, the Lord Advocate must consult publicly on a draft of the code.

(5) When preparing a draft of the code of practice for public consultation, the Lord Advocate must consult—

(a) the Lord Justice General,

(b) the Faculty of Advocates,

(c) the Law Society of Scotland,

(d) the Scottish Police Authority,

(e) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,

(f) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,

(g) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and

(h) such other persons as the Lord Advocate considers appropriate.
(6) The Lord Advocate must lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of the code of practice issued under this section.

(7) Where a court determines in criminal proceedings that evidence has been obtained in breach of the code of practice, the evidence is inadmissible in the proceedings unless the court is satisfied that admitting the evidence would not result in unfairness in the proceedings.

(8) Breach of the code of practice does not of itself give rise to grounds for any legal claim whatsoever.

(9) Subsections (3) to (8) apply to a revised code of practice under subsection (2)(b) as they apply to the code of practice issued under subsection (1).

Before section 53

Michael Matheson

217 Before section 53, insert—

<Disapplication in relation to service offences>

(1) References in this Part to an offence do not include a service offence.

(2) Nothing in this Part applies in relation to a person who is arrested in respect of a service offence.

(3) In this section, “service offence” has the meaning given by section 50(2) of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

Section 53

Michael Matheson

218 In section 53, page 25, line 4, at end insert—

<(  ) Subsection (1) is subject to paragraph 18 of Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000.>

After section 53

Michael Matheson

219 After section 53, insert—

Powers to modify Part

Further provision about application of Part

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part to provide that some or all of it—

(a) applies in relation to persons to whom it would otherwise not apply because of—

(i) section (Disapplication in relation to service offences), or

(ii) section 53,

(b) does not apply in relation to persons arrested otherwise than in respect of an offence.
(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such modifications to this Part as seem to them necessary or expedient in relation to its application to persons mentioned in subsection (1).

(3) Regulations under this section may make different provision for different purposes.

(4) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Michael Matheson

220 After section 53, insert—

<Further provision about vulnerable persons>

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) amend subsections (2)(b) and (6) of section 25,
(b) amend subsections (1)(c), (3) and (5) of section 33,
(c) specify descriptions of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Before section 54

John Pentland

37 Before section 54, insert—

<Meaning of arrest>

In this Part, “arrest” means—

(a) depriving a person of liberty of movement for the purpose of the purported investigation or prevention of crime, and
(b) taking the person to a police station in accordance with section 4.

Section 54

Michael Matheson

221 In section 54, page 25, line 7, leave out <99> and insert <99(1)>

Section 56

Michael Matheson

222 In section 56, page 25, line 15, leave out from <if> to end of line 18 and insert <from the time the person is arrested by a constable until any one of the events mentioned in subsection (2) occurs.

(2) The events are—

(a) the person is released from custody,
(b) the person is brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2),
(c) the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2)(b) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 that the person continue to be kept in a place of safety.

After section 56

Mary Fee

260 After section 56, insert—

<Meaning of responsibility for a child

(1) In this Part, “child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years.

(2) In this Part, references to a person who has responsibility for a child include references to any person who—

(a) is liable to maintain, or has parental responsibilities (within the meaning of section 1(3) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995) in relation to, the child, or

(b) has care of the child.>
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

3rd Groupings of Amendments for Stage 2

This document provides procedural information which will assist in preparing for and following proceedings on the above Bill. The information provided is as follows:

- the list of groupings (that is, the order in which amendments will be debated). Any procedural points relevant to each group are noted;
- a list of any amendments already debated;
- the text of amendments to be debated on the third day of Stage 2 consideration, set out in the order in which they will be debated. THIS LIST DOES NOT REPLACE THE MARSHALLED LIST, WHICH SETS OUT THE AMENDMENTS IN THE ORDER IN WHICH THEY WILL BE DISPOSED OF.

Groupings of amendments

Police powers of search

Power to arrest without warrant and meaning of arrest
111, 112, 37

Replacement of common law power of arrest without warrant, statutory power to detain etc. by section 1 power of arrest
234, 235, 236, 237, 240, 241, 256, 257, 259

Provision of information to arrested person
113, 114, 238, 239, 10, 11

Release from police custody prior to arrival at police station
115, 118

Minor and drafting amendments
116, 117, 121, 124, 132, 133, 138, 140, 194, 205, 221

Information to be given if sexual offence
119, 148

Social work involvement in relation to under 18s in police custody
120, 170, 171, 176, 180, 181, 188

Keeping person not officially accused in custody: period, authorisation, review, etc.
122, 123, 12, 125, 13, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 14, 134, 15, 16, 135, 136, 137, 17, 139, 141
Period for which child or vulnerable adult may be kept in custody without being officially accused 242

Arrest and custody of person with responsibility for child
39, 110, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 260

Investigative liberation: release on conditions
18, 142, 47, 143, 19, 145, 20, 146, 147, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 18 pre-empts amendment 142
Amendments 145 pre-empts amendment 20
Amendment 147 pre-empts amendment 121

Breach of liberation condition
144, 158, 159, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204

Requirement to bring officially accused person before court as soon as practicable
149

Duties of police in relation to under 18s
150, 150A, 151, 152, 65, 255, 196, 197, 222

Release on undertaking
153, 154, 155, 48, 156, 157, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 155 pre-empts amendment 48

Provision of information prior to interview
28, 165, 166

Circumstances in which interview may take place without solicitor present or in which sending of intimation or consultation with solicitor may be delayed
29, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 250, 251, 253

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 29 pre-empts amendments 243 and 244

Rights of under 18s: consent to interview without solicitor present, sending of intimation and access to other person, other support
55, 56, 167, 57, 58, 168, 59, 60, 173, 61, 62, 63, 64, 38, 32

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 58 pre-empts amendment 168
Amendment 63 in this group pre-empts amendments 184 and 185 in the group “Rights of under 18s: minor amendments”
Amendment 38 pre-empts amendment 32
Vulnerable persons: consent to interview without solicitor present, support etc.
30, 31, 169, 33, 189, 34, 190, 249, 191, 220

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 31 pre-empts amendment 169
Amendment 34 pre-empts amendment 190

Rights of under 18s: minor amendments
172, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendments 184 and 185 in this group are pre-empted by amendment 63 in the group “Rights of under 18s: consent to interview without solicitor present, sending of intimation and access to other person, other support”

Means of consultation with solicitor
252, 192, 193

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 252 pre-empts amendment 192

Powers in relation to biometric information
254

Care of drunken persons
195

Disclosure of information relating to persons not officially accused 35, 36

Modification of enactments in connection with Part 1
206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 215, 216

Application of Part 1 in relation to arrests under other enactments
214, 217, 218, 219

Code of practice about investigative functions
258

Amendments already debated

Participation of detained person in proceedings through TV link
With 73 (on Day 2) – 101
Present:

Christian Allard
John Finnie
Margaret McDougall
Margaret Mitchell
Gil Paterson
Roderick Campbell
Christine Grahame (Convener)
Alison McInnes
Elaine Murray (Deputy Convener)

Also present: Michael Matheson, Cabinet Secretary for Justice and Mary Fee (item 1).

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered the Bill at Stage 2 (Day 3).

The following amendments were agreed to (by division) —

- 226 (For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0)
- 229A (For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0)
- 52 (For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0)
- 123 (For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2)
- 12 (For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0)
- 125 (For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2)
- 126 (For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2)
- 129 (For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2)
- 134 (For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2)
- 135 (For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2).

Amendment 242 was disagreed to (by division: For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0).

The following amendments were moved and, no member having objected, withdrawn: 234 and 39.

The following amendments were not moved: 233A, 50, 51 (and, as a consequence, 51A), 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 10, 11, 240, 241, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 17.

The following provisions were agreed to without amendment: sections 5 and 12.
The following provisions were agreed to as amended: sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 13.

The Committee ended consideration of the Bill for the day, section 13 having been agreed to.

Alison McInnes declared an interest as a member of Justice Scotland.
Scottish Parliament
Justice Committee

Tuesday 29 September 2015

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill:
Stage 2

10:03

The Convener: Agenda item 2 is day 3 of stage 2 proceedings on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the meeting the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Michael Matheson, and the Scottish Government officials who are here to support him. As members are aware, they are not able to take part in the proceedings.

Members should have with them their copy of the bill, the marshalled list and the groupings of amendments for consideration. I aim to get as far as we can by around 11.40, as we have other items of business to consider. As members are aware, we will not get through all the amendments today, but we can get on with the remainder next week. I know that members are looking forward to continuing stage 2 of the bill.

Before section 1

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson): Good morning. I thank the committee for altering the normal order of consideration of amendments. As members know, the advisory group on stop and search was not due to report to me until 31 August, so the committee’s scheduling has been extremely helpful in allowing us to debate the matter in light of the advisory group’s recommendations.

I have given a commitment to implement the advisory group’s recommendations, and it is important to look at this group of amendments in that context. My aim is to use the amendments to make the legislative change that we need in order to implement the advisory group’s recommendations in full.

I asked the advisory group to consider whether consensual stop and search should end and whether any additional steps would be required, including any consequential legislation or changes in practice. I also asked it to develop a draft code of practice to underpin the use of stop and search in Scotland.

The advisory group had a broad membership that included Police Scotland, the Scottish Police Authority, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, academics, representatives from Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, and Anne Houston, who is chair of the
I asked the advisory group to report to a tight timescale to match the progress of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I am grateful to the group, and in particular to John Scott, who led it, for delivering the report to last month’s deadline. I am sure that the committee will agree that the report is comprehensive, balanced and considered, and that it makes clear and well-reasoned recommendations.

In the summer, I indicated that I would seek an early opportunity to legislate, and that is what we are doing now. I hope that that reassures the committee that we are serious about implementing all the advisory group’s recommendations swiftly and delivering the new code of practice as soon as we practically can.

I thank Alison McInnes for her contribution to the stop-and-search debate over recent months, and for lodging amendments 50 to 53. As she knows from our recent discussions, it has not been possible to blend her amendments with those of the Government. In my view, implementation of the recommendations requires a co-ordinated set of amendments that are more detailed than amendments 50 to 53. We looked at the matter carefully, but amendments 50 to 53 simply do not lend themselves to being changed in the way that would be required. My conclusion was that the most effective way to ensure proper implementation of the advisory group’s recommendations was to draft a new set of co-ordinated amendments as a single package, which is what we have done.

Amendments 223 to 233, in my name, form a set that hangs together. They form a new part of the bill that is divided into two chapters. The amendments will insert the new part, section by section.

Amendment 223 ends consensual stop and search of persons who are not in police custody. Its effect will be that police officers will be able to search such a person only when they are explicitly permitted to do so by an enactment or warrant. That is what has become known as statutory search.

Amendments 229, 232 and 233 require a code of practice to be implemented, after a period of consultation. The consultation, which is to be both public and with specific stakeholders, will be followed by a requirement for parliamentary approval, under the affirmative procedure. A copy of the code of practice is also to be laid before Parliament.

Amendment 230 provides for the code of practice to be kept under regular review thereafter. The original code will require to be reviewed within two years of coming into effect, and thereafter a review will be required no later than every four years.

Together, amendments 223, 229, 232 and 233 implement advisory group recommendations 1 to 4, and they follow the advisory group’s recommendations in relation to making, publishing and consulting on the code of practice.

Amendment 231 gives the code the appropriate legal status. A court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings will have to take the code of practice into account when determining any questions arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant.

Amendment 227 ensures that consensual stop and search will end under amendment 223 at the point at which the original code of practice comes into effect. Proposed subsection (1) of the new section to be inserted by amendment 227 achieves that by stating that the provision in amendment 223 is to commence on the same day as the original code of practice takes effect under the provisions in amendment 233. That implements advisory group recommendation 8.

Advisory group recommendation 6 is that the Scottish Government should hold an early consultation on whether to legislate to create a specific power for police officers to search children under the age of 18 for alcohol. I have said that we will carry out a consultation on that. The advisory group was unable to form a concluded view as to whether such a power was necessary or desirable, which is why it recommended that there should be a consultation. I will decide whether such a power is necessary after the consultation.

If, after consultation, I decide that such a power is necessary, I would wish to seek the Parliament’s consent to introduce that power in a timely manner. Amendment 226 contains an enabling provision that would facilitate that. It would allow an affirmative Scottish statutory instrument to be made to provide a power to stop children under 18 and search them for alcohol. The amendment would also allow the SSI to provide a power to search a person who is over 18 where that person is hiding a child’s alcohol in order to prevent it from being found. However, unlike consensual stop and search, such powers will only ever be able to be exercised where the police have reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has alcohol in their possession. As I said, decisions on whether to make such an SSI will depend not only on the consultation outcome but, ultimately, on that SSI being approved by the Parliament.

The provision is also subject to the sunset clause in proposed subsection (2) of the new section that will be inserted by amendment 227.
The result is that, if no regulations are made within two years of the original code of practice coming into effect, the provision will cease to have effect.

Amendment 224 addresses the potential but limited gaps in statutory powers that we have identified. There is a possible lack of clarity in the current law and a risk that the complete abolition of consensual stop and search under amendment 223 might mean that the police lack the powers that they need to search persons in certain circumstances—in particular, persons who have not been arrested but who are nevertheless in the hands or safekeeping of the police under some other legal authority.

We have identified several circumstances in which the police have statutory power to hold and/or transport a person from one place to another to safeguard that person’s safety and wellbeing. In order to look after that person and also to protect the police officers looking after them, the police need to be able to search them before holding and/or transporting them. In particular, there is currently no express power of search when the police take a drunk person to a designated place under section 16 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. There is no express power of search when detaining a person under the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 or under part 6 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, or when detaining a child for their own welfare under section 56 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. As I am sure the committee will understand, the gaps that we have identified cannot be left unfilled.

Amendment 224 addresses those gaps. It contains a general provision that would allow constables to search a person in the circumstances that I have mentioned—that is, when the person is to be held or transported by the police under specific authority of an enactment, warrant or court order. It should be noted that the power of search is expressly limited to not just specific circumstances but a specific purpose, namely to ensure that the person who is in the hands of the police is not in possession of something that could be harmful. That power was not included in the advisory group’s recommendations, no doubt because the circumstances that I have outlined were not within the group’s remit. However, I believe that those powers are necessary for the narrow purposes of prevention of harm to self and others in the limited circumstances in question. The amendment will create a new power of statutory search in those limited circumstances whereby the new power falls within the authority for statutory search referred to in amendment 223. The committee may wish to know that John Scott is aware that we propose to introduce the new power and that he considers it to be a sensible proposal.

10:15

Amendment 225 imposes a duty on a constable, when deciding whether to search a child, to treat the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration. That replicates the effect of section 42 in the context of stop and search. The amendment delivers the intention behind advisory group recommendation 7 and amendment 53, in the name of Alison McInnes. I shall return to that point later, when I talk about the non-Government amendments in the group.

Amendment 228 provides a definition of “constable” and “police custody” for the purposes of the proposed new chapter.

In summary, amendments 223 to 233, if accepted as a package, will deliver all the legislative changes required to implement advisory group recommendations 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7 and 8 in full.

For the sake of completeness, the committee will wish to know that implementation of advisory group recommendations 5, 9 and 10 does not require legislative change. Recommendation 5 concerns a transfer of information from Police Scotland to the Scottish Police Authority and the publication of that information. Recommendation 9 concerns the need for a detailed implementation programme, and recommendation 10 is that there should be discussions about the most appropriate way of dealing with children and vulnerable adults who come to notice during stop-and-search situations.

I turn to the non-Government amendments. For the reasons that I have outlined, I consider that the intentions behind amendments 50 and 51, in the name of Alison McInnes, are more effectively delivered by the fuller package of provisions contained in amendments 223, 229, 230, 232 and 233. I therefore ask Alison McInnes not to move amendments 50 and 51.

I also encourage Alison McInnes not to move amendment 52, which has been superseded by advisory group recommendation 5, which covers the transfer of information from Police Scotland to the Scottish Police Authority and the publication of that information. Although I support the principle of publishing information on stop and search, I do not consider that it is appropriate to include such a requirement in primary legislation. There are other, more appropriate ways to publish that information, as recommended by the advisory group.

Amendment 53, in the name of Alison McInnes, concerns the wellbeing of the child and mirrors advisory group recommendation 7. My initial instinct was to support amendment 53. However, on closer inspection, neither amendment 53 nor advisory group recommendation 7 would quite achieve what they seek to achieve, because of their wording and the provision’s proposed placing in the bill. Because of the provision’s proposed position in section 42, and the fact that it is not restricted to children who are not in police custody, amendment 53 goes too far, because it targets all searches in all circumstances. That means that it would unnecessarily and inappropriately affect the power to search people who are being dealt with by the police under the regime for arrest, custody and questioning in part 1. Such people are already protected by section 42. Amendment 53 would also go further than advisory group recommendation 7, which is explicitly limited to children who are not in police custody. As I said, amendment 225 imposes a duty on constables, when deciding whether to search a child, to treat the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration. That exactly delivers the intention behind amendment 53 and advisory group recommendation 7. I therefore ask Alison McInnes not to move amendment 53.

Amendment 229A, in the name of Alison McInnes, would have the effect of specifying the information that the code of practice must contain. As I said, my intention is to implement the advisory group’s recommendations in full. The advisory group looked at the matter closely, and deliberately decided not to be prescriptive about what the code should contain. It provided a draft code and recommended that we carry out a consultation on the draft. That is what I intend to do, and I have asked John Scott and the advisory group to help us to develop the code of practice in light of the consultation responses. Parliament will have the opportunity to debate and vote on the code before it is finalised. The process for the code of practice is designed to ensure that the code contains everything that it should. I therefore encourage Alison McInnes not to move amendment 229A.

Amendment 233B, in the name of Alison McInnes, would provide that regulation to bring into effect the first code of practice must be laid within one year of the bill receiving royal assent. I agree that that is a reasonable time period and I thank Alison McInnes for lodging the amendment. I am content to support amendment 233B, but we may seek to refine the provision at stage 3 if that appears to be necessary on looking at it again when it appears in the bill. I undertake to work with Alison McInnes on the matter.

Amendments 230A and 233A, in the name of Alison McInnes, are about reviews of the code of practice. Amendment 230A seeks to ensure that each review of the code of practice is completed within six months of the review’s start date. I agree with the intention behind ensuring that reviews are carried out as quickly as possible and would certainly agree that any review should be carried out within six months. I am therefore content to support amendment 230A and I thank Alison McInnes for lodging it. Again, we may seek to refine the provision at stage 3 if that appears to be necessary on looking at it again when it appears in the bill. Of course, we will work with Alison McInnes on the matter.

The effect of amendment 233A would be that, after each review of the code of practice, regulations would have to be laid for a new code to come into effect, whether or not the code had been changed. I agree with the principle that reviews of the code should be kept under scrutiny. However, I consider that amendment 233A would create an odd result, because it would require a revised code of practice to be brought into effect even when the earlier version of the code had not been revised.

In addition, amendment 233A would go beyond the advisory group’s recommendation, which was that any revision to the code should be subject to parliamentary approval. Amendment 230, in conjunction with amendment 233, will ensure that that happens. Any revised code will not take effect until Parliament has had the opportunity to debate and vote on the matter. I therefore encourage Alison McInnes not to move amendment 233A.

Amendment 232A, in the name of John Finnie, would add the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner to the list of organisations that should be consulted when the draft code of practice is prepared. The PIRC would be covered by proposed new subsection (2)(h) of the new section that amendment 232 will insert, which refers to

"such other persons as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate."

However, I have no objection to the PIRC being specifically included. I am therefore content to support amendment 232A, although we may seek to move the provision to a different place in the list at stage 3, for technical reasons.

I can summarise as follows. Amendments 223 to 233, if accepted as a package, will deliver all the legislative changes required to implement the recommendations of John Scott’s advisory group. I am content to support amendments 230A, 232A and 233B, but I encourage Alison McInnes not to move amendments 50, 51, 52, 53, 229A and 233A.

I hope that it is clear to the committee that I have taken great care over how to approach stop and search and that I have taken into account suggestions made by Alison McInnes, John Finnie and other members on the amendments. I will continue to do so between now and stage 3, to build as much consensus on the issue as possible.

I move amendment 223.
The Convener: I thank the cabinet secretary for a very comprehensive trip round all the amendments. I think that members received some explanatory notes in advance, which was helpful, because the issue is complex. It would have been difficult if the information had just been put in front of everyone today.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I will speak to most of the amendments in the group, if you will bear with me, convener.

For 18 months, I was repeatedly told by the Scottish Government that stop and search was an operational matter. Ministers insisted that they were comfortable with so-called consensual stop and search, despite it occurring on an industrial scale and targeting young and vulnerable people—even children.

My campaign to abolish so-called consensual stop and search and introduce a code of practice won the backing of dozens of charities, academics, the Scottish Human Rights Commission and Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People. As members will be aware, the Government has finally decided to adopt my plans after they were effectively endorsed by the independent advisory group that is chaired by John Scott QC. I have been pleased to work with the Government since that review was published, and I have reflected on the 11 amendments that the cabinet secretary has lodged, which benefit from the additional evidence that has emerged since I lodged mine in February. I am willing, if John Finnie will agree, not to move amendments 50, 51 and 53. However, it is essential that the Government’s amendments are strengthened in a number of respects to ensure that there is no room for ministers to backtrack.

As the minister said, amendment 229A would specify the information that must as a minimum be included in the code of practice, namely the circumstances in which searches take place; the procedure to be followed; what records must be taken; and the rights of the subject to access those records. Those provisions are not onerous by any means and provide ministers with a great deal of flexibility to develop the code. However, they will establish what this Parliament expects, and I intend to press that amendment.

Amendment 230A specifies that reviews of the code should be completed in six months, again ensuring that reviews cannot just get stalled. I thank the Government for its support on that.

Amendment 233A is intended to reflect my belief that every time the code is reviewed, the Parliament should have an opportunity to reaffirm its support for the code or, if it wishes, initiate changes, even if the minister does not believe that change is necessary. However, having listened to what the cabinet secretary has said this morning, I will not move the amendment.

Amendment 233B is a significant one. It addresses an omission in the Government’s amendment and requires the introduction of the code of practice and the abolition of so-called consensual stop and search to occur within one year of royal assent. With Police Scotland still conducting hundreds of thousands of these unregulated searches, we should not allow the code of practice to slip. I am grateful that the minister has agreed to support that amendment.

I am minded to move amendment 52, which requires the SPA to produce an account of the use of stop and search in its annual report to Parliament. That will encourage transparency and improved data collection methods. The committee will remember the difficulties with the figures that were being bandied about.

Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People warns us that amendment 226, which involves powers to search for alcohol, is premature. Children 1st indicates that it is concerned about the possibility that such a power could lead to unintended consequences for children, such as criminalisation and a higher rate of statutory stopping and searching for young people. I note that John Scott QC’s review group reported:

“We have not been able to form a concluded view on whether a gap in powers exists that could not be dealt with by existing powers, and also on whether a power to search children for alcohol would be desirable. We therefore recommend that there should be a public consultation that involves children and young people.”

The review group went on to say:

“We therefore recommend that this should be considered separately, subject to wider consultation, specifically involving children and young people.”

I agree that there is no need to have this provision in the bill.

Dr Kath Murray’s groundbreaking research into the prevalence of unregulated stop and search and the effects of the encounters in Scotland shone a bright light on something that needs to be challenged. For a long time, I was a lone voice in Parliament raising that challenge, but I am delighted that the evidence has vindicated that approach and that the committee is now on the verge of ensuring that every stop and search that is conducted by the police has a robust legal basis.

We are on the verge of ensuring that every search is justified, regulated and accountable. These changes to the bill will be the start of rebuilding community relations with the groups that have been disproportionately targeted by this thoroughly discredited tactic. However, there is one more hurdle, and I hope that members will join me in ensuring that there is no room for delay or for future Governments to slide back. I hope that the committee will back my amendments.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Stop and search did not use to be a problem. There were all the statutes that could be invoked on stop and search and there was a lot of statutory guidance and case law on the matter. It then became a problem, and I am certainly very grateful to the cabinet secretary for setting up the review committee under John Scott, as it sent a very clear signal that the issues had been responded to. I think that we have heard a lot to suggest that that continues to be the case, and I will not repeat much of what my colleague Alison—ah—[Interruption.] Sorry—I mean Alison McInnes.

The Convener: It is still early and already you are falling apart.

John Finnie: I know. Forgive me, convener.

I will not repeat much of what my colleague Alison McInnes has said, but I am certainly grateful for the movement that has been made. I am therefore happy not to move my amendments.

10:30

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): Labour members also welcome the progress that has been made on stop and search and the move to putting it on to a statutory basis. However, I invite the cabinet secretary to make clear his views on amendment 226 and the concern that has been raised by Tam Baillie, Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, about the use of the affirmative procedure, which he thinks is unlikely to allow for sufficient parliamentary scrutiny of a matter that is likely to have wide-reaching effects for children and young people across Scotland. I appreciate that amendment 227 contains the fall-back position of a sunset clause, which will be invoked if nothing comes forward, but is the Government prepared to consider putting in place a super-affirmative procedure to give Parliament the chance for additional scrutiny?

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con): I am happy to support the cabinet secretary’s amendment on stop and search, which reflects the recommendation of the review committee chaired by John Scott. I also pay tribute to Alison McInnes, who has been relentless in her scrutiny of the matter and her campaigning against the undoubted abuses of the consensual stop and search procedure. I think that today is a victory for her, too.

I support amendment 229A, in the name of Alison McInnes, but I note that the cabinet secretary is not minded to support it, because he does not want to be too prescriptive. However, the amendment simply says “should include”; the content itself is not definitive. In any case, I think that it is eminently sensible for the circumstances of a search to be looked at and, crucially, for a record to be kept. How else are we to determine how many searches are taking place? Despite being a supporter of it, I am also happy that Alison McInnes is not seeking to move amendment 233A.

I am minded to support amendment 52, which seems to me to be sensible. It simply tightens up the provisions and makes them as effective as possible by ensuring that a record of the stop and search is included in the Scottish Police Authority’s annual report.

Finally, I think that John Finnie’s amendments make sense.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): I have heard the point that has been made about amendment 229A being prescriptive but, for me, the important point is that Parliament will have the opportunity to debate and vote on the code of practice before it is finalised. It is therefore not something that will not come back to Parliament.

With regard to amendment 226, I recognise that the area is likely to be controversial. As far as I am concerned, as long as the Parliament has a proper opportunity in some shape or form to consider the outcome of the consultation, I have no particular problem with the Government’s proposal.

Michael Matheson: I am grateful for the comments that various committee members have made.

The intention behind amendment 226 is not to pre-empt anything. Instead, it creates an enabling power to ensure that if, following the consultation as recommended by the advisory group, it is felt to be necessary to create the statutory provision for searching those under 18 for alcohol, the Parliament will have an opportunity to address the matter. The inherent danger and risk in not agreeing to this amendment and not taking forward the provision is that if, as a result of the consultation, a gap is identified and it is not agreeing to this amendment and not taking forward the provision is that if, as a result of the consultation, a gap is identified and it is recommended that we have something to deal with it, we will have no legislative vehicle for pursuing that.

I am open to the idea of exploring, between now and stage 3, whether there is a way in which the provision could be further reinforced. For example, Elaine Murray has suggested that the provision should be subject to a super-affirmative procedure and, if the committee is minded that it should be, I am more than content to explore that idea further between now and stage 3. That would give the Parliament additional oversight before any such power could be introduced.
Nevertheless, I have serious concern about the possibility that we will conduct a consultation, as recommended by the advisory group, find that it identifies a legislative gap but then have no legislative vehicle with which to address that deficit in the law. If, during the course of the consultation, nothing is identified that would justify having such a statutory provision, we have the amendments that would create a sunset clause to remove the provision from the bill.

We decided not to accept amendment 229A primarily because of the recommendations of the advisory group, which considered the issue closely and decided not to be prescriptive about what the code should contain. It provided a draft code with the recommendation that we should have a consultation on that draft code, and that is what we intend to do. To assist that process, the advisory group will remain in place, with John Scott heading it up and other members supporting the consultation exercise and the drafting of the code, which will eventually be brought before Parliament for its consideration. The key point is that, as Rod Campbell said, the code of practice must be laid before Parliament and Parliament will have the ultimate say over whether its content is correct.

We have decided to reject amendment 52 because of the findings of the advisory group on the matter. In its report, the group highlights that the approach that Police Scotland currently takes on data has improved and, in recommendation 5, recommends that practical measures be taken on a regular basis by the SPA and Police Scotland to ensure that there is adequate openness and transparency. That recommendation will be fully implemented along with the other recommendations in the report. There is, therefore, no need to put anything in the bill to achieve that.

Amendment 223 agreed to.

Amendments 224 and 225 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 226 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 226 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Alison McInnes: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 226 agreed to.

Amendments 227 and 228 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 229 moved—[Michael Matheson].

Amendment 229A moved—[Alison McInnes].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 229A be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 229A agreed to.

Amendment 229, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 230 moved—[Michael Matheson].

Amendment 230A moved—[Alison McInnes]—and agreed to.

Amendment 230, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 231 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 232 moved—[Michael Matheson].

Amendment 232A moved—[John Finnie]—and agreed to.

Amendment 232, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 233 moved—[Michael Matheson].

Amendment 233A not moved.

Amendment 233B moved—[Alison McInnes]—and agreed to.

Amendment 233, as amended, agreed to.

Amendments 50 and 51 not moved.

Amendment 52 moved—[Alison McInnes].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 52 be agreed to. Are we agreed?
The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 52 agreed to.

Section 1—Power of a constable

The Convener: Amendment 111, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 112 and 37.

Michael Matheson: I will deal first with amendments 111 and 112, both of which are relatively minor, before turning to amendment 37 and the proposed definition of arrest.

Amendment 111 aims to improve readability.

Amendment 112 clarifies the meaning of an offence not punishable by imprisonment. Section 1(2) sets out an extra test that has to be met before a constable can arrest someone without a warrant if the offence that the person is suspected of committing is “not punishable by imprisonment”.

The phrase is meant to capture minor offences for which nobody would ever be sent to prison. On its own, however, the phrase could be taken to mean that the suspect whom the constable intended to arrest would not be liable to be imprisoned. Children, for example, are never liable to be imprisoned. Amendment 112 makes it clear that, in deciding whether section 1(2) applies, it is the nature of the offence that is to be considered, and not the identity of the suspect.

I turn to John Pentland’s amendment 37, which would add a new section to provide a definition of arrest for the purposes of part 1.

I am not persuaded that amendment 37 would do any good; indeed, it could have the opposite effect. Definitions are there to clarify the meaning of the words and expressions used in the bill. The proposed definition of arrest would not make the meaning of part 1 more certain.

The proposed definition is in two parts. The first part refers to “depriving a person of liberty of movement.”

That phrase is open to interpretation and challenge. For example, would it cover those who were released on investigative liberation or on an undertaking or bail with conditions as to the places where they were permitted to go?

The second part of the proposed definition is that arrest means

“taking the person to a police station in accordance with section 4”, which might imply that nobody can be arrested at a police station. That proposed definition of arrest is circular: a person is under arrest within the meaning of the proposed definition if he or she is to be taken to a police station in accordance with section 4. Who is to be taken to a police station in accordance with section 4? Section 4 applies in relation to a person who has been arrested, so, the definition effectively states that a person is arrested if the person has been arrested.

The Convener: So far so good.

Michael Matheson: Part 1 is, in a sense, an extended definition of arrest. It sets out who can exercise the power of arrest, the grounds for doing so, the rights of the person who has been arrested and what is to happen following arrest. Picking out one element of that extended definition and saying that that is what arrest means for the purposes of the bill does not add anything.

There are many other statutes that use the word “arrest” without a definition and which work well without one. As Police Scotland indicated in its evidence, the bill as introduced will allow the police to work with the current legal understanding and definition of arrest, which is well understood by police officers and others in the justice system.

Although the practitioners understand the legal meaning, I acknowledge that there might be some misunderstanding among the general public of what arrest means, but defining the word in the bill will not help with that. As I said, the purpose of defining words and expressions in legislation is to inform the interpretation of the legislation in question. There is an onus on everyone who works in the criminal justice system to find ways to make the system more understandable and accessible.

I urge Elaine Murray not to move amendment 37 for the reasons that I have outlined.

I move amendment 111.

The Convener: I call Elaine Murray to speak to amendment 37, in the name of John Pentland.
Elaine Murray: I just want to say a few words regarding amendment 37, in the name of my colleague John Pentland. I should point out that, despite the hilarity over the wording of the amendment, it was actually drafted by the legislation team, not by Mr Pentland himself. If there is criticism there—

The Convener: I think that that is deuce.

Elaine Murray: It was drafted by people who know what they are doing.

However, as the cabinet secretary implied in his remarks, the reason why John Pentland lodged the amendment was to address the very issue that the meaning of arrest will change in Scotland. In Scotland we have a particular view of what arrest means. We think that people are arrested once they have been charged with an offence, not when they are helping the police with their inquiries and so on. John Pentland lodged the amendment to see whether there is a method by which we can clarify that in the public mind and, in particular, in the mind of the media.

When we took evidence on the bill many moons ago—it was probably about two years ago—we were advised that in England and Wales there have been quite high-profile instances of people having been arrested for a very serious crime and having been questioned, with the media then treating them as if they were suspects when in fact they were never charged.

If the bill is passed and the meaning of arrest in Scotland changes, it is important that efforts are made to ensure that people who are what would have been termed “helping police with their inquiries” are not necessarily considered to have been charged. I will come back to that issue later. I have other amendments to be discussed much later on—probably next week—that look at some of those issues.

That was John Pentland’s intention with amendment 37, but I know that he is quite content for it not to be moved.

Roderick Campbell: I heard what Elaine Murray said. I am not sure that the reference to “helping police with their inquiries” is helping us in our discussions this morning.

I remind the committee of the comments made two years ago by Professor Chalmers, a distinguished professor from the University of Glasgow. He said:

“the general term ‘arrest’ has been used successfully for quite some time, despite the fact that nobody can state exactly what the law in that area is.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 8 October 2013; c 3353.]

I think that the main thing is to remove an artificial distinction between detention and arrest. If at some later stage somebody wants to attempt to define arrest, so be it—but not in the bill.

The Convener: I am no clearer after what has been said—I am probably more confused.

Michael Matheson: As I outlined in my earlier comments, the circular nature of John Pentland’s amendment 37 means that it would not deliver what it was intended to. I should quickly add that it was the Parliament’s legislation team who assisted in drafting of the amendment.

The Convener: I could see shock and horror on your colleagues’ faces when Elaine Murray commented on the drafting.

Michael Matheson: No doubt Elaine Murray will wish to consider further before stage 3 the definition of “arrest”. However, the point that Rod Campbell outlined and the evidence that the committee received previously on the matter indicate that any attempt to define “arrest” would create a lot of unintended consequences, with the danger that that would create further confusion and make it difficult to interpret the bill’s provisions, which set out in part 1 what is almost an extended definition of “arrest” anyway.

Amendment 111 agreed to.

Amendment 112 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: After we have dealt with the next group, we will have a little break.

Amendment 234, in the name of Margaret Mitchell, is grouped with amendments 235 to 237, 240, 241, 256, 257 and 259.

Margaret Mitchell: It is now two years since the Justice Committee took evidence on part 1 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, on arrest and custody. This is a very important part of the bill that proposes changes to the police’s current power to detain, arrest and charge.

Two years ago, the debate on and scrutiny of the bill focused on the particularly contentious proposal to abolish corroboration. There is now very real concern that the committee, whose composition has changed over the past two years—we also have a new Cabinet Secretary for Justice—has the opportunity to scrutinise properly what by any standards will be a very substantial and significant change to the traditional method by which the police carry out one of their basic functions in protecting the public, namely the power to detain, arrest and charge.

The terms “detain”, “arrest” and “charge” are understood at present. The general public know that when someone is detained for questioning, they will either be released without charge or be arrested and charged. The committee pointed out in its stage 1 report that there is not the same stigma attached to someone who is detained for questioning and who is helping police with their inquiries as there is to someone who has been arrested.

When we took evidence at stage 1, the convener stated that the public “know that detention is different from arrest. They may not know the technical things that lawyers know, but they know that it is different from being arrested.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 8 October 2013; c 3354.]

Sandra White, who was then a member of the Justice Committee, noted:

“The perception is that if someone is arrested, as opposed to being detained, they are suspected of being guilty of a crime.” —[Official Report, Justice Committee, 1 October 2013; c 3294.]

However, Elaine Murray said:

“The problem is that, although the words may mean the same thing, the public think that, when someone has been arrested, the police have sufficient evidence that they may have committed a crime.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 8 October, c 3354.]

The concerns about the proposed changes do not stop there. Crucially, as the Scottish Police Federation pointed out, if the proposed changes are agreed to, it will result in police officers having to be retrained. That, in turn, will have the adverse consequence of taking up precious police hours at a time when Police Scotland and its loyal and hard-working rank-and-file officers are already operating under immense pressure, and it will have adverse financial implications for Police Scotland’s already strained budget.

As the Law Society of Scotland pointed out:

“the current system is working well and there is no requirement to move to a system of arrest on the basis that a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed or is committing an offence.”

Further, Calum Steele of the Scottish Police Federation said:

“I am not entirely convinced that”

the need for change

“has been demonstrated”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 1 October 2013; c 3286.] or that the proposed wording would be “more easily understood”.

My amendments are probing amendments that I fully accept have technical flaws. However, they propose the retention of the status quo in an effort to allow us to have a much-needed discussion about why the proposals for the new terminology are necessary and can be justified, given the implications for Police Scotland, both in practical terms and financially. I will move amendment 234 to allow that discussion to take place.

I move amendment 234.

John Finnie: I listened intently to what Margaret Mitchell said, and I hope to allay her concerns. For example, on police training, earlier in our discussions, we unanimously agreed a package of measures that have implications for training. That is part and parcel of how the police respond to the democratic process. Laws are passed in the Parliament, and the police pick up on them. I would not be concerned about that at all.

I understand the traditional view of arrest and detention, to which I saw changes over 30 years. If an individual is wheeched away and put in a police van, it does not matter to them what we call that—it has the same effect. It is the protections that those individuals are afforded that are important to me. I am sure that we can get it right and that the Police Service will respond appropriately to whatever we decide in the committee.

Roderick Campbell: I accept that we had a lot of evidence sessions on the matter two years ago, and that some members of the committee had the view that detention is different from arrest in some way. I am also mindful that Lord Carloway was fairly clear that we needed to do away with the distinction, which was increasingly blurred. I think that that was Professor Chalmers’s view as well. Professor Chalmers was fairly clear that the public knew that there was a difference between being detained and being charged. Therefore, I am not sure Margaret Mitchell’s amendment 234 is really helpful. I urge the committee to reject it.

The Convener: I think that Margaret Mitchell is probing, but we will get to that.

Elaine Murray: It is helpful that Margaret Mitchell lodged the amendments, even if we do not necessarily agree with them. She referred to the fact that the public have a different view of arrest. That is what I was trying to get at when we were talking about John Pentland’s amendment 37. That is an issue, but I do not particularly recollect many people saying two years ago, “We shouldn’t be doing this at all,” or that part 1 of the bill should be thrown out.

I agree that we have to be careful about the way in which issues around arrest are transmitted to the public—people become aware of the fact that there is a difference—but I do not think that sections need to be taken out of the bill. I fail to see why it would be such a burden on the police to have just a slight difference in terminology, as they will not do anything terribly different. It will just be called something different. I am not convinced that there will be a huge burden on Police Scotland.

Michael Matheson: Margaret Mitchell’s amendments 234 to 237, 240, 241, 256, 257 and 259 would remove all of chapter 1 of part 1 of the
The bill as introduced, together with the related amendments on arrest. That would have the effect of retaining the current detention arrangements that are provided for in section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, together with existing common-law and statutory powers of arrest. I believe that that would be a backward step when we should be moving forward and modernising our justice system.

The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill resulted from an independent review that was carried out by a respected senior member of the Scottish judiciary and from the responses to the Scottish Government's consultation on the thoughtful recommendations that Lord Carloway made in his report.

The report recommended that section 14 of the 1995 act, on detention, should be abolished and that the only general power to take a suspect into custody should be the power of arrest. The bill is the legislative vehicle with which we are implementing Carloway and taking forward the next stage in reforming the Scottish criminal justice system. It will ensure that rights are protected, while ensuring effective access to justice for victims of crime. The bill achieves those policy objectives and reflects Lord Carloway's carefully balanced suggestions in relation to police powers.

11:00

In its stage 1 report, the committee accepted that there might be benefit in simplifying the powers of arrest along the lines proposed in part 1. That is what I think we should be working to achieve. The bill will modernise and clarify the system of arrest, custody and questioning, and I believe that it will keep our communities safe while ensuring that the police continue to act with the consent of the communities that they serve. The common-law power of arrest for offences will be repealed and replaced with a power of arrest on suspicion of having committed an offence. All other common-law powers remain. Statutory powers to arrest suspects for specific offences, which are currently scattered across the statute book, will also be replaced by the single clear power of arrest, as set out in part 1.

I believe that the terminology used in the bill is clear and accurately describes the new regime. The term “arrest” does not imply guilt. Whether a person is guilty of committing an offence is a matter for our courts. The presumption of innocence remains. The terms “not officially accused” and “officially accused” have been used to differentiate between two distinct categories of persons: those who are suspected of an offence but who have not been charged are “not officially accused”; and those who have been formally charged with an offence, including accused on petition, indictment or complaint, are “officially accused”.

It is also worth keeping in mind that the Carloway review concluded that the distinction between arrest and detention had been eroded to such an extent that there was little purpose in continuing with the two different states. Lord Carloway recommended that section 14 of the 1995 act, on detention, should be abolished and that the only general power to take a suspect into custody should be the power of arrest. Chapter 1 of part 1 of the bill as introduced implements that recommendation. I therefore urge Margaret Mitchell not to press her amendments.

Margaret Mitchell: It seems that the common-law power of arrest is to be abolished. When something is put into statute that was previously covered by the common law, with all the flexibility that that contains, there is always the possibility of unintended consequences. We are already seeing some of that when we look at whether the provisions include the power for someone to be arrested for their own safety. I do not know whether that has been or will be addressed.

The cabinet secretary has made much of Lord Carloway’s recommendation simplifying the law. It seems to me that, if someone can be arrested and then not arrested, or “not officially accused” and then “officially accused”, the provision does anything but simplify the law. It might make sense to academics and those steeped in the legal profession but it will not necessarily make sense to the ordinary man in the street, whom the powers will affect.

There also seems to be a justification for the change in Lord Carloway’s recommendation to bring in two distinct means of taking a person into custody under Scots law in order to make matters more clearly in tune with the European convention on human rights. However, in practice, as the Law Society pointed out, the system, as changed in the light of Cadder, seems to have bedded in well. It is working well, without all these changes. I appreciate that many of the amendments that will follow today are aimed at improving the new terminology and I will consider them on their merits on that basis. However, I am not convinced that the new terminology—as opposed to the status quo—is the best way to progress.

I will not press my amendments but I urge the Scottish Government to look again at section 1, for there is most certainly a case to be made for taking the proposed changes to detention, arrest and charge out of the bill to ensure that they are given the necessary scrutiny and would in fact improve the current system.

Amendment 234, by agreement, withdrawn.
Section 1, as amended, agreed to.

11:05
Meeting suspended.

11:10
On resuming—

Section 2—Exercise of the power

The Convener: Amendment 113, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 114, 238, 239, 10 and 11.

Michael Matheson: This group of amendments deals with the information that suspects will be given after they are arrested. I am sure that we all agree that that is an important issue, given that for many people, particularly those who have not previously been in trouble with the police, being arrested might be a distressing and potentially confusing experience.

I am aware that at stage 1 the committee very much welcomed the added protections that the bill will give people when they are arrested. Amendments 113 and 114 extend the information that suspects will be entitled to following an arrest. Amendment 113 seeks to give a person arrested by a police officer who is not in uniform the right to see that officer’s identification, while amendment 114 seeks to amend section 3 to add to the information that a police officer will be required to give a person who has been arrested. Specifically, the officer will be required to inform the person that they have the right to a lawyer, that they are in police custody and that they have the right to have a private consultation with a lawyer at any time while in such custody. Those rights are laid out in sections 35 and 36. The provisions will ensure that suspects are aware of those important rights from the earliest possible time after their arrest. Of course, section 5 already provides that they will be told about them when they arrive at the police station.

I appreciate that amendments 238 and 239 in the name of Alison McInnes and amendments 10 and 11 in the name of John Finnie are motivated by the same desire to ensure that suspects are fully informed of their rights. However, I am afraid to say that I cannot support Alison McInnes’s amendments, which seek to amend section 5 to require the police to tell a suspect on arrival at a police station about the right to have a solicitor present during an interview under section 24 and the right for vulnerable adults to receive support from an appropriate adult under section 33. However, the fact is that not all suspects who are detained at a police station will be questioned and, in such circumstances, those rights will not be engaged. Section 23(2) already requires that suspects who are interviewed are told about their rights to have a lawyer present. Furthermore, section 5 already ensures that every suspect who is detained at a police station is told about their rights to have intimation sent to and a private consultation with a lawyer. As I have explained, amendment 114 will ensure that suspects are told about those rights even earlier in the process—that is, at the point of arrest.

Similarly, not all suspects who are detained at a police station have a right to support from an appropriate adult. The rights in section 5 that the police are required to tell suspects about are those which, in general, the suspect has some choice over whether to exercise, and the right to support from an appropriate adult is not that sort of right. If the suspect is assessed as needing such support, an appropriate adult will be provided. There is no point in having the police tell a suspect that they have a right to support from an appropriate adult if the appropriate adult is already there or en route. If the suspect has been assessed as not requiring support from an appropriate adult, the suspect will have no right under section 33 to be told about. I am afraid to say that, for those reasons, I cannot support amendments 238 and 239.

11:15
Amendments 10 and 11 in the name of John Finnie relate to letters of rights. Section 5 currently states that every suspect is to be given, “verbally or in writing”, the information required by articles 3 and 4 of European directive 2012/13/EU on the right to information in criminal proceedings.

Since July 2013, it has been the practice throughout Scotland to provide suspects with that information in the form of a written letter of rights. The letter of rights is available in 34 languages, and from the start of this year a special easy-to-read version of the letter has been available to help children and suspects with learning difficulties to understand their rights fully. The Government is committed to keeping that letter under review so that it continues to be fit for purpose.

Amendments 10 and 11 would make it a requirement for the information always to be given both in writing and verbally to every suspect. I understand that the committee and the Lord Bonomy review group have been sympathetic to that requirement. The Government has therefore given careful consideration to the practical workability of the proposal. Unfortunately, it has become clear that such a change would have a significant impact on police resource, which the Government considers would be disproportionate to the benefit that suspects would get from the change in practice.
Around 200,000 suspects pass through police stations each year. Police Scotland estimates that the amount of police time that would be taken up each year to read the whole letter of rights to every suspect would be approximately 16,500 hours. That assumes that every suspect has a good grasp of English. Locating an interpreter to read out the letter of rights for those suspects who cannot follow it in English would be likely to cause considerable delay and to add to the time that the person spends in custody, deprived of their liberty.

Of course, I recognise that even the easy-to-read version of the letter of rights that I mentioned earlier will not be suitable for every suspect. For suspects who have difficulty with reading, officers will read out the letter of rights. It is precisely to allow flexibility in such circumstances that the bill says “verbally or in writing”.

As I mentioned in my letter to the committee in August, Police Scotland is going to include in its new custody software a prompt to ask suspects whether they would like the letter of rights to be read out to them. I hope that committee members, and John Finnie himself, will agree that a more proportionate way to meet the good intentions behind his amendments is to have police officers read the letter to those suspects who need that, instead of having a huge amount of police time expended reading it out to suspects who are perfectly well able to read it for themselves.

Before leaving that subject, I would like to offer further reassurance to members of the committee and to John Finnie in particular. During my statement to Parliament on the report of Lord Bonomy’s review group, John Finnie endorsed the group’s recommendation that legal aid contributions for legal advice at police stations should be waived. I appreciate that there have been concerns that suspects, even when they know about their rights to legal advice, may waive them because they are worried about the potential cost implications.

The Government has previously confirmed that it plans to abolish legal aid contributions in all those circumstances. I can now confirm to the committee that the Government will lay regulations to do that before the end of this year. All suspects will be entitled to free legal advice while they are detained. That is a significant step and I believe that it demonstrates the progress and commitment that are being made to safeguard the rights of suspects and detained persons.

I hope that that provides further reassurance to members that steps continue to be taken to encourage the greater uptake of legal advice at police stations. We will monitor how the changes affect the number of suspects taking legal advice in custody and, as always, I will keep the committee informed of the results.

I therefore urge John Finnie not to move his amendments, which would pose significant resource problems for Police Scotland and give suspects no additional protection in the light of other steps that are being taken.

I move amendment 113.

Alison McInnes: Section 5 requires that persons in police custody must be informed “as soon as reasonably practicable” of their key rights. Those currently include the right to have intimation sent to another person, the right of children to access a parent or guardian and the right to remain silent. My amendments 238 and 239 would extend that list in two respects and ensure that persons in custody are also informed of their rights under sections 24 and 33, respectively.

Section 24 sets out the right to have a solicitor present while being interviewed. In response to a recent parliamentary question, the Scottish Government confirmed that approximately 75 per cent of those in police custody waive their option to consult or have present a solicitor. I consider that a troubling statistic.

The bill rightly ensures that people in custody are told of the right to have intimation sent to a solicitor and the right to a consultation with their solicitor at any time. However, unless people are also always told that the solicitor can assist them during the police interview, they may not choose to exercise their right to a consultation.

My amendment 239 would ensure that people are told of the rights that are listed in section 33 regarding the support available to vulnerable adults. I have listened to what the cabinet secretary had to say about that, but the bill currently places the onus squarely on a constable to decide whether someone is unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively. If we inform everyone who enters police custody of the right to support in such circumstances, we will perhaps increase the chance of any individual who does need assistance volunteering that fact. It would provide a safeguard and increase the likelihood of needs being identified as early as possible.

My amendments 238 and 239 are supported by Justice Scotland, which has argued that both those key rights should be on the face of the bill.

Turning to the other amendments in the group, I welcome the cabinet secretary’s amendments 113 and 114, which provide suspects with additional information on their arrest. I am sympathetic to John Finnie’s amendments 10 and 11, and I will listen to his response to the cabinet secretary’s concerns.
John Finnie: Amendments 10 and 11 relate to the information to be given at the police station and the request that it be given both verbally and in writing. Concerns raised by the Law Society highlighted some factors in relation to that issue that the committee already knows about and frequently comes across, namely the level of literacy among people who find themselves in custody, the fact that people in custody often are under the influence of alcohol or drugs and, as has been touched on, the level of brain injury among young people who find themselves in custody.

Amendments 10 and 11 are intended to ensure not simply that the letter of rights is in 34 languages and an easy-to-read version—I do not know whether an easy-to-read version is available in 34 languages—but that people are left in no doubt about their rights. The one message that we want this committee to give is that the legislation is robust and thoroughly scrutinised.

I have to say that I am bemused that Police Scotland says that advising people of their rights would have a significant impact on police resources. That someone has even costed out the hours is a misuse of police time.

The cabinet secretary talked about ensuring that every suspect has a grasp of English. The background to that is, of course, that we know that a lot of people do not have a grasp of English and that communication skills are another factor.

Another term used by the cabinet secretary that gave me no reassurance whatsoever was “flexibility” with regard to rights. There can be no flexibility on rights. Rather than there being a prompt in custody software, I want the prompt to be in the police mindset.

That said, I was very reassured by the cabinet secretary’s finishing remarks about suspects receiving free legal advice. For that reason, I seek permission to withdraw amendments 10 and 11.

The Convener: They have not been moved yet.

Alison McInnes: Before we go to the vote, I remind committee members of my registered interest in and membership of Justice Scotland.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): On what John Finnie said about the misuse of police time, for people for whom English is not a first language, a written letter might be easier to understand than a verbal reading. To a certain extent, I can understand Police Scotland when it says that imposing a requirement for an oral reading of the letter of rights for everybody might be a misuse of its time. A lot of people might prefer to have the letter in writing.

The Convener: I wonder whether one of the available languages is French. You never know.

Gil Paterson (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP): I can see where John Finnie is coming from, but I know from my experience in the motor industry of dealing not with the police but with people over the counter how excited they can be when they present even with a simple accident to their car and how that can make them forget things. It is commendable to look after people who need help, who may be illiterate, and I support that idea, but I do not support the suggestion that we should do the same everywhere. It would be much better if the information was written down so that people could absorb it better. That way, they can look at what is available to them and decide what is important. I suspect that, when information is being read out, they are so excited and so worried about things that it would just pass them by, but if they had time to look at it and absorb it, things would be somewhat different.

However, I take on board what John Finnie is saying. If someone cannot read and does not understand what the bit of paper is about, obviously we need to find a way of reaching them.

I support him not moving the amendments.

The Convener: Does John Finnie want to say anything?

John Finnie: I simply want to say that the issue has been overtaken by events. The best advice will come from the mouth of a professional, rather than being read out by a police officer or being on a bit of paper.

Michael Matheson: I have listened with interest to the points that have been made by both John Finnie and Alison McInnes. I set out the reasons why we cannot support Alison McInnes’s amendments at this stage. I understand the intention behind them, but I do not believe that the way in which they are presently framed would deliver their intent in an effective, proportionate and appropriate way. However, I would be more than happy to explore that further with Alison McInnes between now and stage 3 to see whether there is a way in which that can be achieved more effectively than would be the case with the amendments that we are considering now.

I turn to John Finnie’s amendments. Notwithstanding his decision not to move the amendments, we should be aware of the level of police time that would be taken up in reading out the letter of rights, which is a five-page document, if officers had to read out all five pages in each individual case. It is not a question of having flexibility in rights—the rights are always there. It is a question of having flexibility in whether they are given verbally or in writing. If I was arrested, I would have no difficulty in reading the letter for myself.
The Convener: If you were arrested, it would be on the front page of the Daily Record.

Michael Matheson: More than the Record, I suspect.

My point is that we need to allow officers that flexibility so that, where they think it appropriate to read out the letter of rights, it can be read out for people. However, once members recognise that the letter is five pages long, they will acknowledge that a significant amount of time and police resource would be taken up to read it out for every single individual, irrespective of whether they require it to be read out.

Amendment 113 agreed to.
Amendment 235 not moved.
Section 2, as amended, agreed to.

Section 3—Information to be given on arrest
Amendment 114 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
Amendment 236 not moved.
Section 3, as amended, agreed to.

Section 4—Arrested person to be taken to police station
The Convener: Amendment 115, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendment 118.

Michael Matheson: Amendment 115 will amend section 4 to require the police to release an arrested person before reaching a police station, if the person is no longer suspected of an offence. The bill would currently require the police, where an arrest has taken place outwith a police station, to take every arrested person to a police station, even if they were no longer suspected of an offence. The amendment will ensure that people who are no longer suspects need not be held in custody unnecessarily in order to transport them to a police station. Information about all arrests must still be recorded under section 6. It will not be the case, therefore, that the power of release will encourage misuse of the system and an “Arrest first, ask questions later” approach by the police.

11:30
Amendment 118 is consequential on amendment 115 and will require the police to record the reasons for deciding that a person is no longer a suspect and releasing them before their arrival at a police station. The recording of such decision making will give further reassurance that arrest and subsequent release can be assessed and scrutinised.

I move amendment 115.
Amendment 115 agreed to.
Amendment 237 not moved.
Section 4, as amended, agreed to.

Section 5—Information to be given at police station
The Convener: Amendment 238, in the name of Alison McInnes, has been debated with amendment 113.

Alison McInnes: As the cabinet secretary has indicated a willingness to work with me on the intention behind amendment 238 in advance of stage 3, I will not move it.

Amendments 238, 239, 10, 11 and 240 not moved.
Section 5 agreed to.

Section 6—Information to be recorded by police
The Convener: Amendment 116, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 117, 121, 124, 132, 133, 138, 140, 194, 205 and 221.

Michael Matheson: The group consists of miscellaneous minor technical amendments that are intended primarily to maintain consistency in the drafting of the bill. Amendment 116 is the most substantive of them and will amend section 6(1), which specifies the information that must be recorded when a person is arrested. The amendment makes it clear that the recording requirements in section 6 relate only to arrest by the police, and not to arrest by a citizen, for example.

Amendments 117, 121, 124, 132, 133, 138, 140, 205 and 221 are technical amendments to sections 6, 8, 11, 36, 50 and 54. They will ensure consistency in terminology and easier reading of the provisions.

Amendment 194 is a technical amendment to section 39, which preserves the common-law powers of the police in relation to people who have been arrested. Those include the power to have the person take part in identification parades. The amendment replaces the reference to “identification parade” with a reference to “identification procedure”, which will make it clear that the police retain common-law powers in relation to all identification procedures, including identification parades and more modern video identification procedures.

I move amendment 116.
Amendment 116 agreed to.
Amendments 117 and 118 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 119, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendment 148.

Michael Matheson: People who are accused of certain sexual offences, including rape and sexual assault, are prohibited from conducting their own defence. That protects victims and witnesses from the potential trauma of being cross-examined by the accused. Amendments 119 and 148 restate the existing law, which requires that suspects who are arrested under a warrant in connection with those offences, or who are charged with those sexual offences, be informed that they cannot conduct their own defence and must, instead, engage the services of a lawyer, failing which the court will do so. The amendments will not change the law but will update the approach and terminology to ensure consistency with part 1.

Amendment 119 will require the police to record the details of their compliance with the requirements that are set out in amendment 148. Amendment 148 is the principal amendment and restates the existing law in section 17A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Amendment 119 is consequential and auxiliary.

I move amendment 119.

Amendment 119 agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 120, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 170, 171, 176, 180, 181 and 188.

Michael Matheson: The amendments, in conjunction with related amendments in the two groups on rights of under 18s—the first is on “consent to interview without solicitor present, sending of intimation and access to other person, other support” and the second is on “minor amendments”—make additional provision for the protection of under 18s in police custody. The amendments have specific regard to child protection and wellbeing issues.

Amendment 120 will require the police to record the time at which intimation was sent to a local authority to establish whether or not there are likely to be child protection issues that would prevent intimation from being sent, under section 30 of the bill, that the person was in custody. The amendment is dependent on amendment 188.

Amendments 170 and 171 will allow the police to delay for a child suspect, on safeguarding and wellbeing grounds, the sending of intimation under section 30, but only for as long as is necessary to consult the local authority on whether it will arrange for someone to visit the child in custody. It is expected that the process will, in practice, be used when the police believe that some form of child protection consideration may exist.

Amendments 180 and 181 are technical amendments that are designed to improve the drafting of the bill. The amendments in the group are also associated with amendments in group 21 on “Rights of under 18s: minor amendments”. The amendments will ensure that when it is not practical for the police to contact the person that they have been asked to contact, when the person who has been contacted refuses to attend, or when the local authority advises against contacting the person, the police do not have to contact the person or continue to try to contact them, as may be the case. In that case, the police must send intimation to an appropriate person, as defined in section 31(5) of the bill.

On intimation and access arrangements in respect of persons who are under 18 years of age who are being held in custody, amendment 188 will ensure that the police take cognisance of compulsory supervision orders that have been set by a children’s hearing or a sheriff court. The effect of the amendment will be to ensure that the police will, when they believe that a person is subject to such an order, contact the relevant local authority for advice on how to apply, in compliance with the terms of the order, the intimation and access rights that are set out in sections 30 and 32.

Furthermore, the obligation to involve the local authority goes wider than compulsory supervision order cases to capture circumstances in which a supervision order may not exist but the police have concerns about the child’s wellbeing. The concerns may be significant child protection concerns or there might be other forms of statutory restriction in place in respect of the child—for example, a court-issued child protection order or a compulsory supervision order that restricts contact or directs that no contact takes place, which would both mean that the usual steps of contacting a child’s parent or guardian may not be appropriate. Amendment 188 will in such cases require the police to contact the local authority for advice on who should, under section 30, be sent intimation and be permitted access to the person in custody.

Amendment 176 provides that when a local authority, acting under the provision that will be inserted by amendment 188, has advised against sending intimation in accordance with section 30, intimation must be sent—in accordance—to an appropriate person, as defined in section 31(4). I ask the committee to support the amendments.

I move amendment 120.

Amendment 120 agreed to.

Amendment 121 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
The Convener: Amendment 122, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 123, 12, 125, 13, 126 to 131, 14, 134, 15, 16, 135 to 137, 17, 139 and 141.

Michael Matheson: Although the amendments all relate to keeping a person in custody under chapter 2 of part 1 of the bill, they address four distinct issues. Most of my amendments, and amendments 13 to 17 in the name of John Pentland, deal with the proposal to allow the maximum detention period to be extended from 12 to 24 hours. I will address that issue first before moving on to amendment 12, in the name of John Finnie, which relates to the rank at which decisions on whether to keep a person in custody should be made. I will then speak to amendment 130, which will make a minor adjustment to the test for whether a person can be kept in custody. Finally, I will cover amendments 139 and 141, which relate to the time spent travelling from hospital to the police station.

A key purpose of the custody provisions in chapter 2 is to strike an appropriate balance and ensure that no one is held unnecessarily or disproportionately and that the rights of suspects and victims are protected while the police have the flexibility to carry out effective investigations. The bill allows a person to be kept in custody for a maximum of 12 hours. That is a 12-hour reduction from the current detention period, which allows extensions to 24 hours. The system is designed to ensure that suspects are detained for only as long as is absolutely necessary, and the detention limit is not a target but an absolute maximum.

Strong safeguards are built into the system. The initial custody decision must be made by a police officer who has not been involved in the investigation, and a mandatory custody review must be carried out by an inspector after six hours. Keeping someone in custody can be authorised only if there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that they have committed an offence and if keeping them in custody is necessary and proportionate, with account being taken of the nature and seriousness of the offence, the need to enable the offence to be investigated and the likelihood of interference with witnesses and evidence. Section 41 also places a general duty on every constable to “take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held”

in custody.

Conflicting views were expressed at stage 1 on the detention time limits, and the Scottish Government made a commitment to considering an extension of the detention time limit to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances. Having considered the arguments further, I believe that it is necessary to allow the extension from 12 to 24 hours. I am satisfied that the bill contains appropriate safeguards to ensure that the power will be used properly and that such extensions will not become commonplace.

It is possible to extend detention periods up to a maximum of 24 hours under the current legislation, but not under the bill as introduced, so the police would have to release suspects in some serious and complex cases if the 12-hour period were to expire before they had obtained sufficient evidence to charge the suspects with an offence. That would not prevent suspects from being arrested and charged later, but releasing them could endanger public safety or interfere with the proper investigation of offences.

The current power to extend detention periods to 24 hours is used in only a very small number—less than 0.5 per cent—of cases, which demonstrates that the police make appropriate and proportionate use of the power and that it is used only in exceptional cases. The power to extend is necessary in those cases, many of which involve serious and complex offences.

Various factors can contribute to creating exceptional circumstances in which an extension might be required. The factors that could combine to require an extension to 24 hours tend to involve the timing of the start of interviews rather than the length of those interviews, and the purpose of an extension would be to ensure that interviews are conducted in circumstances that are fair to the suspect and the victims and which allow the police to conclude inquiries properly and gather sufficient evidence in order to charge a suspect. Suspects and victims might be too exhausted, traumatised, drunk or under the influence of drugs to be interviewed immediately after a suspect is arrested and brought to a police station.

11:45

Urgent work might be needed to interview victims, to trace witnesses and to conduct other investigations. It might not be in the interest of public safety or the safety of the victim or suspects to release a person who is suspected of a serious and violent offence on investigative liberation while such investigations take place.

In some cases, it is considered best practice to examine a crime scene during daylight hours, even if an initial arrest took place at night. That may apply, for example, to the examination of bedclothes at a rape scene. Forensic medical examination may be required before interviews can take place. In areas of rural Scotland, victims and suspects may need to travel to specialist police medical suites or for examination by a police casualty surgeon. If a 12-hour detention limit was applied, the examinations and the travel times involved might reduce the time that remained for conducting interviews.

Other people, such as interpreters and appropriate adults, may be required before interviews can commence. It is in the interests of justice and human rights that such people are present at interviews, but it may take time to assess what support is required for a suspect and to arrange for a specialist to attend. Delays are possible if a suspect’s needs are not immediately identified because they were drunk or on drugs.

Those factors can reduce the available time for conducting interviews. In complex cases, extending the detention period beyond 12 hours may become necessary to conduct an effective investigation. I have therefore lodged amendments 122, 123, 125 to 129, 131, 134 and 135 to 137 to make provision for extending detention limits from 12 to 24 hours. Amendments 13 to 17, which John Pentland lodged, would make similar provision. I propose to deal with my amendments before moving on to consider his amendments.

Amendment 135 is the primary amendment to allow the detention limit to be extended to 24 hours. The power to extend is limited to serious offences, and it will be subject to safeguards to ensure that it is used only when absolutely necessary. The safeguards include a requirement for authorisation at inspector level and provision for the suspect to make representations. The existing safeguards in the bill will also apply, including the statutory test for keeping people in custody, mandatory custody reviews at six hours and the general duty under section 41 not to detain people unreasonably or unnecessarily.

The safeguards will ensure that extensions to detention periods can be authorised only in exceptional circumstances. Extensions are tempered by the safeguard of regular review, as recommended by the Carloway report.

My other amendments are all intended to ensure that the new powers to authorise extension are appropriately woven into the existing provisions about providing and recording information and conducting custody reviews. That includes the reorganisation of sections and adjustments to terminology.

Amendments 122 and 123 deal with recording information. Information about the authorisation process and the rationale for extending the period must be recorded. When initial authorisation is given to keep a person in custody under section 7, amendment 125 will require them to be told that their detention period may be extended.

Amendments 126 and 127 amend section 9. Amendment 126 will ensure that a custody review is carried out after the first six hours of an extension. Amendment 127 makes drafting adjustments. Amendment 129 amends section 10 to ensure that the test of necessity and proportionality must be met when deciding whether to keep someone in custody beyond the initial 12-hour period. Amendments 128 and 131 move sections 9 and 10 to after section 12. Amendment 134 amends section 11 to require the police to charge or release someone once any extension to 24 hours has expired. Amendment 136 requires the police to give a person certain information when authorisation has been given to extend the detention period beyond the 12-hour point. Amendment 137 is a technical amendment to allow time that is spent travelling to or from hospital or at hospital to be deducted from the extension period.

Amendments 13 to 17 were lodged by John Pentland. I wholly support the principle of allowing the detention period to be extended from 12 to 24 hours in exceptional circumstances, so I welcome the intention behind his amendments. However, I do not believe that they would offer the same protection to suspects as the amendments that I just outlined would. I therefore ask Elaine Murray not to move amendments 13 to 17.

John Pentland’s amendment 15 would permit an extension up to 24 hours when both the current custody test under section 10 and the additional test of exceptional circumstances were met. Amendments 12 to 14, 16 and 17 are consequential on amendment 15.

My amendments will offer suspects greater protection than amendment 15 would. In particular, my amendments will ensure that an extension can be granted only in relation to serious offences. They will ensure that suspects can make representations about a proposed extension. They will require a custody review by an inspector after six hours and will set out a much more detailed requirement for recording and providing information.

I do not believe that the exceptional circumstances test is necessary. I am satisfied that the existing power to extend the detention period is used only in exceptional circumstances and that the safeguards that are set out in the bill will continue to ensure that that is the case. Setting out an exceptional circumstances test would further complicate the statutory test and create a risk of preventing extensions in cases in which they were genuinely needed.

Amendment 12, in John Finnie’s name, would provide that, when a person was arrested without a warrant and was not charged with an offence, authorisation to keep them in custody could be given only by an officer of the rank of sergeant or above. In many of the more rural custody stations, the duty custody officer may be a constable. There has to be a justifiable reason for continued detention, which has to be authorised by an officer who is not connected with the case. That provides an independent overview of the initial arrest and the continued detention.

Custody officers are trained in custody procedures and prisoner welfare. The authorisation to keep a person in custody also starts the 12-hour period for someone who is not officially accused. A duty custody officer of the rank of constable is perfectly able to carry out that function and afford people their rights. Amendment 12 proposes an unnecessary restriction on current practice that would lead to an increase in the requirement for sergeants across Scotland, even if authorisation were given remotely. The amendment would also lead to delays in the start of the 12-hour period as a result of waiting for an officer of a suitable rank to become available. For that reason, I cannot support the amendment and I ask John Finnie not to move it.

Amendment 130 makes a small clarification to the key test in section 10 for whether a person can be kept in custody. The test applies to the initial decision to keep someone in custody following their arrest. It also applies when the inspectors conduct custody reviews after someone has been in custody for six hours.

The police officer who decides to keep someone in custody must be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that they have committed an offence and that keeping them in custody is necessary and proportionate for the purposes of bringing them before a court or otherwise dealing with them in accordance with the law. Several factors may be taken into account in deciding what is necessary and proportionate. One of those is whether the person’s presence is reasonably required to enable the offence to be investigated.

Amendment 130 will clarify that, when deciding whether to keep someone in custody, the police may consider whether the person’s presence is required to enable the offence to be investigated fully. That has always been the intended effect of section 10. The amendment makes it absolutely clear that police have the ability to undertake a full investigation of an offence while a suspect is held in custody, subject to continued custody being necessary and proportionate for the purposes of bringing the suspect before a court or otherwise dealing with them in accordance with the law.

It is also important to note that section 41 will still apply, to ensure that police “must take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held” in custody. Amendment 130 will protect the balance between the public interest in ensuring a thorough and effective investigation and the rights of suspects, as recommended by Lord Carloway and reflected throughout part 1.

I turn to amendments 139 and 141. The bill already provides that the time that is taken to escort a person to a hospital for medical treatment and any time that is spent in hospital are not to be deducted from the 12-hour detention period, but it does not take account of the time that the return journey takes. In more remote areas of the country, a return journey from hospital could take a considerable time, so amendment 139 provides that the time that is taken to transport an individual back from hospital will not be deducted from the 12-hour detention period. That will ensure that there is still sufficient time to interview suspects effectively once they arrive at the police station.

Amendment 141 will protect suspects by ensuring that, should a suspect be interviewed while travelling from hospital to a police station, the time that is spent interviewing them will count towards the 12-hour limit.

I move amendment 122.

The Convener: Thank you, cabinet secretary. You will be glad to have a rest after that.

John Finnie: I am always keen to ensure that all our legislation is rural proofed.

The Convener: We know that, John.

John Finnie: I am acutely aware of the fact that the number of locations where people can be taken into custody in rural areas is diminishing.

Amendment 12 seeks to change the rank of the police officer who may authorise keeping someone in custody from constable to sergeant. Many, including the Law Society of Scotland, welcome Lord Carloway’s recommendation that the maximum time for which a suspect can be held without being charged or advised that he or she is to be reported to the procurator fiscal should be 12 hours.

Elsewhere in legislation, the appropriate constable is someone above the rank of inspector. I do not accept the idea that authorisation cannot be given remotely or the idea that there can be an independent overview but it cannot be exercised by someone of a supervisory rank. It is anomalous to have a constable authorising a peer’s decision making in relation to the deprivation of liberty. That is a retrograde step rather than an advance, so I certainly intend to move and press amendment 12.

Elaine Murray: John Pentland’s amendments 13 to 17 were intended to address the issue that, in exceptional circumstances, the police might have to extend the period of custody from 12 hours up to 24 hours. His amendments specify circumstances in which that might be the case, such as when the person is under the influence of drugs or alcohol and is therefore unfit to be interviewed, when support for the person cannot be accessed before the end of the 12-hour period or when it is essential for their or another person’s safety that the person remains in custody. A decision to extend the period in custody could be taken only by a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

As the cabinet secretary said, the Government’s amendments in the group fulfil the same policy intention but are more technically competent as they apply to sections of the bill that are not covered in John Pentland’s amendments. Today, the cabinet secretary is supported by an army of Government officials, whereas members who are not in the party of the Scottish Government are reliant on the efforts of the Parliament’s legislation team. While those efforts are sterling, they are made by only two or three people, who have to deal with several bills at the same time. For that reason, I am prepared to admit that the Scottish Government’s amendments are possibly more technically correct, so I am happy not to move John Pentland’s amendments and will support the cabinet secretary’s amendments.

I am very sympathetic to the intention of John Finnie’s amendment 12. Like him, I have every interest in ensuring that people who are kept in custody in rural areas are dealt with appropriately, and I cannot see why it would not be possible for a sergeant to be available remotely, rather than a sergeant having to be available in the custody area. I am therefore inclined to support amendment 12.

Alison McInnes: The cabinet secretary’s amendments in this group seek to extend the length of time for which anyone can be kept in custody to 24 hours in some circumstances. The evidence that the committee received on the issue at stage 1 was mixed, so we should be extremely cautious about departing from Lord Carloway’s view. The cabinet secretary has set out a reasonable case, but I remain concerned about the situation of children and vulnerable young people.

Without wishing to get ahead of myself, I think that my support for the Government’s amendments will be contingent on the Government backing my amendment 242 in the next group, which limits to six hours the length of time for which children and vulnerable adults can be held in custody. In conscience, I could not countenance extending the limit to 24 hours without additional provision being made for safeguards for children and vulnerable adults.

12:00

The Convener: You are getting ahead of yourself. We will come to that. I call Margaret Mitchell, to be followed by Roddy Campbell.

Margaret Mitchell: I speak in favour of John Finnie’s amendment 12, which is sensible. I see no reason why authorisation could not be given remotely, and the amendment gives added protection to people in rural areas as well as those in urban settings.

Roderick Campbell: I want to comment briefly on the key amendment 135. It provides, in addition to the provisions under section 41 on not detaining people unreasonably or unnecessarily, that authorisation has to be given by an inspector, and it applies only to serious or indictable offences. Another bit of the amendment, which has not been mentioned, is that the inspector who gives authorisation has to satisfy himself that “the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously”, so it is not a laggard’s charter. These should be rare occurrences.

Michael Matheson: The reasons that I outlined for not supporting John Finnie’s amendment 12 stand, notwithstanding the points that Mr Finnie made with regard to the issue.

It is worth reflecting that the issue is about the quality of the decision making in a particular instance with regard to retaining someone in custody, and I am not convinced that higher rank will always lead to better decision making in these matters. A significant level of training is provided to constables, particularly those who have custodial responsibilities.

John Finnie: Will the cabinet secretary take an intervention?

The Convener: Let the cabinet secretary continue, then you can come in.

Michael Matheson: There is a growing level of specialism, with many policing responsibilities being made role specific as opposed to rank specific. Constables of whatever rank who fulfil specialist roles have a greater knowledge and understanding of a specific issue than those who do not deal with those matters on a day-to-day basis, who may be of a higher rank. Custody division is now a specialist role area due to the intensive training that is given to those officers on prisoner welfare and custody-related procedures, including the various pieces of guidance issued by the Lord Advocate.

We remain of the view that the decision making should be held at the position of constable.
The Convener: Before you go on, cabinet secretary, John Finnie wants in to say something about that.

John Finnie: I am not absolutely certain how custody division is configured, but I refer to what you said about the nature of rural areas, cabinet secretary. I am not casting any aspersions on the role of constable. I was one for 30 years and I absolutely acknowledge that it is the front-line, pivotal role. Constables will stand and fall by the decisions that they take on depriving someone of their liberty. My suggestion is that that would be enhanced by independent oversight. Custody division would not be there in a remote location, anyway, and the idea that people could phone and not get a sergeant anywhere in Scotland seems peculiar, to say the least.

Michael Matheson: The key here is not the rank but having someone with the appropriate knowledge and skills. Given that, it might be a constable who is contacted remotely for the purpose of getting a period of custody extended. It is about making sure that the officer has the necessary knowledge and skills to make the decision.

The committee will come to a decision on whether it believes that sergeant or constable is the appropriate rank for making those decisions. I welcome Elaine Murray’s decision not to move John Pentland’s amendments.

Amendment 122 agreed to.

Amendment 123 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 123 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Pentland, John (South of Scotland) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2.

Amendment 123 agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

Section 7—Authorisation for keeping in custody

Amendment 12 moved—[John Finnie].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 12 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 12 agreed to.

Section 7, as amended, agreed to.

After section 7

The Convener: Amendment 242, in the name of Alison McInnes, is in a group on its own.

Alison McInnes: The bill states that anyone can be held in custody for up to 12 hours. Members will recall that there were mixed views among witnesses on whether that length of time is appropriate. Some advocated the reintroduction of the six-hour limit while others favoured extending the limit to 24 hours in exceptional cases.

Shelagh McCall of the Scottish Human Rights Commission told the committee:

“Parliament should think carefully about whether it is ever appropriate to hold a child or a vulnerable adult for more than six hours.”—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 8 October 2013; c 3356.]

Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, Tam Baillie, also drew attention to the need for stringent safeguards. The bill does not include any exceptions or variations, but there is a strong argument for reducing the 12 or 24-hour limit to six hours for children and vulnerable adults. That would recognise their unique vulnerability and the additional impact that being held in custody for long periods could have on them.

Amendment 242 would also encourage the police to deal with children and young people’s cases as priorities and help to ensure that they are in custody for the shortest possible time. If further investigations are required after the six-hour period in custody has expired, there would be the option of an investigative liberation.

I move amendment 242.

Elaine Murray: I admit that there were differences of opinion on the issue, but I do not agree that the limit should be six hours. That would cover some people who were under investigation for fairly serious offences. If the amendment was redrafted to say that a child or vulnerable adult could not be kept in detention for more than 12 hours, I might be inclined to support it, but six hours is too short a time.

Roderick Campbell: I agree with Elaine Murray on that point. I hope that the number of children affected would be very small.

John Finnie: A number of years ago, prior to external events affecting the police service, six hours was more than adequate.

Michael Matheson: Amendment 242 would prevent children and vulnerable adult suspects from being kept in custody for more than six hours. I strongly believe that we need to protect the rights of children and vulnerable adult suspects within the justice system, but the amendment would undermine one of the fundamental purposes of the bill and prevent serious crime from being properly investigated.

It is vital that all offences can be properly investigated in the interests of justice. In doing that, it is also vital to protect the rights of suspects. The fundamental purpose that underlies the bill is to balance those sometimes competing interests. That involves providing additional support and protections to ensure that children and vulnerable suspects are not disadvantaged in the justice process.

The Carloway review considered those issues in great detail, and the bill already reflects the delicate balance between the interests that the review identified. It provides strong protection to ensure that no one is held unnecessarily or disproportionately. That includes the test of necessity and proportionality under section 10, the requirement for custody reviews after six hours and the general duty on all constables to “take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody” under section 41.

When a child is involved, the police will have to treat their wellbeing as a primary consideration in any decision to keep them in custody. When a person has been held in custody for six hours, section 9 of the bill requires a custody review to be carried out by an inspector who has not been involved in the investigation, and the person must be released if it is no longer necessary and proportionate for them to be kept in custody. That important process ensures that any period that is spent in custody is tempered by the safeguard of regular review, as recommended in the Carloway report.

In relation to vulnerable adult suspects, the bill already strengthens the protection that is available, placing a duty on the police to seek support to ensure that such individuals understand what is happening and are able to communicate effectively, and preventing vulnerable persons from consenting to be interviewed without a solicitor being present. As is currently the case, the police will continue to balance the interests of justice with the particular circumstances, needs and vulnerabilities of the person who is being interviewed.

The bill also provides additional protection for children that includes the requirement to safeguard and promote the child’s wellbeing as a primary consideration when custody decisions are made. Where custody is necessary and proportionate, the child must be kept in a place of safety rather than a police station, and protections are incorporated in the bill with regard to intimation to and attendance of parents or other persons at the custody centre.

In operational practice, Police Scotland attempts to ensure that children and young people are kept in custody for as short a time as possible. When very minor crimes are committed by children, it is common for them not to be taken to a custody centre but, rather, to be taken home and, if it is deemed necessary, cautioned or charged in front of their parents or carers. When children are in custody, the police’s standard operating procedure states that, if they are to be detained for more than four hours, a custody inspector must review the case.

Currently, most people are released after six hours, but that period is not adequate in all cases. Police Scotland has provided assurances that children and vulnerable adults will be held past six hours only in a small number of cases and that it will ensure that robust operational guidance and monitoring are in place in relation to that power.

Before part 1 of the bill is brought into force, Police Scotland will update its standard operating procedures in relation to custody to ensure that they are in line with the new arrest and custody regime, and that process will include updating existing guidance documents on dealing with children and vulnerable adults in the custody system. Police Scotland will work with stakeholder groups to ensure that the guidance documents ensure that appropriate protection is provided to children and vulnerable adults in custody.
However, there will be cases where it is necessary to hold a child or a vulnerable adult for more than six hours. Children and vulnerable adults can be suspected of very serious or complex offences, and the interests of justice demand that such offences be fully investigated. It would not be in the interests of justice to require certain suspects to be released after six hours regardless of whether the offence has been properly investigated and whether it would otherwise be necessary and proportionate to hold them. I therefore cannot support amendment 242, and I ask Alison McInnes to consider withdrawing it.

Alison McInnes: Elaine Murray said that, if I had lodged an amendment that changed the period to 12 hours, she might have been able to support it, but when I lodged amendment 242, we had not seen the minister’s amendment that changes the period in the bill from 12 hours to 24 hours.

The minister spoke about the delicate balance that Lord Carloway had regard to in relation to the rights of suspects and the responsibility to investigate crime, but the minister’s amendment affects that delicate balance. It is therefore all the more important that children’s and vulnerable adults’ rights are protected, so I press amendment 242.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 242 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

Abstentions

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2.

Amendment 125 agreed to.

Amendment 13 not moved.

Section 8, as amended, agreed to.

Section 9—Review after 6 hours

Amendment 126 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 126 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (Liberal Democrats)

Abstentions

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2.

Amendment 126 agreed to.

Amendment 127 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 9, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 128 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 10—Test for sections 7 and 9

Amendment 129 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 129 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.
The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Graha, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Abstentions
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2.

Amendment 129 agreed to.

Amendment 130 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

12:15
The Convener: At last we get to Mary Fee. She has been sitting here for a long time.

Amendment 39, in the name of Mary Fee, is grouped with amendments 110, 41 to 45 and 260.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): My amendments are designed to ensure that the issues that are faced by children and young people who are affected by their parents' involvement in the justice system are flagged up as part of early intervention and prevention procedures.

As the committee will know from the meeting on 8 September, I wish to see at all stages of the justice process more recognition of children and young people who are affected by their parents' offending behaviour, starting from the point of arrest. We need a more joined-up approach to supporting those children, which should include a raft of agencies, including the police. If the amendments are not accepted, I hope to receive reassurances from the cabinet secretary that the intentions behind them can be addressed in other, non-legislative ways.

More needs to be done to encourage the police to consider the impact of arresting a parent on their dependent children. There is undoubtedly a role for the named person to play. I would welcome the cabinet secretary's comments on how that can be done more effectively.

Amendment 39 would ensure that the factors to be met as part of the test in section 10 for keeping a person in custody under section 7(4) and for reviewing continuation of custody after six hours under section 9(2) would include the impact on the person's dependent child or children.

Section 10(2)(a) provides that one of the factors that the police may consider as part of that test is “whether the person’s presence is reasonably required to enable the offence to be investigated”.

That recognises that the police can investigate an offence without necessarily requiring the person to be kept in custody. The amendment would extend that recognition to ensure that the police, in deciding whether to keep the person in custody, should also consider the impact of keeping the person in custody on the person's dependent child or children. That factor must be taken into account in cases in which it might not be necessary for the police to keep the person in custody in order to investigate the offence. That is particularly important where the person is the primary or sole carer for any dependent child or children.

Amendment 110 outlines the procedures to be followed by the police when a person with a dependent child or children is arrested for a serious offence or is a repeat offender and the police consider that that behaviour may have an impact on the wellbeing of any dependent children, they must share that information with the named person.

The Scottish Government's own guidance on the named person states:

“Practitioners should not wait until a situation has reached crisis point before sharing information. They should also share when there are smaller changes. This allows patterns to emerge—and these can often point to more serious concerns, allowing appropriate help to be offered at an early stage.”

Amendment 110 is necessary because, although a child's own offending behaviour is an obvious and visible wellbeing concern, children who are affected by their parents' offending will not always be present or visible to the police, so there needs to be a trigger. The amendment would ensure that the police are always thinking about any dependent children whom a suspected offender may have and are consistently asking the question and considering at what point the behaviour of the suspected offender may start to have an effect on the wellbeing of any dependent children.

Amendments 41 to 45 are fairly minor amendments that provide clarification. They would extend the duty in section 42 to ensure that the best interests of any dependent children are taken... into account when arresting, holding, interviewing or charging a person with responsibility for a child. In 2012, the UK, with the Scottish Government’s support, accepted a recommendation made in the course of the UK’s human rights peer review at the UN Human Rights Council that asked the UK to ensure that the best interests of the child are taken into account when arresting, detaining, sentencing or considering early release for a sole or primary carer of a child. My amendments are consistent with that recommendation. Section 42 of the bill seeks to integrate the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child into Scottish criminal justice legislation. That is to be welcomed.

The focus on the best interests and wellbeing of the child as paramount is a positive step forward in ensuring that children and young people are treated appropriately within the criminal justice system. However, children and young people can also be indirectly drawn into the criminal justice system through the offending behaviour of their parents or primary care givers. My amendments would require a constable to consider the best interests of an offender’s dependent children, from point of arrest through to being charged. That will help to ensure that the needs of those often forgotten children are met and that their wellbeing is considered a priority during what is often a trying period of their care givers’ time in the criminal justice system. The more opportunities that there are, the more likely that a suspect will disclose that information. Only with the right information can statutory services link up and ensure that the right care and support is provided to children and young people affected by their parents’ offending behaviour.

I move amendment 39.

Michael Matheson: Children can be seriously affected by parental arrest, custody and imprisonment. While there are already areas of good practice, I agree that we need to ensure a consistent multi-agency approach to addressing the impact on children when a parent is arrested or held in custody. That requires strong links between the justice system, statutory services and the voluntary organisations that work with children and families affected by imprisonment.

I have taken on board what Mary Fee has said regarding the interests and wellbeing of children during initial arrest. Mary Fee has met the Minister for Children and Young People on the matter, which I hope has gone some way to reassure her of our commitment to work with her to ensure that the intent behind her amendments is given effect.

I can reassure Mary Fee that the Scottish Government will take steps to address her concerns through implementation of the legislation and through guidance and practice material, under the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014, to the police and other relevant agencies to ensure that the interests of children are properly protected. My officials are already engaged with stakeholders to ensure that that happens.

I support and commend the intention behind Mary Fee’s amendments, but I believe that there are more effective ways to achieve the desired outcome of keeping children safe. As drafted, the amendments would alter the carefully balanced decision-making process for arresting, holding and charging adult suspects.

The bill is designed to deliver a balance between the rights of suspects and the powers of the police in order to serve the interests of justice. That was what was envisaged in the independent Carloway review. Police will be alert to the interests of the child while carrying out their duties under the bill. The police would never act in a way that would leave a child open to danger. While the member’s amendments pursue the aims of protecting children affected by parental arrest and custody, that aim can be better achieved through the implementation of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

Amendment 39 would add to the test already contained in section 10 of the bill regarding custody decisions. That is a key test under the bill. It is used at various stages to decide whether a suspect can be kept in custody. It balances the needs of the police to manage a criminal investigation and the rights of the suspect, taking into consideration the needs of inquiry and public safety.

Amendments 39 and 42 would require the police to treat suspects with responsibility for children differently. In such cases, the effect on the child of keeping the person in custody would have to be a primary concern in making the decision on custody. As we know, children are affected by the arrest of their parents, but making that a primary concern when deciding whether to take someone into or keep someone in custody would be out of balance with the already finely balanced test contained in section 10. The interests of justice and public safety must remain primary considerations when making decisions about whether it is in the interests of justice and proportionate to deprive a person of their liberty.

Making custody decisions on that basis does not prevent the police from working to ensure that the immediate care and support needs of affected children are also met; in fact, that is part of their daily business. The police maintain a duty of care over the arrested person, and that duty naturally extends to any dependent children who have been left exposed by that arrest. It must be remembered that part of their core role is to keep all people safe. If the police become aware of concerns about any child’s wellbeing, they will take immediate steps to ensure the child’s safety, be that tracing another parent or relative, engaging social work or bringing the child into a safe environment, and such work is often done through a close working relationship with social work partners. I believe that a case-specific approach is both preferable and more practicable than the catch-all approach that has been suggested in Mary Fee’s amendments.

Amendment 110 seeks to ensure that when a person with parental responsibilities for a child is arrested the police contact the child’s named person as identified in part 4 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014. It would never be the case that, once the police were made aware of a wellbeing concern, they would leave a child to fend for themselves without taking action to ensure that the child’s welfare needs were addressed. Under the 2014 act, the police have a duty to share relevant information relating to a child’s wellbeing with the named person service when appropriate.

Amendments 41 to 45 seek to add to the test already contained in section 42 for child suspects. The current test set out in that section requires the police to take account of the wellbeing of the child before arresting, holding or charging them, and it seeks to ensure that, whatever the circumstances, children are arrested, held or charged appropriately and proportionately. The amendments would extend the test to cover all people with “responsibility for a child”. In effect, before the police decided to arrest someone, hold them in custody, question or charge them, they would have to consider the wellbeing of any children for whom they might have responsibility. That would be out of step with the test already contained in the bill, which is intended to strike a balance between the public interest in investigating crime and protecting public safety and the rights of suspects.

Under amendment 260, which has been substituted for amendment 46, the scope of the definition of “responsibility for a child” is very wide and covers many people who might have legal responsibilities for children but who are not responsible for their care and support on a day-to-day basis. It is important to acknowledge that the police already take steps to identify any childcare issues of persons who are arrested and take necessary steps to ensure the wellbeing of children who are cared for in partnership with social work colleagues. The police also play a significant role in their localities in protecting children. Amendment 260, as drafted, could make the assessment that they currently undertake more about wellbeing than about the wellbeing and child protection that they assess at the moment. We do not want to lower the level of or lose the current practice that the police already carry out.

My colleague Aileen Campbell would be happy to meet Mary Fee ahead of stage 3 to update her on the progress with the development of practice material for children who are affected by parental detention and how that can better address their needs.

I therefore ask the member not to press amendment 39.

Mary Fee: I will be brief as I am conscious of the time. I thank the cabinet secretary for his mostly supportive comments. He was right to say that I have met the Minister for Children and Young People, and I am glad that he acknowledges that more work can be done on these matters. I am keen that we find a way to support this really vulnerable group of children and young people.

Given the comments that the cabinet secretary has made and his commitment to work with both me and other stakeholders, I am happy not to move my amendment 39.

12:30
The Convener: You have moved it. Do you wish to withdraw it?

Mary Fee: Sorry—yes.

Amendment 39, by agreement, withdrawn.

Section 10, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 131 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: I advise members that I am going to press on for a little so that we can get to the end of section 13, because most of the amendments have already been debated.

Section 11—12 hour limit: general rule

Amendments 132 and 133 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 14 not moved.

Amendment 134 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 134 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Abstentions
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2.
Amendment 134 agreed to.
Section 11, as amended, agreed to.

After section 11
Amendment 15 not moved.

Section 12—12 hour limit: previous period
Amendment 16 not moved.
Section 12 agreed to.

After section 12
Amendment 135 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 135 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)

Abstentions
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 7, Against 0, Abstentions 2.
Amendment 135 agreed to.
Amendment 136 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 13—Medical treatment
Amendment 137 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
Amendment 17 not moved.
Amendments 138 to 141 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
Section 13, as amended, agreed to.

The Convener: That concludes the amendment process for today, but we will return to amendments next week. I hope that you have the stamina, cabinet secretary, because I think that it is going to be an even longer session.

I will suspend the meeting for a couple of minutes.

12:33
Meeting suspended.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

4th Marshalled List of Amendments for Stage 2

The Bill will be considered in the following order—

Sections 57 to 61 Schedule 2
Sections 62 to 87 Schedule 3
Sections 1 to 52 Schedule 1
Sections 53 to 56 Sections 88 to 91
Long Title

Amendments marked * are new (including manuscript amendments) or have been altered.

Section 14

John Finnie
18 In section 14, page 6, line 32, leave out from <and> to end of line 33

Michael Matheson
142 In section 14, page 6, leave out line 33 and insert—

< ( ) either—

(i) the person has not been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, or

(ii) it has not been more than 28 days since the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence.>

Elaine Murray
47 In section 14, page 6, line 35, leave out from <ensuring> to end of line 36 and insert <securing—

(a) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,
(b) that the person does not commit an offence while released,
(c) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into a relevant offence,
(d) the protection of the person, or
(e) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.>

Michael Matheson
143 In section 14, page 6, line 36, at end insert—

<( ) A condition under subsection (2)—

(a) may not require the person to be in a specified place at a specified time,
(b) may require the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period.

John Finnie

19 In section 14, page 6, line 36, at end insert—

<(2A) When imposing a condition under subsection (2), the constable is to specify the period for which the condition is to apply.

(2B) The period specified under subsection (2A) is to be such period, not exceeding 28 days, as the appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(2C) In any case where a person has previously been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, the reference in subsection (2B) to 28 days is to be read as a reference to 28 days minus the number of days on which the person was so subject.>

Michael Matheson

144 In section 14, page 6, line 38, leave out <Chapter 7> and insert <schedule (Breach of liberation condition)>

Michael Matheson

145 In section 14, page 6, line 39, leave out subsection (4)

John Finnie

20 In section 14, page 6, line 39, leave out from <(1)(c)> to end of line 3 on page 7 and insert <(2C)>

Michael Matheson

146 In section 14, page 7, line 7, leave out <inspector> and insert <sergeant>

Section 15

Michael Matheson

147 In section 15, page 7, line 15, leave out from <last> to <14(4)> and insert <day falling 28 days after the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under section 14(2) in connection with a relevant offence>

John Finnie

21 In section 15, page 7, line 15, leave out <28 day period described in section 14(4)> and insert <period specified under section 14(2A)>
Section 17

John Finnie

22 In section 17, page 8, line 17, at end insert <, ( ) to have the period for which the condition applies reduced.>

John Finnie

23 In section 17, page 8, line 20, after <condition> insert <or, as the case may be, the period specified under section 14(2A)>

John Finnie

24 In section 17, page 8, line 21, after <imposed> insert <or, as the case may be, specified>

John Finnie

25 In section 17, page 8, line 23, after <condition> insert <or, as the case may be, specify an alternative period>

John Finnie

26 In section 17, page 8, line 25, after <imposed> insert <or period specified>

John Finnie

27 In section 17, page 8, line 26, at end insert <or, as the case may be, specified under section 14(2A).>

Before section 18

Michael Matheson

148 Before section 18, insert—

<Information to be given if sexual offence>

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant in respect of a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies, or

(b) a person—

(i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and

(ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged by a constable with a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies.

(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—

(a) that the person’s case at, or for the purposes of, any relevant hearing (within the meaning of section 288C(1A) of the 1995 Act) in the course of the proceedings may be conducted only by a lawyer,

(b) that it is, therefore, in the person’s interests to get the professional assistance of a solicitor, and

(c) that if the person does not engage a solicitor for the purposes of the conduct of the person’s case at or for the purposes of the hearing, the court will do so.>
Section 18

Michael Matheson

149 In section 18, page 9, line 1, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

<(2) The person must be brought before a court (unless released from custody under section 19)—

(a) if practicable, before the end of the first day on which the court is sitting after the day on which this subsection began to apply to the person, or

(b) as soon as practicable after that.>

Michael Matheson

101 In section 18, page 9, line 6, at end insert <(by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means)>

After section 18

Michael Matheson

150 After section 18, insert—

<Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), and

(b) either—

(i) a constable believes the person is under 16 years of age, or

(ii) the person is subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(2) The person must (unless released from custody under section 19) be kept in a place of safety until the person can be brought before the court.

(3) The place of safety in which the person is kept must not be a police station unless an appropriate constable certifies that keeping the person in a place of safety other than a police station would be—

(a) impracticable,

(b) unsafe, or

(c) inadvisable due to the person’s state of health (physical or mental).

(4) A certificate under subsection (3) must be produced to the court when the person is brought before it.

(5) In this section—

“an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of inspector or above, “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.>
John Finnie

150A As an amendment to amendment 150, line 21, leave out <inspector> and insert <superintendent>.

Michael Matheson

151 After section 18, insert—

<Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court>

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a person who is 16 years of age or over and subject to a supervision order or under 16 years of age—

(a) is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or
(b) is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) A parent of the person mentioned in subsection (1) (if one can be found) must be informed of the following matters—

(a) the court before which the person is to be brought,
(b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court,
(c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing, and
(d) that the parent’s attendance at the court may be required under section 42 of the 1995 Act.

(3) Subsection (2) does not require any information to be given to a parent if a constable has grounds to believe that giving the parent the information mentioned in that subsection may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person mentioned in subsection (1).

(4) In this section—

“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person mentioned in subsection (1),
“supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Michael Matheson

152 After section 18, insert—

<Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court>

(1) The appropriate local authority must be informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) when—

(a) a person to whom either subsection (2) or (3) applies is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or
(b) a person to whom subsection (2) applies is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) This subsection applies to—

(a) a person who is under 16 years of age,
(b) a person who is—

(i) 16 or 17 years of age, and
(ii) subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(3) This subsection applies to a person if—
   (a) a constable believes the person is 16 or 17 years of age,
   (b) since being arrested, the person has not exercised the right to have intimation sent under section 30, and
   (c) on being informed or reminded of the right to have intimation sent under that section after being officially accused, the person has declined to exercise the right.

(4) The matters referred to in subsection (1) are—
   (a) the court before which the person mentioned in paragraph (a) or (as the case may be) (b) of that subsection is to be brought,
   (b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court, and
   (c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (1), the appropriate local authority is the local authority in whose area the court referred to in subsection (4)(a) sits.

Section 19

Michael Matheson

153 In section 19, page 9, line 20, at end insert—

<( ) Where a person is in custody as mentioned in subsection (1)(a), the person may not be released from custody under subsection (2)(b).>

Section 20

Michael Matheson

154 In section 20, page 9, line 28, at end insert <while subject to the undertaking>

Michael Matheson

155 In section 20, page 9, line 30, leave out from <commit> to end of line 33 and insert—

<(i) commit an offence,
(ii) interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,
(iii) behave in a manner which causes, or is likely to cause, alarm or distress to witnesses,
(b) any further condition that a constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring that any conditions imposed under paragraph (a) are observed.>

Elaine Murray

48 In section 20, page 9, line 32, leave out from <ensuring> to end of line 33 and insert <securing—

(i) that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so,
(ii) that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody,

(iii) the protection of the person, or

(iv) if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.

Michael Matheson

156 In section 20, page 9, line 34, leave out  and insert—

<(a) a condition requiring the person—

(i) to be in a specified place at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain there for a specified period,

(b) a condition requiring the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period>
(2) Sub-paragraph (1) does not apply where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (in which case see paragraph 3).

(3) It is competent to amend a complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under sub-paragraph (1) at any time before the trial of a person in summary proceedings for—
(a) the original offence, or
(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as the original offence.

(4) In sub-paragraph (3), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
(a) an investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
(b) an undertaking was given.

Sentencing for the offence

2 (1) A person who commits an offence under paragraph 1(1) is liable on summary conviction to—
(a) a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or
(b) imprisonment for a period—
(i) where conviction is in the justice of the peace court, not exceeding 60 days,
(ii) where conviction is in the sheriff court, not exceeding 12 months.

(2) A penalty under sub-paragraph (1) may be imposed in addition to any other penalty which it is competent for the court to impose, even if the total of penalties imposed exceeds the maximum penalty which it is competent to impose in respect of the original offence.

(3) The reference in sub-paragraph (2) to a penalty being imposed in addition to another penalty means, in the case of sentences of imprisonment or detention—
(a) where the sentences are imposed at the same time (whether or not in relation to the same complaint), framing the sentences so that they have effect consecutively,
(b) where the sentences are imposed at different times, framing the sentence imposed later so that (if the earlier sentence has not been served) the later sentence has effect consecutive to the earlier sentence.

(4) Sub-paragraph (3)(b) is subject to section 204A (restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners) of the 1995 Act.

(5) Where a person is to be sentenced in respect of an offence under paragraph 1(1), the court may remit the person for sentence in respect of it to any court which is considering the original offence.

(6) In sub-paragraphs (2) and (5), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
(a) the investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
(b) the undertaking was given.

Breach by committing offence

3 (1) This paragraph applies—
(a) where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (“offence O”), but
(b) only if the fact that offence O was committed while the person was subject to the liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(2) In determining the penalty for offence O, the court must have regard—
(a) to the fact that offence O was committed in breach of a liberation condition,
(b) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an investigative liberation condition, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 4(1),
(c) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an undertaking other than the requirement to appear at court, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 5(1).

(3) Where the maximum penalty in respect of offence O is specified by (or by virtue of) an enactment, the maximum penalty is increased—
(a) where it is a fine, by the amount equivalent to level 3 on the standard scale,
(b) where it is a period of imprisonment—
   (i) as respects conviction in the justice of the peace court, by 60 days,
   (ii) as respects conviction in the sheriff court or the High Court, by 6 months.

(4) The maximum penalty is increased by sub-paragraph (3) even if the penalty as so increased exceeds the penalty which it would otherwise be competent for the court to impose.

(5) In imposing a penalty in respect of offence O, the court must state—
(a) where the penalty is different from that which the court would have imposed had sub-paragraph (2) not applied, the extent of and the reasons for that difference,
(b) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(b)

4 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(b), the matters are—
(a) the number of offences in connection with which the person was subject to investigative liberation conditions when offence O was committed,
(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—
(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).
(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(c)

5 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(c), the matters are—

(a) the number of undertakings to which the person was subject when offence O was committed,

(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),

(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—

(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),

(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Evidential presumptions

6 (1) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), the facts mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) are to be held as admitted unless challenged by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded.

(2) The facts are—

(a) that the person breached an undertaking by reason of failing to appear at court as required by the terms of the undertaking,

(b) that the person was subject to a particular—

(i) investigative liberation condition, or

(ii) condition under the terms of an undertaking.

(3) In proceedings to which sub-paragraph (4) applies—

(a) something in writing, purporting to impose investigative liberation conditions and bearing to be signed by a constable, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the investigative liberation conditions imposed under section 14(2),

(b) something in writing, purporting to be an undertaking and bearing to be signed by the person said to have given it, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the undertaking at the time that it was given,

(c) a document purporting to be a notice (or a copy of a notice) under section 16 or 21, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the notice.

(4) This sub-paragraph applies to proceedings—
(a) in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), or
(b) in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(5) In proceedings in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment, that fact is to be held as admitted unless challenged—

(a) in summary proceedings, by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, or

(b) in the case of proceedings on indictment, by giving notice of a preliminary objection in accordance with section 71(2) or 72(6)(b)(i) of the 1995 Act.

Interpretation

7 In this schedule—

(a) references to an investigative liberation condition are to a condition imposed under section 14(2) or 17(3)(b) subject to any modification by notice under section 16(1) or (5)(a),

(b) references to an undertaking are to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a),

(c) references to the terms of an undertaking are to the terms of an undertaking subject to any modification by—

(i) notice under section 21(1), or

(ii) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).>

Section 21

Michael Matheson

160 In section 21, page 10, line 11, leave out subsection (3)

Michael Matheson

161 In section 21, page 10, line 13, leave out subsection (4)

Michael Matheson

162 In section 21, page 10, line 22, leave out <or (3)>

After section 21

Michael Matheson

163 After section 21, insert—

<Rescission of undertaking

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice rescind an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) (whether or not the person who gave it is to be prosecuted).

(2) The rescission of an undertaking by virtue of subsection (1) takes effect at the end of the day on which the notice is sent.

(3) Notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

11
(4) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person is likely to fail to comply with the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(5) Where a person is arrested under subsection (4) or subsection (6) applies—
   (a) the undertaking referred to in subsection (4) or (as the case may be) (6) is rescinded, and
   (b) this Part applies as if the person, since being most recently arrested, has been charged with the offence in connection with which the person was in police custody when the undertaking was given.

(6) This subsection applies where—
   (a) a person who is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) is in police custody (otherwise than as a result of having been arrested under subsection (4)), and
   (b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has failed, or (if liberated) is likely to fail, to comply with the terms of the undertaking.

(7) The references in subsections (4) and (6)(b) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by—
   (a) notice under section 21(1), or
   (b) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).

Michael Matheson

164 After section 21, insert—

<Expiry of undertaking>

(1) An undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) expires—
   (a) at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is required by its terms to appear at a court, or
   (b) if subsection (2) applies, at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is brought before a court having been arrested under the warrant mentioned in that subsection.

(2) This subsection applies where—
   (a) a person fails to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), and
   (b) on account of that failure, a warrant for the person’s arrest is granted.

(3) The references in subsections (1)(a) and (2)(a) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by notice under section 21(1).

Section 23

John Finnie

28 In section 23, page 11, line 10, after <committing> insert <and again immediately before the interview commences>
Michael Matheson

165 In section 23, page 11, line 11, at end insert—
<( ) of the general nature of that offence,>

Michael Matheson

166 In section 23, page 11, line 24, at end insert—
<( ) Where a person is to be interviewed by virtue of authorisation granted under section 27, before the interview begins the person must be informed of what was specified by the court under subsection (6) of that section.>

Section 24

John Finnie

29 In section 24, page 12, line 2, leave out from <if> to end of line 5

Alison McInnes

243 In section 24, page 12, line 2, leave out second <the> and insert <an appropriate>

Alison McInnes

244 In section 24, page 12, line 3, leave out from <in> to end of line 5 and insert <as a result of an urgent need to prevent—>
(a) interference with evidence in connection with the offence under consideration, or
(b) interference with or physical harm to a person.>

Alison McInnes

245 In section 24, page 12, line 13, at end insert—
<( ) In this section, “appropriate constable” means a constable who—>
(a) is of the rank of superintendent or above, and
(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.>

Section 25

Elaine Murray

55 In section 25, page 12, line 15, leave out <Subsections (2) and (3) apply> and insert <Subsection (2) applies>

Elaine Murray

Supported by: Alison McInnes

56 In section 25, page 12, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>
Michael Matheson
167 In section 25, page 12, line 17, after <age,> insert—

   <(aa) the person is 16 or 17 years of age and subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings
   (Scotland) Act 2011,>

Elaine Murray
Supported by: Alison McInnes
57 In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <16> and insert <18>

John Finnie
30 In section 25, page 12, line 18, leave out <, owing to mental disorder,>

Elaine Murray
58 In section 25, page 12, line 22, leave out subsections (3) to (5)

Michael Matheson
168 In section 25, page 12, line 27, leave out <(2)(b)> and insert <(2)(aa) or (b)>

John Finnie
31 In section 25, page 12, leave out lines 36 and 37

Michael Matheson
169 In section 25, page 12, line 36, leave out <328(1)> and insert <328>

Section 30

Elaine Murray
59 In section 30, page 16, line 9, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Elaine Murray
60 In section 30, page 16, line 13, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Alison McInnes
246 In section 30, page 16, line 19, leave out  and insert <an appropriate>

Michael Matheson
170 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert <, or

   (c) safeguarding and promoting the wellbeing of the person in custody, where a constable believes that person to be under 18 years of age.>
Michael Matheson

171 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert—

<(  ) The sending of intimation may be delayed by virtue of subsection (5)(c) only for so long as is necessary to ascertain whether a local authority will arrange for someone to visit the person in custody under section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s)(2).>

Alison McInnes

247 In section 30, page 16, line 22, at end insert—

<(  ) In this section and section 32, “appropriate constable” means a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.>

Michael Matheson

172 In section 30, page 16, line 25, leave out  and insert <the person in custody>

Section 31

Michael Matheson

173 In section 31, page 16, line 31, at end insert—

<(  ) Subsection (2) does not apply if—

(a) a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, and

(b) the person in custody requests that the person to whom intimation is to be sent under section 30(1) is not asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held.>

Michael Matheson

174 In section 31, page 16, line 32, leave out <Subsection (4) applies> and insert <Subsections (3A) and (4) apply>

Michael Matheson

175 In section 31, page 16, leave out lines 35 and 36 and insert—

<(b) the person to whom intimation is sent by virtue of section 30(3), if asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held, claims to be unable or unwilling to attend within a reasonable time.>

Michael Matheson

176 In section 31, page 16, line 36, at end insert—

<(  ) a local authority, acting under section (Social work involvement in relation to under 18s)(8)(a), has advised against sending intimation to the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3).>
Michael Matheson
177 In section 31, page 16, line 36, at end insert—
  <(3A) Section 30(3) ceases to have effect.>

Michael Matheson
178 In section 31, page 16, line 37, after <intimation> insert <to an appropriate person>

Elaine Murray
61 In section 31, page 17, line 2, leave out from second <or> to end of line 5

Michael Matheson
179 In section 31, page 17, line 6, leave out <(4)(a)> and insert <(4)>

Michael Matheson
180 In section 31, page 17, line 12, leave out <30(4)(b)> and insert <30(5)(a) or (b)>

Michael Matheson
181 In section 31, page 17, line 14, leave out <30(4)(b)> and insert <30(5)(a) or (b)>

Section 32

Elaine Murray
62 In section 32, page 17, line 17, leave out <16> and insert <18>

Michael Matheson
182 In section 32, page 17, line 20, leave out <at least one> and insert

Michael Matheson
183 In section 32, page 17, line 21, leave out from <who> to end of line 22

Elaine Murray
63 In section 32, page 17, line 23, leave out subsection (2)

Michael Matheson
184 In section 32, page 17, line 24, leave out <at least one> and insert

Michael Matheson
185 In section 32, page 17, leave out line 26

Michael Matheson
186 In section 32, page 17, line 27, at end insert—
  <( ) Access to a person in custody under subsection (1) or (2) need not be permitted to more than one person at the same time.>
Elaine Murray

64 In section 32, page 17, line 28, leave out <or (2)>

Alison McInnes

248 In section 32, page 17, line 29, after <as> insert <an appropriate constable considers that>

Michael Matheson

187 In section 32, page 17, line 34, leave out  and insert <the person in custody>

After section 32

Michael Matheson

188 After section 32, insert—

<Social work involvement in relation to under 18s>

(1) Intimation of the fact that a person is in police custody and the place where the person is in custody must be sent to a local authority as soon as reasonably practicable if—

(a) a constable believes that the person may be subject to a supervision order, or
(b) by virtue of subsection (5)(c) of section 30, a constable has delayed sending intimation in respect of the person under subsection (1) of that section.

(2) A local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) may arrange for someone to visit the person in custody if—

(a) the person is subject to a supervision order, or
(b) the local authority—

(i) believes the person to be under 16 years of age, and
(ii) has grounds to believe that its arranging someone to visit the person would best safeguard and promote the person’s wellbeing (having regard to the effect of subsection (4)(a)).

(3) Before undertaking to arrange someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2), the local authority must be satisfied that anyone it arranges to visit the person in custody will be able to make the visit within a reasonable time.

(4) Where a local authority arranges for someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2)—

(a) sections 30 and 32 cease to have effect, and
(b) the person who the local authority has arranged to visit the person in custody must be permitted access to the person in custody.

(5) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (4)(b) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—

(a) in the interests of—

(i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or
(ii) the apprehension of offenders, or
(b) for the wellbeing of the person in custody.
(6) Where a local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) confirms that the person in custody is—
   (a) over 16 years of age, and
   (b) subject to a supervision order,
sections 30 to 32 are to be applied in respect of the person as if a constable believes the person to be under 16 years of age.

(7) Subsection (8) applies where a local authority might have arranged for someone to visit a person in custody under subsection (2) but—
   (a) chose not to do so, or
   (b) was precluded from doing so by subsection (3).

(8) The local authority may—
   (a) advise a constable that the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3) should not be sent intimation if the local authority has grounds to believe that sending intimation to that person may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person in custody, and
   (b) give advice as to who might be an appropriate person to a constable considering that matter under section 31(5) (and the constable must have regard to any such advice).

(9) In this section, “supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Section 33

John Pentland
38 In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out from beginning to <over,>

Elaine Murray
32 In section 33, page 18, line 1, leave out <18> and insert <16>

John Finnie
33 In section 33, page 18, line 2, leave out <owing to mental disorder,>

Michael Matheson
189 In section 33, page 18, line 3, leave out <to> and insert—
   <( )>

John Finnie
34 In section 33, page 18, leave out lines 17 and 18

Michael Matheson
190 In section 33, page 18, line 17, leave out <328(1)> and insert <328>
Section 34

Alison McInnes

249 Leave out section 34 and insert—

<Provision of appropriate adults>

Each local authority must ensure the provision of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection 3 of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).>

Michael Matheson

191 Leave out section 34

After section 34

Mary Fee

110 After section 34, insert—

<Persons with responsibility for a child>

Duty to contact named person: persons with responsibility for a child

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody has responsibility for a child.

(2) With a view to ensuring the wellbeing of the child, the constable must send information of the type specified in subsection (3) to an individual identified in relation to the child under section 20 or 21 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

(3) The information to be sent is to contain details of any matters relevant to the child’s wellbeing, and to the child’s wellbeing needs.

(4) Information falls within subsection (3) if the constable considers that—

(a) it is likely to be relevant to the exercise of the named person functions in relation to the child or young person,

(b) it is necessary or expedient for the purposes of the exercise of any of the named person functions,

(c) it ought to be provided for that purpose, and

(d) the provision of the information would not prejudice the conduct of any criminal investigation or the prosecution of any offence.

(5) In considering for the purpose of subsection (4)(c) whether information ought to be provided, the constable is, so far as reasonably practicable, to ascertain and have regard to the views of the child.

(6) In having regard to the views of a child under subsection (5), the constable is to take account of the child’s age and maturity.

(7) For the purpose of subsection (4)(c) the information ought to be provided only if the likely benefit to the wellbeing of the child arising in consequence of doing so outweighs any likely adverse effect on that wellbeing arising from doing so.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision relating to the sending of information under subsection (2) above.
(9) Regulations under subsection (8) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 36

Alison McInnes
250 In section 36, page 19, line 12, leave out  and insert <an appropriate>

Alison McInnes
251 In section 36, page 19, line 13, leave out from <in> to end of line 15 and insert <as a result of an urgent need to prevent —
   (a) interference with evidence in connection with the offence under consideration, or
   (b) interference with, or physical harm to, a person.>

Alison McInnes
252 In section 36, page 19, line 16, leave out from second <consultation> to <example> in line 17 and insert <, except in exceptional circumstances, consultation in person but may include initial>

Michael Matheson
192 In section 36, page 19, line 16, leave out second <means> and insert <method>

Michael Matheson
193 In section 36, page 19, line 17, leave out <means of>

Alison McInnes
253 In section 36, page 19, line 18, at end insert —
   <( ) In subsection (2), “appropriate constable” means a constable who—
      (a) is of the rank of superintendent or above, and
      (b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.>

Section 39

Michael Matheson
194 In section 39, page 20, leave out line 2 and insert —
   <( ) cause the person to participate in an identification procedure.>

After section 40

Alison McInnes
254 After section 40, insert —

<Powers in relation to biometric information
   (1) Section 18 (prints, samples etc. in criminal investigations) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.
   (2) After subsection (7A)(d) there is inserted —
      “(e) other biometric information.”.
(3) After subsection (7B) there is inserted—

“(7C) In subsection (7A)(e) “biometric information” means any information (in any form and produced and stored by any method) about a person’s physical or behavioural characteristics or features which—

(a) is capable of being used in order to establish or verify the identity of the person, and

(b) is obtained or recorded with the intention that it be used for the purposes of a biometric recognition system.

(7D) Biometric information may, in particular, include images or recordings of or information about—

(a) the features of an iris or any other part of the eye,

(b) the features of any other part of the face,

(c) a person’s voice, handwriting or gait.

(7E) In subsection (7C) “biometric recognition system” means a system which, by means of equipment operating automatically—

(a) obtains or records information about a person’s physical or behavioural characteristics or features, and

(b) compares the information with stored information that has previously been so obtained or recorded, or otherwise processes the information, for the purpose of establishing or verifying the identity of the person, or otherwise determining whether the person is recognised by the system.

(7F) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations subject to the affirmative procedure modify subsection (7D) by—

(a) adding a physical or behavioural characteristic or feature to, or removing such a characteristic or feature from, that subsection, or

(b) modifying the description of a physical or behavioural characteristic for the time being included in that subsection.”.

Michael Matheson

195 After section 40, insert—

<Care of drunken persons

Taking drunk persons to designated place

(1) Where—

(a) a person is liable to be arrested in respect of an offence by a constable without a warrant, and

(b) the constable is of the opinion that the person is drunk,

the constable may take the person to a designated place (and do so instead of arresting the person).

(2) Nothing done under subsection (1)—

(a) makes a person liable to be held unwillingly at a designated place, or

(b) prevents a constable from arresting the person in respect of the offence referred to in that subsection.
(3) In this section, “designated place” is any place designated by the Scottish Ministers for the purpose of this section as a place suitable for the care of drunken persons.

Section 42

Alison McInnes

53 In section 42, page 20, line 18, at end insert—

<( ) search a child,>

Mary Fee

41 In section 42, page 20, line 19, at end insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee

42 In section 42, page 20, line 20, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee

43 In section 42, page 20, line 21, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Mary Fee

44 In section 42, page 20, line 22, after <child> insert <or person>

Mary Fee

45 In section 42, page 20, line 23, after <child> insert <or person who has responsibility for a child>

Elaine Murray

65 In section 42, page 20, line 25, leave out <well-being> and insert <best interests>

Alison McInnes

255 In section 42, page 20, line 25, at end insert—

<( ) A decision under subsection (1)(b) or (c) must be exercised for the shortest possible period of time.>

After section 42

Michael Matheson

196 After section 42, insert—

< Duties in relation to children in custody

(1) A child who is in police custody at a police station is, so far as practicable, to be prevented from associating with any adult who is officially accused of committing an offence other than an adult to whom subsection (2) applies.

(2) This subsection applies to an adult if a constable believes that it may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the child mentioned in subsection (1) to prevent the child and adult from associating with one another.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

“child” means person who is under 18 years of age,
“adult” means person who is 18 years of age or over.

Michael Matheson

197 After section 42, insert—

<Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted>

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply if—

(a) a person is being kept in a place of safety in accordance with section (Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court) when it is decided not to prosecute the person for any relevant offence, and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence.

(2) The Principal Reporter must be informed, as soon as reasonably practicable, that the person is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3).

(3) The person must be kept in a place of safety under this subsection until the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(4) An offence is a “relevant offence” for the purpose of subsection (1) if—

(a) it is the offence with which the person was officially accused, leading to the person being kept in the place of safety in accordance with section (Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court), or

(b) it is an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence mentioned in paragraph (a).

(5) In this section, “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Elaine Murray

35 After section 42, insert—

<Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused>

(1) Subject to section (Disclosure of information: person released under section 14), a constable must not without reasonable cause release the information specified in subsection (2) to any person other than an authorised person.

(2) The information is information relating to a person not officially accused of an offence which—

(a) identifies that person, or

(b) is likely to be sufficient to allow that person to be identified, as having been arrested in connection with an offence.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (1), an “authorised person” means—

(a) a constable,

(b) a person to whom intimation must or may be sent under Chapter 5 of this Part,

(c) a person other than a constable to whom the information must be disclosed for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into the offence.
(4) For the purposes of subsection (1), a determination that there is reasonable cause to disclose information must be made—
   (a) only if it is in the public interest to do so, and
   (b) by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

Elaine Murray

36 After section 42, insert—

<Disclosure of information: person released under section 14

(1) Without prejudice to the generality of section (Duty not to disclose information relating to person not officially accused), a constable may disclose qualifying information relating to an alleged offence to a person mentioned in subsection (2) where the conditions in subsection (3) are met.

(2) The persons are—
   (a) a person—
      (i) against whom, or
      (ii) against whose property,
      the acts which constituted the alleged offence were directed,
   (b) in the case where the death of a person mentioned in paragraph (a) was (or appears to have been) caused by the alleged offence, a prescribed relative of the person,
   (c) a person who is likely to give evidence in criminal proceedings which are likely to be instituted against a person in respect of the alleged offence,
   (d) a person who has given a statement in relation to the alleged offence to a constable.

(3) The conditions are that disclosure of the information —
   (a) is in the public interest or is otherwise likely to promote the safety and wellbeing of a person mentioned in subsection (2), and
   (b) is authorised by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

(4) In this section—
   “prescribed” means prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by order subject to the negative procedure,
   “qualifying information” means information that—
   (a) identifies a person as having been arrested in connection with an alleged offence and subsequently released under section 14, and
   (b) sets out such information relating to any conditions imposed on the person under section 14(2) as the constable authorising the disclosure considers appropriate.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by order subject to the negative procedure, modify the definition of “qualifying information” in subsection (4).>
Section 43
Michael Matheson
198 Leave out section 43

Section 44
Michael Matheson
199 Leave out section 44

Section 45
Michael Matheson
200 Leave out section 45

Section 46
Michael Matheson
201 Leave out section 46

Section 47
Michael Matheson
202 Leave out section 47

Section 48
Michael Matheson
203 Leave out section 48

Section 49
Michael Matheson
204 Leave out section 49

Section 50
Michael Matheson
205 In section 50, page 24, line 27, leave out <relation to> and insert <respect of>
Margaret Mitchell
256 Leave out section 50

Section 51
Margaret Mitchell
257 Leave out section 51
Schedule 1

Michael Matheson

206 In schedule 1, page 44, line 28, at end insert—

<( ) in subsection (3), for the words “he can be delivered into the custody” there is substituted “the arrival” ,>

Michael Matheson

207 In schedule 1, page 45, line 30, at end insert—

<In each of sections 169(2) and 170(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, the words “arrested without warrant and” are repealed.>

Margaret Mitchell

259 In schedule 1, page 46, line 2, leave out <14> and insert <15>

Michael Matheson

208 In schedule 1, page 46, line 2, leave out from <15A> to end of line 3 and insert <17A,>

Michael Matheson

209 In schedule 1, page 46, line 4, leave out <cross-heading> and insert <heading>

Michael Matheson

210 In schedule 1, page 46, line 5, at end insert—

<( ) section 43,>

Michael Matheson

211 In schedule 1, page 46, line 6, at end insert—

<(1) In section 18—

(a) in subsection (1), the words “or is detained under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed,

(b) in subsection (2), the words “or detained” are repealed.

(2) In subsection (2)(a) of section 18B, for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(3) In section 18D—

(a) in subsection (2)(a), the words “or detained” are repealed,

(b) in subsection (2)(b), for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(4) In subsection (8)(b) of section 19AA, the words “or detention under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed.>
Michael Matheson

212 In schedule 1, page 46, line 6, at end insert—

<In section 42—

(a) subsection (3) is repealed,
(b) subsection (7) is repealed,
(c) in subsection (8), for the words “subsection (7) above” there is substituted “section (Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,
(d) in subsection (9), the words “detained in a police station, or” are repealed,
(e) subsection (10) is repealed.>

Michael Matheson

213 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In section 6D of the Road Traffic Act 1988, for subsection (2A) there is substituted—

“(2A) Instead of, or before, arresting a person under this section, a constable may detain the person at or near the place where the preliminary test was, or would have been, administered with a view to imposing on the person there a requirement under section 7.”.>

Michael Matheson

214 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000—

(a) in paragraph 18—

(i) in sub-paragraph (2), for the words from “and” at the end of paragraph (a) to the end of the sub-paragraph there is substituted—

“(ab) intimation is to be made under paragraph 16(1) whether the person detained requests that it be made or not, and
(ac) section 32 (right of under 18s to have access to other person) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies as if the detained person were a person in police custody for the purposes of that section.”,

(ii) after sub-paragraph (3) there is inserted—

“(4) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)—

“child” means a person under 16 years of age,
“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the child mentioned in sub-paragraph (2).”,

(b) in paragraph 20(1), the words “or a person detained under section 14 of that Act” are repealed,

(c) in paragraph 27—

(i) in sub-paragraph (4), paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) sub-paragraph (5) is repealed.>
Michael Matheson

215 In schedule 1, page 46, line 31, at end insert—

<In the schedule to the Sexual Offences (Procedure and Evidence) (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph 2 is repealed.>

Michael Matheson

216 In schedule 1, page 46, line 33, at end insert—

<In the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011—

(a) in section 65—

(i) for subsection (1) there is substituted—

“(1) Subsection (2) applies where the Principal Reporter is informed under subsection (2) of section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 that a child is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3) of that section.”,

(ii) in subsection (2), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”,

(b) in section 66(1), for sub-paragraph (vii) there is substituted—

“(vii) information under section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, or”,

(c) in section 68(4)(e)(vi), for the words “section 43(5) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46)” there is substituted “section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,

(d) in section 69, for subsection (3) there is substituted—

“(3) If—

(a) the determination under section 66(2) is made following the Principal Reporter receiving information under section (Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, and

(b) at the time the determination is made the child is being kept in a place of safety,

the children’s hearing must be arranged to take place no later than the third day after the Principal Reporter receives the information mentioned in paragraph (a).”,

(e) in section 72(2)(b), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”.

After section 52

Alison McInnes

258 After section 52, insert—

<Code of practice about investigative functions

Code of practice about investigative functions

(1) The Lord Advocate must issue a code of practice on—

28
(a) the questioning, and recording of questioning, of persons suspected of committing offences, and
(b) the conduct of identification procedures involving such persons.

(2) The Lord Advocate—
(a) must keep the code of practice issued under subsection (1) under review,
(b) may from time to time revise the code of practice.

(3) The code of practice is to apply to the functions exercisable by or on behalf of—
(a) the Police Service of Scotland,
(b) such other bodies as are specified in the code (being bodies responsible for reporting offences to the procurator fiscal).

(4) Before issuing the code of practice, the Lord Advocate must consult publicly on a draft of the code.

(5) When preparing a draft of the code of practice for public consultation, the Lord Advocate must consult—
(a) the Lord Justice General,
(b) the Faculty of Advocates,
(c) the Law Society of Scotland,
(d) the Scottish Police Authority,
(e) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
(f) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
(g) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
(h) such other persons as the Lord Advocate considers appropriate.

(6) The Lord Advocate must lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of the code of practice issued under this section.

(7) Where a court determines in criminal proceedings that evidence has been obtained in breach of the code of practice, the evidence is inadmissible in the proceedings unless the court is satisfied that admitting the evidence would not result in unfairness in the proceedings.

(8) Breach of the code of practice does not of itself give rise to grounds for any legal claim whatsoever.

(9) Subsections (3) to (8) apply to a revised code of practice under subsection (2)(b) as they apply to the code of practice issued under subsection (1).>

Before section 53

Michael Matheson

217 Before section 53, insert—

<Disapplication in relation to service offences
(1) References in this Part to an offence do not include a service offence.
(2) Nothing in this Part applies in relation to a person who is arrested in respect of a service offence.
(3) In this section, “service offence” has the meaning given by section 50(2) of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

Section 53

Michael Matheson

218 In section 53, page 25, line 4, at end insert—
<( ) Subsection (1) is subject to paragraph 18 of Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000.>

After section 53

Michael Matheson

219 After section 53, insert—

<Powers to modify Part

Further provision about application of Part

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part to provide that some or all of it—
   (a) applies in relation to persons to whom it would otherwise not apply because of—
      (i) section (Disapplication in relation to service offences), or
      (ii) section 53,
   (b) does not apply in relation to persons arrested otherwise than in respect of an offence.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such modifications to this Part as seem to them necessary or expedient in relation to its application to persons mentioned in subsection (1).

(3) Regulations under this section may make different provision for different purposes.

(4) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.>

Michael Matheson

220 After section 53, insert—

<Further provision about vulnerable persons

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—
   (a) amend subsections (2)(b) and (6) of section 25,
   (b) amend subsections (1)(c), (3) and (5) of section 33,
   (c) specify descriptions of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.>
Before section 54

John Pentland

37 Before section 54, insert—

<Meaning of arrest

In this Part, “arrest” means—

(a) depriving a person of liberty of movement for the purpose of the purported investigation or prevention of crime, and

(b) taking the person to a police station in accordance with section 4.>

Section 54

Michael Matheson

221 In section 54, page 25, line 7, leave out <99> and insert <99(1)>

Section 56

Michael Matheson

222 In section 56, page 25, line 15, leave out from <if> to end of line 18 and insert <from the time the person is arrested by a constable until any one of the events mentioned in subsection (2) occurs.>

(2) The events are—

(a) the person is released from custody,

(b) the person is brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2),

(c) the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2)(b) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 that the person continue to be kept in a place of safety.>

After section 56

Mary Fee

260 After section 56, insert—

<Meaning of responsibility for a child

(1) In this Part, “child” means a person who has not attained the age of 18 years.

(2) In this Part, references to a person who has responsibility for a child include references to any person who—

(a) is liable to maintain, or has parental responsibilities (within the meaning of section 1(3) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995) in relation to, the child, or

(b) has care of the child.>
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

4th Groupings of Amendments for Stage 2

This document provides procedural information which will assist in preparing for and following proceedings on the above Bill. The information provided is as follows:

- the list of groupings (that is, the order in which amendments will be debated). Any procedural points relevant to each group are noted;
- a list of any amendments already debated;
- the text of amendments to be debated on the fourth day of Stage 2 consideration, set out in the order in which they will be debated. THIS LIST DOES NOT REPLACE THE MARSHALLED LIST, WHICH SETS OUT THE AMENDMENTS IN THE ORDER IN WHICH THEY WILL BE DISPOSED OF.

Groupings of amendments

Investigative liberation: release on conditions
18, 142, 47, 143, 19, 145, 20, 146, 147, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 18 pre-empts amendment 142
Amendments 145 pre-empts amendment 20
Amendment 147 pre-empts amendment 21

Breach of liberation condition
144, 158, 159, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204

Requirement to bring officially accused person before court as soon as practicable
149

Duties of police in relation to under 18s
150, 150A, 151, 152, 65, 255, 196, 197, 222

Release on undertaking
153, 154, 155, 48, 156, 157, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 155 pre-empts amendment 48

Provision of information prior to interview
28, 165, 166
Circumstances in which interview may take place without solicitor present or in which sending of intimation or consultation with solicitor may be delayed
29, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 250, 251, 253

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 29 pre-empts amendments 243 and 244

Rights of under 18s: consent to interview without solicitor present, sending of intimation and access to other person, other support
55, 56, 167, 57, 58, 168, 59, 60, 173, 61, 62, 63, 64, 38, 32

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 58 pre-empts amendment 168
Amendment 63 in this group pre-empts amendments 184 and 185 in the group “Rights of under 18s: minor amendments”
Amendment 38 pre-empts amendment 32

Vulnerable persons: consent to interview without solicitor present, support etc.
30, 31, 169, 33, 189, 34, 190, 249, 191, 220

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 31 pre-empts amendment 169
Amendment 34 pre-empts amendment 190

Rights of under 18s: minor amendments
172, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendments 184 and 185 in this group are pre-empted by amendment 63 in the group “Rights of under 18s: consent to interview without solicitor present, sending of intimation and access to other person, other support”

Means of consultation with solicitor
252, 192, 193

Notes on amendments in this group
Amendment 252 pre-empts amendment 192

Powers in relation to biometric information
254

Care of drunken persons
195

Disclosure of information relating to persons not officially accused
35, 36

Modification of enactments in connection with Part 1
206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 215, 216
Application of Part 1 in relation to arrests under other enactments
214, 217, 218, 219

Code of practice about investigative functions
258

Amendments already debated

Participation of detained person in proceedings through TV link
With 73 (on Day 2) – 101

Police powers of search
With 223 (on Day 3) – 53

Power to arrest without warrant and meaning of arrest
With 111 (on Day 3) – 37

Replacement of common law power of arrest without warrant, statutory power to detain etc. by section 1 power of arrest
With 234 (on Day 3) – 256, 257, 259

Minor and drafting amendments
With 116 (on Day 3) – 194, 205, 221

Information to be given if sexual offence
With 119 (on Day 3) – 148

Social work involvement in relation to under 18s in police custody
With 120 (on Day 3) – 170, 171, 176, 180, 181, 188

Arrest and custody of person with responsibility for child
With 39 (on Day 3) – 110, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 260
Present:

Christian Allard  Roderick Campbell
John Finnie    Christine Grahame (Convener)
Margaret McDougall  Alison McInnes
Margaret Mitchell    Elaine Murray (Deputy Convener)
Michael Russell (Committee Substitute)

Also present: Michael Matheson, Cabinet Secretary for Justice (item 2).

Apologies were received from Gil Paterson.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered the Bill at Stage 2 (Day 4).

The following amendments were agreed to (by division)—

- 142 (For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0)
- 145 (For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0)
- 146 (For 7, Against 2, Abstentions 0)
- 147 (For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0)
- 258 (For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0).

The following amendments were disagreed to (by division)—

- 18 (For 3, Against 6, Abstentions 0)
- 150A (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0)
- 28 (For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0)
- 243 (For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0)
- 244 (For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0)
- 55 (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0)
- 56 (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0)
- 30 (For 4, Against 4, Abstentions 1; amendment disagreed to on casting vote)
- 59 (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0)
- 60 (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0)
246 (For 3, Against 6, Abstentions 0)
61 (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0)
62 (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0)
252 (For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0)
35 (For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0).

The following amendments were moved and, no member having objected, withdrawn: 29 and 254.

The following amendments were pre-empted: 20, 21 and 48.

The following amendments were not moved: 47, 19, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 245, 57, 58, 31, 247, 63, 64, 248, 38, 33, 34, 249, 110, 250, 251, 253, 53, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 65, 255, 36, 256, 257, 259, 37 and 260.

The following provisions were agreed to without amendment: sections 16, 17, 22, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 35, 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 51, 52, 55, 88, 89, 90 and 91 and the Long Title.

The following provisions were agreed to as amended: sections 14, 15, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 25, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 39 and 50, schedule 1 and sections 53, 54 and 56.

The Committee completed Stage 2 consideration of the Bill.

Roderick Campbell declared an interest as a member of the Faculty of Advocates and Alison McInnes declared an interest as a member of Justice Scotland.
On resuming—

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener: Item 2 is day 4 of stage 2 proceedings on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the meeting the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Michael Matheson, and Scottish Government officials, who are supporting the cabinet secretary but will not take part in the proceedings. As far as we are concerned—but not, I should say, the cabinet secretary—they must remain silent.

Members should have their copies of the bill, the marshalled list and the groupings of amendments for today’s consideration. They might also find the purpose-and-effect notes that the Government sent for last week’s amendments useful for this session.

I aim to complete all the amendments today, so you are nailed to your chairs. If necessary, however, we will have a little break after an hour or so if I see anyone faltering.

Before we move to the consideration of amendments, there are two declarations of interest to be made.

Alison McInnes: I draw members’ attention to my entry in the register of interests, particularly my membership of Justice Scotland.

Roderick Campbell: I want to draw members’ attention to my entry in the register of interests as a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

Section 14—Release on conditions

The Convener: Amendment 18, in the name of John Finnie, is grouped with amendments 142, 47, 143, 19, 145, 20, 146, 147 and 21 to 27. I must point out the various pre-emptions in this group. If amendment 18 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 142; if amendment 145 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 20; and if amendment 147 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 21. I do not expect members to commit all that to memory, so I will repeat those pre-emptions as we go along.

John Finnie: Amendment 18 and, indeed, the other amendments in this group relate to investigative liberation and release on conditions. My amendments would allow for a period during which a suspect can be released from custody to be up to a maximum of 28 days. That differs from the blanket 28-day period that is set out in section 14(1). Indeed, Lord Carloway recommended that the period during which a suspect could be subject to investigative liberation should not exceed 28 days. The Law Society of Scotland supports the amendment, believing that one advantage of having a shorter period in which a person can be released from custody is that it is more likely that conditions imposed by a constable under section 14(2) will be accepted by an individual who is subject to investigative liberation if it is for a shorter period.

The provision in the bill is a major change, and it does not follow Lord Carloway’s proposal. There is a question of proportionality attached to it. In the Government’s amendment 146, we once again see a diminution of the authority exercised from inspector to sergeant. When we previously debated the matter, we heard what seemed to be Police Scotland’s view on it, which is that there should be equal access to facilities across Scotland. I therefore think it entirely reasonable for the inspector to keep doing this sort of thing.

Amendments 22 to 27 would allow a sheriff to review not only a condition of interim liberation under section 14 but the time period that had been imposed. We know that the bill facilitates a review of terms, but why does it not allow for a review of duration? As I have said, Lord Carloway never intended a blanket 28-day period.

I move amendment 18.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson): The amendments in this group relate to investigative liberation, which is a new process for the police. At present, if the police want to liberate a suspect subject to conditions such as requiring them not to approach victims or witnesses, they must charge that person. Lord Carloway recommended that the police should be able to release a suspect subject to conditions, even though the suspect has not been charged, but that the conditions should apply only for a limited period.

That recommendation recognises that in some of today’s complex police investigations the police might need to break off an interview while they wait for, say, laboratory results or mobile phone records. Imposing conditions on a suspect for a limited period means that they can leave the suspect at liberty while other aspects of the investigation are progressed. However, the police can also take the suspect straight back into custody if they attempt to interfere with victims or witnesses or otherwise compromise the investigation.

My amendments in this group, which I will speak to in a moment, are aimed at ensuring that the investigative liberation process works fairly and proportionately. Although I agree that it is important to ensure that investigative liberation conditions do not have an unnecessary impact on a suspect’s private life, I regret to say that the Government cannot support the amendments in the names of John Finnie and Elaine Murray.

On amendments 18 to 27, in the name of John Finnie, I entirely agree that it would not be appropriate for every suspect released on investigative liberation to be subject to conditions for a full 28 days. However, the bill already ensures that that will not happen. As drafted, the bill does not impose a blanket 28-day investigative liberation period; instead, it provides that any investigative liberation conditions that have not been lifted before then fall away automatically after 28 days. That reflects Lord Carloway’s recommendation that 28 days is the appropriate maximum period for investigative liberation.

Section 15 sets out that conditions must end after 28 days and can end sooner, while sections 16 and 17 set out how conditions can be modified or removed before the end of the 28-day period. In particular, section 16 provides that an inspector must keep under review whether there are still reasonable grounds to suspect that the person subject to the conditions committed an offence and whether the conditions imposed continue to satisfy the demanding test of being necessary and proportionate to ensure the proper conduct of the investigation. If the inspector is not satisfied that those tests are met, either more proportionate conditions can be imposed or the conditions must be lifted altogether. Moreover, if a suspect is not satisfied with the police’s review of the appropriateness of the conditions, section 17 allows the suspect to challenge the conditions before a sheriff, who will also have the power to modify the conditions or to remove them completely.

Investigative liberation is all about the conditions that are imposed, and the bill makes it clear that those conditions can be removed after review by an inspector or a sheriff. That can happen at any time, and there is no requirement for them to be in place for 28 days. The bill states that, as soon as conditions stop being both necessary and proportionate, they must be removed or modified. In other words, the 28 days is a backstop. The decision on when it is no longer appropriate to keep a person subject to investigative liberation will be made on a day-to-day basis as the investigation into the offence unfolds.

The amendments in the name of John Finnie would cause investigative liberation conditions imposed on the suspect to fall away after a number of days not exceeding 28 days, which the police are to specify at the time of releasing the suspect. It might be possible in some cases for the police to do what amendment 19 would require them to do, which is to estimate and specify at the time of release the period of time required to carry out further investigations. Where the police are able to do so, they could set a shorter period at the outset, but that would only ever be an estimate. Investigations are not always predictable.

The purpose of imposing investigative liberation conditions is to protect the interests of justice and to help to protect victims and witnesses. If the police guessed wrongly by a day or two, and underestimated how long would be required to carry out the investigation, that would mean that the investigative liberation conditions would cease to apply at a time when they were still needed to protect alleged victims.

Amendment 22 would allow a sheriff to review not only the investigative liberation conditions imposed on a suspect but the period specified by the police during which the conditions would run. In other words, amendment 22 presupposes that the other amendments in this group in the name of John Finnie will be supported. I do not think that it is feasible or in the interests of justice to require constables to specify a period for investigative liberation to run, and it follows that there is no reason for giving sheriffs the power to review any period specified. I therefore urge John Finnie not to press amendments 18 to 27.

Amendment 47, in the name of Elaine Murray, would change the purpose for which investigative liberation conditions may be imposed. Conditions would still have to be necessary and proportionate but would have to be for the purposes of securing specific things, rather than for the broad purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation. I am concerned that the list of purposes for which conditions could be imposed could be unnecessarily restrictive and may suggest that the detailed purposes should be linked to standard conditions. Investigative liberation conditions need to be tailored to the needs of the particular investigation. Standard conditions could be too restrictive in some circumstances and insufficient in others.

The thrust of any condition imposed under investigative liberation is that it should be necessary and proportionate. Some of the purposes listed in amendment 47 appear inconsistent with that general principle. There is no requirement for a person to surrender themselves to custody, as the police already have the power to arrest during the period of investigative liberation. Although it might seem pertinent for the police to take into account a person’s protection and wellbeing when setting conditions, that could lead to conditions being set that would not be proportionate, or indeed necessary, for a person not charged with an offence. I therefore invite Elaine Murray not to move amendment 47, but I will undertake to consider before stage 3 whether an amendment is necessary to expand or to illustrate what the general purpose of “ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation” under section 14 might cover.

I turn to the amendments in my name. The bill as introduced allowed a suspect to be subject to a number of periods of investigative liberation, provided that the total of the periods did not exceed 28 days. Amendments 142, 145 and 147 change the position so that investigative liberation conditions can be imposed on a suspect only for a maximum period of 28 consecutive days in relation to a particular investigation. It will not be possible to impose investigative liberation conditions over a number of shorter periods adding up to a total of 28 days. These amendments deal with the concern that was raised by some at stage 1 that the police would be able to subject a person to repeated arrests and periods subject to investigative liberation conditions.

Amendment 143 sets out certain types of condition that can and cannot be imposed when releasing a person on investigative liberation. Requiring a person to be in a particular place at a particular time—for example, a home detention curfew—would significantly disrupt most people’s lives. In the Government’s view, that would be too severe an intrusion into the liberty of someone who has not been and may never be charged with an offence, so the amendment provides that conditions that impose curfews will not be permitted. It will, however, be possible to impose conditions banning a suspect from being in a particular place at a particular time, in order to protect victims and witnesses and prevent interference with evidence.

Amendment 146 will allow investigative liberation conditions to be authorised by a police officer of sergeant rank or above. At present, the bill provides that conditions must be authorised by a constable of inspector rank or above, but in most cases custody sergeants will make the initial decision on whether it is necessary or proportionate to keep a person in custody. Like all constables, custody sergeants will be under an ongoing general duty to take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody. Having taken the initial decision to keep a person in custody, they will need to keep under consideration whether it remains necessary to hold that person. At present, the bill would not allow a custody sergeant to release a person subject to investigative liberation conditions, but amendment 146 will allow that specialist officer to release the person, subject to conditions.

Custody sergeants are under the command of Police Scotland’s custody division, which sits separately from the territorial policing divisions. It deals with the safety and wellbeing of those in police custody. It has its own management and governance structure, which is independent of the territorial divisions and is commanded by a chief superintendent who is accountable directly to an assistant chief constable who is a member of the force executive. That ensures better oversight and management of persons in custody, and better decision making on custody matters.

The independence and increased professionalisation of custody division removes the need for decisions on liberation to be taken at inspector level. The officer best placed to make decisions on a person’s liberation and, by extension, any conditions that are to be attached to that liberation will in most cases be the sergeant in charge of the custody centre.

I consider that the arrangements for the management and governance of custody facilities, coupled with the procedural safeguards that are built into the bill, mean that it is appropriate for most investigative liberation conditions to be set by a custody sergeant.

A custody sergeant will be independent from the investigation, so they will need to consult the senior investigating officer to determine what conditions are necessary for the interests of the investigation and for the protection of victims. The process will ensure that conditions are tailored to the investigation and that the final decision on what is proportionate and necessary will be made by an officer with the right knowledge and expertise in dealing with custody matters.

The bill sets a minimum authorisation rank for investigative liberation decisions. I believe that that rank should be sergeant, but investigative liberation decisions could also be made by more senior officers. The bill provides the detailed framework and sets a minimum rank required to ensure good decision making on investigative liberation. The provisions must be flexible enough to cover relatively minor offences, complex technical investigations and very serious offences.

It will be for the police to ensure that the new option of investigative liberation is used appropriately and proportionately in each case. The bill provides the legal framework, but day-to-day decision making will be supported by detailed guidance. The police guidance in the standard operating procedures for custody will be revised to take account of the bill. There will be scope for the police to develop more finely grained authorisation processes for investigative liberation conditions in different circumstances. Higher authorisation requirements could be set before a suspect could be released on investigative liberation for particular offences, for example domestic violence; for particular types of suspect, for example children; or when unusual conditions are set. Those are practical operational matters for Police Scotland and it would be unnecessarily restrictive to set out the detail on them in the bill.

There will still be a requirement for any conditions set to be kept under review by an inspector. That inspector could modify any conditions set by a sergeant that the inspector did not agree were necessary and proportionate. Authorisation to release on investigative liberation will be given during the initial 12-hour detention period and I believe that custody sergeants are best placed to make such decisions. However, the requirement to keep conditions under review will ensure that all conditions are subject to detailed oversight by inspectors.

The amendments in my name in this group are designed to ensure that, in all cases, correct and fully informed decisions are made, that the proper conduct of the investigation is assured and that the rights of the individual are protected.

I invite the committee to support the amendments in my name.

Elaine Murray: Amendment 47, in my name, amends section 14 by replacing the conditions that are being imposed with a series of conditions required of the person. The reason for that is that, if someone is released on certain conditions, it seems more appropriate that the conditions should relate to their behaviour on release, rather than the way in which the police are conducting the inquiry. That issue was raised with us at stage 1.

"for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence"

The comments that the cabinet secretary made in the previous discussion are helpful and I will bear them in mind. Amendment 48, in my name, which will be discussed later, is on a similar topic and I note that amendment 155, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is similar to amendment 48, so I wonder whether he will consider a similar amendment to amendment 47 at stage 3, if amendment 47 is considered to be too restrictive. It is important that the conditions for release relate to the way the person behaves when they are on investigative liberation.

I am very supportive of the intention behind John Finnie’s amendments and again I think that the cabinet secretary’s comments were helpful. I am interested to hear how John Finnie reacts to those comments when he sums up.

I am very supportive of amendment 143, which no longer permits a curfew.

Roderick Campbell: I have some sympathy with the suggestion behind amendment 47, but I also bear in mind what the cabinet secretary has said this morning.

In relation to his amendments, John Finnie should reflect further on the detailed provisions in sections 15, 16 and 17, in which 28 days is specified as a long-stop period and the detention period might be a great deal less. There are safeguards in there and we should reflect on that. I disagree with the idea that there should be an additional test before a sheriff to determine the length of detention.

Margaret Mitchell: It is good that John Finnie has raised the point, but amendment 142, in the name of the minister, allays our concerns about the provision and explains what would happen more fully.

The idea behind amendment 47 is good, but the amendment is not flexible enough to suit every situation. I welcome the minister’s offer to reconsider the issue at stage 3.

The minister’s amendments to section 14 make improvements that will help the bill in general.

John Finnie: I have noted everything that has been said. I should stress that Lord Carloway never intended there to be a blanket 28 days. I reiterate the point that the Law Society of Scotland supports amendment 18. The cabinet secretary said that it is a new process and he is right about that in respect of release subject to conditions. However, we have heard again that some investigations are complex. Some of us can recall when the introduction of a six-hour detention was seen as hugely draconian; we have moved through various phases since then and are now being told that 28 days is required.

Language is very important and the portrayal of anyone who is not supportive of such measures as being somehow less supportive of victims of crime is unfortunate and entirely inaccurate. For example, the cabinet secretary talked about the implications that restricting detention would have for attempts to interfere with witnesses, but if someone attempts to interfere with a witness at the moment, that is a crime in common law of attempting to pervert the course of justice, and they would be arrested without warrant. That is the right way to treat such a crime and the bill would have no impact on that.

The cabinet secretary assures us that an inspector will keep the 28-day period under review, yet it will be a sergeant who will authorise the detention, and the same information is put out about custody division. Police Scotland may believe that that is an important use of terminology. However, people place a lot of store in the decisions that are made in the supervisory role about detention. I point out that every constable has an obligation to ensure that no one is disproportionately retained in custody.

The question is one of proportionality, and it is my view that the backstop remains excessive. For that reason I will press amendment 18.

11:00

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 18 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 3, Against 6, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 18 disagreed to.

Amendment 142 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 142 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 142 agreed to.

Amendment 47 not moved.

Amendment 143 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 19 not moved.

The Convener: Amendment 144, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 158, 159 and 198 to 204.

Michael Matheson: Amendments 144, 158, 159 and 198 to 204 make no change to the substance of the bill. They simply improve its structure.

The amendments move what is presently chapter 7 of part 1 into a schedule. Chapter 7 sets out the consequences for someone who fails to comply with conditions imposed on them when they are released from police custody either on investigative liberation or on undertaking. In essence, the consequences are that they have committed an offence.

Part 1 is mainly concerned with setting down the rules according to which the police are to deal with suspects, and the part flows better if those rules are not interrupted by a chapter dealing with what the courts are to do in the event that a suspect breaches a condition imposed on him or her by the police.

I move amendment 144.

Amendment 144 agreed to.

The Convener: I remind members that if amendment 145, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is agreed to, amendment 20 will be pre-empted.

Amendment 145 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 145 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 145 agreed to.

Amendment 146 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 146 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 145 agreed to.

Amendment 146 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 146 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.
The Convener: Amendment 146 agreed to.

Section 14, as amended, agreed to.

Section 15—Conditions ceasing to apply

The Convener: I remind members that if amendment 147 is agreed to, amendment 21 is pre-empted.

Amendment 147 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 147 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Mclnnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 7, Against 2, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 147 agreed to.

Section 14, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 147 agreed to.

Section 15—Conditions ceasing to apply

The Convener: I remind members that if amendment 147 is agreed to, amendment 21 is pre-empted.

Amendment 147 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 147 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

Against
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Mclnnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 8, Against 1, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 147 agreed to.

Section 15, as amended, agreed to.

Section 16 agreed to.

Section 17—Review of conditions

Amendments 22 to 27 not moved.

Section 17 agreed to.

Before section 18

Amendment 148 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
more appropriate than a place of safety as meaning a constable of the rank of inspector or above. Amendment 150A would omit “inspector” and insert “superintendent”, meaning that certification would have to be by an officer of the rank of superintendent or above. Currently, certification may be by an officer of the rank of inspector or above, or by the officer in charge of the police station to which the child is brought.

It is important that decisions are made in a timely, efficient and proportionate way that makes the best use of inspectors’ knowledge, skills, experience and training, while ensuring that they are supported in decision making if needed. Such an approach is in the interests of children and young people.

There are a limited number of superintendents, and requiring a superintendent to make the decision may not be in the interests of the child, as a superintendent will not necessarily be at the station, and a delay may be to the detriment of the child.

Requiring certification by an officer of the rank of superintendent or above would constrain the police’s operational flexibility and would not make best use of the skills, knowledge and capabilities of appropriate officers of the rank of inspector or chief inspector. It is important that we support effective decision making at the appropriate level of seniority. For the reasons that I have given, I ask Mr Finnie not to move his amendment.

Amendment 151 replaces section 42(3) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The amendment requires the police to notify at least one parent or guardian, if they can be found, of the court where the child is to appear, the date on which they are to be brought before the court, that the attendance of the parent or guardian at court may be required and, in supplement to existing law, the general nature of the offence with which the child has been charged. The police may withhold such notification if they have grounds to believe that notifying the parent or guardian would be detrimental to the child's wellbeing.

Amendment 152 replaces section 42(7) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The amendment requires the police to notify the relevant local authority of where the child is to appear, the date on which they are to be brought before the court, and the general nature of the offence with which they have been charged, the relevant local authority being the authority for the area where the court sits. In line with other provisions of the bill, that protection has been extended to 16 and 17-year-olds who are subject to supervision.

I turn now to section 42 of the bill. It is a progressive and significant provision that requires a constable to treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration. With reference to amendment 65, in the name of Elaine Murray, the term "wellbeing" is consistent with language used in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014, and is understood by the police.

The term “wellbeing” was given full consideration by Parliament in the context of the scrutiny of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill, and there was strong support from children’s groups for its use. Wellbeing is at the heart of the getting it right for every child approach, which itself is rooted in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. The principles of the UNCRC are the foundation for any assessment of the wellbeing of a child or young person.

Our approach is consistent with a wider assessment of children’s needs. It is that wider assessment that the bill requires the police to make a primary consideration as they decide whether to arrest, detain, interview or charge a child. The factors that they will consider will be dictated by the circumstances of the investigation that they are dealing with.

It is right that the wellbeing of the child should be a primary consideration in all those circumstances. Any assessment of wellbeing must seek to identify all the factors in the life of the child or young person that may be benefiting or adversely affecting their wellbeing. That can potentially help to further children’s rights, as it is more inclusive. Consistency is important in this area, and the forthcoming statutory guidance on wellbeing in respect of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 reinforces the value of alignment with the 2014 act on the issue. There is a danger in creating confusion around terminology, and both the 2014 act and the bill provide consistency and clarity around expectations.

The committee highlighted concerns regarding the lack of consistency in use of the terms “welfare”, “best interests” and “well-being” of the child in this and other legislation. As demonstrated in amendments 151, 170, 188 and 196, I have taken that on board to ensure consistency. If the phrase “best interests” was brought into section 42 by amendment 65, that inconsistency would be reintroduced. Taking account of those points, I therefore ask Elaine Murray to not to move amendment 65.

Amendment 196 replaces the protections in section 42(9) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, ensuring that, where it is practicable and not detrimental to the wellbeing of a child who is officially accused of committing an offence, that child should not associate with an adult when in custody.

Amendment 197 replaces section 43(5) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and continues to ensure that the principal reporter is notified of cases where the procurator fiscal has decided, for whatever reason, not to proceed with a prosecution against a child. The purpose of the amendment is to enable the principal reporter to consider whether other appropriate action should be taken. In particular, the amendment makes it clear that, despite the decision not to prosecute, where a constable reasonably suspects that the child has committed the offence that led to their detention, they may be kept in a place of safety, in accordance with the provisions of the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, until the principal reporter has decided whether it is necessary to make a compulsory supervision order in respect of the child. The effect of the provision largely reflects the status quo.

11:15

Amendment 222 adjusts the meaning of police custody as a consequence of amendment 197. The effect will be that a person who is not being prosecuted will no longer be in “police custody” within the meaning of part 1 of the bill. It would apply if the principal reporter has directed that the person should remain in a place of safety under section 65 of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 pending a decision on whether to make a compulsory supervision order in respect of that person.

Amendment 255, in the name of Alison McInnes, seeks to amend section 42 of the bill, which relates to safeguarding and promoting the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration. The amendment would add a subsection that states:

“A decision”

...to hold a child in custody or interview a child about an offence

“must be exercised for the shortest possible period of time.”

I am not entirely sure what exercising a decision means, but I take the general point about ensuring that children are not kept in custody or interviewed for longer than necessary.

However, there is already a general duty under section 41 of the bill to ensure that people are not held unnecessarily that has the intended effect. Importantly, that duty relates to the test of necessity, whereas the phrase “shortest time possible” has no such test and could lead to an inappropriate release.

Section 10 also sets a carefully balanced test that must be considered before anyone is held in custody. In deciding whether that test is met in relation to a child, the police will have the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration, as provided for by section 42. Amendment 255 therefore adds nothing to the bill and does not work in terms of ordinary language. I invite Alison McInnes not to move it.

I move amendment 150.

John Finnie: I welcome amendment 150. I am sure that most police officers will acknowledge that dealing with young people in such circumstances is one of the most challenging things that they do, and therefore the background is very important. It may seem that amendment 150A makes a change for change’s sake, given that I fully support everything that is already there, but my thinking is that the decision is of such importance that it should be taken by someone who is detached from the operational experience.

The cabinet secretary says that there will not be a superintendent at every station. I sincerely hope that that will not be—if there were, it would mean that there were far too many superintendents. However, likewise, there will not be an inspector at every station. I am quite sure that the cabinet secretary is not trying to say that a superintendent would not be available to make timely decisions, not least because a duty superintendent has to make timely decisions on very sensitive matters that we need not go into here. To my mind, there is nothing more sensitive than a decision to formally detain a child.

I move amendment 150A.

Elaine Murray: The cabinet secretary said that Children 1st supports his amendments, but it did not support them originally. It did not support them because it looked as though the amendments would be discussed with other amendments on the rights of under-18s that will be discussed later on, and because the amendments do not go far enough as they would protect only a very small number of 16 and 17 year-olds who are under compulsory supervision orders and would not protect other 16 and 17-year-olds.

As a result of the way in which the amendments fall in our discussions, I will support them at this point. However, I think that the provisions will require further amendment at stage 3 in order to give greater protection to 16 and 17-year-olds.

My amendment 65 would amend section 42, which has as its title “Duty to consider child’s best interests”. If my amendment’s proposed introduction of the concept of “best interests” into the text of section 42 is inconsistent or confusing, I cannot see how having “best interests” in the section title is any less so. The meaning of “best interests” has been determined by a body of case law and is nationally and internationally... recognised. It has been used since 1959 and is in accordance with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. As I said, “best interests” is used in the section title but not in its text, which is inconsistent.

“Well-being” is a relatively new term, and although it appears in previous legislation it is not as well defined as “best interests”. It could be difficult to define in the context of section 42 and therefore difficult to implement. The use of the phrase “best interests” of a child is in line with international human rights obligations.

I listened to what John Finnie had to say on amendment 150A, and he has convinced me that it is appropriate.

Alison McInnes: As we have heard, section 42 places a duty on a constable to consider a child’s best interests in the early stages of the criminal justice process. It currently states that, when taking decisions on arrest, custody, interviews and charge, the constable “must treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child as a primary consideration.”

My amendment 255 would require the constable to exercise their power to hold a child in police custody and interview them

“for the shortest possible period of time.”

The amendment would make it explicit that that would have to be a consideration.

Amendment 255 is supported by Justice Scotland, and its intention is somewhat obvious: it is to ensure that when constables make decisions they bear in mind the unique vulnerability of children and the potentially damaging impact of their being held in custody or interviewed for long periods of time. The amendment is even more important given the committee’s agreement last week to an amendment that allows children to be held for up to 24 hours, which I opposed. The purpose of my amendment is to emphasise the need not to use up all that time. I will press my amendment, and I support Elaine Murray’s amendment 65.

The Convener: You have not moved your amendment yet—you are just speaking to it.

Does anyone else want to come in?

Margaret Mitchell: I understand the intention behind John Finnie’s amendment 150A. The decision to hold a child in custody is a serious one and possibly should be taken by a high-ranking officer. However, I wonder whether John Finnie has considered the unintended consequence of his amendment. As amendment 150 currently stands, an inspector, if they happened to be present, could decide that it was not appropriate to keep the child in custody. That would mean that the decision would be made more quickly than if people had to wait for a superintendent. We are widening the scope of the bill by including inspectors, who could be more readily available to take such important decisions more timeously. That is something to consider. I was persuaded that the minister had the provision more or less right in his amendment 150.

On Elaine Murray’s amendment 65, there is an issue about the terminology, especially if “best interests” is used in the section title. However, the cabinet secretary is sure that the phrase “well-being” is more appropriate. That could be a drafting issue, or there might be a more fundamental issue. However, I think that the cabinet secretary has looked at the issue.

The sentiment behind Alison McInnes’s amendment 255 is absolutely right: children should be held in custody for “the shortest possible ... time”. However, how does one define that? Can some test be devised? Is the phrase relative and therefore vague? Does it add anything? I am uncertain about that and will be interested to hear the cabinet secretary’s comments.

Roderick Campbell: John Finnie’s amendment 150A would introduce a requirement for the decision to be taken by a superintendent, which would be unnecessarily restrictive and not necessarily in the child’s best interests.

I have some sympathy with Elaine Murray’s amendment 65. We are struggling a wee bit with consistency. The cabinet secretary persuaded me that the bill is at least consistent with the 2014 act, but I still cannot quite understand what consideration might have been given when the 2014 act was drafted to the use of “well-being” and its implications for the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, which refers to “best interests”. It would be helpful to have further clarification of the point before stage 3.

Michael Matheson: It may be helpful if I deal first with the issue about the title of section 42. That has already been changed within the bill. It is not a matter of amendment; it is a matter that is dealt with through printing. It has been changed from “best interests” to “wellbeing” to ensure consistency. I hope that that addresses the concern that members had regarding the section title.

The Convener: Just to clarify, we thought that there would be a reprint.

Michael Matheson: It is a matter of printing, yes; it is not a matter of an amendment to the bill. The bill will be reprinted before stage 3.

The Convener: You are saying that the title has not been changed yet but that it will be changed, with the permission of the parliamentary authorities. Is that correct?

Michael Matheson: Yes. There is a technical process that it goes through for that.

The Convener: I just wanted to clarify that for the record.

Michael Matheson: The title will say “wellbeing” rather than “best interests”. I hope that that clarifies the point.

However, that point aside, a number of the amendments that I have lodged try to achieve that consistency and read-across with other children’s legislation. It is important to ensure that the police and other organisations have a consistent understanding of the terminology.

I turn now to the issue that John Finnie raised in amendment 150A on the rank of the officer taking decisions in relation to a detained child. Last week, I made the point that “the issue is about the quality of the decision making”. — [Official Report, Justice Committee, 29 September 2015; c 40.]

The decision is best taken by the individual who is best able to make an informed decision at that particular time. Operationally, I believe that the decision can best be made at the rank of inspector or chief inspector. Clearly, it could be made by an officer of a higher rank, if necessary, but I think that the rank of inspector or chief inspector should be the minimum at which a decision of such a nature should be made. There is no need to move up to the rank of superintendent. Of course, superintendents operate on an on-call basis for operational matters, but there is an issue to do with the speed at which decisions can be made in such instances. I believe that it is appropriate that the decision should be made as quickly as possible, and having decisions made at the rank of inspector or chief inspector will allow us to maximise the speed at which that can happen.

Returning to the issue that Elaine Murray raised, I am happy to have a dialogue with her between now and stage 3 if there are areas where she feels that further changes need to be made, and to consider what those are.

On amendment 255, in the name of Alison McInnes, I have already outlined how issues of language and definition mean that how what it proposes would be applied in particular circumstances is unclear. Legally, the amendment adds no protections to the bill, so it does not fit well within the bill. I understand the general thrust of what Alison McInnes is trying to achieve through the amendment, and I am happy to explore that with her between now and stage 3, to see whether there is a way of addressing the issue, or even whether there is a need for it to be addressed. However, as it stands at present, the language in and the drafting of the amendment do not add anything to the bill and do not sit well with the terms that are used in the bill.

John Finnie: I certainly did not in any way mean to be disparaging about the federated ranks. Amendment 150A is about the importance that is attached to the treatment of young people. In practical terms, in the area that I represent, for example, it just means phoning someone; indeed, an inspector will not be on duty in the vast majority of places. I am sure that the cabinet secretary does not wish to give the impression that a superintendent is not instantly available to answer a phone to deal with the many challenges that the modern police service faces outwith routine office hours—not that that is how the service works. I think that the amendment demonstrates the significance of the decision to detain a child by having it taken at the higher rank.

I press amendment 150A.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 150A be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 150A disagreed to.
Amendment 150 agreed to.
Amendments 151 and 152 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 19—Liberation by police

The Convener: Amendment 153, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 154, 155, 48, 156, 157 and 160 to 164. If amendment 155 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 48, as it will be pre-empted.

11:30

Michael Matheson: The amendments in this group relate to police powers to release people on undertaking.
Amendment 156 makes it clear that the sort of undertaking conditions that can be imposed include requirements to be in a specified place at a specified time, or to refrain from entering a specified place or type of place for a particular period. Those are curfew-type conditions. The bill as introduced stated that curfews could be imposed as undertaking conditions. Amendment 156 simply rewords the non-curfew conditions as they can be applied in undertakings for consistency with their counterparts for investigative liberation, as amended by amendment 143, which was debated earlier.

Amendment 157 provides that undertaking conditions can generally be authorised by a constable of the rank of sergeant or above but that curfew conditions requiring a suspect to be in a specified place at a specified time must be authorised by an officer of the rank of inspector or above.

I consider that the arrangements for the management and governance of custody facilities, coupled with the safeguards provided in the bill, mean that it is appropriate for most undertaking conditions to be set by a custody sergeant. The arguments for allowing sergeants to set undertaking conditions are similar to those that I made for investigative liberation conditions, although the context here is different.

Once a person has been charged, the police need to consider whether it is necessary to keep that person in custody until they can be brought before a court under section 18 of the bill or whether they can be released, either with or without an undertaking. The assessment of release options should be made by a specialist custody officer in consultation with the senior investigating officer and in accordance with the Lord Advocate’s guidelines on liberation by the police. That process will ensure that any special conditions are tailored to the particular case but that the final decision on what is proportionate and necessary will be made by an officer with the right knowledge and expertise in dealing with custody matters.

The bill already allows a specialist custody sergeant to decide to keep a person in custody or to release them without undertaking. Amendment 157 would allow that custody sergeant to release a person subject to undertaking conditions. The independence and increased professionalisation of custody division removes the need for decisions on liberation conditions to be taken at inspector level. The officer best placed to make decisions on whether a person should be released subject to undertaking conditions will, in most cases, be the sergeant in charge of the custody centre.

I believe that a higher level of authorisation is justified when imposing curfew conditions. There may be cases where it is necessary and proportionate to impose a curfew on a suspect, but it is important to recognise that doing so would place very significant restrictions on the suspect’s liberty. My amendment 157 therefore requires curfew conditions to be authorised by an inspector.

The provisions have to be flexible enough to cover the full spectrum of criminal offences, but there is scope for the Lord Advocate and the police to set out in guidance more finely grained authorisation processes for undertaking conditions in different circumstances. I believe that those are matters for the Lord Advocate and Police Scotland and that it would be unnecessarily restrictive to set out that detail on the face of the bill.

I believe that amendments 153 to 157 reinforce the robust and comprehensive system for police liberation set out in the bill.

I now come to amendments 160 to 164, which are also in my name. Those amendments restructure the provisions that are already in the bill on the procurator fiscal’s power to rescind or modify an undertaking and on the expiry of undertakings.

Amendments 160, 161, 162 and 164 are primarily drafting improvements that clarify the powers of the procurator fiscal and restructure the provisions on the rescission and expiry of undertakings in order to make the provisions easier to navigate.

Amendment 163 is more substantial. In addition to restating provisions about rescission of undertakings, it gives a new power to the police to arrest people who are reasonably suspected of being likely to breach an undertaking. It is based on an existing power that the police have to arrest suspects in anticipation of their breaching bail conditions.

Amendment 163 will ensure that people who are likely to breach an undertaking can be arrested in the same circumstances as people who are likely to breach bail conditions. The power could be used if, for example, the police consider it likely that the person will interfere with witnesses. Actual breach of undertaking is already an offence in respect of which the person can be arrested.

I will now respond to Elaine Murray’s amendment 48, which sets out the purposes against which the necessity and proportionality of conditions can be tested. It restricts those purposes to securing that the person surrenders to custody if required to do so, that the person does not interfere with a witness or otherwise obstruct the course of the investigation into the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody, the protection of the person or, if the person is under 18 years of age, the welfare or interests of the person.

As I explained earlier, amendment 155 will provide more flexibility to prevent interference with witnesses and evidence. Therefore I would ask Elaine Murray not press her amendment.

I believe that, taken together, the provisions in the bill on release on undertaking and the amendments in my name provide clarity and help to balance the interests of justice with individuals’ rights, and I invite the committee to support them.

I move amendment 153.

The Convener: I am waning a little, so we will go on to the end of the group of amendments on release and undertaking before taking a five-minute break. I call Elaine Murray to speak to amendment 48 and others in the group.

Elaine Murray: As the cabinet secretary said, amendment 48 refers to standard conditions and is similar to amendment 155 in the name of the cabinet secretary, which I agree is probably more flexible. However, I believe that the protection of a person or the welfare and interests of a person under 18 are important enough to appear on the face of the bill. Although I am prepared to support amendment 155, which will supersede amendment 48 if it is agreed to, there may still be a case for further amendments at stage 3 to include the protection of the person and the best interests of someone who is under 18.

Michael Matheson: If amendment 155 is agreed by the committee and becomes part of the bill, I will be more than happy to explore the issue further with Elaine Murray after the stage 2 process.

Amendment 153 agreed to.

Section 19, as amended, agreed to.

Section 20—Release on undertaking

Amendment 154 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: I call amendment 155 in the name of the cabinet secretary. I remind members that, if amendment 155 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 48, which would be pre-empted.

Amendment 155 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendments 156 to 158 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 20, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 159 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
Section 21—Modification of undertaking

Amendments 160 to 162 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 21, as amended, agreed to.

After section 21

Amendments 163 and 164 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 22 agreed to.

The Convener: Members will be delighted to know that I am suspending the meeting for a five-minute break.

11:43

Meeting suspended.

11:48

On resuming—

Section 23—Information to be given before interview

The Convener: Amendment 28, in the name of John Finnie, is grouped with amendments 165 and 166.

John Finnie: Amendment 28 would oblige a constable not only to caution a person not more than one hour before an interview, but to repeat the caution “immediately before” the constable interviews the person about an offence.

A long time ago, when I was learning about the law, the importance of timely cautions was constantly reinforced: it forms a significant part of case law. One hour is a long time for someone who is a suspect, and we know that many people who find themselves in police stations as suspects have challenging conditions. There should always be an overriding consideration of fairness and there should be the opportunity for the person to get their rights straight away. I imagine that most constables do that anyway. The amendment would disadvantage no one, but would simply reinforce people’s rights. I hope that members will support amendment 28.

I move amendment 28.

Michael Matheson: The bill provides for and will enhance the rights of individuals who are to be interviewed by the police by conferring upon them the right, if they so choose, not to say anything other than to give basic information, the right to have a solicitor present and the right to have another person or a solicitor informed that they are in custody. Those are fundamental rights and it is only correct that the bill will ensure fully that suspects are given such information in a timely and clear way.

I understand the reasons that John Finnie has set out in speaking to amendment 28, and I am sure that we all agree that the intention behind the relevant provisions in the bill is to ensure that anyone who is arrested or who is attending voluntarily at a police station is clearly informed about their rights. The question is whether amendment 28 would achieve that aim proportionately; it could require that the person who is to be interviewed be informed of their rights twice in the space of the hour prior to the interview. Although I am fully supportive of the principle that individuals should fully understand their rights, I do not believe that it is necessary for them to be informed of them twice in so short a time.

There are, in the bill, other safeguards of individuals’ rights. A person must be told on arrest, and on arrival at the police station, that they are under no obligation to provide any information to the police other than their name, address, nationality and their date and place of birth. In addition to that, the letter of rights includes information about the right to remain silent and states that any information will be recorded and may be given in evidence if the matter proceeds to trial. Therefore, I ask John Finnie not to press amendment 28.

I hope that the Government’s amendments in the group will provide further reassurance to John Finnie and the committee. We are fully supportive of the aim to ensure that suspects and accused persons are regularly advised of their rights and of relevant information. In that respect, amendment 165 will add to the information that a person must be told before they are interviewed: it will require a police officer to inform a suspect “of the general nature of” the offence that they are suspected of committing. Under section 3 of the bill, that information will already be given when a person is initially arrested. For consistency, however, we consider it appropriate that that information be stated again prior to the interview. I consider that to be a particularly important change for suspects who attend a police station voluntarily, because such persons may not already have been given that information. Amendment 165 will ensure that they are given it.

Amendment 166 will enhance protection of persons who are to be interviewed under the post-charge questioning procedure. The power to allow the police to question an accused person about an offence after he or she has been charged with that offence is included in the bill, as recommended by Lord Carloway in his review. An application to carry out questioning after charge has to go before a court. Where the court grants such an application, it must specify the length of time for which questioning is permitted, and can add other conditions to ensure that the questioning is not unfair—for example, to limit the scope of the questioning. Amendment 166 will ensure that a person who is being interviewed by the police in such a situation will be told of the time limit for the questioning and of any other conditions that have been imposed by the court. It is, therefore, an additional protection of the rights of the accused.

As I have already said, I hope that the Government’s amendments 165 and 166 will, by adding to the information given to suspects, be sufficient to satisfy members that amendment 28 is unnecessary.

The Convener: John Finnie will wind up and say whether he will press or seek to withdraw amendment 28.

John Finnie: It is my intention to press amendment 28, which enjoys the support of the Law Society of Scotland. It would be a modest provision under the sections governing “Rights of suspects”. It would oblige a constable not only to caution a person one hour before the interview, but to caution them immediately in advance of it. That is simply to reinforce the point that a person is not obliged to say anything. It would not be an onerous task, so it would be entirely proportionate to support the amendment. I hope that members will do so.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 28 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 28 disagreed to.

Amendments 165 and 166 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 23, as amended, agreed to.

Section 24—Right to have solicitor present

The Convener: Amendment 29, in the name of John Finnie, is grouped with amendments 243 to 248, 250, 251 and 253. If amendment 29 is agreed to, I cannot call amendments 243 and 244, because they will have been pre-empted.

John Finnie: I concur with a number of representations that I have received that say that the proposed threshold in paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 24(4) is inappropriate. Section 24(4) currently says that “a constable may, in exceptional circumstances, proceed to interview the person without a solicitor being present if the constable is satisfied that it is necessary to interview the person without delay in the interests of—

(a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or
(b) the apprehension of offenders.”

That wording could, and likely would, be used legitimately to cover a huge percentage of instances. Amendment 29 would ensure that a person would be interviewed without a solicitor being present only in the most exceptional circumstances. I consider that to be a fair and balanced approach.

I move amendment 29.

Alison McInnes: John Finnie and I are concerned about the same things, but we have taken a different tack to try to address them. All my amendments in the group seek to strengthen the rules around the ability of the police to interfere with the fundamental rights of both adult and child suspects. I am talking about the right to be assisted by a solicitor during interview, the right to a consultation with a solicitor, the right of adults to have an intimation sent to another person, and the right of children to have access to their parent or guardian.

Section 24 states that a

“constable may, in exceptional circumstances, proceed to interview the person without a solicitor being present if the constable” believes that it is necessary to proceed in “the interests of—

(a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or
(b) the apprehension of offenders.”

The section grants the right to override a suspect’s request for legal assistance. Section 36 establishes that constables may delay a person’s right to a private consultation with a solicitor on the same basis.

I firmly believe that referring to the prevention or detection of crime and “the apprehension of offenders” is far too broad a basis on which to deny someone their right to be assisted by a solicitor. That is why my amendments 243 to 245, 250, 251 and 253 would create a switch to an interference-based definition of need that stresses that restriction of those rights must be to prevent “interference with evidence” or another person, and would elevate the making of such decisions from constable to superintendent level.

Members will note—as the convener has already indicated—that my amendments 243 and 244 would be pre-empted by agreement to amendment 29, which is in the name of my colleague John Finnie. His amendment contrasts with mine: it would allow a constable to proceed to interview the person without a solicitor being present only in exceptional circumstances. Amendment 29 does not specify what those circumstances may be, nor does it mention sign-off up the ranks. It would still grant the police too much leeway, although it is obviously better than what is in the bill.

The bill suggests that denial of those fundamental rights could become routine. My amendments highlight the significance of those decisions and would ensure that proper safeguards are in place to discourage misuse of the powers.

Elaine Murray: I agree that there is a need for the police not to routinely abuse their powers, but I do not believe that the bill encourages that, because it makes it quite clear that it is talking about “in exceptional circumstances”. Obviously, with things such as the prevention of crime, there are important circumstances in which it may be necessary to act very quickly.

I do not disagree with what Alison McInnes says about “interference with evidence in connection with the offence” and so on, but I think that those things are, to an extent, encompassed. There might be an argument for expansion at stage 3 to include some of them, but I am not very sure about that.

On amendment 245, which is on the “appropriate constable” being a superintendent who “has not been involved in the investigation” of the offence, I do not see how somebody who has not been involved in that investigation could judge whether an exceptional case has arisen. Therefore, I would also resist amendment 245.

Roderick Campbell: I do not have anything to add to what Elaine Murray has said, other than that I support it.

12:00

Michael Matheson: The amendments in the group relate to authorisations for interviewing suspects without a solicitor being present, to delaying intimation of the fact someone is in custody and to delaying consultations with solicitors.

I appreciate that the intention behind the amendments is to protect suspects. That is a key purpose of part 1, which aims to strike the right balance between protecting the rights of suspects and ensuring effective investigation of crime. In order to do this, chapters 4 and 5 of part 1 confer crucial rights on suspects, including the right to have a solicitor present during interview, the right to have someone else informed that they are in custody and the right to a private consultation with a solicitor at any time. There will be exceptional circumstances in which these rights cannot be delivered, but we should set a high bar for when that can happen.

Amendments 29 and 244 would amend section 24(4), which deals with circumstances in which a person could be interviewed without a solicitor. Section 24(4) permits such an interview only “in exceptional circumstances” but does not define those circumstances. That reflects the recommendation in the Carloway report that interviewing a suspect without a solicitor, against the suspect’s wishes, should be possible only in exceptional circumstances. Lord Carloway recommended that “exceptional circumstances” should not be defined because case law has made it clear that it means in very rare cases:

“for example where an immediate interview is required in order to protect persons or property from serious harm.”

Section 24(4) also includes an additional test so that before proceeding to interview where there are exceptional circumstances, police must also be “satisfied that it is necessary to interview ... without delay in the interests of—

(a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or
(b) the apprehension of offenders.”

John Finnie’s amendment 29 would remove that additional test of necessity. In doing so, it would remove protections for suspects and reduce transparency in decision making—although I appreciate that that was probably not the intention.

Alison McInnes’ amendment 244 would leave the “exceptional circumstances” element of the test in place but would narrow the parameters of the necessity test. The effect of that would be, for example, to prevent the police from deciding that it was necessary to interview in exceptional circumstances in cases where there was an additional suspect on the run. Amendment 251 would substitute the same narrower test into section 36(2), which deals with circumstances in which a suspect’s exercise of their right to a private consultation with a solicitor could be delayed.

Amendments 243, 245 to 248, 250 and 253 all seek to require that decisions to interview without a solicitor or to delay intimation or consultations be made by constables of senior rank. The assumption underlying the amendments seems to be that requiring that particular decisions be made by very senior officers is necessary to ensure good decision making.

All constables go through professional training throughout their careers to ensure that they are fully able to carry out whatever role they have to undertake. All custody facilities across Scotland now come under the command of the custody division, and there is a corporate approach to dealing with people in custody, with a national standard operating procedure and training for all officers who work in those facilities.

The Justice Committee agreed last week that sergeants should make the initial decisions to keep people in custody. It would be during that initial authorisation procedure that any requests would be made to delay notifications to solicitors or named persons and, potentially, to interview without a solicitor being present. The person who makes that initial custody decision would be best placed to consider the other rights-based decisions. The decisions that would be covered by the amendments relate to rights that are afforded to people who are being held in custody. I believe that such decisions are best made by specialist custody officers within the custody division—as is the case at present.

The decisions that would be affected by the amendments may also need to be made in exceptional circumstances in which time is of the essence. One example might be a kidnap scenario: requiring authorisation from a superintendent before interviewing a suspect could endanger life by creating delay in a situation in which time is critical. There is a relatively small number of superintendents in Scotland: although there will always be a superintendent on call, that superintendent may not be instantly available to make such a decision.

I appreciate that we are talking about important decisions to withhold or delay the delivery of crucial rights to suspects. The bill already sets high tests to ensure that the powers can be used only when absolutely necessary. However, I have listened to the arguments that have been put forward by Alison McInnes and I agree that authorisation by a police constable may not be appropriate in all cases. Therefore, I urge John Finnie not to press amendment 29 and Alison McInnes not to move her amendments, and I will undertake to consider the matter further and to lodge amendments at stage 3 to ensure that the decisions are made by constable of the most appropriate rank.

The Convener: John Finnie’s body language seems to show that he is not persuaded, so I do not know whether that has done it, cabinet secretary.

John Finnie: No, convener—I am grateful to the cabinet secretary for his comments. He says that the bill does not define “exceptional circumstances” and he rightly alluded to Lord Carloway’s recommendations and the fact that there is ample case law. I suppose that that is the challenge when we are trying to make statute and to make reference to case law but not make the statute voluminous every time. Likewise, there is no definition of what a constable’s “satisfaction” is or what constitutes “necessity” with regard to interviewing a person. However, I acknowledge that the cabinet secretary has seen that there are problems, so I am happy to wait to see what he comes back with at stage 3. I will not press amendment 29: I seek permission to withdraw it.

Amendment 29, by agreement, withdrawn.

The Convener: Amendment 243, in the name of Alison McInnes, has already been debated with amendment 29.

Alison McInnes: I will move amendment 243. I understand that the cabinet secretary has asked me not to move amendment 245.

The Convener: We are all getting a bit battle weary—I can hear it in your voice.

Amendment 243 moved—[Alison McInnes].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 243 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 243 disagreed to.

Amendment 244 moved—[Alison McInnes].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 244 be agreed to. Are we agreed?
Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 244 disagreed to.
Amendment 245 not moved.
Section 24 agreed to.

Section 25—Consent to interview without solicitor

The Convener: Amendment 55, in the name of Elaine Murray, is grouped with amendments 56, 167, 57, 58, 168, 59, 60, 173, 61 to 64, 38 and 32.

I take a deep breath here, because I must point out that there are various pre-emptions in the group—you will be tested on this immediately after I have read it out. If amendment 58 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 168. If amendment 63 is agreed to, I cannot call amendments 184 and 185 in the group “Rights of under 18s: minor amendments”. If amendment 38 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 32. By the looks on your faces, I am guessing that you all took that in.

Elaine Murray: I will try to get through this as quickly as possible, as I have several amendments in the group. My amendments aim to afford the same protection to 16 and 17-year-old children as the bill gives to children under the age of 16.

My amendments 55 and 56 apply to section 25, which is on the ability to consent to interview without a solicitor present. The bill treats older children aged 16 and 17 differently from children who are under 16, despite the fact that it defines a child as someone under the age of 18. That is the case in much of the legislation that we have passed, such as the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014, the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 and the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Bill, which we passed last week.

We know that young people who have contact with the criminal justice system are often vulnerable in different ways. Many young offenders have poor literacy and numeracy skills and some may have chaotic home lives. Recent research by the British Psychological Society indicates that many have neurological conditions or acquired brain injury, and some will have taken legal or illegal substances that render them less risk averse than normal.

Apart from that, a young person who is under arrest with the prospect of interview by the police may be frightened, worried that their parents, school or employers are going to find out and distressed. That in itself could lead to panicked rather than rational behaviour. Access to calm and informed legal advice from a solicitor is particularly necessary when a young person is vulnerable or not thinking clearly.

My amendments 55 and 56 would protect older children aged 16 and 17 from making the wrong decision to consent to interview without a solicitor being present, by ensuring that no one under the age of 18 can give such consent. The amendments are compliant with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which states that children who are accused of breaking the law have the right to legal help and fair treatment.

In addition, amendments 57 and 58 would remove children under 18 from the provisions that exclude from consenting to interview without a solicitor persons who appear to a constable to have a mental disorder or who cannot communicate effectively with the police or understand what is happening. Those provisions will not be necessary if amendments 55 and 56 are agreed to.

In my view, amendments 167 and 168 are inadequate, as they offer the additional protection only to young people aged 16 and 17 who are on a compulsory supervision order. The vast majority of children on CSOs are under the age of 16, so the number who would be protected by the amendments is very small. I agree that those young people need protection, but they will receive it if my amendments are agreed to.

In my view, amendments 167 and 168 are inadequate, as they offer the additional protection only to young people aged 16 and 17 who are on a compulsory supervision order. The vast majority of children on CSOs are under the age of 16, so the number who would be protected by the amendments is very small. I agree that those young people need protection, but they will receive it if my amendments are agreed to.

Amendments 59 and 60, which are to section 30, are similar and would ensure that all children under the age of 18, rather than 16, have the right to have intimation sent to another person that they are in custody. The child’s parent or another adult named by the child will receive intimation as quickly as practicable. The arguments for amendments 55 and 56 regarding the vulnerability of under-18s are the same. An appropriate adult should be aware that a child has been taken into custody.

Amendment 61 would prevent 16 and 17-year-olds from requesting that no intimation be sent to their parent or other named adult. Exactly the same arguments can be made regarding the varied vulnerabilities of older children as were made for amendments 55 and 56. Amendment 61 would ensure compatibility with the rest of the bill and with recent legislation, as I stated.

Amendment 62 would give a parent or other adult who has been sent intimation that a child who is under 18 is in police custody the right of access to the child. That would change the age to which that right applies from 16 to 18.

Amendment 63 would remove section 32(2), which refers to 16 and 17-year-olds, as that section will not be necessary if amendment 62 is agreed to. Amendment 64 is consequential on amendment 63.

Amendment 38, in the name of John Pentland, would remove any reference to age in the section on support for vulnerable persons, so that all persons would have equal rights to support should a constable believe them to be suffering from a mental disorder—although that condition would be removed by John Finnie’s amendments, which, incidentally, we also support—or if a person is unable to communicate sufficiently with the police.

My amendment 32 is an alternative. It would change the age of 18 in section 33(1)(b) to 16. That is a back-up in case my other amendments and John Pentland’s amendment 38 are not agreed to. It would provide vulnerable 16 and 17-year-olds with support.

I move amendment 55.

Michael Matheson: In Scots law, there are a number of definitions of a child, and those are put in place for different purposes. Under the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014, the term “child” generally means a person who has not attained the age of 18. However, under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, “child” generally means a person who is under 16, although the definition is extended to 16 and 17-year-olds who are subject to a compulsory supervision order.

For the purposes of arrest, detention and questioning, the bill defines a child as a person who is under the age of 18. Everyone of any age has the right of access to a solicitor in the context of part 1. However, the bill reflects the self-evident fact that 16 and 17-year-olds have greater capacity, maturity and autonomy than younger children, and that is commonly reflected in other rights and responsibilities. The age-based laws that allow for 17-year-olds to live independently, vote, work and marry reflect the extent of self-determination that can exist at 16 years of age and beyond. With that greater right of self-determination should come the right for older young people to have a bigger say in the major issues and incidents in their lives.

This bill seeks to respect, reflect and act on young people’s individual views in a meaningful yet responsible way. Currently, the bill provides that a child under 16 cannot consent to an interview without a solicitor being present. The bill further provides that anyone aged 16 or 17 can decide to be interviewed without a solicitor, but there is a safeguard: in order to do so, they must have the agreement of a relevant person.

12:15

While I sympathise with the underlying intention, the effect of Elaine Murray’s amendments 55 to 58 would be to remove the right of any 16 or 17-year-old to consent to be interviewed without a solicitor.

The Scottish Government prefers an approach which would allow young people aged 16 and over to make their own decision, with safeguards in place to support them in that.

That is consistent with Lord Carloway’s recommendations and takes account of article 12 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child—the right to an opinion and for that to be listened to and taken seriously.

Crucially, the effect of Elaine Murray’s amendments would be to remove the obligation on those young people to take on a solicitor. While those young people could not be lawfully interviewed without a solicitor, they could still be charged, released or released on investigative liberation.

On balance, it is preferable to allow for the greater level of self-determination of 16 and 17-year-olds, while also providing additional protection for those subject to compulsory supervision.

I assure the committee that we plan to have further dialogue with partners, including children’s organisations, on those issues before stage 3. The wider needs of 16 and 17-year-olds who may be vulnerable but are not subject to compulsory supervision will also have to be reflected in guidance and practice requirements, which will have to be fully implemented on the ground.

I ask Elaine Murray not to press her amendments 55 to 58.

We also take seriously the fact that some 16 and 17-year-olds are more mature than others. After further discussions with Police Scotland and the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration, we are persuaded that amendments are required to improve the protections afforded to 16 and 17-year-olds in custody who are perhaps more vulnerable.
I have therefore lodged amendments 167 and 168, which relate to young persons aged 16 and 17 who are subject to a compulsory supervision order under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011. Our amendments provide that all who are subject to such orders, and specifically those aged 16 and 17, should be treated in the same way as those aged under 16. Most significantly, that will remove the right of those young people to waive access to a solicitor.

The Scottish Government amendments are a positive and proportionate change. I believe that they strike an appropriate balance between respecting individual autonomy and affording protection to the most vulnerable youngsters.

Section 30 of the bill sets out the right of a person in police custody to have another person told that they are in custody. Section 32 sets out the right of those under 18 in custody to access the person sent intimation under section 30.

The bill as introduced did not allow a 16 or 17-year-old to notify a responsible person that they were in police custody, without requiring that person to come to where the young person was being held. Amendment 173 allows those young people to intimate without requiring the relevant adult to attend at the police office.

I recognise and acknowledge Elaine Murray’s amendments 59 to 64, which also seek to deliver a raising of the relevant age in sections 30 and 32, but this time to include all those under 18. However, as I have said before, I do not believe that such a blanket approach is appropriate in respect of 16 and 17-year-olds.

I ask Elaine Murray to consider the package of Government amendments that I have lodged and not to press amendments 59 to 64.

Amendments 38 and 32, in the names of John Pentland and Elaine Murray respectively, relate to the age at which the vulnerable persons provisions in section 33 apply.

Section 33 places a duty on the police to seek support for vulnerable adult suspects who, as a result of a mental disorder, are unable to understand what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police.

That is intended to reflect Lord Carloway’s recommendations in relation to vulnerable adult suspects. As he defined a child as someone under the age of 18, it followed that adults should be those aged 18 or over, which is the approach that the section currently takes.

In their written evidence, however, the Scottish appropriate adult network, Police Scotland and the Scottish Association for Mental Health suggested that the definition of vulnerable person should be expanded to include 16 and 17-year-olds. They noted that that would reflect current practice whereby appropriate adults provide support to vulnerable suspects aged 16 and over.

The bill already makes important distinctions between those under 16 years of age and those aged 16 and 17. On reflection, therefore, I am now persuaded that the bill should provide an additional safeguard by including vulnerable child suspects aged 16 and 17 in the vulnerable persons provisions in section 33.

Amendment 32, in the name of Elaine Murray, achieves that and I am happy to support it. However, I am unable to support amendment 38, in the name of John Pentland. That amendment would remove the age criteria from section 33 entirely, resulting in support being sought in relation to children younger than 16.

Although I completely understand the desire to ensure support for all vulnerable persons in custody, section 33 is aimed specifically at those vulnerable adult suspects who are currently supported by appropriate adults, to put that support on a statutory basis. Those support arrangements are simply not designed to cater for the specific needs of children—needs that are met through other means.

The bill strengthens support for children and young people, with a range of provisions in relation to intimation, access and support. For example, children under 16 would always have support from a relevant person and a solicitor, even in cases where they did not have particular communication difficulties. There are also protections for 16 and 17-year-olds, some of which are specific to children subject to compulsory supervision.

Given that the particular support needs of children are addressed elsewhere, I consider that the focus of section 33 should remain on those aged over 16, so I ask Elaine Murray to consider not moving amendment 38, in John Pentland’s name.

Margaret Mitchell: The cabinet secretary makes a strong case. He refers to 16 and 17-year-olds being more mature and refers to both the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. I welcome his amendments that look at vulnerable 16 and 17-year-olds. I think that they strike the right balance, as does Elaine Murray’s amendment 32.

Elaine Murray: I am grateful to the cabinet secretary for accepting amendment 32. However, he has not persuaded me that my earlier amendments are not necessary. As I said, other legislation such as the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014 and the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Bill recognise the vulnerability of people under the age of 18. Although we have age-based laws, maturity is not necessarily the same as age. Somebody aged 14 could be more mature than somebody aged 17 given their life experience and so on.

I remain of the opinion that children under 18 who are being interviewed by the police are going to be vulnerable for a whole variety of reasons, not least the circumstances in which they find themselves. Children who come to the attention of the criminal justice system are often vulnerable in a number of ways that are not absolutely obvious on first inspection, so I press amendment 55.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 55 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
- Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
- McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
- McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
- Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
- Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
- Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
- Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
- Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
- Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 56 moved—[Elaine Murray].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 56 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
- Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
- McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
- McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
- Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
- Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
- Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
- Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
- Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
- Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 56 disagreed to.

Amendment 57 not moved.

The Convener: Amendment 30, in the name of John Finnie, is grouped with amendments 31, 169, 33, 189, 34, 190, 249, 191 and 220. I know that you love pre-emptions, so I point out that if amendment 31 is agreed to I cannot call amendment 169 and that if amendment 34 is agreed to I cannot call amendment 190.

John Finnie: Amendment 30 relates to section 25, which is on consent to interview without a solicitor. The amendment removes the mental disorder requirement when it appears to a constable that a person over 16 years of age is "unable to ... understand sufficiently what is happening, or communicate effectively with the police" for the purpose of that person not being entitled to waive their right to be interviewed without having a solicitor present.

The Law Society and others believe that it is difficult for a police officer to assess whether a person is suffering from a mental disorder—indeed, it is a challenge for many people. The support of a solicitor should not be restricted as it is presently. Indeed, anyone unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or unable to communicate effectively with the police should not be interviewed without a solicitor present.

I move amendment 30.

Michael Matheson: In its stage 1 report the Justice Committee highlighted concerns that the definition of vulnerable person in the bill may not capture all those needing additional support when in custody and asked that the Scottish Government give that further consideration.

A particular concern raised during stage 1 was about the use of the term "mental disorder" as part of the definition of a vulnerable person in sections 25 and 33 of the bill. There were suggestions that that term should be removed and that the only criteria for identifying a vulnerable person in custody should be that they are unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police. Amendments 30, 31, 33 and 34, in the name of John Finnie, seek to do that.

Although I appreciate those concerns and the desire to ensure that all those who require support to communicate with the police receive it, it is worth revisiting the intention behind sections 25 and 33 and the underlying recommendations by Lord Carloway.

When discussing the support needs of vulnerable suspects, Lord Carloway’s report noted that individuals who are intoxicated through alcohol consumption or drug use or who are experiencing short-term illness may be unable to communicate effectively but that such difficulties will be cured through the passage of time. It also noted that some individuals may not be able to understand what is happening as a result of language or hearing difficulties but that that could be resolved through the use of an interpreter or by other means.

A deliberate—and crucial—distinction was made between those scenarios and cases in which an individual has a permanent or semi-permanent condition that results in their being particularly vulnerable and requiring additional support to ensure that they understand what is happening and can communicate with the police. It is at those cases that the relevant provisions in sections 25 and 33 are aimed.

That is why, as part of the definition of a vulnerable person, the term “mental disorder” was used. That term encompasses mental illnesses, personality disorders and learning disabilities, and it reflects the current basis on which support from appropriate adult services is offered.

The police already have considerable experience in identifying those at risk and arranging for support where necessary. Equally, they have experience in dealing with those who, for the reasons that I have mentioned, may be experiencing communication difficulties of a more temporary nature.

If the reference to “mental disorder” is removed, the requirements of sections 25 and 33 would apply in relation to those who are temporarily intoxicated or who simply require an interpreter or other assistance. That would result in communication support being sought where it is simply not required, with potentially significant practical and financial implications for current providers of appropriate adult services. It may also have an impact on the legal profession as a result of an increase in the number of adults unable to consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present.

12:30

I consider that a requirement that communication difficulties be linked to permanent or semi-permanent conditions is vital in order to identify those who genuinely require the support and protection offered by sections 25 and 33. For that reason, I am not persuaded that the term “mental disorder” should be removed. However, for the reasons given by John Finnie and others at stage 1, we intend to keep the provisions under review as part of wider on-going work to examine the remit and provision of appropriate adults. The criteria for support under section 33 can be changed by subordinate legislation, if that is considered desirable in future. On that basis, I ask John Finnie to consider withdrawing amendment 30 and not moving amendments 31, 33 and 34.

Amendments 169 and 190, in my name, will make minor changes to the definition of “mental disorder” in sections 25 and 33. The term is currently defined by reference to section 328(1) of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, but subsection (2) of that section contains further context to the definition—in particular, it sets out characteristics that do not of themselves signify mental disorder. To ensure consistency with the 2003 act, it is desirable to refer to the definition of “mental disorder” in its entirety.

Amendment 189 is a minor technical amendment to ensure stylistic consistency between sections 25(2)(b) and 33(1)(c), which are worded in similar terms.

Amendments 191 and 220 relate to the regulation-making power in section 34. They will remove that section from the bill and replicate it after section 53, with a number of changes. As the bill stands, the powers in section 34 would allow the Scottish ministers to amend part of the definition of a vulnerable person in section 33, which currently provides that such persons are those who, “owing to mental disorder”, seem to be “unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively.”

Section 25(2)(b), which describes persons who may not consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present, also uses the definition, but there is no means of altering it by subordinate legislation. I consider that such a power should be added, to ensure that any changes made to section 33 can, if appropriate, be replicated at section 25.

I also consider it prudent to further extend the regulation-making power to allow the Scottish ministers to amend the definitions relating to mental disorder and the police at sections 25(6) and 33(5). The terms are also used in sections 25(2)(b) and 33(1)(c), which themselves can be amended by regulation, so consequential changes may be required if those powers are ever used.

Amendment 249, in the name of Alison McInnes, relates to concerns that were raised at stage 1, including in the committee’s report, that although section 33 will place a duty on the police to request support it does not identify where the responsibility lies for ensuring the availability and adequate provision of suitably trained persons.

The committee will be aware that, more recently, Lord Bonomy recommended that the bill should identify a body with responsibility for ensuring the adequate provision of appropriate adult services. Amendment 249 would place such a duty on local authorities, which currently provide such services.

When the bill was introduced, it was considered that the appropriate adult system was working well and that a light-touch approach should be adopted—in essence, placing the referral process on a statutory basis but going no further. However, further evidence, including evidence submitted at stage 1, has persuaded me that the current model for appropriate adult services is not sustainable over the longer term. Concerns have been expressed about the accessibility and consistency of service provision, the exact remit of appropriate adults and funding for the service, all of which warrant further consideration.

I therefore appreciate the intention behind amendment 249 and agree that action is required. However, if we are to put in place an effective and sustainable appropriate adult service, it is vital that we get the model right. To that end, we are leading work with local authorities, the health service, Police Scotland, the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland and other interested parties to identify the best way to provide a sustainable service, taking account of Lord Bonomy’s recommendation.

Workshops have been undertaken this year with key interests at national and local level, which have informed the development of potential service delivery options. We recently sought comments on those options, including from those who deliver the service on the ground. Over the coming weeks and months more detailed analysis, including consideration of financial implications, will be undertaken.

Although I am sympathetic to the issues raised by the committee and others, it is important not to allocate responsibility for the appropriate adult service without completing the work under way and reaching a consensus with those who deliver and use the service.

I expect to be in a position by stage 3 to set out our preferred approach for the sustainable delivery of appropriate adult services across Scotland and, on that basis, I ask Alison McInnes to consider not moving her amendment 249.

Alison McInnes: As we have just heard, Lord Bonomy’s post-corroboration safeguards review recommended "that the Bill be amended to identify a body or organisation with responsibility for ensuring adequate provision of persons with appropriate skills or qualifications to provide support for vulnerable persons in custody."

He said that that is "a vital safeguard for a vulnerable suspect."

I welcome the cabinet secretary’s recognition of the need for that.

My amendment 249, which is intended to give effect to Lord Bonomy’s recommendation, is supported by the Law Society. It proposes that we specifically enlist local authorities to provide that support. As we know, provision is patchy, there is little co-ordination and we do not necessarily know where to turn to in order to get it.

I am grateful for the cabinet secretary’s response. Amendment 249 is, without a doubt, a probing amendment. It has done its job. If, by stage 3, we can have an answer on the way forward, I will be more than happy.

Elaine Murray: I do not quite follow the cabinet secretary’s arguments on John Finnie’s amendment 30.

First, I make clear that I do not like the term "mental disorder". I appreciate that that is defined in statute, but it is a slightly derogatory term for people who have mental health issues or learning difficulties. Under the bill, the only reason that a constable can decide that a person cannot be interviewed without a solicitor will be because they do not understand what is happening or cannot communicate effectively as they have a mental disorder. However, there are other circumstances when someone may not be able to do that. I am not just talking about someone being drunk or under the influence of drugs. For example, someone may not be able to speak English well and may have difficulty communicating, particularly under such stressful circumstances.

If John Finnie wants to press amendment 30, I am quite inclined to continue to support it.

John Finnie: I note what the cabinet secretary said about subsequent subordinate legislation. It is appropriate that we keep all legislation under revision. However, with regard to this specific issue, the problems are well known and documented. I have dealt with a number of cases and the police have dealt with the responsible adults very well.

The cabinet secretary talked about additional support to help people to communicate. We want informed decision making. That would legitimise the information that is obtained. There is ample case law to say that information obtained under duress is inadmissible.

I return to the wording in the Law Society’s submission. Anyone unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or unable to communicate effectively with the police

"should not be interviewed without having a solicitor present."

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 30 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

Abstentions
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 4, Abstentions 1.

In that case, I use my casting vote against the amendment. I heard what the cabinet secretary said about the matter, and I hope that there will be developments in that area.

Amendment 30 disagreed to.

The Convener: I remind members that, if amendment 58 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 168 under the pre-emption rule.

Amendment 58 not moved.

Amendment 168 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: I remind members that, if amendment 31 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 169 under the pre-emption rule.

Amendment 31 not moved.

Amendment 169 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 25, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 26 to 29 agreed to.

Section 30—Right to have intimation sent to other person

Amendment 59 moved—[Elaine Murray].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 59 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 59 disagreed to.

Amendment 60 moved—[Elaine Murray].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 60 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 60 disagreed to.

Amendment 246 moved—[Alison McInnes].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 246 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 3, Against 6, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 246 disagreed to.
Amendments 170 and 171 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 247 not moved.

The Convener: Amendment 172, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 174, 175, 177 to 179 and 182 to 187. I remind members that amendments 184 and 185 are pre-empted by amendment 63.

Michael Matheson: These are minor amendments in relation to under-18s, which follow from the earlier consideration that the committee has given to the two groups of amendments on social work involvement in relation to under-18s in police custody and the rights of under-18s with reference to consent to interview without a solicitor present, the sending of intimation and the access to other persons and other support. The amendments complement and help give effect to the bill’s provisions for the protection of child suspects while in police custody.

Amendment 172 is a minor technical amendment that clarifies that the person being referred to in section 30 is “the person in custody”.

The effect of amendments 174, 175, 177 and 179, as well as being minor amendments as part of the group on social work involvement in relation to under-18s, is to add to the circumstances in which alternative arrangements to contacting the person requested may apply. Those are: where it is not practicable for the police to contact the person that they have been asked to contact; or, where the local authority advises against contacting the person.

When any of those circumstances occur, the police do not have to contact the person or continue to try to contact the person, as the case may be. In such cases, intimation must be sent by the police to an “appropriate person” as defined in section 31(5). Minor amendments in the group of amendments on social work involvement in relation to under-18s—in particular, amendments 176, 180 and 181—are associated with that.

Section 30 sets out the right of a person in police custody to have another person told that they are in custody. Section 32 sets out the right of under-18s in custody to access the person sent intimation under section 30. It is possible that more than one person might be sent intimation under section 30. In that event, amendments 182 to 184 and 186 to 187 make it clear that the police must give only one person so intimated access to the child suspect at a time, though they may in their discretion give access to more than one at a time. The approach strikes an appropriate balance between facilitating support and not being unduly burdensome on the police to manage.

Amendment 185 provides that the issue of whether the person contacted can attend at the person in custody within a reasonable time does not prevent the person being contacted by the police.

I ask the committee to support the amendments.

I move amendment 172.

Amendment 172 agreed to.

Section 30, as amended, agreed to.

12:45

Section 31—Right to have intimation sent: under 18s

Amendments 173 to 178 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 61 moved—[Elaine Murray].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 61 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For

Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against

Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 61 disagreed to.

Amendments 179 to 181 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 31, as amended, agreed to.

Section 32—Right of under 18s to have access to other person

Amendment 62 moved—[Elaine Murray].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 62 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For

Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 4, Against 5, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 62 disagreed to.

Amendment 182 and 183 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: I remind members that, if amendment 63 is agreed to, I cannot call amendments 184 and 185 under the pre-emption rule.

Amendment 63 not moved.

Amendments 184 to 186 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendments 64 and 248 not moved.

Amendment 187 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 32, as amended, agreed to.

After section 32

Amendment 188 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 33—Support for vulnerable persons

The Convener: I remind members that, if amendment 38 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 32, under the pre-emption rule.

Amendment 38 not moved.

Amendment 32 moved—[Elaine Murray]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Elaine Murray has won one—she will be celebrating. The cake is on her at 3 o’clock.

Amendment 33 not moved.

Amendment 189 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: I remind members that, if amendment 34 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 190, under the pre-emption rule.

Amendment 34 not moved.

Amendment 190 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 33, as amended, agreed to.

Section 34—Power to make further provision

Amendment 249 not moved.
was to be interviewed, except in exceptional circumstances. It is not clear from the amendment what should be considered exceptional circumstances.

The Scottish Government has given extensive consideration to the appropriate means by which access to a solicitor should be provided to a person while at the police station, to enable advice and assistance to be delivered in an efficient and effective way. Lord Carloway recommended that “subject to what can reasonably be funded by the Scottish Legal Aid Board or the suspect himself, it is ultimately for the suspect to decide whether the advice from the solicitor should be provided by telephone or in person.”

Furthermore, Lord Carloway explained that, initially, the person would be expected to speak to a solicitor in private over the telephone, which would enable the solicitor to give immediate initial advice and to discuss whether the solicitor’s attendance at the police station was necessary or desirable.

As members are aware, the current means by which suspects can secure legal advice is through the solicitor contact line. The contact line is administered by the Scottish Legal Aid Board, and legal advice to suspects is provided through a mixture of solicitors employed by SLAB and private practice solicitors. The line operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Suspects can receive legal advice either over the telephone or in person, if so required.

Not every suspect will want or require personal attendance by a solicitor. Solicitors are likely to want to consider what is in the best interests of their client—whether that is advice by phone or a personal attendance. The Scottish Government favours provisions that allow for the most appropriate means of securing legal advice and for the preferences and requirements of the particular suspect. A telephone consultation will be appropriate for some individuals and in some circumstances. However, it is acknowledged that it may not be suitable for everyone, which is why the Government has chosen the most flexible, cost-effective and efficient means for suspects to secure legal advice. As I have just explained, the choice of personal attendance lies with the suspect, in conjunction with the solicitor. I consider that to be a proportionate and fair approach.

Amendments 192 and 193 are technical, drafting adjustments to avoid the slight awkwardness of expressions in relation to consultation with a solicitor prior to interview.

As I said, the bill extends the right of access to a solicitor to all suspects who are held in police custody, regardless of whether the police intend to question the suspect. I consider that to be a significant step, demonstrating the progress and the commitment that is being made to safeguard the rights of suspects and detained persons.

I consider that there should be time for the new provisions in the bill to bed in before we make what could be unnecessary or potentially inappropriate changes. For the reasons that I have explained, I ask Alison McInnes not to press amendment 252.

Roderick Campbell: I emphasise what the cabinet secretary has just said: the choice really ought to be for the suspect, in conjunction with his solicitor. Furthermore, we have not heard anything from Alison McInnes about the cost of her proposals, but I suspect that it would be significant.

John Finnie: There is a cost associated with not having the highest standards of justice applied to people. If Mr Campbell, for instance, was given the choice of phoning someone or meeting them face to face and assessing the entire set of circumstances as laid out by my colleague, I know which option he would be likely to choose.

Of course there will be challenges associated with the proposals but, with the new legislation, we should start off with the best possible standards. For that reason, I will support Alison McInnes’s amendment 252.

Alison McInnes: Amendment 252 does not specify what the exceptional circumstances would be. That is quite right, cabinet secretary. However, the term is used elsewhere in the bill without definition, so one must presume that the phrase is well known and can readily be interpreted.

Justice Scotland’s briefing suggests that, without amendment 252, we would be “condoning the provision of inadequate advice.”

I have a great deal of sympathy with that argument.

As I noted in committee last week, a 2013 study by Police Scotland and an analysis of interviews conducted in the autumn of 2013 have both shown that 75 per cent of suspects waive their rights to a solicitor. We should all be very worried indeed by that. Amendment 252 would help to address that imbalance in the system. It is important that interviews are not only conducted fairly but are seen to be conducted fairly.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 252 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.
For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 2, Against 7, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 252 disagreed to.

Amendment 192 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: I hear groans coming from Mike Russell.

Amendment 193 moved—[Michael Matheson].

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 193 be agreed to. Are we—

Members: Yes.

The Convener: You are saying yes before I have even asked the question. Calm down, now.

Amendment 193 agreed to.

Amendment 253 not moved.

Section 36, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 37 and 38 agreed to.

Section 39—Common law power of search etc
Amendment 194 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 39, as amended, agreed to.

Section 40 agreed to.

After section 40

The Convener: Amendment 254, in the name of Alison McInnes, is in a group on its own.

Alison McInnes: Amendment 254 seeks to update the definition of biometric information and to improve how the use of samples is regulated.

Members will recall my concerns about the use of facial recognition technology by Police Scotland, in conjunction with other forces around the United Kingdom. The effect of my amendment would be to ensure that the retention of individuals’ images by the police is subject to the same law as the retention of DNA and fingerprints.

My amendment draws on the arguably more up-to-date definition of biometrics in the previous UK Government’s Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 and extends the regulatory regime to a wider array of relevant physical data.

The law that governs the use of DNA was introduced in 2006 by the Scottish Liberal Democrats and it was extended to cover fingerprints in 2010, but new biometric technologies are being developed more quickly than primary legislation can keep up with. For example, gait and ear recognition software may soon be a real possibility.

13:00

The Convener: Did you say “ear”?

Alison McInnes: Yes.

The Convener: I did not realise that our ears could be recognised, but there we are.

Alison McInnes: Indeed. Amendment 254 is future proof, as much as it can be, because it provides that any new collection and use of biometric information and technology by the police must be subject to the Parliament’s agreement through the affirmative procedure.

In England and Wales, the Biometrics Commissioner recently stated:

“proper consideration should now be given to the civil liberties and other issues that arise as regards those newer technologies and urgent steps should now be taken to ensure that they are governed by an appropriate regulatory regime. In the absence of such steps there must be a real risk that the considerable benefits that could be derived from the use of these new technologies will be counterbalanced by a lack of public confidence in the way in which they are operated by the police and/or by challenges as to their lawfulness.”

I am not aware of any evidence that Scotland is further forward than the rest of the UK in regulating the use of emerging biometric technologies. Those technologies could be a useful part of the police’s toolkit, but they must be properly regulated to ensure that civil liberties and privacy are protected.

I move amendment 254.

Roderick Campbell: I do not remember this issue being discussed in the long-distant time when we considered the bill at stage 1, but it is important and I would be grateful to hear the cabinet secretary comment on it.

Margaret Mitchell: What Alison McInnes says makes sense. It is important that we keep pace with new technologies and that the proper protections are in place.

Michael Matheson: As Alison McInnes explained, amendment 254 provides for how biometric information is used, retained and destroyed. I support the intention behind it, but the effects would be significantly wider than that. It would add significantly to the list of physical data that a constable can take from a person who has been arrested or detained by adding “other biometric information” to the list of physical data in section 18 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The amendment’s wide definition of “biometric information” includes “any information ... about a person’s physical or behavioural characteristics or features” that could be used to identify someone. That would be a significant change and the implications could be far reaching. I am also conscious that we have carried out no formal consultation on the matter.

Amendment 254 covers the type of physical personal data that the police can take, the way it is used and the way it is disposed of. As always with such issues, we need to strike the right balance between the need to prevent and detect crime and the need to protect civil liberties. I believe that we have the right balance and that introducing the changes in amendment 254 without the necessary consultation and consideration could have the unintended consequence of altering that balance.

Alison McInnes will appreciate that we have had little time to consult stakeholders or consider the implications of her amendment. However, the limited discussions that we have been able to undertake have already raised a number of issues. I believe that we need to look at biometrics in the round to ensure that we have the right balance and that the necessary safeguards and oversight are in place.

As Alison McInnes is aware, I asked Her Majesty’s inspectorate of constabulary in Scotland to consider including scrutiny of Police Scotland’s use of facial recognition technology in its work programme. It is carrying out that review, and I expect it to publish its report in the next few months. The remit of the review goes beyond facial recognition and considers the wider policing and societal opportunities and threats that arise from the police’s use of new and emerging biometric technologies.

I suggest to Alison McInnes and the committee that it is sensible to wait for that report. Once we have seen the recommendations, we will consider the options and we can look at the wider biometrics issues in the round. At that point, there might be a need, for example, for a full public consultation. I will be happy to discuss that with the committee once HMICS has published its report.

In summary, I support the intention that lies behind amendment 254, but I believe that its effects could be far reaching, that there is a high risk of unintended consequences, and that it would not be appropriate to embark on such a major change without full consultation. I ask Alison McInnes not to press amendment 254.

Alison McInnes: As the cabinet secretary said, HMICS is conducting an independent inquiry to look at biometric images. That was commissioned at the urging of the Scottish Liberal Democrats, of course, and I look forward to reading its findings.

We led the way in Scotland in governing the use of DNA, although the law was extended belatedly to cover fingerprints. We always seem to be playing catch-up, and I am anxious that we should not do that.

I am glad to have been able to air the issues and to have heard the cabinet secretary’s views, but I will not press amendment 254.

Amendment 254, by agreement, withdrawn.

The Convener: Amendment 195, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is in a group on its own.

Michael Matheson: Amendment 195 will insert a new section into the bill, under which the police will be able to take drunk people who are suspected of having committed offences to a designated place where they can receive help to recover from the effects of their alcohol intake and their on-going alcohol issues can be addressed. That replaces a power that the police already have under section 16 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which will be repealed through the effect of amendment 208.

I move amendment 195.

Amendment 195 agreed to.

Section 41 agreed to.

Section 42—Duty to consider child’s best interests

Amendments 53, 41 to 45, 65 and 255 not moved.

Section 42 agreed to.

After section 42

Amendments 196 and 197 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 35, in the name of Elaine Murray, is grouped with amendment 36.

Elaine Murray: Amendments 35 and 36 relate to the change in meaning of the word “arrested” and how that might affect persons who are being questioned by the police but who have not been officially accused. Currently, such individuals would not be described as having been arrested, but once the bill is enacted they will be described as such.
As we discussed before, the public may not understand the new meaning. It will take some time for the change in the use of the word “arrested” to be understood by the general public and, indeed, the media. People are used to the word being applied to those who have been charged and are therefore suspected of having committed a crime. Any arrested person should be assumed to be innocent until they are proved guilty, even if charged, of course. However, reporting in the media about persons in England who have been arrested but not charged—some of those persons are quite high profile—suggests that it is sometimes assumed that a person who has been arrested is guilty, or at the very least is a suspicious individual.

Amendment 35 would require a constable not to disclose information that might allow a person who has been arrested but not officially accused to be identified, other than if that would be in the public interest. Any decision to disclose information would be made by a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

Amendment 36 would allow a constable to disclose information regarding the release of a person who has not been officially accused to victims and witnesses if that is in the public interest or if it promotes the safety and wellbeing of the victim or witness. Such information would be released by a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

I move amendment 35.

Michael Matheson: The purpose of amendment 35 is to protect the privacy and reputation of suspects during an investigation. I sympathise with the intention behind amendment 35, but I consider that such provision is unnecessary. The committee previously accepted Police Scotland’s assurances that it does not and would not release a suspect’s name to the media when they have not been formally charged with an offence. I have seen no evidence that runs counter to that and, like the committee, I am reassured by Police Scotland’s approach on this subject.

In addition, we have always had a very strict contempt of court regime that applies after charge to cases that are progressing through the courts and prevents the release of information to the media. That regime will apply in relation to suspects who have been arrested and will continue to apply during the entire time of investigative liberation. The protection of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 is statutorily afforded to the accused from the time of arrest. No one will be released on investigative liberation unless he or she is in police custody after being arrested for an offence, at which point the protection of the 1981 act is in full effect. The same protections will apply in the case of someone liberated on a police undertaking, since they, too, will have been arrested.

Amendment 36 seeks to ensure the safety of alleged victims when a suspect is released on investigative liberation. Again, I am sympathetic to the intention behind the amendment. Upholding the rights of alleged victims and ensuring their safety is crucial to ensuring a fair criminal justice system. That includes ensuring that, where they might be at risk, alleged victims are informed of a suspect’s release on investigative liberation and of any other conditions. However, amendment 36’s proposal has to be considered in the context of existing measures to notify victims of the release of accused persons by the court on bail, which were recently put in place as part of work to implement the European protection order directive and the Lord Advocate’s guidelines to the police on liberation. We are currently considering how investigative liberation will fit into that landscape and are discussing that with stakeholders to ensure that a consistent and proportionate approach to victim notification is put in place, taking into account the risk to and safety of such individuals.

I ask Elaine Murray not to press amendment 35 and not to move amendment 36. I would be more than happy to meet her to discuss the issues involved in more detail and to provide an update on our proposals as we approach the stage 3 process.

Elaine Murray: With respect to amendment 35, I appreciate that Police Scotland has given assurances, but assurances are no good if somebody actually releases information. Assurances do not help a person whose name might be besmirched by information being out there that they have been arrested, although they have never officially been charged. I am inclined to press amendment 35.

I appreciate that what amendment 36 proposes might overlap with provisions in the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2014, so I will not move amendment 36. However, I hope that there will be some discussion prior to stage 3 on the issues that the amendment raises to clarify what is happening.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 35 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Amendment 256 not moved.

Section 50, as amended, agreed to.

Section 51—Abolition of requirement for constable to charge
Amendment 257 not moved.

Section 51 agreed to.

Section 52 agreed to.

Schedule 1—Modifications in connection with Part 1

The Convener: Amendment 206, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 207 to 213, 215 and 216.

Michael Matheson: The amendments in the group deal with consequential amendments to other acts to ensure that they work consistently with the bill’s provisions.

Amendment 206 will amend a special statutory form of citizen’s arrest that is found in section 59 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. It talks about a person who has been arrested by a member of the public under that power being delivered into the custody of a constable. The new general power for constables to arrest without warrant under section 1 of the bill means that there is no longer a need for the 1982 act to make that provision, so amendment 206 provides for repeal of that unnecessary provision.

Amendments 207 and 213 will amend respectively the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 and the Road Traffic Act 1988 to remove from them certain references to arrest. The types of arrest in question are quite different in nature from the types of arrest that part 1 is intended to deal with. The word “arrest” will therefore be removed from the provisions in question so that the consequences of arrest that are provided for in the bill are not attracted by those provisions.

Amendments 208 and 215 are consequential on previously debated amendments that will move into the bill the rules about giving information to suspects in sexual offence cases from the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Amendment 209 is a minor amendment to ensure consistency within the bill.

Amendments 210 and 212 provide for the repeal of provisions in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 relating to the police’s duties in relation to child suspects. That is in consequence of previously debated amendments that will move the rules about child suspects into the bill, so they are no longer required in the 1995 act.

Amendment 216 deals with the other side of the coin. It will amend the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 to update its cross-references to procedures under the 1995 act so that they instead cross-refer to the equivalent provisions in the bill.

Amendment 211 is a set of consequential amendments to sections 18, 18D and 19AA of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which give powers to a constable to take samples and prints. The amendment will remove references in those sections to “detention” because, as members know, the concept of detention under section 14 of the 1995 act is being dispensed with.

I move amendment 206.

Amendment 206 agreed to.

Amendment 207 moved—[Michael Matheson] and agreed to.

Amendment 259 not moved.

Amendments 208 to 213 moved—[Michael Matheson] and agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 214, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 217 to 219.

Michael Matheson: The amendments in the group deal with the interaction between the provisions in part 1 and arrests that can be made under other enactments.

Generally, part 1 will not apply to people who are arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000. That is provided for by section 53. However, schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000 cross-refers to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 in order to apply certain protections under that act. Amendment 214 will update references in schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000 to refer to the bill and its concepts instead of to the 1995 act. Amendment 218 is in consequence of amendment 214, and will put beyond doubt that disapplication of part 1 in relation to people who are arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000 does not mean that part 1 does not apply to the extent that was expressly provided for by schedule 8 to that act.

Amendment 217 provides that part 1 will not apply to people who are arrested for service offences under the Armed Forces Act 2006. That act sets out its own rules for treatment of suspects who are arrested for service offences.

Amendment 192 provides ministers with the power to use subordinate legislation to apply some or all of part 1 to arrests under the Terrorism Act 2000 and for service offences under the Armed Forces Act 2006 and, conversely, to disapply some or all of part 1 so that it does not operate in relation to people who have been arrested otherwise than in connection with an offence.

The Terrorism Act 2000 and the Armed Forces Act 2006 set out their own rules for people who are arrested under them; generally, the bill does not impinge on those rules. It may, however, be appropriate to apply some aspects of part 1 if arrests are not already covered by the procedures in those other acts. For example, for service offences under the Armed Forces Act 2006, it may be desirable to ensure that provisions relating to access to a third party or those relating to information to be recorded at the time of arrest apply for the short period that someone who is suspected of a service offence is in the custody of Police Scotland, before being transferred to the custody of the Royal Military Police.

Amendment 119 would also allow ministers to disapply some or all of part 1 using secondary legislation for arrests that are not in relation to offences. Many powers of arrest do not relate to a person being suspected of committing an offence. For example, under the Adult Support and Protection (Scotland) Act 2007 powers of arrest stem from the ability of a court to grant a banning order against a subject, prohibiting them from doing a variety of things, including being in specific places. There are other examples and it may not be appropriate in every case for part 1 to apply in its entirety. The addition of the power will allow the interaction between the bill and other legislation to be specifically tailored as is most appropriate.

I move amendment 214.

The Convener: I am glad to see that you are wearying, too. I think that you said amendment 192 and amendment 119 when you meant amendment 219, so I think that Official Report will be suitably amended. We forgive you; we understand.

Amendment 214 agreed to.

Amendments 215 and 216 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Schedule 1, as amended, agreed to.

After section 52

The Convener: Amendment 258, in the name of Alison McInnes, is in a group on its own.

Alison McInnes: I know that members are tired, but I hope that they will bear with me while I speak to my final amendment.

Amendment 258 would introduce a code of practice in connection with identification procedures and interviewing of suspects, similar to that which was established by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in England and Wales.

The post-corroboration safeguards review stated that the evidence “points persuasively towards the inclusion in the Bill of a statutory requirement that there should be Codes of Practice relating to the interviewing of suspects and identification procedures.”

The review went on to say that further regulation, through the introduction of codes, “should be introduced regardless of the abolition of the corroboration requirement.”
Amendment 258 would implement the draft provisions in the review. It would require the Lord Advocate to issue a code of practice on the questioning and recording of questioning of suspects, and the conduct of identification procedures. It would require the Lord Advocate regularly to review the code and to consult and lay a revised code before Parliament. In the event of a breach, the current common-law fairness test would apply in respect of admissibility of evidence.

The Lord Advocate last published guidance on the conduct of visual identification procedures in 2007. There are no such guidelines in relation to suspect interviews. Lord Bonomy observed that the standard operating procedures and practices that each of the legacy forces implemented were "not uniform" and that regional differences persist in Police Scotland. His review highlighted that practices are inconsistent, which is worrying, given how critical such aspects of an investigation are. ID procedures and interviews often provide crucial incriminating evidence.

Amendment 258 will ensure that interview and ID operating procedures across the country are predictable and consistent, as the public expect them to be, and it would improve standards.

I move amendment 258.

Michael Matheson: As Alison McInnes explained, amendment 258 is based on recommendations in Lord Bonomy's post-corroboration safeguards review. When Lord Bonomy's report was published, I said that we would consider whether any of its proposals could be progressed in this parliamentary session. On the whole, however, our preference was to take time to consider all the recommendations in detail and to carry out a more holistic review of the recommendations, alongside other reforms.

I have therefore advised the committee that we will this year take forward only a small number of Lord Bonomy's recommendations—for example, we have an amendment that will require the Lord Advocate to publish the prosecutorial test. I still consider that there is great value in many of the other recommendations. However, such substantive and important changes to our justice system require to be looked at in the round and alongside other potential reforms. For example, as members are aware, the Scottish Courts and Tribunal Service is currently conducting an evidence and procedure review. In my view, the work that we will start later this year should take account of recommendations from both reviews, to ensure that a future package of reforms is comprehensive and strikes an appropriate and fair balance.

I do not consider that there is a significant gap in the law while that wider package of reforms is being looked at. I understand that the Lord Advocate already issues guidance to the police in relation to identification procedures, and that the guidance is available to the public. The police produce guidance to officers for interviewing suspects and witnesses, with numerous safeguards built in to ensure that human rights legislation is adhered to. The interviewing of suspects already receives significant scrutiny during the judicial process, and police procedures are constantly updated on the basis of stated cases in the courts.

The police are in the process of collating an investigations standard operating procedures document, which will bring together various legacy documents on interviews and other matters that relate to investigations. The guidance will include specific guidance on interviewing children and vulnerable persons. Police Scotland's intention is that the guidance document will, when it is complete, become publicly available, subject to redaction for technical or security reasons.

The recording of interviews is a matter that requires careful examination in order to establish what measures are deemed to be appropriate and necessary. A recommendation of an increase in audio and video recording would lead to significant financial costs for upgrading infrastructure, for training and for retention facilities. Such issues should not be looked at separately but as part of the wider set of recommendations that Lord Bonomy made, alongside other relevant reform work.

Therefore, although I understand the good intentions behind amendment 258, I hope that members understand why at this time I do not think it appropriate to require that a code of practice be published. That substantive issue should be considered alongside the other outstanding Bonomy recommendations, as part of the wider criminal justice review project that is due to start later this year. It will also be considered in the context of the justice digital strategy.

I therefore ask Alison McInnes not to press amendment 258.

13:30

Alison McInnes: I am disappointed by what the cabinet secretary has said on amendment 258. He said that the Lord Advocate already publishes guidance on the conduct of ID procedures. That guidance has not been updated for eight years, so it is clearly not operating appropriately. The conduct of interviews and the conduct of ID parades are fundamental issues and are of a different order to many of the other things that Lord Bonomy recommended and which the cabinet secretary said he will take together holistically.

Therefore, I think that the committee should agree to amendment 258, which sets out that there must be full consultation ahead of the code of practice coming into place. We have seen during the stop-and-search debate the importance of statutory codes of practice and the benefits that they can bring in terms of consistency, transparency and accountability. I believe that there is considerable scope for having interviewing codes governing how other procedures should occur without risking interfering in operational matters.

It is essential for the interests of justice that interviews and ID procedures are conducted fairly and in a uniform manner. There is evidence that that is not the case at present. Therefore, I will press amendment 258.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 258 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
McDougall, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)

Against
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 5, Against 4, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 258 agreed to.

Before section 53
Amendment 217 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 53—Disapplication to terrorism offences
Amendment 218 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 53, as amended, agreed to.

After section 53
Amendments 219 and 220 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Before section 54
Amendment 37 not moved.
CONTENTS

PART A1
POLICE PROCEDURES

CHAPTER 1
SEARCH OF PERSON NOT IN POLICE CUSTODY

Lawfulness of search by constable

A1 Limitation on what enables search
B1 Cases involving removal of person
C1 Duty to consider child’s best interests

Miscellaneous and definitions

D1 Provisions about possession of alcohol
E1 Matters as to effect of sections A1, B1 and D1
F1 Meaning of constable etc.

CHAPTER 2
CODE OF PRACTICE

Making and status of code

G1 Contents of code of practice
H1 Review of code of practice
I1 Legal status of code of practice

Procedure applying to code

J1 Consultation on code of practice
K1 Bringing code of practice into effect
L1 Police powers of search: annual reporting

PART 1
ARREST AND CUSTODY

CHAPTER 1
ARREST BY POLICE

Arrest without warrant

1 Power of a constable
2 Exercise of the power
Procedure following arrest

3 Information to be given on arrest
4 Arrested person to be taken to police station
5 Information to be given at police station
6 Information to be recorded by police

CHAPTER 2
CUSTODY: PERSON NOT OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Keeping person in custody

7 Authorisation for keeping in custody
8 Information to be given on authorisation
11 12 hour limit: general rule
12 12 hour limit: previous period
12A Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit
12B Information to be given on authorisation under section 12A
9 Custody review
10 Test for sections 7, 12A and 9
13 Medical treatment

Investigative liberation

14 Release on conditions
15 Conditions ceasing to apply
16 Modification or removal of conditions
17 Review of conditions

CHAPTER 3
CUSTODY: PERSON OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Person to be brought before court

17A Information to be given if sexual offence
18 Person to be brought before court
18A Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court
18B Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court
18C Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court

Police liberation

19 Liberation by police
20 Release on undertaking
21 Modification of undertaking
21A Rescission of undertaking
21B Expiry of undertaking
22 Review of undertaking

CHAPTER 4
POLICE INTERVIEW

Rights of suspects

23 Information to be given before interview
24 Right to have solicitor present
25 Consent to interview without solicitor

Person not officially accused

26 Questioning following arrest

Person officially accused

27 Authorisation for questioning
28 Authorisation: further provision
29 Arrest to facilitate questioning

CHAPTER 5
RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS IN POLICE CUSTODY

Intimation and access to another person

30 Right to have intimation sent to other person
31 Right to have intimation sent: under 18s
32 Right of under 18s to have access to other person
32A Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

Vulnerable persons

33 Support for vulnerable persons

Intimation and access to a solicitor

35 Right to have intimation sent to solicitor
36 Right to consultation with solicitor

CHAPTER 6
POLICE POWERS AND DUTIES

Powers of police

37 Use of reasonable force
38 Common law power of entry
39 Common law power of search etc.
40 Power of search etc. on arrest

Care of drunken persons

40A Taking drunk persons to designated place

Duties of police

41 Duty not to detain unnecessarily
42 Duty to consider child’s wellbeing
42A Duties in relation to children in custody
42B Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted

CHAPTER 8
GENERAL

Common law and enactments

50 Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest
51 Abolition of requirement for constable to charge
52 Consequential modification

  Code of practice about investigative functions

52A Code of practice about investigative functions

  Disapplication of Part

52B Disapplication in relation to service offences
53 Disapplication to terrorism offences

  Powers to modify Part

53A Further provision about application of Part
53B Further provision about vulnerable persons

  Interpretation of Part

54 Meaning of constable
55 Meaning of officially accused
56 Meaning of police custody

PART 3

SOLEMN PROCEDURE

63 Proceedings on petition
64 Citation of jurors
65 Pre-trial time limits
66 Duty of parties to communicate
67 First diets
68 Preliminary hearings
69 Plea of guilty

PART 4

SENTENCING

Maximum term for weapons offences

71 Maximum term for weapons offences

  Prisoners on early release

72 Sentencing under the 1995 Act
73 Sentencing under the 1993 Act

PART 5

APPEALS AND SCCRC

  Appeals

74 Preliminary pleas in summary cases
75 Preliminary diets in solemn cases
76 Extending certain time limits: summary
77 Extending certain time limits: solemn
78 Certain lateness not excusable
79 Advocation in solemn proceedings
80 Advocation in summary proceedings
81 Finality of appeal proceedings
SCCRC

PART 5A
CHILDREN AFFECTED BY PARENTAL IMPRISONMENT

82A Duty to undertake a child and family impact assessment

PART 6
MISCELLANEOUS

CHAPTER A1
PUBLICATION OF PROSECUTORIAL TEST

82B Publication of prosecutorial test

CHAPTER 1
STATEMENTS AND PROCEDURE

Statements by accused

Use of technology

86 Live television links
86A Electronic proceedings

CHAPTER 1A
AUTHORISATION UNDER PART III OF THE POLICE ACT 1997

86B Authorisation of persons other than constables

CHAPTER 2
POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

87 Establishment and functions
87A Consequential and transitional

PART 7
FINAL PROVISIONS

Ancillary and definition

88 Ancillary regulations
89 Meaning of “the 1995 Act”

Commencement and short title

90 Commencement
91 Short title
Schedule A1—Breach of liberation condition
Schedule 1—Modifications in connection with Part 1
  Part 1—Provisions as to arrest
  Part 2—Further modifications
Schedule 3—Police Negotiating Board for Scotland
Amendments to the Bill since the previous version are indicated by sideling in the right margin. Wherever possible, provisions that were in the Bill as introduced retain the original numbering.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

[AS AMENDED AT STAGE 2]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about criminal justice including as to police powers and rights of suspects and as to criminal evidence, procedure and sentencing; to establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland; and for connected purposes.

PART A1

POLICE PROCEDURES

CHAPTER 1

SEARCH OF PERSON NOT IN POLICE CUSTODY

Lawfulness of search by constable

A1 Limitation on what enables search

(1) This section applies in relation to a person who is not in police custody.

(2) It is unlawful for a constable to search the person otherwise than—

(a) in accordance with a power of search conferred in express terms by an enactment, or

(b) under the authority of a warrant expressly conferring a power of search.

B1 Cases involving removal of person

(1) A person who is not in police custody may be searched by a constable while the person is to be, or is being, taken to or from any place by virtue of any enactment, warrant or court order requiring or permitting the constable to do so.

(2) A search under this section is to be carried out for the purpose of ensuring that the person is not in, or does not remain in, possession of any item or substance that could cause harm to the person or someone else.

(3) Anything seized by a constable in the course of a search carried out under this section may be retained by the constable.
C1 Duty to consider child’s best interests

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a constable is deciding whether to search a child who is not in police custody.

(2) In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a child is a person who is under 18 years of age.

D1 Provisions about possession of alcohol

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend section 61 (confiscation of alcohol from persons under 18) of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997 so as to confer on a constable a power, exercisable in addition to the power in subsection (1) or (2) of that section—

(a) to search a person for alcoholic liquor,

(b) to dispose of anything found in the person’s possession that the constable believes to be such liquor.

(2) Prior to laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations under this section, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly on the regulations that they are proposing to make.

(3) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.

E1 Matters as to effect of sections A1, B1 and D1

(1) The day appointed for the coming into force of sections A1 and B1 is to be the same as the day from which a code of practice required by section G1(1) has effect by virtue of the first regulations made under section K1.

(2) If no regulations under section D1 are made before the end of the 2 years beginning with the day from which a code of practice required by section G1(1) has effect by virtue of the first regulations made under section K1, section D1 is to be regarded as repealed at the end of that period.

F1 Meaning of constable etc.

In this Chapter—

“constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,

“police custody” has the same meaning as given for the purposes of Part 1 (see section 56).
CHAPTER 2

CODE OF PRACTICE

Making and status of code

G1 Contents of code of practice

(1) The Scottish Ministers must make a code of practice about the carrying out of a search of a person who is not in police custody.

(1A) A code of practice must set out—

(a) the circumstances in which such a search may be carried out,
(b) the procedure to be followed in carrying out such a search,
(c) the record to be kept, and the right of any person to receive a copy of the record, of such a search,
(d) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(2) A code of practice is to apply to the functions exercisable by a constable.

(3) In this section—

“constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,
“police custody” has the same meaning as given for the purposes of Part 1 (see section 56).

(4) In this Chapter, a reference to a code of practice means one required by subsection (1) (but see also section H1(4)).

H1 Review of code of practice

(1) The Scottish Ministers may revise a code of practice in light of a review conducted under subsection (2).

(2) The Scottish Ministers must conduct a review of a code of practice as follows—

(a) a review is to begin no later than 2 years after the code comes into effect,
(b) subsequently, a review is to begin no later than 4 years after—

(i) if the code is revised in light of the previous review under this subsection, the coming into effect of the revised code, or
(ii) otherwise, the completion of the previous review under this subsection.

(2A) Each review conducted under subsection (2) must be completed within 6 months of the day it begins.

(3) In deciding when to conduct a review in accordance with subsection (2), the Scottish Ministers must have regard to representations put to them on the matter by—

(a) the Scottish Police Authority,
(b) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland, or
(c) Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland.

(4) For the purposes of—
(a) section G1(2) and this section (except subsection (2)(a)), and
(b) sections I1 to K1,
a reference to a code of practice includes a revised code as allowed by subsection (1).

I1 Legal status of code of practice

1 A court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings must take a code of practice into account when determining any question arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant.

2 Breach of a code of practice does not of itself give rise to grounds for any legal claim whatsoever.

Procedure applying to code

J1 Consultation on code of practice

1 Prior to making a code of practice, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly on a draft of the code.

2 When preparing a draft of a code of practice for public consultation, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) the Lord Justice General,
(b) the Faculty of Advocates,
(c) the Law Society of Scotland,
(d) the Scottish Police Authority,
(e) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
(f) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
(g) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland,
(ga) the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner, and
(h) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

K1 Bringing code of practice into effect

1 A code of practice has no effect until a day appointed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

2 When laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations bringing a code of practice into effect, the Scottish Ministers must also so lay a copy of the code.

2A A draft of an instrument containing regulations bringing the first code of practice into effect must be laid before the Scottish Parliament no later than one year after the day of Royal Assent.

3 Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.
L1 Police powers of search: annual reporting

In subsection (3) of section 39 (the Scottish Police Authority’s annual report) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012—

(a) the word “and” at the end of paragraph (a) is repealed, and

(b) after paragraph (b) there is inserted “and

(c) a record of the number of searches without a warrant of persons not arrested carried out by the Police Service during the reporting year, including in particular and where practicable a record of—

(i) the number of instances where an individual has been searched on more than one occasion,

(ii) the profile, as regards age, gender and ethnic or national origin, of those searched,

(iii) the proportion of searches that resulted in anything being found,

(iv) the proportion of searches that resulted in a matter being reported to the procurator fiscal, and

(v) the number of complaints made to the Police Service about the conduct of searches.”.

PART 1
ARREST AND CUSTODY

CHAPTER 1
ARREST BY POLICE

Arrest without warrant

1 Power of a constable

(1) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed or is committing an offence.

(2) In relation to an offence not punishable by imprisonment, a constable may arrest a person under subsection (1) only if the constable is satisfied that it would not be in the interests of justice to delay the arrest in order to seek a warrant for the person’s arrest.

(3) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2), it would not be in the interests of justice to delay an arrest in order to seek a warrant if the constable reasonably believes that unless the person is arrested without delay the person will—

(d) continue committing the offence, or

(e) obstruct the course of justice in any way, including by—

(i) seeking to avoid arrest, or

(ii) interfering with witnesses or evidence.

(4) For the avoidance of doubt, an offence is to be regarded as not punishable by imprisonment for the purpose of subsection (2) only if no person convicted of the offence can be sentenced to imprisonment in respect of it.
2 Exercise of the power

(1) A person may be arrested under section 1 more than once in respect of the same offence.

(2) A person may not be arrested under section 1 in respect of an offence if the person has been officially accused of committing the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(3) Where—
   (a) a constable who is not in uniform arrests a person under section 1, and
   (b) the person asks to see the constable’s identification,

the constable must show identification to the person as soon as reasonably practicable.

3 Information to be given on arrest

When a constable arrests a person (or as soon afterwards as is reasonably practicable), a constable must inform the person—

(a) that the person is under arrest,

(b) of the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested,

(c) of the reason for the arrest,

(d) that the person is under no obligation to say anything, other than to give the information specified in section 26(3), and

(e) of the person’s right to have—
   (i) intimation sent to a solicitor under section 35, and
   (ii) access to a solicitor under section 36.

4 Arrested person to be taken to police station

(1) Where a person is arrested by a constable outwith a police station, a constable must take the person as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station.

(2) Subsection (1) ceases to apply, and the person must be released from police custody immediately, if—
   (a) the person has been arrested without a warrant,
   (b) the person has not yet arrived at a police station in accordance with this section, and
   (c) in the opinion of a constable there are no reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed—
      (i) the offence in respect of which the person was arrested, or
      (ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

(3) For the avoidance of doubt, subsection (1) ceases to apply if, before arriving at a police station in accordance with this section, the person is released from custody under section 19(2).
5 Information to be given at police station

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply when—
   (a) a person is in police custody having been arrested at a police station, or
   (b) a person is in police custody and has been taken to a police station in accordance with section 4.

(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—
   (a) that the person is under no obligation to say anything, other than to give the information specified in section 26(3),
   (b) of any right the person has to have intimation sent and to have access to certain persons under—
      (i) section 30,
      (ii) section 32,
      (iii) section 35,
      (iv) section 36.

(3) The person must be provided as soon as reasonably practicable with such information (verbally or in writing) as is necessary to satisfy the requirements of Articles 3 and 4 of Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on the right to information in criminal proceedings.

6 Information to be recorded by police

(1) There must be recorded in relation to any arrest by a constable—
   (a) the time and place of arrest,
   (b) the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested,
   (c) if the person is taken from one place to another while in police custody (including to a police station in accordance with section 4)—
      (i) the place from which, and time at which, the person is taken, and
      (ii) the place to which the person is taken and the time at which the person arrives there,
   (d) the time at which, and the identity of the constable by whom, the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 3,
   (da) the time at which the person ceases to be in police custody.

(1A) Where relevant, there must be recorded in relation to an arrest by a constable—
   (a) the reason that the constable who released the person from custody under subsection (2) of section 4 formed the opinion mentioned in paragraph (c) of that subsection,
   (e) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is—
      (i) informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (2) of section 5, and
      (ii) provided with information in accordance with subsection (3) of that section,
(ea) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 17A,

(f) the time at which the person requests that intimation be sent under—
   (i) section 30,
   (ii) section 35,

(g) the time at which intimation is sent under—
   (i) section 30,
   (ia) section 32A,
   (ii) section 33,
   (iii) section 35.

(2) Where a person is in police custody and not officially accused of committing an offence, there must be recorded the time, place and outcome of any decision under section 7.

(3) Where a person is held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7 there must be recorded—

   (a) the time at which the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 8,
   (b) the time, place and outcome of any custody review under section 9,
   (c) the time at which any interview in the circumstances described in section 13(6) begins and the time at which it ends.

(3A) If a constable considers whether to give authorisation under section 12A there must be recorded—

   (a) whether a reasonable opportunity to make representations has been afforded in accordance with subsection (4)(a) of that section,
   (b) if the opportunity referred to in paragraph (a) has not been afforded, the reason for that,
   (c) the time, place and outcome of the constable’s decision, and
   (d) if the constable’s decision is to give the authorisation—
      (i) the grounds on which it is given,
      (ii) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed and reminded of things in accordance with section 12B, and
      (iii) the time at which the person requests that intimation be sent under section 12B(3)(a) and the time at which it is sent.

(3B) Where a person is held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 12A there must be recorded—

   (a) the time, place and outcome of any custody review under section 9,
   (b) the time at which any interview in the circumstances described in section 13(6) begins and the time at which it ends.

(4) If a person is released from police custody on conditions under section 14, there must be recorded—

   (a) details of the conditions imposed,
(b) the identity of the constable who imposed them.

(5) If a person is charged with an offence by a constable while in police custody, there must be recorded the time at which the person is charged.

CHAPTER 2

CUSTODY: PERSON NOT OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Keeping person in custody

7 Authorisation for keeping in custody

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and

(b) since being arrested, the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) Authorisation to keep the person in custody must be sought as soon as reasonably practicable after the person—

(a) is arrested at a police station, or

(b) arrives at a police station, having been taken there in accordance with section 4.

(3) Authorisation may be given only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(4) Authorisation may be given only if that constable is satisfied that the test in section 10 is met.

(5) If authorisation is refused, the person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

8 Information to be given on authorisation

At the time when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given under section 7, the person must be informed of—

(a) the reason that the person is being kept in custody, and

(b) the 12 hour limit arising by virtue of section 11 and the fact that the person may be kept in custody for a further 12 hours under section 12A.

11 12 hour limit: general rule

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 12 hours, beginning with the time at which authorisation was given under section 7, and

(b) during that period the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) The person may continue to be held in police custody only if—

(a) a constable charges the person with an offence, or
(b) authorisation to keep the person in custody has been given under section 12A.

12 12 hour limit: previous period

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is being held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7,

(b) authorisation has been given under that section to hold the person in police custody on a previous occasion, and

(c) the offence in connection with which the authorisation mentioned in paragraph (a) has been given is the same offence or arises from the same circumstances as the offence in connection with which the authorisation mentioned in paragraph (b) was given.

(2) The 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 is reduced by the length of the period during which the person was held in police custody by virtue of the authorisation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).

(3) Subsections (5) and (6) of section 13 apply for the purpose of calculating the length of the period during which the person was held in police custody by virtue of the authorisation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).

12A Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit

(1) A constable may give authorisation for a person who is in police custody to be kept in custody for a continuous period of 12 hours, beginning when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(2) Authorisation may be given only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(3) Authorisation may be given only if—

(a) the person has not been held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under this section in connection with—

(i) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody, or

(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence, and

(b) the constable is satisfied that—

(i) the test in section 10 will be met when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends,

(ii) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody is an indictable offence, and

(iii) the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously.

(4) Before deciding whether or not to give authorisation the constable must—

(a) where practicable afford a reasonable opportunity to make verbal or written representations to—
(i) the person, or
(ii) if the person so chooses, the person’s solicitor, and
(b) have regard to any representations made.

(5) If authorisation is given, it is deemed to be withdrawn if the person is released from police custody before the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(6) Subsection (7) applies when—
(a) by virtue of authorisation given under this section, a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 12 hours (beginning with the time at which the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ended), and
(b) during that period the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(7) The person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

12B Information to be given on authorisation under section 12A

(1) This section applies when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given under section 12A.

(2) The person must be informed—
(a) that the authorisation has been given, and
(b) of the grounds on which it has been given.

(3) The person—
(a) has the right to have the information mentioned in subsection (2) intimated to a solicitor, and
(b) must be informed of that right.

(4) The person must be reminded about any right which the person has under Chapter 5.

(5) Subsection (4) does not require that a person be reminded about a right to have intimation sent under either of the following sections if the person has exercised the right already—
(a) section 30,
(b) section 35.

(6) Information to be given under subsections (2), (3)(b) and (4) must be given to the person as soon as reasonably practicable after the authorisation is given.

(7) Where the person requests that intimation be sent under subsection (3)(a), the intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.

9 Custody review

(1) A custody review must be carried out—
(a) when a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of authorisation given under section 7, and
(b) again, if authorisation to keep the person in police custody is given under section 12A, when the person has been held in custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of that authorisation.

(2) A custody review entails the consideration by a constable of whether the test in section 10 is met.

(3) A custody review must be carried out by a constable who—
   (a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and
   (b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(4) If the constable is not satisfied that the test in section 10 is met, the person may continue to be held in police custody only if a constable charges the person with an offence.

Test for sections 7, 12A and 9

(1) For the purposes of sections 7(4), 12A(3)(b) and 9(2), the test is that—
   (a) there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed an offence, and
   (b) keeping the person in custody is necessary and proportionate for the purposes of bringing the person before a court or otherwise dealing with the person in accordance with the law.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1)(b), in considering what is necessary and proportionate for the purpose mentioned in that subsection regard may be had to—
   (a) whether the person’s presence is reasonably required to enable the offence to be investigated fully,
   (b) whether the person (if liberated) would be likely to interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,
   (c) the nature and seriousness of the offence.

Medical treatment

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—
   (a) a person is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant,
   (b) since being arrested, the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable, and
   (c) the person is at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment.

(2) If authorisation to keep the person in custody has not been given under section 7, that section has effect as if—
   (a) each reference in subsection (2) of that section to a police station were a reference to the hospital, and
   (b) the words after the reference to a police station in paragraph (b) of that subsection were omitted.
(3) Where authorisation is given under section 7 when a person is at a hospital, authorisation under that section need not be sought again if, while still in custody, the person is taken to a police station in accordance with section 4.

(4) Subsections (5) and (6) apply for the purpose of calculating the 12 hours mentioned in sections 11 and 12A.

(5) Except as provided for in subsection (6), no account is to be taken of any period during which a person is—

(a) at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, or
(b) being taken as quickly as is reasonably practicable—

(i) to a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, or
(ii) to a police station from a hospital to which the person was taken for the purpose of receiving medical treatment.

(6) Account is to be taken of any period during which a person is both—

(a) at a hospital, or being taken to or from one, and
(b) being interviewed by a constable in relation to an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing.

Investigative liberation

14 Release on conditions

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is being held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7,
(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence, and
(d) either—

(i) the person has not been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, or
(ii) it has not been more than 28 days since the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence.

(2) If releasing the person from custody, a constable may impose any condition that an appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(2A) A condition under subsection (2)—

(a) may not require the person to be in a specified place at a specified time,
(b) may require the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and
(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period.
(3) A condition imposed under subsection (2) is a liberation condition for the purposes of schedule A1.

(5) In subsection (2), “an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of sergeant or above.

(6) In this section, “a relevant offence” means—
   (a) the offence in connection with which the authorisation under section 7 has been given, or
   (b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

15 Conditions ceasing to apply

(1) A condition imposed on a person under section 14(2) ceases to apply—
   (a) at the end of the day falling 28 days after the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under section 14(2) in connection with a relevant offence, or
   (b) before then, if—
       (i) the condition is removed by a notice under section 16,
       (ii) the person is arrested in connection with a relevant offence,
       (iii) the person is officially accused of committing a relevant offence, or
       (iv) the condition is removed by the sheriff under section 17.

(2) In subsection (1), “a relevant offence” means—
   (a) the offence in connection with which the condition was imposed, or
   (b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

16 Modification or removal of conditions

(1) A constable may by notice modify or remove a condition imposed under section 14(2).

(2) A notice under subsection (1)—
   (a) is to be given in writing to the person who is subject to the condition,
   (b) must specify the time from which the condition is modified or removed.

(3) A constable of the rank of inspector or above must keep under review whether or not—
   (a) there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) has committed a relevant offence, and
   (b) the condition imposed remains necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(4) Where the constable referred to in subsection (3) is no longer satisfied as to the matter mentioned in paragraph (a) of that subsection, a constable must give notice to the person removing any condition imposed in connection with a relevant offence.

(5) Where the constable referred to in subsection (3) is no longer satisfied as to the matter mentioned in paragraph (b) of that subsection, a constable must give notice to the person—
(a) modifying the condition in question, or
(b) removing it.

(6) Where a duty to give notice to a person arises under subsection (4) or (5), the notice—
(a) is to be given in writing to the person as soon as practicable, and
(b) must specify, as the time from which the condition is modified or removed, the time at which the duty to give the notice arose.

(7) The modification or removal of a condition under subsection (1), (4) or (5) requires the authority of a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

(8) In this section, “a relevant offence” means—
(a) the offence in connection with which the condition was imposed, or
(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

17 Review of conditions

(1) A person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) may apply to the sheriff to have the condition reviewed.

(2) Before disposing of an application under this section, the sheriff must give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations.

(3) If the sheriff is not satisfied that the condition is necessary and proportionate for the purpose for which it was imposed, the sheriff may—
(a) remove the condition, or
(b) impose an alternative condition that the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate for that purpose.

(4) For the purposes of sections 15 and 16, a condition imposed by the sheriff under subsection (3)(b) is to be regarded as having been imposed under section 14(2).

CHAPTER 3

CUSTODY: PERSON OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Person to be brought before court

17A Information to be given if sexual offence

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—
(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant in respect of a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies, or
(b) a person—
(i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
(ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged by a constable with a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies.

(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—
(a) that the person’s case at, or for the purposes of, any relevant hearing (within the meaning of section 288C(1A) of the 1995 Act) in the course of the proceedings may be conducted only by a lawyer,

(b) that it is, therefore, in the person’s interests to get the professional assistance of a solicitor, and

(c) that if the person does not engage a solicitor for the purposes of the conduct of the person’s case at or for the purposes of the hearing, the court will do so.

18 Person to be brought before court

(1) Subsection (2) applies to a person when—

(a) the person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant (other than a warrant granted under section 29(1)), or

(b) the person—

(i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and

(ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) The person must be brought before a court (unless released from custody under section 19)—

(a) if practicable, before the end of the first day on which the court is sitting after the day on which this subsection began to apply to the person, or

(b) as soon as practicable after that.

(3) A person is deemed to be brought before a court in accordance with subsection (2) if the person appears before it by means of a live television link (by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means).

18A Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), and

(b) either—

(i) a constable believes the person is under 16 years of age, or

(ii) the person is subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(2) The person must (unless released from custody under section 19) be kept in a place of safety until the person can be brought before the court.

(3) The place of safety in which the person is kept must not be a police station unless an appropriate constable certifies that keeping the person in a place of safety other than a police station would be—

(a) impracticable,

(b) unsafe, or

(c) inadvisable due to the person’s state of health (physical or mental).
(4) A certificate under subsection (3) must be produced to the court when the person is brought before it.

(5) In this section—

“an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of inspector or above,
“place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

18B  Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a person who is 16 years of age or over and subject to a supervision order or under 16 years of age—

(a) is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or
(b) is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) A parent of the person mentioned in subsection (1) (if one can be found) must be informed of the following matters—

(a) the court before which the person is to be brought,
(b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court,
(c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing, and
(d) that the parent’s attendance at the court may be required under section 42 of the 1995 Act.

(3) Subsection (2) does not require any information to be given to a parent if a constable has grounds to believe that giving the parent the information mentioned in that subsection may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person mentioned in subsection (1).

(4) In this section—

“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person mentioned in subsection (1),

“supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

18C  Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court

(1) The appropriate local authority must be informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) when—

(a) a person to whom either subsection (2) or (3) applies is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or
(b) a person to whom subsection (2) applies is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) This subsection applies to—

(a) a person who is under 16 years of age,
(b) a person who is—

(i) 16 or 17 years of age, and
(ii) subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(3) This subsection applies to a person if—

(a) a constable believes the person is 16 or 17 years of age,

(b) since being arrested, the person has not exercised the right to have intimation sent under section 30, and

(c) on being informed or reminded of the right to have intimation sent under that section after being officially accused, the person has declined to exercise the right.

(4) The matters referred to in subsection (1) are—

(a) the court before which the person mentioned in paragraph (a) or (as the case may be) (b) of that subsection is to be brought,

(b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court, and

(c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (1), the appropriate local authority is the local authority in whose area the court referred to in subsection (4)(a) sits.

19 Liberation by police

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant (other than a warrant granted under section 29(1)), or

(b) a person—

(i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and

(ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) A constable may—

(a) if the person gives an undertaking in accordance with section 20, release the person from custody,

(b) release the person from custody without such an undertaking,

(c) refuse to release the person from custody.

(2A) Where a person is in custody as mentioned in subsection (1)(a), the person may not be released from custody under subsection (2)(b).

(3) A constable is not to be subject to any claim whatsoever by reason of having refused to release a person from custody under subsection (2)(c).

20 Release on undertaking

(1) A person may be released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) only if the person signs the undertaking.
(2) The terms of an undertaking are that the person undertakes to—
   (a) appear at a specified court at a specified time, and
   (b) comply with any conditions imposed under subsection (3) while subject to the undertaking.

(3) The conditions which may be imposed under this subsection are—
   (a) that the person does not—
       (i) commit an offence,
       (ii) interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,
       (iii) behave in a manner which causes, or is likely to cause, alarm or distress to witnesses,
   (b) any further condition that a constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring that any conditions imposed under paragraph (a) are observed.

(4) Conditions which may be imposed under subsection (3)(b) include—
   (a) a condition requiring the person—
       (i) to be in a specified place at a specified time, and
       (ii) to remain there for a specified period,
   (b) a condition requiring the person—
       (i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and
       (ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period.

(5) For the imposition of a condition under subsection (3)(b)—
   (a) if it is of the kind described in subsection (4)(a), the authority of a constable of the rank of inspector or above is required,
   (b) if it is of any other kind, the authority of a constable of the rank of sergeant is required.

(6) The requirements imposed by an undertaking to attend at a court and comply with conditions are liberation conditions for the purposes of schedule A1.

21 Modification of undertaking

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice modify the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) by—
    (a) changing the court specified as the court at which the person is to appear,
    (b) changing the time specified as the time at which the person is to appear at the court,
    (c) removing or altering any condition imposed under section 20(3).

(2) A condition may not be altered under subsection (1)(c) so as to forbid or require something not forbidden or required by the terms of the condition when the person gave the undertaking.
(3) Notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

21A Rescission of undertaking

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice rescind an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) (whether or not the person who gave it is to be prosecuted).

(2) The rescission of an undertaking by virtue of subsection (1) takes effect at the end of the day on which the notice is sent.

(3) Notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

(4) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person is likely to fail to comply with the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(5) Where a person is arrested under subsection (4) or subsection (6) applies—

(a) the undertaking referred to in subsection (4) or (as the case may be) (6) is rescinded, and

(b) this Part applies as if the person, since being most recently arrested, has been charged with the offence in connection with which the person was in police custody when the undertaking was given.

(6) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person who is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) is in police custody (otherwise than as a result of having been arrested under subsection (4)), and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has failed, or (if liberated) is likely to fail, to comply with the terms of the undertaking.

(7) The references in subsections (4) and (6)(b) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by—

(a) notice under section 21(1), or

(b) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).

21B Expiry of undertaking

(1) An undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) expires—

(a) at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is required by its terms to appear at a court, or

(b) if subsection (2) applies, at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is brought before a court having been arrested under the warrant mentioned in that subsection.

(2) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person fails to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), and

(b) on account of that failure, a warrant for the person’s arrest is granted.
(3) The references in subsections (1)(a) and (2)(a) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by notice under section 21(1).

22 Review of undertaking

(1) A person who is subject to an undertaking containing a condition imposed under section 20(3)(b) may apply to the sheriff to have the condition reviewed.

(2) Before disposing of an application under this section, the sheriff must give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations.

(3) If the sheriff is not satisfied that the condition is necessary and proportionate for the purpose for which it was imposed, the sheriff may modify the terms of the undertaking by—

(a) removing the condition, or
(b) imposing an alternative condition that the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate for that purpose.

CHAPTER 4

POLICE INTERVIEW

Rights of suspects

23 Information to be given before interview

(1) Subsection (2) applies to a person who—

(a) is in police custody, or
(b) is attending at a police station or other place voluntarily for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.

(2) Not more than one hour before a constable interviews the person about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing, the person must be informed—

(za) of the general nature of that offence,
(a) that the person is under no obligation to say anything other than to give the information specified in section 26(3),
(b) about the right under section 24 to have a solicitor present during the interview, and
(c) if the person is in police custody, about any right which the person has under Chapter 5.

(3) A person need not be informed under subsection (2)(c) about a right to have intimation sent under either of the following sections if the person has exercised the right already—

(a) section 30,
(b) section 35.

(4) For the purpose of subsection (2), a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking the person for the information specified in section 26(3).
(5) Where a person is to be interviewed by virtue of authorisation granted under section 27, before the interview begins the person must be informed of what was specified by the court under subsection (6) of that section.

24 Right to have solicitor present

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply to a person who—

(a) is in police custody, or
(b) is attending at a police station or other place voluntarily for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.

(2) The person has the right to have a solicitor present while being interviewed by a constable about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing.

(3) Accordingly—

(a) unless the person consents to being interviewed without having a solicitor present, a constable must not begin to interview the person about the offence until the person’s solicitor is present, and
(b) the person’s solicitor must not be denied access to the person at any time while a constable is interviewing the person about the offence.

(4) Despite subsection (3)(a) a constable may, in exceptional circumstances, proceed to interview the person without a solicitor being present if the constable is satisfied that it is necessary to interview the person without delay in the interests of—

(a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or
(b) the apprehension of offenders.

(5) For the purposes of subsections (2) and (3), a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking the person for the information specified in section 26(3).

(6) Where a person consents to being interviewed without having a solicitor present, there must be recorded—

(a) the time at which the person consented, and
(b) any reason given by the person at that time for waiving the right to have a solicitor present.

25 Consent to interview without solicitor

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply for the purpose of section 24(3)(a).

(2) A person may not consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present if—

(a) the person is under 16 years of age

(aa) the person is 16 or 17 years of age and subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, or

(b) the person is 16 years of age or over and, owing to mental disorder, appears to a constable to be unable to—
(i) understand sufficiently what is happening, or
(ii) communicate effectively with the police.

(3) A person to whom this subsection applies (referred to in subsection (5) as “person A”) may consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present only with the agreement of a relevant person.

(4) Subsection (3) applies to a person who is—
(a) 16 or 17 years of age, and
(b) not precluded by subsection (2)(aa) or (b) from consenting to being interviewed without having a solicitor present.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (3), “a relevant person” means—
(a) if person A is in police custody, any person who is entitled to access to person A by virtue of section 32(2),
(b) if person A is not in police custody, a person who is—
(i) at least 18 years of age, and
(ii) reasonably named by person A.

(6) In subsection (2)(b)—
(a) “mental disorder” has the meaning given in section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003,
(b) the reference to the police is to any—
(i) constable, or
(ii) person appointed as a member of police staff under section 26(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

Person not officially accused

Questioning following arrest

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply where—
(a) a person is in police custody in relation to an offence, and
(b) the person has not been officially accused of committing the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(2) A constable may put questions to the person in relation to the offence.

(3) The person is under no obligation to answer any question, other than to give the following information—
(a) the person’s name,
(b) the person’s address,
(c) the person’s date of birth,
(d) the person’s place of birth (in such detail as a constable considers necessary or expedient for the purpose of establishing the person’s identity), and
(e) the person’s nationality.
(4) Subsection (2) is without prejudice to any rule of law as regards the admissibility in evidence of any answer given.

Person officially accused

27 Authorisation for questioning

5 (1) The court may authorise a constable to question a person about an offence after the person has been officially accused of committing the offence.

(2) The court may grant authorisation only if it is satisfied that allowing the person to be questioned about the offence is necessary in the interests of justice.

(3) In deciding whether to grant authorisation, the court must take into account—

(a) the seriousness of the offence,
(b) the extent to which the person could have been questioned earlier in relation to the information which the applicant believes may be elicited by the proposed questioning,
(c) where the person could have been questioned earlier in relation to that information, whether it could reasonably have been foreseen at that time that the information might be important to proving or disproving that the person has committed an offence.

(4) Where subsection (5) applies, the court must give the person an opportunity to make representations before deciding whether to grant authorisation.

(5) This subsection applies where—

(a) a warrant has been granted to arrest the person in respect of the offence, or
(b) the person has appeared before a court in relation to the offence.

(6) Where granting authorisation, the court—

(a) must specify the period for which questioning is authorised, and
(b) may specify such other conditions as the court considers necessary to ensure that allowing the proposed questioning is not unfair to the person.

(7) A decision of the court—

(a) to grant or refuse authorisation, or
(b) to specify, or not to specify, conditions under subsection (6)(b), is final.

(8) In this section, “the court” means—

(a) where an indictment has been served on the person in respect of the High Court, a single judge of that court,
(b) in any other case, the sheriff.

28 Authorisation: further provision

(1) An application for authorisation may be made—

(a) where section 27(5) applies, by the prosecutor, or
(b) in any other case, by a constable.

(2) In subsection (1)(a), “the prosecutor” means—

(a) where an indictment has been served on the person in respect of the High Court, Crown Counsel, or

(b) in any other case, the procurator fiscal.

(3) Where an application for authorisation is made in writing (rather than orally) it must—

(a) be made in such form as may be prescribed by act of adjournal (or as nearly as may be in such form), and

(b) state whether another application has been made for authorisation to question the person about the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(4) Authorisation ceases to apply as soon as either—

(a) the period specified under section 27(6)(a) expires, or

(b) the person’s trial in respect of the offence, or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence, begins.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (4)(b), a trial begins—

(a) in proceedings on indictment, when the jury is sworn,

(b) in summary proceedings, when the first witness for the prosecution is sworn.

(6) In this section—

“authorisation” means authorisation under section 27,

“the offence” means the offence referred to in section 27(1).

29 Arrest to facilitate questioning

(1) On granting authorisation under section 27, the court may also grant a warrant for the person’s arrest if it seems to the court expedient to do so.

(2) The court must specify in a warrant granted under subsection (1) the maximum period for which the person may be detained under it.

(3) The person’s detention under a warrant granted under subsection (1) must end as soon as—

(a) the period of the person’s detention under the warrant becomes equal to the maximum period specified under subsection (2),

(b) the authorisation ceases to apply (see section 28(4)), or

(c) in the opinion of the constable responsible for the investigation into the offence referred to in section 27(1), there are no longer reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed—

(i) that offence, or

(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

(4) For the purpose of subsection (3)(a), the period of the person’s detention under the warrant begins when the person—
(a) is arrested at a police station, or
(b) arrives at a police station, having been taken there in accordance with section 4.

(5) For the avoidance of doubt—
(a) if the person is on bail when a warrant under subsection (1) is granted, the order admitting the person to bail is not impliedly recalled by the granting of the warrant,
(b) if the person is on bail when arrested under a warrant granted under subsection
(1)—
   (i) despite being in custody by virtue of the warrant the person remains on bail for the purpose of section 24(5)(b) of the 1995 Act,
   (ii) when the person’s detention under the warrant ends, the bail order continues to apply as it did immediately before the person’s arrest,
(c) if the person is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), the person remains subject to the undertaking despite—
   (i) the granting of a warrant under subsection (1),
   (ii) the person’s arrest and detention under it.

CHAPTER 5
RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS IN POLICE CUSTODY

Intimation and access to another person

30 Right to have intimation sent to other person

(1) A person in police custody has the right to have intimation sent to another person of—
   (a) the fact that the person is in custody,
   (b) the place where the person is in custody.

(2) Intimation under subsection (1) must be sent—
   (a) where a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, regardless of whether the person requests that it be sent,
   (b) in any other case, if the person requests that it be sent.

(3) The person to whom intimation is to be sent under subsection (1) is—
   (a) where a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, a parent of the person,
   (b) in any other case, an adult reasonably named by the person in custody.

(4) Intimation under subsection (1) must be sent—
   (a) as soon as reasonably practicable, or
   (b) if subsection (5) applies, with no more delay than is necessary.

(5) This subsection applies where a constable considers some delay to be necessary in the interests of—
   (a) the investigation or prevention of crime,
(b) the apprehension of offenders, or
(c) safeguarding and promoting the wellbeing of the person in custody, where a constable believes that person to be under 18 years of age.

(5A) The sending of intimation may be delayed by virtue of subsection (5)(c) only for so long as is necessary to ascertain whether a local authority will arrange for someone to visit the person in custody under section 32A(2).

(6) In this section and section 31—
“adult” means person who is at least 18 years of age, “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person in custody.

31 Right to have intimation sent: under 18s

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody is under 18 years of age.

(2) At the time of sending intimation to a person under section 30(1), that person must be asked to attend at the police station or other place where the person in custody is being held.

(2A) Subsection (2) does not apply if—
(a) a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, and
(b) the person in custody requests that the person to whom intimation is to be sent under section 30(1) is not asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held.

(3) Subsections (3A) and (4) apply where—
(a) it is not practicable or possible to contact, within a reasonable time, the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3),
(b) the person to whom intimation is sent by virtue of section 30(3), if asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held, claims to be unable or unwilling to attend within a reasonable time, or
(c) a local authority, acting under section 32A(8)(a), has advised against sending intimation to the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3).

(3A) Section 30(3) ceases to have effect.

(4) Attempts to send intimation to an appropriate person under section 30(1) must continue to be made until—
(a) an appropriate person is contacted and agrees to attend, within a reasonable time, at the police station or other place where the person in custody is being held, or (b) if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, the person requests that (for the time being) no further attempt to send intimation is made.

(5) In subsection (4), “an appropriate person” means—
(a) if a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, a person the constable considers appropriate having regard to the views of the person in custody,

(b) if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, an adult who is named by the person in custody and to whom a constable is willing to send intimation without a delay by virtue of section 30(5)(a) or (b).

(6) The reference in subsection (3)(a) to its not being possible to contact a person within a reasonable time includes the case where, by virtue of section 30(5)(a) or (b), a constable delays sending intimation to the person.

32 Right of under 18s to have access to other person

(1) Access to a person in police custody who a constable believes is under 16 years of age must be permitted to—

(a) a parent of the person,

(b) where a parent is not available, a person sent intimation under section 30 in respect of the person in custody.

(2) Access to a person in police custody who a constable believes is 16 or 17 years of age must be permitted to a person sent intimation under section 30 in respect of the person in custody where the person in custody wishes to have access to the person sent intimation.

(2A) Access to a person in custody under subsection (1) or (2) need not be permitted to more than one person at the same time.

(3) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (1) or (2) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—

(a) in the interests of—

(i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or

(ii) the apprehension of offenders, or

(b) for the wellbeing of the person in custody.

(4) In this section, “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person in custody.

32A Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

(1) Intimation of the fact that a person is in police custody and the place where the person is in custody must be sent to a local authority as soon as reasonably practicable if—

(a) a constable believes that the person may be subject to a supervision order, or

(b) by virtue of subsection (5)(c) of section 30, a constable has delayed sending intimation in respect of the person under subsection (1) of that section.

(2) A local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) may arrange for someone to visit the person in custody if—

(a) the person is subject to a supervision order, or

(b) the local authority—

(i) believes the person to be under 16 years of age, and
(ii) has grounds to believe that its arranging someone to visit the person would best safeguard and promote the person’s wellbeing (having regard to the effect of subsection (4)(a)).

(3) Before undertaking to arrange someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2), the local authority must be satisfied that anyone it arranges to visit the person in custody will be able to make the visit within a reasonable time.

(4) Where a local authority arranges for someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2)—

(a) sections 30 and 32 cease to have effect, and

(b) the person who the local authority has arranged to visit the person in custody must be permitted access to the person in custody.

(5) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (4)(b) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—

(a) in the interests of—

(i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or

(ii) the apprehension of offenders, or

(b) for the wellbeing of the person in custody.

(6) Where a local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) confirms that the person in custody is—

(a) over 16 years of age, and

(b) subject to a supervision order,

sections 30 to 32 are to be applied in respect of the person as if a constable believes the person to be under 16 years of age.

(7) Subsection (8) applies where a local authority might have arranged for someone to visit a person in custody under subsection (2) but—

(a) chose not to do so, or

(b) was precluded from doing so by subsection (3).

(8) The local authority may—

(a) advise a constable that the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3) should not be sent intimation if the local authority has grounds to believe that sending intimation to that person may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person in custody, and

(b) give advice as to who might be an appropriate person to a constable considering that matter under section 31(5) (and the constable must have regard to any such advice).

(9) In this section, “supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.
Support for vulnerable persons

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—
   (a) a person is in police custody,
   (b) a constable believes that the person is 16 years of age or over, and
   (c) owing to mental disorder, the person appears to the constable to be unable to—
      (i) understand sufficiently what is happening, or
      (ii) communicate effectively with the police.

(2) With a view to facilitating the provision of support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) to the person as soon as reasonably practicable, the constable must ensure that intimation of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) is sent to a person who the constable considers is suitable to provide the support.

(3) That is, support to—
   (a) help the person in custody to understand what is happening, and
   (b) facilitate effective communication between the person and the police.

(4) Those matters are—
   (a) the place where the person is in custody, and
   (b) that support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) is, in the view of the constable, required by the person.

(5) In this section—
   (a) “mental disorder” has the meaning given by section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003,
   (b) the references to the police are to any—
      (i) constable, or
      (ii) person appointed as a member of police staff under section 26(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

Right to have intimation sent to solicitor

(1) A person who is in police custody has the right to have intimation sent to a solicitor of any or all of the following—
   (a) the fact that the person is in custody,
   (b) the place where the person is in custody,
   (c) that the solicitor’s professional assistance is required by the person,
   (d) if the person has been officially accused of an offence—
      (i) whether the person is to be released from custody, and
(ii) where the person is not to be released, the court before which the person is to be brought in accordance with section 18(2) and the date on which the person is to be brought before that court.

(2) Where the person requests that intimation be sent under subsection (1), the intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.

36 Right to consultation with solicitor

(1) A person who is in police custody has the right to have a private consultation with a solicitor at any time.

(2) In exceptional circumstances, a constable may delay the person’s exercise of the right under subsection (1) so far as it is necessary in the interests of—
   (a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or
   (b) the apprehension of offenders.

(3) In subsection (1), “consultation” means consultation by such method as may be appropriate in the circumstances and includes (for example) consultation by telephone.

CHAPTER 6
POLICE POWERS AND DUTIES

Powers of police

37 Use of reasonable force

A constable may use reasonable force—
   (a) to effect an arrest,
   (b) when taking a person who is in police custody to any place.

38 Common law power of entry

Nothing in this Part affects any rule of law concerning the powers of a constable to enter any premises for any purpose.

39 Common law power of search etc.

(1) Nothing in this Part affects any rule of law by virtue of which a constable may exercise a power of the type described in subsection (2).

(2) The type of power is a power that a constable may exercise in relation to a person by reason of the person’s having been arrested and charged with an offence by a constable.

(3) Powers of the type described in subsection (2) include the power to—
   (a) search the person,
   (b) seize any item in the person’s possession,
   (d) cause the person to participate in an identification procedure.
40 Power of search etc. on arrest

(1) A constable may exercise in relation to a person to whom subsection (2) applies any power of the type described in section 39(2) which the constable would be able to exercise by virtue of a rule of law if the person had been charged with the relevant offence by a constable.

(2) This subsection applies to a person who—
   (a) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
   (b) has not, since being arrested, been charged with an offence by a constable.

(3) In subsection (1), “the relevant offence” means the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody.

Care of drunken persons

40A Taking drunk persons to designated place

(1) Where—
   (a) a person is liable to be arrested in respect of an offence by a constable without a warrant, and
   (b) the constable is of the opinion that the person is drunk,
the constable may take the person to a designated place (and do so instead of arresting the person).

(2) Nothing done under subsection (1)—
   (a) makes a person liable to be held unwillingly at a designated place, or
   (b) prevents a constable from arresting the person in respect of the offence referred to in that subsection.

(3) In this section, “designated place” is any place designated by the Scottish Ministers for the purpose of this section as a place suitable for the care of drunken persons.

Duties of police

41 Duty not to detain unnecessarily

A constable must take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

42 Duty to consider child’s wellbeing

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a constable is deciding whether to—
   (a) arrest a child,
   (b) hold a child in police custody,
   (c) interview a child about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the child of committing, or
   (d) charge a child with committing an offence.
(2) In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a child is a person who is under 18 years of age.

42A Duties in relation to children in custody

(1) A child who is in police custody at a police station is, so far as practicable, to be prevented from associating with any adult who is officially accused of committing an offence other than an adult to whom subsection (2) applies.

(2) This subsection applies to an adult if a constable believes that it may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the child mentioned in subsection (1) to prevent the child and adult from associating with one another.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

“child” means person who is under 18 years of age,

“adult” means person who is 18 years of age or over.

42B Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply if—

(a) a person is being kept in a place of safety in accordance with section 18A(2) when it is decided not to prosecute the person for any relevant offence, and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence.

(2) The Principal Reporter must be informed, as soon as reasonably practicable, that the person is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3).

(3) The person must be kept in a place of safety under this subsection until the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(4) An offence is a “relevant offence” for the purpose of subsection (1) if—

(a) it is the offence with which the person was officially accused, leading to the person being kept in the place of safety in accordance with section 18A(2), or

(b) it is an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence mentioned in paragraph (a).

(5) In this section, “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

CHAPTER 8

GENERAL

Common law and enactments

50 Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest

A constable has no power to arrest a person without a warrant in respect of an offence that has been or is being committed other than—
(a) the power of arrest conferred by section 1,
(b) the power of arrest conferred by section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

51 Abolition of requirement for constable to charge

Any rule of law that requires a constable to charge a person with an offence in particular circumstances is abolished.

52 Consequential modification

Schedule 1 contains repeals and other provisions consequential on this Part.

Code of practice about investigative functions

52A Code of practice about investigative functions

10 (1) The Lord Advocate must issue a code of practice on—
(a) the questioning, and recording of questioning, of persons suspected of committing offences, and
(b) the conduct of identification procedures involving such persons.

(2) The Lord Advocate—
(a) must keep the code of practice issued under subsection (1) under review,
(b) may from time to time revise the code of practice.

(3) The code of practice is to apply to the functions exercisable by or on behalf of—
(a) the Police Service of Scotland,
(b) such other bodies as are specified in the code (being bodies responsible for reporting offences to the procurator fiscal).

(4) Before issuing the code of practice, the Lord Advocate must consult publicly on a draft of the code.

(5) When preparing a draft of the code of practice for public consultation, the Lord Advocate must consult—
(a) the Lord Justice General,
(b) the Faculty of Advocates,
(c) the Law Society of Scotland,
(d) the Scottish Police Authority,
(e) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
(f) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
(g) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
(h) such other persons as the Lord Advocate considers appropriate.

(6) The Lord Advocate must lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of the code of practice issued under this section.
(7) Where a court determines in criminal proceedings that evidence has been obtained in breach of the code of practice, the evidence is inadmissible in the proceedings unless the court is satisfied that admitting the evidence would not result in unfairness in the proceedings.

(8) Breach of the code of practice does not of itself give rise to grounds for any legal claim whatsoever.

(9) Subsections (3) to (8) apply to a revised code of practice under subsection (2)(b) as they apply to the code of practice issued under subsection (1).

Disapplication of Part

52B Disapplication in relation to service offences

(1) References in this Part to an offence do not include a service offence.

(2) Nothing in this Part applies in relation to a person who is arrested in respect of a service offence.

(3) In this section, “service offence” has the meaning given by section 50(2) of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

53 Disapplication to terrorism offences

(1) Nothing in this Part applies in relation to a person who is arrested under section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to paragraph 18 of Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000.

Powers to modify Part

53A Further provision about application of Part

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part to provide that some or all of it—

(a) applies in relation to persons to whom it would otherwise not apply because of—

(i) section 52B, or

(ii) section 53,

(b) does not apply in relation to persons arrested otherwise than in respect of an offence.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such modifications to this Part as seem to them necessary or expedient in relation to its application to persons mentioned in subsection (1).

(3) Regulations under this section may make different provision for different purposes.

(4) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.

53B Further provision about vulnerable persons

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) amend subsections (2)(b) and (6) of section 25,
(b) amend subsections (1)(c), (3) and (5) of section 33,

(c) specify descriptions of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Interpretation of Part

54 Meaning of constable

In this Part, “constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

55 Meaning of officially accused

For the purposes of this Part, a person is officially accused of committing an offence if—

(a) a constable charges the person with the offence, or

(b) the prosecutor initiates proceedings against the person in respect of the offence.

56 Meaning of police custody

(1) For the purposes of this Part, a person is in police custody from the time the person is arrested by a constable until any one of the events mentioned in subsection (2) occurs.

(2) The events are—

(a) the person is released from custody,

(b) the person is brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2),

(c) the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2)(b) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 that the person continue to be kept in a place of safety.

PART 3

SOLEMN PROCEDURE

63 Proceedings on petition

(1) In section 35 (judicial examination) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (6) there is inserted—

“(6A) In proceedings before the sheriff in examination or further examination, the accused is not to be given an opportunity to make a declaration in respect of any charge.”.

(2) The following provisions of the 1995 Act are repealed—

(a) in section 35, subsections (3), (4) and (5),

(b) sections 36, 37 and 38,

(c) in section 68, subsection (1),

(d) in section 79, paragraph (b)(iii) of subsection (2),
64 Citation of jurors

In subsection (4) of section 85 (citation of jurors) of the 1995 Act, the words “by registered post or recorded delivery” are repealed.

65 Pre-trial time limits

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 65 (prevention of delay in trials)—

(a) in subsection (1), after paragraph (a) there is inserted—

“(aa) where an indictment has been served on the accused in respect of the sheriff court, a first diet is commenced within the period of 11 months;”,

(b) in subsection (1A), after the word “applies)” there is inserted “, the first diet (where subsection (1)(aa) above applies),”;

(c) in subsection (4)(b), for the words “110 days” there is substituted—

“(i) 110 days, unless a first diet in respect of the case is commenced within that period, which failing he shall be entitled to be admitted to bail; or

(ii) 140 days”,

(d) in subsection (9)—

(i) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (b) is repealed,

(ii) after paragraph (b) there is inserted—

“(ba) a first diet shall be taken to commence when it is called;”.

(3) In section 66 (service and lodging of indictment, etc.), for sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (a) of subsection (6) there is substituted “at a first diet not less than 29 clear days after the service of the indictment,”.

(4) In section 72C (procedure where preliminary hearing does not proceed), for paragraph (b) of subsection (4) there is substituted—

“(b) where the charge is one that can lawfully be tried in the sheriff court, at a first diet in that court not less than 29 clear days after the service of the notice.”.

66 Duty of parties to communicate

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 71 (first diet), after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1ZA)If a written record has been lodged in accordance with section 71C, the court must have regard to the written record when ascertaining the state of preparation of the parties.”.

(3) Before section 72 there is inserted—

“71C Written record of state of preparation: sheriff court

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—”
(a) the accused is indicted to the sheriff court, and
(b) a solicitor—
   (i) has notified the court under section 72F(1) that the solicitor has been engaged by the accused for the purposes of conducting the accused’s defence, and
   (ii) has not subsequently been dismissed by the accused or withdrawn.

(2) The prosecutor and the accused’s legal representative must, within the period described in subsection (3), communicate with each other and jointly prepare a written record of their state of preparation with respect to their cases (referred to in this section as “the written record”).

(3) The period referred to in subsection (2) begins on the day the accused is served with an indictment and expires at the end of the day falling 14 days later.

(6) The written record must—
   (a) be in such form, or as nearly as may be in such form,
   (b) contain such information, and
   (c) be lodged in such manner,
   as may be prescribed by act of adjournal.

(7) The written record must state the manner in which the communication required by subsection (2) was conducted (for example, by telephone, email or a meeting in person).

(8) In subsection (2), “the accused’s legal representative” means—
   (a) the solicitor referred to in subsection (1), or
   (b) where the solicitor has instructed counsel for the purposes of the conduct of the accused’s case, either the solicitor or that counsel, or both of them.

(9) In subsection (8)(b), “counsel” includes a solicitor who has a right of audience in the High Court of Justiciary under section 25A of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980.”.

(4) In section 75 (computation of certain periods), after the words “67(3),” there is inserted “71C(3)”.

67 First diets

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 66 (service and lodging of indictment, etc.)—
   (a) after subsection (6AA) there is inserted—
      “(6AB) A notice affixed under subsection (4)(b) or served under subsection (6), where the indictment is in respect of the sheriff court, must contain intimation to the accused that the first diet may proceed and a trial diet may be appointed in the accused’s absence.”,
   (b) in subsection (6B), for the words “or (6AA)” there is substituted “, (6AA) or (6AB)”.

(3) In section 71 (first diet)—
Part 3—Solemn procedure

(a) in subsection (1), the words from “whether” to “particular” are repealed,

(b) in subsection (5), after the word “proceed” there is inserted “, and a trial diet may be appointed,”,

(c) in subsection (6), for the words from the beginning to “required” there is substituted “Where the accused appears at the first diet, the accused is to be required at that diet”,

(d) subsection (7) is repealed,

(e) in subsection (9), after the word “section” there is inserted “and section 71B”.

(4) After section 71 there is inserted—

“71B First diet: appointment of trial diet

(1) At a first diet, unless a plea of guilty is tendered and accepted, the court must—

(a) after complying with section 71, and

(b) subject to subsections (3) to (7),

appoint a trial diet.

(2) Where a trial diet is appointed at a first diet, the accused must appear at the trial diet and answer the indictment.

(3) In appointing a trial diet under subsection (1), in any case in which the 12 month period applies (whether or not the 140 day period also applies in the case)—

(a) if the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed to trial within that period, it must, subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial diet for a date within that period, or

(b) if the court considers that the case would not be likely to be so ready, it must give the prosecutor an opportunity to make an application to the court under section 65(3) for an extension of the 12 month period.

(4) Where paragraph (b) of subsection (3) applies—

(a) if such an application as is mentioned in that paragraph is made and granted, the court must, subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial diet for a date within the 12 month period as extended, or

(b) if no such application is made or if one is made but is refused by the court—

(i) the court may desert the first diet simpliciter or pro loco et tempore, and

(ii) where the accused is committed until liberated in due course of law, the accused must be liberated forthwith.

(5) Subsection (6) applies in any case in which—

(a) the 140 day period as well as the 12 month period applies, and

(b) the court is required, by virtue of subsection (3)(a) or (4)(a) to appoint a trial diet within the 12 month period.

(6) In such a case—
(a) if the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed to trial within the 140 day period, it must appoint a trial diet for a date within that period as well as within the 12 month period, or

(b) if the court considers that the case would not be likely to be so ready, it must give the prosecutor an opportunity to make an application under section 65(5) for an extension of the 140 day period.

(7) Where paragraph (b) of subsection (6) applies—

(a) if such an application as is mentioned in that paragraph is made and granted, the court must appoint a trial diet for a date within the 140 day period as extended as well as within the 12 month period,

(b) if no such application is made or if one is made but is refused by the court—

(i) the court must proceed under subsection (3)(a) or (as the case may be) (4)(a) to appoint a trial diet for a date within the 12 month period, and

(ii) the accused is then entitled to be admitted to bail.

(8) Where an accused is, by virtue of subsection (7)(b)(ii), entitled to be admitted to bail, the court must, before admitting the accused to bail, give the prosecutor an opportunity to be heard.

(9) On appointing a trial diet under this section in a case where the accused has been admitted to bail (otherwise than by virtue of subsection (7)(b)(ii)), the court, after giving the parties an opportunity to be heard—

(a) must review the conditions imposed on the accused's bail, and

(b) having done so, may, if it considers it appropriate to do so, fix bail on different conditions.

(10) In this section—

“the 12 month period” means the period specified in subsection (1)(b) of section 65 and, in any case in which that period has been extended under subsection (3) of that section, includes that period as so extended,

“the 140 day period” means the period specified in subsection (4)(b)(ii) of section 65 and, in any case in which that period has been extended under subsection (5) of that section, includes that period as so extended.”.

(5) In subsection (3) of section 76 (procedure where accused desires to plead guilty), for the words from “or, where” to “Court,” there is substituted “, the first diet or (as the case may be)”.

(6) After section 83A there is inserted—

“83B Continuation of trial diet in the sheriff court

(1) In the sheriff court a trial diet and, if it is adjourned, the adjourned diet, may, without having been commenced, be continued from sitting day to sitting day—

(a) by minute, in such form as may be prescribed by act of adjournal, signed by the sheriff clerk,
(b) up to such maximum number of sitting days after the day originally appointed for the trial diet as may be so prescribed.

(2) The indictment falls if a trial diet, or adjourned diet, is not commenced by the end of the last sitting day to which it may be continued by virtue of subsection (1).

(3) For the purposes of this section, a trial diet or adjourned trial diet is to be taken to commence when it is called.

(4) In this section, “sitting day” means any day on which the court is sitting but does not include any Saturday or Sunday or any day which is a court holiday.”.

(7) The italic cross-heading immediately preceding section 83A becomes “Continuation of trial diet”.

68 Preliminary hearings

In section 72A (preliminary hearing: appointment of trial diet) of the 1995 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from the beginning to “section” there is substituted “In any case in which subsection (6) of section 72”,

(b) subsection (1A) is repealed.

69 Plea of guilty

In the 1995 Act—

(a) in section 70 (proceedings against organisations), subsection (7) is repealed,

(b) in subsection (1) of section 77 (plea of guilty), the words from “and, subject” to the end are repealed.

PART 4

SENTENCING

Maximum term for weapons offences

71 Maximum term for weapons offences

(1) The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)(b) of section 47 (prohibition of the carrying of offensive weapons), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(3) In subsection (1)(b) of section 49 (offence of having in public place article with blade or point), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(4) In subsection (5) of section 49A (offence of having article with blade or point (or offensive weapon) on school premises)—

(a) in paragraph (a)(ii), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”,

(b) in paragraph (b)(ii), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(5) In subsection (6)(b) of section 49C (offence of having offensive weapon etc. in prison), for the word “4” there is substituted “5”.
Prisoners on early release

72 Sentencing under the 1995 Act

After section 200 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“200A Sentencing prisoners on early release

(1) Before sentencing or otherwise dealing with a person who has been found by the court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment (other than an offence in respect of which life imprisonment is mandatory), the court must so far as is reasonably practicable ascertain whether the person was on early release at the time the offence was committed.

(2) Where the court ascertains that the person was on early release at the time the offence was committed, the court must consider making an order, or as the case may be a reference, under section 16(2) of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993.

(3) For the purposes of this section a person is on early release if, by virtue of one of the following enactments, the person is not in custody—

(a) Part I of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993,

(b) Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, or

(c) Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.”.

73 Sentencing under the 1993 Act

(1) Section 16 (commission of offence by released prisoner) of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1), for the words “or Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991” there is substituted “, Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003”.

(3) In subsection (2)—

(a) in paragraph (a), for the words from “other” to “below” there is substituted “to which subsection (2A) does not apply”,

(b) in paragraph (b), for the words from “where” to “subsection (1)(a)” there is substituted “to which subsection (2A) applies”.

(4) After subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2A) This subsection applies to a case if—

(a) the court mentioned in subsection (1)(b) is inferior to the court which imposed the original sentence, and

(b) the whole of the period described in subsection (2)(a) exceeds—

(i) if the court mentioned in subsection (1)(b) is a justice of the peace court not constituted by a stipendiary magistrate, 60 days,

(ii) if the court is a justice of the peace court constituted by a stipendiary magistrate or the sheriff sitting summarily, 12 months,

(iii) if the court is the sheriff sitting as a court of solemn jurisdiction, 5 years.”.
PART 5

APPEALS AND SCCRC

Appeals

74 Preliminary pleas in summary cases

(1) Section 174 (appeals relating to preliminary pleas) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)—
   (a) the words from “with the leave” to “and” are repealed,
   (b) for the words “this subsection” there is substituted “subsection (1A)(b)”.

(3) After subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) An appeal under subsection (1) may be taken—
   (a) in the case of a decision to dismiss the complaint or any part of it, by the prosecutor without the leave of the court,
   (b) in any other case, only with the leave of the court of first instance (granted on the motion of a party or ex proprio motu).”.

(4) After subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2A) Subsection (3) applies where—
   (a) the court grants leave to appeal under subsection (1), or
   (b) the prosecutor—
      (i) indicates an intention to appeal under subsection (1), and
      (ii) by virtue of subsection (1A)(a), does not require the leave of the court.”.

(5) In subsection (3), for the words from the beginning to “it” there is substituted “Where this subsection applies, the court of first instance”.

75 Preliminary diets in solemn cases

In section 74 (appeals in connection with preliminary diets) of the 1995 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from “to—” to “motu)” there is substituted “to any right of appeal under section 106 or 108 a party may,”,

(b) after subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2A) An appeal under subsection (1) may be taken—

(a) in the case of a decision to dismiss the indictment or any part of it, by the prosecutor without the leave of the court,
(b) in any other case, only with the leave of the court of first instance (granted on the motion of a party or ex proprio motu).”.

76 Extending certain time limits: summary

(1) Section 181 (stated case: directions by High Court) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.
(2) After subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) Where an application for a direction under subsection (1)—

(a) is made by the person convicted, and

(b) relates to the requirements of section 176(1),

the High Court may make a direction only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified by exceptional circumstances.

(1B) In considering whether there are exceptional circumstances for the purpose of subsection (1A), the High Court must have regard to—

(a) the length of time that has elapsed between the expiry of the period mentioned in section 176(1)(a) and the making of the application,

(b) the reasons stated in accordance with subsection (2A)(a)(i),

(c) the proposed grounds of appeal.”.

(3) Subsection (2C) is repealed.

(4) In paragraph (a) of subsection (3), the words from “(unless” to the end are repealed.

(5) At the end of the section there is inserted—

“(5) If the High Court makes a direction under subsection (1) it must—

(a) give reasons for the decision in writing, and

(b) give the reasons in ordinary language.”.

77 Extending certain time limits: solemn

(1) In section 105 (appeal against refusal of application) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (3) there is inserted—

“(3A) Subsection (3) does not entitle an applicant to be present at the hearing and determination of an application under section 111(2) unless the High Court has made a direction under section 111(4)(b).”.

(2) Section 111 (provisions supplementary to sections 109 and 110) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(3) After subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2ZA) Where an application under subsection (2) is received after the period to which it relates has expired, the High Court may extend the period only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified by exceptional circumstances.

(2ZB) In considering whether there are exceptional circumstances for the purpose of subsection (2ZA), the High Court must have regard to—

(a) the length of time that has elapsed between the expiry of the period and the making of the application,

(b) the reasons stated in accordance with subsection (2A)(a)(i),

(c) the proposed grounds of appeal.”.

(4) In subsection (2A)—

(a) the words “seeking extension of the period mentioned in section 109(1) of this Act” are repealed,
(b) in paragraph (a)(i)—

(i) after “failed” there is inserted “, or expects to fail,”,

(ii) the words “in section 109(1)” are repealed.

(5) Subsection (2C) is repealed.

(6) At the end of the section there is inserted—

“(4) An application under subsection (2) is to be dealt with by the High Court—

(a) in chambers, and

(b) unless the Court directs otherwise, without the parties being present.

(5) If the High Court extends a period under subsection (2) it must—

(a) give reasons for the decision in writing, and

(b) give the reasons in ordinary language.”.

78 Certain lateness not excusable

In section 300A (power of court to excuse procedural irregularities) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (7) there is inserted—

“(7A) Subsection (1) does not authorise a court to excuse a failure to do any of the following things timeously—

(a) lodge written intimation of intention to appeal in accordance with section 109(1),

(b) lodge a note of appeal in accordance with section 110(1)(a),

(c) make an application for a stated case under section 176(1),

(d) lodge a note of appeal in accordance with section 186(2)(a).”.

79 Advocation in solemn proceedings

After section 130 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“130A Bill of advocation not competent in respect of certain decisions

It is not competent to bring under review of the High Court by way of bill of advocation a decision taken at a first diet or a preliminary hearing.”.

80 Advocation in summary proceedings

After section 191A of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“191B Bill of advocation not competent in respect of certain decisions

It is not competent to bring under review of the High Court by way of bill of advocation a decision of the court of first instance that relates to such objection or denial as is mentioned in section 144(4).”.

81 Finality of appeal proceedings

(1) In subsection (2) of section 124 (finality of proceedings) of the 1995 Act—

(a) for the words “sections 288ZB and 288AA” there is substituted “section 288AA”,
(b) the words “a reference under section 288ZB or” are repealed.

(2) After section 194 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“194ZA Finality of proceedings

(1) Every interlocutor and sentence (including disposal or order) pronounced by the High Court when disposing of an appeal relating to summary proceedings is final and conclusive and not subject to review by any court whatsoever.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to—

(a) Part XA and section 288AA of this Act, and

(b) paragraph 13(a) of Schedule 6 to the Scotland Act 1998.

(3) It is incompetent to stay or suspend any execution or diligence issuing from the High Court under this Part, except for the purposes of an appeal under—

(a) section 288AA of this Act, or

(b) paragraph 13(a) of Schedule 6 to the Scotland Act 1998.”.

SCCRC

15 82 References by SCCRC

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 194B in subsection (1), the words “, subject to section 194DA of this Act,” are repealed.

(3) The title of section 194B becomes “References by the Commission”.

(3A) In section 194C, subsection (2) is repealed.

(4) Section 194DA is repealed.

PART 5A

CHILDREN AFFECTED BY PARENTAL IMPRISONMENT

82A Duty to undertake a child and family impact assessment

(1) Subsection (2) applies where a person who has responsibility for a child—

(a) has been remanded in custody awaiting trial,

(b) has been found by a court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment and has been remanded in custody awaiting sentence, or

(c) has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention.

(2) The court must ensure that an assessment (a “child and family impact assessment”) is carried out to determine the likely impact of the imprisonment or other detention on the wellbeing of the child, and to identify any support and assistance which will be necessary to meet the child’s wellbeing needs.

(3) A child and family impact assessment must be undertaken as soon as reasonably practicable after the period of imprisonment or other detention has been imposed on the person.
(4) A child and family impact assessment must—

(a) consider how the imprisonment or other detention is likely to affect the wellbeing of any child for whom the person is responsible,

(b) identify the wellbeing needs of any child arising from the imprisonment or other detention,

(c) confirm any actions to be taken, as a result of the child and family impact assessment, to ensure that the child’s wellbeing needs are met,

(d) confirm who is to be responsible for taking those actions,

(e) provide advice and information about what can best be done to address the wellbeing needs of the child, and

(f) specify arrangements for a future review of the child and family impact assessment.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision requiring such persons (or descriptions of persons) as may be prescribed in the regulations to undertake a child and family impact assessment under subsection (2).

(6) Regulations under subsection (5) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

PART 6

MISCELLANEOUS

CHAPTER A1

PUBLICATION OF PROSECUTORIAL TEST

82B Publication of prosecutorial test

(1) The Lord Advocate must make available to the public a statement setting out in general terms the matters about which a prosecutor requires to be satisfied in order to initiate, and continue with, criminal proceedings in respect of any offence.

(2) The reference in subsection (1) to a prosecutor is to one within the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

CHAPTER 1

STATEMENTS AND PROCEDURE

Statements by accused

(1) After section 261 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“261ZA Statements by accused

(1) Evidence of a statement to which this subsection applies is not inadmissible as evidence of any fact contained in the statement on account of the evidence’s being hearsay.”
(2) Subsection (1) applies to a statement made by the accused in the course of the accused’s being questioned (whether as a suspect or not) by a constable, or another official, investigating an offence.

(3) Subsection (1) does not affect the issue of whether evidence of a statement made by one accused is admissible as evidence in relation to another accused.”.

(2) The title of section 261 of the 1995 Act becomes “Statements by co-accused”.

Use of technology

86 Live television links

(1) After section 288G of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“Use of live television link

288H Participation through live television link

(1) Where the court so determines at any time before or at a specified hearing, a detained person is to participate in the hearing by means of a live television link.

(2) The court—

(a) must give the parties in the case an opportunity to make representations before making a determination under subsection (1),

(b) may make such a determination only if it considers that to do so is not contrary to the interests of justice.

(3) The court may require a detained person to participate by means of a live television link in any proceedings at a specified hearing or otherwise in the case for the sole purpose of considering whether to make a determination under subsection (1) with respect to a specified hearing.

(4) Where a detained person participates in any specified hearing or other proceedings by means of a live television link—

(a) a place of detention is, for the purposes of the hearing or other proceedings, deemed to be part of the court-room, and

(b) accordingly, the hearing or other proceedings is deemed to take place in the presence of the detained person.

(5) In this section—

“court-room” includes chambers,

“live television link” means live television link between a place of detention and the court-room in which any specified hearing or other proceedings is or (as the case may be) is to be held.

288I Evidence and personal appearance

(1) No evidence as to a charge on any complaint or indictment may be led or presented at a specified hearing in respect of which there is a determination under section 288H(1).

(2) The court—
(a) may, at any time before or at a specified hearing, revoke a determination under section 288H(1),

(b) must do so in relation to a detained person if it considers that it is in the interests of justice for the detained person to appear in person.

(3) The court may postpone a specified hearing to a later day if, on the day on which a specified hearing takes place or is due to take place—

(a) the court decides not to make a determination under section 288H(1) with respect to the hearing, or

(b) the court revokes such a determination under subsection (2).

288IA Effect of postponement

(1) Except where a postponement under section 288I(3) is while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, the following do not count towards any time limit arising in such a person’s case if such a postponement in the case is to the next day on which the court is sitting—

(a) that next day,

(b) any intervening Saturday, Sunday or court holiday.

(2) Even while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, that section does not prevent a postponement under section 288I(3) in the person’s case.

(3) In section 288I and this section, “postpone” includes adjourn.

288J Specified hearings

(1) The Lord Justice General may by directions specify types of hearing at the High Court, sheriff court and JP court in which a detained person may participate in accordance with section 288H(1).

(2) Directions under subsection (1) may specify types of hearing by reference to—

(a) the venues at which they take place,

(b) particular places of detention,

(c) categories of cases or proceedings to which they relate.

(3) Directions under subsection (1) may—

(a) vary or revoke earlier such directions,

(b) make different provision for different purposes.

(4) The validity of any proceedings is not affected by the participation of a detained person by means of a live television link in a hearing that is not a specified hearing.

(5) In this section, “hearing” includes any diet or hearing in criminal proceedings which may be held in the presence of an accused, a convicted person or an appellant in the proceedings.
288K Defined terms

For the purpose of sections 288H to 288J—

“detained person” means person who is—

(a) an accused, a convicted person or an appellant in the case to which a specified hearing relates, and

(b) imprisoned or otherwise lawfully detained (whether or not in connection with an offence) at any place in Scotland,

“place of detention” means place in which a detained person is imprisoned or detained,

“specified hearing” means hearing of a type specified in directions having effect for the time being under section 288J.”.

(2) In addition—

(a) in section 117 (presence of appellant or applicant at hearing) of the 1995 Act—

(i) subsection (6) is repealed,

(ii) in subsection (7), for the word “(6)” there is substituted “(5)”,

(b) section 80 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 is repealed.

86A Electronic proceedings

(1) In section 305 (Acts of Adjournal) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) Subsection (1) above extends to making provision by Act of Adjournal for something to be done in electronic form or by electronic means.”.

(2) These provisions of the 1995 Act are repealed—

(a) in section 141—

(i) subsection (3A),

(ii) in subsection (5), the words “(including a legible version of an electronic communication)”,

(iii) subsection (5ZA),

(iv) in subsection (5A), paragraph (b) together with the word “or” immediately preceding it,

(v) subsections (6A), (7A) and (7B),

(b) section 303B together with the italic heading immediately preceding it,

(c) section 308A.

(3) In the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007, section 42 is repealed.
CHAPTER 1A

AUTHORISATION UNDER PART III OF THE POLICE ACT 1997

86B Authorisation of persons other than constables

In section 108 (interpretation of Part III) of the Police Act 1997, after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) A reference in this Part to a staff officer of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner is to any person who—

(a) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7A of schedule 4 to the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, or

(b) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7 of that schedule to whom paragraph 7B(2) of that schedule applies.”.

CHAPTER 2

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

87 Establishment and functions

(1) After section 55 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 there is inserted—

“CHAPTER 8A

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

55A Establishment of the PNBS

(1) There is established a body to be known as the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

(2) Schedule 2A makes further provision about the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

(3) In this Chapter, the references to the PNBS are to the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

55B Representations about pay etc.

(1) The PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about—

(a) any draft regulations shared with it under section 54(1)(a),

(b) any draft determination of a kind mentioned in subsection (2),

(c) the matters mentioned in subsection (4) generally.

(2) The draft determination referred to in subsection (1)(b) is a draft of a determination to be made by the Scottish Ministers—

(a) in relation to a matter mentioned in subsection (4), and

(b) by virtue of regulations made under section 48.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may, after consulting the chairperson of the PNBS—

(a) require the PNBS to make representations under subsection (1),
(b) set or extend a time limit within which it must do so.

(4) The matters referred to in subsections (1)(c) and (2)(a) are the following matters in relation to constables (other than special constables) and police cadets—

(a) pay, allowances and expenses,

(b) public holidays and leave,

(d) hours of duty.

55C Representations on other matters

(1) The PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about—

(a) any draft regulations shared with it under section 54(2),

(b) the matters mentioned in subsection (2) generally.

(2) The matters referred to in subsection (1)(b) are matters relating to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets.

(3) But those matters do not include the matters mentioned in section 55B(4).

55CA Steps following arbitration

(1) If representations under section 55B(1) are made in terms settled through arbitration in accordance with the PNBS’s constitution, the Scottish Ministers must take all reasonable steps appearing to them to be necessary for giving effect to those representations.

(2) However, this—

(a) requires the Scottish Ministers to take such steps only in qualifying cases (see paragraph 4C(2) of schedule 2A),

(b) does not require the Scottish Ministers—

(i) to take such steps in relation to representations that are no longer being pursued by the PNBS, or

(ii) where such steps would comprise or include the making of regulations under section 48, to make regulations under that section more than once with respect to the same representations.

55D Reporting by the PNBS

(1) The PNBS must, as soon as practicable after the end of each reporting year, prepare a report on how it has carried out its functions during that year.

(2) The PNBS must—

(a) give a copy of each report to the Scottish Ministers,

(b) publish each report in such manner as it considers appropriate.

(3) In this Chapter, “reporting year” is as defined in the PNBS’s constitution.”.
(2) In section 54 (consultation on regulations) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, in subsection (1)—
   (a) for the words from “61(1)” to “pensions)” there is substituted “55B(4)”,
   (b) in paragraph (a), for the words “the United Kingdom” there is substituted “Scotland”.

(2A) In section 125 (subordinate legislation) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, after subsection (3) there is inserted—
   “(3A) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) of schedule 2A are subject to the affirmative procedure if they include provisions of the kind mentioned in paragraph 4B(2) or 4C(2) of that schedule.”.

(3) After schedule 2 to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 there is inserted (as schedule 2A to that Act) the schedule set out in schedule 3.

87A Consequential and transitional

(1) In connection with section 87—
   (a) in schedule 1 to the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, after paragraph 50A there is inserted—
      “50B The Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.”,
   (b) in schedule 2 to the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003, at the appropriate place under the heading referring to offices there is inserted—
      “Chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland”.

(2) On the coming into force of section 87—
   (a) a person then holding office as the chairman of the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom by virtue of section 61(2) of the Police Act 1996 is to be regarded as if appointed as the chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland under paragraph 2(2) of schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,
   (b) any agreements then extant within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom (so far as relating to the Police Service of Scotland) of the kind for which Chapter 8A of Part 1 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 includes provision are to be regarded as if made as agreements within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland by virtue of that Chapter.

PART 7
FINAL PROVISIONS

Ancillary and definition

88 Ancillary regulations

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such supplemental, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of or in connection with this Act.

(2) Regulations under this section—
(a) are subject to the affirmative procedure if they add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act (including this Act),
(b) otherwise, are subject to the negative procedure.

89 Meaning of “the 1995 Act”

In this Act, “the 1995 Act” means the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

Commencement and short title

90 Commencement

(1) This Part comes into force on the day after Royal Assent.
(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.
(3) An order under subsection (2) may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

91 Short title

The short title of this Act is the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015.
SCHEDULE A1
(introduced by sections 14(3) and 20(6))

BREACH OF LIBERATION CONDITION

Offence of breaching condition

1 (1) A person commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, the person breaches a liberation condition by reason of—
   (a) failing to comply with an investigative liberation condition,
   (b) failing to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking, or
   (c) failing to comply with the terms of an undertaking, other than the requirement to appear at court.

2 (2) Sub-paragraph (1) does not apply where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (in which case see paragraph 3).

3 (3) It is competent to amend a complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under sub-paragraph (1) at any time before the trial of a person in summary proceedings for—
   (a) the original offence, or
   (b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as the original offence.

4 (4) In sub-paragraph (3), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
   (a) an investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
   (b) an undertaking was given.

Sentencing for the offence

2 (1) A person who commits an offence under paragraph 1(1) is liable on summary conviction to—
   (a) a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or
   (b) imprisonment for a period—
       (i) where conviction is in the justice of the peace court, not exceeding 60 days,
       (ii) where conviction is in the sheriff court, not exceeding 12 months.

3 (2) A penalty under sub-paragraph (1) may be imposed in addition to any other penalty which it is competent for the court to impose, even if the total of penalties imposed exceeds the maximum penalty which it is competent to impose in respect of the original offence.

3 (3) The reference in sub-paragraph (2) to a penalty being imposed in addition to another penalty means, in the case of sentences of imprisonment or detention—
   (a) where the sentences are imposed at the same time (whether or not in relation to the same complaint), framing the sentences so that they have effect consecutively,
   (b) where the sentences are imposed at different times, framing the sentence imposed later so that (if the earlier sentence has not been served) the later sentence has effect consecutive to the earlier sentence.
(4) Sub-paragraph (3)(b) is subject to section 204A (restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners) of the 1995 Act.

(5) Where a person is to be sentenced in respect of an offence under paragraph 1(1), the court may remit the person for sentence in respect of it to any court which is considering the original offence.

(6) In sub-paragraphs (2) and (5), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
(a) the investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
(b) the undertaking was given.

Breach by committing offence

3 (1) This paragraph applies—
(a) where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (“offence O”), but
(b) only if the fact that offence O was committed while the person was subject to the liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(2) In determining the penalty for offence O, the court must have regard—
(a) to the fact that offence O was committed in breach of a liberation condition,
(b) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an investigative liberation condition, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 4(1),
(c) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an undertaking other than the requirement to appear at court, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 5(1).

(3) Where the maximum penalty in respect of offence O is specified by (or by virtue of) an enactment, the maximum penalty is increased—
(a) where it is a fine, by the amount equivalent to level 3 on the standard scale,
(b) where it is a period of imprisonment—
(i) as respects conviction in the justice of the peace court, by 60 days,
(ii) as respects conviction in the sheriff court or the High Court, by 6 months.

(4) The maximum penalty is increased by sub-paragraph (3) even if the penalty as so increased exceeds the penalty which it would otherwise be competent for the court to impose.

(5) In imposing a penalty in respect of offence O, the court must state—
(a) where the penalty is different from that which the court would have imposed had sub-paragraph (2) not applied, the extent of and the reasons for that difference,
(b) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(b)

4 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(b), the matters are—
(a) the number of offences in connection with which the person was subject to investigative liberation conditions when offence O was committed,
(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

5 (2) In sub-paragraph (1)—
(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

3 Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

15 Matters for paragraph 3(2)(c)
5 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(c), the matters are—
(a) the number of undertakings to which the person was subject when offence O was committed,
(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),
(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

5 (2) In sub-paragraph (1)—
(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph,
as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

3 Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Evidential presumptions
6 (1) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), the facts mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) are to be held as admitted unless challenged by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded.

3 The facts are—
(a) that the person breached an undertaking by reason of failing to appear at court as required by the terms of the undertaking,

(b) that the person was subject to a particular—
(i) investigative liberation condition, or
(ii) condition under the terms of an undertaking.

(3) In proceedings to which sub-paragraph (4) applies—

(a) something in writing, purporting to impose investigative liberation conditions and bearing to be signed by a constable, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the investigative liberation conditions imposed under section 14(2),

(b) something in writing, purporting to be an undertaking and bearing to be signed by the person said to have given it, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the undertaking at the time that it was given,

(c) a document purporting to be a notice (or a copy of a notice) under section 16 or 21, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the notice.

(4) This sub-paragraph applies to proceedings—

(a) in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), or

(b) in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(5) In proceedings in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment, that fact is to be held as admitted unless challenged—

(a) in summary proceedings, by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, or

(b) in the case of proceedings on indictment, by giving notice of a preliminary objection in accordance with section 71(2) or 72(6)(b)(i) of the 1995 Act.

Interpretation

7 In this schedule—

(a) references to an investigative liberation condition are to a condition imposed under section 14(2) or 17(3)(b) subject to any modification by notice under section 16(1) or (5)(a),

(b) references to an undertaking are to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a),

(c) references to the terms of an undertaking are to the terms of an undertaking subject to any modification by—

(i) notice under section 21(1), or

(ii) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).

SCHEDULE 1

(introduced by section 52)

MODIFICATIONS IN CONNECTION WITH PART 1

PART 1

PROVISIONS AS TO ARREST

Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

The 1995 Act is amended as follows.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Schedule 1—Modifications in connection with Part 1

Part 1—Provisions as to arrest

2 These provisions are repealed—
   (a) in section 13, subsection (7),
   (b) section 21.

3 In section 28—
   (a) in subsection (1), for the words “has broken, is breaking, or is likely to break” there is substituted “is likely to breach”,
   (b) in subsection (1A), for the words “has breached, or is likely to breach,” there is substituted “is likely to breach”.

4 (1) In section 234A, subsections (4A) and (4B) are repealed.
   (2) In subsection (11) of section 234AA, for the words from the beginning to “those sections apply” there is substituted “Section 9 (breach of orders) of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 applies in relation to antisocial behaviour orders made under this section as that section applies”.

Miscellaneous enactments

5 In section 4 of the Trespass (Scotland) Act 1865, for the words from the beginning to “every” in the last place where it occurs there is substituted “A”.

6 In subsection (3) of section 1 of the Public Meeting Act 1908, the words from “, and if he refuses” to the end are repealed.

7 In the Firearms Act 1968, section 50 is repealed.

8 In the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982—
   (a) in section 59, subsections (1), (2) and (5) are repealed,
   (aa) in subsection (3), for the words “he can be delivered into the custody” there is substituted “the arrival”,
   (b) in section 65, subsections (4) and (5) are repealed,
   (c) in subsection (1) of section 80, for the words from “and taken” to the end there is substituted “by a constable”.

9 In the Child Abduction Act 1984, section 7 is repealed.

10 In section 11 of the Protection of Badgers Act 1992, paragraph (c) of subsection (1) is repealed.

11 In the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, section 60B is repealed.

12 In section 8B of the Olympic Symbol etc. (Protection) Act 1995, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.

13 In the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995—
   (a) in section 7, subsection (4) is repealed,
   (b) in section 47, subsection (3) is repealed,
   (c) in section 48, subsection (3) is repealed,
   (d) in section 50, subsections (3) and (5) are repealed.

14 In the Deer (Scotland) Act 1996, section 28 is repealed.
In section 61 of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997, subsection (5) is repealed.

In section 7 of the Protection of Wild Mammals (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph (a) of subsection (1) is repealed.

In the Fireworks Act 2003—
(a) in section 11A, subsection (6) is repealed,
(b) section 11B is repealed.

In section 307 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, subsection (4) is repealed.

In the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004—
(a) section 11 is repealed,
(b) in section 22, subsections (3) and (4) are repealed,
(c) section 38 is repealed.

In section 130 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, subsection (3) is repealed.

In section 13 of the Animal Health and Welfare (Scotland) Act 2006, in schedule 1—
(a) paragraph 16 is repealed,
(b) in paragraph 18(b)(i), the words “except paragraph 16” are repealed.

In the Prostitution (Public Places) (Scotland) Act 2007, section 2 is repealed.

In section 32 of the Glasgow Commonwealth Games Act 2008, subsections (3) and (4) are repealed.

In section 7 of the Tobacco and Primary Medical Services (Scotland) Act 2010, subsection (4) is repealed.

In each of sections 169(2) and 170(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, the words “arrested without warrant and” are repealed.

In section 9 of the Forced Marriage etc. (Protection and Jurisdiction) (Scotland) Act 2011, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.

PART 2

FURTHER MODIFICATIONS

The 1995 Act

The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

These provisions are repealed—
(a) sections 14 to 17A,
(c) sections 22 to 22ZB (together with the italic heading immediately preceding section 22),
(c) section 43,
(d) in section 135, subsection (3).

In section 18—
(a) in subsection (1), the words “or is detained under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed,
(b) in subsection (2), the words “or detained” are repealed.

(2) In subsection (2)(a) of section 18B, for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(3) In section 18D—
(a) in subsection (2)(a), the words “or detained” are repealed,
(b) in subsection (2)(b), for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(4) In subsection (8)(b) of section 19AA, the words “or detention under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed.

27B In section 42—
(a) subsection (3) is repealed,
(b) subsection (7) is repealed,
(c) in subsection (8), for the words “subsection (7) above” there is substituted “section 18C of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,
(d) in subsection (9), the words “detained in a police station, or” are repealed,
(e) subsection (10) is repealed.

28 In section 74, after paragraph (a) of subsection (2) there is inserted—
“(aza)may not be taken against a decision taken by virtue of section 27 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015;”.

29 In section 79—
(a) for subsection (2)(b)(ii) there is substituted—
“(ii) a preliminary objection under any of the provisions listed in subsection (3A);”;
(b) after subsection (3) there is inserted—
“(3A) For the purpose of subsection (2)(b)(ii), the provisions are—
(a) section 27(4A)(a) or (4B), 90C(2A), 255 or 255A of this Act,
(b) section 9(6) of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 or that section as applied by section 234AA(11) of this Act,
(c) section 48(5)(b) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015.”.

30 Before section 261A there is inserted—“Statements made after charge

261ZB Exception to rule on inadmissibility

Evidence of a statement made by a person in response to questioning carried out in accordance with authorisation granted under section 27 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 is not inadmissible on account of the statement’s being made after the person has been charged with an offence.”.
Other enactments

31 In subsection (2)(a) of section 8A of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986, for the words “section 15A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (right of suspects to have access to a solicitor)” there is substituted “section 24 (right to have solicitor present) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”.

31A In section 6D of the Road Traffic Act 1988, for subsection (2A) there is substituted—

“(2A) Instead of, or before, arresting a person under this section, a constable may detain the person at or near the place where the preliminary test was, or would have been, administered with a view to imposing on the person there a requirement under section 7.”.

31B In Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000—

(a) in paragraph 18—

(i) in sub-paragraph (2), for the words from “and” at the end of paragraph (a) to the end of the sub-paragraph there is substituted—

“(ab) intimation is to be made under paragraph 16(1) whether the person detained requests that it be made or not, and

(ac) section 32 (right of under 18s to have access to other person) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies as if the detained person were a person in police custody for the purposes of that section.”,

(ii) after sub-paragraph (3) there is inserted—

“(4) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)—

“child” means a person under 16 years of age,

“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the child mentioned in sub-paragraph (2).”;

(b) in paragraph 20(1), the words “or a person detained under section 14 of that Act” are repealed,

(c) in paragraph 27—

(i) in sub-paragraph (4), paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) sub-paragraph (5) is repealed.

31C In the schedule to the Sexual Offences (Procedure and Evidence) (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph 2 is repealed.

32 In the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, sections 1, 3 and 4 are repealed.

32A In the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011—

(a) in section 65—

(i) for subsection (1) there is substituted—

“(1) Subsection (2) applies where the Principal Reporter is informed under subsection (2) of section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 that a child is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3) of that section.”,

(ii) in subsection (2), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”,

32B In Schedule 2 to the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Act 2012, paragraph 41 is repealed.
(b) in section 66(1), for sub-paragraph (vii) there is substituted—

“(vii) information under section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, or”;

(c) in section 68(4)(e)(vi), for the words “section 43(5) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46)” there is substituted “section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,

(d) in section 69, for subsection (3) there is substituted—

“(3) If—

(a) the determination under section 66(2) is made following the Principal Reporter receiving information under section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, and

(b) at the time the determination is made the child is being kept in a place of safety,

the children’s hearing must be arranged to take place no later than the third day after the Principal Reporter receives the information mentioned in paragraph (a).”,

(e) in section 72(2)(b), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”.

In section 20 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.

SCHEDULE 3
(introduced by section 87)

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

“SCHEDULE 2A
(introduced by section 55A)

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

Status of the PNBS

1 (1) The PNBS—

(a) is not a servant or agent of the Crown, and

(b) has no status, immunity or privilege of the Crown.

(2) The property of the PNBS is not property of, or property held on behalf of, the Crown.

Chairing and membership

2 (1) The PNBS is to consist of—

(a) a chairperson,

(c) other persons representing the interests of each of—

(i) the Authority,

(ii) the chief constable,
(iii) constables (other than special constables) and police cadets,
(iv) the Scottish Ministers.

(2) It is for the Scottish Ministers to appoint the chairperson.

(3) Other members are to be appointed in accordance with the constitution prepared under paragraph 4.

(4) A member of the PNBS holds and vacates office in accordance with the terms of the member’s appointment.

(5) The chairperson may—
   (a) resign from office by giving notice in writing to the Scottish Ministers,
   (b) be removed from office if, in the opinion of the Scottish Ministers, the person is unable, unfit or unwilling to perform the functions of the office.

Temporary chairperson

2A(1) The PNBS may have a temporary chairperson if (for the time being)—
   (a) there is no chairperson, or
   (b) the chairperson is unavailable to act.

(2) A reference in this Chapter to the chairperson is to be read, where appropriate to do so by virtue of sub-paragraph (1), as meaning or including (as the context requires) the temporary chairperson.

Disqualification from chairing

3 A person is disqualified from appointment, and from holding office, as the chairperson of the PNBS if the person is or becomes—
   (a) a member of the House of Commons,
   (b) a member of the Scottish Parliament,
   (c) a member of the European Parliament,
   (d) a Minister of the Crown,
   (e) a member of the Scottish Government,
   (f) a civil servant.

Constitution and procedure etc.

4 (1) It is for the Scottish Ministers to prepare the constitution for the PNBS.

(2) The constitution must regulate the procedure for consensus to be reached among the members of the PNBS on the terms of representations to be made under section 55B(1) or 55C(1).

(2A) The constitution—
   (a) may require a dispute on representations to be made under section 55B(1) to be submitted to arbitration by agreement among the members to do so, and must not prevent such a dispute from being submitted to arbitration on such agreement (except prevention by way of limitation as allowed below),
(b) may—

(i) authorise the chairperson to submit such a dispute to arbitration without such agreement,

(ii) limit how often within a reporting year such a dispute can be submitted to arbitration (including limitation framed by reference to particular matters or circumstances).

(3) The constitution may contain provision about—

(a) membership (including number of members to represent each of the interests mentioned in paragraph 2(1)(c)),

(b) internal organisation (for example, committees and office-holders),

(c) procedures to be followed (including conduct of meetings),

(d) the content of a report required by section 55D,

(e) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(4) The Scottish Ministers—

(a) must keep the constitution under review,

(b) may revise it from time to time.

(5) Before preparing or revising the constitution, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the Authority,

(b) the chief constable, and

(c) persons representing the interests of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets.

(6) The constitution, or any revision of it, has effect only when brought into effect by the Scottish Ministers by regulations.

Process of arbitration

4A(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies where—

(a) a dispute is submitted to arbitration in accordance with the constitution, and

(b) no arbitration agreement relating to the dispute is in place.

(2) A document submitting the dispute to arbitration is deemed to be an arbitration agreement.

(3) For the application of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010, a reference in this paragraph to an arbitration agreement is to such an agreement as defined by section 4 of that Act.

4B(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of arbitration in accordance with the constitution (whether such arbitration arises by reason of a real or deemed arbitration agreement).

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions disapplying or modifying the mandatory rules in schedule 1 to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010.
4C(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of the operation of section 55CA.

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions specifying, by reference to particular matters or circumstances, what are qualifying cases.

Remuneration and expenses

5 (1) The Scottish Ministers may pay—

(a) such remuneration to the chairperson of the PNBS as they think fit,

(b) such expenses of the members of the PNBS as they think fit.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must pay such expenses as they consider are reasonably required to be incurred to enable the PNBS to carry out its functions.”.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
[AS AMENDED AT STAGE 2]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about criminal justice including as to police powers and rights of suspects and as to criminal evidence, procedure and sentencing; to establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland; and for connected purposes.

Introduced by: Kenny MacAskill
On: 20 June 2013
Bill type: Government Bill
INTRODUCTION

1. As required under Rule 9.7.8A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, these revised Explanatory Notes are published to accompany the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013) as amended at Stage 2. Text has been added or deleted as necessary to reflect the amendments made to the Bill at Stage 2 and these changes are indicated by sidelining in the right margin.

2. These revised Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament.

3. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

OVERVIEW OF THE BILL

4. The Bill seeks to support the aims set out in the Policy Memorandum by introducing reforms to modernise and enhance the efficiency of the Scottish criminal justice system. The provisions in the Bill take forward a range of the Scottish Government’s key justice priorities. Some of these provisions have been developed from the recommendations of two independent reviews: Lord Carloway’s review of criminal law and practice ¹ and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s review of sheriff and jury procedure ². The Scottish Government sought views on Lord Carloway’s ³ and Sheriff Principal Bowen’s ⁴ recommendations in two separate consultations. A further consultation was also carried out on whether additional safeguards ⁵ may be required if the requirement for corroboration is removed. The provisions in the Bill that would have abolished the requirement for corroboration were removed from the Bill at Stage 2. Further information on these consultations can be found in the Policy Memorandum.

¹http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Review/CarlowayReview
²http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2010/06/10093251/0
³http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/07/4794
⁴http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/8141/0
⁵http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/4628
5. The Bill is in eight Parts.

6. Part A1 (Police procedures) includes provisions about searches of persons not in police custody. It includes limitations on when such a search can be carried out, and makes provision for there to be a code of practice about such searches. It also makes provision for police to have the power to search a person before the person is being taken from one place to another. This part also makes provisions that allow regulations to be laid that will give the police the power to search children for alcohol, should this power be considered necessary after a public consultation.

7. Part 1 (Arrest and custody) includes provisions on the powers of the police to arrest, hold in custody and question a person who is suspected of committing an offence. This part also provides for the rights of such persons in custody and makes specific provision for vulnerable adults and children.

8. Part 3 (Solemn procedure) makes a number of amendments to the solemn procedure set out in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). These include imposing a duty on parties in criminal proceedings to communicate and increasing the length of time for which an accused person can be remanded before having to be brought to trial from 110 to 140 days.

9. Part 4 (Sentencing) increases the maximum sentence for handling offensive weapons offences, places a specific duty on the court to consider whether it is appropriate to punish an offender for committing an offence while on early release, and increases the flexibility for different levels of court to consider imposing a punishment on such offenders.

10. Part 5 (Appeals and SCCRC) amends the 1995 Act to make changes to appeal procedures in the High Court and adjusts how the Appeal Court will consider Scottish Criminal Case Review Commission referrals.

11. Part 5A (Children affected by parental imprisonment) places a duty on courts which have authorised the detention of a person who has responsibility for a child to undertake a child and family impact assessment.

12. Part 6 (Miscellaneous) requires the Lord Advocate to publish details of the test used by prosecutors to decide whether to bring a prosecution, makes provision to enable the use of TV links by courts; makes an amendment to the Police Act 1997 and establishes and sets out the functions for a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

13. Part 7 contains general and ancillary provisions.
PART A1 – POLICE PROCEDURES

CHAPTER 1 – SEARCH OF A PERSON NOT IN POLICE CUSTODY

Section 1 – Power of a constable

14. Section A1 provides that, where a person is not in police custody, it is unlawful for a search to be carried out without express statutory authority, or without express authority conferred by a warrant. This provision will have the effect of ending the practice of ‘consensual’ stop and search.

15. Section B1 provides express authority for constables to search a person in the circumstances where the police have a power to transport a person from one place to another under specific authority of an enactment, warrant or court order. The search is for the purpose of safeguarding that person’s, or any other person’s, safety and well-being.

16. Section C1 imposes a duty on a constable, when deciding whether to search a child who is not in police custody, to treat the well-being of the child as a primary consideration.

17. Section D1 allows regulations to be laid that would provide a power for the police to search children under 18 for alcohol and to search a person who is over 18 where that person is hiding a child’s alcohol in order to stop it being found. Before laying regulations, the Scottish Ministers must carry out a public consultation. The regulations would be subject to affirmative procedure. This section is subject to the sunset clause in section E1.

18. Section E1 provides commencement provisions. The provisions in section A1 and B1 are required to commence on the same date that the code of practice required by section G1 first comes into effect. If no regulations are laid under the provisions in section D1 within two years of the date that the code of practice first comes into effect, the power to make regulations in section D1 will lapse.

Chapter 2 – Code of practice

19. Section G1 provides that Scottish Ministers must make a code of practice about the carrying out of stop and search and what the code must set out. The code of practice will only apply to the functions exercisable by police constables.

20. Section H1 contains provisions regarding subsequent reviews and revision of the code of practice. It allows Ministers to revise the code in light of a review. The Scottish Ministers must review the code within two years of it first coming into effect. Thereafter the code must be reviewed at least every four years. When deciding when to conduct a review, Ministers must have regard to representations made by the Scottish Police Authority, the Chief Constable, or Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary in Scotland (HMICS).

21. Section I1 provides for the legal status of the code of practice. Any court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings must take into account the code of practice (including, therefore, any breach of the code) when determining any questions arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant.
22. Section J1 makes provisions about consultation on the code of practice. Before making a code of practice, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly on a draft code. Subsection (2) names a number of persons or organisations that Ministers must consult when preparing a draft for public consultation.

23. Section K1 makes provision for bringing the code of practice into effect. A code of practice or any revised code of practice will be brought into effect on a date to be appointed by regulations. The regulations will be subject to affirmative procedure, and the code to which the regulations relate must be laid before the parliament at the same time.

24. Section L1 amends the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 to provide that the Scottish Police Authority must publish specified stop and search data in its annual report.

PART 1 – ARREST AND CUSTODY

Chapter 1 – Arrest by police

Section 1 – Power of a constable

25. Section 1 sets out new powers of a police constable to arrest, without a warrant, a person suspected of having committed or to be committing an offence in Scotland. (Note, however, that the arrest regime under the Terrorism Act 2000 is unaffected by the Bill (see sections 50(b) and 53)).

26. Section 1(1) provides that a constable (defined in section 54) who has reasonable grounds to suspect that a person has committed or is committing an offence may arrest that person without a warrant.

27. Section 1(2) qualifies the power of a constable to arrest a person without warrant for having committed an offence which is not punishable by imprisonment. Not only must a constable have reasonable grounds for suspecting the person, the constable must also be satisfied that the “interests of justice” would not be met if the person was not immediately arrested for the offence. Section 1(3) sets out factors that may be relevant in applying the “interests of justice” test referred to in section 1(2).

28. Section 1(4) provides clarity that an offence is only to be considered as not punishable by imprisonment in terms of subsection (2) if, as a matter of general application, a person, when convicted, cannot be sentenced to imprisonment. This means that the power operates even where the particular person arrested may not be imprisoned (due, most likely, to the person’s age).

Section 2 – Exercise of the power

29. Section 2 sets out how the power of arrest set out in section 1 can be exercised.

30. Section 2(1) provides that a person may be arrested under section 1 multiple times for the same offence (e.g. a person may be arrested, questioned and released and subsequently arrested again if, for example, further evidence comes to light).
31. Section 2(2) clarifies that the power to arrest again does not apply to persons who have been “officially accused” (defined in section 55) of having committed the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances. For example, the police cannot use the power of arrest to arrest a person without a warrant if they have a warrant to arrest the person.

32. Section 2(3) creates a requirement that a constable who is not in uniform must show his or her identification, as soon as reasonably practicable, when requested to do so by a person being arrested.

Procedure following arrest

Section 3 – Information to be given on arrest

33. Section 3 specifies the information which must be provided by a constable, as soon as is reasonably practicable, to an arrested person. The information will normally be provided immediately upon arrest.

Section 4 – Arrested person to be taken to police station

34. Section 4 sets out the requirement on a constable to take an arrested person to a police station as soon as is reasonably practicable after arrest (if not arrested there). By virtue of section 37 a constable may use reasonable force when doing so.

35. Section 4(2) provides circumstances as to when the duty to take the person to the police station can cease to apply prior to arrival at a police station. It further provides that the person must in those circumstances be released from custody.

36. Section 4(3) also clarifies that the requirement to take the person to the police station will also cease to apply if, before arriving at a police station, that person is released under the provisions contained within section 19(2).

Section 5 – Information to be given at police station

37. Section 5 sets out the information that must be provided to a person taken to a police station under arrest and to those arrested whilst at a police station.

38. In particular, section 5(2) and (3) set out various matters that the arrested person must be informed of, as soon as reasonably practicable, e.g. their right not to say anything other than to provide information relating to their name, address etc.; their rights to have intimation sent, and to have access, to solicitors and, where appropriate, persons such as parents or other persons capable of giving support; and their rights under Articles 3 and 4 of Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council, including, for example, a letter of rights which contains basic information to assist persons in understanding their rights.

Section 6 – Information to be recorded by police

39. Section 6 details the information which must be recorded by a constable when a person is arrested under section 1.
40. Section 6(1) provides a list of the information to be recorded in respect of all arrests.

41. Section 6(1A) requires a constable who has released a person from custody under section 4(2) to record the reasons for the initial arrest. Section 6(2) to (5) specifies the information that must be recorded in relation to a person arrested and held in police custody (defined in section 56) but not officially charged with an offence e.g. the timing and outcome of a police decision on whether to authorise their continued custody; the time and outcome of any review of continued custody; the time a person is released from custody on conditions or charged.

Chapter 2 – Custody: person not officially accused

Keeping person in custody

Section 7 – Authorisation for keeping in custody

42. Section 7(1) sets out the procedure for keeping a person in custody where the person has not been arrested under a warrant or charged with an offence by a constable.

43. Section 7(2) provides that authorisation to keep the person in custody must be sought as soon as reasonably practicable after the person is arrested at a police station or arrives at a police station following arrest.

44. Section 7(3) and (4) provide that authorisation to keep a person in custody may only be given by a constable of the rank of sergeant or above who has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody and if the test set out in section 10 is met. Section 7(5) provides that if authorisation is refused then the person can continue to be held in custody only if charged with an offence.

Section 8 – Information to be given on authorisation

45. Section 8 provides that at the time when authorisation is given to keep a person in custody under section 7, the person must be informed of the reason they are being kept in custody and that they may only be kept in custody without charge for a period of 12 hours. That person must also be informed when authorisation is given under section 7 that a further extension of 12 hours may be authorised under section 12A.

Section 11 – 12 hour limit: general rule

46. Section 11 provides that a person may not continue to be held in custody after a continuous period of 12 hours unless that person is then charged with an offence by a constable or authorisation has been given to extend that arrest for a further 12 hours under section 12A. The period of 12 hours begins at the point when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given by a constable in accordance with section 7. After the expiry of 12 hours if the person is not charged, they must be released, perhaps conditionally, if appropriate (see section 14).
Section 12 – 12 hour limit: previous period

47. Where a person is held in custody on more than one occasion for the same or a related offence, section 12 provides that the 12 hour maximum period of custody (set out in section 11) is reduced by any earlier period during which the person was held in custody for that offence.

Section 12A – Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit

48. Section 12A(1) contains provisions to allow for an extension of the time in which a person may be kept in police custody for a further 12 hours after the initial 12 hours ends.

49. Section 12A(2) provides that the authorisation to extend that custody must be given by a constable of the rank of inspector or above who has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody and if the tests set out in section 12A(3)(a) and (b) are met.

50. Section 12A(3) contains the tests which must be met before authorisation to extend the arrest for a further 12 hours can be authorised.

51. Section 12A(4) places a duty on the authorising constable to, where practicable, allow the person or if the person wishes, the person’s solicitor, to make representations either orally or in writing, and to have regard to any such representations.

52. Section 12A(5) clarifies that any authorisation to extend beyond the initial 12 hours is deemed to have been withdrawn if the person is released prior to those initial 12 hours elapsing.

53. Section 12A(6) provides that after the expiry of the further 12 hours the person can only continue to be held in police custody if charged.

Section 12B – Information to be given on authorisation under section 12A

54. Section 12B specifies the information which must be provided by a constable to an arrested person when authorisation to extend the arrest under section 12A is granted. This information will be given as soon as reasonably practicable after authorisation is given.

Section 9 – Custody review

55. Section 9(1) and (2) provide that where a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of six hours and has not been charged with an offence, a decision must be made on whether to continue to keep that person in custody. That decision must be made as soon as reasonably practicable after the expiry of the period of six hours which started when the authorisation under section 7 was given. In making that decision, the test set out in section 10 is applied (referred to below). Under section 9(3) the decision must be made by a constable of the rank of inspector or above, who has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody. If the test set out in section 10 is not met, the person may continue to be held in custody only if they are charged with an offence. This section also provides that where an arrest has been extended under 12A, and if the person remains in custody, that there must be a further 6 hour review after this extension period has begun.
Section 10 – Test for sections 7, 12A and 9

56. Section 10 sets out the test for keeping a person in custody under section 7(4), 12A and reviewing continuation of that period of custody after six hours under section 9(2).

57. Section 10(1) provides that the test is that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed an offence and keeping the person in custody is necessary and proportionate for the purposes of bringing the person before a court or otherwise dealing with the person under the law. In considering what is “necessary and proportionate” regard may be had to (among others) the factors detailed in section 10(2).

Section 13 – Medical treatment

58. Section 13(1) and (2) apply to a person who is taken into police custody having been arrested without a warrant, has not been charged with an offence and is at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment. They provide that authority to keep a person in custody may be given as though section 7 applies in the hospital as it does in a police station. For the purpose of calculating the 12 hour maximum period of custody set out in section 11, account will be taken of any time during which a person is at a hospital or travelling to or from one and is being questioned by a constable (section 13(4) to (6)). The same rules apply in calculating any previous period of custody (section 12(3)).

Investigative liberation

Section 14 – Release on conditions

59. Section 14 applies where: a person is in police custody by virtue of the authorisation under section 7 (that is, where a person has been arrested without warrant and not charged, including a case where authorisation has been reviewed and continued under section 9), a constable has reasonable grounds to suspect that the person has committed a relevant offence and the period of 28 days calculated in accordance with section 15(1)(a) has not expired. As explained further below, the effect of section 14 is to enable the police to release such persons from police custody on conditions which may be applied for a maximum period of 28 days following the conditions being imposed. It follows, that a person could not be released again on investigative liberation if arrested again after those 28 days have expired. The meaning of “relevant offence” is given in subsection (6).

60. Subsection (2) provides that a constable of the rank of sergeant or above (subsection (5)) may authorise the release of a person from custody on any condition which is necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence. The meaning of “relevant offence” is given in subsection (6).

61. Section 14(3) ensures that any condition imposed is treated as a liberation condition for the purposes of Chapter 7. This means that a breach of any condition may be penalised by a fine or a prison sentence as outlined in Chapter 7 and, a breach which would be an offence were the person not subject to liberation conditions may be taken into account in sentencing for that offence.
Section 15 – Conditions ceasing to apply

62. Section 15 provides when conditions imposed on a person under section 14(2) cease to apply: namely, (under section 16) if the condition is removed by the police by notice, if the person is arrested in connection with a relevant offence (“relevant offence” as defined by section 15(2)), if the person is officially accused of committing a relevant offence, at the end of the 28 day period (described in section 14(4)) or (under section 17) if the condition is removed as a result of an application for review made to a sheriff against the conditions.

Section 16 – Modification or removal of conditions

63. Section 16 enables a constable, by notice, to modify or remove any condition imposed by the police under section 14(2). A modified condition may be more or less onerous than the condition originally set. Under section 16(2) a notice about the modification or removal of a condition must be given in writing to the person who is subject to it and must specify the time from which the condition is modified or removed. Any modification or removal of a condition requires to be approved by a constable of the rank of an inspector or above. This power gives the police the flexibility to adjust conditions in light of changed circumstances.

64. Section 16(3) provides that a constable of the rank of inspector or above must keep under review whether or not there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) has committed a relevant offence (as defined in section 16(8)), and whether the condition imposed remains necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence. If the inspector is no longer satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person who is subject to a condition has committed a relevant offence, the person must be given notice of the removal of the condition. If no longer satisfied that a condition is necessary and proportionate, again the person must be given notice that the condition is being modified or removed.

65. Section 16(6) provides that any such notice must be given in writing to the person as soon as practicable and it must specify as the time from which the condition is modified or removed, the time at which the duty to give the notice arose i.e. the time at which the decision is made by an appropriate constable, to remove or modify the condition.

Section 17 – Review of conditions

66. Section 17(1) provides that a person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) may make an application for review to a sheriff.

67. Section 17(2) requires the sheriff to give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations before the review is determined.

68. Section 17(3) provides that where the sheriff is not satisfied that the condition imposed is necessary and proportionate, the sheriff may remove it or impose an alternative condition which the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate for that purpose.

69. Section 17(4) provides that a condition imposed on review by the sheriff under section 17(3) is to be regarded as having been imposed by a constable under section 14(2). provides that in effect, the conditions set by the sheriff have the same effect and are to be taken as having taken effect when set by the police, i.e. the 28 day period is calculated from the date on which the police conditions were set. Conditions imposed by the sheriff can be modified or removed under section 16(1) in the same manner as police conditions.

Chapter 3 – Custody: person officially accused

Person to be brought before court

Section 17A – Information to be given if sexual offence

70. Section 17A(1) contains the criteria that are to be applied to establish whether a person falls within this section. The person must have been arrested in respect of a warrant for a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies or, if arrested without warrant and since being arrested, have been charged by a constable for a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies.

71. Section 17(2) contains the information that a person who falls within the criteria contained within subsection (1) must be given. The person must be informed that certain hearings in the course of their case may only be conducted by a lawyer. The person must also be given notice that it is in their interests to engage the professional assistance of a solicitor at, or for the purposes of those hearings and if the person does not engage the assistance of a solicitor then the court will do so.

Section 18 – Person to be brought before court

72. Section 18(1) and (2) provide that, wherever practicable, persons kept in custody after being arrested under a warrant or arrested without a warrant and subsequently charged with an offence by a constable, must be brought before a court by the end of the next court day. For example, a person arrested at 11pm on a Tuesday and charged with an offence at 2am on the Wednesday would be due in court not later than the end of the court’s sitting on the Thursday.

73. Section 18(3) provides for persons to be considered to be brought before a court if appearing by television link.

Section 18A – Under 18s to be kept in a place of safety prior to court

74. Section 18A provides that persons under 16 and those aged 16 and 17 subject to compulsory supervision orders who are being brought to court in accordance with section 18(2) are only kept in a police station in the circumstances prescribed in subsection (3) and a constable of the rank of inspector or above has certified accordingly.

Section 18B – Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court

75. Section 18B makes provision for circumstances where a person who is under 16 or is aged 16 or over and subject to a supervision order is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2) or released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a). It provides that a parent of that person (if one can be found) must be informed (a) of the court before which the person is to be brought, (b) of the date on which the person is to be brought before the court, (c) of the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing and (d) that the parent’s attendance at the court may be required under section 42 of the 1995 Act. The requirement to give such information may be dispensed with if a constable believes that it would be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person being brought before the court or released on undertaking (subsection(3)).

Section 18C – Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court

76. Section 18C sets out the circumstances when a local authority has to be advised of the following information: the court before which the person is to be brought, the date the person is to be brought before the court and the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing. There are two sets of circumstances which require the local authority to be notified. Firstly, where a person who is (i) under 16 years, (ii) 16 or 17 years of age and subject to either a compulsory supervision order or an interim compulsory supervision order or (iii) believed to be 16 or 17 years of age and has declined the right to have intimation sent under section 30 is brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2). Secondly, where a person is under 16 or 17 years and subject to compulsory supervision is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

77. The information to be provided is (a) the court before which the person is to be brought, (b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court and (c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing. Subsection (5) defines “appropriate local authority” as the local authority in the area where the court sits.

Police liberation

Section 19 – Liberation by police

78. Section 19(1) and (2) provide that where a person is in custody having been charged with an offence, the police may: release that person on an undertaking under section 20, release the person without an undertaking or refuse to release. (Note the provisions do not apply where a person is in custody by virtue of a warrant granted under section 29(1)). It is also relevant to note that under section 41 a constable must take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

79. Section 19(2A) provides that where a person is in police custody on a warrant as contained within sub-section (1)(b), the person will not be allowed to be released without an undertaking as provided for in sub-section (2)(b).

80. Section 19(3) provides that a constable will not be liable to any claim because of a refusal to release a person from custody.

Section 20 – Release on undertaking

81. Again, in considering whether to release a person on an undertaking the police will be mindful of their obligations under section 41 of the Bill (duty not to detain unnecessarily). Section 20(1) provides for a person to be released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) only if they sign that undertaking.
82. Section 20(2) specifies the terms of an undertaking and section 20(3) provides for the conditions and the further conditions which may be imposed. With regard to those further conditions, these are illustrated by subsection (4), with paragraph (a) setting out the type of further conditions that only a constable of the rank of inspector or above may impose. Any other condition may be imposed by a constable of the rank of sergeant or above.

83. Section 20(6) provides that the requirement imposed by an undertaking to attend at court and comply with conditions are to be taken to be liberation conditions for the purposes of schedule A1 on breach of liberation conditions. This means that a breach of any condition may be penalised by a fine or a prison sentence as outlined in schedule A1 and a breach which would be an offence were the person not subject to liberation conditions may be taken into account in sentencing for that offence.

Section 21 – Modification of undertaking

84. Section 21(1) enables the procurator fiscal by notice (effected as set out in section 21(5)) to modify an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), either by changing the time or place of the court hearing or removing or altering a condition in the undertaking. The manner of citation may be effected, for example, by delivering the notice personally or leaving it at the person’s home.

Section 21A – Rescission of undertaking

85. Section 21A(1) enables the procurator fiscal to rescind an undertaking under section 19(2)(a) regardless of whether the person who gave it is to be prosecuted.

86. Section 21A(2) clarifies that the rescission takes effect at the end of the day the notice is sent to the person who gave the undertaking.

87. Section 21A(3) provides that notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

88. Section 21A(4) provides a constable with a power of arrest to if the constable has reasonable grounds for believing that the person is likely to fail to comply with the terms of an undertaking as contained within section 19(2)(a).

89. Section 21A(5) provides that, when a person is arrested under subsection (4) or is arrested otherwise than in accordance with the undertaking, as in subsection (6), the undertaking is rescinded and the person is deemed to be in custody, as if charged with the original offence for which an undertaking was given.

90. Section 21A(7) provides that reference contained within subsections (4) and (6)(b) regarding the terms of the undertaking also refer to any undertaking modified by notice made under section 21(1) or by a sheriff under section 22(3)(b).
21B – Expiry of Undertaking

91. Section 21B(1) provides that an undertaking under section 19(2) is deemed to have expired in two circumstances: either at the end of the day when the person was required to have appeared at court, or at the end of the day when a person appears at court having been arrested on a warrant for failing to appear as required by the terms of the undertaking.

92. Section 21(2) provides that any alteration to a condition in an undertaking should not make a condition more onerous on the person.

93. Section 21(3) provides for the procurator fiscal to rescind an undertaking. This would be appropriate, for example, if a decision is made not to prosecute. Section 21(4) provides for the circumstances in which an undertaking will expire.

Section 22 – Review of undertaking

94. Section 22(1) enables a person subject to an undertaking to apply to the sheriff for review.

95. Section 22(2) provides that the sheriff must provide the procurator fiscal with an opportunity to make representations with regard to the review. Section 22(3) provides that the sheriff may either remove a condition or impose any alternative condition that the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate.

Chapter 4 – Police interview

Rights of suspects

Section 23 – Information to be given before interview

96. Section 23 applies to a person who is either in police custody (defined in section 56) or has voluntarily attended a police station, or other place, for the purpose of being interviewed by the police.

97. It requires a constable to inform a person suspected of committing an offence of their rights at the most one hour before any interview commences. These rights are:

- the right to be informed of the general nature of that offence,
- the right not to say anything other than to provide the person’s name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality;
- the right to have a solicitor present during any interview; and
- if the person is being held in police custody, the rights detailed in Chapter 5, namely: the right to have another person informed that the person is in custody, the right to have a solicitor informed that the person is in custody and the person’s right of access to a solicitor whilst in custody.
98. Subsection (3) provides that if a person has already exercised their right to have another person or solicitor informed of their custody, then the police are not required to inform the person of these rights a second time.

99. For the purpose of this section, a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking for the person’s name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality. As such, a constable does not have to inform the person of their rights, as detailed at subsection (2), before asking the person for these details.

100. Subsection (5) provides that, if a person is being interviewed as authorised by section 27 of the Bill (which permits the court to authorise a constable to question someone who has been officially accused of an offence), the person must be told before the start of the interview about any conditions attached by the court when authorising the questioning. This will always include a specified period of time for which questioning is authorised, and may also include conditions imposed by the court to ensure that allowing the questioning is not unfair.

Section 24 – Right to have solicitor present

101. This section provides for the right of a person reasonably suspected of committing an offence to have a solicitor present during police interview. It applies to a person who is either in police custody or has voluntarily attended a police station, or other place, for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.

102. Section 24(3) provides that unless a person has consented to be interviewed without a solicitor present, a constable must not start to interview the person about the alleged offence until a solicitor is present and must not deny the solicitor access to the person at any time during interview.

103. Under subsection (4), a constable may start to interview the person without a solicitor present if satisfied it is necessary to interview the person without delay in the interests of the investigation or prevention of crime, or the apprehension of offenders. This is a high test. If a solicitor becomes available during such time as the police are interviewing a person, the solicitor must be allowed access to that person.

104. For the purpose of this section, a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking for the person’s name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality. As such, a constable does not have to wait for a solicitor to be present before asking a person for these details.

105. Subsection (6)(a) and (b) provides for a record to be made of the time at which a person consents to be interviewed without a solicitor present and any reason the person gives for waiving the right to have a solicitor present. A person may revoke their consent at any time and in such a case the police must record the time at which a person requests that intimation is sent to a solicitor and the time that intimation is sent (section 6(1)(f) and (g)).
Section 25 – Consent to interview without solicitor

106. Subsection (2)(a) provides that a person under 16 years of age may not consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present.

107. Subsection (2)(aa) provides that a person aged 16 or 17 and subject to a compulsory supervision order or an interim compulsory supervision order made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 may not consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present.

108. Subsection (2)(b) provides that a person aged 16 years and over and, owing to a mental disorder (as defined in subsection (6)(a)), is considered by a constable to be unable to understand sufficiently what is happening or to communicate effectively with the police, may not consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present.

109. Subsections (3), (4) and (5) provide that a person who is 16 or 17 years of age and not subject to a compulsory supervision order or interim compulsory supervision order or suffering from a mental disorder may consent to be interviewed without a solicitor present with the agreement of a “relevant person”. If the person aged 16 or 17 years is in police custody, a “relevant person” means any person who could by virtue of section 32(2) visit the person. If the person aged 16 or 17 is not in police custody, a “relevant person” means a person who is at least 18 years of age and is reasonably named by the 16 or 17 year old.

Person not officially accused

Section 26 – Questioning following arrest

110. Section 26 enables a constable to question a person following arrest provided the person has not been officially accused of the offence (i.e. charged with the offence by the police or where a prosecutor has started proceedings in relation to the offence), or an offence arising from the same circumstances. The person has the right, however, not to answer any questions but must provide the police with their name, address, date of birth, place of birth and nationality.

111. Under subsection (3), the use, in evidence, of any answers given by a person during questioning is subject to the laws on admissibility. In general terms, this means that any questioning must be fair.

Person officially accused

Section 27 – Authorisation for questioning

112. Section 27 introduces a regime to allow the court to authorise a constable to question an accused person after the person has been officially accused of an offence or offences.

113. Subsection (1) confirms that the court may authorise a constable to carry out questioning once this stage has been reached. There is no provision for any other person, such as a prosecutor, to be so authorised.
114. Subsections (2) and (3) set out the circumstances in which the court can allow this questioning to take place. These provisions are designed to ensure that this power is exercised proportionately, having regard both to the rights of the accused person and to the public interest in gathering evidence in respect of an alleged criminal offence.

115. Thus subsection (2) provides that the court needs to be satisfied that the proposed questioning is in the interests of justice.

116. Subsection (3) sets out further factors which the court must take into account when deciding whether or not to authorise an application for questioning.

117. Subsection (5) applies where a court has granted an application to authorise questioning after the case has called in court, either having been commenced by means of a warrant, or where the accused has appeared in court. In those circumstances, subsection (4) gives the accused person the right to be heard by the court before any decision on the application is made. The person can be represented by a solicitor for these purposes, if the person wishes. It follows that the person has no similar right to be heard in respect of an application about a case which has not yet called in court.

118. Subsection (6) applies where the court has decided to grant the application and authorise questioning. In that event, subsection (6)(a) provides that the court must specify the length of time during which a constable may question the accused person. Subsection (6)(b) allows, but does not require, a court to place other conditions on the questioning to ensure that it is not unfair to the accused person. This might, for example, mean a restriction on the subject matter about which the accused person can properly be questioned.

119. Subsection (7) provides that there is no right of appeal against the decision of a court either to grant or refuse authorisation, or against any conditions imposed by the court under subsection (6)(b).

120. Subsection (8) defines the word “court” for the purposes of this section.

Section 28 – Authorisation: further provision

121. Section 28 makes further provision in respect of questioning after a person has been officially accused of an offence.

122. Subsection (1) sets out who may make an application for authorisation. Where the case against the accused person has called in court in terms of section 27(5), subsection (1)(a) provides that the application must be made by a prosecutor; otherwise the application should be made by a constable (subsection (1)(b)). In the former case, though, even if the application is granted, the questioning will be carried out by a constable, in terms of section 27(1); the prosecutor’s limited right to question an accused person at the inception of solemn proceedings only (generally known as “judicial examination”) is abolished by section 63 of this Bill.

123. Subsection (2) defines “prosecutor” for the purposes of subsection (1).
124. Subsection (3)(a) gives the High Court of Justiciary the power to prescribe, in an Act of Adjournal, the form in which a written application seeking authorisation must be made; and a written application should closely follow that form. Subsection (3)(b), by requiring an applicant to include details of any previous applications for authorisation to question the accused person, either about the same offence, or about another offence arising out of the same circumstances, will ensure that the court has information about any such previous applications.

125. Subsection (4) sets out when authorisation to question the accused person comes to an end: either when the period stipulated by the court under section 27(6)(a) expires; or, when the trial of the accused person starts. Subsection (5) defines when a trial is deemed to have started for this section.

126. Subsection (6) defines “authorisation” and “offence” for the purposes of this section.

Section 29 – Arrest to facilitate questioning

127. Where the police wish to question someone who has been officially accused of an offence, but is at liberty, section 29 provides that it will be open to the court to grant a warrant for the arrest of the accused person so the person can be detained for the purposes of questioning.

128. Subsection (1) provides that, when granting authorisation for questioning, a court can grant a warrant for the accused person’s arrest if it is expedient to do so.

129. Subsection (2) protects the accused person from indefinite detention, by requiring that if the court grants an application for a warrant it must put a time limit on the period for which the person can be detained to be questioned. Subsection (3) makes provision as to when the accused person’s detention, under a warrant granted in terms of this section, must come to an end.

130. Subsection (4) clarifies when an accused person’s detention under a warrant granted in terms of this section starts, making it possible to determine when the period specified in section 29(3)(a) has expired.

131. Subsections (5)(a) and (b) put it beyond doubt that a warrant under this section does not operate to recall or affect the operation of any bail order that the accused person might be on, whether in the same proceedings or not. While the accused person is in custody, having been detained and arrested on the warrant, subsection 24(5)(b) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which makes it a condition of bail that the accused does not commit an offence while on bail, remains in force. This means that if the person commits an offence while detained in custody under a warrant granted in terms of this section, it would be a breach of that condition of bail. Once the accused person’s detention ends, the bail order applies in full, including any conditions attached to that order.

132. Similarly, subsection (5)(c) makes it clear that, where an accused person has been liberated on an undertaking in terms of section 19 of this Bill, the terms and conditions of the undertaking remain in force where a warrant is granted for the accused person, and continue in force after arrest and detention on that warrant.
Chapter 5 – Rights of suspects in police custody

Intimation and access to another person

Section 30 – Right to have intimation sent to other person

133. Section 30 affords a person in police custody the right to have someone else informed that the person is in police custody and where they are being held in custody.

134. This intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable after the person arrives at a police station unless a delay is considered necessary in the interests of the investigation or prevention of crime, the apprehension of offenders or safeguarding and promoting the wellbeing of the person (subsection (5)). Where such a delay is required, it should be for no longer than necessary (subsection (4)(b)) or until it has been ascertained whether a local authority will arrange for someone to visit the person in custody under section 32A(2) (subsection(5A)).

135. If a constable believes that the person in police custody is under 16 years of age, under subsections (2)(a) and (3)(a), a parent must be informed, regardless of whether the person requests that intimation be sent. The definition of a parent for this section and section 31 includes a guardian and any other person who has the care of the person (subsection (6)).

Section 31 – Right to have intimation sent: under 18s

136. Under this section, if a constable believes that a person in police custody is under 18 years of age, the person sent intimation under section 30 must be asked to attend at the police station or other place where the person is being held (subsection (2)). For those under 16 years this means a parent of the person and for those aged 16 and 17 years, an adult named by them (section 30(3)). The requirement in subsection (2) does not apply if a constable believes that the person in police custody is 16 or 17 years of age and has requested that the person notified under section 30 should not be asked to attend (subsection (2A)).

137. If a constable believes that a person in police custody is under 18 years of age and finds that the person to whom intimation is to be sent is not contactable within a reasonable time or claims to be unable or unwilling to attend in a reasonable time, or a local authority has advised against sending intimation to that person, then intimation must be sent to another appropriate person. An “appropriate person” for these purposes might be a parent or guardian or carer or, a duty social worker from the local authority.

138. Where the person in police custody is believed to be under 16, attempts to send intimation must continue until an “appropriate person” is contacted and agrees to attend at the police station or other place the person is being held within a reasonable time. For these purposes, an “appropriate person” means a person the police consider appropriate having regard to the views of the person in police custody.

139. Where the person in police custody is believed to be 16 or 17 years of age, attempts to send intimation must continue until an “appropriate person” is contacted and agrees to attend at the police station or other place the person is being held within a reasonable time or the person in custody requests that, for the time being, no further attempts be made. For these purposes an “appropriate person” means an adult who is named by the person in custody and to whom a constable is willing to send intimation without delay.

140. Subsection (6) provides that, where the police delay sending intimation by virtue of section 30(5)(a) or (b) (which allows the police to delay sending intimation where the person to be contacted is someone the police fear will compromise the investigation or the apprehension of offenders), they must endeavour to contact another appropriate person in accordance with subsection (4).

Section 32 – Right of under 18s to have access to other person

141. Section 32 provides for children under 18 years of age in police custody to have access to another person.

142. Under subsection (1) all children under 16 years of age in police custody must have access, in the first instance, to any parent (defined in subsection (4) to include guardians and carers) to provide support. Subsection (1)(b) ensures that where a parent is not available, the child has access to another appropriate adult sent intimation under section 30, subject to the caveats in section 32(3).

143. Subsection (2) provides similar rights of access for those aged 16 or 17 years. However, in this case the adult granted access to the 16 or 17 year old does not have to be their parent (in line with section 30, which allows this age group to request that intimation be sent under that section to an adult other than their parent). As explained in section 31, intimation may be sent to more than one person. Subsection (2A) provides that access need not be permitted to more than one person, subject to the caveats in section 32(3).

Section 32A – Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

144. Section 32A makes provision for a local authority to be notified of the fact that a person is in police custody (and where the person is being held), where a constable believes that the person may be subject to a supervision order or has delayed intimation by virtue of section 30(5)(c). Following intimation under subsection (1), a local authority may arrange for someone to visit the person in custody if that person is subject to a supervision order or the local authority believes the person to be under 16 years of age and arranging a visit would best safeguard and promote the person’s wellbeing. The local authority must be satisfied the visit will be made within a reasonable time before arranging the visit (subsection (3)).

145. Where a local authority arranges for someone to visit the person in custody, sections 30 and 32 cease to have effect (subsection(4)(a)) until such time as the local authority confirms that the person in custody is over 16 years and subject to a supervision order. Sections 30 and 32 will then apply as if a constable believes the person to be under 16 years of age (subsection (6)). The person who the local authority arranges to visit the person in custody must be permitted access to that person (subsection (4)(b)) unless, in exceptional circumstances, such access would affect the investigation or prevention of crime, the apprehension of offenders or the wellbeing of the person in custody (subsection (5)).
Vulnerable persons

Section 33 – Support for vulnerable persons

147. Section 33 makes provision to identify vulnerable adults in police custody and to provide them with support to assist communication between them and the police. In practice, this support is provided by an Appropriate Adult though this term is not used in the Bill.

148. To ensure support is provided as soon as is reasonably practicable, subsections (1), (2) and (4) provide that, where a police constable (who may have been advised that a person is vulnerable following an initial assessment by the police custody and security officer, who is a uniformed non-warranted officer, whose duties include attending to the wellbeing of a person in their custody) considers that a person in police custody is age 16 or over and is unable, because of a mental disorder, to understand what is happening or to communicate effectively, they must make sure that an Appropriate Adult is told where the person is being held (this is not always at the police station and could be, for example, at a hospital) and that they require the support of an Appropriate Adult.

149. Subsection (3) provides that the role of the Appropriate Adult is to assist a vulnerable person to understand what is happening and to facilitate effective communication between the vulnerable person and the police.

150. Subsection (5) explains that “mental disorder” is as defined in section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 (i.e. “any mental illness, personality disorder, learning disability however caused or manifested”). It also explains that references to the police are to constables or members of police staff as provided for in section 99 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012. This ensures that a constable can delegate certain tasks, such as intimation to an Appropriate Adult, to a civilian member of police staff.

Intimation and access to a solicitor

Section 35 – Right to have intimation sent to solicitor

151. Section 35 affords a person in police custody the right to have a solicitor informed, as soon as reasonably practicable after a request is made by the person in police custody, that the person is being held in police custody, where they are being held and that the professional assistance of a solicitor is required. If the person has been officially accused of an offence (i.e. charged with the offence by the police or where a prosecutor has started proceedings in relation to the offence), the person has the right to have a solicitor informed whether they are to be released from custody or, if not, of the court before which the person is to be brought and the day on which the person will be brought before court.
Section 36 – Right to consultation with solicitor

152. Section 36 provides for the right of a person in police custody to have a private consultation with a solicitor at any time. For the purposes of this section, a consultation is defined by subsection (3) as a consultation by such means as considered appropriate, for example, by telephone.

153. Under subsection (2) the police can delay the exercise of this right only so far as necessary in the interest of the investigation or prevention of crime, or the apprehension of offenders.

Chapter 6 – Police powers and duties

Powers of police

Section 37 – Use of reasonable force

154. Section 37 enables a constable to use reasonable force to effect an arrest and when taking a person in custody to any place.

Section 38 – Common law power of entry

155. Section 38 makes clear that any existing powers of a constable to enter any premises for any purposes are not affected by this Bill. Those powers remain.

Section 39 – Common law power of search etc.

156. Section 39(1) similarly preserves any existing powers of a constable in relation to a person arrested and charged, for example, to search them, seize items in their possession and place them in an identification parade (this list is not exhaustive).

Section 40 – Power of search etc. on arrest

157. Section 40 makes clear that the powers described in section 39(2) which can be exercised by a constable in relation to a person after arrest and charge can also be exercised between a person’s arrest and the person being charged.

Care of drunken persons

Section 40A – Taking drunk persons to designated place

158. Section 40A(1) allows the police to take a person who is deemed to be drunk to a designated place (as designated by the Scottish Ministers) to be cared for instead of arresting the person for an offence. By using this power it does not, however, require the person to remain unwillingly at such a place nor does it prevent a constable from subsequently arresting the person.
Duties of police

Section 41 – Duty not to detain unnecessarily

159. Section 41 provides that a constable must ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

Section 42 – Duty to consider child’s best interests

160. Section 42 states that in making decisions to arrest a child (defined for this section in subsection (3) as a person under 18 years of age), hold a child in police custody, interview a child about an offence which the child is suspected of committing, or charge a child with an offence, a constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the well-being of the child as a primary consideration. This does not mean that the interests of the child are the only consideration or that they are, in all cases, the most important consideration. For example, the need to protect others may prevail.

Section 42A – Duties in relation to children in custody

161. Section 42 states that a child who is in police custody at a police station should, so far as practicable, be prevented from associating with any adult who is officially accused of committing an offence unless a constable believes it would be detrimental to the child’s wellbeing to prevent them from associating with that particular adult (subsection (2)).

Section 42B – Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted

162. Section 42B applies where a person is being kept in a place of safety (as defined in subsection (5)) in accordance with section 18A(2) when it has been decided not to prosecute the person for any relevant offence (as defined in subsection (4)) but a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence. The Principal Reporter must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable that the person is being kept in a place of safety until the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

Chapter 8 – General

Common law and enactments

Section 50 – Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest

163. Section 50 provides that the only power of arrest which the police have to bring a person into police custody comes from Section 1 of this Bill and Section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

Section 51 – Abolition of requirement for constable to charge

164. Section 51 provides that a constable does not have to charge a suspect with a crime at any time and abolishes any rule of law that requires such a charge to be made.
Section 52 – Consequential modification

165. Section 52 introduces schedule 1 to the Bill which contains details of changes to existing legislation as a consequence of Part 1. Paragraph 290 provides further detail in regard to Schedule 1.

Section 52A – Code of practice about investigative functions

166. Section 52A requires the Lord Advocate to issue a code of practice on the matters set out in subsection (1) and to keep such a code of practice under review.

167. Section 52A(3) sets out that the code will apply to the Police Service of Scotland and such other bodies specified in the code who report offences to the procurator fiscal.

168. Section 52A(4) contains a requirement for the Lord Advocate to publicly consult on the code and subsection (5) identifies the persons or groups that the Lord Advocate is required to consult when preparing the code.

169. Section 52A(6) obliges the Lord Advocate to lay a copy of the code of practice before the Scottish Parliament.

170. Section 52A(7) and (8) contain provisions relating to the legal status of the code and the effect of a breach of the code of practice.

Disapplication of Part

Section 52B – Disapplication in relation to service offences

171. Section 52B clarifies that service offences are not included in this Part. Service offences are those offences committed by service personnel under the Armed Forces Act 2006.

Section 53 – Disapplication to terrorism offences

172. Section 53 provides that Part 1 of the Bill, dealing with arrest and custody, does not apply to persons arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000.

Powers to modify Part

Section 53A- Further provision about application of Part

173. Section 53A provides that the Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify Part 1 to either provide that some or all of it applies to persons to whom it otherwise does not apply because of sections 52B and 53, or to dis-apply some or all of it so that it does not operate in relation to people who have been arrested otherwise that in respect of an offence.
Section 53B—Further provision about vulnerable persons

174. Section 53B allows the Scottish Ministers to modify, by regulations, the provisions which provide that those aged over 16 and who have a mental disorder are unable to consent to being interviewed without a solicitor being present.

175. Section 53B allows the modification of the description of vulnerable persons in relation to whom support is to be sought, and allows modification of the definition of the type of support to be sought for vulnerable persons as currently set out under section 33. The Scottish Ministers will also be able to specify, for the purposes of section 33, those persons to be considered suitable for providing the support mentioned in section 33, including by reference to training, qualifications and experience.

176. Section 52B also enables the Scottish Ministers to modify those provisions in sections 25 and 33 which provide definitions of certain relevant terms, in particular references to the police and the term “mental disorder”.

177. The effect of Section 53B is to allow the Scottish Ministers to alter the conditions under which section 25 and 33 apply and the nature of the support referred to in section 33, and to make further provisions about that support.

Interpretation of Part

Section 54—Meaning of constable

178. Section 54 defines the meaning of constable for the purposes of this Part.

Section 55—Meaning of officially accused

179. Section 55 defines the meaning of the term “officially accused” for the purposes of this Part.

Section 56—Meaning of police custody

180. Section 56 defines the meaning of police custody for the purposes of this Part.

PART 3—SOLEMN PROCEDURE

Section 63—Proceedings on petition

181. Section 63 changes the procedure to be followed at what are usually the first court appearances of a person being prosecuted under solemn procedure, when the person appears on petition.

182. The purpose of these provisions is to abolish the procedure, commonly known as judicial examination, whereby the prosecutor can, at the commencement of a case being prosecuted under solemn procedure, question the accused in the presence of the sheriff. In addition, the section 63 removes the rarely-used option for the accused to make a declaration – broadly, a statement of his or her position in respect of the charge or charges on the petition – at that stage in proceedings.

183. Subsection (1) inserts a provision into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) which removes the accused’s common-law right to be given the opportunity to make a declaration at the commencement of a case being prosecuted under solemn procedure.

184. Subsection (2) both removes from statute various provisions which relate to declarations, and abolishes the procedure known as judicial examination.

185. Subsection (2)(a) removes, from the 1995 Act, provisions which govern the making of declarations, and the right of the prosecutor to question the accused on extra-judicial confessions.

186. Subsection (2)(b) removes from the 1995 Act three sections which enable and regulate procedure at judicial examinations. By so doing, it abolishes the procedure.

187. Subsections (2)(c), (2)(d), and (2)(e) remove from the 1995 Act various provisions in respect of any records made of a judicial examination. These changes are consequential to the abolition of the judicial examination procedure by subsection (2)(b).

Section 65 – Pre-trial time limits

188. Sections 65 to 67 make changes to the procedure followed in proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court.

189. Section 66 introduces a requirement on the prosecution and the defence to communicate and to lodge a written record of their state of preparation in advance of the first diet.

190. Section 67 provides that the arrangement by which a sheriff court indictment assigns dates for both the first diet and the trial ceases to have effect. Instead the court will appoint a trial diet at the first diet, or at a continuation of it, having ascertained the parties’ state of preparation.

191. Section 65 makes changes to the time limits prescribed in section 65 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) which are intended to allow time for the procedure set out in section 66. In particular the period during which the accused can be remanded in custody pending a first diet and trial are brought in line with the corresponding High Court limits to reflect the altered pre-trial procedure.

192. Subsection (2) amends section 65 of the 1995 Act to set out revised time limits for various procedural steps in proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court.

193. The amendments made by subsection (2)(a) and (b) prevent the accused being tried on indictment in the sheriff court where the first diet is not commenced within 11 months of the first appearance on petition. That period can be extended by the court under section 65(3) of the 1995 Act. The 12-month period within which the trial must be commenced, as specified in section
65(1)(b) of the 1995 Act is unaffected. The amended provisions mirror the equivalent arrangements for proceedings in the High Court.

194. Subsection (2)(c) amends the provisions in section 65(4) of the 1995 Act concerning the periods during which the accused person who is committed until liberated in due course of law (i.e. imprisoned to await the outcome of a trial) can be detained by virtue of that committal where an indictment has been served in respect of the sheriff court. The effect of the amendment is that the accused person must be liberated after 110 days, if no first diet has been held, and 140 days if such a diet has been held, unless the trial begins within that period. These periods can be extended by the court under section 65(5) of the 1995 Act. Again, the amended provisions mirror High Court procedure. To assist in the calculation of the time period, subsection (2)(d) amends section 65(9) of the 1995 Act to provide that the first diet in the sheriff and jury court shall be taken to commence when it is called.

195. Subsection (3) amends section 66(6) of the 1995 Act to replace the arrangements whereby an accused person is to be tried on indictment in the sheriff court is given notice of the first diet and trial diet at the same time as being served with the indictment. Instead, the accused will be given notice only of the first diet and the date of the trial diet will be fixed at the first diet. The period within which the first diet must take place will be increased from 15 clear days from the service of the indictment to 29 clear days; this change makes the sheriff court practice consistent with High Court practice.

196. Subsection (4) amends section 72C(4) of the 1995 Act for consistency with the amendment made by subsection (3). Section 72C(4) is a provision in similar terms to section 66(6), it deals with the situation where a fresh indictment has to be served on an accused because a preliminary hearing before the High Court either did not take place when it was supposed to, or was deserted for the time being without another hearing being appointed.

Section 66 – Duty of parties to communicate

197. Section 66 amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) to impose a duty on the prosecution and the defence, in cases indicted to the sheriff court, to communicate and to prepare a written record of their state of preparation.

198. Subsection (2) amends section 71 of the 1995 Act by inserting a new subsection (1ZA) which requires the court to have regard to the written record when ascertaining the parties’ state of preparation at the first diet.

199. Subsection (3) inserts a new section 71C into the 1995 Act. Subsection (2) of this new section requires the prosecutor and the accused’s legal representative (as defined in subsections (8) and (9)) to communicate and jointly prepare a written record of the state of preparation of their respective cases. The requirement arises where the accused is indicted to the sheriff court and is represented by a solicitor (new section 71C(1)).

200. Subsection (3) of the new section 71C provides that the period within which the communication must take place, and within which the written record of the state of preparation must be prepared is the period beginning with the service of the indictment and ending 14 days later.
201. Subsection (6) of the new section 71C provides for the form, content, and arrangements for lodging of the written record, to be prescribed under an Act of Adjournal. Subsection (7) provides that the record must include a statement of how the communication required by this new section took place. Subsection (7) gives examples of the means by which the communication may take place, but the examples are not exhaustive of the means that might be employed.

202. Section 66(4) of the Bill amends section 75 of the 1995 Act to include a reference to the period mentioned in section 71C. This ensures that, where the 14 day period referred to in section 71C(3) ends on a weekend or on a court holiday, it is extended to include the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday or court holiday.

Section 67 – First diets

203. Section 67 deals with the procedure at first diets in proceedings on indictment in the sheriff court.

204. Subsection (2) amends section 66 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). Subsection (2)(a) requires the notice served on the accused with the indictment to include a warning to the accused that the first diet may proceed in his or her absence and that a trial diet may be fixed in his or her absence. This is distinct from the intimation that requires to be given by virtue of section 66(6AA) where the accused is a body corporate. However, even if the notice does not contain this warning, the amendment to section 66(6B) of the 1995 Act made by subsection (2)(b) ensures that the validity of the notice, and other procedure against the accused, is not invalidated by the omission.

205. Subsection (3) amends section 71 of the 1995 Act. The amendments provided for in subsection (3)(a), (b) and (d) are consequential on the new arrangements whereby the trial diet is appointed at the first diet (see discussion below of new section 71B). Subsection (3)(c) ensures that the requirement in section 71(6) that the accused should be called upon to plead at the first diet does not prevent the first diet proceeding in the absence of the accused. Subsection (3)(e) extends to the new section 71B discussed below the definition of the word “court” in section 71 of the 1995 Act, so that in the new section 71B references to the court will be understood as references to the sheriff court only.

206. Subsection (4) inserts a new section 71B into the 1995 Act, to deal with appointment of a trial diet at the first diet.

207. Subsection (1) of the new section 71B provides that, having taken the steps and examined the issues required at the first diet, the court only then goes on to appoint a trial. The appointing of a trial has to be in accordance with subsections (3) to (7), which are discussed below. Subsection (2) requires the accused to appear at the trial diet.

208. Subsections (3) and (4) of the new section 71B apply when a case is subject to the requirement that the trial must commence within 12 months of the accused’s first appearance on petition. If the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed to trial within the 12 months (which may not be 12 months from the petition appearance, because the period can be extended under section 65(3) of the 1995 Act) the court must, subject to subsections (5) to
(7) appoint a trial within the 12 month period. If the court does not think the case will be ready to proceed within the 12 months, the prosecutor must be given an opportunity to seek an extension of the 12 month period. If an extension is granted the court must, again subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial within the 12 month period as extended. If the period is not extended the court may desert the first diet (either permanently or for the time being only) and if the accused is being held in custody pending trial, the accused must be liberated.

209. Subsections (5) to (7) of the new section 71B apply where, in addition to the court being required to appoint a trial diet within the 12 month period under subsection (3) or (4), the accused has been committed until liberated in due course of law (i.e. imprisoned to await the outcome of a trial) and cannot be detained by reason of that committal for more than 140 days without being put on trial. In that event, as well as appointing a trial diet within the 12 month period, the court must appoint a trial within the 140 day period if it is satisfied that the case will be ready to go to trial within that period. If the court is not satisfied about that, the prosecutor must be given an opportunity to apply for an extension of the 140 day period. If an extension is granted the court must appoint a trial for a date within the 140 day period as extended (as well as within the 12 month period). If the period is not extended the accused is entitled to be admitted to bail. In that event, subsection (8) requires the court to give the prosecutor an opportunity to be heard before admitting the accused to bail.

210. Where the court has appointed a trial diet for an accused on bail (other than in the circumstances where the accused has been bailed as described in the previous paragraph) subsection (9) of the new section 71B requires that the court must review the accused’s bail conditions and empowers it, if it considers it appropriate, to set different conditions.

211. Subsection (10) of the new section 71B defines the 12 month and 140 day time limits with reference to the applicable provisions of section 65 of the 1995 Act.

212. Subsection (5) of section 67 amends section 76(3) the 1995 Act which makes provision for the situation where a diet fixed as a result of an intimation given by the accused under section 76(1) (that he intends to plead guilty) does not result in pleas being accepted in respect of all charges. The amendment allows the court to postpone a first diet where a case has been indicted to the sheriff court on the same basis as the power to postpone a preliminary hearing where the case has been indicted to the High Court.

213. Subsection (6) inserts a new section 83B into the 1995 Act applying to jury trials in the sheriff court. The section allows trials that have not yet been commenced to be continued from sitting day to sitting day, up to a maximum number of sitting days after the day originally appointed for the trial, the maximum being set by Act of Adjournal. Failure to commence the trial by the end of the last sitting day permitted results in the indictment falling and proceedings against the accused coming to an end.

Section 68 – Preliminary hearings

214. Section 68 reverses the effect of amendments to section 72A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 effected by section 7(3) of the Vulnerable Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2004. The amendments, which relate to proceedings in the High Court, were mistakenly applied after the section to which they related was repealed by the Criminal Procedure (Amendment) (Scotland) Act 2004, and replaced with another section with the same number.

Section 69 – Plea of guilty

215. Section 69 repeals that part of section 77(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) which requires that the accused pleading guilty to an indictment should sign a copy of the plea. Section 70(7) of the 1995 Act, which provides for an exception to the signing requirement where the accused pleading guilty is an organisation, is thereby rendered obsolete and is also repealed.

PART 4 – SENTENCING

Maximum term for weapons offences

Section 71 – Maximum term for weapons offences

216. The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 provides for the following offences:

- carrying an offensive weapon in a public place (section 47);
- possessing an article with a blade or point in a public place (section 49);
- possessing an article with a blade or point (or weapons) on school premises (section 49A);
- having an offensive weapon etc. in prison (section 49C).

217. Section 71 of the Bill increases the maximum penalty for each of those offences from 4 to 5 years.

Prisoners on early release

Section 72 – Sentencing under the 1995 Act

218. Section 72 of the Bill inserts a new section 200A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). New section 200A(1) of the 1995 Act provides that when the court is dealing with a person who has been found to have committed an offence that is capable of being punishable with imprisonment (except where the offence is such that the court is required to impose a life sentence), the court must so far as is reasonably practicable ascertain whether the person was on early release from a previous sentence at the time the offence was committed.

219. Part I of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (“the 1993 Act”), Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 provide for the operation of release from custody of a prisoner prior to the end of a prisoner’s sentence. The operation of these provisions is commonly known as “early release” arrangements. For the purposes of new section 200A, new section 200A(3) provides that a person is on early release if they are not in custody as a result of the operation of Part I of the 1993 Act, Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.
Section 16 of the 1993 Act provides the court with a power to be able to punish a person who commits an offence while on early release. This power is separate and additional to the normal powers of the court to sentence the person for having committed the offence. These powers are commonly known as section 16 orders and can be seen as a punishment on a person for having abused the trust placed in them by committing an offence while on early release.

New section 200A(2) provides that where the court has determined under new section 200A(1) that a person was on early release at the time the offence was committed, the court must consider making a section 16 order.

New section 200A(2) also provides that in the case where the court dealing with the offence is inferior to the court which imposed the previous sentence from which the person was released early, an inferior court must consider making a reference to the court which imposed the previous sentence so that they can consider making a section 16 order. This is subject to the new powers being given to inferior courts to make section 16 orders contained in section 73(4) of the Bill.

Section 73 – Sentencing under the 1993 Act

Where an offence (“the new offence”) has been committed while a person was on early release, section 16(2) of the 1993 Act provides that a Scottish court may, instead of or in addition to imposing a sentence for plea or finding of guilt, order that a person may be returned to prison for a period of time. This period can be up to a maximum length equal to the period of time between the date on which the new offence was committed and the date of the expiry of their previous sentence. Section 16(2)(b) of the 1993 Act provides that where the court dealing with the new offence is inferior to the court which imposed the sentence from which the person was released early, the inferior court cannot directly impose a section 16 order and can only refer the case to the higher court for consideration to be given as to whether a section 16 order should be imposed.

Section 73(2) of the Bill adjusts section 16(1) of the 1993 Act so that prisoners released early under Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 can have section 16 orders imposed upon them.

Section 73(4) of the Bill inserts new section 16(2A) into the 1993 Act. New section 16(2A) provides new discretion for courts dealing with persons who have committed offences while on early release from a previous sentence imposed by a higher court. The effect of the new discretion is that inferior courts will be able to consider making a section 16 order in such cases.

The powers of inferior courts to impose section 16 orders are restricted to those cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed the sentencing powers of the court in respect of common law offences. Section 7(6) of the 1995 Act provides that a Justice of the Peace court can impose a custodial sentence for common law offences of up to 60 days. Section 5(2) of the 1995 Act provides a sheriff summary court, including when constituted by a stipendiary magistrate (by virtue of section 7(5) of the 1995 Act), can impose a custodial sentence for a common law offence of up to 12 months. Section 3(3) of the 1995 Act provides a sheriff solemn court can impose a custodial sentence for a common law offence of up to 5 years.
227. New section 16(2A)(b)(i) provides that a Justice of the Peace court, except when constituted by a stipendiary magistrate, will be able to impose a section 16 order in cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed 60 days.

228. New section 16(2A)(b)(ii) provides that a Justice of the Peace court constituted by a stipendiary magistrate or a sheriff sitting summarily (i.e. without a jury) will be able to impose a section 16 order in cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed 12 months.

229. New section 16(2A)(b)(iii) provides that a sheriff sitting as a court of solemn jurisdiction (i.e. with a jury) will be able to impose a section 16 order in cases where the maximum length of a section 16 order does not exceed 5 years.

230. Section 73(3) makes consequential changes to section 16(2) reflecting the insertion of new section 16(2A) into the 1993 Act.

PART 5 – APPEALS AND SCCRC

Appeals

Section 74 – Preliminary pleas in summary cases

231. Section 174 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) allows for decisions disposing of certain objections and denials in summary proceedings, including objections to the competency and relevancy of the complaint, to be appealed to the High Court where the first instance court gives permission for the appeal. Section 74 of the Bill amends section 174 of the 1995 Act by removing the requirement to obtain permission for an appeal by the prosecutor against a decision that has resulted in the dismissal of the complaint, or any part of it.

Section 75 – Preliminary diets in solemn cases

232. Section 74 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act) allows for decisions taken at first diets and preliminary hearings to be appealed to the High Court where the first instance court gives permission for the appeal. Section 75 of the Bill amends section 74 of the 1995 Act by removing the requirement to obtain permission for an appeal by the prosecutor against a decision that has resulted in the dismissal of the indictment, or any part of it.

Section 76 – Extending certain time limits: summary

233. Section 76 amends section 181 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 Act (“the 1995 Act”) so as to make further provision concerning applications to extend certain time limits that apply in relation to appeals from summary proceedings.

234. Subsection (2) inserts provisions prescribing the test to be applied by the High Court when determining an application to extend the period within which a convicted person may apply for a stated case. Subsections (3) and (4) omit the provisions under which the respondent in relation to an application under section 181(1) of the 1995 Act may insist on a hearing.
Subsection (5) inserts section 181(5) which requires the court to give reasons in writing for a decision to extend a period on an application under section 181(1).

By virtue of section 186(8) of the 1995 Act, the amendments effected by section 76 of the Bill also have effect in relation to certain applications to extend the period allowed for the lodging of a note of appeal under section 186.

Section 77 – Extending certain time limits: solemn

Section 77 makes provision concerning applications to the High Court under section 111(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) applications to extend the period within which a convicted person may lodge intimation of intention to appeal, or a note of appeal.

Subsections (3) to (6) amend section 111. Subsection (3) inserts provisions prescribing the test to be applied by the High Court when determining an application under section 111(2) when it is received after the expiry of the period to which it relates. Subsection (4) amends section 111(2A) so as to extend to every application under section 111(2) the requirement on the applicant to state reasons for the failure to comply with the applicable time limit and to state the proposed grounds of appeal. Subsection (6) inserts section 111(4) which provides that applications under section 111(2) are to be dealt with in chambers and, unless the court otherwise directs, without parties being present. Subsections (1) and (5) contain amendments that are consequential on this change. Subsection (6) also inserts section 111(5) which requires the court to give reasons in writing for a decision to extend a period.

Section 78 – Certain lateness not excusable

Section 78 amends section 300A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 by inserting a new subsection (7A). Section 300A gives courts a general power to excuse failures to comply with procedural requirements. The amendment precludes a failure to timeously lodge certain documents from being excused under section 300A. The documents in question are those which the High Court can permit being lodged late by applying the tests that are to be amended by sections 76 and 77 of the Bill (i.e. documents used to initiate appeals from, respectively, summary and solemn proceedings).

Section 79 – Advocation in solemn proceedings

Section 79 inserts section 130A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which provides that it is not competent for a decision taken at a first diet or preliminary hearing to be appealed to the High Court by bill of advocation. The provision excludes bill of advocation as a competent method of appealing a decision that could be appealed under the procedure provided for in section 74 of the 1995 Act.

Section 80 – Advocation in summary proceedings

Section 80 inserts section 191B into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The new section applies to decisions disposing of certain objections and denials which require to be stated before a plea is tendered in summary proceedings, including objections to the competency or relevancy of a complaint. Such decisions can be appealed to the High Court under the procedure provided for in section 174 of the 1995 Act. The new section provides that such decisions cannot also be competently appealed by way of bill of advocation.

Section 81 – Finality of appeal proceedings

242. Section 81(2) inserts a new section 194ZA into the 1995 Act. Subject to the exceptions specified, the new section provides that decisions of the High Court when disposing of an appeal related to summary proceedings are final and conclusive and not subject to review by any court whatsoever. The new section is in similar terms to the corresponding provision in section 124(2) of the 1995 Act, which relates to decisions of the High Court when disposing of appeals from solemn proceedings.

SCCRC

Section 82 – References by SCCRC

243. Section 82 of the Bill amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to adjust how the High Court considers cases referred to it by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (“the SCCRC”) and to adjust the definition of the ‘interests of justice’ test applied by the SCCRC in deciding whether to refer a case to the High Court.

244. Section 82(3A) of the Bill repeals section 194C(2) of the 1995 Act so that the SCCRC are no longer required to explicitly consider the need for finality and certainty in criminal proceedings as part of how they assess ‘interests of justice’ when deciding whether to refer a case to the High Court.

245. Section 82(4) of the Bill repeals section 194DA of the 1995 Act so that the High Court will no longer have the power to reject a SCCRC reference on the basis of applying an interests of justice test. Section 82(2) of the Bill makes a consequential change to section 194B of the 1995 Act.

PART 5A – CHILDREN AFFECTED BY PARENTAL IMPRISONMENT

246. Section 82A places a duty on the court to ensure that a child and family impact assessment is undertaken where a person who has responsibility for a child has (a) been remanded in custody awaiting trial, (b) been found by a court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment and has been remanded in custody awaiting sentence, or (c) been sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention.
PART 6 – MISCELLANEOUS

Chapter A1 – Publication of prosecutorial test

Section 82B – Publication of prosecutorial test

247. This section obliges the Lord Advocate to publish the matters which are considered by a prosecutor when deciding whether to commence, and thereafter continue with, criminal proceedings. This is sometimes known as the prosecutorial test.

Chapter 1 – Statements and procedure

Statements by accused

Section 62 – Statements by accused

248. Section 62 inserts new section 261ZA into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). New section 261ZA will modify the common-law rule on the admissibility of hearsay evidence in criminal proceedings, as it applies to certain types of statement made by an accused.

249. Section 261ZA(1) and (2) provide that evidence of a statement made by an accused in certain circumstances is not inadmissible as evidence of a fact contained in the statement on account of the evidence being hearsay. The provision applies to a statement made by the accused in the course of being questioned (whether as a suspect or not) by a constable or another official investigating an offence.

250. The provision modifies the law relating to hearsay. As explained by the High Court of Justiciary in Morrison v HM Advocate 1991 SLT 57, “The general rule is that hearsay, that is evidence of what another person has said, is inadmissible as evidence of the facts contained in the statement”. That general rule is subject to exceptions. The existing common-law exceptions (discussed in McCutcheon v HM Advocate 2002 SLT 27) allow for a statement made by the accused to be admitted as evidence of a fact contained in the statement if it is inculpatory of the accused (e.g. a confession) or “mixed” (e.g. a statement in which the accused puts himself or herself at the locus at the time the offence was committed, but does so in the context of proffering an innocent explanation for why the accused was there). The common-law does not, however, allow evidence of a statement made by the accused to be admitted as evidence of a fact asserted in the statement if the statement is purely exculpatory of the accused.

251. Subject to subsection (3), section 261ZA extends the exceptions by dispensing with the distinctions between inculpatory, exculpatory and mixed statements. The effect is that any statement made by an accused person to a constable or another official investigating an offence is excepted from the general rule that hearsay evidence is not admissible as evidence of a fact contained in the statement, regardless of whether it is inculpatory, exculpatory or “mixed”.

252. By virtue of subsection (3), section 261ZA does not affect the admissibility of evidence of a statement made by an accused as evidence in relation to a co-accused. Section 261 of the 1995 Act lays down special rules which apply before hearsay evidence of a statement by one accused can be admitted in evidence in relation to another accused. Those rules will continue to apply before evidence of a statement made by accused A can be treated as evidence of fact in the case for or against accused B.
253. New section 261ZA is restricted in its effect to superseding objections to the admissibility of evidence based on its hearsay quality. The provision does not override any other objections to the admissibility of evidence of a statement, such as objections to its admissibility based on the fairness of the circumstances in which the statement was made, or based on the content of the statement (for example, section 274 of the 1995 Act, which concerns the admissibility of evidence relating to the sexual history or character of a complainer in a sexual offence case, will still apply).

Use of live television link

Section 86 – Use of live television link

254. Subsection (1) of section 86 inserts sections 288H to 288K into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The new sections (discussed in greater detail in the following paragraphs) make provision for the participation of detained persons in hearings by means of live television link from the place of detention.

255. Subsection (2) repeals enactments in consequence of the new sections of the 1995 Act inserted by subsection (1). Specifically, paragraph (a) repeals section 117(6) of the 1995 Act, which requires an appellant in an appeal from solemn proceedings to appear before the court in ordinary civilian clothes. Paragraph (b) repeals section 80 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, which allowed certain court appearances to be conducted by means of live television link and is rendered obsolete by the wider reaching new sections inserted by section 86 of the Bill.

Inserted section 288H – Participation through live television link

256. Subsection (1) requires a detained person to participate in a “specified hearing” (defined by inserted section 288J) by means of live TV link where the court has determined that the hearing should proceed in that manner. Before so determining, subsection (2) requires the court to give the parties an opportunity to make representations on the use of the TV link in the hearing. The court can only allow the hearing to proceed by TV link if satisfied that it is not contrary to the interests of justice to do so.

257. Subsection (3) gives the court the power to require a detained person to appear by TV link from the place where the person is in custody for the sole purpose of considering whether to make a determination on the use of TV links in the specified hearing itself.

258. Where a detained person participates in a hearing by means of a TV link, the effect of subsection (4) is that the place of detention is deemed part of the court room, so that the hearing is deemed to take place in the presence of the detained person.

Inserted section 288I – Evidence and personal appearance

259. Subsection (1) precludes evidence as to a charge against the detained person on a complaint or indictment being led at a hearing in which the detained person is participating by means of a TV link. It would therefore not be possible for a trial in which evidence is being led to proceed with the accused participating by TV link.
260. Subsection (2) gives the court the power to revoke, before or during a hearing, a determination (under section 288H(1)) that the accused is to participate at the hearing by TV link and subsection (2)(b) requires that the court exercise the power to revoke the determination if it considers that it is in the interests of justice for the detained person to appear in person. The court might consider revocation of its previous determination if, for example, a technical issue arises with the link itself, or when further information comes to light during the substantive hearing which, in the view of the court, makes it no longer appropriate to proceed by way of TV link.

261. In the event that the court decides not to proceed with the appearance of the accused by TV link, or revokes an earlier determination to allow proceedings via TV link, practical difficulties might arise – the accused may well need to be brought to court, which might not be readily achievable on the same day, so postponement of the hearing could be necessary.
Subsection (3) allows the court, in these circumstances, to postpone the hearing to a later day.
The effect of a postponement under this section is detailed in inserted section 288IA.

Inserted section 288IA of the 1995 Act – Effect of a postponement

262. Subsection (1) provides that, where a case is postponed to the next day under section 288I, that day and any intervening weekend days or court holidays do not count towards any time limits – such as, for example, those for detaining a person in custody pending a first diet or preliminary hearing in the case. However, this provision does not apply where the accused is in police custody under section 18(2) of this Act, which requires an accused, if practicable, to be brought before a court before the end of the first day on which the court is sitting following the accused’s arrest; or as soon as practicable thereafter.

263. The effect of this is that when a postponement is regarded as necessary for an accused in police custody, the accused still has a right to argue that the section 18 requirements have not been complied with, even if the postponement had become unavoidable by the time it was granted. It would then be up to the court to decide if the circumstances provide sufficient justification for the delay. Nonetheless, a postponement in such a situation remains competent, as subsection (2) makes clear.

Inserted section 288J – Specified hearings

264. Subsection (1) confers on the Lord Justice General the function of specifying the categories of hearings, such as the first appearance, at which a detained person may participate by live television link. Hearings may be specified by reference to the venues at which hearings take place (subsection (2)(a)), particular places of detention (subsection (2)(b)), or the types of cases or proceedings in which TV links can be used (subsection (2)(c)). Under subsection (3)(a) the Lord Justice General can vary or revoke any earlier directions and make different provision for different purposes (subsection (3)(b)).

Inserted section 288K – Defined terms

265. This section defines certain terms used within sections 288H to 288J. The expression “detained person” is defined so that the person imprisoned or lawfully detained at a location in Scotland. The concept of lawful detention is a broad one, it includes detention at a police station pending first appearance at court, detention in hospital by virtue of an assessment order or a
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 35A) treatment order imposed under the 1995 Act, detention in hospital under the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003, or a young person’s detention in local authority secure accommodation.

Section 86A – Electronic proceedings

266. Section 86A inserts subsection 305(1A) into the 1995 Act. It provides that the power of the High Court to regulate criminal procedure through Acts of Adjournal includes the power to make provision in respect of electronic proceedings. This might include, for example, constituting or keeping any document (or copy), serving or conveying any document (or copy) or signing or otherwise authenticating any document (or copy).

Chapter 1A – Authorisation under Part III of the Police Act 1997

267. Section 86B allows directly employed staff of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner, who have been designated by the Commissioner to take charge or assist in investigations, to make property interference applications to the Commissioner for authorisation under Part III of the Police Act 1997. It also allows the Commissioner to designate a member of directly employed staff to authorise property interference in the Commissioner’s absence if the matter is urgent.

Chapter 2 – Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

Section 87 – Establishment and functions

268. Section 87(1) inserts a new Chapter 8A into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (“the 2012 Act”) to provide for a Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (“PNBS”).

269. New section 55A provides for the PNBS to be established, and introduces a new schedule 2A to make further provision about it. New schedule 2A is set out in schedule 3 to the Bill (see paragraphs 291 and 292 for further discussion).

270. New section 55B provides that the PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about pay, allowances and expenses, public holidays and leave, the issue, use and return of police clothing and equipment, and hours of duty, in relation to constables (other than special constables) and cadets. Such representations may be made about draft regulations or draft determinations on these issues, or generally. The Scottish Ministers may, after consultation with the chairperson, require the PNBS to make representations about these matters within a set time period which may be extended by the Scottish Ministers.

271. New section 55C provides that the PNBS may also make representations to the Scottish Ministers about other matters relating to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets including draft regulations on such matters.

272. New section 55CA creates a mechanism for the Scottish Ministers to be required to take all reasonable steps appearing to them to be necessary for giving effect to representations in certain circumstances. The circumstances are that the representations are made under new section 55B(1), and that they are in terms settled through arbitration in accordance with the PNBS constitution and that they concern a “qualifying case”, to be specified by the Scottish Ministers in regulations made under new schedule 2A, paragraphs 4(6) and 4C.

273. New section 55D requires the PNBS to produce an annual report on how it has carried out its functions which is to be given to the Scottish Ministers and published. The reporting year for the annual report will be defined in the PNBS’s constitution.

274. Section 87(2) amends section 54 of the 2012 Act to require the Scottish Ministers to consult the PNBS before making regulations about the matters mentioned in new section 55B(4).

275. Section 87(2A) amends section 125 of the 2012 Act to provide that certain regulations made under new Chapter 8A (see paragraph 268) will be scrutinised by the Scottish Parliament in accordance with affirmative procedure.

Section 87A – Consequential and transitional

276. Section 87A makes consequential provision in connection with the establishment of the PNBS. The Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 will apply to the PNBS and the appointment of the chairperson of the PNBS will be in accordance with the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003. Section 87A also makes transitional provision. When the PNBS provisions come into force the chairman of the PNBS’s predecessor body, the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom (“PNBUK”), will become the chairperson of the PNBS, and any current agreements involving the PNBUK will be regarded as agreements of the PNBS.

SCHEDULE A1 – BREACH OF LIBERATION CONDITIONS

Paragraph 1 – Offence where condition breached

277. Paragraph 1(1) sets out the circumstances in which a person breaches a liberation condition and thereby commits an offence. A “liberation condition” includes investigative liberation conditions imposed before charge under section 14(2) or requirements imposed by an undertaking given after charge under section 19(2).

278. Paragraph 1(2) provides that paragraph 1(1) does not apply when a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence. Such breaches are dealt with in accordance with paragraph 3. An example of a breach of condition which may, of itself, not constitute a separate offence is a condition not to enter a particular street. If the person subject to the condition is subsequently found in that street, then a breach of liberation has occurred, but not a separate offence. If the condition was that the person was not to approach a particular witness in the case and the person does contact the witness then not only has a breach of condition occurred, but a more serious offence (attempting to defeat the ends of justice) may have taken place.

279. Paragraph 1(3) provides that a complaint may be amended to add an additional charge of an offence of breaching a liberation condition at any time before the trial of an accused for either... the original offence (see paragraph 1(4)) or an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

Paragraph 2 – Sentencing for the offence

280. Paragraph 2(1) sets out the penalties applicable to a person convicted of an offence of breaching a liberation condition under paragraph 1.

281. Sub-paragraphs 2(2) and (3) provide that such a penalty may be imposed in addition to any other penalty that may be imposed, even if the total exceeds the maximum penalty for the original offence. The penalties may run consecutively, subject to section 204A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 Act which concerns restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners. The provisions put beyond doubt that the penalty imposed for breach of the condition can be imposed on top of the penalty for original offence, even where the penalty imposed for the original offence represents the maximum penalty applicable in the circumstances.

282. Sub-paragraphs (5) and (6) provide that where a court finds a person guilty of breaching a liberation condition, or the person pleads guilty to that offence, the person may be sent for sentence at any court which is considering the original offence (as defined in subsection (7).

Paragraph 3 – Breach by committing offence

283. Paragraph 3 applies where a person breaches a liberation condition by committing an offence and the fact that the offence was committed whilst the person was subject to a liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment. This is distinct from failing to comply with a condition and applies where the person is being prosecuted for the offence committed while on liberation conditions.

284. Paragraph 3(2) requires the court, in determining the penalty for the offence, which constituted the breach of condition, to have regard to the matters specified.

285. Paragraph 3(3) and (4) enable the court to increase the maximum penalty otherwise specified for the offence. This provision effectively displaces the maximum penalty, allowing the court to add to the penalty to take account of the fact that a breach of conditions has occurred as a consequence of the commission of an offence.

286. Paragraph 3(5) requires the court to explain the reasons for the penalty imposed for the offence, whether it imposes an increased penalty or not.

Paragraph 4 – Matters for section 3(2)(b)

287. Where a person breaches an investigative liberation condition, by committing an offence, the court must have regard to the matters specified in paragraph 4 in determining the penalty.
Paragraph 5 – Matters for paragraph 3(2)(c)

288. Where a person breaches the terms of an undertaking, as defined in paragraph 7©, (other than the requirement to appear to court), by committing an offence, the court must have regard to the matters specified in paragraph 5 in determining the penalty.

Paragraph 6 – Evidential presumptions

289. In proceedings relating to an offence under paragraph 1(breach of liberation conditions), the evidential presumptions set out in paragraph 6 apply.

Schedule 1 – Modifications in connection with Part 1

290. Schedule 1 makes amendments to existing legislation as a consequence of specific elements of the Bill. Part 1 makes provision for the repeal of various enactments conferring a power to arrest without warrant, which are affected by the new power of arrest for the police set out in section 1 of the Bill. Part 2 makes provision for the repeal of enactments affected by the new arrangements for police custody and access to legal advice set out in Part 1 of the Bill.

Schedule 3 – Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

291. Schedule 3 inserts schedule 2A into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012. Paragraph 1 establishes that the PNBS is not a Crown servant and has no Crown status, immunity or privilege. Paragraph 2 sets out the membership of the PNBS. It is to consist of a chair and deputy chair appointed by the Scottish Ministers, and other persons representing the Scottish Ministers, the Scottish Police Authority, the chief constable, constables (other than special constables) and police cadets. Paragraph 2A allows a temporary chairperson to be appointed if the chairperson is unavailable. Under paragraph 3, MPs, MSPs, MEPs, government Ministers and civil servants will be disqualified from being the chair or deputy chair of the PNBS to ensure that the chair and deputy chair are independent.

292. Paragraph 4 provides that the Scottish Ministers are to prepare the constitution for the PNBS, after consulting the other persons to be represented on it. They must keep the constitution under review and may from time to time revise it. The constitution or any revision of it must be brought into effect by regulations. This paragraph also sets out what the constitution may include. It must regulate the procedure by which the PNBS reaches agreement on representations to the Scottish Ministers, and if the PNBS is in dispute about what representations are to be made to the Scottish Ministers under section 55B(1) the constitution may provide for the dispute to be submitted to arbitration either by agreement within the PNBS or on the authority of the chairperson where there is no such agreement. The constitution may limit how often within a reporting year and in what circumstances a dispute on representations may be submitted to arbitration. Paragraphs 4A and 4B provide for the application of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”) to PNBS arbitrations, including a power to disapply or modify the mandatory arbitration rules set out in the 2010 Act. Paragraph 4C enables regulations giving effect to the PNBS constitution to specify, for the purposes of section 55CA, “qualifying cases” where the Scottish Ministers will be required to take all reasonable steps appearing to them to be necessary to give effect to section 55B(1) representations in terms settled through arbitration in accordance with the PNBS constitution.
Paragraph 5 provides that the Scottish Ministers may pay remuneration to the chairperson of the PNBS, and expenses to its members. They must also pay such expenses as are necessary to enable the PNBS to carry out its functions.
CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL
[AS AMENDED AT STAGE 2]

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. As required under Rule 9.7.8B of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, this Supplementary Financial Memorandum is published to accompany the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill (introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 20 June 2013) as amended at Stage 2.

2. The Memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament. It should be read in conjunction with the original Financial Memorandum published to accompany the Bill as introduced.

3. This Supplementary Financial Memorandum addresses the financial impact of Stage 2 amendments. The majority of the amendments do not substantially alter any of the costs in the original Financial Memorandum. This document, therefore, only addresses those Stage 2 amendments with anticipated or potential cost implications.

4. Four areas have been identified where there are expected to be additional costs arising from stage 2 amendments. These are as follows:
   - Search of person not in police custody (“stop and search”) (paras 6 – 11)
   - Keeping person not officially accused in police custody (paras 12 – 22)
   - Code of practice about investigative functions (paras 23 – 35)
   - Detention of person with responsibility for a child (paras 36 – 51).

5. In addition, two areas have been identified where it is anticipated that costs outlined in the original Financial Memorandum will no longer be incurred as a consequence of stage 2 amendments. These are as follows:
   - Investigative liberation – release on conditions (paras 52 – 54)
   - Corroboration (paras 55 – 62).
STAGE 2 AMENDMENTS WHICH WILL RESULT IN ADDITIONAL COSTS

Search of person not in police custody

6. A number of amendments agreed by the Justice Committee at stage 2 introduced new provisions into the Bill about the search of a person who is not in police custody at the time of the search (sometimes known as the “stop and search” provisions).

7. The provisions put, on the face of legislation, a limitation on the power of police officers to search persons who are not in police custody.

8. They also require the Scottish Ministers to issue a code of practice about the carrying out of searches of such people. A draft of the code must be the subject of public consultation, and has to be reviewed at intervals stipulated by the legislation.

9. A draft code of practice has already been prepared by the independent advisory group on “stop and search”. But there will be additional costs to the Scottish Government associated with public consultation on the terms of the code. The cost of this will vary depending on the number and length of responses received to the consultation, and whether there is ultimately thought to be a need to engage external analysts to consider the responses. Drawing on previous experience of similar consultations, the costs are estimated as being between £0 – 12,000.

10. These provisions will also result in costs for the SPA related to the training of police officers. As well as the terms of the code once it has been finalised, the legislation contains an important clarification of the limits of police powers in this area. The circumstances in which officers search individuals, particularly those not in police custody, is a significant operational matter, and an issue of considerable public interest.

11. That being so, Police Scotland’s assessment is that all officers up to and including the rank of inspector will require one full day’s training. The cost of this is £3,852,637. However, this cost evaluates the time of police officers, and the intention is to provide this training over a period of time to ensure that the delivery of operational police functions is not impaired, and that there will be no need to backfill posts during the training. The cost will therefore be met from within existing resources. And it will not be a recurring cost, as the training of new recruits will be updated to cover the changes.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Table 1: Summary of additional costs arising from amendments in respect of searches of persons not in police custody</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Costs to be met from within existing resources</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPA – training requirements</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scottish Government – public consultation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Totals</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Keeping person not officially accused in custody

12. There are two amendments in this area which have an impact on the Financial Memorandum, and will result in increased costs for the Scottish Police Authority (SPA).

13. Firstly, the Bill as introduced provided that, where a person has not been officially accused of an offence but is in police custody, authorisation to keep the person in custody may be given by a police constable of any rank who has not been involved in the relevant investigation (subsection 7(3)). An amendment agreed by the Justice Committee at stage 2 altered the position so that authorisation to keep the person in custody can only be given by an officer of the rank of sergeant or above.

14. Police Scotland based the estimates in the Financial Memorandum on figures from the financial year 2011/12. During that period there were 32,400 people processed at a custody facility after detention under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. 91% of those people had their detention authorised by a sergeant at a sergeant-led custody facility. The remaining 9% - 2880 people - were authorised by a constable at a constable-led custody facility.

15. Taking these estimates as a starting point, the effect of the amendment is that in the region of 2880 additional authorisations will require to be made by a sergeant or above, instead of by a constable as before. However, these authorisations may be carried out remotely by telephone, so there will not be a need to provide additional sergeants at every constable-led facility. Each authorisation will vary in time depending on the complexity of the case, and for the purposes of estimation it has been assumed that the process will fall into a range between 10 and 20 minutes.

16. The costs of authorisation by a constable are as follows:
   • 2,880 arrest authorisations by constable taking 10 minutes, at £22.76 per hour = £10,925
   • 2,880 arrest authorisations by constable taking 20 minutes, at £22.76 per hour = £21,849.

17. And the costs of having these authorisations carried out by a sergeant are as follows:
   • 2,880 additional arrest authorisations by sergeant taking 10 minutes, at £26.97 an hour = £12,946
   • 2,880 additional arrest authorisations by sergeant taking 20 minutes, at £26.97 per hour = £25,891.

18. This provides a cost range between £2021 (for ten-minute authorisations) and £4042 (for twenty-minute authorisations) for the additional authorisations to be carried out by an officer of the rank of sergeant, this being the difference between the present cost and the cost under this provision. This cost will be met from within existing resources.

19. Secondly, the Bill as introduced provided that a person who has not been officially accused of an offence could be held in police custody for a maximum of twelve hours without being charged. Amendments agreed by the Justice Committee at stage 2 provide, in section 12A, that the period of twelve hours can be extended by a further twelve hours if authorised by an officer of the rank of inspector or above; and that, where someone is in that position, there should be a review, no more than six hours after the start of the extended period, of whether the suspect requires to be kept in custody.

20. The amendment which gives an inspector the power to extend a period of detention by a further twelve hours reinstates current procedure and, therefore, will not result in additional costs. However, the amendment which requires a review of the extended period after no more than six hours is new, and has some costs associated with it.

21. Figures available to Police Scotland suggest that around 129 suspects per year have their detention extended past the 12 hour mark. It is unlikely that all of these suspects will be kept in custody for 18 hours or more, so the following calculations represent an upper limit on possible costs, as it may be that not all of these suspects will require a review. However, if each of these suspects were to require their detention to be reviewed, by an inspector, after 18 hours in custody, assuming that each review will take between 10 and 30 minutes, this gives a potential range of costs as follows:

- 129 additional extension authorisations by inspector taking 10 minutes, at £33.86 an hour = £728
- 129 additional extension authorisations by inspector taking 30 minutes, at £33.86 per hour = £2,183.

22. This provides a cost range between £728 and £2,183 per annum. This cost will be met from within existing resources.

Table 2: Summary of additional costs of amendments in respect of keeping a person not officially accused in police custody

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Lower estimate</th>
<th>Higher estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Authorisation to keep person in custody from sergeant or above (annually)</td>
<td>£2021</td>
<td>£4042</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Authorisation to keep person in custody past eighteen hours (annually)</td>
<td>£728</td>
<td>£2183</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total (to be met from within existing resources)</td>
<td>£2749</td>
<td>£6225</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Code of practice about investigative functions

23. An amendment agreed by the Justice Committee at stage 2 introduced a new section 52A into the Bill. This provision requires the Lord Advocate to issue a code of practice on the questioning, and recording of questioning, of persons suspected of committing an offence; and the conduct of identification procedures involving such persons. In the course of drafting and issuing the code the Lord Advocate is obliged to consult publicly on a draft of the code, must thereafter keep it under review, and may revise it.
24. This provision has financial implications for the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) and for the SPA. The obligation to issue the code rests on the Lord Advocate, who will be assisted in that by staff from within COPFS. In assessing the likely costs, COPFS has had regard to the fact that a considerable amount of work will be involved. There are extant Lord Advocate’s Guidelines on identification procedures, but these were issued in 2007 and have not been revised since. There are presently no guidelines on interviewing.

25. The code also needs to be drafted with care, as a failure to comply with its terms could have an effect on the admissibility or value, in subsequent court proceedings, of any evidence obtained by police officers.

26. Taking that into account, COPFS’s estimate is that preparation of the code will take approximately 12 months to complete. Two members of COPFS staff will be required on a permanent basis: one principal procurator fiscal depute, and one member of administrative staff. The costs are £82,333 and £23,124 respectively, including National Insurance and pension contributions: a total of £105,457.

27. COPFS may be able to achieve this by transferring staff from other duties, and meeting the cost from within existing resources. However, COPFS cannot rule out the possibility that, depending on operational requirements when the code is being prepared, the posts vacated will need to be backfilled, and that additional recruitment would then be required.

28. COPFS anticipates that, to assist in preparation of the code, it will need the practical expertise of an experienced police officer to advise on current practices, and to provide input on proposals arising from public consultation and discussion with COPFS. The officer will also be able to liaise with Police Scotland and utilise contacts with other police forces for comparative purposes. COPFS therefore considers that it will require a seconded officer from Police Scotland at either Inspector or Chief Inspector rank, with costs, including National Insurance and pension contributions, estimated at £71,505 for an Inspector or £75,970 for a Chief Inspector.

29. COPFS will also require to consult publicly on the terms of the code. The cost of this will depend on a number of factors which at this stage are not known: the length of the code, the level of detail thought necessary in any consultation document, the number of responses to the consultation, and whether external analysts require to be engaged to consider the responses received. The cost of consultation is estimated as being in the range £0-12,000.

30. The total cost to COPFS is therefore estimated as being between £176,962 and £193,427.

31. There may also be a training cost for the SPA following publication of the code. This will depend on the contents of the code, which are entirely within the discretion of the Lord Advocate.

32. If the code requires no change to current operational practices, no or minimal training will be required. At the other end of the scale, if the code requires that all operational police officers be trained to the required standard to carry out formal investigative interviews – a level of training presently restricted to specialist roles including the CID – the potential cost becomes more significant.

33. In that event, Police Scotland estimates that around 12,900 officers, up to and including the rank of sergeant, would be required to complete the national five day investigative interview training course at a cost of £10,575,298. This would take in excess of one year to deliver following publication of the code.

34. However, this cost does not arise as a direct result of the Bill; it may arise after the code has been issued, and the extent to which training is required will of course depend on the terms of the code. The figure provided should therefore be regarded as being at the upper end of a range of possibilities following publication of the code; assessment of what – if anything – will require to change in police practice; and the consequent training requirements, if any.

35. In addition, this cost evaluates the time of police officers, and the intention is to provide this training over a period of time to ensure that the delivery of operational police functions is not impaired, and that there will be no need to backfill posts during the training. The cost will therefore be met from within existing resources.

Table 3a: Summary of additional costs arising from amendments in respect of the code of practice of investigative functions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Lower estimate</th>
<th>Higher estimate</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>COPFS – internal staff redeployment</td>
<td>£105,457</td>
<td>£105,457</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>COPFS – costs of seconded police officer</td>
<td>£71,505</td>
<td>£75,970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>COPFS – public consultation</td>
<td>£0</td>
<td>£12,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total costs</td>
<td>£176,962</td>
<td>£193,427</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 3b: Summary of additional costs arising from police training requirements as a consequence of the code of practice of investigative functions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Year 1 Lower estimate</th>
<th>Year 1 Higher estimate</th>
<th>Year 2 Lower estimate</th>
<th>Year 2 Higher estimate</th>
<th>Total (to be met from within existing resources)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>SPA – costs of training officers on code</td>
<td>£0</td>
<td>£5,287,649</td>
<td>£0</td>
<td>£5,287,649</td>
<td>£10,575,298</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Detention of person with responsibility for a child

36. An amendment agreed by the Justice Committee at stage 2 introduced a new section 82A into the Bill. This provision places an obligation on the court to ensure that a child and family impact assessment (“CFIA”) is carried out when a person who has responsibility for a child has been remanded in custody awaiting trial; has been convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment and has been remanded in custody pending sentence; or has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention.

37. The purpose of the CFIA is to determine the likely impact of the imprisonment on the wellbeing of the child, and to identify any support and assistance which will be necessary to meet the child’s wellbeing needs.

38. The amendment does not specify who is to carry out the CFIA; it gives power to the Scottish Ministers to make provision, by regulations, to require persons to undertake them.

39. As the court is required to “ensure” that the CFIA is carried out, in terms of the provision, the burden of requesting and administering the CFIA will fall on the Scottish Courts and Tribunals Service (SCTS). For SCTS, it is considered that the requirement for the court to ensure that a CFIA is carried out in these circumstances will have significant cost implications.

40. SCTS’s estimate of costs is based on the following assumptions. There are, annually, an estimated 23,000 remands in custody, and 15,000 sentences of imprisonment or other detention. Office of National Statistics figures show that there is an average of 1.7 children per family.

41. It is assumed that an assessment will be requested for each dependent child for whom the individual has responsibility. This is on the basis that the effect on each child will differ and some individuals will have responsibility for multiple children, who may live at different addresses.

42. It is also assumed that an assessment will be required for each period of remand or imprisonment/detention, given the wording of the provision.

43. This gives a total of 64,600 requests per year (23000 + 15000, multiplied by 1.7).

44. It is unlikely to be known by the court, particularly at the point of remand awaiting trial/sentence, whether a person has responsibility for a dependent child. This may be contained in a Criminal Justice Social Work Report. However, these are not produced for periods of remand and are not always required, or requested, pre-sentence.

45. Accordingly, it has been estimated that an average additional two minutes of court time will be required per case, in order for the court to obtain details of whether the individual has responsibility for a child, and to obtain any required details (e.g. the name and address of the child or children).

46. SCTS estimates the costs of this provision, therefore, as being as follows:
   - Judicial costs: £390,830
   - SCTS staff cost in court, for one clerk of court and one court officer: £118,864

• SCTS staff cost to prepare and send request for assessment: £160,208
• SCTS postage costs. Given the sensitive nature of the information being conveyed, and the fact that SCTS does not know at this stage who will be responsible for the preparation of the assessments, and may not have a secure email link with them, SCTS has estimated this cost on the basis of first class recorded delivery at £1.73 per item: £111,758.

47. This gives an annual cost of £781,660.

48. In addition, the Bill provision requires the court to “ensure” that an assessment is carried out. Simply requesting the assessment does not necessarily meet this requirement. It is expected that SCTS would need to receive some form of confirmation that the assessment has been completed. Assuming that no judicial involvement is required, SCTS expects that to administer receipt of such notifications would involve more staff time: to receive confirmation, locate court papers, and update the IT system. This cost is estimated at £160,208.

49. Finally, SCTS has indicated that, as this is a novel procedure, an update to its IT systems would be required. The cost of this is estimated as being in the region of £10,000.

50. This gives a total financial cost to SCTS of around £941,868 per annum, with an additional one-off cost of £10,000 for IT. This represents a significant cost for SCTS, and its position is that this could not be met from within existing resources.

51. It should be noted that the provision contains no requirement for the judiciary to consider the terms of a CFIA once prepared, so no costs have been estimated in that regard. And if the court, in some cases, requires to obtain detailed and sensitive personal information about the children of the accused, necessitating the closing of the court, the given estimate of the amount of court time required for each case would, in all likelihood, be conservative.

Table 4a: Summary of additional annual costs of amendments in respect of courts requiring the preparation of a child and family impact assessment

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Cost Description</th>
<th>Cost (£)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Judicial costs</td>
<td>£390,830</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCTS staff in court costs</td>
<td>£118,864</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCTS staff out of court costs, to request assessments</td>
<td>£160,208</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCTS postage costs</td>
<td>£111,758</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCTS staff costs, ensuring report has been prepared</td>
<td>£160,208</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total annual costs</td>
<td>£941,868</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 4b: Summary of additional one-off costs of amendments in respect of courts requiring the preparation of a child and family impact assessment

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Cost Description</th>
<th>Cost (£)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>SCTS costs to upgrade IT systems</td>
<td>£10,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total one-off costs</td>
<td>£10,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
STAGE 2 AMENDMENTS WHICH WILL RESULT IN ANTICIPATED COSTS NOT BEING INCURRED

Investigative liberation – release on conditions

52. The Bill as introduced requires that, where a suspect is released on investigative liberation, a police officer of the rank of inspector or above may impose such conditions as s/he considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation. An amendment agreed by the Justice Committee at stage 2 provides that an officer of the rank of sergeant or above can impose these conditions.

53. The Financial Memorandum estimated the costs of the provision in the Bill as introduced as £27,427 annually. The basis of this estimate was that 1620 suspects would be liberated with conditions requiring the authorisation of an inspector, taking an average of 30 minutes, per case, at a cost of £33.86 per hour.

54. Taking, as the starting point, the same estimate of the number of suspects to whom this applies, and the average length of time to consider each case, and the cost of a sergeant’s time as £26.97 per hour, this gives a new cost of £21,847, equating to a saving of £5,580 per annum. The cost of this provision in the Bill as introduced was categorised as an “opportunity cost”, to be met from within existing resources, and this represents a reduction in expected costs.

Table 5: summary of costs not incurred arising from amendments in respect of suspects being released on investigative liberation with conditions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>SPA – annual cost not incurred</th>
<th>£5,580</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Total costs not incurred</td>
<td>£5,580</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Corroboration

55. The Bill, as introduced, proposed the abolition of the general requirement for corroboration in criminal cases. Amendments agreed by the Justice Committee removed these provisions from the Bill.

56. The Financial Memorandum anticipated that the Bill’s provisions would result in increases in the number of cases reported by the police to COPFS, and in the number of cases prosecuted by COPFS, with potential cost implications for SPA, COPFS, the Scottish Legal Aid Board (SLAB), SCTS, local authorities, and the Scottish Prison Service (SPS).

57. It was anticipated that most of these costs would be absorbed as part of general staff workloads, and could be met from within the budget and existing resources of the relevant organisations, by measures such as full use of existing resources, prioritisation of functions, and increased operational efficiency. These were referred to in the Financial Memorandum as “opportunity costs”.

58. However, for some of the costs a specific need for additional staff or resources had been identified. These were referred to in the Financial Memorandum as “financial costs”. These figures were based on estimates provided by Police Scotland and COPFS, suggesting that there were likely to be increases in the number of cases reported by the police to COPFS, and in the number of cases prosecuted by COPFS.

Table 6a: costs of the abolition of the corroboration requirement, as given in the Financial Memorandum

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>2015/16</th>
<th>2016/17</th>
<th>2017/18</th>
<th>2018/19</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Opportunity costs (£ ‘000)</td>
<td>14,974</td>
<td>22,724</td>
<td>26,774</td>
<td>30,874</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Financial costs (£ ‘000)</td>
<td>4,032</td>
<td>4,032</td>
<td>4,032</td>
<td>4,032</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

59. The anticipated costs of £4,032,000 were to be incurred by SPA and SLAB.

60. Police Scotland estimated an annual cost of £132,000 per annum, in respect of overtime costs for police officers being required to attend court as witnesses. This assumed a 3.03% rise in court overtime payments.

61. SLAB estimated an annual cost of £3,900,000, following the expected increase in prosecutions at all court levels. This relied on a best estimate of an additional 7.6% prosecutions at solemn level, split between High Court and sheriff and jury courts; and an additional 2.5% prosecutions at summary level, split between sheriff courts and JP courts.

62. With the removal of these provisions from the Bill, these costs will no longer be incurred.

Table 6b and 6c: summary of costs, as provided in the Financial Memorandum, which will not be incurred as a consequence of amendments in respect of the abolition of the corroboration requirement

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Reduction in expected costs identified in Financial Memorandum as being met from within existing resources</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>2015/16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPA</td>
<td>£3,965,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>COPFS</td>
<td>£3,250,000*</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SLAB</td>
<td>£0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCTS</td>
<td>£2,500,000*</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPS</td>
<td>£4,100,000*</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local authorities</td>
<td>£1,160,000*</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>£14,975,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 35A)

Reduction in expected costs identified in Financial Memorandum as requiring additional resources (annual)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>SCTS</th>
<th>SLAB</th>
<th>SPA</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>SPA</td>
<td>£132,000</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SLAB</td>
<td></td>
<td>£3,900,000</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>£4,032,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

*best estimate from given range

SUMMARY

Table 7a: summary of additional annual financial costs, and costs not incurred, arising as a result of stage 2 amendments

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>SCTS</th>
<th>SLAB</th>
<th>SPA</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Child and family impact assessment</td>
<td>£941,868</td>
<td>(£3,900,000)</td>
<td>(£132,000)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Totals per organisation</td>
<td>£941,868</td>
<td>(£3,900,000)</td>
<td>(£132,000)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 7b: summary of additional one-off costs arising as a result of stage 2 amendments

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>SCTS</th>
<th>COPFS</th>
<th>SG</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Child and family impact assessment</td>
<td>£10,000</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Code of practice about investigative functions</td>
<td>£176,962 - £193,427</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Stop and search”</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>£12,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Totals per organisation</td>
<td>£10,000</td>
<td>£176,962 - £193,427</td>
<td>£12,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 7c: summary of additional financial costs, and costs not incurred, arising as a result of stage 2 amendments, on costs identified in the Financial Memorandum as being met from within existing resources

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>2015/16</th>
<th>2016/17</th>
<th>2017/18</th>
<th>2018/19</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>SPA</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Keeping person in custody</td>
<td>£2,749 - £6,225</td>
<td>£2,749 - £6,225</td>
<td>£2,749 - £6,225</td>
<td>£2,749 - £6,225</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Stop and search”</td>
<td>£3,852,637</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>(£3,965,000)</td>
<td>(£3,965,000)</td>
<td>(£3,965,000)</td>
<td>(£3,965,000)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Investigative liberation</td>
<td>(£5,580)</td>
<td>(£5,580)</td>
<td>(£5,580)</td>
<td>(£5,580)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total for SPA</td>
<td>£5,175,931 - (£115,194)</td>
<td>£1,323,294 - (£3,967,831)</td>
<td>(£3,964,355) - (£3,967,831)</td>
<td>(£3,964,355) - (£3,967,831)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (SP Bill 35A)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Authority</th>
<th>Ownerships</th>
<th>(£3,250,000)</th>
<th>(£3,250,000)</th>
<th>(£3,250,000)</th>
<th>(£3,250,000)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>COPFS</td>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>(£2,500,000)</td>
<td>(£2,500,000)</td>
<td>(£2,500,000)</td>
<td>(£2,500,000)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCTS</td>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>(£1,160,000)</td>
<td>(£1,160,000)</td>
<td>(£1,160,000)</td>
<td>(£1,160,000)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPS</td>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>(£4,100,000)</td>
<td>(£11,850,000)</td>
<td>(£15,900,000)</td>
<td>(£20,000,000)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local authorities</td>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>(£5,834,069)</td>
<td>(£17,436,706)</td>
<td>(£26,774,355)</td>
<td>(£30,874,355)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total cost per year</td>
<td>Corroboration</td>
<td>(£5,834,069)</td>
<td>(£17,436,706)</td>
<td>(£26,774,355)</td>
<td>(£30,874,355)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) BILL
[AS AMENDED AT STAGE 2]

SUPPLEMENTARY DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government to assist the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in its consideration of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. This memorandum describes provisions in the Bill conferring power to make subordinate legislation which were either introduced to the Bill or amended at Stage 2. The memorandum supplements the Delegated Powers Memorandum on the Bill as introduced.

2. The contents of this memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

PROVISIONS CONFERRING POWER TO MAKE SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION INTRODUCED OR AMENDED AT STAGE 2

3. The amended or new delegated powers provisions in the Bill are listed below, with a short explanation of what each power allows, why the power has been taken in the Bill and why the selected form of Parliamentary procedure has been considered appropriate.

Section D1 — Provisions about possession of alcohol

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>the Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>affirmative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

4. Provision Section D1 was inserted at Stage 2 and provides the Scottish Ministers with a new power to amend section 61 of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997. Section 61 of the 1997 Act relates to confiscation of alcohol from persons under 18. The new power in section D1 would allow the Scottish Ministers to confer powers on a constable to search a person under 18 for alcohol and to dispose of any alcohol found.

5. The use of the power is subject to the Scottish Ministers duty to consult being fulfilled. Section D1(2) provides that Scottish Ministers must publicly consult on the regulations prior to laying a draft of them before the Scottish Parliament.
6. The power is subject to a sunset clause under section E1(2), meaning that section D1 will be regarded as repealed if no regulations are made under section D1 within 2 years of the coming into effect of the first code of practice on stop and search.

Reason for taking this power

7. This new power is required in consequence of the abolition of “consensual stop and search” under section A1 of the Bill. It originates with a recommendation by the independent advisory group on stop and search, which was chaired by John Scott QC. The group identified a potential gap in the law, which means that while the police have powers to confiscate alcohol from children, they do not have a statutory power to search them for alcohol and have instead been relying on consensual searches as a means of doing so. The Advisory Group were not able to form a concluded view on whether such a power was necessary or desirable. The Group therefore recommended that the Scottish Government should hold an early consultation on whether to legislate to create a specific power for police officers to search children under the age of 18 for alcohol.

8. It was considered appropriate to include an enabling power in the Bill to ensure that the power to search children for alcohol can be introduced by regulations. The potential need for a power to search for alcohol arises from the abolition of consensual stop and search and the introduction of a code of practice about the carrying out of searches. This regulation making power would only be used if it were to be confirmed, following a public consultation that the abolition of consensual stop and search, which is currently relied on, would mean that searches in such circumstances require to be able to continue, meaning that it would be it should be considered necessary and appropriate to create a bespoke new power. It is considered appropriate to allow for a new power of search to be introduced in secondary legislation, to ensure that, if it is required, the power to search for alcohol can be put in place at the same time as consensual stop and search is abolished, rather than leaving a gap in the law while waiting for the opportunity to make the change in primary legislation. The regulations will be subject to statutory consultation requirements and affirmative procedure. The sunset clause will ensure that the enabling power will only be used if the consultation demonstrates that it is necessary to do so following the abolition of consensual search.

Choice of procedure

9. Police powers to search children raise important considerations, not least because the exercise of those powers will involve interference with the rights of children who are searched. The Parliament has a strong interest in stop and search and the rights of children. It is therefore considered appropriate that regulations under section D1 should be subject to the level of scrutiny afforded by affirmative procedure. The Cabinet Secretary stated at Stage 2 that consideration would be given at Stage 3 as to whether an enhanced form of affirmative procedure would be appropriate here.
Section K1 — Bringing code of practice into effect

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

10. Section K1 provides the Scottish Ministers with a new power to appoint a day on which a code of practice about the carrying out of searches is to come into effect. A copy of the proposed code must be laid at the same time as the draft regulations and that code must have been subject to consultation under section J1 (consultation on code of practice). The first set of draft regulations under this power must be laid no later than 1 year after the Bill receives Royal Assent.

Reason for taking this power

11. This new power is required in consequence of recommendations made by the independent advisory group on stop and search, which was chaired by John Scott QC. The group made a number of recommendations including the creation of a Code of Practice on stop and search and that this Code of Practice should be the subject of public consultation.

12. The recommendations of the independent advisory group were published only a very short period before Stage 2 consideration of the Bill began. Due to the requirement for public consultation on the Code of Practice it was deemed appropriate that the Bill contain an enabling power to allow Scottish Ministers to implement the code only after it had been consulted on and the Scottish Parliament given an opportunity to consider its terms.

Choice of procedure

13. The Parliament has shown a keen interest in stop and search provisions, not least because the exercise of those powers will involve interference with the rights of those persons being searched. The provisions for introduction of the code are similar to models used elsewhere, (notably in section 24 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2001 (asp 11) and section 67 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (c.60)). It gives Parliamentary control over the introduction of the code and also recognises that, while the code will have legal effect (in the sense that a court must have regard to it), it is unlikely to be drafted in the formal legislative language or format required of secondary legislation. It is therefore considered appropriate that the Parliament is able to exercise control over that code by choosing to affirm the regulations bringing the code into effect.
Section 53A — Further provision about application of Part 1

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

14. Part 1 of the Bill deals with arrests, custody and questioning of suspects. It replaces most existing powers to arrest in respect of offences with a single power of arrest. It also sets out the procedures and consequences of arrest including information to be recorded by the police, the rights of people arrested and duties to take arrested people to a police station. These general provisions about arrest will apply to all arrests (not just those under the Bill or in relation to offences), with the exception of arrests under the Terrorism Act 2000 (“the 2000 Act”) and arrests for service offences.

15. Section 53A provides Scottish Ministers with a new power to make regulations to apply some or all of Part 1 of the Bill to arrests under the 2000 Act and service offences under the Armed Forces Act 2006 (“the 2006 Act”) and, conversely, to disapply some or all of the Part so that it does not operate in relation to people who have been arrested otherwise than in connection with an offence.

Reason for taking this power

16. The 2000 Act and the 2006 Act set out their own rules for people arrested under them and generally the Bill does not impinge on those rules. The 2000 Act for example sets different time periods for keeping people in custody. There may, however, be some aspects of Part 1 that it would be appropriate to apply if they are not already covered by the procedures in those other Acts. For example, for service offences under the 2006 Act, it may be desirable to ensure that provisions relating to access to a third party or information to be recorded at the time of arrest do apply for the short period that someone suspected of a service offence is in the custody of Police Scotland, before being transferred to the custody of the military police. The power in section 53A would allow this provision to be made in regulations. The power to apply the Bill provisions to arrests under the 2000 Act or to service offences under the 2006 Act is unlikely to be used to apply large parts of the Bill to such arrests. It would provide flexibility and future proofing. The Bill is intended to streamline and modernise the law on arresting and keeping people in custody. The exact nature of the provisions required under this power will depend on the extent to which people arrested under the 2000 Act or 2006 Act are dealt with by specific rules under those Acts and the extent to which they are dealt with under standard police procedures. Where the 2000 and 2006 Acts do not make separate provision then this regulation making power could be used to ensure that the modernised and streamlined police powers and procedures set out under the Bill could be applied to arrests under the 2000 Act and 2006 Act. It could, for example, be used to apply section 6 of the Bill in order to require the police to record information about arrests under the 2000 Act.

17. Section 53A would also allow Ministers to disapply some or all of Part 1 using secondary legislation for arrests that aren’t in relation to offences. There are many powers of arrest that do not relate to a person being suspected of committing an offence. For example, under the Adult Support and Protection (Scotland) Act 2007 there are powers of arrest stemming from the ability of a court to grant a banning order against a ‘subject’ prohibiting them from doing a variety of things – including prohibiting them from being in a specific place.

18. There are other examples and it may not be appropriate in every case for Part 1 of the Bill to apply in its entirety. For example, courts can issue arrest warrants to apprehend witnesses who do not attend court. The purpose of such an arrest is to ensure the witness attends court. It would be appropriate for some information about the arrest to be recorded under section 6. But the person arrested may not need to be provided with the same information as a criminal suspect under section 3. Depending on the timing of the arrest, the police may also need to take the witness straight to court and the section 4 requirement to take them to a police station would not be helpful in these circumstances. The addition of this power will allow the interaction between this Bill and each individual piece of legislation to be specifically tailored as is most appropriate.

19. It is considered most appropriate to adapt the provisions of Part 1 using secondary legislation as that will allow the flexibility to make sure that each piece of amending legislation is accounted for and will also allow for future changes without the need for further primary legislation. The main purpose of Part 1 of the Bill is to deal with the system of arrest and custody of people who are suspected of offences. Modernising and clarifying the law on arrest requires consequential changes to be made in relation to non-offending arrests. But the appropriate place to do that is in separate regulations where they can be given the detailed scrutiny afforded by affirmative procedure. The need for changes in relation to non-offending arrests and arrests under the 2000 and 2006 Acts will arise in consequence of this Bill, which makes comprehensive changes to the statutory framework for arresting and holding people in custody. The enabling power will allow appropriate provision to be put in place before Part 1 of the Bill is brought into force.

Choice of procedure

20. Regulations under section 53A would modify the application of primary legislation dealing with the rights of people who are arrested or held in custody by the police. It is therefore considered appropriate for the power to be subject to affirmative procedure.

Section 82A — Duty to undertake a child and family impact assessment

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

21. Section 82A(5) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision requiring such persons as they may prescribe to undertake a child and family impact assessment in accordance with section 82A(2). Section 82A(2) requires a court to ensure that such an assessment is carried out in order to determine the likely impact of the imprisonment or other detention of a person with responsibility for a child, on the wellbeing of the child, and to identify any support and assistance which will be necessary to meet the child’s wellbeing needs.
Reason for taking this power

22. This power was inserted as part of a non-Government amendment at Stage 2. The amendment was put forward by Mary Fee, MSP and places a duty on the court to ensure that a child and family impact assessment is carried out for the purpose noted above. The intention behind section 82A is to determine the likely impact of parental imprisonment on any child and identify support and assistance for that child. The duty applies where a person who has responsibility for a child has been remanded in custody awaiting trial, has been found by a court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment and has been remanded in custody awaiting sentence, or has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment or other detention. The regulation-making power given to Ministers under section 82A(5) is to specify who should actually undertake the assessment which it is the court’s duty to ensure is carried out and which takes forward the purpose of section 82A.

Choice of procedure

23. This regulation-making power is to allow Ministers to specify who should undertake child and family impact assessments as provided for in section 82A. As this would place a duty on particular organisations to resource and undertake such assessments, it is considered appropriate for the power to be subject to affirmative procedure so that an appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny can be undertaken.

Section 86A: (new subsection 305(1A) of the 1995 Act) – Electronic proceedings

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>the High Court of Justiciary</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>act of adjournal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>laid, no procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

24. Section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) provides that the High Court, through Acts of Adjournal, can regulate practice and procedure in relation to criminal procedure; and, in connection with that, can modify, amend or repeal any enactment in so far as that enactment relates to matters with respect to which an Act of Adjournal may be made.

25. Section 86A introduces a new subsection (1A) into section 305. The new subsection provides that the scope of section 305 includes the power to make provision for something to be done in electronic form or by electronic means.

Reason for taking this power

26. Criminal procedure, both in the 1995 Act and generally, requires the use of many different types of documentation, most of which are presently produced in paper form. These documents may require to be signed or otherwise authenticated, and may also require to be served on or delivered to other parties in the case.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2
(SP Bill 35A)

27. This amendment allows the High Court, through Acts of Adjournal, to make such changes as it sees fit to criminal procedure to allow the greater use of electronic documents, signature, and service. The High Court is assisted in its use of Acts of Adjournal by the Criminal Court Rules Council, and it is better placed than the Scottish Ministers to assess and then make provision for when it is appropriate for a particular document, signature, or service requirement to take place electronically.

28. It would also be inappropriate and unnecessary to do this through primary legislation: it would be a poor use of the Parliament’s time to deal with this level of administrative detail, particularly given the number of occasions on which legislative change would be required – the 1995 Act alone, for example, contains numerous instances where signature or another form of authorisation is required. Further, court rules allow the court the required flexibility to make modification to their practice and procedure rules in order to ensure their continued effectiveness, without requiring primary legislation in every instance.

Choice of procedure

29. Such administrative matters can appropriately be dealt with, in terms of section 305 of the 1995 Act (as amended by this provision), by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any parliamentary procedure. The power is subject only to the default laying requirement under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010.

Schedule 3: (new schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012) — Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: negative when using paragraph 4(6) only or affirmative procedure when using paragraph 4(6) combined with paragraphs 4B or 4C

Provision

30. Schedule 3 inserts a new schedule 2A into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (“the 2012 Act”). Paragraph 4(6) of schedule 2A provides for the constitution of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland (“PNBS”), or any revision of it, to be given effect by regulations. Paragraph 4B of schedule 2A provides that regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions disapplying or modifying the mandatory rules in schedule 1 to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010 in relation to arbitrations taking place in accordance with the PNBS constitution. Paragraph 4C of schedule 2A provides that regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions specifying, by reference to particular matters or circumstances, what are qualifying cases for the purposes of new section 55CA of the 2012 Act (inserted by section 87 of the Bill). Section 55CA(1) requires the Scottish Ministers to take all reasonable steps as appear to them necessary to give effect to PNBS representations under section 55B(1) which are based on arbitration, but only in qualifying cases. Section 55B(1) representations would relate to police pay, allowances and expenses, public holidays and leave, and hours of duty.
Reason for taking this power

31. The role of PNBS is to consider and make representations to the Scottish Government on police matters, in particular on the pay and conditions of constables. The PNBS constitution will set out in detail how the PNBS will operate, including its membership, procedures and organisation. The constitution will be a document of an administrative nature and it will need to be changed from time to time to enable the PNBS to adapt and change its structures as necessary to fulfil its role; this makes it unsuitable for primary legislation. The Bill as introduced to the Parliament did not provide for any parliamentary scrutiny over the making of the constitution. Paragraph 4(6), inserted by way of a Stage 2 amendment, will provide an opportunity for the Scottish Parliament to scrutinise the constitution and any changes to it, enhancing the fairness and transparency of the constitution-making process.

32. The PNBS constitution will set out procedures for disputes within PNBS to be referred to an arbitration process which would be subject to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”). The mandatory arbitration rules in the 2010 Act are designed primarily for commercial arbitrations and some rules may be unsuitable for this statutory arbitration. For example the rules, which are set out in schedule 1 to the 2010 Act, refer throughout to “the parties”, “the referring party”, “the other party”, whereas in a PNBS arbitration there will be only one party (the PNBS) referring a matter of internal dispute to arbitration. Paragraph 4B enables the Scottish Ministers to disapply or modify the 2010 Act rules as appropriate for PNBS arbitrations. Paragraph 4B is in similar terms to the order-making power at section 17 of the 2010 Act (which is subject to affirmative procedure by virtue of section 33(3) of the 2010 Act).

33. The Scottish Government wishes in certain circumstances (“qualifying cases”) to be bound to give effect to section 55B(1) representations made by PNBS where those representations are based on an arbitration decision. The Scottish Government intends to consult further on the detail of what will be a qualifying case; it is envisaged that this will be limited to arbitration decisions on certain matters, for example the main police pay award, and only so many times a year. Paragraph 4C enables the Scottish Ministers to set out the qualifying cases in regulations and there will be corresponding provision in the PNBS constitution made under paragraph 4(6).

Choice of procedure

34. Section 87(2A) of the Bill amends section 125 of the 2012 Act in respect of the procedure which will apply to this regulation-making power. Accordingly, negative procedure will apply to regulations which only give effect to the PNBS constitution under paragraph 4(6); however, affirmative procedure will apply in relation to regulations which also make provision of the type referred to in paragraphs 4B or 4C. The Scottish Government considers this is appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament to give a high level of scrutiny to provisions disapplying or modifying primary legislation in the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010 or expanding on the application of section 55CA of the 2012 Act by setting out qualifying cases. In contrast the PNBS constitution is essentially a procedural and administrative document and scrutiny in accordance with negative procedure is appropriate.
Contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delegated Powers Provisions</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Annexe</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee

The remit of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee is to consider and report on—

a. any—
   i. subordinate legislation laid before the Parliament or requiring the consent of the Parliament under section 9 of the Public Bodies Act 2011;
   ii. [deleted]
   iii. pension or grants motion as described in Rule 8.11A.1; and, in particular, to determine whether the attention of the Parliament should be drawn to any of the matters mentioned in Rule 10.3.1;

b. proposed powers to make subordinate legislation in particular Bills or other proposed legislation;

c. general questions relating to powers to make subordinate legislation;

d. whether any proposed delegated powers in particular Bills or other legislation should be expressed as a power to make subordinate legislation;

e. any failure to lay an instrument in accordance with section 28(2), 30(2) or 31 of the 2010 Act; and

f. proposed changes to the procedure to which subordinate legislation laid before the Parliament is subject.

g. any Scottish Law Commission Bill as defined in Rule 9.17A.1; and

h. any draft proposal for a Scottish Law Commission Bill as defined in that Rule; and

i. any Consolidation Bill as defined in Rule 9.18.1 referred to it by the Parliamentary Bureau in accordance with Rule 9.18.3.
Committee Membership

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Convener</th>
<th>Deputy Convener</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Nigel Don Scottish National Party</td>
<td>John Mason Scottish National Party</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Richard Baker Scottish Labour</th>
<th>John Scott Scottish Conservative and Unionist Party</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

| Stewart Stevenson Scottish National Party |
Introduction

1. At its meeting on 8 December 2015, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (“the Bill”)\(^1\). The Committee submits this report to the Parliament under Rule 9.7.9 of Standing Orders.

2. The Bill was introduced on 20 June 2013 by the former Cabinet Secretary for Justice. It seeks to make provision about criminal justice including as to police powers and rights of suspects and as to criminal evidence, procedure and sentencing; to establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland; and for connected purposes.

3. The Scottish Government has provided the Parliament with a supplementary memorandum on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill, in advance of Stage 3 of the Bill (“the SDPM”)\(^2\).

4. The Committee reported on certain matters in relation to the delegated powers provisions in the Bill at Stage 1 in its 53rd report of 2013\(^3\).

Delegated Powers Provisions

5. The Committee considered each of the new, removed or substantially amended delegated powers provisions in the Bill after Stage 2.

6. After Stage 2, the Committee reports that it does not need to draw the attention of the Parliament to the substantially amended or new delegated powers provisions listed below, and that it is content with the parliamentary procedure to which they are subject:
   - Section D1 – Provisions about possession of alcohol
   - Section G1 – Contents of code of practice
   - Section K1 – Bringing code of practice into effect
   - Section 53A – Further provision about application of Part 1
   - Section 53B – Further provision about vulnerable persons
   - Section 82A – Duty to undertake a child and family impact assessment
   - Section 86A – inserting new section 305(1A) into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) 1995 Act – Electronic proceedings
   - Schedule 3 – inserting new schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 – Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

7. The Committee therefore reports that it is content with the provisions in the Bill which have been amended at Stage 2 to insert or substantially alter provisions conferring powers to make subordinate legislation.

8. The Committee also considered Stage 3 amendments, introducing five new delegated powers, contained within a new Chapter of the Bill “Support for vulnerable persons”. The Scottish Government wrote to advise the Committee of these proposed changes in advance of formally lodging the amendments. This correspondence is reproduced at the Annexe.

9. The Committee reports that it does not need to draw the attention of the Parliament to the new delegated powers provisions listed below, and that it is content with the parliamentary procedure to which they are subject:
   - Amendment 65 – After Section 82B, subsection 1 – Meaning of appropriate adult support
   - Amendment 65 – After Section 82B, subsection 4 – Meaning of appropriate adult support
• Amendment 66 – After Section 82B – Responsibility for ensuring availability of appropriate adults

• Amendment 67 – After Section 82B – Assessment of quality of appropriate adult support

• Amendment 68 – After Section 82B – Training for appropriate adults
1 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 is available at the following website:

2 Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2, Supplementary Delegated Powers Memorandum is available at the following website:

3 Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee. 53rd Report, 2013 (Session 4) Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1 (SP Paper 411) is available at the following website:
Correspondence from the Scottish Government

On 26 November 2015 the Cabinet Secretary for Justice wrote to the Convener as follows:

I am writing to give you advance notice of Stage 3 amendments which the Government intends to lodge in relation to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill ("the Bill") that will give Ministers new subordinate legislation making powers.

The amendment, or amendments, the Government means to lodge will empower Ministers to make regulations conferring on a body the duty to ensure that support is available for vulnerable persons at certain points in a criminal investigation or criminal proceedings. The sort of support in question is that provided by people generally known as appropriate adults.

The proposal to take this power at this late stage in the Bill process is a result of concerns expressed by members (in particular Alison McInnes) during Stage 2 consideration of the Bill. During the Justice Committee’s stage 2 deliberations, I said this (SP OR J 6 October 2015, col 67):

"When the Bill was introduced, it was considered that the appropriate adult system was working well and that a light-touch approach should be adopted — in essence placing the referral process on a statutory basis but going no further. However, further evidence … has persuaded me that the current model for appropriate adult services is not sustainable over the longer term. Concerns have been expressed about the accessibility and consistency of service provision, the exact remit of appropriate adults and funding for the service, all of which warrant further consideration.

The limited time available between Stages 2 and 3 of the Bill is insufficient to give these important matters the careful consideration which they warrant, especially when a number of stakeholders including Police Scotland, local authorities and the appropriate adult network all need to be involved in developing the new model for the delivery of appropriate adult services to ensure that it is sustainable in the long term.

The power the Government proposes to take will be restricted so as to be exercisable only after Scottish Ministers have carried out a public consultation, and any regulations made under it will be subject to the affirmative procedure so that Parliament is given a proper opportunity to consider what is proposed.

A copy of this letter is being sent to the Convener of the Justice Committee.

I hope this is helpful.
In discussing the matter of Independent Legal Representation (ILR) for complainers in relation to sexual offences during Stage 2 of the Criminal Justice Bill, I advised the Committee that I considered a better understanding of the current use of related legislation was required (sections 274 and 275 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995).

While I remain unconvinced that ILR is a necessary step, I believe it is important that any discussion about such significant changes to Scots law are based on a thorough understanding of how the system operates at present. Unfortunately, in relation to sections 274 and 275, justice organisations do not specifically record the number of applications made nor their disposals. We therefore do not have an understanding of how often these provisions are used, and how often they are granted.

To help gain such an understanding, I confirm that a small research project will be taken forward to review the usage of these provisions. I have requested COPFS and SCTS to undertake a short monitoring exercise which will initially last around 3 months. Once sufficient information is available we will develop our consideration of any further analysis required with interested parties, both from the legal system and from victims’ organisations.

As I mentioned at Committee, it will be timely to undertake this work now so it can be considered alongside the wider criminal justice reform project. This wider work will also give consideration to Lord Bonomy’s recommendations, the requirement for corroboration reform and any other relevant issues.
Following this exercise, we will have gained a greater evidence base of the volumes and disposals of cases involved. It will then of course be a matter for the Scottish Government elected in May to consider what additional research, if any, may be appropriate to ascertain how sections 274 and 275 are being applied by the courts and how this relates to the wider criminal justice reform project.

I hope the above information is helpful to the Committee.

Best wishes,

MICHAEL MATHESON
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Marshalled List of Amendments selected for Stage 3

The Bill will be considered in the following order—

Sections A1 to 91  Schedules A1 to 3
Long Title

Amendments marked * are new (including manuscript amendments) or have been altered.

Section A1

Michael Matheson

5  Move section A1 to after section 56

Section B1

Michael Matheson

83  In section B1, page 1, line 17, after <place> insert—

<(  )>

Michael Matheson

6  In section B1, page 1, line 18, at end insert <, or

(  ) in circumstances in which the constable believes that it is necessary to do so with respect to the care or protection of the person.>

Michael Matheson

7  Move section B1 to after section 56

After section B1

Michael Matheson

8  After section B1, insert—

<Public safety at premises or events

(1) A person who is not in police custody may be searched by a constable if—

(a) the person—

(i) is seeking to enter, or has entered, relevant premises, or

(ii) is seeking to attend, or is attending, a relevant event, and

(b) the further criteria are met.
(2) Premises are or an event is relevant if—
   (a) the premises may be entered, or the event may be attended, by members of the public (including where dependent on possession of a ticket or on payment of a charge), and
   (b) the entry or the attendance is controlled, at the time of the entry or the attendance, by or on behalf of the occupier of the premises or the organiser of the event.

(3) The further criteria to be met are that—
   (a) the entry or the attendance is subject to a condition, imposed by the occupier of the premises or the organiser of the event, that the person consents to being searched, and
   (b) the person informs the constable that the person consents to being searched by the constable.

(4) A search under this section is to be carried out for the purpose of ensuring the health, safety or security of people on the premises or at the event.

(5) Anything seized by a constable in the course of a search carried out under this section may be retained by the constable.

Section C1

Michael Matheson

9 Move section C1 to after section 56

Before section D1

Michael Matheson

10 Before section D1, insert—

<Publication of information by police

(1) The Police Service of Scotland must ensure that, as soon as practicable after the end of each reporting year, information is published on how many times during the reporting year a search was carried out by a constable—
   (a) of a person not in police custody, and
   (b) otherwise than under the authority of a warrant expressly conferring a power of search.

(2) So far as practicable, the information is to disclose (in addition)—
   (a) how many persons were searched on two or more occasions,
   (b) the age and gender, and the ethnic and national origin, of the persons searched,
   (c) the proportion of searches that resulted in—
      (i) something being seized by a constable,
      (ii) a case being reported to the procurator fiscal,
   (d) the number of complaints made to the Police Service of Scotland about the carrying out of searches (or the manner in which they were carried out).
(3) In this section, “reporting year” means a yearly period ending on 31 March.

Section D1

Elaine Murray

11 In section D1, page 2, line 18, at end insert—

   <( ) send a copy of the proposed regulations to—
   (i) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
   (ii) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
   (iii) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
   (iv) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.>

Elaine Murray

12 In section D1, page 2, line 18, at end insert—

   <( ) When laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations under this section, the Scottish Ministers must also so lay a statement—
   (a) giving reasons for wishing to make the regulations as currently framed (and confirming whether the regulations will amend the relevant enactment in the same way as shown in the proposed regulations),
   (b) summarising—
       (i) the responses received by them to the public consultation on the proposed regulations,
       (ii) the representations made to them by the persons to whom a copy of the proposed regulations was sent.>

Alison McInnes

84 In section D1, page 2, line 18, at end insert—

   <(2A) For the purposes of a consultation under subsection (2), the Scottish Ministers must—
   (a) lay a copy of the proposed regulations before the Scottish Parliament,
   (b) publish in such manner as they consider appropriate a copy of the proposed regulations, and
   (c) have regard to the matters mentioned in subsection (2B).

(2B) The matters are—

   (a) any resolution of the Parliament made,
   (b) any report of any committee of the Parliament published,
   (c) any representations to the Scottish Ministers made, in relation to the proposed regulations within 60 days of the day on which the copy of the proposed regulations is laid before the Parliament.

(2C) In calculating any period of 60 days for the purposes of subsection (2B), no account is to be taken of any time during which the Scottish Parliament is dissolved or in recess for more than 4 days.

(2D) When laying a draft of an instrument containing regulations under this section before the Scottish Parliament, the Scottish Ministers must also lay before the Parliament an explanatory document giving details of—

(a) the consultation carried out under subsection (2),

(b) any representations received as a result of the consultation, and

(c) the changes (if any) made to the proposed regulations as a result of those representations.

---

Alison McInnes

1 Leave out section D1

Michael Matheson

13 Move section D1 to after section 56

Section E1

Alison McInnes

2 In section E1, page 2, line 24, leave out subsection (2)

Michael Matheson

14 Move section E1 to after section 56

Section F1

Michael Matheson

15 Move section F1 to after section 56

Section G1

Michael Matheson

16 In section G1, page 3, line 7, after <out> insert <(in particular)>

Michael Matheson

17 In section G1 page 3, line 8, leave out <such a search> and insert

Michael Matheson

18 In section G1, page 3, leave out lines 10 and 11 and insert—

<(c) in relation to such a search—>
(i) the record to be kept,
(ii) the right of someone to receive a copy of the record.

Michael Matheson

19 In section G1, page 3, leave out line 12

Michael Matheson

20 Move section G1 to after section 56

Section H1

Michael Matheson

21 In section H1, page 3, line 30, leave out subsection (2A) and insert—

<(2A) So far as practicable, a review conducted under subsection (2) must be completed within 6 months of the day on which the review begins.>

Michael Matheson

22 In section H1, page 4, line 2, leave out <to K1> and insert <, J1 (except subsection (3)) and K1 (except subsection (2A))>

Michael Matheson

23 Move section H1 to after section 56

Section I1

Michael Matheson

24 Move section I1 to after section 56

Section J1

Michael Matheson

25 In section J1, page 4, line 20, at end insert—

<( ) the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner,>

Michael Matheson

26 In section J1, page 4, leave out line 23
In section J1, page 4, line 24, at end insert—

<(3) Subsection (1) or (2) is complied with in relation to a code of practice having (or to have) effect for the first time even if the consultation has been initiated before the day on which this section comes into force.>

Move section J1 to after section 56

Section K1

In section K1, page 4, line 26, leave out  and insert <the day appointed for the code>

In section K1, page 4, line 31, leave out subsection (2A) and insert—

<(2A) No later than at the end of the 12 months beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, there must be so laid a draft of an instrument containing regulations bringing a code of practice into effect.>

Move section K1 to after section 56

Section L1

Leave out section L1

Section 4

In section 4, page 6, line 36, after <19(2)> insert <, or ( ) section 28(3A) of the 1995 Act>

Section 7

In section 7, page 9, line 23, after <offence> insert <, or

( ) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions)>
Section 11

Michael Matheson

35 In section 11, page 10, line 1, after <12A> insert <, or

( ) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions)>

Section 12A

Alison McInnes

3 In section 12A, page 10, line 21, at end insert—

<(1A) Subsection (1) does not apply where—

(a) a constable believes that the person who is in police custody is under 18 years of age, or

(b) owing to mental disorder, the person who is in police custody appears to a constable to be unable to—

(i) understand sufficiently what is happening, or

(ii) communicate effectively with the police.

(1B) It is irrelevant for the purposes of subsection (1A)(b) whether the person is or is not in receipt of support of the type mentioned in section 33(3).>

Michael Matheson

36 In section 12A, page 10, leave out line 23 and insert—

<(  ) is of, or above, the rank of—

(i) inspector, if a constable believes the person to be 18 years of age or over,

(ii) chief inspector, if a constable believes the person to be under 18 years of age, and>

Michael Matheson

37 In section 12A, page 11, line 12, after <offence> insert <, or

( ) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions)>

Alison McInnes

4 In section 12A, page 11, line 12, at end insert—

<(  ) In subsection (1A)(b)—

(a) “mental disorder” has the meaning given in section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003,

(b) the reference to the police is to any—

(i) constable, or
(ii) person appointed as a member of police staff under section 26(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

Section 9

Michael Matheson

38 In section 9, page 12, line 11, after <offence> insert <, or

( ) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions).

Section 14

Elaine Murray

39 In section 14, page 13, line 32, after <offence> insert <(including, for example, a condition aimed at securing that the person does not interfere with witnesses or evidence).

After section 17

Elaine Murray

85 After section 17, insert—

<Disclosure of information: person released under section 14>

(1) A constable may disclose qualifying information relating to an alleged offence to a person mentioned in subsection (2) where the conditions in subsection (3) are met.

(2) The persons are—

(a) a person—

(i) against whom, or

(ii) against whose property,

the acts which constituted the alleged offence were directed,

(b) in the case where the death of a person mentioned in paragraph (a) was (or appears to have been) caused by the alleged offence, a prescribed relative of the person,

(c) a person who is likely to give evidence in criminal proceedings which are likely to be instituted against a person in respect of the alleged offence,

(d) a person who has given a statement in relation to the alleged offence to a constable.

(3) The conditions are that disclosure of the information —

(a) is in the public interest or is otherwise likely to promote the safety and wellbeing of a person mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) is authorised by a constable who is of the rank of inspector or above.

(4) In this section—
“prescribed” means prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by regulations subject to the negative procedure,

“qualifying information” means information that—

(a) identifies a person as having been arrested in connection with an alleged offence and subsequently released under section 14, and

(b) sets out such information relating to any conditions imposed on the person under section 14(2) as the constable authorising the disclosure considers appropriate.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may, by regulations subject to the negative procedure, modify the definition of “qualifying information” in subsection (4).

Section 20

Michael Matheson

40 In section 20, page 19, line 26, after <sergeant> insert <or above>

Section 24

Michael Matheson

41 In section 24, page 22, line 19, leave out <the constable is satisfied that>

Michael Matheson

42 In section 24, page 22, line 22, at end insert—

<(  ) A decision to allow the person to be interviewed without a solicitor present by virtue of subsection (4) may be taken only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in investigating the offence about which the person is to be interviewed.>

Section 25

Michael Matheson

43 In section 25, page 23, line 17, leave out <in> and insert <by>

Section 26

Michael Matheson

44 In section 26, page 23, line 29, at end insert—

<(  ) For the avoidance of doubt, nothing in this section is to be taken to mean that a constable cannot put questions to the person in relation to any other matter.>
Section 30

Michael Matheson

45 In section 30, page 26, line 35, leave out  and insert <an appropriate>.

Michael Matheson

46 In section 30, page 27, line 3, at end insert—

<( ) In subsection (5), “an appropriate constable” means a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.>

Section 32

Michael Matheson

47 In section 32, page 28, line 26, at end insert—

<( ) A decision to refuse or restrict access to a person in custody under subsection (1) or (2) may be taken only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.>

Section 32A

Michael Matheson

48 In section 32A, page 29, line 17, at end insert—

<( ) A decision to refuse or restrict access to a person in custody under subsection (4)(b) may be taken only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.>

Section 36

Michael Matheson

49 In section 36, page 31, line 9, leave out from  to <it> in line 10 and insert <the person’s exercise of the right under subsection (1) may be delayed so far as that>.
Michael Matheson

50 In section 36, page 31, line 12, at end insert—

< ( ) A decision to delay the person’s exercise of the right under subsection (1) may be taken only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.>

Section 52A

Michael Matheson

51 In section 52A, page 35, line 1, leave out subsection (7) and insert—

< (7) A court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings must take the code of practice into account when determining any question arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant.>

Section 53A

Michael Matheson

52 In section 53A, page 35, line 27, leave out from second <in> to end of line 28 and insert <under section 1.>

Section 56

Michael Matheson

53 In section 56, page 36, line 21, at end insert—

< ( ) the person is brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of the 1995 Act,>

After section 56

Alison McInnes

86 After section 56, insert—

<PART

AGE OF CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

Age of criminal responsibility

In section 41 (age of criminal responsibility) of the 1995 Act, for the word “eight” there is substituted “12”.

>
Section 64

Michael Matheson

54 Leave out section 64

Section 67

Michael Matheson

55 In section 67, page 41, line 10, leave out <cross-heading> and insert <heading>

Section 73

Michael Matheson

56 In section 73, page 42, line 36, leave out <not constituted by a stipendiary magistrate> and insert <(however constituted)>

Michael Matheson

57 In section 73, page 42, line 37, leave out leave out from first  to <summarily> in line 38 and insert <the sheriff court sitting in summary proceedings>

Michael Matheson

58 In section 73, page 42, line 39, leave out leave out <sitting as a court of solemn jurisdiction> and insert <court sitting in solemn proceedings>

Section 76

Michael Matheson

59 In section 76, page 44, line 5, leave out <High Court> and insert <Sheriff Appeal Court>

Michael Matheson

60 In section 76, page 44, line 8, leave out <High Court> and insert <Sheriff Appeal Court>

Michael Matheson

61 In section 76, page 44, line 16, leave out <High Court> and insert <Sheriff Appeal Court>

Section 80

Michael Matheson

62 In section 80, page 45, line 30, leave out <High Court> and insert <Sheriff Appeal Court>
Section 81

Michael Matheson

63 In section 81, page 46, line 2, leave out subsection (2)

After section 81

Michael Matheson

64 After section 81, insert—

<Courts reform: spent provisions>

In schedule 3 to the Courts Reform (Scotland) Act 2014, the following provisions are repealed—

(a) in paragraph 10, sub-paragraphs (4), (5) and (8),
(b) paragraph 22,
(c) paragraph 25.>

Section 82A

Mary Fee

87 Leave out section 82A

After section 82B

Michael Matheson

65 After section 82B, insert—

<Chapter>

Support for vulnerable persons

Meaning of appropriate adult support

(1) For the purposes of this Chapter, “appropriate adult support” means—

(a) support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of section 33 that is provided to a person about whom intimation has been sent under subsection (2) of that section, and
(b) such other support for vulnerable persons in connection with a criminal investigation or criminal proceedings as the Scottish Ministers specify by regulations.

(2) In regulations under subsection (1)(b), the Scottish Ministers may, in particular, specify support by reference to—

(a) the purpose it is to serve,
(b) the description of vulnerable persons to whom it is to be available, and
(c) the circumstances in which it is to be available.
(3) For the purposes of this section—

“vulnerable person” means a person who, owing to mental disorder, is—

(a) unable to understand sufficiently what is happening, or
(b) communicate effectively,
in the context of a criminal investigation or criminal proceedings,

“mental disorder” has the meaning given by section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend the definitions of “vulnerable person” and “mental disorder” in subsection (3) for the purpose of making them consistent with (respectively) subsections (1)(c) and (5)(a) of section 33.

Michael Matheson

66 After section 82B, insert—

<Responsibility for ensuring availability of appropriate adults

The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) confer on a person the function of ensuring that people are available to provide appropriate adult support—

(i) throughout Scotland, or

(ii) in a particular part of Scotland, and

(b) make provision about how that function may or must be discharged.

Michael Matheson

67 After section 82B, insert—

<Assessment of quality of appropriate adult support

The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) confer on a person the functions of—

(i) assessing the quality of whatever arrangements may be in place to ensure that people are available to provide appropriate adult support, and

(ii) assessing the quality of any appropriate adult support that is provided, and

(b) make provision about how those functions may or must be discharged.

Michael Matheson

68 After section 82B, insert—

<Training for appropriate adults

The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) confer on a person the function of—

(i) giving to people who provide, or wish to provide, appropriate adult support training in how to provide that support,
(ii) giving to other people specified by the Scottish Ministers in the regulations training in how to deal with people who need appropriate adult support, and

(b) make provision about how that function may or must be discharged.

Michael Matheson

69 After section 82B, insert—

<Recommendations from quality assessor and training provider

(1) A person upon whom a function has been conferred by virtue of section (Assessment of quality of appropriate adult support) or (Training for appropriate adults) may—

(a) make to a provider of appropriate adult support recommendations about the way that appropriate adult support is provided,

(b) make to the Scottish Ministers recommendations about the exercise of their powers under section 53B and the provisions of this Chapter.

(2) A provider of appropriate adult support must have regard to any recommendation made to it under subsection (1)(a).

(3) The Scottish Ministers must have regard to any recommendation made under subsection (1)(b).

(4) In this section, “a provider of appropriate adult support” means a person upon whom the function of ensuring that people are available to provide appropriate adult support has been conferred by virtue of section (Responsibility for ensuring availability of appropriate adults).

Michael Matheson

70 After section 82B, insert—

<Duty to ensure quality assessment takes place

If, by virtue of regulations under section (Responsibility for ensuring availability of appropriate adults), a person has the function of ensuring that people are available to provide appropriate adult support, it is the Scottish Ministers’ duty to ensure that there is a person discharging the functions mentioned in section (Assessment of quality of appropriate adult support)(a).

Michael Matheson

71 After section 82B, insert—

<Elaboration of regulation-making powers under this Chapter

(1) A power under this Chapter to confer a function on a person by regulations may be exercised so as to confer the function, or aspects of the function, on more than one person.

(2) A power under this Chapter to make provision by regulations about how a function may or must be discharged may, in particular, be exercised so as to—

(a) require or allow the person discharging the function to enter into a contract with another person,
(b) require the person discharging the function to have regard to any guidance about the discharge of the function issued by the Scottish Ministers.

(3) The powers under this Chapter to make regulations may be exercised so as to—

(a) make such provision as the Scottish Ministers consider necessary or expedient in consequence of, or for the purpose of giving full effect to, any regulations made in exercise of a power under this Chapter,

(b) modify any enactment (including this Act),

(c) make different provision for different purposes.

Michael Matheson

72 After section 82B, insert—

<Procedure for making regulations under this Chapter>

(1) Regulations under this Chapter are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(2) Prior to laying a draft Scottish statutory instrument containing regulations under this Chapter before the Scottish Parliament for approval by resolution, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly.

Michael Matheson

73 After section 82B, insert—

<Other powers of Ministers unaffected>

Nothing in this Chapter is to be taken to imply that the powers it gives to the Scottish Ministers to confer functions are the only powers that they have to confer those (or similar) functions.

Mary Fee

88 After section 82B, insert—

<Chapter>

NOTIFICATION IF PARENT OF UNDER-18 IMPRISONED

Child’s named person to be notified

(1) This section applies where a person is admitted to any penal institution for imprisonment or detention arising from—

(a) anything done by a court of criminal jurisdiction (including the imposition of a sentence, the making of an order or the issuing of a warrant),

(b) anything done under section 17 or 17A of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (as to the recall of a prisoner),

(c) anything done by virtue of the Extradition Act 2003 (particularly section 9(2) or 77(2) of that Act), or

(d) the operation of any other enactment concerning criminal matters (including penal matters).

(2) The Scottish Ministers must ensure that the person is asked—

(a) whether the person is a parent of a child, and
(b) if the person claims to be a parent of a child, to—
   (i) state the identity of the child, and
   (ii) give information enabling the identity of the service provider in relation to the child to be ascertained.

(3) If the identity of the service provider can be ascertained by or on behalf of the Scottish Ministers without undue difficulty in light of anything disclosed by the person, they must ensure that the service provider is notified of—
   (a) the fact of the person’s admission to the penal institution,
   (b) what has been stated by the person about the identity of the child, and
   (c) such other matters disclosed by the person as appear to them to be relevant for the purpose of the exercise of the named person functions with respect to the child.

(4) In addition, the Scottish Ministers must ensure that the service provider is notified of anything disclosed by the person about the identity of any other child—
   (a) of whom the person claims to be a parent, and
   (b) the service provider in relation to whom is unknown to them.

(5) No requirement is imposed by subsection (2) if the person’s admission to the penal institution is on—
   (a) returning after—
      (i) any unauthorised absence, or
      (ii) any temporary release in accordance with prison rules, or
   (b) being transferred from—
      (i) any other penal institution,
      (ii) any secure accommodation in which the person has been kept, or
      (iii) any hospital in which the person has been detained, so as to be given medical treatment for a mental disorder, by virtue of Part VI of the 1995 Act or the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.

(6) Each of the requirements imposed by subsections (2) to (4) is to be fulfilled without unnecessary delay.

(7) The references in subsections (2) to (4) to the Scottish Ministers are to them in their exercise of functions in connection with the person’s imprisonment or detention in the penal institution.

(8) The references in subsections (3) and (4) to disclosure by the person are to such disclosure in response to something asked under subsection (2).

Mary Fee

89 After section 82B, insert—

<Definition of certain expressions>

In this Chapter—

“child” means a person who is under 18 years of age,

“named person functions” has the meaning given by section 32 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014,
“parent” includes any person who—
(a) is a guardian of a child,
(b) is liable to maintain, or has care of, a child, or
(c) has parental responsibilities in relation to a child (as construed by reference to section 1(1) to (3) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995),

“penal institution” means—
(a) any prison, other than—
   (i) a naval, military or air force prison, or
   (ii) any legalised police cells (within the meaning of section 14(1) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989),
(b) any remand centre (within the meaning of section 19(1)(a) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989), or
(c) any young offenders institution (within the meaning of section 19(1)(b) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989),

“prison rules” means rules made under section 39 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989,

“secure accommodation” means accommodation provided in a residential establishment, approved in accordance with regulations made under section 78(2) of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, for the purpose of restricting the liberty of children,

“service provider” in relation to a child has the meaning given by section 32 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

Section 86

Michael Matheson
74 In section 86, page 48, line 28, leave out <or other proceedings is> and insert <is or other proceedings are>

Michael Matheson
75 In section 86, page 48, line 33, leave out from <or> to second <be> in line 34 and insert <is or other proceedings are to be held or (as the case may be) any specified hearing is or other proceedings are being>

Michael Matheson
76 In section 86, page 49, line 13, leave out <such a person’s case if such a> and insert <the person’s case if the>
After section 86A

Margaret Mitchell
Supported by: Alison McInnes

90 After section 86A, insert—

CHAPTER

RECOVERY OF DOCUMENTS IN SEXUAL OFFENCE CASES: LEGAL REPRESENTATION

Recovery of certain documents in sexual offence cases: legal representation
In section 301A (recovery of documents) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (4), insert—
“(4A) Subsection (4B) applies where the application for an order under subsection (1)—
(a) is made in connection with the trial of a person charged with an offence to which section 288C of this Act applies, and
(b) seeks the recovery of any psychiatric, psychological or medical records of the complainer.

(4B) Before such an order is granted, the court must ensure that the complainer—
(a) is informed of the right of the complainer—
(i) to seek legal advice,
(ii) to appoint a legal representative, and
(b) is given the opportunity—
(i) to seek such advice,
(ii) to appoint such a representative.

(4C) Where the complainer appoints a legal representative—
(a) a copy of the application must be sent to the legal representative, and
(b) the legal representative must be given an opportunity to—
(i) submit written evidence on the matters set out in the application,
(ii) represent the complainer at any hearing in relation to the application.

(4D) The Scottish Ministers must by regulations make provision for fees incurred by a legal representative appointed under subsection (4B) to be paid out of the Scottish Legal Aid Fund.

(4E) In subsections (4A) to (4C), “complainer” means the person against whom the offence which is the subject of the criminal proceedings to which the application for an order under subsection (1) relates is alleged to have been committed.”.
Section 90

Michael Matheson

77 In section 90, page 54, line 8, leave out subsection (1) and insert—

<(1) The following provisions come into force on the day after Royal Assent—
   (a) sections E1 and G1 to K1,
       (b) this Part.>“

Alison McInnes

91 In section 90, page 54, line 8, at end insert—

<( ) Section (Age of criminal responsibility) comes into force on the day 18 months after Royal Assent.>“

Schedule A1

Michael Matheson

78 In schedule A1, page 58, line 9, leave out <or 21> and insert <, 21 or 21A>“

Schedule 1

Michael Matheson

79 In schedule 1, page 59, leave out lines 4 to 8“

Michael Matheson

80 In schedule 1, page 61, line 11, at end insert—

<In section 28—
   (a) after subsection (1) there is inserted—
       “(1ZA)Where—
           (a) a constable who is not in uniform arrests a person under subsection (1),
               and
           (b) the person asks to see the constable’s identification,
               the constable must show identification to the person as soon as reasonably practicable.’;
       (b) after subsection (3) there is inserted—
           “(3A) If—
               (a) a person is in custody only by virtue of subsection (1) or (1A), and
               (b) in the opinion of a constable there are no reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has broken, or is likely to break, a condition imposed on the person’s bail,
               the person must be released from custody immediately.">“
(3B) An accused is deemed to be brought before a court under subsection (2) or (3) if the accused appears before it by means of a live television link (by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means).”.

Michael Matheson

81 In schedule 1, page 61, line 11, at end insert—

<After section 28 there is inserted—

“28A Application of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 to persons arrested and detained under section 28

(1) Section 7(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 (“the 2015 Act”) does not apply to an accused who has been arrested under section 28(1) of this Act.

(2) The following provisions of the 2015 Act apply in relation to a person who is to be brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of this Act as they apply in relation to a person who is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2) of the 2015 Act—

(a) section 18A,

(b) section 18B,

(c) section 18C.

(3) In relation to a person who is to be brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of this Act, the 2015 Act applies as though—

(a) in section 18B(2)—

(i) for paragraph (c) there were substituted—

“(c) that the person is to be brought before the court under section 28 of the 1995 Act in order for the person’s bail to be considered.”, and

(ii) paragraph (d) were omitted,

(b) in section 18C—

(i) in subsection (3)(c), for the words “after being officially accused” there were substituted “after being informed that the person is to be brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of the 1995 Act”, and

(ii) in subsection (4), for paragraph (c) there were substituted—

“(c) that the person is to be brought before the court under section 28 of the 1995 Act in order for the person’s bail to be considered.”;

(c) in section 35(1), for paragraph (d) there were substituted—

“(d) the court before which the person is to be brought under section 28(2) or (3) of the 1995 Act and the date on which the person is to be brought before that court.”.”.

>
Michael Matheson

82 In schedule 1, page 61, line 31, leave out <section 48(5)(b) of> and insert <paragraph 6(5)(b) of schedule A1 to>
Groupings of Amendments for Stage 3

This document provides procedural information which will assist in preparing for and following proceedings on the above Bill. The information provided is as follows:

- the list of groupings (that is, the order in which amendments will be debated). Any procedural points relevant to each group are noted;
- the text of amendments to be debated on the day of Stage 3 consideration, set out in the order in which they will be debated. THIS LIST DOES NOT REPLACE THE MARSHALLED LIST, WHICH SETS OUT THE AMENDMENTS IN THE ORDER IN WHICH THEY WILL BE DISPOSED OF.

Groupings of amendments

Note: The time limits indicated are those set out in the timetabling motion to be considered by the Parliament before the Stage 3 proceedings begin. If that motion is agreed to, debate on the groups above each line must be concluded by the time indicated, although the amendments in those groups may still be moved formally and disposed of later in the proceedings.

Group 1: Move Part A1

5, 7, 9, 13, 14, 15, 20, 23, 24, 28, 31

Group 2: Search of person not in police custody: lawfulness of search by constable

83, 6, 8

Group 3: Search of person not in police custody: publication of information by police

10, 32

Group 4: Search of person not in police custody: provisions about possession of alcohol

11, 12, 84, 1, 2

Debate to end no later than 35 minutes after proceedings begin

Group 5: Code of practice

16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 77

Group 6: Arrest and detention in connection with bail breaches

33, 34, 35, 37, 38, 53, 79, 80, 81
Group 7: Extension of period of custody without charge from 12 to 24 hours
3, 36, 4

Group 8: Investigative liberation: release on conditions
39, 85

Debate to end no later than 1 hour 30 minutes after proceedings begin

Group 9: Rank and independence of constable required to take certain decisions
40, 41, 42, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50

Group 10: Minor, consequential and drafting amendments
43, 51, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 74, 75, 76, 78, 82

Group 11: Questioning following arrest
44

Group 12: Power to modify application of Part 1 52

Debate to end no later than 2 hours after proceedings begin

Group 13: Age of criminal responsibility
86, 91

Group 14: Children affected by parental imprisonment
87, 88, 89

Group 15: Support for vulnerable persons: appropriate adult services
65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73

Group 16: Recovery of documents in sexual offences cases: legal representation 90

Debate to end no later than 2 hours 40 minutes after proceedings begin
EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

Vol. 5, No. 58 Session 4

Meeting of the Parliament

Tuesday 8 December 2015

Note: (DT) signifies a decision taken at Decision Time.

Business Motion: Joe FitzPatrick, on behalf of the Parliamentary Bureau, moved S4M-15086—That the Parliament agrees that, during stage 3 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, debate on groups of amendments shall, subject to Rule 9.8.4A, be brought to a conclusion by the time limit indicated, that time limit being calculated from when the stage begins and excluding any periods when other business is under consideration or when a meeting of the Parliament is suspended (other than a suspension following the first division in the stage being called) or otherwise not in progress:

Groups 1 to 4: 35 minutes
Groups 5 to 8: 1 hour 30 minutes
Groups 9 to 12: 2 hours
Groups 13 to 16: 2 hours 40 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill - Stage 3: The Bill was considered at Stage 3.

The following amendments were agreed to (without division): 5, 83, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 87, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 88, 89, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81 and 82.

The following amendments were disagreed to (by division)—

1 (For 3, Against 103, Abstentions 4)
3 (For 6, Against 103, Abstentions 0)
86 (For 40, Against 75, Abstentions 0)
90 (For 50, Against 61, Abstentions 4).

The following amendments were not moved: 84, 2, 4, 85 and 91.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill: The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson) moved S4M-15087—That the Parliament agrees that the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill be passed.

After debate, the motion was agreed to (DT).
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill:
Stage 3

15:05

The Deputy Presiding Officer (John Scott):
The next item of business is stage 3 proceedings on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. In dealing with the amendments, members should have the bill as amended at stage 2, the marshalled list and the groupings. The division bell will sound and proceedings will be suspended for five minutes for the first division of the afternoon. The period of voting for the first division will be 30 seconds.
Thereafter, I will allow a voting period of one minute for the first division after a debate.
Members who wish to speak on any group of amendments should press their request-to-speak buttons as soon as possible after I call the group.

Section A1—Limitation on what enables search

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We start with group 1. Amendment 5, in the name of the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, is grouped with amendments
7, 9, 13 to 15, 20, 23, 24, 28 and 31.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson): Amendments 5, 7, 9, 13 to 15, 20, 23, 24, 28 and 31 move part A1 from its place at the start of the bill to after section 56. That reflects the importance of part 1 of the bill and, in particular, the new single power of arrest in section 1.

Moving part A1 will also help to avoid any possible confusion that could arise if part 1 was renumbered. Section 1 contains the new power of arrest, which replaces the current power to detain suspects under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and a mixture of common law and statutory powers to arrest people. If part A1 was not moved, section 1 would be renumbered as section 14. That would create scope for unnecessary confusion with the old power of detention under the 1995 act, which the bill will repeal.

The new arrest and custody regime that is set out in part 1 represents a very significant change in police powers. Every police officer in Scotland will receive extensive training before the bill comes into force. That will help to ensure a smooth transition to the new system. However, there is bound to be a period where police officers and others working in the criminal justice system will take time to get used to the new legislation.
Moving part A1 to later in the bill will also reduce the possibility of confusion. It will ensure that the ew new single power of arrest will continue to be contained in section 1 of the bill.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to group 2. Amendment 83, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 6
and 8.

Michael Matheson: Amendments were passed at stage 2 to implement the recommendations of the independent advisory group on stop and search, which was chaired by John Scott QC. The bill will introduce a new code of practice after a period of consultation. When that code of practice comes into effect, the current practice of non-statutory, or consensual, stop and search will end.
From that point on, searches by the police of people not in police custody will be carried out only where there is a statutory authority or a warrant to do so.

I have been keen to build consensus on this important issue, and since stage 2 I have continued to engage with members of the Justice Committee. I thank members for the constructive way in which they have approached our discussions and I look forward to continuing that engagement as we consult on the draft code of practice.

To complement the provisions that were added at stage 2, I have lodged amendments to address two potential gaps in powers. Section B1 gives police the power to search a person before that person is transported under a statutory power or under warrant from one place to another. That search must be only for the purpose of making sure that the person does not have anything on them that could cause harm to that person or to any other person.

However, there are occasions on which a person may be transported voluntarily from one place to another. There is currently no statutory power to search such a person. Amendment 6 will therefore allow the police to search a person in very limited circumstances. Accordingly, as long as the person is to be or is being transported, and that transport is necessary with respect to that person’s care and protection, the police will have a limited power of search. The power of search is limited so that it can be used only for the purpose of making sure that the person does not have any item on them that could cause harm to themselves or to another. The power could be used, for example, in transporting a person with mental health issues from their home or from any other non-public place to a hospital.

Amendment 6 has been narrowly drafted to ensure that only those who are being genuinely transported for the purpose of ensuring their care can be searched, and even then only in circumstances to ensure their own safety and that of others.

Amendment 83 is a technical amendment. Amendment 8 addresses another potential gap in statutory search powers. Police officers are often involved in carrying out searches as a condition of entry to sports grounds and other premises or events. The bill as it stands would make that unlawful. Amendment 8 therefore allows the police to search people as a condition of entry at relevant premises and events. Again, that is limited, and it is only for the purposes of ensuring the health, safety or security of people there. That is subject to specific conditions so that the power to search is not too general.

The premises or event must be open to members of the public; entrance must be controlled by the occupier or organiser; the occupier or organiser must have imposed a condition of entry that the person consents to being searched; and the person must inform the constable that they consent to being searched.

I move amendment 83.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): When I first read amendment 6, I was concerned that it seemed to be cast quite widely. I am therefore grateful for the cabinet secretary's reassurances this afternoon. However, if someone is being voluntarily transported to hospital, they can surely voluntarily undergo a search. Amendment 6 could perhaps be more precise to make it absolutely clear that it relates to a very small set of specific circumstances.

On amendment 8, when I consulted experts at stage 2 there were mixed views as to whether an amendment would be required to provide for searches to be undertaken at the entrance to events and venues. I note that the equivalent provisions in the PACE—Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984—codes in England and Wales are arguably tighter, specifying that an exception to the rules on consensual searches can be made where it “applies to searches of persons entering sports grounds or other premises carried out with their consent given as a condition of entry”.

How often are the police currently involved in those activities? Would the cabinet secretary expect these powers to be used sparingly—for example, in the provision of the robust security that is required for high-profile events such as the Commonwealth games and the Ryder cup?

Does the cabinet secretary expect that the powers that are set out in amendment 8 would be used regularly at a local level—for example, for those who are entering pubs or nightclubs? After all, in Aberdeen we have seen the police undertake unannounced drugs tests at the doors of nightclubs against the wishes of some owners. Will that become the norm under amendment 8?

We need assurances that the code of practice will be set out when those powers should be used and that event organisers will always have the final say on whether the police turn up to conduct those searches.

Finally, will the use of searches at those events and venues be included in the figures that are reported by Police Scotland or the Scottish Police Authority so that the public can understand when those powers are being deployed and can be assured that they are being used responsibly?

Alex Salmond (Aberdeenshire East) (SNP): It is admirable that the cabinet secretary is looking for consensus but I would like to hear a bit more about whether he feels that the powers and amendments will be sufficient to keep the public safe from harm.

I am particularly concerned about knife crime. During my early years as First Minister, there was an epidemic of knife crime in Scotland and far too many young people ended up as victims to that epidemic. Members might remember that it was a significant issue in the 2011 Scottish elections. As various people around the chamber tried in good faith to tackle that issue, they found themselves driven into more and more extreme positions on the penalties that might be proposed as a deterrent to knife crime. One of the turning points of the election was when the Labour policy was portrayed as wanting a long custodial sentence for anyone who was caught in the possession of any instrument whatsoever, even if it was a garden implement. I well remember that point in the election campaign.

My concern is that there is in my mind a strong correlation between the decline in knife crime in Scotland, and therefore the casualties and deaths resulting from knife crime, and the police’s use of stop and search powers.

In the report of the advisory group on stop and search, John Carnochan, a police officer who does nothing other than look for a range of ways to tackle the fundamental evils in society and who has elicited praise from all sides of the chamber on many occasions because of the various pioneering efforts that he has been engaged in, notes that non-statutory stop and search was appropriate for the time in which it was being deployed.

My question to the cabinet secretary follows. I would have liked to see the advisory group do far more analysis of the impact of stop and search on knife crime. Knife crime is mentioned three times in the advisory group’s report. In contrast, alcohol and drink is mentioned 16 times and it has an entire subsection to itself. I am concerned about the problems of underage drinking, drinking in society generally, and the various measures that have been brought forward to deal with that. I would love to see minimum pricing come in in this country to tackle that fundamental evil. However, I am really concerned to know whether stop and search powers have been effective in reducing knife crime and the number of deaths of young people in this country.

When the cabinet secretary is closing, I would like him to say whether he is absolutely satisfied that nothing in the change of powers will change the downward trajectory of knife crime in Scotland. We have seen much less use of stop and search in England in recent times and we are now seeing a rising level of knife crime in England and Wales. I want to be absolutely certain that everything that is being done is being done with that as the principal motivation.

Of course, members will be concerned about all sorts of other matters, but I am sure that no member will want to do anything other than make absolutely sure that the powers that will be available to the police will be the maximum necessary to ensure that knife crime continues to decline in Scotland. It is a great social evil, which consumed members’ attention so recently, and rightly so, because of the damage that it inflicted on communities and families across this country. We need the police to have the powers that will enable them to make certain that safety is uppermost.

My final point—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I must hurry you, Mr Salmond.

Alex Salmond: In that case, I will sit down.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): I have a brief comment to lend the cabinet secretary my support for amendment 6. The amendment is a proportionate suggestion that will provide protection to the individual, to officers and to the wider public. Most important, it will be on a statutory footing and that is how I want to see all searches being undertaken.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): At the beginning of Mr Salmond’s speech, I was a bit concerned to find myself agreeing with him. He managed to break the consensus after a while, so I got back to my normal position. I agree that it is important to be able to keep the public and police officers safe. Recently, we have seen some appalling incidents internationally, and there are circumstances in which powers have to be in place to keep the public safe. We will therefore support the Government on the matter.

Michael Matheson: First, I will deal with the points that Alison McInnes made. Amendment 6 is an attempt to address the matter in a proportionate way and protect the safety of the individual, police officers and members of the public, and it has been drafted in a specific way in order to fulfil that function. It will also be regulated by the code of practice that will be in operation, so there is an additional safeguard in how the provision will operate.

Alison McInnes also mentioned the matter that is covered by amendment 8. Part of the issue is that, as she identified, there are mixed views on the matter. We are making the statutory provision to ensure that there is absolute clarity in the area and that there can be no grey areas in the powers that the police have.

On how it will be included in the calculation of the detail that is held on stop and search, it should be kept in mind that the vast majority of searches at events and venues are conducted by people who are not police officers, such as event security officers. The aim is to ensure that, where the police are responsible for entrance to particular events, they have the power. As things stand, they would potentially not have the power in such circumstances.

Again, that area will be regulated by the code of practice when it is operated by the police, and we will look to see how it can be captured in the data that is to be taken forward overall in regulating stop and search.

I turn to the number of important points that Alex Salmond raised. I fully endorse his view about the need to ensure that the police have the necessary statutory powers to be able to undertake action that can help to reduce things such as knife crime. There is absolutely no doubt that, since 2006-07, there has been a dramatic reduction in the level of knife crime in Scotland overall. In particular, there has been a significant reduction in the west of Scotland, which has a correlation in that it has resulted in a significant reduction in the number of homicides.

Over the past few years, there has been a significant reduction in the amount of stop and search that Police Scotland has undertaken on a consensual, non-statutory basis. The statistics show that. There has been a significant drop-off over the past three years, and during that time knife crime has continued to decline. The key thing is to ensure that the police have the right statutory powers to intervene as and when they think it is appropriate to search someone, and to ensure that they are using the right type of intelligence for that purpose.
I am confident that, given the code of practice and the consideration that the advisory group gave to the matter, the police will have the necessary powers to allow them to continue that work, and to continue to ensure that we drive down knife crime and the problems that are associated with it.

I add that tackling knife crime goes much wider than stop and search. The no knives, better lives programme has been instrumental in our schools and local communities in changing attitudes around such crime, and the mentors in violence prevention programme has also been crucial in helping to change young people's attitudes to carrying sharp weapons and other offensive weapons.

I am confident that the combination of different factors, through the statutory powers that the police will have and those additional measures, will allow us to continue to see a reduction in knife crime overall.

Alex Salmond: I accept that point, which is why I praised John Carnochan. However, one of the key aspects of reducing knife crime is preventing youngsters from carrying knives for protection because they believe that other youngsters will have them. Stop and search was extremely influential in giving people—almost—a guarantee that there would not be widespread carrying of knives because of the extensive use of stop and search. Perhaps the cabinet secretary will address that point.

Michael Matheson: I agree. A big part of the challenge in dealing with the issue around the stop and search provisions was tackling the issue of gang culture. That particularly pervaded parts of west central Scotland, where there was a culture that a person was part of a gang and it was expected that they should carry a weapon.

There is no doubt that some of the approaches that have been used around stop and search have assisted in helping to deal with that issue and reduce its incidence. However, the statutory powers that the police will have for searching people in those circumstances will allow them to continue to undertake that type of work on the basis of intelligence. The police will still have the scope to be able to do that, but they will do so on a statutory footing. Given the advisory group’s consideration of the issue and the fact that we have seen over the past three years a significant reduction in consensual, non-statutory stop and search being undertaken by the police, I am confident that we will continue to see a marked reduction in knife crime and in homicide in Scotland overall.

We want to ensure that the police have the necessary statutory powers to continue that work. I believe that the combination of the provisions that we are making for the police—the statutory powers and the code of practice, which will also be consulted on and which the Parliament will have an opportunity to consider—will allow us to ensure that the police continue to have the necessary powers.

Amendment 83 agreed to.

Amendments 6 and 7 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

After section B1
Amendment 8 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section C1—Duty to consider child’s best interests
Amendment 9 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Before section D1
The Deputy Presiding Officer: Before we move to group 3, I point out that we are very tight for time today.

Amendment 10, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendment 32.

Michael Matheson: At stage 2, an amendment was passed that would oblige the Scottish Police Authority to include stop and search data in its annual report. I agree that that information should be published, but I consider it more appropriate for there to be an obligation on Police Scotland to publish it than on the SPA. Amendment 10 will therefore impose a duty on Police Scotland to publish stop and search data annually, and amendment 32 will remove the provision that would place that duty on the SPA.

I move amendment 10.

Alison McInnes: As the cabinet secretary said, amendments 10 and 32 build on one of my successful stage 2 amendments. The bill as amended at stage 2 will require the SPA to provide an account of the use of stop and search in its annual report to Parliament. The cabinet secretary’s amendment 10 will break that link, and it will mean that the figures will not be reported directly to Parliament or even to the SPA; rather, the data will simply be published.

There have, of course, been numerous scandals surrounding data on stop and search—not least, the so-called consensual searches of under-12s. The national force told the BBC that more than 200 children had been searched in the six months after the instruction went out. Police chiefs subsequently revised that number down to 18, but then it went back up to 83, according to Her Majesty’s inspector of constabulary in Scotland.
The police reviewed and recategorised stop and search figures again and again, but still could not get them straight for either Parliament or the SPA, and that has caused police inspectors to declare that they have no confidence in the data. Given that record, does not the cabinet secretary think that there is merit in an accountability framework that encourages the SPA to scrutinise the figures before they are reported in turn to Parliament?

Michael Matheson: I have listened carefully to what Alison McInnes has had to say on this issue. I would, of course, expect the data that are published by Police Scotland to be fully considered before being placed in the public domain. However, it is appropriate that the body that is responsible for collating the data is the body that actually reports the information and makes it publicly available. There is absolutely no doubt that the SPA will want to scrutinise the information and might want to consider its accuracy, and I have no doubt that Parliament will also want to consider the information.

I am very conscious that if Police Scotland were to publish data that were then passed to the SPA, and the SPA subsequently changed the data, there would be members in here—as tends to be the case when it comes to debating issues around policing in Scotland—accusing the SPA of manipulating the data that Police Scotland had published. I therefore think that it is important that we ensure that the data that the police publish are as accurate as possible. I have no doubt that the SPA will want to scrutinise the data, and to consider how accurate the information is and how it is used by the police to inform decisions that they make about future policy in such areas.

Amendment 10 agreed to.

Section D1—Provisions about possession of alcohol

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to group 4. Amendment 11, in the name of Dr Elaine Murray, is grouped with amendments 12, 84, 1 and 2. I point out that if amendment 1 is agreed to, I cannot, because it would be pre-empted, call amendment 13, which has already been debated with group 1.

15:30

Elaine Murray: Queen’s counsel John Scott’s review of stop search by Police Scotland has largely been implemented by amendments at stage 2, as we have heard. However, Mr Scott felt that there needed to be further consultation on whether Police Scotland should have a statutory power to stop and search young people under 18 who may be in possession of alcohol. Therefore, the bill will enable Scottish ministers to make regulations to give police officers the statutory power to search under-18s for possession of alcohol if the consultation suggests that that would be desirable. The ability of ministers to make such regulations will lapse in two years if it is not used.

Some concern about the provision was expressed at stage 2: the Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland in particular was concerned that ministers were prejudging the consultation results and that any such regulations might inadvertently criminalise under-18s who are caught in possession of alcohol and result in inappropriately high numbers of under-18s being subjected to statutory stop and search. At stage 2, I suggested that a way around those concerns might be to make changes in the regulations on stop and search of under-18s for possession of alcohol subject to the super-affirmative procedure.

Amendments 11 and 12 have been drafted for me by the Government’s bill team, for which I thank the cabinet secretary. Amendment 11 specifies that, in addition to the public consultation, the chief constable, the Scottish Human Rights Commission and the Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland must receive a copy of proposed regulations, as should any other person whom the Government considers to be appropriate.

Amendment 12 requires that the Scottish Government, on laying any draft instrument before Parliament, must also make available its reasons for wanting to make regulations, as well as a summary of responses to the public consultation and the representations that have been made by the specified people to which a copy of the regulations were sent. That will ensure that Parliament is fully informed of any concerns about potential regulations on statutory stop and search for possession of alcohol before deciding whether to agree to them.

Alison McInnes’s amendment 84 is similar to my amendment. However, she does not specify that the Scottish Human Rights Commission and the Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland must receive a copy of the draft regulations. In that respect, my amendments are more robust. Her amendment would also require ministers to have regard to resolutions of Parliament and to committee reports made within 60 days of the instruments’ being laid. That is unnecessary, because ministers would be unable to pass the regulations without the recommendation of the Justice Committee—or appropriate committee—and Parliament’s agreement.

Amendment 1, in the name of Alison McInnes, would remove section D1, which will empower ministers to make regulations on stop and search of young people for the possession of alcohol.
Therefore, if the consultation results were such that the police ought to have the power to stop and search young people and children for alcohol, primary legislation would be required to implement the consultation recommendations.

All the other recommendations of the Scott review are being implemented through legislation, so it seems to be sensible to provide in this bill the power to introduce regulations that might be suggested by further consultation.

Alison McInnes: Elaine Murray has made reference to the Scott review recommendations. Does she agree that it did not recommend that provision?

Elaine Murray: The Scott review did not recommend the provision, but it recommended consultation. Amendment 11 is a mechanism for taking forward the results of that consultation, if the results of the consultation come out in favour of stop and search for possession of alcohol.

I am afraid that we will not be supporting Alison McInnes’s amendments. Her amendment 2 is consequential on agreement to her amendment 1.

I move amendment 11.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I call Alison McInnes to speak to amendment 84 and the other amendments in the group.

Alison McInnes: As the cabinet secretary will be aware, although it is not an offence for children to be in possession of alcohol, officers have the power to confiscate it. Why, then, is the Government intent on paving the way for the creation of a search power in relation to an activity that is not illegal? That is a reckless and, to be frank, dangerous precedent for Parliament to set, and it risks a return to legitimising and normalising stop and search, which has been entirely discredited.

The case for creating search powers for alcohol has not yet been made. According to Dr Kath Murray, between June and August 2015, 90 per cent of underage alcohol detections resulted from statutory powers of search—powers that are available to the police. Just 7 per cent resulted from non-statutory searches.

John Scott QC’s review group did not request the provision. The majority of the group concluded that there is no gap. The Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland says that the approach is premature; Children 1st said that it could lead to the criminalisation of children.

Today, I am presenting members with two options. My preference is for members to back amendments 1 and 2, which would remove section D1 entirely. Secondary legislation should be used to establish comparatively minor details, but the creation of potentially sweeping police search powers is anything but minor, so it is no way to legislate for something so important. Despite the justice secretary’s assurances, every member should know that an order-making power leaves no real scope for proper parliamentary scrutiny and, as it stands, the creation of the new power of search for alcohol would be at the behest of just a few committee members.

Given our constituents’ experience of stop and search during the past two and a half years, members must surely recognise the need for both evidence and caution. The creation of new search powers must be the subject of in-depth consultation, keen democratic scrutiny and rigorous debate. That is why I ask members, if they do not back amendments 1 and 2, at least to support amendment 84, which would make the introduction of new search powers subject to the super-affirmative procedure.

If section D1 is unamended, there is a real risk that Parliament will allow our young people once again to be disproportionately targeted. They might once again be the subject of intrusive mass searches that contravene their human rights. If it is unamended, the section could allow the return by the back door of the discredited so-called consensual searches.

Michael Matheson: I am content to support amendments 11 and 12, which were lodged by Elaine Murray, and I thank her for lodging them. The amendments require that, as part of the existing requirement for consultation on any regulations allowing the search of children for alcohol, key stakeholders including the Commissioner for Children and Young People Scotland and the Scottish Human Rights Commission will be sent copies of draft regulations. In addition, they will require ministers, when laying such regulations in Parliament, to lay a statement that summarises the responses to the consultation and gives the reasons for making the regulations. Amendments 11 and 12 will ensure that the role of key stakeholders in the consultation process is enhanced, and that Parliament is fully informed of the consultation that we carry out, the responses that we receive and our reasons for laying the regulations. The regulations are, of course, already subject to affirmative procedure. I believe that the provisions in the amendments will further enhance their necessary parliamentary scrutiny.

Amendments 1 and 2, which were lodged by Alison McInnes, would delete section D1; that would remove the provisions that allow regulations to be laid. I cannot support those amendments. Section D1 does not pre-empt our consultation on whether there should be a power to search children for alcohol. I assure members that the purpose of the consultation will be to gather views on whether there is a need to legislate at all. We will also seek views on whether such a power would have any detrimental effects on children and/or their relationship with the police.

We will consult stakeholders, including John Scott QC and organisations that represent children’s interests, when we draft the consultation paper. If, after consultation, it was decided that such a power is necessary, I would wish to seek Parliament’s consent to introduce that power in a timely manner. The effect of amendments 1 and 2 would be that we would, if the consultation identified a gap in powers, have no legislative vehicle to address that. I therefore urge Alison McInnes not to move amendments 1 and 2.

Amendment 84, which was also lodged by Alison McInnes, overlaps Elaine Murray’s amendments 11 and 12 and duplicates several of their provisions. It also duplicates provisions that are already in the bill, regarding publication of proposed regulations. Amendment 84 could therefore result in unclear and potentially confusing legislation because of the way it overlaps with and duplicates existing provisions. In addition, it requires that a consultation on proposed regulations must last for 60 parliamentary sitting days, which would take to 100 the total number of sitting days that would be applicable to the regulations. That could result in a significant delay in our ability to act in abolishing consensual stop and search, should the consultation identify a gap in powers that needs to be filled before that can take place. I therefore urge Alison McInnes not to move amendment 84.

Elaine Murray: I will wind up very briefly on the issue of criminalising children. If it is considered after the consultation that regulations should be made, their purpose would not be to criminalise children. The criminals are the people who supply alcohol to children, not the children themselves.

My amendments provide the necessary degree of consultation and democratic accountability. I hope that Parliament will accept them.

Amendment 11 agreed to.

Amendment 12 moved—[Elaine Murray]—and agreed to.

Amendment 84 not moved.

Amendment 1 moved—[Alison McInnes].

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I remind members that, if amendment 1 is agreed to, amendment 13 will be pre-empted.

The question is, that amendment 1 be agreed to. Are we all agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division. I suspend the proceedings for five minutes to allow the division bell to rung and members to return to the chamber.

15:41
Meeting suspended.

15:46
On resuming—

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to the division on amendment 1.

For
Hume, Jim (South Scotland) (LD)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Scott, Tavish (Shetland Islands) (LD)

Against
Adam, George (Paisley) (SNP)
Adamson, Clara (Central Scotland) (SNP)
Allan, Dr Alasdair (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP)
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Baker, Claire (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Baker, Richard (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Baxter, Jayne (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Beattie, Colin (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP)
Biagi, Marco (Edinburgh Central) (SNP)
Bibby, Neil (West Scotland) (Lab)
Brodie, Chic (South Scotland) (SNP)
Brown, Gavin (Lothian) (Con)
Brown, Keith (Clackmannanshire and Dunblane) (SNP)
Buchanan, Cameron (Lothian) (Con)
Burgess, Margaret (Cunninghame South) (SNP)
Campbell, Aileen (Clydesdale) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Carlaw, Jackson (West Scotland) (Con)
Chisholm, Malcolm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab)
Coffey, Willie (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP)
Constance, Angela (Almond Valley) (SNP)
Crawford, Bruce (Stirling) (SNP)
Cunningham, Roseanna (Perthshire South and Kinross-shire) (SNP)
Davidson, Ruth (Glasgow) (Con)
Dey, Graeme (Angus South) (SNP)
Don, Nigel (Angus North and Mearns) (SNP)
Doris, Bob (Glascow) (SNP)
Dornan, James (Glasgow Cathcart) (SNP)
Dugdale, Kezia (Lothian) (Lab)
Eddie, Jim (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP)
Ewing, Annabelle (Mid Scotland and Fife) (SNP)
Ewing, Fergus (Inverness and Nairn) (SNP)
Fabiani, Linda (East Kilbride) (SNP)
Fee, Mary (West Scotland) (Lab)
Ferguson, Patricia (Glasgow Maryhill and Springburn) (Lab)
Fergusson, Alex (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con)
Findlay, Neil (Lothian) (Lab)
FitzPatrick, Joe (Dun dee City West) (SNP)
Fraser, Murdo (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Gibson, Kenneth (Cunninghame North) (SNP)
Goldie, Annabel (West Scotland) (Con)
Graha, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Grant, Rhoda (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)
Gray, lain (East Lothian) (Lab)
Henry, Hugh (Renfrewshire South) (Lab)
Hepburn, Jamie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (SNP)
Hilton, Cara (Dunfermline) (Lab)
The Deputy Presiding Officer: That takes us to group 5. Amendment 16, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 17 to 19, 21, 22, 25 to 27, 29, 30 and 77.

Michael Matheson: This group comprises minor and technical amendments.

Amendments 16 to 19 are minor technical amendments to provisions that relate to the contents of the code of practice.

Amendments 21 and 22 are minor technical amendments to provisions that relate to reviews of the code of practice.

Amendments 25 and 26 make technical changes to the provision in the bill that adds the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner to the list of organisations that are to be consulted on the draft code of practice.

Amendment 27 is a minor amendment to provisions about consultation on the draft code of practice to allow consultation to begin as soon as possible.

Amendments 29 and 30 are minor technical amendments to the provisions that bring the code into effect.

Amendment 77 provides for technical reasons why the sections of the bill that relate to the code of practice will commence on the day after the bill receives royal assent.

I move amendment 16.

Amendment 16 agreed to.

Amendments 17 to 20 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section H1—Review of code of practice

Amendments 21 to 23 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section I1—Legal status of code of practice

Amendment 24 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
Section J1—Consultation on code of practice
Amendments 25 to 28 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section K1—Bringing code of practice into effect
Amendments 29 to 31 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section L1—Police powers of search: annual reporting
Amendment 32 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 4—Arrested person to be taken to police station
The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to group 6. Amendment 33, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 34, 35, 37, 38, 53 and 79 to 81.

Michael Matheson: This group of amendments deals with the process by which the police can bring someone who is on bail back to court to have the person’s bail reviewed when the police suspect that they have broken or may break a bail condition.

Section 28 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 gives the police a power to arrest someone on suspicion that the person has broken or may break a bail condition. It also gives the police a power to continue the detention of someone whom they have arrested on some other basis if they come to suspect that the person has broken or may break a bail condition. In either case, section 28 of the 1995 act goes on to require the police to bring the person before a court for a bail review.

The Government’s intention now is that section 28 of the 1995 act should continue to operate as it presently does once the bill is passed and is in force. The approach that is being taken is slightly different from that which was set out in the bill as introduced. Therefore, amendment 79 removes the amendments that schedule 1 of the bill would have made to section 28 of the 1995 act, and amendments 80 and 81 put other amendments in their place.

Amendment 80 makes a series of amendments to the powers of arrest and detention under section 28 of the 1995 act to ensure consistency with the bill. New subsection (1ZA) will require officers who are not in uniform to produce identification when they arrest someone for breach of bail, just as section 2 of the bill will do in relation to arrests under section 1. New subsection (3A) of section 28 of the 1995 act will require a person who has been arrested for breach of bail to be released when they are no longer suspected of breaching bail, and proposed section 28(3B) of the 1995 act allows a person to be brought before a court for a bail review by television link.

Amendment 81 inserts a new section 28A into the 1995 act. That applies the protections in part 1 of the bill with modifications to people who have been arrested for breach of bail. It ensures the right to have intimation sent to a solicitor, and the protections in relation to child suspects will also apply to people who have been arrested for a breach of bail.

The other amendments in the group are minor changes to part 1 of the bill to explain its interaction with the section 28 process.

Amendment 33 would disapply the section 4 requirement to take an arrested person to a police station where the person was arrested for breach of bail but was then released under proposed section 28(3A) of the 1995 act because they were no longer suspected of breaching bail.

Amendments 34, 38, 35 and 37 are amendments to sections 7, 9, 11 and 12A of the bill to highlight the possibility of a suspect’s detention being continued under section 28(1A) of the 1995 act for the sake of bringing him before a court to have his bail reviewed.

Amendment 53 is a technical amendment to section 56 to recognise that section 28 of the 1995 act provides an alternative to section 18 of the bill as a statutory basis on which a person who has been arrested might be brought before a court.

I move amendment 33.

John Finnie: I am very happy to support the cabinet secretary’s amendments in group 6. Only last week in the Justice Committee, we heard a harrowing tale from someone about the effects of an offender who continually breached bail. What can the cabinet secretary do to ensure that, if we agree to the amendments, the courts will take breaches of bail more seriously?

Michael Matheson: It is, of course, important for the courts to be able to consider those matters at those particular times. One of the most important issues is that, when someone is in breach of bail, they are brought before the court quickly in order for it to come to a determination on the issues. However, I am sure that the member also respects the fact that it is a matter for the independent judiciary and sheriffs to determine what decisions they then make on the basis of the information that has been presented before them at a bail review hearing.

Amendment 33 agreed to.
Section 7—Authorisation for keeping in custody

Amendment 34 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 11—12 hour limit: general rule

Amendment 35 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 12A—Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to group 7. Amendment 3, in the name of Alison McInnes, is grouped with amendments 36 and 4.

Alison McInnes: Amendment 36, in the cabinet secretary’s name, is a step in the right direction, but it does not go anywhere near far enough to protect children, nor does it make exceptions for other vulnerable people.

At stage 2, the cabinet secretary, presenting almost no evidence to the committee, extended the length of time for which someone could be kept in custody from 12 hours to 24 hours in certain circumstances. Amendments 3 and 4 in my name would ensure that children and vulnerable adults could not be held in custody for more than 12 hours.

When the committee took evidence at stage 1 it heard from the Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland and the Scottish Human Rights Commission about the need for safeguards and the dangers of what at that stage was a 12-hour limit. I wrote to our witnesses after the cabinet secretary increased the limit to 24 hours and Tam Baillie replied, describing the change as excessive.

The Scottish Human Rights Commission told me that it is not aware of concrete evidence that a 24-hour detention period is necessary and described the lack of exemptions for vulnerable people as disappointing. Professor Alan Miller stressed that to comply with the European convention on human rights, “justification must be on the basis of evidence, not anecdote.”

He said:

“The Commission is unaware of any evidence which suggested that prior to” the introduction of the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, which quadrupled maximum detention periods,

“the police were systematically hampered in their efforts to investigate crime by the limits of the 6 hour detention period.”

If the Government opposes amendments 3 and 4 it will defy the Scottish Human Rights Commission and the children’s commissioner. It will also defy Lord Carloway’s recommendations, on which the bill is founded. It will deny the evidence; more important, it will deny the rights of children and vulnerable adults to be protected from heavy-handed police procedures.

I move amendment 3.

Michael Matheson: Amendments 3 and 4 would prevent any vulnerable adult or child suspect from being kept in custody for more than 12 hours. The Government is clear that the rights of such suspects must be protected and there are many measures in the bill to ensure that such people are not disadvantaged in the justice process.

However, setting a lower detention limit for children and vulnerable adults could prevent serious offences from being properly investigated and could place the public and vulnerable suspects at greater risk. Amendment 36, in my name, would instead increase the safeguards that must be in place before detention extensions can be granted for children.

It is vital that all offences can be properly investigated in the interests of justice, while protecting the rights of suspects. All constables will have a general duty to take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody. A test of necessity and proportionality must be satisfied whenever a sergeant makes an initial decision to keep a person in custody, an inspector carries out a six-hour custody review and an inspector decides whether to extend the detention limit from 12 to 24 hours. Those decision makers must be independent of the investigation.

The detention limit can be extended only if the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously and relates to a serious, indictable offence. The safeguards will ensure that the initial 12-hour detention period and any 12-hour extension period cannot operate as blanket detention periods for any suspect.

More than 80 per cent of people are released within the first six hours. It has therefore been argued that the detention limit should be six hours, but Lord Carloway recognised that “any timescales set must be sufficient to accommodate the effective investigation and prosecution of crime”, and concluded:

“There is therefore little, if any, doubt that a six hour maximum is unrealistic in many ... cases.”
16:00

It is necessary to hold some people beyond six hours. In a very small proportion of cases, it is also necessary to extend detention from 12 to 24 hours. Twenty-four hours is a low detention limit compared with many other jurisdictions, but I am satisfied that it is sufficient to ensure, for example, that vital interviews need not take place in the middle of the night and that police are able to examine certain crime scenes during daylight hours.

The bill recognises that children have needs that adults do not. It provides specific rights and support for children and creates an overarching duty on every constable to treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration. That new duty ensures that the wellbeing of the child suspect will be a primary consideration in any decision to keep them in custody.

Police standard operating procedures further protect the rights of children and vulnerable adults who are in custody. They will be updated before the bill is implemented.

It is standard policy that children should be brought into custody at a police station only when it is unavoidable and that they should be kept in custody for as short a time as possible. Children are held past six hours only in a small number of cases.

Vulnerable adult suspects are also entitled to additional support to ensure that they can understand and communicate effectively with the police. The definition of “mental disorder” covers a very wide spectrum, but the vast majority of individuals with mental disorders are fit to remain in police custody and are fit to be interviewed. In urgent situations and after psychiatric assessment, there are mechanisms to remove an individual from police custody if it is necessary. The majority of vulnerable adult suspects will be released within six hours.

It is unfortunately the case that under-18s and vulnerable adults are sometimes suspected of very serious offences, including murder and rape. Police Scotland figures indicate that 27 children have been detained for murder and culpable homicide since June 2010. The interests of justice require that such offences should be fully investigated before it is decided whether to charge or release a suspect. There is nothing to suggest that serious offences that involve child or vulnerable adult suspects can be properly investigated in a shorter period than offences that involve other suspects.

A child suspect could be too exhausted, traumatised or drunk to be interviewed immediately. Some types of crime scene need to be examined during daylight hours, even if an initial arrest took place at night. Other people, such as an appropriate adult, may need to attend interviews. It may take time to assess what support is required for a suspect.

Alison McInnes’s amendments would mean that under-18s and vulnerable adult suspects in serious cases would have to be released after 12 hours, regardless of whether the offence had been fully investigated. Compressing such investigations into a shorter period would not be in the interests of justice, the victims or the suspects themselves.

An absolute 12-hour limit would create pressure to carry out interviews during the 12-hour period in circumstances that might not be wholly fair to the suspect, for example, late at night. That could place the suspect’s human rights at risk and lead to prosecutions failing in serious cases because evidence had been unfairly obtained.

We need to provide the right protections for children and vulnerable adults without jeopardising investigations that are necessary to protect the public. I believe that the bill already provides sufficient protection for vulnerable adult suspects.

I recognise the Children and Young People’s Commissioner’s views and his suggestion that the detention limit for under-18s should be 12 hours. Having considered the types of complex cases involved and the additional protections for under-18s, I am firmly of the view that the Scottish Government’s amendment 36 provides an appropriate balance. It will require at least a chief inspector to authorise custody extensions for under-18s. Occasionally, it will be necessary to extend custody periods for children, but I believe that that power needs very close scrutiny before it is used. Children’s organisations, including the Children and Young People’s Commissioner’s office, will have the opportunity to inform the guidance during the implementation of that provision.

Elaine Murray: I am afraid that I disagree with Alison McInnes that there was little evidence that a 24-hour detention period is necessary in some cases. We heard evidence from Police Scotland illustrating that, although that period is not required on many occasions, it is required occasionally. My colleague John Pentland submitted amendments at stage 2 that were similar to the Government’s amendment 36.

It is unfortunate that my colleague Graeme Pearson is not able to be here as he has commitments to a constituent. However, I discussed the issue with him, as he has 30-odd years’ experience in the police. He agreed with many of the points that the cabinet secretary has made. On occasion, a young person or vulnerable necessary safeguards to protect children under the age of 18 in the rare circumstances in which they might be detained for in excess of 12 hours.

Alison McInnes: I remind members that, just a few years ago, the police managed with six hours of detention and that the fourfold increase is significant. It is pretty rich of the cabinet secretary to quote Lord Carloway, because he maintains that 12 hours is sufficient.

Members should also remember that the bill allows for investigative liberation, which seems to me to be a more appropriate way in which to deal with young people under difficult circumstances. I repeat that the Scottish Human Rights Commission and the Children and Young People’s Commissioner endorsed amendments 3 and 4. I am disappointed that the cabinet secretary has once again chosen to dismiss not only my arguments but their reasoned and principled pleas to protect children and vulnerable adults from intrusive and illiberal police custody procedures. He has once again chosen to reject a vital safeguard. I will press amendment 3.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): The question is, that amendment 3 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

For
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Harvie, Patrick (Glasgow) (Green)
Hume, Jim (South Scotland) (LD)
Johnstone, Alison (Lothian) (Green)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
Wilson, John (Central Scotland) (Ind)

Against
Adam, George (Paisley) (SNP)
Adamson, Clare (Central Scotland) (SNP)
Allan, Dr Alasdair (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP)
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Baillie, Jackie (Dumbarton) (Lab)
Baker, Claire (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Baker, Richard (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Baxter, Hayne (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Beamish, Claudia (South Scotland) (Lab)
Beattie, Colin (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP)
Biagi, Marco (Edinburgh Central) (SNP)
Bibby, Neil (West Scotland) (Lab)
Boyack, Sarah (Lothian) (Lab)
Brown, Gavin (Lothian) (Con)
Brown, Keith (Clackmannanshire and Dunblane) (SNP)
Buchanan, Cameron (Lothian) (Con)
Burgess, Margaret (Cunninghame South) (SNP)
Campbell, Aileen (Clydesdale) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Carlaw, Jackson (West Scotland) (Con)
Chisholm, Malcolm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab)
Coffey, Willie (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP)
Constance, Angela (Almond Valley) (SNP)
Cunningham, Roseanna (Perthshire South and Kinross-shire) (SNP)
Davidson, Ruth (Glasgow) (Con)
Amendment 3 disagreed to.

Amendments 36 and 37 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Amendment 4 not moved.

Section 9—Custody review

Amendment 38 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 14—Release on conditions

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 8 is on investigative liberation: release on conditions. Amendment 39, in the name of Elaine Murray, is grouped with amendment 85.

Elaine Murray: Amendments 39 and 85 relate to the conditions that are imposed when a suspect is released while further investigation is carried out by the police. As introduced, the bill read as if those conditions related to how the further investigation was to be carried out rather than to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period. At stage 2, I proposed amendments that would delete that reference and instead refer to the behaviour of the suspect during that period.

The bill changes the point at which a person is described in Scots law as being arrested. Arrest will occur when the person is held by the police under investigation rather than when they are charged with an offence. That will bring Scots law into line with the law in the rest of the United Kingdom. I and other members of the Justice Committee had expressed concerns that the public and the media would not be aware of the changes, and that there would be a perception that, if someone was arrested, they had been charged. Of course, everyone is presumed innocent under the law until proved otherwise but, unfortunately, that does not stop some of the mud sticking.
At stage 2, I proposed an amendment that would have prohibited the police from releasing the names of persons who had been arrested but not charged, but it turns out that, because persons who are held by the police under investigation are now termed as having been arrested, the release of their names is now covered by the Contempt of Court Act 1981. Therefore, that amendment was unnecessary.

However, I also wanted to ensure that complainers and potential victims can be informed that the person who may have committed an offence against them has been released on investigative liberation. Amendment 85 would enable a police officer to disclose information relating to an alleged offence to persons against whom the alleged offence has been perpetrated or, in the case of a person who has been killed, to their family. Amendment 85 is a probing amendment, as such circumstances might already be covered. However, in light of the fact that an arrested person who has been released on investigative liberation is subject to the Contempt of Court Act 1981, I seek the cabinet secretary’s assurance that that would not prevent alleged victims from being informed that the person who may have committed an offence against them has been released on investigative liberation.

I move amendment 39.

Michael Matheson: I am happy to support Elaine Murray’s amendment 39. It is important that investigative liberation conditions are tailored to meet the needs of the particular investigation. Any condition should be both necessary and proportionate for the purposes of ensuring the proper conduct of that investigation.

Investigative liberation will be used when an offence is still under investigation and a person has not been and may never be officially accused. Therefore, it is particularly important to ensure that any condition that is imposed is necessary for the investigation and does not unduly impact on the individual’s private life. Elaine Murray’s amendment 39 preserves that important link to the needs of the investigation while also making it clear that investigative liberation conditions can be intended to prevent interference with witnesses or with evidence. I am grateful to her for lodging the amendment and I am happy to support it.

16:15

Amendment 85 seeks to ensure the safety of alleged victims when a suspect is released on investigative liberation. I am sympathetic to the intention behind the amendment. Upholding the rights of alleged victims and ensuring their safety is crucial to ensuring a fair criminal justice system. That includes ensuring that, where they may be at risk, alleged victims are informed of a suspect’s release on investigative liberation and any relevant conditions.

Since stage 2, Scottish Government officials have met Police Scotland, the Crown Office, Scottish Women’s Aid and the advice, support, safety and information services together, or ASSIST, project in order to discuss the various aspects of victim notification that are required for undertakings and investigative liberation. The Crown Office and Police Scotland have provided reassurance that operational guidance will be produced regarding victim notification in those areas.

The Scottish Government has also set up an implementation group for part 1 of the bill. The group will include Police Scotland, the Crown Office, the Scottish Legal Aid Board and the Scottish Courts and Tribunals Service, with the first meeting due to take place on 16 December. The group will consider various aspects of the bill’s implementation, from staff training to updating guidance documents as a result of the bill. The Scottish Government also intends to invite other interested groups, including Scottish Women’s Aid, the ASSIST project, Barnardo’s Scotland, Children 1st and other stakeholders, to feed into the group with information and advice to assist the formulation of the guidance.

At stage 2, I was able to provide reassurance that Police Scotland would be updating its standard operating procedures to take account of the new provisions in the bill. The amendment that was agreed to at stage 2 that requires the Lord Advocate to produce a code of practice on investigative functions will also shape guidance in this area.

Consideration of how to adopt a consistent and proportionate approach to notification, bearing in mind existing arrangements that relate to the provision of information to alleged victims, will continue as part of the work to implement the provisions in the bill. I am content that amendment 85 is not required in order to ensure that appropriate information can be provided to those who may be at risk.

I ask Elaine Murray not to move amendment 85, but I am happy to support amendment 39.

Elaine Murray: I intend to press amendment 39. However, I am satisfied with the reassurances that we now have on the record with regard to the information that is provided to alleged victims, so I will not move amendment 85.

Amendment 39 agreed to.

After section 17

Amendment 85 not moved.
Section 20—Release on undertaking

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 9 concerns the rank and independence of a constable required to take certain decisions. Amendment 40, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 41, 42 and 45 to 50.

Michael Matheson: Amendments 41, 42 and 45 to 50 will ensure that important decisions to withhold or delay rights must be made by a constable who is of the rank of sergeant or above and who is independent of the investigation.

Chapters 4 and 5 of part 1 confer crucial rights on suspects, including, among others, the right to have a solicitor present during interview, the right to have someone else informed that they are in custody and the right to a private consultation with a solicitor at any time. There are also key provisions about access to persons under 18 who are held in police custody. There will be exceptional circumstances in which those rights cannot be delivered or need to be delayed. The bill already sets very demanding tests before that can happen.

I said at stage 2 that I would also consider raising the rank of constable required to make those decisions. I consider that raising the rank to at least that of sergeant will ensure that those decisions are made by constables with suitable rank, knowledge and expertise in custody-related matters. It will also be consistent with the role of sergeants in making initial decisions to keep people in custody. It would usually be during that initial authorisation process that any requests would be made to delay notifying solicitors or named persons, to interview without a solicitor being present or to restrict access to a person under 18 years of age.

The custody sergeant who makes the initial custody authorisation will be independent not only of the investigation but of the local policing division. I therefore consider that they would generally be best placed to consider those other rights-based decisions. The amendments set the minimum rank for those decisions. It will be open to Police Scotland to make more tailored provision in its standard operating procedures and to require officers of higher rank to make decisions in particular circumstances.

The code of practice on investigative functions to be issued by the Lord Advocate could also be used to provide the police with guidance relating to the interviewing of suspects, including the rare circumstances in which it may be permissible to interview without a solicitor present.

Amendment 40 is a minor drafting amendment to allow undertaking conditions to be set by a constable who is more senior than a sergeant. Currently, section 20 allows that to be done only by a sergeant and not by a constable of a higher rank.

I move amendment 40.

Amendment 40 agreed to.

Section 24—Right to have solicitor present

Amendments 41 and 42 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 25—Consent to interview without solicitor

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 10 is on minor consequential and drafting amendments. Amendment 43, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 51, 54 to 64, 74 to 76, 78 and 82.

Michael Matheson: Amendment 43 and the amendments with which it is grouped are minor and technical in nature. I will run through them briefly.

Amendment 43 changes the word “in” to “by” in section 25 for consistency with section 33.

Amendment 51 aligns the wording used in section 52A to describe the consequences of breaches of the code of practice on investigative functions with the wording in section 11 used in relation to breaches of the code of practice on searches.

In both cases, a court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings will be required to take into account any breach of the code when determining any question arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant. The wording used to explain that in section 11 was carefully considered by John Scott’s independent advisory group on stop and search, and it is appropriate to take the same approach in relation to the code of practice on investigations.

Amendment 54 removes section 64 from the bill. Its job has now been done by the Courts Reform (Scotland) Act 2014.

Amendment 55 substitutes the word “heading” for “cross-heading”.

Amendments 56 and 57 remove references to stipendiary magistrates. That office will be abolished on 1 April next year when the relevant provisions in the Courts Reform (Scotland) Act 2014 come into force.

Amendment 58 adjusts the way in which a solemn court is described, for consistency with the approach elsewhere.

Amendments 59 to 64 make changes in consequence of the Courts Reform (Scotland) Act...
2014, in particular by replacing references to the High Court that should now be references to the new Sheriff Appeal Court.

Amendments 74 to 76 cure some grammatical and stylistic errors in section 86, which were inadvertently introduced by amendments at stage 2.

Amendments 78 and 82 fix some cross-references in consequence of the moving of some provisions at stage 2.

I move amendment 43.

Amendment 43 agreed to.

Section 26—Questioning following arrest

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 11 is on questioning following arrest. Amendment 44, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is the only amendment in the group.

Michael Matheson: Amendment 44 is a technical amendment to clarify the position of questioning following arrest in section 26.

Section 26(2) provides that, where a person who has not been officially accused is in police custody, a constable may put questions to them in relation to the offence for which they are in custody. There is currently a common-law rule that limits police powers to interview a suspect about the offence for which they have been arrested.

At present, suspects are questioned while detained under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995—section 14 detention—and are only arrested at the point of charge. Section 26(2) is intended to make it clear that, once section 14 detention is abolished and replaced with arrest under section 1 of the bill, it will still be possible for the police to interview someone who has not yet been charged. There was never any intention that section 26(2) would limit the power of the police to question a suspect in other circumstances or about other offences while in police custody.

Amendment 44 is intended to make it absolutely clear that section 26(2) removes only the common-law rule about interviewing people who have been arrested and does not otherwise limit the ability of the police to interview people. The police are already under a duty to ensure that all interviews are carried out in accordance with the protections in the bill, meet the common-law test of fairness and are also compliant with human rights obligations. Those rules ensure that interviews will not be unnecessarily long or oppressive in nature.

I move amendment 44.

Amendment 44 agreed to.

Section 30—Right to have intimation sent to other person

Amendments 45 and 46 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 32—Right of under 18s to have access to other person

Amendment 47 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 32A—Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

Amendment 48 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 36—Right to consultation with solicitor

Amendments 49 and 50 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 52A—Code of practice about investigative functions

Amendment 51 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 53A—Further provision about application of Part

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 12 is on power to modify application of part 1. Amendment 52, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is the only amendment in the group.

Michael Matheson: Amendment 52 is a technical amendment to a power added to the bill at stage 2. It will allow the provisions in part 1 to be disapplied or to be modified as they apply to persons who are arrested on a basis other than section 1 of the bill.

Section 1 creates a new single power for the police to arrest a person without a warrant on suspicion that the person has committed an offence. It will replace a mixture of common-law and specific statutory powers to arrest on suspicion of an offence without a warrant. The rest of part 1 of the bill goes on to set out the procedures and consequences when someone is arrested.

The police also have powers to arrest in other circumstances. They can, for instance, arrest people under the authority of a warrant, and they also have some statutory powers to arrest without a warrant that do not relate to suspected offences.

Most of the part 1 provisions apply to all arrests, not just to arrests under section 1. The power in section 53A, which was added to the bill at stage 2, allows ministers to tailor the application of part 1 to cases in which a person has been arrested for a reason that does not relate to an offence.

16:30

The point is that some of what part 1 says may need to be adjusted to make the bill work properly in those contexts. In some cases, it may be more appropriate to disapply it altogether. For example, if a witness is arrested under a warrant so that he or she can be brought to court, it would not make sense to have section 4 of the bill apply so that, instead of being taken straight to court, he or she is taken to the police station.

Section 53A, as added at stage 2, would allow part 1 to be disapplied or modified only in relation to people who are arrested otherwise than in relation to an offence. That may be too narrow. Amendment 52 will widen the power to cover other arrests that may be related to an offence but in relation to which it would not be appropriate to have the full set of part 1 provisions apply without some modification. One example might be where the court issues an arrest warrant solely to allow the police to take samples from an accused.

The amendment creates the flexibility to cater for such arrests and to disapply part 1 arrest provisions or to apply them with modifications.

I move amendment 52.

Amendment 52 agreed to.

Section 56—Meaning of police custody

Amendment 53 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

After section 56

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 13 is on the age of criminal responsibility. Amendment 86, in the name of Alison McInnes, is grouped with amendment 91.

Alison McInnes: My amendment 86 would raise the age of criminal responsibility from eight to 12. My amendment 91 specifies that that would occur only at least 18 months after royal assent. That would provide ministers with time to make any additional changes that the current advisory group, which was set up following my amendment at stage 2, recommends through secondary or even primary legislation.

Increasing the age of criminal responsibility to 12 would bring it into line with the age of criminal prosecution and would reflect the wealth of evidence that children should not come into contact with the justice system any earlier. To suggest that children as young as eight can be deemed responsible for their actions is completely out of touch with our understanding of their capacity and maturity.

Children can still receive convictions that require to be declared for decades or even for the rest of their lives. How is curtailing their life chances in that way getting it right for every child? The law must change and prevent that destructive response. Instead, we must address the source of children’s disturbing behaviour, whether that is trauma, neglect, maltreatment or abuse.

Scotland has the lowest age of criminal responsibility in Europe. Tam Baillie, the Children and Young People’s Commissioner, was right to say that criminalising children as young as eight has “long tarnished” our international reputation. It has also led to Scotland being reported to the United Nations.

The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child has stated that 12 is the “absolute minimum” that it expects. The Scottish Government told the UN committee that it would “do the right thing” and increase the age in the current session of Parliament. The fact that we are still trailing so far behind international best practice should shame and embarrass each one of us.

The fact that the Scottish National Party Government is picking and choosing which human rights to uphold sends a dreadful message, and the fact that it is not using the powers that it has at Holyrood to prevent violations of international law undermines its bid to block the UK Government’s attempt to abolish the Human Rights Act 1998.

The Scottish Parliament is not just free to do things better; it is bound by its founding documents to act in accordance with human rights legislation.

The cabinet secretary will no doubt seek to persuade Parliament to oppose my amendments, citing the group that he has set up. That is too timid, and I urge him to confirm today that it is inconceivable that he or his advisory group would suggest an age lower than 12 for criminal responsibility. If he does not want to support my amendments today, he needs to set out a clear legislative timetable for ending this national disgrace.

I move amendment 86.

Christine Grahame (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP): I sympathise with my Justice Committee colleague’s arguments. She rightly refers to the expert group that is considering the matter and is due to report in 2016. To clarify, under the age of eight, there is no legal capacity to commit a crime. Between the ages of eight and 12, a person cannot be prosecuted in the criminal courts.
There is an issue to be addressed here, but the Justice Committee did not take any evidence on it and it is far too substantial to deal with by way of amendment. Following the review, I hope that the Government will take cognisance and perhaps consider coming more into line with what we expect of other European countries.

As the member knows, my casting vote was against the amendment at stage 2 because there was insufficient evidence to support it. If there is sufficient evidence, I will be content to support it another time.

Elaine Murray: The thing I cannot understand is why in Scotland we have not already done this. We do not prosecute children who are under the age of 12 so why do we continue to consider children who are between the ages of 8 and 11 to be criminally responsible? As Alison McInnes said, Scots law is lagging behind much other good international practice.

Christine Grahame rightly said that the matter was not in the bill but this has been an issue for years and there is plenty evidence out there. It is time that we acted on that evidence and all that we have heard over the years. I urge members to support Alison McInnes.

John Finnie: I rise to support Alison McInnes. We do not need sympathy; we need action. We are told that we do not have evidence but, of course, we do have evidence in the advice of the children’s commissioner and the position of the UN.

The bill can be the vehicle for bringing us into line with everyone else and the 18 months that amendment 91 would afford would certainly give an opportunity to address all the other issues that would arise.

Roderick Campbell: I have every sympathy with Alison McInnes’s intention but I do not think that the bill is the right way to go about it. We heard evidence in the committee from Professor Leverick and Tam Baillie, the children’s commissioner, that the bill is not the right place to do it. I am grateful that the cabinet secretary has set up a working group. There are important issues still to be considered, such as the interrelation with children’s hearings. It is unfinished business and we need to get on with it.

Neil Findlay (Lothian) (Lab): We have just heard classic Christine Grahame there. As she did with the Offensive Behaviour at Football and Threatening Communications (Scotland) Bill and court closures she shows great sympathy but will slavishly follow the whips when they tell her what to do.

Michael Matheson: I welcome the opportunity to make a statement about a change to the minimum age of criminal responsibility. I thank Alison McInnes for lodging amendment 86.

Alison McInnes’s amendment was closely debated at stage 2. I make it clear that we are open to future change to the minimum age of criminal responsibility. Scotland has a proud record of promoting children’s rights, and it was this Government that raised the minimum age of prosecution to 12 years.

I acknowledge that the headline minimum age of criminal responsibility is damaging our standing as well as impacting on the life chances of young children. Amendment 86, however, does not address the policy or legislative and procedural implications of change, or offer any additional safeguards that might be required to respond to serious sexual or violent behaviour.

The advisory group, which I committed to establishing at stage 2, is up and running. Intensive work, focusing on disclosure, risk management, police powers, children’s hearings and victims’ issues, is under way. The issues are complex and the group is working at pace. The group meets next week and I expect to get an update before Christmas.

I understand that there is a strong commitment from all partners to addressing the underlying issues and the implications that would arise from a change. The plan is to make recommendations for consultation in early 2016.

This is a priority area and senior representatives from organisations that are responsible for children and how they interact with Scotland’s justice system are fully engaged in the process. They include the Children and Young People’s Commissioner Scotland, Together—Scotland’s alliance for children’s rights, Police Scotland and Victim Support Scotland. The terms of reference for the group and details of the membership have been published.

The responsible view to take here is that no change should be made to the minimum age of criminal responsibility without the implications of any proposed approach being properly co-produced, consulted on and scrutinised. The Children and Young People’s Commissioner for Scotland, Tam Baillie, has provided to all MSPs a briefing that confirms that, although he supports the sentiment behind Alison McInnes’s amendments, they run the risk of pre-empting the findings of the expert group and should not be supported.

Our intention is to publish a consultation in early 2016, once the advisory group’s report has been completed. The group is expected to report to ministers shortly after its meeting on 11 February. A change of this nature should be undertaken with full parliamentary involvement and scrutiny.
throughout all stages of primary legislation. I would strongly resist the temptation to support any amendment in respect of a change to the minimum age of criminal responsibility without having allowed the advisory group to complete its work.

Alison McInnes: Are you really telling the Parliament that it is possible that you, as justice secretary, would come back to the chamber and suggest that the age should be nine, 10 or 11? Really?

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Could members speak through the chair, please?

Michael Matheson: We have set up an independent advisory group to come back to us with key recommendations on what the age should be so that we can then take the matter forward. The member will recall that we were the Government that raised the prosecution age to 12 years. It is right that, having set up the independent advisory group, we allow it to complete its work and provide a report. A full public consultation can then be undertaken. I urge the Parliament to ensure that we take the matter forward in that way, and to reject the amendments.

Alison McInnes: The cabinet secretary said that Scotland has a proud record on human rights—well, it does not on this subject.

It is interesting that an approach that the cabinet secretary endorsed earlier—relating to a suspended introduction to do with stop and search for alcohol—is suddenly not appropriate here.

I am grateful for the support of other members in the chamber this afternoon and, indeed, of Aberlour Child Care Trust. I acknowledge the deliberations of the working group and its examination of the practicalities, but they should not prevent us from making good on the minister’s promises to the UN.

Bruce Crawford (Stirling) (SNP): I want to get to the bottom of this, so I wonder whether Alison McInnes could outline for me what consultation on the proposal has taken place and how we can make it cohesive with the rest of Government policy. That would help me to make up my mind. [Laughter.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, please.

Alison McInnes: I have lost count of the number of times that this Parliament has discussed the subject and taken evidence on it. The SNP’s timidity on this is astonishing. [Interruption.]

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Order, please. Order!

Alison McInnes: The cabinet secretary’s rhetoric seeks to conceal the fact that the SNP has been in power for eight years now and two major criminal justice bills have come and gone. It could have introduced dedicated primary legislation at any time to end the systematic violations of internationally recognised human rights. It has not been devoid of chances; it has been devoid of political will. If it had not been for my amendment at stage 2, there would not even be an advisory group.

The Government is failing to meet the demands of the UN Human Rights Committee but, more important, it is failing some of Scotland’s most vulnerable children. This is the last chance to change that in the current session of Parliament, and that is why I press amendment 86 and challenge the Government to finally put its efforts into ending this national shame.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is, that amendment 86 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

For

Baker, Claire (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Baker, Richard (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Baxter, Jayne (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Beamish, Claudia (South Scotland) (Lab)
Bibby, Neil (West Scotland) (Lab)
Boyack, Sarah (Lothian) (Lab)
Chisholm, Malcolm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab)
Fee, Mary (West Scotland) (Lab)
Ferguson, Patricia (Glasgow Maryhill and Springburn) (Lab)
Findlay, Neil (Lothian) (Lab)
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Grant, Rhoda (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)
Gray, Iain (East Lothian) (Lab)
Harvie, Patrick (Glasgow) (Green)
Henry, Hugh (Renfrewshire South) (Lab)
Hilton, Cara (Dunfermline) (Lab)
Hume, Jim (South Scotland) (LD)
Johnstone, Alison (Lothian) (Green)
Kelly, James (Rutherglen) (Lab)
Lamont, Johann (Glasgow Pollok) (Lab)
Macdonald, Lewis (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Macintosh, Ken (Eastwood) (Lab)
Malik, Hanzala (Glasgow) (Lab)
Marra, Jenny (North East Scotland) (Lab)
McArthur, Liam (Orkney Islands) (LD)
McCulloch, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McDougall, Margaret (West Scotland) (Lab)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
McMahon, Michael (Uddingston and Bellshill) (Lab)
McMahon, Siobhan (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McNeil, Duncan (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab)
McTaggart, Anne (Glasgow) (Lab)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Pentland, John (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab)
Rowley, Alex (Cowdenbeath) (Lab)
Scott, Tavish (Shetland Islands) (LD)
Simpson, Dr Richard (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Smith, Drew (Glasgow) (Lab)
Stewart, David (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)
Wilson, John (Central Scotland) (Ind)
Against
Adam, George (Paisley) (SNP)
Adamson, Clare (Central Scotland) (SNP)
Allan, Dr Alasdair (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP)
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Beattie, Colin (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP)
Biagi, Marco (Edinburgh Central) (SNP)
Brodie, Chic (South Scotland) (SNP)
Brown, Gavin (Lothian) (Con)
Brown, Keith (Clackmannanshire and Dunblane) (SNP)
Buchanan, Cameron (Lothian) (Con)
Burgess, Margaret (Cunninghame South) (SNP)
Campbell, Aileen (Clydesdale) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Carlaw, Jackson (West Scotland) (Con)
Coffey, Willie (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP)
Constance, Angela (Almond Valley) (SNP)
Crawford, Bruce (Stirling) (SNP)
Cunningham, Roseanna (Perthshire South and Kinross-shire) (SNP)
Dey, Graeme (Angus South) (SNP)
Don, Nigel (Angus North and Mearns) (SNP)
Eadie, Jim (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP)
Ewing, Annabelle (Mid Scotland and Fife) (SNP)
Ewing, Fergus (Inverness and Nairn) (SNP)
Fabiani, Linda (East Kilbride) (SNP)
Fergusson, Alex (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con)
FitzPatrick, Joe (Dundee City West) (SNP)
Fraser, Murdo (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Gibson, Kenneth (Cunninghame North) (SNP)
Gibson, Rob (Caithness, Sutherland and Ross) (SNP)
Goldie, Annabel (West Scotland) (Con)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Hepburn, Jamie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (SNP)
Hyslop, Fiona (Linlithgow) (SNP)
Ingram, Adam (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP)
Johnstone, Alex (North East Scotland) (Con)
Keir, Colin (Edinburgh Western) (SNP)
Kidd, Bill (Glasgow Anniesland) (SNP)
Lamont, John (Ettrick, Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (Con)
Lochhead, Richard (Moray) (SNP)
Lyle, Richard (Central Scotland) (SNP)
MacAskill, Kenny (Cunninghame North) (SNP)
MacDougall, Angus (Falkirk East) (SNP)
MacDonald, Gordon (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP)
MacKenzie, Mike (Highlands and Islands) (SNP)
Mason, John (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP)
Matheson, Michael (Falkirk West) (SNP)
Maxwell, Stewart (West Scotland) (SNP)
McAlpine, Joan (South Scotland) (SNP)
McDonald, Mark (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP)
McGrigor, Jamie (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
McKelvie, Christina (Hamilton, Larkhall and Stonehouse) (SNP)
McLeod, Aileen (South Scotland) (SNP)
McLeod, Fiona (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (SNP)
McMillan, Stuart (West Scotland) (SNP)
Milne, Nanette (North East Scotland) (Con)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Neil, Alex (Airdrie and Shotts) (SNP)
Paterson, Gill (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)
Robertson, Dennis (Aberdeenshire West) (SNP)
Robison, Shona (Dundee City East) (SNP)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)
Salmond, Alex (Aberdeen East) (SNP)
Scanlon, Mary (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
Smith, Liz (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Stevenson, Stewart (Banffshire and Buchan Coast) (SNP)
Stewart, Kevin (Aberdeen Central) (SNP)
Sturgeon, Nicola (Glasgow Southside) (SNP)
Torrance, David (Kirkcaldy) (SNP)
Watt, Maureen (Aberdeen South and North Kincardine) (SNP)
Wheelhouse, Paul (South Scotland) (SNP)
White, Sandra (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP)
Yousaf, Humza (Glasgow) (SNP)

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 40, Against 75, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 86 disagreed to.

Section 64—Citation of jurors
Amendment 54 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

16:45

Section 67—First diets
Amendment 55 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 73—Sentencing under the 1993 Act
Amendments 56 to 58 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 76—Extending certain time limits: summary
Amendments 59 to 61 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 80—Advocation in summary proceedings
Amendment 62 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 81—Finality of appeal proceedings
Amendment 63 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

After section 81
Amendment 64 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Section 82A—Duty to undertake a child and family impact assessment
The Deputy Presiding Officer: We move to group 14 amendments, on children affected by parental imprisonment Amendment 87, in the name of Mary Fee, is grouped with amendments 88 and 89.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): I start by thanking the Justice Committee for supporting my original amendment at stage 2 of the bill process. I also thank the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, the Minister for Children and Young People and their officials for the very constructive dialogue that has enabled us to reach the stage that we are at today.

Evidence shows that children and young people affected by the imprisonment of a parent are particularly at risk of negative outcomes such as stigma, bullying, trauma and mental health problems. That issue has been raised previously in Parliament and addressing it has received cross-party support. There are an estimated 27,000 children in Scotland with a parent in prison, but an estimate is the best that we can do at the moment, as we have no way of systematically collecting or recording information about those children. Until we can accurately identify them and the impact on them of a parent being imprisoned, their needs will not be properly taken into account by local authorities and other public bodies, and they will continue to slip through the net.

Amendment 88, in my name, would place a duty on Scottish ministers to ensure that all individuals sent to custody are asked to provide information about dependent children. If children were identified during that process, information would be passed to the child’s named person. There would be a presumption that having a parent in prison was a potential wellbeing concern, and the named person would ensure that such children had a wellbeing assessment. That would lead to any necessary support being provided, as appropriate, under the provisions in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

Amendment 88 sets out proposed links between the child wellbeing provisions in the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 and the needs of children affected by parental imprisonment. The intention of amendment 88 is to ensure that Scottish ministers start to identify and collect data on the number of children affected by parental imprisonment. Again, that is one of the key issues that we need to address in order to provide appropriate support to such children.

Amendment 89 sets out the definitions that underpin amendment 88, including clarifying that “penal institution” means any prison—other than a military prison or police cell—any remand centre or any young offenders institution.

Amendment 87 would remove my previous amendment, which would be redundant.

Too often, the voices of children are lost in a justice system geared towards adult offenders; and too often, those children will end up in the justice system. Amendment 88 would make huge progress towards ensuring that those children are identified, their voices are heard and their needs are met. Scotland has the chance to be world leading in recognising and acknowledging the children affected by parental imprisonment—the silent victims of crime.

Through the cross-party group on families affected by imprisonment, of which I am the convener, we have sought to raise awareness of those children’s needs. We have had useful meetings with ministers, professionals and Scottish Prison Service representatives; we have also heard from affected families. That has all helped to build a cross-party consensus that we must do more to support these children; they cannot remain, as Barnardo’s Scotland puts it, the hidden victims of crime. My amendments are an important step on that journey. I would urge all members to support them.

I move amendment 87.

Christine Grahame: I rise in support of amendment 87. I congratulate Mary Fee on not just her thorough submission to the Justice Committee, which I am sure persuaded the cabinet secretary to change his mind about certain things, but her support for families affected by imprisonment. The member has made a huge inroad into that area. I also congratulate her on making strong the link between the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 and this bill. I know that, at one time, the Government was relying on that act. The member’s amendments would ensure that the link is embedded in the legislation. I have huge regard for her for doing that and I support her amendments.

Alison McInnes: I, too, commend Mary Fee for her work in this area. The Scottish Liberal Democrats welcome her amendments, which would encourage the identification of the 27,000 children who experience parental imprisonment in Scotland and, where necessary, the provision of co-ordinated support. Nonetheless, I would be grateful if the cabinet secretary could tell me whether the process would include an assessment of the impact of imprisonment on any dependent children, because it would be important that this does not simply become a box-ticking exercise. Would there be robust guidance? For example, would there be a code of practice for all the professionals involved? Would the framework also include training for staff in prisons?

Michael Matheson: I thank Mary Fee for bringing to light this very important subject at stage 2. I thank her again for her patience as we have worked to find a solution to ensure that children who may be affected by the imprisonment of their parent are appropriately supported.

The amendments in group 14 seek to remove the original amendment lodged at committee and to replace it with a version that we know would deliver improved outcomes for any child whose parent is sent to prison.
Amendments 88 and 89 complement the existing provisions on named persons in part 4 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014. The amendments seek to ensure that, when a person is imprisoned, information that they disclose about any child they parent can be shared with the child’s named person service provider.

The amendments will ensure that information provided will include the fact that the child’s parent is in prison, and any other information that may be relevant to the named person’s functions. That in turn will ensure that any wellbeing needs of a child with a parent in prison are properly assessed and that the child’s named person has the opportunity to consider whether any advice, information, support or services are necessary to help to promote, support and safeguard their wellbeing. That is consistent with the named person’s role under the 2014 act.

The amendments set out clearly how and when information should be passed and where the responsibility for that lies. I hope that members agree that, by working together, we have found an appropriate way forward that is in the best interests of children, and I hope that they will support the amendments.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I invite Mary Fee to wind up and indicate whether she intends to press or withdraw her amendment.

Mary Fee: I will be brief. I thank again the members of the Justice Committee who supported me at stage 2 and allowed me to progress my amendments to this stage: Alison McInnes, John Finnie, Margaret Mitchell and Margaret McDougall. In addition, it would be remiss of me not to acknowledge the tremendous work that Nicki Wray from Barnardo’s has done to progress us to this point. Without her tenacity we would not be here today.

I am grateful for the supportive comments of members across the chamber today. I am happy to continue the very constructive dialogue with the cabinet secretary and his ministerial team as we progress the provision in the amendments and work on the guidance and how we roll it out.

Amendment 87 agreed to.

After section 82B

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Group 15 is on support for vulnerable persons: appropriate adult services. Amendment 65, in the name of the cabinet secretary, is grouped with amendments 66 to 73.

Michael Matheson: Section 33 places a duty on the police to request support for vulnerable suspects in police custody in order to enable such individuals to understand what is happening and to communicate effectively. In practice, that support is delivered by people who are known as appropriate adults, who are specifically recruited for their communication skills, expertise and experience of working in the field of mental health. They are often social workers or health professionals.

The bill does not identify where responsibility for providing appropriate adults lies. When the bill was introduced, it was considered that the appropriate adult system was working well and that a light-touch approach should be adopted. However, the Justice Committee and various stakeholders have raised concerns about that, and about the accessibility and consistency of service provision, the exact remit of appropriate adults, and the funding for the service.

As I said at stage 2, I am sympathetic to the various issues that have been raised, which warrant serious and careful consideration. It is vital that we protect the interests of vulnerable persons, and it is clear to me that we need a new model to afford that protection to those who require it, and that the model must be sustainable over the long term.

At stage 2, I undertook to set out our proposed approach to addressing those issues at stage 3. Over the past two months, significant work has been undertaken, and in that time I have met Alison McInnes, who has a particular interest in the area, to discuss the progress that we have made to date.

A high-level options paper was issued on 24 September to those with a key interest at a national and local level, including Police Scotland, local authorities, the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland and Social Work Scotland, to inform the development of options for appropriate adult service provision. The paper sought views on viable options for a new model in relation to service delivery, training, support and guidance, inspection and oversight.

Constructive meetings have taken place with Police Scotland, the Mental Welfare Commission, the Care Inspectorate and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, and consensus is developing around the key delivery and oversight functions for any new model. However, it is clear that further work and engagement is required to ensure that any model that is put in place is truly effective and sustainable.

Our position on the provision of appropriate adult services in Scotland is very clear. We want to resolve the issues that have been raised and put in place a sustainable model, and we understand that that work must take place promptly. However, getting the model right is Absolutely vital, and it simply has not been possible to resolve all of the issues by stage 3. In particular, further discussions are required to fully address how the developing model will work in practice, what body or bodies are best placed to deliver the service, and how much it will cost.

It is crucial that we work collaboratively with those who deliver and utilise appropriate adult services, such as COSLA and Police Scotland, and I am determined to seek consensus if significant changes are to be made. To that end, the amendments in this group are designed to provide the flexibility that is required to put in place a new model once that vital work is complete.

Amendments 65 to 73 insert a package of regulation-making powers that will enable the Scottish ministers to place a duty on a person or persons to ensure adequate provision of appropriate adults; to provide robust oversight of any service, including assessing quality and making recommendations; and to provide effective training for those who actually deliver the service. The amendments also allow the scope of appropriate adult services to be revisited in the future, should that be necessary.

The regulation-making powers are broad, but I consider that that is necessary in order to provide the flexibility for us to act once a new model for appropriate adult services has been developed and agreed. Reflecting the significance of the proposed powers, a public consultation will be required before any regulations are made, and they will be subject to the affirmative procedure so that Parliament is given a proper opportunity to consider the proposed model.

The issues that have been raised in this area have not been straightforward, and I am grateful for the constructive input from Police Scotland, the Scottish appropriate adult network, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, local authorities, the Law Society of Scotland, the Justice Committee and many others throughout the bill process. I have listened carefully to the concerns that have been raised, and I believe that the amendments that are being proposed today will allow us to take the necessary steps to put in place a sustainable model for the long-term delivery of appropriate adult services in Scotland.

I move amendment 65.

Alison McInnes: I raised the matter in a probing amendment at stage 2, and I am grateful that the cabinet secretary has engaged with me on the issue and has sought to address the concerns that I raised.
It is important to stress that such records are confidential between the medical profession and the patient and that it is well established that all patients have a right to privacy in relation to their records under article 8 of the European convention on human rights. There is a hearing to determine the application and, if the complainant or the haver of the documents wishes to oppose the application for recovery of the confidential records, the next stage is to instruct legal representation to represent their interests before the court at the hearing. That recognises that complainants have a right to be heard.

Although it is competent to take that approach in Scotland, it is not the usual practice for the victim in a criminal case to be legally represented at such application hearings. Rape Crisis Scotland, Scottish Women’s Aid and other support groups for victims of sexual crime and domestic abuse state that the reason for that is the lack of legal aid. I ask members to compare that with the situation in England and Wales, where legal aid is available to complainants on the basis that, were it not, the complainant’s right to privacy under article 8 could be infringed.

In England and Wales, the right to be heard has developed through case law and can be found in the Crown Prosecution Service’s guidelines. In Scotland, the argument has been advanced that the Crown Office will take into account the complainant’s situation and look out for his or her interests. However, as Roddy Campbell stated in committee at stage 2, the Crown represents the public interest, not the complainant’s personal interest. That is an important point and is why it is essential that legal aid be made available in such cases to allow the complainant to be represented. It is surely totally unacceptable that rape victims in Scotland whose case proceeds to prosecution will not have their right to be heard through legal representation protected unless they have the means to provide for that, whereas their counterparts in England and Wales have such a right.

The amendment would not require a change in the law; it would exact what already happens in practice. Crucially, it would allow access to justice and ensure that complainants in rape and violent sexual assault cases could enforce the right that they already have under article 8 of the ECHR. If the cabinet secretary and the Parliament genuinely want to improve conviction rates in such vexing serious sexual assault and rape cases, they will support the amendment.

I move amendment 90.

Roderick Campbell: I declare an interest as a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

Margaret Mitchell referred to my comments at stage 2. Her comments about the distinction between the public interest and the complainant’s personal interest are right. However, this is a matter of principle and something that we need to get right.

At stage 2, we rejected an amendment that dealt with sexual history—for want of a better term—in relation to section 275 of the 1995 act, and amendment 90 is a kind of reformulation of that. Amendment 90 is important. I understand that the cabinet secretary has moved on since the Bonomy report, in so far as one of the matters that are being investigated is the history of such applications in practice. That research could certainly influence our view. It is also important to remember that Lord Bonomy made no recommendation on independent legal representation, so the matter is still in the air.

There is one point that the amendment does not really deal with. Margaret Mitchell referred to rape cases. The proposed amendment is to section 301A of the 1995 act, which simply refers to cases in the sheriff court, be they solemn or summary. That would not include rape cases, which can be heard only in the High Court. Therefore, the Government should not be happy to support the amendment.

Finally, there is the important issue of where the money would come from for all this, particularly at a time of considerable challenge to the legal aid budget and other demands on public resources.

Elaine Murray: In the past, I have resisted similar amendments—to the Victims and Witnesses (Scotland) Bill and to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill at stage 2. To be honest, when I read the previous amendments, I was never quite certain how things would work in practice and whether we were talking about legal representation in court. The situation would become quite difficult if there was a legal representative of the victim in court, plus the Crown representing the public interest and somebody representing the defence.

Amendment 90 is a lot clearer than the previous amendments were about how it would operate. It is more explicit and a lot tighter in the matters that it deals with. The Government has written to committee members about research on sections 274 and 275 of the 1995 act, but the amendment is specifically about access to medical records that ought to be confidential to a victim who has been a patient. I know that the amendment has a lot of support from victims groups and Justice Scotland, which probably has a fair handle on the legal issues that are involved.

I am therefore inclined to support the amendment. We need to make progress on how we support victims of such offences and on addressing how their privacy is infringed or can be infringed at times. Enabling them to have legal advice on what may and may not be released could well be beneficial. After considerable discussion with many people over the past few days, we are inclined to support the amendment.

Alison McInnes: I support Margaret Mitchell’s amendment 90 and commend her for the sterling work that she has done to promote the needs of victims in such cases. I welcome the fact that, since stage 2, the Government has taken a tiny step forward on applications under sections 274 and 275. I appreciate that move, but it is not to be confused with what amendment 90 seeks to do. The amendment focuses on a clear anomaly, which has been addressed in England and Wales.

Like Margaret Mitchell, I am keen to right the situation that prevails, whereby a complainer in a rape or serious sexual assault case often has no voice in opposing an application for the release of their medical records. I stress that that is a pre-trial process, as Elaine Murray has acknowledged. The release of those records is of huge concern to women, as it is often used against them in an attempt to discredit their testimony, and I have no doubt that it is an inhibiting factor in people’s reluctance to come forward in the first place.

Our medical records are the most sensitive of private data, so a victim has a clear and unequivocal right to be heard. That right is bestowed by article 8 of the ECHR, and there is a right to be heard before the determination is made on whether to release the records.

As Margaret Mitchell said, the approach is competent in Scotland, but it does not happen in practice. That is only because legal aid is not available.

In this instance, the Crown does not and could not represent the victim’s interests. The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service balances responsibility for a number of interests at that point, including the public interest, the complainer’s interest and the accused’s interest in a fair trial. The complainer cannot instruct the Crown to make their case and prosecute it properly for them.

I am disappointed to have heard Roddy Campbell ask where the money will come from. This is a human rights issue. Yet again, the Government talks a good game on human rights but fails to take action.

There is an opportunity to give justice to those who currently cannot afford it. The proposal is a small step and is perfectly competent. The locus is there, and I urge the cabinet secretary to support Margaret Mitchell.

17:15

Michael Matheson: Like all other members, I very much agree with supporting complainers in sexual offences cases. I am grateful to Margaret Mitchell for giving us the opportunity to consider the best way of doing so.

At stage 2, Margaret Mitchell sought to introduce a requirement for complainers to have access to legal advice and representation in sexual offences cases. I could not agree to such a major innovation in our criminal law, which at the time appeared untested. My concern was shared by the majority of members of the Justice Committee and Margaret Mitchell’s amendment was not agreed to.

Amendment 90 would provide for legal representation at an earlier stage, when medical and similar documentation was being sought, but it would have the same effect of introducing a third party into the court’s proceedings. That is still a major change. The High Court recently described “the absence of any right of a victim, or relative of a deceased victim, to participate directly in the criminal process” as a “central tenet of criminal proceedings”.

I would be very concerned about sweeping away a central tenet of criminal proceedings at stage 3 of a bill, given that no evidence on such a significant change was taken at stage 1—or through any public consultation.

During his review, Lord Bonomy considered independent legal representation for complainers. Having done so, he did not recommend the introduction of such an approach in his final report, which had the support of his entire reference group, including Rape Crisis Scotland.

I recognise the need for more information. I recently advised the Justice Committee that we will take forward a research project on the use of the provisions that permit character and history evidence to be led, in restricted circumstances, in sexual offences trials.

I make it entirely clear that amendment 90 would add significantly to the costs of the legal aid fund. I am not convinced that paying to have more lawyers involved is the right answer; instead, the Government is strongly committed to providing the support that is needed directly and sensitively to victims.

In March, the First Minister announced an unprecedented additional £20 million to deliver a comprehensive package of measures to tackle and eradicate violence against women and girls. That will enhance support for victims of domestic abuse and sexual violence.
The funding is being targeted to areas that need it most. We have allocated £2.4 million each year over three years to reducing waiting times for domestic abuse and sexual offences cases. That will reduce the stress and inconvenience that witnesses experience as they wait for their cases to be called.

Alison McInnes: That is all very welcome, but is the cabinet secretary saying that women’s article 8 rights are not important?

Michael Matheson: No—I am not saying that. I am emphasising that we are undertaking a range of work to support victims of the crimes that we are talking about.

In September, I announced £1.85 million of additional resource to support victims of sex crimes across Scotland. That money means that Rape Crisis Scotland, in partnership with Scottish Women’s Aid and the Highland centre, can develop services to enable victims in Orkney and Shetland to access the specialist support that they need, which is not currently available. It will also almost double the current funding for each rape crisis centre in Scotland until 2018 and provide a dedicated advocacy worker in West Lothian.

The funding will ensure consistent provision of specialist services across the country. It will ensure that support is provided to the brave individuals who report crimes to the police, as well as those who might be considering reporting or who have been through the court process. We have allocated funding to the Edinburgh domestic abuse court service, to ASSIST—the advice, support, safety and information services together project—to Medics against Violence and to the mentors in violence prevention programme, and we have contributed to the advertising campaign for Police Scotland’s disclosure scheme for domestic abuse.

Work has started on focused action plans to address the structural inequalities in our society that are both a cause and a consequence of violence against women. The Government is absolutely committed to that agenda. I hope that that reassures members that we will continue to support complainers and victims in the sensitive cases that we are talking about.

However, it is important that we accept that relevant evidence should be put before a court. Our current laws set out a clear process for that. The compatibility of those arrangements with the European convention on human rights was recently considered by the courts. As recently as 24 November, a High Court judgment confirmed:

“we do not agree that the absence of any formal mechanism to place the views of a complainer before the court creates any incompatibility with her convention rights.”

The potential denial of evidence to an accused has not been examined in that way. We would have to consider the rights of accused persons carefully before reducing access to evidence that might properly exculpate them. The courts undertake that consideration and they are best placed to do so. We must not lose sight of the fact that the courts already have an obligation to prevent malicious and irrelevant use of character or history evidence.

Before making significant changes, we want evidence of what actually happens in court. I recently wrote to the Justice Committee to confirm that an exercise to monitor applications to lead character or history evidence will begin in the new year. Following that exercise, the Government that is elected in May can consider what additional research might be needed. That could include examining whether and why documents that were recovered under section 301A of the 1995 act were used in those applications. I consider that approach to be a better way forward than rushing today into a substantial reform that might have many unintended potential consequences.

I give the warning that amendment 90 would not achieve its basic aims. Among the problems that need to be addressed is the fundamental one that it would not apply to rape cases. Section 301A refers to proceedings in the sheriff and justice of the peace courts, but rape cases must be indicted in the High Court, so the amendment would not affect those cases at all.

I understand and sympathise with Margaret Mitchell’s intentions. However, her amendment would represent a major departure that has not been fully considered and which could have unhelpful consequences, so I ask her not to press her amendment.

Margaret Mitchell: Well, there we have it—now it is laid completely bare, Presiding Officer. By providing legal aid for such victims to be heard, we have an opportunity today to address gender issues, which the First Minister has made an absolute priority. The First Minister, the cabinet secretary and the whole Parliament must know that such medical records are damaging in these cases, but they are depriving the affected individuals of the right to be legally represented in order to have their view heard—that is not happening at present.

The cabinet secretary talked about the rights of the accused, which are for the court to decide. However, if amendment 90 was agreed to, at least victims of serious sexual assault would have the right to be heard—a fundamental right under article 8 of the European convention on human rights and one that is available in England and Wales.
Opposing the amendment makes a complete sham of all the rhetoric that we have heard in the Parliament about the Scottish Government, the First Minister and the justice secretary wanting to protect the rights of those victims of serious sexual crimes. It is laid bare today that the reason for the Government’s opposition to the amendment is nothing to do with third-party rights or any fundamental change that would be insurmountable; its opposition is about money. The Government is not prepared to put in money to support such victims.

I press amendment 90.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The question is—[Interruption.] Order, please.

The question is, that amendment 90 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: There will be a division.

For
Baker, Claire (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Baker, Richard (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Baxter, Jayne (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Beamish, Claudia (South Scotland) (Lab)
Bibby, Neil (West Scotland) (Lab)
Boyack, Sarah (Lothian) (Lab)
Brown, Gavin (Lothian) (Con)
Buchanan, Cameron (Lothian) (Con)
Carlaw, Jackson (West Scotland) (Con)
Chisholm, Malcolm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab)
Davidson, Ruth (Glasgow) (Con)
Dugdale, Kezia (Lothian) (Lab)
Fergusson, Alex (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con)
Findlay, Neil (Lothian) (Lab)
Fraser, Murdo (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Goldie, Annabel (West Scotland) (Con)
Grant, Rhoda (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)
Gray, Iain (East Lothian) (Lab)
Henry, Hugh (Renfrewshire South) (Lab)
Hilton, Cara (Dunfermline) (Lab)
Hume, Jim (South Scotland) (LD)
Johnstone, Alex (North East Scotland) (Con)
Kelly, James (Rutherglen) (Lab)
Lamont, Johann (Glasgow Pollok) (Lab)
Lamont, John (Eretrick, Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (Con)
Macdonald, Lewis (North East Scotland) (Lab)
Macintosh, Ken (Eastwood) (Lab)
Malik, Hanzala (Glasgow) (Lab)
Marra, Jenny (North East Scotland) (Lab)
McArthur, Liam (Orkney Islands) (LD)
McCulloch, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McGrigor, Jamie (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
McInnes, Alison (North East Scotland) (LD)
McMahon, Michael (Uddingston and Bellshill) (Lab)
McMahon, Siobhan (Central Scotland) (Lab)
McNeil, Duncan (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab)
McTaggart, Anne (Glasgow) (Lab)
Milne, Nanette (North East Scotland) (Con)
Mitchell, Margaret (Central Scotland) (Con)
Murray, Elaine (Dumfriesshire) (Lab)
Pentland, John (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab)
Rowley, Alex (Cowdenbeath) (Lab)
Scanlon, Mary (Highlands and Islands) (Con)
Scott, John (Ayr) (Con)
Scott, Tavish (Shetland Islands) (LD)
Simpson, Dr Richard (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab)
Smith, Drew (Glasgow) (Lab)
Smith, Liz (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Con)
Stewart, David (Highlands and Islands) (Lab)

Against
Adam, George (Paisley) (SNP)
Adamson, Clare (Central Scotland) (SNP)
Allan, Dr Alasdair (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP)
Allard, Christian (North East Scotland) (SNP)
Beattie, Colin (Midlothian North and Musselburgh) (SNP)
Biagi, Marco (Edinburgh Central) (SNP)
Brodie, Chic (South Scotland) (SNP)
Brown, Keith (Clackmannanshire and Dunblane) (SNP)
Burgess, Margaret (Cunninghame South) (SNP)
Campbell, Aileen (Clydesdale) (SNP)
Campbell, Roderick (North East Fife) (SNP)
Coffey, Willie (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP)
Constance, Angela (Almond Valley) (SNP)
Crawford, Bruce (Stirling) (SNP)
Cunningham, Roseanna (Perthshire South and Kinross-shire) (SNP)
Dey, Graeme (Angus South) (SNP)
Don, Nigel (Angus North and Mearns) (SNP)
Doris, Bob (Glasgow) (SNP)
Dornan, James (Glasgow Cathcart) (SNP)
Eddie, Jim (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP)
Ewing, Annabelle (Mid Scotland and Fife) (SNP)
Ewing, Fergus (Inverness and Nairn) (SNP)
Fabian, Linda (East Kilbride) (SNP)
FitzPatrick, Joe (Dundee City West) (SNP)
Gibson, Kenneth (Cunninghame North) (SNP)
Gibson, Rob (Caithness, Sutherland and Ross) (SNP)
Grahame, Christine (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP)
Hepburn, Jamie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (SNP)
Hyslop, Fiona (Linlithgow) (SNP)
Ingram, Adam (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP)
Keir, Colin (Edinburgh Western) (SNP)
Kidd, Bill (Glasgow Anniesland) (SNP)
Lochhead, Richard (Moray) (SNP)
Lyle, Richard (Central Scotland) (SNP)
MacAskill, Kenny (Edinburgh Eastern) (SNP)
MacDonald, Angus (Falkirk East) (SNP)
MacDonald, Gordon (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP)
MacKenzie, Mike (Highlands and Islands) (SNP)
Mason, John (Glasgow Shettleston) (SNP)
Matheson, Michael (Falkirk West) (SNP)
Maxwell, Stewart (West Scotland) (SNP)
McAlpine, Joan (South Scotland) (SNP)
McDonald, Mark (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP)
McKelvie, Christina (Hamilton, Larkhall and Stonehouse) (SNP)
McLeod, Aileen (South Scotland) (SNP)
McLeod, Fiona (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (SNP)
McMillan, Stuart (West Scotland) (SNP)
Neil, Alex (Airdrie and Shotts) (SNP)
Paterson, Gil (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP)
Robertson, Dennis (Aberdeen West) (SNP)
Robison, Shona (Dundee City East) (SNP)
Russell, Michael (Argyll and Bute) (SNP)
Salmond, Alex (Aberdeen Central) (SNP)
Stevenson, Stewart (Banffshire and Buchan Coast) (SNP)
Stewart, Kevin (Aberdeen Central) (SNP)
Sturgeon, Nicola (Glasgow Southside) (SNP)
Torrance, David (Kirkcaldy) (SNP)
Watt, Maureen (Aberdeen South and North Kircaldy) (SNP)
Wheelhouse, Paul (South Scotland) (SNP)
White, Sandra (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP)
Yousaf, Humza (Glasgow) (SNP)
Abstentions
Finnie, John (Highlands and Islands) (Ind)
Harvie, Patrick (Glasgow) (Green)
Johnstone, Alison (Lothian) (Green)
Wilson, John (Central Scotland) (Ind)

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The result of the division is: For 50, Against 61, Abstentions 4.
Amendment 90 disagreed to.

Section 90—Commencement
Amendment 77 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.
Amendment 91 not moved.

Schedule A1—Breach of liberation condition
Amendment 78 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

Schedule 1—Modifications in connection with Part 1
Amendments 79 to 82 moved—[Michael Matheson]—and agreed to.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: That ends consideration of amendments.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): The next item of business is a debate on motion S4M-15087, in the name of Michael Matheson, on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill.

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): On a point of order, Presiding Officer. Given that the consideration of amendments has finished a lot sooner than expected, I wonder whether there is a possibility of bringing forward decision time to liberate members so that they can carry out their other duties thereafter.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Thank you. That matter is being considered and members will be advised in due course.

Members who wish to speak in the debate should press their request-to-speak buttons now.

17:27

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson): I am delighted to open the stage 3 debate on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. As members are aware, the bill has had a unique passage through Parliament since it was introduced in June 2013. It was quite rightly subject to thorough scrutiny by the Justice Committee at stage 1. The committee undertook detailed and challenging evidence sessions and it is clear that its hard work has greatly helped to shape the content of the bill that is before us today. I extend my thanks to the clerks and all members of the committee, past and present, for their thoughtful examination of these important reforms. In addition, I thank the clerks and members of the Finance Committee and the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee for their knowledge and expertise in examining the relevant effects and provisions of the bill for those interests. I also pass on my thanks to my predecessor, Kenny MacAskill, whose passion and belief in bringing forward these significant reforms is to be commended.

The current content of the bill also owes a great deal to the work of four independent review groups. First, I thank Lord Carloway for his review of criminal law and practice. Many of the provisions in the bill have been developed from his recommendations. In particular, there are the reforms to modernise arrest and custody procedures.

It would be remiss of me not to mention the one important recommendation that we are no longer taking forward in the bill: the corroboration reforms. As I previously advised the Parliament, given the substantial and important nature of Lord Bonomy’s recommendations, the Scottish Government accepted that it was not appropriate for the reform to continue at this time. That was one of the key areas in which the Justice Committee significantly influenced the proposed legislation.

Although I realise that the Government has been criticised over how it handled the reform, I believe that our actions show that we listened to the committee and the evidence of the stakeholders at stage 1. That led to the decision to take forward Lord Bonomy’s post-corroboration additional safeguards review and, ultimately, to the postponing of the bill until that review reported.

Christian Allard (North East Scotland) (SNP): As a member of the Justice Committee, I think that the abolition of the absolute requirement for corroboration had a place in the bill and I am sorry that it has not been taken forward. However, I look forward to the proposal returning in the next parliamentary session.

Michael Matheson: I recognise Christian Allard’s particular interest in the matter. It is not the first time that he has expressed concern about the removal of the corroboration provisions from the bill. However, I will set out the Government’s intention, which I hope will give him some confidence in our continued commitment in that area.

I again thank Lord Bonomy. We are continuing to consider his recommendations alongside other relevant reforms. The bill already includes a number of his recommendations: it places the prosecutorial test on a statutory footing and it requires codes of conduct to be issued to the police on the interviewing and identification of suspects. My initial view was that the latter provisions would be better considered as part of the wider consideration of Lord Bonomy’s review, but I have been persuaded in the interim that the addition of that requirement to the bill is helpful, and I thank Alison McInnes for lodging her amendment on that at stage 2.

Before I move on, I wish to make some further comments on the reform of corroboration. Although it was not possible to build a general consensus for the abolition of the corroboration rule at this time, I still consider that concerns about that rule—and, in particular, the very detrimental effect that it can have on people when the crime is committed in private—remain. On this day, we should not forget about the victims who have been affected by that legal requirement.

Christine Grahame (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP): I am sure that the cabinet secretary would accept that most crimes are committed in private and that it would be impossible to select certain categories of crime in which one could abolish corroboration.

Michael Matheson: I am not disputing that point; I recognise the point that the member makes.

I understand that many members who opposed the reform of corroboration did not do so out of a lack of concern for such individuals. Indeed, as a Parliament we have shown that we are often united in standing up for the most vulnerable in society and leading the way on key issues. I hope that the work that we undertake in considering the Bonomy recommendations and other reforms will enable a future Parliament to consider and, I hope, find consensus for such an important change in our law.

The third review that led to a number of provisions in the bill was Sheriff Principal Bowen’s review of sheriff and jury procedure. The provisions in the bill that have been developed from his review will make improvements to the effective management of such cases, so I extend my thanks to Sheriff Principal Bowen for his work in that important area.

Finally, there was the most recent review of the use of stop and search. John Scott QC and his advisory group worked tirelessly to produce a thorough and balanced report. I again pass on my gratitude to John Scott and all the members of his group for their hard work, as it has enabled us to include detailed provisions in the bill.

I realise that I have been talking about the past and the extensive work that has brought us to this point, but it is equally important that we look to the future and the real and positive changes that the bill can bring about. The stop and search reforms complement the provisions that were already in part 1 of the bill. Part 1 clarifies powers of arrest by creating a new single power to arrest someone on suspicion of having committed an offence. It replaces a complicated mixture of common-law and statutory powers of arrest. The reforms bring greater clarity to the process of arresting and holding suspects in custody while ensuring that the police have the necessary powers to carry out their role in investigating and detecting crime.

I am always proud to pay tribute to the hard work of our police officers who are committed to protecting our communities and our country on a daily basis. The new legal framework will support them in continuing to do their job as effectively as possible. The bill also enhances the rights of suspects to legal advice. It is only fair that those individuals who are brought into police custody are fully informed about their legal rights, and all suspects will now have a right of access to a lawyer, regardless of whether they are to be interviewed. We will also shortly bring forward regulations to seek to remove legal aid contributions for police station advice.
However, it is clear that some people in police custody require even more protection to ensure that they are fairly and appropriately treated according to their needs. That is why the bill, building on the Carloway recommendations, includes specific provisions for vulnerable adult and child suspects. The bill includes, for example, the vital safeguard that where a person who is aged 16 or over is assessed as vulnerable owing to a mental disorder, they cannot be interviewed without a solicitor being present. The bill will also ensure that appropriate adult support is sought by the police to facilitate effective communication with such individuals. The bill strikes an appropriate balance in introducing additional protections for children while recognising the greater level of self-determination of 16 and 17-year-olds.

I want to recognise Mary Fee’s work on highlighting the important issue of children who are affected by parental imprisonment. Although the Government was unable to support her previous amendment at stage 2, we understood the positive intentions behind the proposed change. Our concerns were more specifically about how workable the exact amendment might be in practice. Since stage 2, we have given the matter serious consideration and I am delighted that we were able to support the revised provisions that Mary Fee brought forward today. I consider the change to be a constructive and positive step.

Part 2 and onwards contain a number of equally important and modernising reforms that should greatly benefit our justice system. I mentioned earlier that reforms in the bill take forward recommendations from Lord Carloway and Sheriff Principal Bowen to enhance efficiency for appeal procedures and sheriff court solemn cases. I consider that those reforms will have a positive effect on our court practices and procedures.

There are many other important reforms in the bill. Members will be aware of specific and devastating cases in which Scots have lost their lives because of knife crimes. Much progress has been made in recent years, with offences of handling offensive weapons down 67 per cent since 2006-07. However, we must continue to do all that we can to discourage individuals from carrying offensive weapons. That includes ensuring that our courts have sufficient powers to deal with individuals who continue to carry such weapons in public, despite being aware of the terrible consequences. I am pleased that Parliament supports our policy, expressed in the bill, to increase the maximum custodial term for carrying such offensive weapons, including knives, from four to five years.

If we are to continue to have a justice system to be proud of, we must ensure that our justice sector partners are not prevented from using the most appropriate technology. The provisions in the bill will assist in that aim, first by opening the door to the greater use of television links in our courts, including for people appearing from police custody, and secondly by giving our courts the power to make rules on the greater use of technology in criminal procedure.

The bill represents a significant step forward in ensuring that our criminal justice system continues to be modern and efficient and strikes the right balance.

I move,

That the Parliament agrees that the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill be passed.

17:38

Elaine Murray (Dumfriesshire) (Lab): As we have heard, the bill was introduced almost two and a half years ago, in June 2013. It has gone through a number of transformations in that period. It was brought to Parliament to implement many of the recommendations of Lord Carloway’s review of Scottish criminal law and practice, which was set up in 2010, following the Cadder case. As members know, after the Cadder case, emergency legislation had to be introduced in the form of the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010.

Lord Carloway’s review group made 76 recommendations, including recommendations on a new system of arrest and detention, avoiding unnecessarily long periods of detention and liberation subject to conditions while the police carry out further investigation. Recommendations were also made regarding suspects’ right to legal advice, the nature of police questioning and safeguards for children under 18 and vulnerable adults. Most controversially, the bill as drafted would have ended the requirement for corroboration in Scots law. That was accompanied by proposed changes in jury composition and jury majority. I think that some of that will be revisited with Michael McMahon’s bill—the Criminal Verdicts (Scotland) Bill—when it comes before the Justice Committee shortly.

The proposal to end the corroboration requirement caused many of us much deliberation in weighing up the potential benefits to victims of one-on-one crimes such as rape and domestic abuse, as more cases would be likely to be prosecuted, with other concerns, such as whether successful prosecution was any more likely, and the possibility of miscarriages of justice for individuals accused of other crimes on only one piece of evidence.

The bill was suspended after stage 1, which it narrowly passed, for Lord Bonomy to undertake a review of additional safeguards required if and when the requirement for corroboration was removed. While the current cabinet secretary understands the concerns that many of us had, I am afraid that his predecessor castigated us roundly for them at the end of the stage 1 debate. Although the present Cabinet Secretary for Justice probably disappointed some on his own side, he was correct to remove the parts of the bill relating to the removal of the requirement for corroboration to enable the remainder of the bill to continue its passage through Parliament.

The original bill contained other proposals that have since been taken forward by alternative means. Sections 83 and 84 of the original bill created two statutory aggravations relating to people trafficking. However, the issue of human trafficking was addressed through a much more robust, stand-alone human trafficking bill, the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Bill, which was based on a member’s bill proposed by my colleague Jenny Marra.

The original bill did not contain measures to change the terms of release of long-term prisoners, but the intention had been to introduce those as stage 2 amendments. When the bill’s progress was suspended after stage 1, the proposals were progressed through the Prisoners (Control of Release) (Scotland) Bill, which turned out to be much more controversial than had been expected. It is fortunate that the measures were not introduced as amendments at stage 2 and were subject to full scrutiny at stage 1 of the subsequent bill. That was an advantage of suspending the passage of the bill.

Despite those deletions, many of Lord Carloway’s recommendations remain in the bill as we considered it during its final stage today. On first consideration, committee members had concerns about the change in the use of the term “arrest” from what we were used to in Scotland, complex as that might have been. Instead of meaning that a suspect is charged with an offence, it means that a suspect will be arrested when they are questioned on suspicion by the police in connection with the offence.

We had concerns that the general public and the media would not be aware of the change in the use of the term and that persons who had been arrested would be assumed to have been charged. Although, in our legal system, everyone is innocent until proved guilty, some suspicion is unfortunately commonly still attached to individuals who have been arrested, as that term is commonly understood. It will be necessary to educate both the public and the media on what the change in use of the term means. In England and Wales where the term “arrest” has been used, I am afraid that I have often assumed that the person has been charged.

I was at my mother-in-law’s home one Christmas when there had been a terrible murder down south and an individual was arrested for questioning. The assumption seemed to be that the poor guy had been charged. He turned out to be innocent and was not charged; someone else had done it. In changing the use of the term “arrest”, we need to ensure that everybody understands what the term “arrest” means, so that suspicions are not cast on people who have not done anything.

Many concerns have been expressed recently about stop and search, and it is to be welcomed that most of the recommendations from John Scott’s review have been included in the bill.

At stage 2, Mary Fee was successful in introducing an amendment to ensure that a child and family impact assessment will be undertaken when a person is remanded in custody or imprisoned. That assessment will determine the likely impact of detention or imprisonment on dependent children and identify any support and assistance necessary for their wellbeing. The amendment is extremely welcome.

Committee convener Christine Grahame also introduced a stage 2 amendment, which has survived in the final form of the bill. She was concerned about changes that were brought about in the emergency legislation in 2010 that related to the relative powers of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission and the High Court and which enabled the High Court to overrule decisions of the SCCRC and not accept cases referred to it.

A requirement on the Lord Advocate to publish the prosecutorial test—a statement on the general criteria that a prosecutor requires to be satisfied in order to proceed with criminal proceedings—was originally proposed as a safeguard if the requirement for corroboration was abolished. Despite the latter being dropped from the bill, the prosecutorial test was introduced nevertheless and I believe that it will provide a welcome understanding regarding how decisions to take a criminal case to court are made.

Lord Carloway also proposed that anyone under the age of 18 should be considered to be a child for the purposes of arrest, detention and questioning. That would accord with much of the legislation that we have recently passed. At stage 2, I lodged a number of amendments that would have introduced parity for anyone below the age of 18; some parts of the bill treat 16 and 17-year-olds differently from younger children, which is probably right. Children 1st was concerned about the fact that we had not changed every reference... to 16-year-olds to 18-year-olds. Having heard the reasons for that, given the other legislation that has been passed, Children 1st, like me, is content that some things have to be introduced more gradually. The general intention to treat people aged under 18 as children has been accepted; indeed, it applies in much of the bill.

Children 1st was also concerned about the use of the term “wellbeing” of a child in the bill, which it considers to be less well understood than the more-often-used phrase “best interests”. However, I believe that it was less concerned on learning that there will be training for police officers and other professionals around the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 and this bill, to which it has offered to contribute.

The bill has travelled a long and rocky road and Scottish Labour members have expressed concerns about it and suggested improvements to it. Most of our concerns have been addressed and some of our suggestions have made it through to the bill’s final form, which we are very happy about. Unlike at stage 1, we will support the bill tonight.

17:46

Margaret Mitchell (Central Scotland) (Con):
This stage 3 debate on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill presents the final opportunity to thank the many witnesses and stakeholders whose contributions have helped to shape the bill and to pay tribute to the work that the Justice Committee clerks have undertaken, together with members of the committee and the convener, at the various stages of the bill.

The bill before us this evening has taken over two years to reach its conclusion, having been introduced to the Parliament in the summer of 2013. It sought to implement recommendations from two expert reviews: Sheriff Principal Bowen’s review on sheriff and jury procedure and Lord Carloway’s review on criminal law and practice.

Since then, some of the original provisions relating to automatic early release and corroboration have been removed. It is fair to say that the debate on corroboration dominated the stage 1 proceedings and ultimately resulted in the postponement of the legislative process until the Bonomy review reported many months later. Although that delay was welcome, it undoubtedly came at the expense of effective scrutiny of the bill, given the huge time lapse between stage 1, stage 2 and today’s stage 3 proceedings.

However, among a number of reasonable and sensible provisions in the bill are changes to solemn procedure, the statutory requirement for out-of-court discussion between the prosecution and the defence and the increase in the maximum custodial sentence for handling offensive weapons from four to five years. The bill also allows for greater use of live television links between prisons and the courts and includes provisions to mitigate delays in progressing appeals. Those are practical provisions that have received cross-party support from the outset.

However, at stage 1, the Justice Committee expressed concern about the change in terminology to use the term “arrested” to describe suspects who are taken into custody for questioning but who are not charged, which risks unfairly stigmatising people who may simply be assisting the police with their inquiries. The terms “detained”, “arrested” and “charged” are well understood by the public, who, as the Justice Committee’s convener pointed out at stage 2, know that being detained is different from being arrested, even if they do not fully understand the procedural and legal distinctions between the two.

Furthermore, in its submission to the Justice Committee on the 2016-17 budget, Police Scotland highlighted the cost implications of the bill for the forthcoming year.

I am glad that the cabinet secretary has listened to some of the concerns that have been expressed, but I remain unconvinced about some of the proposals.

I turn to the subsequent additions to the bill at stage 2, in particular the provisions relating to stop and search, which have codified what became a controversial tactic employed by Police Scotland. Together with the associated public consultation, that will help to restore the public’s confidence in Scotland’s policing. It is only right to acknowledge Alison McInnes’s considerable efforts to put those changes on a statutory footing.

Mary Fee’s amendment at stage 2 was withdrawn and lodged again today to make reference to the named person. For the avoidance of doubt, the Conservatives, although we voted for that amendment, remain opposed to the universal application of the named person policy. However, we recognise that, if the named person policy goes ahead, it should be targeted at vulnerable children such as the children of people in custody or in prison. The amendment has the potential to make a significant difference to the unacceptably high number of children of prisoners who go on to offend and I congratulate Mary Fee on lodging it.

However, I rather fear that the bill will be remembered for all the wrong reasons: not just for the debacle over corroboration, but most decidedly for the opportunity that has been missed today to provide legal aid for a complainer in cases of serious sexual assault in Scotland to ensure that they are able to oppose an application for the release of their psychiatric, psychological and medical records. That amendment would have represented a small but hugely significant step for victims in sexual offence cases. The amendment would have addressed many injustices. It would have put victims in Scotland on an equal footing with victims in England and Wales; it would have addressed the age-long issue of medical records being misused to discredit victims; and it would have upheld those courageous individuals' basic human right to privacy under article 8 of the European convention on human rights. The victims of rape and sexual assault bravely subject themselves to what is often a traumatic process and it is a travesty that an opportunity to help them to see justice served has been lost.

The Scottish Conservatives recognise that the bill has not had an easy passage and that it has posed a lot of difficulties for the Scottish Government. We voted against it at stage 1, but the subsequent changes and concessions that have been made since then—notwithstanding my huge disappointment and dismay at the failure of the legal representation and legal aid amendment—mean that my party will support the bill at decision time.

17:53

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP):
The final words of the introductory music to the Scandinavian crime noir, “The Bridge”, which is currently showing on BBC Four, are:

“everything goes back to the beginning.”

If we go back to the beginning of this process, we find a bill that sought to build on the Carloway report. Part 1 of the bill tackles the somewhat confusing statutory issues of detention and arrest, and Lord Carloway sought to create a modern approach to powers of arrest that initially confused the members of the Justice Committee. However, we finally got to grips with it, and that part of the bill now contains important provisions for suspects to have a right to legal advice at police stations. Rather importantly, it will also provide for the removal of legal aid contributions for that advice.

We touched earlier on issues relating to the length of time for which suspects can be held for questioning. We have indeed gone further than Lord Carloway recommended in his report. In our committee there were differing views, but in my view the position that we have now agreed strikes a reasonable balance. I say to Alison McInnes that I hope that the use of the powers to extend beyond 12 hours interrogation in the investigation of crimes involving children will indeed be very limited. Investigative liberation was recommended by Lord Carloway. It is a somewhat ungainly term for a new system of continuing an investigation. I suspect that it will quickly come to be used and the 28-day maximum period seems to be a reasonable balance.

Issues in relation to child and other vulnerable suspects occupied the committee for quite some time. There were understandable concerns about a proper balance between the right to investigate crime and the rights of children and vulnerable people. Whatever else, we must hope that the safeguards that are provided by the legislation are properly adhered to. While child impact assessments were a controversial amendment at stage 2, I am glad to hear that discussions between the Government, Mary Fee and children’s organisations have borne fruit and we were able to agree the amendments earlier this afternoon.

No discussion of the bill would be complete without referring to the C-word: corroboration. Lord Carloway’s initial recommendation to abolish the requirement for corroboration was and remains controversial. It evoked strong emotions from the committee members, in the chamber and throughout civic Scotland. The problem remains as to how to create a system that balances the rights of the accused with the victim’s rights and access to justice. That conundrum will remain for the new parliamentary session and we await the results of the further work that was carried out following Lord Bonomy’s recommendations. In particular, what will the results of jury research reveal? Will it impact on the views on jury majorities, for example? We are, however, embarking on the publication of a prosecutorial test and a code of practice in connection with the identification and interviewing of suspects.

The current cabinet secretary responded quickly to concerns about consensual stop and search. We were perhaps slow to follow the example of our southern neighbours in putting these matters on a formal basis, but they operate it in a slightly different culture. I am also mindful of the former First Minister’s earlier comments about knife crime. I do not quite understand the current position with regard to section 60 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, under which, when there is a reasonable belief that persons are carrying dangerous instruments or offensive weapons, the police can organise a search. That is to be covered by the code of practice; we await that with interest.

We also debated provisions for children’s possession of alcohol and consensual searching. Now that the Parliament has voted on that, we need to move on and accept the cabinet secretary’s assurances. We should also remember that the bill contains recommendations on sheriff and jury cases from Sheriff Bowen. They might be dry but they are nevertheless important.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (John Scott):
You should draw to a close please.
Roderick Campbell: I will leave the question of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission and the interests of justice to my colleague Christine Grahame.

This important bill modernises Scotland’s criminal justice system, but it is certainly not the final word on the subject.

17:57

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): I am delighted to be able to take part in the stage 3 debate on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill. I reiterate my thanks to Barnardo’s Scotland for its support and encouragement on the amendments that I lodged at stage 2, for bringing them through to today and seeing them passed at stage 3. I particularly thank Nicki Wray for her tireless work in progressing this important issue. I also offer my gratitude to the Scottish Government for working with me ahead of today’s debate to bring about what will be a substantial change for the children of imprisoned parents.

It will come as no surprise to members that I intend to focus my speech on the children and families who are affected by imprisonment. The amendments in my name that we agreed are a turning point for children and families who are affected by imprisonment in Scotland.

Children are often the forgotten victims of crime. Many witness the arrest and, in some cases, the crime that leads to the arrest. The children of prisoners face stigma, poorer educational outcomes, mental health problems and behavioural problems. Research shows that children who have a parent in prison are more likely than their peers to become incarcerated as adults. With the right support, we can prevent today’s children becoming the prisoners of the future.

The Scottish Government has a number of initiatives to reduce reoffending. In my view, my amendments are a step towards preventing offending.

I mentioned the stigma that is attached to imprisonment, and the Children and Young People’s Commissioner, Tam Baillie, in supporting what I seek to achieve through the amendments that we have agreed to, also referenced that. Research in the “Not Seen, Not Heard, Not Guilty” report by the commissioner shows that many children of prisoners find it difficult to ask for help.

Ahead of today’s stage 3 debate, I visited Perth prison, where I met a number of fathers who have been working with a parenting programme that is run in the prison by the thrive project. Funded by the Scottish Government, it is an excellent programme that needs to be rolled out across Scotland’s prison estate. The project, which is run by Barnardo’s and Enable, aims to identify families that are in need of support, create greater engagement with them and respond to the needs of both the adults and the children. The fathers spoke of the positive benefits that they see from the parenting programme, the positive effect that it can have on their children and the importance of the bonds that they want to have with their children when they are released.

One father spoke about how he never thought of his children when he was offending and said that he did not understand the impact that it could have on them until he was sentenced and the children started to visit. The father, who is working with the thrive project and the parenting programme, told me how hard it is for him to watch his young daughter cry as she leaves the visiting room, and he said that he never wants that to happen to him or his child again once he is released.

I am grateful to the fathers that I met for being so open and honest in the short time that I spent with them. Promoting positive family relationships is essential in criminal justice. It is a route out of prison and a tool to reduce reoffending, and it can help to tackle the inequality that we see in society.

Once the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill has been passed, I will be happy to work with the Scottish Government further to ensure that my amendments do what they are designed to do. We will soon know how many children in Scotland have a parent in prison, and with that information we can get it right for every child. I look forward to the day when children are no longer the forgotten victims of crime.

18:02

Christine Grahame (Midlothian South, Tweeddale and Lauderdale) (SNP): The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill is a wide-ranging and substantial bill. We need only to read its purposes to determine that. As others have said, it has had a long and tortuous journey. It was introduced to the Parliament in 2013 and, following the stage 1 debate in 2014, the Government narrowly won a majority to proceed, including on abolition of the requirement for corroboration.

I have long opposed that abolition, not because I wish the accused to be let off with a sexual assault or a rape or those who are accused of those crimes in particular to escape conviction, but to ensure that victims, with the requirement for corroboration, have enhanced prospects of a successful prosecution and conviction. It is not about people having their day in court; it is about people having their day in court and the accused being convicted and sentenced.
I note that we may return to the subject—perhaps in the next session of Parliament, depending on who is in government—and I hope that, at that time, we will take in a comprehensive review of other issues, such as the size of the jury, the jury majority and the three verdicts that are currently available, in the High Court in particular.

The second issue on which I was in disagreement with the Government is not the stuff of headlines, but it is of considerable relevance to the Scottish justice system. It is the role of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission, which colleagues throughout the chamber have mentioned today.

Following the decision in the case of Cadder v Her Majesty’s Advocate in 2010, the Scottish Government introduced by way of emergency legislation the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010. All three stages took place on one day, which is not a good way to legislate. The act reduced the power of the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission and increased the power of the High Court sitting as the court of appeal when the SCCRC referred cases to it.

Let me explain. Before the 2010 act, a referral from the SCCRC had to be accepted by the High Court, and if the appeal was successful, it had to grant the appeal. The 2010 act changed all that and made two radical changes. First, although the SCCRC will always have considered the interests of justice and whether there might have been a miscarriage of justice, the 2010 act endowed the High Court with the power to reject a referral, even before it heard any evidence, if in its view the referral was not in the interest of justice. Secondly, even if a referral passed that second test, the High Court still had the power, notwithstanding a successful appeal, not to grant the referral if it considered that it was not in the interests of justice.

Therefore, the High Court had a gatekeeping role over its own appellate procedures, and the 2010 act created two categories of appeal: those coming straight from the High Court to the appeal court, if successful, were successful, but if they came from the SCCRC, they might be successful but then not permitted or allowed. It is simply wrong to have two categories of appeal.

At stage 2, I moved an amendment successfully, by a majority against the Government, to take us back to pre-2010 rules and I am delighted that the Government has accepted the reasons behind that amendment. I think that order has been restored.

Therefore, I am personally delighted by what has happened regarding corroboration and the role of the SCCRC. It is a pity that Mr Findlay is not present in the chamber to hear that, as he boorishly accused me of somewhat falling to the Government’s whip. I put this quite simply for him: put that in your pipe and smoke it, Mr Findlay.

18:06

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD):

What a difference a couple of years makes. No other Government bill has taken this long to get through Parliament and no bill has undergone such a dramatic and crucial transformation.

At the stage 1 debate, the then Cabinet Secretary for Justice won the vote but lost the plot, attacking opponents of abolishing corroboration as a unionist cabal intent on “selling out the victims of crime.”—[Official Report, 27 February 2014, c 28376.]

More worrying than that was that the justice secretary revealed his contempt for this Parliament by recklessly promoting what he knew by then to be seriously defective legislation. We know that he knew that, because he had belatedly and hurriedly appointed a 17-strong panel of distinguished minds who were expected to patch things up after the bill was passed. The newly appointed dean of the Faculty of Advocates described that approach as asking MSPs “to buy a pig in a poke.”

Let us not forget that 64 MSPs in this chamber, including the current Cabinet Secretary for Justice and the current First Minister, were happy to do just that. I think that that was a low point for this chamber and the Parliament because, whatever members’ views about corroboration, it became a matter of how Parliament legislates. As a business manager, I believed that our Parliament’s credibility was at stake.

In the absence of any willingness to remove the offending section of the bill, I took a different tack and urged the Government to put the whole bill on ice. Thankfully, at the 11th hour, the Government agreed to my request to suspend the bill, allowing time for Lord Bonomy’s corroboration review. His report not only vindicated that approach; his findings exposed the willingness of ministers to jeopardise the integrity of Scotland’s justice system on the basis of scant evidence and blithe assurances to this chamber.

As I said, what a difference two years makes: there is now cross-party support for the bill. Perhaps there is a wider lesson here for us on how our unicameral legislature operates, as more time between stage 1 and stage 2 for reflection and mature discussion can radically improve the quality of legislation. There is now a great deal to welcome in the bill. It will help to ensure that arrest and custody procedures are fairer, more transparent and compliant with the European convention on human rights. My successful stage 2 amendment means the introduction of codes of practice governing how the police identify suspects and conduct interviews, which is akin to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984—PACE—codes that have existed in England and Wales for decades.

For months, ministers told Willie Rennie and me that they were comfortable with so-called consensual stop and search. I am therefore, of course, delighted that the Scottish Liberal Democrats’ campaign for its abolition will conclude today and that that discredited, intrusive and, frankly, illegal tactic will cease. It is a tactic that has damaged the relations between the police and the communities and young people they targeted; and it is a tactic that was dogged by scandal and deployed hundreds of thousands of times a year without justification.

I hope that the whole chamber will join me in thanking those who offered expert opinion and thoughtful, evidenced interventions on the issue, not least John Scott and Dr Kath Murray. However, it remains galling that the Scottish National Party Government’s reaction to Dr Murray’s landmark stop and search findings was to engineer a delay in their publication in an effort to pre-empt and discredit her research.

It is similarly worrying that the Parliament has paved the way for the creation of a search power for something that is not illegal—the possession of alcohol. Elsewhere in the bill, ministers have failed to protect children by permitting their being held in custody for 24 hours and shelving plans—for a third time—to raise the age of criminal responsibility. This Government speaks a lot about human rights, but its actions are timid.

Speaking of unfinished business, what next for corroboration? Irrespective the future of corroboration, Parliament must continually strive to improve reporting and conviction rates, particularly for sexual offences and other crimes that occur behind closed doors. Therefore, I am disappointed that the Government did not support amendment 90 in Margaret Mitchell’s name. The cabinet secretary is obstinate on the matter, but I can only conclude that he has been ill advised. There is no doubt that an individual has a locus on the narrow point, and the amendment was not about banning access to any medical records but merely about giving victims a voice at the time when those records are sought.

Lord Bonomy provides a starting point on measures that are worth while regardless of the future for corroboration. As I said, it is disappointing that we have not taken the opportunity to allow people to be represented in court.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): Could you draw to a close, please?

Alison McInnes: Nevertheless, the Scottish Liberal Democrats will support the bill at decision time. We are proud to have been pivotal to the bill’s success by ensuring that the law better protects us all from miscarriages of justice and illegal police intrusions and that the integrity of our justice system remains intact.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Thank you. I ask that our next two members keep to their four minutes, please. I call Alex Salmond.

18:11

Alex Salmond (Aberdeenshire East) (SNP): I welcome the opportunity to contribute, not least to defend Kenny MacAskill, who was a fine justice secretary. I say not just to Alison McInnes but to the whole chamber that the impact of the Salduz and Cadder rulings has brought into serious examination the issue of corroboration and whether it can be sustained, particularly in the matter of sexual offences. Of course, it is a subject to which this Parliament will have to return. To believe, as Alison McInnes seems to, that there is outstanding wisdom on the matter is entirely wrong. The issue will have to occupy this Parliament again. I am just commenting on the certainty with which Alison McInnes put forward her remarks.

I congratulate the current Cabinet Secretary for Justice. Even over a two-year period, it is no inconsiderable achievement to bring a criminal justice bill to a point of almost success, as he has done.

I hesitated to intrude into this reunion of the Justice Committee by making a speech, but I want to return to the subject of knife crime, not least because I want to make a point about John Carnochan, who I respect enormously. He is not an opponent but a supporter of moving stop and search from a non-statutory to a statutory basis. However, he has pointed out that non-statutory stop and search played a considerable role in the diminution and breaking of the knife culture, which had infected many parts of our communities in many areas of Scotland. It is to that issue that I want to devote some examination.

Alison McInnes said that the stop and search statistics were a scandal. The statistic keeping on stop and search was perhaps mistaken, unfortunate and inadequate, but it was not the scandal. The scandal was the level of knife crime, which resulted in the tragedies and deaths of young people. The achievement—what we should take pride in—through a range of initiatives, many of which John Carnochan was connected with, should be understood.
We have seen a situation where the total figures on the handling of an offensive weapon have reduced from 10,110 in 2006-07 to 3,795 in 2013-14. That is a spectacular reduction—not an elimination—of knife crime and other offensive weapons offences. That huge reduction is a massive achievement. People such as John Carnochan, his colleague Karyn McCluskey, and others from the Scottish violence reduction unit, as well as those from the no knives, better lives campaign—indeed, from the whole range of initiatives—deserve our thanks and congratulation. A part of that achievement was the stop and search tactic employed by the Scottish police service.

We should remember that, in England, over the past few years, there has been a substantial decline in stop and search statistics, both under section 1 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and section 60 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. However, in the past year, there has been a rise—of no less than 13 per cent—in the key statistic of knife crime. We should be extremely careful in dismissing whether there might not be a connection between those two changes.

We would make a fatal bargain if, in pursuit of finding an absolute certainty of how we conduct our operations, we did not acknowledge that our primary duty is to make absolutely sure, whatever else we do as far as the relevant part of the bill is concerned, that the decline in knife crime and therefore the decline in fatality and tragedy as a result of that crime is not in any way impeded. I am certain that this justice secretary will have that uppermost in his mind as he pursues the new statutory base for the policy.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I remind members that they should not turn their backs to the chair.

18:15

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (Ind): Section 1 of the bill is about the power of a constable and section 2 is about exercise of that power, which has been a key part of what we have discussed in the course of looking at the bill.

If I noted him correctly, the cabinet secretary talked about the complicated mixture of statutory and common law that the bill will address. One power that I fear may have been lost of those that surround stop and search is the power of discretion—indeed, there is a suggestion that discretion is not being exercised at all.

Some additional powers are being given. I was happy to support amendments 6 and 8 on transport of individuals and sports grounds respectively. I supported them because they were proportionate and have put searches on a statutory basis. I am very pleased that a code of practice will be put in place, and I am happy that the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner will be included in the list of people who will be consulted on that. That is important, because PIRC is one of the organisations that deal with complaints that arise from misuse of the powers. I hope that there will not be any such complaints.

Members have referred to the work of John Scott QC and his committee. The cabinet secretary described his report as "thorough and balanced"; I concur with that view. I also concur with my colleague Alison McInnes's comments on Kath Murray's excellent work. When I met Mr Scott, I was aware of the tensions that remain in the police service regarding uncertainty among junior officers. Those officers have used so-called—I still struggle with the term—consensual non-statutory stop and search. Lots of members have commented on the powers that constables have; they have common-law powers and statutory powers, but I was not aware that they have non-statutory consensual powers. That is the challenge. I acknowledge what Alex Salmond said, but there have always been common-law search powers. We should recognise that having everything on a more formal basis is perhaps the way ahead.

When I met Mr Scott, we talked about human rights. I am delighted that, as a result of an amendment that I lodged when we considered the bill that introduced the single police service, human rights is now part of the police oath. Mr Scott said—I think that he said it in his report; I hope that I quote him correctly—that police officers are the front-line defenders of the public's human rights. That is important; the police should defend human rights with pride. It is also very important that the police recognise the power that they have to impact on individuals' rights.

We have talked in the debate about the rights of children and young people. I share the disappointment that the advice of the Scottish Human Rights Commission and the Children and Young People's Commissioner Scotland has not been taken on board.

I welcome some of the changes that have been made, particularly on supervisory oversight and the important decisions that are made about individuals' liberty. Police Scotland will, of course, have its standard operating procedures, which I hope will accurately reflect the intent of the bill. The change regarding access to a lawyer is a very important development.

There is a lot to be said, but in the few minutes that I have left I want to quote the policy objectives, which say that the bill contains the “next stage of essential reforms to the Scottish criminal justice system to enhance efficiency and bring the appropriate balance to the justice system so that rights are protected whilst ensuring effective access to justice for victims of crime.”

If we get individuals’ rights and victims’ rights correct, we will be doing no bad.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I am afraid that members have gone slightly over the time that has been allocated for the debate, so I would appreciate it if closing speakers could keep to their time or use slightly less.

18:19

Gavin Brown (Lothian) (Con): The bill has indeed—to quote the justice secretary—“had a unique passage”. One point that is worth making at the outset is that, despite a number of controversies, huge swathes of the bill—large parts of the 100 or so sections—have gone through the process without any real change or controversy, and with all parties signing up to them at the first available opportunity.

The sections through which solemn procedure will be improved by facilitation of better preparation of sheriff and jury cases are to be welcomed. Also welcome are the sentencing aspects that have been touched on—in particular, the increase in the maximum sentence for carrying a knife or offensive weapon, and the provisions covering people who offend while on early release—and the appeals section, which addresses delays in determining a number of types of appeal. Those are large parts of the bill that have gone through the process fairly easily, so I am glad to see them go through today.

The biggest controversy—the subject that dominated stage 1—was the section that would have removed the general requirement for corroboration. It was certainly wrong at the time, but criticism of the Government can be levelled mostly because of the fact that, at that time, the Government appeared to be unwilling to listen to expert evidence and to opposition parties. The demeanour of a number of members of the Government and the governing party towards those who opposed them was deeply unwise. I therefore commend the current justice secretary for his very different approach and for, ultimately, deciding to delete that section at stage 2.

The proposal was probably a genuine attempt to address a weakness in the law, but the Justice Committee received weighty submissions that suggested that removing the requirement for corroboration would not increase the number of safe convictions, so it would not solve the problem that the Government wanted it to solve. At the same time, there were credible fears that its removal could lead to an increase in the number of miscarriages of justice. It would not have solved the problem that it was intended to solve and it could have created a new problem.

If the Government decides to reconsider the matter, it ought to be careful, because the complexities of removing the requirement for corroboration are enormous. The Bonyon review made it clear that if we were to do that—it had to assume that it was going to happen—we would need to make at least four changes in respect of suspect interviews, at least three changes in respect of the evidence of identification, three changes in respect of the code of practice, two changes to the prosecutorial test and four changes to the way in which juries operate. Probably most important—even though the review was told to assume that corroboration would no longer exist—is that it made the firm recommendation that the requirement for corroboration should be retained in relation to hearsay evidence and confession evidence.

In my final minute, I return to Margaret Mitchell’s amendment 90. Parliament and the Government ultimately rejected the amendment, as is their right, but the Government expressed some sympathy for it. There is a loophole whereby legal aid is not available to complainers who want to oppose applications to access their medical records. I say to the cabinet secretary—who will, I presume, close for the Government—that the Government has expressed sympathy for amendment 90 even though it rejected it. What, therefore, does the Government intend to do to right that injustice? Groups all around the country will be disappointed that the amendment was not agreed to, but they will be extremely keen to hear what the Government intends to do. Perhaps they will hear that in early course.

18:23

Elaine Murray: I assume that decision time will be brought forward. That is pleasing because after two or more years of considering the bill, I think that I might be running out of things to say about it. I will, however, do my best to fill the time.

I closed the stage 1 debate for Labour in February 2014, when my colleagues and I were told that we were selling out our principles and, indeed, that we had sold our souls. I am glad that today’s debate has been much more constructive, even when there has not been agreement.

One issue that has concerned members is the need to improve access to justice for victims of one-on-one crimes—in particular, crimes of sexual and domestic abuse. Much of the consideration of the requirement for corroboration concerned that issue. Today, Margaret Mitchell and Alison McInnes argued passionately in favour of introducing the right to legal representation for victims of sexual abuse when application is made to access their medical records. I know that both Justice Scotland and representatives of women’s organisations were supportive of the proposal, but the amendment was not agreed to. Nevertheless, I have recently become aware that the right is available to rape victims in England and Wales, so I think that we need to address the matter here.

I am pleased that the Government is doing research on sections 274 and 275 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 but, as I said in the recent debate on violence against women and girls, I hope that Parliament will, in the next session, return to gender-based violence with more comprehensive legislation.

Similarly, I am in favour of increasing the age of criminal responsibility from eight to 12 and hope that, in the next session of Parliament, that measure will be in a bill from its start so that it cannot just be glossed over.

Much as I respect our children’s commissioner, Tam Baillie, I am not able to agree with him on the powers in the bill to introduce stop and search of under 18s for alcohol. Those powers may not be used if the consultation suggests that they should not be. Even if they are used, the people who will be criminalised are the people over 18 who supply alcohol to young people. I hope that the children’s commissioner’s concerns will be discounted. It might be that the consultation will come out against stop and search in those circumstances, so we need to wait to see what will happen on that.

Mary Fee lodged important amendments on children and families who are affected by imprisonment, on which she is to be congratulated. As she said, children are often the forgotten victims of crime. She told us about how the stigma and related problems that young people can have result in it being more likely that they will become involved in the justice system themselves and perpetuate the cycle. I was interested in what she said about Perth prison and the thrive parenting programme for male offenders. It was also interesting to hear about the impact of a parent’s imprisonment on children and how it affects the offender. I can think of little that might be more valuable in the prevention of reoffending than making a parent aware of the effect that their offending has on their child.

Christine Grahame expressed the concerns that many of us had when it came to abolition of the requirement for corroboration and how and whether that issue will come back to us. That issue will not go away and extensive consultation on it will be required in the future.

I congratulate Christine Grahame on noticing the issues with the emergency legislation on the Cadder case. The High Court used to have to accept cases that the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission referred to it, but changes made through emergency legislation meant that the High Court might not accept successful cases. It is important that that situation has now been reversed.

Alison McInnes also referred to the corroboration debate and reminded us that the majority of the committee members had asked for the section on corroboration to be removed. She made an important point that lessons need to be learned from the passage of the bill. The way in which it has been improved through its extended passage perhaps provides us with some lessons that we could learn for future legislation.

Alex Salmond also referred to corroboration, but made an important point about knife crime, John Carnochan and the role of the violence reduction unit. Before any of us become too sanctimonious about it, we need to remember that it was my good friend Cathy Jamieson who implemented some of the measures that have been mentioned. They have resulted in a reduction in knife crime, so it is a question of not throwing the baby out with the bath water when good work has been done. We have been concerned about many of the effects of the increased use of stop and search, but that does not mean to say that stop and search never has a role or has no value.

It is important that John Finnie reminded us that there always were common-law powers of stop and search. Sometimes, there is great value in people who have police experience being members of Parliament, because they can remind us of such factors; I am grateful to him for doing that.

I thank the clerks and the witnesses for all their hard work with the committee at all stages of the bill over the extended period—two and a half years—that it has been going through Parliament.

18:29

Michael Matheson: I listened with interest to all the comments that were made and views that were expressed during the debate. I am conscious that a number of members who spoke have been involved with the process from its beginnings back in June 2013. The bill has probably been in the parliamentary process for the longest period of any bill in the Parliament’s history.

I will pick up on a few issues that members have raised. As she did at stage 2, Elaine Murray raised the important issue of the reporting on those who may be on investigative liberation, how that will be presented and how it can be portrayed. I recognise the concerns and anxieties that she expressed about how that might be presented as if someone had been arrested and charged. Someone who was on investigative liberation might not be or would never be charged with an offence. There is a piece of work to be done on education and promoting understanding of the difference that the bill will create among those in the media and in stakeholder groups that have an interest in the matter.

With the good will of the Parliament in passing the bill, the implementation group that has been established will be responsible for looking at specific media and press matters and at how the media and the press can help to promote understanding of the bill’s provisions. I expect the implementation group to consider what I recognise is an important issue that Elaine Murray has raised.

I turn briefly to the issue that Margaret Mitchell raised in her amendment 90, which was on legal representation for those in the court process and related to personal and detailed information. On several occasions, she has referred to provision in England and Wales that is not available in Scotland. I presume that she was referring to a particular High Court judgment on such an issue in England and Wales. That judgment was in a case that was brought by a complainer who sought legal aid to take action to prevent the disclosure of her confidential counselling records. Although the High Court correctly found in her favour, that was only on the extent to which her rights to exceptional public funding had not been properly considered by the director of legal aid casework.

The Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 allows exceptional cases to be provided for in the same way as applied in the case that I presume that the member was referring to, which appears to be the only one on record in England and Wales in which a judgment was made in favour of the complainer. However, there is no requirement in either jurisdiction that makes legal aid provision necessary. The difference in Scotland is that we have not had a judgment on that. In England and Wales, there was a judgment, which said that the case had not been properly considered. That is different, but that is not to say that there is provision in England and Wales that is not available in Scotland.

Exceptional cases can be considered in Scotland in exactly the same way as in England and Wales. For accuracy, it is important that we do not get ourselves locked into the idea that there is a provision somewhere else in the United Kingdom that is being denied in Scotland, when the legal case that I referred to is clearly not as Margaret Mitchell presented it.

On the important issue of the imprisonment of parents, which Mary Fee raised, we have been able to get to a point of agreement in a constructive way. One of the main challenges for us as a country is putting the right provisions in place to support children who might be affected by their parents being imprisoned, but we as a country also have to face up to the fact that we have the second-highest prison population level per head in western Europe, which includes the rate for females. That is because we as a country have failed to implement much more progressive and effective means of achieving desistance from committing offences.

If we are serious about the matter, we should not be closing stable doors once the horse has bolted; we must have a serious debate and dialogue about how we can use our prison system so that, while those who have to go to prison go there for public safety and punishment, we are also serious about and committed to taking forward policies that assist us in dealing with those who can be more effectively dealt with by alternative means.

If we get that right, we will do more for children in Scotland than an amendment to the bill would do—I mean no disrespect when I say that. We will demonstrate that we are big enough to be progressive in our penal policy rather than continue with a model that has remained largely unchanged in almost 200 years.

Let me turn to the issue that has also—[Interruption.] My microphone appears to be off. I do not know whether that is an indication that you want me to stop speaking, Presiding Officer.

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): I promise you that I did not touch the switch for your microphone.

Michael Matheson: Okay—I believe you, of course.

Alex Salmond raised the issue of tackling the knife culture. There is no doubt that there has been a massive reduction in knife crime in Scotland since 2006-07. In parts of west central Scotland, there have been massive reductions of more than 50 per cent in that period. A huge amount of that has come about through policing, engagement programmes such as the no knives, better lives programme, and the violence reduction unit—the tremendous work of John Carnochan and Karyn McCluskey has changed perceptions and communities.

The report of the advisory group on stop and search quotes John Carnochan as saying:

“I believe now is the time to Police our communities a little differently. When the medication works and the patient’s condition is stabilised or even improves we don’t usually increase the dosage; that would be a waste of time, energy and resource and it often makes the patient worse. Now is the time for all agencies, including the Police, to engage with the communities, particularly the young people in our poorest areas in a positive way to help prevent violence. It was these young people who received by far the largest dose of the stop search medicine. It is them who have shown most improvement on this course of treatment. They now need help to stay healthy and violence free. Good community policing can help that happen.”

John Carnochan got that right.

Our provisions on stop and search will not prevent the police from stopping individuals whom they think might be carrying offensive weapons in order to search those people. The police will still be able to target the approach; the only thing that is ending is the non-statutory provision for that. I want knife crime to continue to decrease in this country, as I am sure that all members do. I am confident that we will achieve that.

When I came into post, I was conscious that it would be challenging to get a consensus in the Parliament on the bill. I hope that all members agree that the bill is balanced and effective in addressing the need for improvement in our criminal justice system and that it will help to deliver a modernised approach to various elements of the system. I call on all members to take the opportunity to support this important bill and continue the modernisation of our criminal justice system.
Decision Time

18:38

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): There is one question to be put as a result of today’s business. The question is, that motion S4M-15087, in the name of Michael Matheson, on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, be agreed to.

Motion agreed to,

That the Parliament agrees that the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill be passed.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

[AS PASSED]

CONTENTS

Section

PART 1

ARREST AND CUSTODY

CHAPTER 1

ARREST BY POLICE

Arrest without warrant

1 Power of a constable
2 Exercise of the power

Procedure following arrest

3 Information to be given on arrest
4 Arrested person to be taken to police station
5 Information to be given at police station
6 Information to be recorded by police

CHAPTER 2

CUSTODY: PERSON NOT OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Keeping person in custody

7 Authorisation for keeping in custody
8 Information to be given on authorisation
11 12 hour limit: general rule
12 12 hour limit: previous period
12A Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit
12B Information to be given on authorisation under section 12A
9 Custody review
10 Test for sections 7, 12A and 9
13 Medical treatment

Investigative liberation

14 Release on conditions
15 Conditions ceasing to apply
16 Modification or removal of conditions
17 Review of conditions
CHAPTER 3
CUSTODY: PERSON OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Person to be brought before court

17A Information to be given if sexual offence
18 Person to be brought before court
18A Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court
18B Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court
18C Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court

Police liberation

19 Liberation by police
20 Release on undertaking
21 Modification of undertaking
21A Rescission of undertaking
21B Expiry of undertaking
22 Review of undertaking

CHAPTER 4
POLICE INTERVIEW

Rights of suspects

23 Information to be given before interview
24 Right to have solicitor present
25 Consent to interview without solicitor

Person not officially accused

26 Questioning following arrest

Person officially accused

27 Authorisation for questioning
28 Authorisation: further provision
29 Arrest to facilitate questioning

CHAPTER 5
RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS IN POLICE CUSTODY

Intimation and access to another person

30 Right to have intimation sent to other person
31 Right to have intimation sent: under 18s
32 Right of under 18s to have access to other person
32A Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

Vulnerable persons

33 Support for vulnerable persons

Intimation and access to a solicitor

35 Right to have intimation sent to solicitor
36 Right to consultation with solicitor
Chapter 6

Police Powers and Duties

Powers of police

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>Use of reasonable force</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>Common law power of entry</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>Common law power of search etc.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>Power of search etc. on arrest</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Care of drunken persons

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>40A</td>
<td>Taking drunk persons to designated place</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Duties of police

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>Duty not to detain unnecessarily</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42</td>
<td>Duty to consider child’s wellbeing</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42A</td>
<td>Duties in relation to children in custody</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42B</td>
<td>Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Chapter 8

General

Common law and enactments

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>50</td>
<td>Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>51</td>
<td>Abolition of requirement for constable to charge</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>52</td>
<td>Consequential modification</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Code of practice about investigative functions

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>52A</td>
<td>Code of practice about investigative functions</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Disapplication of Part

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>52B</td>
<td>Disapplication in relation to service offences</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53</td>
<td>Disapplication in relation to terrorism offences</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Powers to modify Part

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>53A</td>
<td>Further provision about application of Part</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53B</td>
<td>Further provision about vulnerable persons</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Interpretation of Part

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>54</td>
<td>Meaning of constable</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>55</td>
<td>Meaning of officially accused</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>56</td>
<td>Meaning of police custody</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Part A1

Police Procedures

Chapter 1

Search of Person Not in Police Custody

Lawfulness of search by constable

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A1</td>
<td>Limitation on what enables search</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
B1 Cases involving removal of person
B2 Public safety at premises or events
C1 Duty to consider child’s best interests

Miscellaneous and definitions
C2 Publication of information by police
D1 Provisions about possession of alcohol
E1 Matters as to effect of sections A1, B1 and D1
F1 Meaning of constable etc.

CHAPTER 2
CODE OF PRACTICE

Making and status of code
G1 Contents of code of practice
H1 Review of code of practice
I1 Legal status of code of practice

Procedure applying to code
J1 Consultation on code of practice
K1 Bringing code of practice into effect

PART 3
SOLEMN PROCEDURE

63 Proceedings on petition
65 Pre-trial time limits
66 Duty of parties to communicate
67 First diets
68 Preliminary hearings
69 Plea of guilty

PART 4
SENTENCING

Maximum term for weapons offences
71 Maximum term for weapons offences

Prisoners on early release
72 Sentencing under the 1995 Act
73 Sentencing under the 1993 Act

PART 5
APPEALS AND SCCRC

Appeals
74 Preliminary pleas in summary cases
75 Preliminary diets in solemn cases
76 Extending certain time limits: summary
77 Extending certain time limits: solemn
78 Certain lateness not excusable
79 Advocation in solemn proceedings
80 Advocation in summary proceedings
81 Finality of appeal proceedings

SCCRC

82 References by SCCRC

PART 6
MISCELLANEOUS

CHAPTER A1

PUBLICATION OF PROSECUTORIAL TEST

82B Publication of prosecutorial test

CHAPTER B1

SUPPORT FOR VULNERABLE PERSONS

82C Meaning of appropriate adult support
82D Responsibility for ensuring availability of appropriate adults
82E Assessment of quality of appropriate adult support
82F Training for appropriate adults
82G Recommendations from quality assessor and training provider
82H Duty to ensure quality assessment takes place
82J Procedure for making regulations under this Chapter
82K Other powers of Ministers unaffected

CHAPTER C1

NOTIFICATION IF PARENT OF UNDER-18 IMPRISONED

82L Child’s named person to be notified
82M Definition of certain expressions

CHAPTER 1

STATEMENTS AND PROCEDURE

Statements by accused

Use of technology

86 Live television links
86A Electronic proceedings

CHAPTER 1A

AUTHORISATION UNDER PART III OF THE POLICE ACT 1997

86B Authorisation of persons other than constables
CHAPTER 2
POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

87 Establishment and functions
87A Consequential and transitional

PART 7
FINAL PROVISIONS

Ancillary and definition

88 Ancillary regulations
89 Meaning of “the 1995 Act”

Commencement and short title

90 Commencement
91 Short title

Schedule A1—Breach of liberation condition
Schedule 1—Modifications in connection with Part 1
  Part 1—Provisions as to arrest
  Part 2—Further modifications
Schedule 3—Police Negotiating Board for Scotland
Amendments to the Bill since the previous version are indicated by sidelining in the right margin. Wherever possible, provisions that were in the Bill as introduced retain the original numbering.

Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

[AS PASSED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about criminal justice including as to police powers and rights of suspects and as to criminal evidence, procedure and sentencing; to establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland; and for connected purposes.

PART 1

ARREST AND CUSTODY

CHAPTER 1

ARREST BY POLICE

Arrest without warrant

1. Power of a constable

10. (1) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed or is committing an offence.

(2) In relation to an offence not punishable by imprisonment, a constable may arrest a person under subsection (1) only if the constable is satisfied that it would not be in the interests of justice to delay the arrest in order to seek a warrant for the person’s arrest.

15. (3) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2), it would not be in the interests of justice to delay an arrest in order to seek a warrant if the constable reasonably believes that unless the person is arrested without delay the person will—

   (d) continue committing the offence, or

   (e) obstruct the course of justice in any way, including by—

   (i) seeking to avoid arrest, or

   (ii) interfering with witnesses or evidence.

20. (4) For the avoidance of doubt, an offence is to be regarded as not punishable by imprisonment for the purpose of subsection (2) only if no person convicted of the offence can be sentenced to imprisonment in respect of it.

25. Exercise of the power

(1) A person may be arrested under section 1 more than once in respect of the same offence.
A person may not be arrested under section 1 in respect of an offence if the person has been officially accused of committing the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(3) Where—

(a) a constable who is not in uniform arrests a person under section 1, and
(b) the person asks to see the constable’s identification,
the constable must show identification to the person as soon as reasonably practicable.

Procedure following arrest

Information to be given on arrest

When a constable arrests a person (or as soon afterwards as is reasonably practicable), a constable must inform the person—

(a) that the person is under arrest,
(b) of the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested,
(c) of the reason for the arrest,
(d) that the person is under no obligation to say anything, other than to give the information specified in section 26(3), and
(e) of the person’s right to have—

(i) intimation sent to a solicitor under section 35, and
(ii) access to a solicitor under section 36.

Arrested person to be taken to police station

(1) Where a person is arrested by a constable outwith a police station, a constable must take the person as quickly as is reasonably practicable to a police station.

(2) Subsection (1) ceases to apply, and the person must be released from police custody immediately, if—

(a) the person has been arrested without a warrant,
(b) the person has not yet arrived at a police station in accordance with this section, and
(c) in the opinion of a constable there are no reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed—

(i) the offence in respect of which the person was arrested, or
(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

(3) For the avoidance of doubt, subsection (1) ceases to apply if, before arriving at a police station in accordance with this section, the person is released from custody under—

(a) section 19(2), or
(b) section 28(3A) of the 1995 Act.
5 Information to be given at police station

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested at a police station, or
(b) a person is in police custody and has been taken to a police station in accordance with section 4.

(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—

(a) that the person is under no obligation to say anything, other than to give the information specified in section 26(3),
(b) of any right the person has to have intimation sent and to have access to certain persons under—

(i) section 30,
(ii) section 32,
(iii) section 35,
(iv) section 36.

(3) The person must be provided as soon as reasonably practicable with such information (verbally or in writing) as is necessary to satisfy the requirements of Articles 3 and 4 of Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on the right to information in criminal proceedings.

6 Information to be recorded by police

(1) There must be recorded in relation to any arrest by a constable—

(a) the time and place of arrest,
(b) the general nature of the offence in respect of which the person is arrested,
(c) if the person is taken from one place to another while in police custody (including to a police station in accordance with section 4)—

(i) the place from which, and time at which, the person is taken, and
(ii) the place to which the person is taken and the time at which the person arrives there,
(d) the time at which, and the identity of the constable by whom, the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 3,
(da) the time at which the person ceases to be in police custody.

(1A) Where relevant, there must be recorded in relation to an arrest by a constable—

(a) the reason that the constable who released the person from custody under subsection (2) of section 4 formed the opinion mentioned in paragraph (c) of that subsection,
(e) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is—

(i) informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (2) of section 5, and
(ii) provided with information in accordance with subsection (3) of that section,
(ea) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 17A,

(f) the time at which the person requests that intimation be sent under—

(i) section 30,

(ii) section 35,

(g) the time at which intimation is sent under—

(i) section 30,

(ii) section 32A,

(iii) section 33,

(iv) section 35.

(2) Where a person is in police custody and not officially accused of committing an offence, there must be recorded the time, place and outcome of any decision under section 7.

(3) Where a person is held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7 there must be recorded—

(a) the time at which the person is informed of the matters mentioned in section 8,

(b) the time, place and outcome of any custody review under section 9,

(c) the time at which any interview in the circumstances described in section 13(6) begins and the time at which it ends.

(3A) If a constable considers whether to give authorisation under section 12A there must be recorded—

(a) whether a reasonable opportunity to make representations has been afforded in accordance with subsection (4)(a) of that section,

(b) if the opportunity referred to in paragraph (a) has not been afforded, the reason for that,

(c) the time, place and outcome of the constable’s decision, and

(d) if the constable’s decision is to give the authorisation—

(i) the grounds on which it is given,

(ii) the time at which, and the identity of the person by whom, the person is informed and reminded of things in accordance with section 12B, and

(iii) the time at which the person requests that intimation be sent under section 12B(3)(a) and the time at which it is sent.

(3B) Where a person is held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 12A there must be recorded—

(a) the time, place and outcome of any custody review under section 9,

(b) the time at which any interview in the circumstances described in section 13(6) begins and the time at which it ends.

(4) If a person is released from police custody on conditions under section 14, there must be recorded—

(a) details of the conditions imposed, and
(b) the identity of the constable who imposed them.

(5) If a person is charged with an offence by a constable while in police custody, there must be recorded the time at which the person is charged.

Chapter 2

Custody: person not officially accused

Keeping person in custody

7 Authorisation for keeping in custody

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and

(b) since being arrested, the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) Authorisation to keep the person in custody must be sought as soon as reasonably practicable after the person—

(a) is arrested at a police station, or

(b) arrives at a police station, having been taken there in accordance with section 4.

(3) Authorisation may be given only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(4) Authorisation may be given only if that constable is satisfied that the test in section 10 is met.

(5) If authorisation is refused, the person may continue to be held in police custody only if—

(a) a constable charges the person with an offence, or

(b) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions).

8 Information to be given on authorisation

At the time when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given under section 7, the person must be informed of—

(a) the reason that the person is being kept in custody, and

(b) the 12 hour limit arising by virtue of section 11 and the fact that the person may be kept in custody for a further 12 hours under section 12A.

11 12 hour limit: general rule

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 12 hours, beginning with the time at which authorisation was given under section 7, and
(b) during that period the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) The person may continue to be held in police custody only if—
   (a) a constable charges the person with an offence,
   (b) authorisation to keep the person in custody has been given under section 12A, or
   (c) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions).

12 hour limit: previous period

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—
   (a) a person is being held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7,
   (b) authorisation has been given under that section to hold the person in police custody on a previous occasion, and
   (c) the offence in connection with which the authorisation mentioned in paragraph (a) has been given is the same offence or arises from the same circumstances as the offence in connection with which the authorisation mentioned in paragraph (b) was given.

(2) The 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 is reduced by the length of the period during which the person was held in police custody by virtue of the authorisation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).

(3) Subsections (5) and (6) of section 13 apply for the purpose of calculating the length of the period during which the person was held in police custody by virtue of the authorisation mentioned in subsection (1)(b).

12A Authorisation for keeping in custody beyond 12 hour limit

(1) A constable may give authorisation for a person who is in police custody to be kept in custody for a continuous period of 12 hours, beginning when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(2) Authorisation may be given only by a constable who—
   (aa) is of, or above, the rank of—
      (i) inspector, if a constable believes the person to be 18 years of age or over,
      (ii) chief inspector, if a constable believes the person to be under 18 years of age, and
   (b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(3) Authorisation may be given only if—
   (a) the person has not been held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under this section in connection with—
      (i) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody, or
      (ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence, and
   (b) the constable is satisfied that—
(i) the test in section 10 will be met when the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends,
(ii) the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody is an indictable offence, and
(iii) the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously.

(4) Before deciding whether or not to give authorisation the constable must—
(a) where practicable afford a reasonable opportunity to make verbal or written representations to—
(i) the person, or
(ii) if the person so chooses, the person’s solicitor, and
(b) have regard to any representations made.

(5) If authorisation is given, it is deemed to be withdrawn if the person is released from police custody before the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ends.

(6) Subsection (7) applies when—
(a) by virtue of authorisation given under this section, a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 12 hours (beginning with the time at which the 12 hour period mentioned in section 11 ended), and
(b) during that period the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable.

(7) The person may continue to be held in police custody only if—
(a) a constable charges the person with an offence, or
(b) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions).

12B Information to be given on authorisation under section 12A

(1) This section applies when authorisation to keep a person in custody is given under section 12A.

(2) The person must be informed—
(a) that the authorisation has been given, and
(b) of the grounds on which it has been given.

(3) The person—
(a) has the right to have the information mentioned in subsection (2) intimated to a solicitor, and
(b) must be informed of that right.

(4) The person must be reminded about any right which the person has under Chapter 5.

(5) Subsection (4) does not require that a person be reminded about a right to have intimation sent under either of the following sections if the person has exercised the right already—
(a) section 30,
(b) section 35.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
Part 1—Arrest and custody
Chapter 2—Custody: person not officially accused

(6) Information to be given under subsections (2), (3)(b) and (4) must be given to the person as soon as reasonably practicable after the authorisation is given.

(7) Where the person requests that intimation be sent under subsection (3)(a), the intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.

9 Custody review

(1) A custody review must be carried out—
(a) when a person has been held in police custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of authorisation given under section 7, and
(b) again, if authorisation to keep the person in police custody is given under section 12A, when the person has been held in custody for a continuous period of 6 hours by virtue of that authorisation.

(2) A custody review entails the consideration by a constable of whether the test in section 10 is met.

(3) A custody review must be carried out by a constable who—
(a) is of the rank of inspector or above, and
(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in police custody.

(4) If the constable is not satisfied that the test in section 10 is met, the person may continue to be held in police custody only if—
(a) a constable charges the person with an offence, or
(b) the person is detained under section 28(1A) of the 1995 Act (which allows for detention in connection with a breach of bail conditions).

10 Test for sections 7, 12A and 9

(1) For the purposes of sections 7(4), 12A(3)(b) and 9(2), the test is that—
(a) there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed an offence, and
(b) keeping the person in custody is necessary and proportionate for the purposes of bringing the person before a court or otherwise dealing with the person in accordance with the law.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1)(b), in considering what is necessary and proportionate for the purpose mentioned in that subsection regard may be had to—
(a) whether the person’s presence is reasonably required to enable the offence to be investigated fully,
(b) whether the person (if liberated) would be likely to interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,
(c) the nature and seriousness of the offence.
13 Medical treatment

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—
   (a) a person is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant,
   (b) since being arrested, the person has not been charged with an offence by a constable, and
   (c) the person is at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment.

(2) If authorisation to keep the person in custody has not been given under section 7, that section has effect as if—
   (a) each reference in subsection (2) of that section to a police station were a reference to the hospital, and
   (b) the words after the reference to a police station in paragraph (b) of that subsection were omitted.

(3) Where authorisation is given under section 7 when a person is at a hospital, authorisation under that section need not be sought again if, while still in custody, the person is taken to a police station in accordance with section 4.

(4) Subsections (5) and (6) apply for the purpose of calculating the 12 hours mentioned in sections 11 and 12A.

(5) Except as provided for in subsection (6), no account is to be taken of any period during which a person is—
   (a) at a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, or
   (b) being taken as quickly as is reasonably practicable—
      (i) to a hospital for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, or
      (ii) to a police station from a hospital to which the person was taken for the purpose of receiving medical treatment.

(6) Account is to be taken of any period during which a person is both—
   (a) at a hospital, or being taken to or from one, and
   (b) being interviewed by a constable in relation to an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing.

Investigative liberation

14 Release on conditions

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—
   (a) a person is being held in police custody by virtue of authorisation given under section 7,
   (b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence, and
   (d) either—
      (i) the person has not been subject to a condition imposed under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence, or
(ii) it has not been more than 28 days since the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under subsection (2) in connection with a relevant offence.

(2) If releasing the person from custody, a constable may impose any condition that an appropriate constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence (including, for example, a condition aimed at securing that the person does not interfere with witnesses or evidence).

(2A) A condition under subsection (2)—

(a) may not require the person to be in a specified place at a specified time,

(b) may require the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period.

(3) A condition imposed under subsection (2) is a liberation condition for the purposes of schedule A1.

(5) In subsection (2), “an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of sergeant or above.

(6) In this section, “a relevant offence” means—

(a) the offence in connection with which the authorisation under section 7 has been given, or

(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

15 Conditions ceasing to apply

(1) A condition imposed on a person under section 14(2) ceases to apply—

(a) at the end of the day falling 28 days after the first occasion on which a condition was imposed on the person under section 14(2) in connection with a relevant offence, or

(b) before then, if—

(i) the condition is removed by a notice under section 16,

(ii) the person is arrested in connection with a relevant offence,

(iii) the person is officially accused of committing a relevant offence, or

(iv) the condition is removed by the sheriff under section 17.

(2) In subsection (1), “a relevant offence” means—

(a) the offence in connection with which the condition was imposed, or

(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

16 Modification or removal of conditions

(1) A constable may by notice modify or remove a condition imposed under section 14(2).

(2) A notice under subsection (1)—
(a) is to be given in writing to the person who is subject to the condition,
(b) must specify the time from which the condition is modified or removed.

(3) A constable of the rank of inspector or above must keep under review whether or not—
(a) there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) has committed a relevant offence, and
(b) the condition imposed remains necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring the proper conduct of the investigation into a relevant offence.

(4) Where the constable referred to in subsection (3) is no longer satisfied as to the matter mentioned in paragraph (a) of that subsection, a constable must give notice to the person removing any condition imposed in connection with a relevant offence.

(5) Where the constable referred to in subsection (3) is no longer satisfied as to the matter mentioned in paragraph (b) of that subsection, a constable must give notice to the person—
(a) modifying the condition in question, or
(b) removing it.

(6) Where a duty to give notice to a person arises under subsection (4) or (5), the notice—
(a) is to be given in writing to the person as soon as practicable, and
(b) must specify, as the time from which the condition is modified or removed, the time at which the duty to give the notice arose.

(7) The modification or removal of a condition under subsection (1), (4) or (5) requires the authority of a constable of the rank of inspector or above.

(8) In this section, “a relevant offence” means—
(a) the offence in connection with which the condition was imposed, or
(b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

17 Review of conditions

(1) A person who is subject to a condition imposed under section 14(2) may apply to the sheriff to have the condition reviewed.

(2) Before disposing of an application under this section, the sheriff must give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations.

(3) If the sheriff is not satisfied that the condition is necessary and proportionate for the purpose for which it was imposed, the sheriff may—
(a) remove the condition, or
(b) impose an alternative condition that the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate for that purpose.

(4) For the purposes of sections 15 and 16, a condition imposed by the sheriff under subsection (3)(b) is to be regarded as having been imposed under section 14(2).
CHAPTER 3
CUSTODY: PERSON OFFICIALLY ACCUSED

Person to be brought before court

17A Information to be given if sexual offence

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—
(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant in respect of a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies, or
(b) a person—
   (i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
   (ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged by a constable with a sexual offence to which section 288C of the 1995 Act applies.

(2) The person must be informed as soon as reasonably practicable—
(a) that the person’s case at, or for the purposes of, any relevant hearing (within the meaning of section 288C(1A) of the 1995 Act) in the course of the proceedings may be conducted only by a lawyer,
(b) that it is, therefore, in the person’s interests to get the professional assistance of a solicitor, and
(c) that if the person does not engage a solicitor for the purposes of the conduct of the person’s case at or for the purposes of the hearing, the court will do so.

18 Person to be brought before court

(1) Subsection (2) applies to a person when—
(a) the person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant (other than a warrant granted under section 29(1)), or
(b) the person—
   (i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
   (ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) The person must be brought before a court (unless released from custody under section 19)—
(a) if practicable, before the end of the first day on which the court is sitting after the day on which this subsection began to apply to the person, or
(b) as soon as practicable after that.

(3) A person is deemed to be brought before a court in accordance with subsection (2) if the person appears before it by means of a live television link (by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means).

18A Under 18s to be kept in place of safety prior to court

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—
(a) a person is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), and
(b) either—
   (i) a constable believes the person is under 16 years of age, or
   (ii) the person is subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings
       (Scotland) Act 2011.

(2) The person must (unless released from custody under section 19) be kept in a place of safety until the person can be brought before the court.

(3) The place of safety in which the person is kept must not be a police station unless an appropriate constable certifies that keeping the person in a place of safety other than a police station would be—
   (a) impracticable,
   (b) unsafe, or
   (c) inadvisable due to the person’s state of health (physical or mental).

(4) A certificate under subsection (3) must be produced to the court when the person is brought before it.

(5) In this section—
   “an appropriate constable” means a constable of the rank of inspector or above,
   “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

18B Notice to parent that under 18 to be brought before court

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a person who is 16 years of age or over and subject to a supervision order or under 16 years of age—
   (a) is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or
   (b) is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) A parent of the person mentioned in subsection (1) (if one can be found) must be informed of the following matters—
   (a) the court before which the person is to be brought,
   (b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court,
   (c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing, and
   (d) that the parent’s attendance at the court may be required under section 42 of the

(3) Subsection (2) does not require any information to be given to a parent if a constable has grounds to believe that giving the parent the information mentioned in that subsection may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person mentioned in subsection (1).

(4) In this section—
   “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person mentioned in subsection (1),
“supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

18C Notice to local authority that under 18 to be brought before court

(1) The appropriate local authority must be informed of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) when—

(a) a person to whom either subsection (2) or (3) applies is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2), or

(b) a person to whom subsection (2) applies is released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(2) This subsection applies to—

(a) a person who is under 16 years of age,

(b) a person who is—

(i) 16 or 17 years of age, and

(ii) subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(3) This subsection applies to a person if—

(a) a constable believes the person is 16 or 17 years of age,

(b) since being arrested, the person has not exercised the right to have intimation sent under section 30, and

(c) on being informed or reminded of the right to have intimation sent under that section after being officially accused, the person has declined to exercise the right.

(4) The matters referred to in subsection (1) are—

(a) the court before which the person mentioned in paragraph (a) or (as the case may be) (b) of that subsection is to be brought,

(b) the date on which the person is to be brought before the court, and

(c) the general nature of the offence which the person has been officially accused of committing.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (1), the appropriate local authority is the local authority in whose area the court referred to in subsection (4)(a) sits.

Liberation by police

(1) Subsection (2) applies when—

(a) a person is in police custody having been arrested under a warrant (other than a warrant granted under section 29(1)), or

(b) a person—

(i) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
Part 1—Arrest and custody
Chapter 3—Custody: person officially accused

(ii) since being arrested, the person has been charged with an offence by a constable.

(2) A constable may—

(a) if the person gives an undertaking in accordance with section 20, release the person from custody,

(b) release the person from custody without such an undertaking,

(c) refuse to release the person from custody.

(2A) Where a person is in custody as mentioned in subsection (1)(a), the person may not be released from custody under subsection (2)(b).

(3) A constable is not to be subject to any claim whatsoever by reason of having refused to release a person from custody under subsection (2)(c).

20 Release on undertaking

(1) A person may be released from police custody on an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) only if the person signs the undertaking.

(2) The terms of an undertaking are that the person undertakes to—

(a) appear at a specified court at a specified time, and

(b) comply with any conditions imposed under subsection (3) while subject to the undertaking.

(3) The conditions which may be imposed under this subsection are—

(a) that the person does not—

(i) commit an offence,

(ii) interfere with witnesses or evidence, or otherwise obstruct the course of justice,

(iii) behave in a manner which causes, or is likely to cause, alarm or distress to witnesses,

(b) any further condition that a constable considers necessary and proportionate for the purpose of ensuring that any conditions imposed under paragraph (a) are observed.

(4) Conditions which may be imposed under subsection (3)(b) include—

(a) a condition requiring the person—

(i) to be in a specified place at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain there for a specified period,

(b) a condition requiring the person—

(i) not to be in a specified place, or category of place, at a specified time, and

(ii) to remain outwith that place, or any place falling within the specified category (if any), for a specified period.

(5) For the imposition of a condition under subsection (3)(b)—
(a) if it is of the kind described in subsection (4)(a), the authority of a constable of the rank of inspector or above is required,

(b) if it is of any other kind, the authority of a constable of the rank of sergeant or above is required.

(6) The requirements imposed by an undertaking to attend at a court and comply with conditions are liberation conditions for the purposes of schedule A1.

21 Modification of undertaking

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice modify the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) by—

(a) changing the court specified as the court at which the person is to appear,

(b) changing the time specified as the time at which the person is to appear at the court,

(c) removing or altering any condition imposed under section 20(3).

(2) A condition may not be altered under subsection (1)(c) so as to forbid or require something not forbidden or required by the terms of the condition when the person gave the undertaking.

(3) Notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

21A Rescission of undertaking

(1) The procurator fiscal may by notice rescind an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) (whether or not the person who gave it is to be prosecuted).

(2) The rescission of an undertaking by virtue of subsection (1) takes effect at the end of the day on which the notice is sent.

(3) Notice under subsection (1) must be effected in a manner by which citation may be effected under section 141 of the 1995 Act.

(4) A constable may arrest a person without a warrant if the constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person is likely to fail to comply with the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a).

(5) Where a person is arrested under subsection (4) or subsection (6) applies—

(a) the undertaking referred to in subsection (4) or (as the case may be) (6) is rescinded, and

(b) this Part applies as if the person, since being most recently arrested, has been charged with the offence in connection with which the person was in police custody when the undertaking was given.

(6) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person who is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) is in police custody (otherwise than as a result of having been arrested under subsection (4)), and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has failed, or (if liberated) is likely to fail, to comply with the terms of the undertaking.
(7) The references in subsections (4) and (6)(b) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by—

(a) notice under section 21(1), or

(b) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).

21B Expiry of undertaking

(1) An undertaking given under section 19(2)(a) expires—

(a) at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is required by its terms to appear at a court, or

(b) if subsection (2) applies, at the end of the day on which the person who gave it is brought before a court having been arrested under the warrant mentioned in that subsection.

(2) This subsection applies where—

(a) a person fails to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), and

(b) on account of that failure, a warrant for the person’s arrest is granted.

(3) The references in subsections (1)(a) and (2)(a) to the terms of the undertaking are to the terms of the undertaking subject to any modification by notice under section 21(1).

22 Review of undertaking

(1) A person who is subject to an undertaking containing a condition imposed under section 20(3)(b) may apply to the sheriff to have the condition reviewed.

(2) Before disposing of an application under this section, the sheriff must give the procurator fiscal an opportunity to make representations.

(3) If the sheriff is not satisfied that the condition is necessary and proportionate for the purpose for which it was imposed, the sheriff may modify the terms of the undertaking by—

(a) removing the condition, or

(b) imposing an alternative condition that the sheriff considers to be necessary and proportionate for that purpose.

Chapter 4

Police interview

Rights of suspects

23 Information to be given before interview

(1) Subsection (2) applies to a person who—

(a) is in police custody, or

(b) is attending at a police station or other place voluntarily for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.
(2) Not more than one hour before a constable interviews the person about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing, the person must be informed—
   (za) of the general nature of that offence,
   (a) that the person is under no obligation to say anything other than to give the information specified in section 26(3),
   (b) about the right under section 24 to have a solicitor present during the interview,
       and
   (c) if the person is in police custody, about any right which the person has under
       Chapter 5.

(3) A person need not be informed under subsection (2)(c) about a right to have intimation sent under either of the following sections if the person has exercised the right already—
   (a) section 30,
   (b) section 35.

(4) For the purpose of subsection (2), a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking the person for the information specified in section 26(3).

(5) Where a person is to be interviewed by virtue of authorisation granted under section 27, before the interview begins the person must be informed of what was specified by the court under subsection (6) of that section.

24 Right to have solicitor present

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply to a person who—
   (a) is in police custody, or
   (b) is attending at a police station or other place voluntarily for the purpose of being interviewed by a constable.

(2) The person has the right to have a solicitor present while being interviewed by a constable about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of committing.

(3) Accordingly—
   (a) unless the person consents to being interviewed without having a solicitor present, a constable must not begin to interview the person about the offence until the person’s solicitor is present, and
   (b) the person’s solicitor must not be denied access to the person at any time while a constable is interviewing the person about the offence.

(4) Despite subsection (3)(a) a constable may, in exceptional circumstances, proceed to interview the person without a solicitor being present if it is necessary to interview the person without delay in the interests of—
   (a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or
   (b) the apprehension of offenders.
(4A) A decision to allow the person to be interviewed without a solicitor present by virtue of subsection (4) may be taken only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in investigating the offence about which the person is to be interviewed.

(5) For the purposes of subsections (2) and (3), a constable is not to be regarded as interviewing a person about an offence merely by asking the person for the information specified in section 26(3).

(6) Where a person consents to being interviewed without having a solicitor present, there must be recorded—

(a) the time at which the person consented, and

(b) any reason given by the person at that time for waiving the right to have a solicitor present.

Consent to interview without solicitor

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply for the purpose of section 24(3)(a).

(2) A person may not consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present if—

(a) the person is under 16 years of age

(aa) the person is 16 or 17 years of age and subject to a compulsory supervision order, or an interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011, or

(b) the person is 16 years of age or over and, owing to mental disorder, appears to a constable to be unable to—

(i) understand sufficiently what is happening, or

(ii) communicate effectively with the police.

(3) A person to whom this subsection applies (referred to in subsection (5) as “person A”) may consent to being interviewed without having a solicitor present only with the agreement of a relevant person.

(4) Subsection (3) applies to a person who is—

(a) 16 or 17 years of age, and

(b) not precluded by subsection (2)(aa) or (b) from consenting to being interviewed without having a solicitor present.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (3), “a relevant person” means—

(a) if person A is in police custody, any person who is entitled to access to person A by virtue of section 32(2),

(b) if person A is not in police custody, a person who is—

(i) at least 18 years of age, and

(ii) reasonably named by person A.

(6) In subsection (2)(b)—
(a) “mental disorder” has the meaning given by section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003,

(b) the reference to the police is to any—
   (i) constable, or
   (ii) person appointed as a member of police staff under section 26(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

Person not officially accused

26 Questioning following arrest

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply where—
    (a) a person is in police custody in relation to an offence, and
    (b) the person has not been officially accused of committing the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(2) A constable may put questions to the person in relation to the offence.

(2A) For the avoidance of doubt, nothing in this section is to be taken to mean that a constable cannot put questions to the person in relation to any other matter.

(3) The person is under no obligation to answer any question, other than to give the following information—
   (a) the person’s name,
   (b) the person’s address,
   (c) the person’s date of birth,
   (d) the person’s place of birth (in such detail as a constable considers necessary or expedient for the purpose of establishing the person’s identity), and
   (e) the person’s nationality.

(4) Subsection (2) is without prejudice to any rule of law as regards the admissibility in evidence of any answer given.

Person officially accused

27 Authorisation for questioning

(1) The court may authorise a constable to question a person about an offence after the person has been officially accused of committing the offence.

(2) The court may grant authorisation only if it is satisfied that allowing the person to be questioned about the offence is necessary in the interests of justice.

(3) In deciding whether to grant authorisation, the court must take into account—
   (a) the seriousness of the offence,
   (b) the extent to which the person could have been questioned earlier in relation to the information which the applicant believes may be elicited by the proposed questioning,
(c) where the person could have been questioned earlier in relation to that information, whether it could reasonably have been foreseen at that time that the information might be important to proving or disproving that the person has committed an offence.

(4) Where subsection (5) applies, the court must give the person an opportunity to make representations before deciding whether to grant authorisation.

(5) This subsection applies where—

(a) a warrant has been granted to arrest the person in respect of the offence, or
(b) the person has appeared before a court in relation to the offence.

(6) Where granting authorisation, the court—

(a) must specify the period for which questioning is authorised, and
(b) may specify such other conditions as the court considers necessary to ensure that allowing the proposed questioning is not unfair to the person.

(7) A decision of the court—

(a) to grant or refuse authorisation, or
(b) to specify, or not to specify, conditions under subsection (6)(b), is final.

(8) In this section, “the court” means—

(a) where an indictment has been served on the person in respect of the High Court, a single judge of that court,
(b) in any other case, the sheriff.

28 Authorisation: further provision

(1) An application for authorisation may be made—

(a) where section 27(5) applies, by the prosecutor, or
(b) in any other case, by a constable.

(2) In subsection (1)(a), “the prosecutor” means—

(a) where an indictment has been served on the person in respect of the High Court, Crown Counsel, or
(b) in any other case, the procurator fiscal.

(3) Where an application for authorisation is made in writing (rather than orally) it must—

(a) be made in such form as may be prescribed by act of adjournal (or as nearly as may be in such form), and
(b) state whether another application has been made for authorisation to question the person about the offence or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence.

(4) Authorisation ceases to apply as soon as either—

(a) the period specified under section 27(6)(a) expires, or
(b) the person’s trial in respect of the offence, or an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence, begins.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (4)(b), a trial begins—
(a) in proceedings on indictment, when the jury is sworn,
(b) in summary proceedings, when the first witness for the prosecution is sworn.

(6) In this section—
“authorisation” means authorisation under section 27,
“the offence” means the offence referred to in section 27(1).

29 Arrest to facilitate questioning

(1) On granting authorisation under section 27, the court may also grant a warrant for the person’s arrest if it seems to the court expedient to do so.

(2) The court must specify in a warrant granted under subsection (1) the maximum period for which the person may be detained under it.

(3) The person’s detention under a warrant granted under subsection (1) must end as soon as—
(a) the period of the person’s detention under the warrant becomes equal to the maximum period specified under subsection (2),
(b) the authorisation ceases to apply (see section 28(4)), or
(c) in the opinion of the constable responsible for the investigation into the offence referred to in section 27(1), there are no longer reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed—
(i) that offence, or
(ii) an offence arising from the same circumstances as that offence.

(4) For the purpose of subsection (3)(a), the period of the person’s detention under the warrant begins when the person—
(a) is arrested at a police station, or
(b) arrives at a police station, having been taken there in accordance with section 4.

(5) For the avoidance of doubt—
(a) if the person is on bail when a warrant under subsection (1) is granted, the order admitting the person to bail is not impliedly recalled by the granting of the warrant,
(b) if the person is on bail when arrested under a warrant granted under subsection (1)—
(i) despite being in custody by virtue of the warrant the person remains on bail for the purpose of section 24(5)(b) of the 1995 Act,
(ii) when the person’s detention under the warrant ends, the bail order continues to apply as it did immediately before the person’s arrest,
(c) if the person is subject to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a), the person remains subject to the undertaking despite—
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
Part 1—Arrest and custody
Chapter 5—Rights of suspects in police custody

(i) the granting of a warrant under subsection (1),
(ii) the person’s arrest and detention under it.

CHAPTER 5

RIGHTS OF SUSPECTS IN POLICE CUSTODY

5

Intimation and access to another person

30 Right to have intimation sent to other person

(1) A person in police custody has the right to have intimation sent to another person of—

(a) the fact that the person is in custody,
(b) the place where the person is in custody.

(2) Intimation under subsection (1) must be sent—

(a) where a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, regardless of whether the person requests that it be sent,
(b) in any other case, if the person requests that it be sent.

(3) The person to whom intimation is to be sent under subsection (1) is—

(a) where a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, a parent of the person,
(b) in any other case, an adult reasonably named by the person in custody.

(4) Intimation under subsection (1) must be sent—

(a) as soon as reasonably practicable, or
(b) if subsection (5) applies, with no more delay than is necessary.

(5) This subsection applies where an appropriate constable considers some delay to be necessary in the interests of—

(a) the investigation or prevention of crime,
(b) the apprehension of offenders, or
(c) safeguarding and promoting the wellbeing of the person in custody, where a constable believes that person to be under 18 years of age.

(5ZA) In subsection (5), “an appropriate constable” means a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and
(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.

(5A) The sending of intimation may be delayed by virtue of subsection (5)(c) only for so long as is necessary to ascertain whether a local authority will arrange for someone to visit the person in custody under section 32A(2).

(6) In this section and section 31—

“adult” means person who is at least 18 years of age,
“parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person in custody.
31 Right to have intimation sent: under 18s

(1) This section applies where a constable believes that a person in police custody is under 18 years of age.

(2) At the time of sending intimation to a person under section 30(1), that person must be asked to attend at the police station or other place where the person in custody is being held.

(2A) Subsection (2) does not apply if—

(a) a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, and

(b) the person in custody requests that the person to whom intimation is to be sent under section 30(1) is not asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held.

(3) Subsections (3A) and (4) apply where—

(a) it is not practicable or possible to contact, within a reasonable time, the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3),

(b) the person to whom intimation is sent by virtue of section 30(3), if asked to attend at the place where the person in custody is being held, claims to be unable or unwilling to attend within a reasonable time, or

(c) a local authority, acting under section 32A(8)(a), has advised against sending intimation to the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3).

(3A) Section 30(3) ceases to have effect.

(4) Attempts to send intimation to an appropriate person under section 30(1) must continue to be made until—

(a) an appropriate person is contacted and agrees to attend, within a reasonable time, at the police station or other place where the person in custody is being held, or

(b) if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, the person requests that (for the time being) no further attempt to send intimation is made.

(5) In subsection (4), “an appropriate person” means—

(a) if a constable believes that the person in custody is under 16 years of age, a person the constable considers appropriate having regard to the views of the person in custody,

(b) if a constable believes that the person in custody is 16 or 17 years of age, an adult who is named by the person in custody and to whom a constable is willing to send intimation without a delay by virtue of section 30(5)(a) or (b).

(6) The reference in subsection (3)(a) to its not being possible to contact a person within a reasonable time includes the case where, by virtue of section 30(5)(a) or (b), a constable delays sending intimation to the person.
32  Right of under 18s to have access to other person

(1) Access to a person in police custody who a constable believes is under 16 years of age must be permitted to—
   (a) a parent of the person,
   (b) where a parent is not available, a person sent intimation under section 30 in respect of the person in custody.

(2) Access to a person in police custody who a constable believes is 16 or 17 years of age must be permitted to a person sent intimation under section 30 in respect of the person in custody where the person in custody wishes to have access to the person sent intimation.

(2A) Access to a person in custody under subsection (1) or (2) need not be permitted to more than one person at the same time.

(3) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (1) or (2) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—
   (a) in the interests of—
      (i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or
      (ii) the apprehension of offenders, or
   (b) for the wellbeing of the person in custody.

(3A) A decision to refuse or restrict access to a person in custody under subsection (1) or (2) may be taken only by a constable who—
   (a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and
   (b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.

(4) In this section, “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the person in custody.

32A  Social work involvement in relation to under 18s

(1) Intimation of the fact that a person is in police custody and the place where the person is in custody must be sent to a local authority as soon as reasonably practicable if—
   (a) a constable believes that the person may be subject to a supervision order, or
   (b) by virtue of subsection (5)(c) of section 30, a constable has delayed sending intimation in respect of the person under subsection (1) of that section.

(2) A local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) may arrange for someone to visit the person in custody if—
   (a) the person is subject to a supervision order, or
   (b) the local authority—
      (i) believes the person to be under 16 years of age, and
      (ii) has grounds to believe that its arranging someone to visit the person would best safeguard and promote the person’s wellbeing (having regard to the effect of subsection (4)(a)).
(3) Before undertaking to arrange someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2), the local authority must be satisfied that anyone it arranges to visit the person in custody will be able to make the visit within a reasonable time.

(4) Where a local authority arranges for someone to visit the person in custody under subsection (2)—

(a) sections 30 and 32 cease to have effect, and

(b) the person who the local authority has arranged to visit the person in custody must be permitted access to the person in custody.

(5) In exceptional circumstances, access under subsection (4)(b) may be refused or restricted so far as the refusal or restriction is necessary—

(a) in the interests of—

(i) the investigation or prevention of crime, or

(ii) the apprehension of offenders, or

(b) for the wellbeing of the person in custody.

(5A) A decision to refuse or restrict access to a person in custody under subsection (4)(b) may be taken only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.

(6) Where a local authority sent intimation under subsection (1) confirms that the person in custody is—

(a) over 16 years of age, and

(b) subject to a supervision order,

sections 30 to 32 are to be applied in respect of the person as if a constable believes the person to be under 16 years of age.

(7) Subsection (8) applies where a local authority might have arranged for someone to visit a person in custody under subsection (2) but—

(a) chose not to do so, or

(b) was precluded from doing so by subsection (3).

(8) The local authority may—

(a) advise a constable that the person to whom intimation is to be sent by virtue of section 30(3) should not be sent intimation if the local authority has grounds to believe that sending intimation to that person may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the person in custody, and

(b) give advice as to who might be an appropriate person to a constable considering that matter under section 31(5) (and the constable must have regard to any such advice).

(9) In this section, “supervision order” means compulsory supervision order, or interim compulsory supervision order, made under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.
Vulnerable persons

33 Support for vulnerable persons

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a person is in police custody,

(b) a constable believes that the person is 16 years of age or over, and

(c) owing to mental disorder, the person appears to the constable to be unable to—

(i) understand sufficiently what is happening, or

(ii) communicate effectively with the police.

(2) With a view to facilitating the provision of support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) to the person as soon as reasonably practicable, the constable must ensure that intimation of the matters mentioned in subsection (4) is sent to a person who the constable considers is suitable to provide the support.

(3) That is, support to—

(a) help the person in custody to understand what is happening, and

(b) facilitate effective communication between the person and the police.

(4) Those matters are—

(a) the place where the person is in custody, and

(b) that support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) is, in the view of the constable, required by the person.

(5) In this section—

(a) “mental disorder” has the meaning given by section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003,

(b) the references to the police are to any—

(i) constable, or

(ii) person appointed as a member of police staff under section 26(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

Intimation and access to a solicitor

35 Right to have intimation sent to solicitor

(1) A person who is in police custody has the right to have intimation sent to a solicitor of any or all of the following—

(a) the fact that the person is in custody,

(b) the place where the person is in custody,

(c) that the solicitor’s professional assistance is required by the person,

(d) if the person has been officially accused of an offence—

(i) whether the person is to be released from custody, and
(ii) where the person is not to be released, the court before which the person is to be brought in accordance with section 18(2) and the date on which the person is to be brought before that court.

(2) Where the person requests that intimation be sent under subsection (1), the intimation must be sent as soon as reasonably practicable.

36 Right to consultation with solicitor

(1) A person who is in police custody has the right to have a private consultation with a solicitor at any time.

(2) In exceptional circumstances, the person’s exercise of the right under subsection (1) may be delayed so far as that is necessary in the interests of—

(a) the investigation or the prevention of crime, or

(b) the apprehension of offenders.

(2A) A decision to delay the person’s exercise of the right under subsection (1) may be taken only by a constable who—

(a) is of the rank of sergeant or above, and

(b) has not been involved in the investigation in connection with which the person is in custody.

(3) In subsection (1), “consultation” means consultation by such method as may be appropriate in the circumstances and includes (for example) consultation by telephone.

Chapter 6

Police powers and duties

37 Use of reasonable force

A constable may use reasonable force—

(a) to effect an arrest,

(b) when taking a person who is in police custody to any place.

38 Common law power of entry

Nothing in this Part affects any rule of law concerning the powers of a constable to enter any premises for any purpose.

39 Common law power of search etc.

(1) Nothing in this Part affects any rule of law by virtue of which a constable may exercise a power of the type described in subsection (2).

(2) The type of power is a power that a constable may exercise in relation to a person by reason of the person’s having been arrested and charged with an offence by a constable.

(3) Powers of the type described in subsection (2) include the power to—

(a) search the person,
(b) seize any item in the person’s possession,
(d) cause the person to participate in an identification procedure.

40  Power of search etc. on arrest

(1) A constable may exercise in relation to a person to whom subsection (2) applies any power of the type described in section 39(2) which the constable would be able to exercise by virtue of a rule of law if the person had been charged with the relevant offence by a constable.

(2) This subsection applies to a person who—

(a) is in police custody having been arrested without a warrant, and
(b) has not, since being arrested, been charged with an offence by a constable.

(3) In subsection (1), “the relevant offence” means the offence in connection with which the person is in police custody.

Care of drunken persons

40A  Taking drunk persons to designated place

(1) Where—

(a) a person is liable to be arrested in respect of an offence by a constable without a warrant, and
(b) the constable is of the opinion that the person is drunk,

the constable may take the person to a designated place (and do so instead of arresting the person).

(2) Nothing done under subsection (1)—

(a) makes a person liable to be held unwillingly at a designated place, or
(b) prevents a constable from arresting the person in respect of the offence referred to in that subsection.

(3) In this section, “designated place” is any place designated by the Scottish Ministers for the purpose of this section as a place suitable for the care of drunken persons.

Duties of police

41  Duty not to detain unnecessarily

A constable must take every precaution to ensure that a person is not unreasonably or unnecessarily held in police custody.

42  Duty to consider child’s wellbeing

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a constable is deciding whether to—

(a) arrest a child,
(b) hold a child in police custody,
(c) interview a child about an offence which the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect the child of committing, or

(d) charge a child with committing an offence.

(2) In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a child is a person who is under 18 years of age.

42A Duties in relation to children in custody

(1) A child who is in police custody at a police station is, so far as practicable, to be prevented from associating with any adult who is officially accused of committing an offence other than an adult to whom subsection (2) applies.

(2) This subsection applies to an adult if a constable believes that it may be detrimental to the wellbeing of the child mentioned in subsection (1) to prevent the child and adult from associating with one another.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

“child” means person who is under 18 years of age,

“adult” means person who is 18 years of age or over.

42B Duty to inform Principal Reporter if child not being prosecuted

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply if—

(a) a person is being kept in a place of safety in accordance with section 18A(2) when it is decided not to prosecute the person for any relevant offence, and

(b) a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has committed a relevant offence.

(2) The Principal Reporter must be informed, as soon as reasonably practicable, that the person is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3).

(3) The person must be kept in a place of safety under this subsection until the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.

(4) An offence is a “relevant offence” for the purpose of subsection (1) if—

(a) it is the offence with which the person was officially accused, leading to the person being kept in the place of safety in accordance with section 18A(2), or

(b) it is an offence arising from the same circumstances as the offence mentioned in paragraph (a).

(5) In this section, “place of safety” has the meaning given in section 202(1) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011.
CHAPTER 8

GENERAL

Common law and enactments

50 Abolition of pre-enactment powers of arrest

A constable has no power to arrest a person without a warrant in respect of an offence that has been or is being committed other than—

(a) the power of arrest conferred by section 1,
(b) the power of arrest conferred by section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

51 Abolition of requirement for constable to charge

Any rule of law that requires a constable to charge a person with an offence in particular circumstances is abolished.

52 Consequential modification

Schedule 1 contains repeals and other provisions consequential on this Part.

Code of practice about investigative functions

52A Code of practice about investigative functions

(1) The Lord Advocate must issue a code of practice on—

(a) the questioning, and recording of questioning, of persons suspected of committing offences, and
(b) the conduct of identification procedures involving such persons.

(2) The Lord Advocate—

(a) must keep the code of practice issued under subsection (1) under review,
(b) may from time to time revise the code of practice.

(3) The code of practice is to apply to the functions exercisable by or on behalf of—

(a) the Police Service of Scotland,
(b) such other bodies as are specified in the code (being bodies responsible for reporting offences to the procurator fiscal).

(4) Before issuing the code of practice, the Lord Advocate must consult publicly on a draft of the code.

(5) When preparing a draft of the code of practice for public consultation, the Lord Advocate must consult—

(a) the Lord Justice General,
(b) the Faculty of Advocates,
(c) the Law Society of Scotland,
(d) the Scottish Police Authority,
(e) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
(f) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
(g) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
(h) such other persons as the Lord Advocate considers appropriate.

(6) The Lord Advocate must lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of the code of practice issued under this section.

(7) A court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings must take the code of practice into account when determining any question arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant.

(8) Breach of the code of practice does not of itself give rise to grounds for any legal claim whatsoever.

(9) Subsections (3) to (8) apply to a revised code of practice under subsection (2)(b) as they apply to the code of practice issued under subsection (1).

Disapplication of Part

52B Disapplication in relation to service offences

(1) References in this Part to an offence do not include a service offence.

(2) Nothing in this Part applies in relation to a person who is arrested in respect of a service offence.

(3) In this section, “service offence” has the meaning given by section 50(2) of the Armed Forces Act 2006.

53 Disapplication in relation to terrorism offences

(1) Nothing in this Part applies in relation to a person who is arrested under section 41(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to paragraph 18 of Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000.

Powers to modify Part

53A Further provision about application of Part

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify this Part to provide that some or all of it—

(a) applies in relation to persons to whom it would otherwise not apply because of—

(i) section 52B, or

(ii) section 53,

(b) does not apply in relation to persons arrested otherwise than under section 1.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such modifications to this Part as seem to them necessary or expedient in relation to its application to persons mentioned in subsection (1).

(3) Regulations under this section may make different provision for different purposes.

(4) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.
53B Further provision about vulnerable persons

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—
   (a) amend subsections (2)(b) and (6) of section 25,
   (b) amend subsections (1)(c), (3) and (5) of section 33,
   (c) specify descriptions of persons who may for the purposes of subsection (2) of section 33 be considered suitable to provide support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of that section (including as to training, qualifications and experience).

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

Interpretation of Part

54 Meaning of constable
In this Part, “constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.

55 Meaning of officially accused
For the purposes of this Part, a person is officially accused of committing an offence if—
   (a) a constable charges the person with the offence, or
   (b) the prosecutor initiates proceedings against the person in respect of the offence.

56 Meaning of police custody

(1) For the purposes of this Part, a person is in police custody from the time the person is arrested by a constable until any one of the events mentioned in subsection (2) occurs.

(2) The events are—
   (a) the person is released from custody,
   (b) the person is brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2),
   (ba) the person is brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of the 1995 Act,
   (c) the Principal Reporter makes a direction under section 65(2)(b) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 that the person continue to be kept in a place of safety.
PART A1

POLICE PROCEDURES

CHAPTER 1

SEARCH OF PERSON NOT IN POLICE CUSTODY

5

Lawfulness of search by constable

A1 Limitation on what enables search

(1) This section applies in relation to a person who is not in police custody.

(2) It is unlawful for a constable to search the person otherwise than—

(a) in accordance with a power of search conferred in express terms by an enactment,

(b) under the authority of a warrant expressly conferring a power of search.

B1 Cases involving removal of person

(1) A person who is not in police custody may be searched by a constable while the person is to be, or is being, taken to or from any place—

(a) by virtue of any enactment, warrant or court order requiring or permitting the constable to do so, or

(b) in circumstances in which the constable believes that it is necessary to do so with respect to the care or protection of the person.

(2) A search under this section is to be carried out for the purpose of ensuring that the person is not in, or does not remain in, possession of any item or substance that could cause harm to the person or someone else.

(3) Anything seized by a constable in the course of a search carried out under this section may be retained by the constable.

B2 Public safety at premises or events

(1) A person who is not in police custody may be searched by a constable if—

(a) the person—

(i) is seeking to enter, or has entered, relevant premises, or

(ii) is seeking to attend, or is attending, a relevant event, and

(b) the further criteria are met.

(2) Premises are or an event is relevant if—

(a) the premises may be entered, or the event may be attended, by members of the public (including where dependent on possession of a ticket or on payment of a charge), and

(b) the entry or the attendance is controlled, at the time of the entry or the attendance, by or on behalf of the occupier of the premises or the organiser of the event.

(3) The further criteria to be met are that—
C1 Duty to consider child’s best interests

(1) Subsection (2) applies when a constable is deciding whether to search a child who is not in police custody.

(2) In taking the decision, the constable must treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of the child as a primary consideration.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a child is a person who is under 18 years of age.

Miscellaneous and definitions

C2 Publication of information by police

(1) The Police Service of Scotland must ensure that, as soon as practicable after the end of each reporting year, information is published on how many times during the reporting year a search was carried out by a constable—

(a) of a person not in police custody, and

(b) otherwise than under the authority of a warrant expressly conferring a power of search.

(2) So far as practicable, the information is to disclose (in addition)—

(a) how many persons were searched on two or more occasions,

(b) the age and gender, and the ethnic and national origin, of the persons searched,

(c) the proportion of searches that resulted in—

(i) something being seized by a constable,

(ii) a case being reported to the procurator fiscal,

(d) the number of complaints made to the Police Service of Scotland about the carrying out of searches (or the manner in which they were carried out).

(3) In this section, “reporting year” means a yearly period ending on 31 March.

D1 Provisions about possession of alcohol

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend section 61 (confiscation of alcohol from persons under 18) of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997 so as to confer on a constable a power, exercisable in addition to the power in subsection (1) or (2) of that section—
(a) to search a person for alcoholic liquor,
(b) to dispose of anything found in the person’s possession that the constable believes to be such liquor.

(2) Prior to laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations under this section, the Scottish Ministers must—
(a) consult publicly on the regulations that they are proposing to make,
(b) send a copy of the proposed regulations to—
   (i) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
   (ii) the Scottish Human Rights Commission,
   (iii) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
   (iv) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(2A) When laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations under this section, the Scottish Ministers must also so lay a statement—
(a) giving reasons for wishing to make the regulations as currently framed (and confirming whether the regulations will amend the relevant enactment in the same way as shown in the proposed regulations),
(b) summarising—
   (i) the responses received by them to the public consultation on the proposed regulations,
   (ii) the representations made to them by the persons to whom a copy of the proposed regulations was sent.

(3) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.

E1 Matters as to effect of sections A1, B1 and D1

(1) The day appointed for the coming into force of sections A1 and B1 is to be the same as the day from which a code of practice required by section G1(1) has effect by virtue of the first regulations made under section K1.

(2) If no regulations under section D1 are made before the end of the 2 years beginning with the day from which a code of practice required by section G1(1) has effect by virtue of the first regulations made under section K1, section D1 is to be regarded as repealed at the end of that period.

F1 Meaning of constable etc.

In this Chapter—

“constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,

“police custody” has the same meaning as given for the purposes of Part 1 (see section 56).
CHAPTER 2

CODE OF PRACTICE

Making and status of code

G1 Contents of code of practice

1 The Scottish Ministers must make a code of practice about the carrying out of a search of a person who is not in police custody.

1A A code of practice must set out (in particular)—
   (a) the circumstances in which a search of such a person may be carried out,
   (b) the procedure to be followed in carrying out such a search,
   (c) in relation to such a search—
      (i) the record to be kept,
      (ii) the right of someone to receive a copy of the record.

2 A code of practice is to apply to the functions exercisable by a constable.

3 In this section—
   “constable” has the meaning given by section 99(1) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,
   “police custody” has the same meaning as given for the purposes of Part 1 (see section 56).

4 In this Chapter, a reference to a code of practice means one required by subsection (1) (but see also section H1(4)).

H1 Review of code of practice

1 The Scottish Ministers may revise a code of practice in light of a review conducted under subsection (2).

2 The Scottish Ministers must conduct a review of a code of practice as follows—
   (a) a review is to begin no later than 2 years after the code comes into effect,
   (b) subsequently, a review is to begin no later than 4 years after—
      (i) if the code is revised in light of the previous review under this subsection,
      the coming into effect of the revised code, or
      (ii) otherwise, the completion of the previous review under this subsection.

2A So far as practicable, a review conducted under subsection (2) must be completed within 6 months of the day on which the review begins.

3 In deciding when to conduct a review in accordance with subsection (2), the Scottish Ministers must have regard to representations put to them on the matter by—
   (a) the Scottish Police Authority,
   (b) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland, or
   (c) Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland.

4 For the purposes of—
(a) section G1(2) and this section (except subsection (2)(a)), and
(b) sections I1, J1 (except subsection (3)) and K1 (except subsection (2A)), a reference to a code of practice includes a revised code as allowed by subsection (1).

I

Legal status of code of practice

(1) A court or tribunal in civil or criminal proceedings must take a code of practice into account when determining any question arising in the proceedings to which the code is relevant.

(2) Breach of a code of practice does not of itself give rise to grounds for any legal claim whatsoever.

J

Consultation on code of practice

(1) Prior to making a code of practice, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly on a draft of the code.

(2) When preparing a draft of a code of practice for public consultation, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the Lord Justice General,
(b) the Faculty of Advocates,
(c) the Law Society of Scotland,
(d) the Scottish Police Authority,
(e) the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
(f) the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner,
(g) the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland, and
(h) such other persons as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) Subsection (1) or (2) is complied with in relation to a code of practice having (or to have) effect for the first time even if the consultation has been initiated before the day on which this section comes into force.

K

Bringing code of practice into effect

(1) A code of practice has no effect until the day appointed for the code by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(2) When laying before the Scottish Parliament a draft of an instrument containing regulations bringing a code of practice into effect, the Scottish Ministers must also so lay a copy of the code.

(2A) No later than at the end of the 12 months beginning with the day on which this section comes into force, there must be so laid a draft of an instrument containing regulations bringing a code of practice into effect.

(3) Regulations under this section are subject to the affirmative procedure.
PART 3
SOLEMN PROCEDURE

63 Proceedings on petition

(1) In section 35 (judicial examination) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (6) there is inserted—

“(6A) In proceedings before the sheriff in examination or further examination, the accused is not to be given an opportunity to make a declaration in respect of any charge.”.

(2) The following provisions of the 1995 Act are repealed—

(a) in section 35, subsections (3), (4) and (5),
(b) sections 36, 37 and 38,
(c) in section 68, subsection (1),
(d) in section 79, paragraph (b)(iii) of subsection (2),
(e) section 278.

65 Pre-trial time limits

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 65 (prevention of delay in trials)—

(a) in subsection (1), after paragraph (a) there is inserted—

“(aa) where an indictment has been served on the accused in respect of the sheriff court, a first diet is commenced within the period of 11 months;”,

(b) in subsection (1A), after the word “applies)” there is inserted “, the first diet (where subsection (1)(aa) above applies),”,

(c) in subsection (4)(b), for the words “110 days” there is substituted—

“(i) 110 days, unless a first diet in respect of the case is commenced within that period, which failing he shall be entitled to be admitted to bail; or

(ii) 140 days”,

(d) in subsection (9)—

(i) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (b) is repealed,

(ii) after paragraph (b) there is inserted—

“(ba) a first diet shall be taken to commence when it is called;”.

(3) In section 66 (service and lodging of indictment, etc.), for sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (a) of subsection (6) there is substituted “at a first diet not less than 29 clear days after the service of the indictment,”.

(4) In section 72C (procedure where preliminary hearing does not proceed), for paragraph (b) of subsection (4) there is substituted—

“(b) where the charge is one that can lawfully be tried in the sheriff court, at a first diet in that court not less than 29 clear days after the service of the notice.”.
Duty of parties to communicate

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 71 (first diet), after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1ZA) If a written record has been lodged in accordance with section 71C, the court must have regard to the written record when ascertaining the state of preparation of the parties.”.

(3) Before section 72 there is inserted—

“71C Written record of state of preparation: sheriff court

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) the accused is indicted to the sheriff court, and

(b) a solicitor—

(i) has notified the court under section 72F(1) that the solicitor has been engaged by the accused for the purposes of conducting the accused’s defence, and

(ii) has not subsequently been dismissed by the accused or withdrawn.

(2) The prosecutor and the accused’s legal representative must, within the period described in subsection (3), communicate with each other and jointly prepare a written record of their state of preparation with respect to their cases (referred to in this section as “the written record”).

(3) The period referred to in subsection (2) begins on the day the accused is served with an indictment and expires at the end of the day falling 14 days later.

(6) The written record must—

(a) be in such form, or as nearly as may be in such form,

(b) contain such information, and

(c) be lodged in such manner,

as may be prescribed by act of adjournal.

(7) The written record must state the manner in which the communication required by subsection (2) was conducted (for example, by telephone, email or a meeting in person).

(8) In subsection (2), “the accused’s legal representative” means—

(a) the solicitor referred to in subsection (1), or

(b) where the solicitor has instructed counsel for the purposes of the conduct of the accused’s case, either the solicitor or that counsel, or both of them.

(9) In subsection (8)(b), “counsel” includes a solicitor who has a right of audience in the High Court of Justiciary under section 25A of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980.”.

(4) In section 75 (computation of certain periods), after the words “67(3),” there is inserted “71C(3)”.
First diets

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 66 (service and lodging of indictment, etc.)—

(a) after subsection (6AA) there is inserted—

“(6AB) A notice affixed under subsection (4)(b) or served under subsection (6) where the indictment is in respect of the sheriff court, must contain intimation to the accused that the first diet may proceed and a trial diet may be appointed in the accused’s absence.”,

(b) in subsection (6B), for the words “or (6AA)” there is substituted “, (6AA) or (6AB)”.

(3) In section 71 (first diet)—

(a) in subsection (1), the words from “whether” to “particular” are repealed,

(b) in subsection (5), after the word “proceed” there is inserted “, and a trial diet may be appointed,”,

(c) in subsection (6), for the words from the beginning to “required” there is substituted “Where the accused appears at the first diet, the accused is to be required at that diet”,

(d) subsection (7) is repealed,

(e) in subsection (9), after the word “section” there is inserted “and section 71B”.

(4) After section 71 there is inserted—

“71B First diet: appointment of trial diet

(1) At a first diet, unless a plea of guilty is tendered and accepted, the court must—

(a) after complying with section 71, and

(b) subject to subsections (3) to (7),

appoint a trial diet.

(2) Where a trial diet is appointed at a first diet, the accused must appear at the trial diet and answer the indictment.

(3) In appointing a trial diet under subsection (1), in any case in which the 12 month period applies (whether or not the 140 day period also applies in the case)—

(a) if the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed to trial within that period, it must, subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial diet for a date within that period, or

(b) if the court considers that the case would not be likely to be so ready, it must give the prosecutor an opportunity to make an application to the court under section 65(3) for an extension of the 12 month period.

(4) Where paragraph (b) of subsection (3) applies—

(a) if such an application as is mentioned in that paragraph is made and granted, the court must, subject to subsections (5) to (7), appoint a trial diet for a date within the 12 month period as extended, or
(b) if no such application is made or if one is made but is refused by the court—

(i) the court may desert the first diet simpliciter or pro loco et tempore, and

(ii) where the accused is committed until liberated in due course of law, the accused must be liberated forthwith.

(5) Subsection (6) applies in any case in which—

(a) the 140 day period as well as the 12 month period applies, and

(b) the court is required, by virtue of subsection (3)(a) or (4)(a) to appoint a trial diet within the 12 month period.

(6) In such a case—

(a) if the court considers that the case would be likely to be ready to proceed to trial within the 140 day period, it must appoint a trial diet for a date within that period as well as within the 12 month period, or

(b) if the court considers that the case would not be likely to be so ready, it must give the prosecutor an opportunity to make an application under section 65(5) for an extension of the 140 day period.

(7) Where paragraph (b) of subsection (6) applies—

(a) if such an application as is mentioned in that paragraph is made and granted, the court must appoint a trial diet for a date within the 140 day period as extended as well as within the 12 month period,

(b) if no such application is made or if one is made but is refused by the court—

(i) the court must proceed under subsection (3)(a) or (as the case may be) (4)(a) to appoint a trial diet for a date within the 12 month period, and

(ii) the accused is then entitled to be admitted to bail.

(8) Where an accused is, by virtue of subsection (7)(b)(ii), entitled to be admitted to bail, the court must, before admitting the accused to bail, give the prosecutor an opportunity to be heard.

(9) On appointing a trial diet under this section in a case where the accused has been admitted to bail (otherwise than by virtue of subsection (7)(b)(ii)), the court, after giving the parties an opportunity to be heard—

(a) must review the conditions imposed on the accused's bail, and

(b) having done so, may, if it considers it appropriate to do so, fix bail on different conditions.

(10) In this section—

“the 12 month period” means the period specified in subsection (1)(b) of section 65 and, in any case in which that period has been extended under subsection (3) of that section, includes that period as so extended,
Part 3—Solemn procedure

“the 140 day period” means the period specified in subsection (4)(b)(ii) of section 65 and, in any case in which that period has been extended under subsection (5) of that section, includes that period as so extended.”.

(5) In subsection (3) of section 76 (procedure where accused desires to plead guilty), for the words from “or, where” to “Court,” there is substituted “, the first diet or (as the case may be)”.

(6) After section 83A there is inserted—

“83B Continuation of trial diet in the sheriff court

(1) In the sheriff court a trial diet and, if it is adjourned, the adjourned diet, may, without having been commenced, be continued from sitting day to sitting day—

(a) by minute, in such form as may be prescribed by act of adjournal, signed by the sheriff clerk,

(b) up to such maximum number of sitting days after the day originally appointed for the trial diet as may be so prescribed.

(2) The indictment falls if a trial diet, or adjourned diet, is not commenced by the end of the last sitting day to which it may be continued by virtue of subsection (1).

(3) For the purposes of this section, a trial diet or adjourned trial diet is to be taken to commence when it is called.

(4) In this section, “sitting day” means any day on which the court is sitting but does not include any Saturday or Sunday or any day which is a court holiday.”.

(7) The italic heading immediately preceding section 83A becomes “Continuation of trial diet”.

68 Preliminary hearings

In section 72A (preliminary hearing: appointment of trial diet) of the 1995 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from the beginning to “section” there is substituted “In any case in which subsection (6) of section 72”,

(b) subsection (1A) is repealed.

69 Plea of guilty

In the 1995 Act—

(a) in section 70 (proceedings against organisations), subsection (7) is repealed,

(b) in subsection (1) of section 77 (plea of guilty), the words from “and, subject” to the end are repealed.
PART 4

SENTENCING

Maximum term for weapons offences

71 Maximum term for weapons offences

5 (1) The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)(b) of section 47 (prohibition of the carrying of offensive weapons), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(3) In subsection (1)(b) of section 49 (offence of having in public place article with blade or point), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

10 (4) In subsection (5) of section 49A (offence of having article with blade or point (or offensive weapon) on school premises)—

(a) in paragraph (a)(ii), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”;

(b) in paragraph (b)(ii), for the word “four” there is substituted “5”.

(5) In subsection (6)(b) of section 49C (offence of having offensive weapon etc. in prison), for the word “4” there is substituted “5”.

Prisoners on early release

72 Sentencing under the 1995 Act

After section 200 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“200A Sentencing prisoners on early release

20 (1) Before sentencing or otherwise dealing with a person who has been found by the court to have committed an offence punishable with imprisonment (other than an offence in respect of which life imprisonment is mandatory), the court must so far as is reasonably practicable ascertain whether the person was on early release at the time the offence was committed.

25 (2) Where the court ascertains that the person was on early release at the time the offence was committed, the court must consider making an order, or as the case may be a reference, under section 16(2) of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993.

30 (3) For the purposes of this section a person is on early release if, by virtue of one of the following enactments, the person is not in custody—

(a) Part I of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993,

(b) Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, or

(c) Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.”.

73 Sentencing under the 1993 Act

35 (1) Section 16 (commission of offence by released prisoner) of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1), for the words “or Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991” there is substituted “, Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or Part 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003”.

1694
(3) In subsection (2)—
(a) in paragraph (a), for the words from “other” to “below” there is substituted “to which subsection (2A) does not apply”,
(b) in paragraph (b), for the words from “where” to “subsection (1)(a)” there is substituted “to which subsection (2A) applies”.

(4) After subsection (2) there is inserted—
“(2A) This subsection applies to a case if—
(a) the court mentioned in subsection (1)(b) is inferior to the court which imposed the original sentence, and
(b) the whole of the period described in subsection (2)(a) exceeds—
(i) if the court mentioned in subsection (1)(b) is a justice of the peace court (however constituted), 60 days,
(ii) if the court is the sheriff court sitting in summary proceedings, 12 months,
(iii) if the court is the sheriff court sitting in solemn proceedings, 5 years.”.

PART 5
APPEALS AND SCCRC

APPEALS
(5) In subsection (3), for the words from the beginning to “it” there is substituted “Where this subsection applies, the court of first instance”.

75 Preliminary diets in solemn cases

In section 74 (appeals in connection with preliminary diets) of the 1995 Act—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from “to—” to “motu)” there is substituted “to any right of appeal under section 106 or 108 a party may,”,

(b) after subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2A) An appeal under subsection (1) may be taken—

(a) in the case of a decision to dismiss the indictment or any part of it, by the prosecutor without the leave of the court,

(b) in any other case, only with the leave of the court of first instance (granted on the motion of a party or ex proprio motu).”.

76 Extending certain time limits: summary

(1) Section 181 (stated case: directions by High Court) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) Where an application for a direction under subsection (1)—

(a) is made by the person convicted, and

(b) relates to the requirements of section 176(1),

the Sheriff Appeal Court may make a direction only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified by exceptional circumstances.

(1B) In considering whether there are exceptional circumstances for the purpose of subsection (1A), the Sheriff Appeal Court must have regard to—

(a) the length of time that has elapsed between the expiry of the period mentioned in section 176(1)(a) and the making of the application,

(b) the reasons stated in accordance with subsection (2A)(a)(i),

(c) the proposed grounds of appeal.”.

(3) Subsection (2C) is repealed.

(4) In paragraph (a) of subsection (3), the words from “(unless” to the end are repealed.

(5) At the end of the section there is inserted—

“(5) If the Sheriff Appeal Court makes a direction under subsection (1) it must—

(a) give reasons for the decision in writing, and

(b) give the reasons in ordinary language.”.

77 Extending certain time limits: solemn

(1) In section 105 (appeal against refusal of application) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (3) there is inserted—
“(3A) Subsection (3) does not entitle an applicant to be present at the hearing and determination of an application under section 111(2) unless the High Court has made a direction under section 111(4)(b).”.

(2) Section 111 (provisions supplementary to sections 109 and 110) of the 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(3) After subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(2ZA) Where an application under subsection (2) is received after the period to which it relates has expired, the High Court may extend the period only if it is satisfied that doing so is justified by exceptional circumstances.

(2ZB) In considering whether there are exceptional circumstances for the purpose of subsection (2ZA), the High Court must have regard to—

(a) the length of time that has elapsed between the expiry of the period and the making of the application,

(b) the reasons stated in accordance with subsection (2A)(a)(i),

(c) the proposed grounds of appeal.”.

(4) In subsection (2A)—

(a) the words “seeking extension of the period mentioned in section 109(1) of this Act” are repealed,

(b) in paragraph (a)(i)—

(i) after “failed” there is inserted “, or expects to fail,”,

(ii) the words “in section 109(1)” are repealed.

(5) Subsection (2C) is repealed.

(6) At the end of the section there is inserted—

“(4) An application under subsection (2) is to be dealt with by the High Court—

(a) in chambers, and

(b) unless the Court directs otherwise, without the parties being present.

(5) If the High Court extends a period under subsection (2) it must—

(a) give reasons for the decision in writing, and

(b) give the reasons in ordinary language.”.

78 Certain lateness not excusable

In section 300A (power of court to excuse procedural irregularities) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (7) there is inserted—

“(7A) Subsection (1) does not authorise a court to excuse a failure to do any of the following things timeously—

(a) lodge written intimation of intention to appeal in accordance with section 109(1),

(b) lodge a note of appeal in accordance with section 110(1)(a),

(c) make an application for a stated case under section 176(1),

(d) lodge a note of appeal in accordance with section 186(2)(a).”.
Advocation in solemn proceedings

After section 130 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“130A Bill of advocation not competent in respect of certain decisions

It is not competent to bring under review of the High Court by way of bill of advocation a decision taken at a first diet or a preliminary hearing.”.

Advocation in summary proceedings

After section 191A of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“191B Bill of advocation not competent in respect of certain decisions

It is not competent to bring under review of the Sheriff Appeal Court by way of bill of advocation a decision of the court of first instance that relates to such objection or denial as is mentioned in section 144(4).”.

Finality of appeal proceedings

In subsection (2) of section 124 (finality of proceedings) of the 1995 Act—

(a) for the words “sections 288ZB and 288AA” there is substituted “section 288AA”,

(b) the words “a reference under section 288ZB or” are repealed.

Courts reform: spent provisions

In schedule 3 to the Courts Reform (Scotland) Act 2014, the following provisions are repealed—

(a) in paragraph 10, sub-paragraphs (4), (5) and (8),

(b) paragraph 22,

(c) paragraph 25.

References by SCCRC

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 194B in subsection (1), the words “, subject to section 194DA of this Act,” are repealed.

(3) The title of section 194B becomes “References by the Commission”.

(3A) In section 194C, subsection (2) is repealed.

(4) Section 194DA is repealed.
PART 6
MISCELLANEOUS
CHAPTER A1

PUBLICATION OF PROSECUTORIAL TEST

82B Publication of prosecutorial test

(1) The Lord Advocate must make available to the public a statement setting out in general terms the matters about which a prosecutor requires to be satisfied in order to initiate, and continue with, criminal proceedings in respect of any offence.

(2) The reference in subsection (1) to a prosecutor is to one within the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

CHAPTER B1

SUPPORT FOR VULNERABLE PERSONS

82C Meaning of appropriate adult support

(1) For the purposes of this Chapter, “appropriate adult support” means—

(a) support of the sort mentioned in subsection (3) of section 33 that is provided to a person about whom intimation has been sent under subsection (2) of that section, and

(b) such other support for vulnerable persons in connection with a criminal investigation or criminal proceedings as the Scottish Ministers specify by regulations.

(2) In regulations under subsection (1)(b), the Scottish Ministers may, in particular, specify support by reference to—

(a) the purpose it is to serve,

(b) the description of vulnerable persons to whom it is to be available, and

(c) the circumstances in which it is to be available.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

“vulnerable person” means a person who, owing to mental disorder, is—

(a) unable to understand sufficiently what is happening, or

(b) communicate effectively,

in the context of a criminal investigation or criminal proceedings,

“mental disorder” has the meaning given by section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend the definitions of “vulnerable person” and “mental disorder” in subsection (3) for the purpose of making them consistent with (respectively) subsections (1)(c) and (5)(a) of section 33.

82D Responsibility for ensuring availability of appropriate adults

The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—
(a) confer on a person the function of ensuring that people are available to provide appropriate adult support—
   (i) throughout Scotland, or
   (ii) in a particular part of Scotland, and
(b) make provision about how that function may or must be discharged.

82E  Assessment of quality of appropriate adult support

The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—
(a) confer on a person the functions of—
   (i) assessing the quality of whatever arrangements may be in place to ensure that people are available to provide appropriate adult support, and
   (ii) assessing the quality of any appropriate adult support that is provided, and
(b) make provision about how those functions may or must be discharged.

82F  Training for appropriate adults

The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—
(a) confer on a person the function of—
   (i) giving to people who provide, or wish to provide, appropriate adult support training in how to provide that support,
   (ii) giving to other people specified by the Scottish Ministers in the regulations training in how to deal with people who need appropriate adult support, and
(b) make provision about how that function may or must be discharged.

82G  Recommendations from quality assessor and training provider

(1) A person upon whom a function has been conferred by virtue of section 82E or 82F may—
   (a) make to a provider of appropriate adult support recommendations about the way that appropriate adult support is provided,
   (b) make to the Scottish Ministers recommendations about the exercise of their powers under section 53B and the provisions of this Chapter.

(2) A provider of appropriate adult support must have regard to any recommendation made to it under subsection (1)(a).

(3) The Scottish Ministers must have regard to any recommendation made under subsection (1)(b).

(4) In this section, “a provider of appropriate adult support” means a person upon whom the function of ensuring that people are available to provide appropriate adult support has been conferred by virtue of section 82D.
82H Duty to ensure quality assessment takes place
If, by virtue of regulations under section 82D, a person has the function of ensuring that people are available to provide appropriate adult support, it is the Scottish Ministers’ duty to ensure that there is a person discharging the functions mentioned in section 82E(a).

82I Elaboration of regulation-making powers under this Chapter
(1) A power under this Chapter to confer a function on a person by regulations may be exercised so as to confer the function, or aspects of the function, on more than one person.

(2) A power under this Chapter to make provision by regulations about how a function may or must be discharged may, in particular, be exercised so as to—
(a) require or allow the person discharging the function to enter into a contract with another person,
(b) require the person discharging the function to have regard to any guidance about the discharge of the function issued by the Scottish Ministers.

(3) The powers under this Chapter to make regulations may be exercised so as to—
(a) make such provision as the Scottish Ministers consider necessary or expedient in consequence of, or for the purpose of giving full effect to, any regulations made in exercise of a power under this Chapter,
(b) modify any enactment (including this Act),
(c) make different provision for different purposes.

82J Procedure for making regulations under this Chapter
(1) Regulations under this Chapter are subject to the affirmative procedure.

(2) Prior to laying a draft Scottish statutory instrument containing regulations under this Chapter before the Scottish Parliament for approval by resolution, the Scottish Ministers must consult publicly.

82K Other powers of Ministers unaffected
Nothing in this Chapter is to be taken to imply that the powers it gives to the Scottish Ministers to confer functions are the only powers that they have to confer those (or similar) functions.

CHAPTER C1
NOTIFICATION IF PARENT OF UNDER-18 IMPRISONED

82L Child’s named person to be notified
(1) This section applies where a person is admitted to any penal institution for imprisonment or detention arising from—
(a) anything done by a court of criminal jurisdiction (including the imposition of a sentence, the making of an order or the issuing of a warrant),
(b) anything done under section 17 or 17A of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (as to the recall of a prisoner),

c) anything done by virtue of the Extradition Act 2003 (particularly section 9(2) or 77(2) of that Act), or

d) the operation of any other enactment concerning criminal matters (including penal matters).

(2) The Scottish Ministers must ensure that the person is asked—

(a) whether the person is a parent of a child, and

(b) if the person claims to be a parent of a child, to—

(i) state the identity of the child, and

(ii) give information enabling the identity of the service provider in relation to the child to be ascertained.

(3) If the identity of the service provider can be ascertained by or on behalf of the Scottish Ministers without undue difficulty in light of anything disclosed by the person, they must ensure that the service provider is notified of—

(a) the fact of the person’s admission to the penal institution,

(b) what has been stated by the person about the identity of the child, and

(c) such other matters disclosed by the person as appear to them to be relevant for the purpose of the exercise of the named person functions with respect to the child.

(4) In addition, the Scottish Ministers must ensure that the service provider is notified of anything disclosed by the person about the identity of any other child—

(a) of whom the person claims to be a parent, and

(b) the service provider in relation to whom is unknown to them.

(5) No requirement is imposed by subsection (2) if the person’s admission to the penal institution is on—

(a) returning after—

(i) any unauthorised absence, or

(ii) any temporary release in accordance with prison rules, or

(b) being transferred from—

(i) any other penal institution,

(ii) any secure accommodation in which the person has been kept, or

(iii) any hospital in which the person has been detained, so as to be given medical treatment for a mental disorder, by virtue of Part VI of the 1995 Act or the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.

(6) Each of the requirements imposed by subsections (2) to (4) is to be fulfilled without unnecessary delay.

(7) The references in subsections (2) to (4) to the Scottish Ministers are to them in their exercise of functions in connection with the person’s imprisonment or detention in the penal institution.
(8) The references in subsections (3) and (4) to disclosure by the person are to such disclosure in response to something asked under subsection (2).

82M Definition of certain expressions

In this Chapter—

“child” means a person who is under 18 years of age,

“named person functions” has the meaning given by section 32 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014,

“parent” includes any person who—

(a) is a guardian of a child,

(b) is liable to maintain, or has care of, a child, or

(c) has parental responsibilities in relation to a child (as construed by reference to section 1(1) to (3) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995),

“penal institution” means—

(a) any prison, other than—

   (i) a naval, military or air force prison, or

   (ii) any legalised police cells (within the meaning of section 14(1) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989),

(b) any remand centre (within the meaning of section 19(1)(a) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989), or

(c) any young offenders institution (within the meaning of section 19(1)(b) of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989),

“prison rules” means rules made under section 39 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989,

“secure accommodation” means accommodation provided in a residential establishment, approved in accordance with regulations made under section 78(2) of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, for the purpose of restricting the liberty of children,

“service provider” in relation to a child has the meaning given by section 32 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

CHAPTER 1

STATEMENTS AND PROCEDURE

Statements by accused

62 Statements by accused

(1) After section 261 of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“261ZA Statements by accused

(1) Evidence of a statement to which this subsection applies is not inadmissible as evidence of any fact contained in the statement on account of the evidence’s being hearsay.
(2) Subsection (1) applies to a statement made by the accused in the course of the accused’s being questioned (whether as a suspect or not) by a constable, or another official, investigating an offence.

(3) Subsection (1) does not affect the issue of whether evidence of a statement made by one accused is admissible as evidence in relation to another accused.”.

The title of section 261 of the 1995 Act becomes “Statements by co-accused”.

Use of technology

86 Live television links

(1) After section 288G of the 1995 Act there is inserted—

“Use of live television link

288H Participation through live television link

(1) Where the court so determines at any time before or at a specified hearing, a detained person is to participate in the hearing by means of a live television link.

(2) The court—

(a) must give the parties in the case an opportunity to make representations before making a determination under subsection (1),

(b) may make such a determination only if it considers that to do so is not contrary to the interests of justice.

(3) The court may require a detained person to participate by means of a live television link in any proceedings at a specified hearing or otherwise in the case for the sole purpose of considering whether to make a determination under subsection (1) with respect to a specified hearing.

(4) Where a detained person participates in any specified hearing or other proceedings by means of a live television link—

(a) a place of detention is, for the purposes of the hearing or other proceedings, deemed to be part of the court-room, and

(b) accordingly, the hearing is or other proceedings are deemed to take place in the presence of the detained person.

(5) In this section—

“court-room” includes chambers,

“live television link” means live television link between a place of detention and the court-room in which any specified hearing is or other proceedings are to be held or (as the case may be) any specified hearing is or other proceedings are being held.

288I Evidence and personal appearance

(1) No evidence as to a charge on any complaint or indictment may be led or presented at a specified hearing in respect of which there is a determination under section 288H(1).
(2) The court—
   (a) may, at any time before or at a specified hearing, revoke a determination under section 288H(1),
   (b) must do so in relation to a detained person if it considers that it is in the interests of justice for the detained person to appear in person.

(3) The court may postpone a specified hearing to a later day if, on the day on which a specified hearing takes place or is due to take place—
   (a) the court decides not to make a determination under section 288H(1) with respect to the hearing, or
   (b) the court revokes such a determination under subsection (2).

288IA Effect of postponement

(1) Except where a postponement under section 288I(3) is while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, the following do not count towards any time limit arising in the person’s case if the postponement in the case is to the next day on which the court is sitting—
   (a) that next day,
   (b) any intervening Saturday, Sunday or court holiday.

(2) Even while section 18(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies to a detained person, that section does not prevent a postponement under section 288I(3) in the person’s case.

(3) In section 288I and this section, “postpone” includes adjourn.

288J Specified hearings

(1) The Lord Justice General may by directions specify types of hearing at the High Court, sheriff court and JP court in which a detained person may participate in accordance with section 288H(1).

(2) Directions under subsection (1) may specify types of hearing by reference to—
   (a) the venues at which they take place,
   (b) particular places of detention,
   (c) categories of cases or proceedings to which they relate.

(3) Directions under subsection (1) may—
   (a) vary or revoke earlier such directions,
   (b) make different provision for different purposes.

(4) The validity of any proceedings is not affected by the participation of a detained person by means of a live television link in a hearing that is not a specified hearing.

(5) In this section, “hearing” includes any diet or hearing in criminal proceedings which may be held in the presence of an accused, a convicted person or an appellant in the proceedings.
288K Defined terms

For the purpose of sections 288H to 288J—

“detained person” means person who is—

(a) an accused, a convicted person or an appellant in the case to which a specified hearing relates, and

(b) imprisoned or otherwise lawfully detained (whether or not in connection with an offence) at any place in Scotland,

“place of detention” means place in which a detained person is imprisoned or detained,

“specified hearing” means hearing of a type specified in directions having effect for the time being under section 288J.”.

(2) In addition—

(a) in section 117 (presence of appellant or applicant at hearing) of the 1995 Act—

(i) subsection (6) is repealed,

(ii) in subsection (7), for the word “(6)” there is substituted “(5)”,

(b) section 80 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 is repealed.

86A Electronic proceedings

(1) In section 305 (Acts of Adjournal) of the 1995 Act, after subsection (1 ) there is inserted—

“(1A) Subsection (1) above extends to making provision by Act of Adjournal for something to be done in electronic form or by electronic means.”.

(2) These provisions of the 1995 Act are repealed—

(a) in section 141—

(i) subsection (3A),

(ii) in subsection (5), the words “(including a legible version of an electronic communication)”,

(iii) subsection (5ZA),

(iv) in subsection (5A), paragraph (b) together with the word “or” immediately preceding it,

(v) subsections (6A), (7A) and (7B),

(b) section 303B together with the italic heading immediately preceding it,

(c) section 308A.

(3) In the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007, section 42 is repealed.
Chapter 1A

Authorisation under Part III of the Police Act 1997

86B Authorisation of persons other than constables

In section 108 (interpretation of Part III) of the Police Act 1997, after subsection (1) there is inserted—

“(1A) A reference in this Part to a staff officer of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner is to any person who—

(a) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7A of schedule 4 to the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, or

(b) is a member of the Commissioner’s staff appointed under paragraph 7 of that schedule to whom paragraph 7B(2) of that schedule applies.”.

Chapter 2

Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

87 Establishment and functions

(1) After section 55 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 there is inserted—

“Chapter 8A

Police Negotiating Board for Scotland

55A Establishment of the PNBS

(1) There is established a body to be known as the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

(2) Schedule 2A makes further provision about the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

(3) In this Chapter, the references to the PNBS are to the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.

55B Representations about pay etc.

(1) The PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about—

(a) any draft regulations shared with it under section 54(1)(a),

(b) any draft determination of a kind mentioned in subsection (2),

(c) the matters mentioned in subsection (4) generally.

(2) The draft determination referred to in subsection (1)(b) is a draft of a determination to be made by the Scottish Ministers—

(a) in relation to a matter mentioned in subsection (4), and

(b) by virtue of regulations made under section 48.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may, after consulting the chairperson of the PNBS—

(a) require the PNBS to make representations under subsection (1),
(b) set or extend a time limit within which it must do so.

(4) The matters referred to in subsections (1)(c) and (2)(a) are the following matters in relation to constables (other than special constables) and police cadets—

(a) pay, allowances and expenses,
(b) public holidays and leave,
(d) hours of duty.

55C Representations on other matters

(1) The PNBS may make representations to the Scottish Ministers about—

(a) any draft regulations shared with it under section 54(2),
(b) the matters mentioned in subsection (2) generally.

(2) The matters referred to in subsection (1)(b) are matters relating to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets.

(3) But those matters do not include the matters mentioned in section 55B(4).

55CA Steps following arbitration

(1) If representations under section 55B(1) are made in terms settled through arbitration in accordance with the PNBS’s constitution, the Scottish Ministers must take all reasonable steps appearing to them to be necessary for giving effect to those representations.

(2) However, this—

(a) requires the Scottish Ministers to take such steps only in qualifying cases (see paragraph 4C(2) of schedule 2A),
(b) does not require the Scottish Ministers—

(i) to take such steps in relation to representations that are no longer being pursued by the PNBS, or
(ii) where such steps would comprise or include the making of regulations under section 48, to make regulations under that section more than once with respect to the same representations.

55D Reporting by the PNBS

(1) The PNBS must, as soon as practicable after the end of each reporting year, prepare a report on how it has carried out its functions during that year.

(2) The PNBS must—

(a) give a copy of each report to the Scottish Ministers,
(b) publish each report in such manner as it considers appropriate.

(3) In this Chapter, “reporting year” is as defined in the PNBS’s constitution.”.
(2) In section 54 (consultation on regulations) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, in subsection (1)—
   (a) for the words from “61(1)” to “pensions)” there is substituted “55B(4)
   (b) in paragraph (a), for the words “the United Kingdom” there is substituted “Scotland”.

(2A) In section 125 (subordinate legislation) of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, after subsection (3) there is inserted—

   “(3A) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) of schedule 2A are subject to the affirmative procedure if they include provisions of the kind mentioned in paragraph 4B(2) or 4C(2) of that schedule.”.

(3) After schedule 2 to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 there is inserted (as schedule 2A to that Act) the schedule set out in schedule 3.

87A Consequential and transitional

(1) In connection with section 87—
   (a) in schedule 1 to the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, after paragraph 50A there is inserted—
   “50B The Police Negotiating Board for Scotland.
   (b) in schedule 2 to the Public Appointments and Public Bodies etc. (Scotland) Act 2003, at the appropriate place under the heading referring to offices there is inserted—
   “Chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland”.

(2) On the coming into force of section 87—
   (a) a person then holding office as the chairman of the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom by virtue of section 61(2) of the Police Act 1996 is to be regarded as if appointed as the chairperson of the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland under paragraph 2(2) of schedule 2A to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012,
   (b) any agreements then extant within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom (so far as relating to the Police Service of Scotland) of the kind for which Chapter 8A of Part 1 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 includes provision are to be regarded as if made as agreements within or involving the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland by virtue of that Chapter.

PART 7
FINAL PROVISIONS

Ancillary and definition

88 Ancillary regulations

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such supplemental, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of or in connection with this Act.

(2) Regulations under this section—
89 Meaning of “the 1995 Act”

In this Act, “the 1995 Act” means the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

Commencement and short title

90 Commencement

(1) The following provisions come into force on the day after Royal Assent—

(a) sections E1 and G1 to K1,

(b) this Part.

(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(3) An order under subsection (2) may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

91 Short title

The short title of this Act is the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015.
SCHEDULE A1
(introduced by sections 14(3) and 20(6))

BREACH OF LIBERATION CONDITION

Offence of breaching condition

1 (1) A person commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, the person breaches a liberation condition by reason of—
   (a) failing to comply with an investigative liberation condition,
   (b) failing to appear at court as required by the terms of an undertaking, or
   (c) failing to comply with the terms of an undertaking, other than the requirement to appear at court.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) does not apply where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (in which case see paragraph 3).

(3) It is competent to amend a complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under sub-paragraph (1) at any time before the trial of a person in summary proceedings for—
   (a) the original offence, or
   (b) an offence arising from the same circumstances as the original offence.

(4) In sub-paragraph (3), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
   (a) an investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
   (b) an undertaking was given.

Sentencing for the offence

2 (1) A person who commits an offence under paragraph 1(1) is liable on summary conviction to—
   (a) a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or
   (b) imprisonment for a period—
      (i) where conviction is in the justice of the peace court, not exceeding 60 days,
      (ii) where conviction is in the sheriff court, not exceeding 12 months.

(2) A penalty under sub-paragraph (1) may be imposed in addition to any other penalty which it is competent for the court to impose, even if the total of penalties imposed exceeds the maximum penalty which it is competent to impose in respect of the original offence.

(3) The reference in sub-paragraph (2) to a penalty being imposed in addition to another penalty means, in the case of sentences of imprisonment or detention—
   (a) where the sentences are imposed at the same time (whether or not in relation to the same complaint), framing the sentences so that they have effect consecutively,
   (b) where the sentences are imposed at different times, framing the sentence imposed later so that (if the earlier sentence has not been served) the later sentence has effect consecutive to the earlier sentence.
(4) Sub-paragraph (3)(b) is subject to section 204A (restriction on consecutive sentences for released prisoners) of the 1995 Act.

(5) Where a person is to be sentenced in respect of an offence under paragraph 1(1), the court may remit the person for sentence in respect of it to any court which is considering the original offence.

(6) In sub-paragraphs (2) and (5), “the original offence” is the offence in connection with which—
   (a) the investigative liberation condition was imposed, or
   (b) the undertaking was given.

Breach by committing offence

3 (1) This paragraph applies—
   (a) where (and to the extent that) a person breaches a liberation condition by reason of committing an offence (“offence O”), but
   (b) only if the fact that offence O was committed while the person was subject to the liberation condition is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(2) In determining the penalty for offence O, the court must have regard—
   (a) to the fact that offence O was committed in breach of a liberation condition,
   (b) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an investigative liberation condition, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 4(1),
   (c) if the breach is by reason of the person’s failure to comply with the terms of an undertaking other than the requirement to appear at court, to the matters mentioned in paragraph 5(1).

(3) Where the maximum penalty in respect of offence O is specified by (or by virtue of) an enactment, the maximum penalty is increased—
   (a) where it is a fine, by the amount equivalent to level 3 on the standard scale,
   (b) where it is a period of imprisonment—
       (i) as respects conviction in the justice of the peace court, by 60 days,
       (ii) as respects conviction in the sheriff court or the High Court, by 6 months.

(4) The maximum penalty is increased by sub-paragraph (3) even if the penalty as so increased exceeds the penalty which it would otherwise be competent for the court to impose.

(5) In imposing a penalty in respect of offence O, the court must state—
   (a) where the penalty is different from that which the court would have imposed had sub-paragraph (2) not applied, the extent of and the reasons for that difference,
   (b) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(b)

4 (1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(b), the matters are—
   (a) the number of offences in connection with which the person was subject to investigative liberation conditions when offence O was committed,
(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—
(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(a),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Matters for paragraph 3(2)(c)

(1) For the purpose of paragraph 3(2)(c), the matters are—
(a) the number of undertakings to which the person was subject when offence O was committed,
(b) any previous conviction the person has for an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),
(c) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of paragraph 3(2), from that which the court would have imposed but for that paragraph.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1)—
(a) in paragraph (b), the reference to any previous conviction includes any previous conviction by a court in England and Wales, Northern Ireland or a member State of the European Union (other than the United Kingdom) for an offence that is equivalent to an offence under paragraph 1(1)(c),
(b) in paragraph (c), the references to paragraph 3(2) are to be read, in relation to a previous conviction by a court referred to in paragraph (a) of this sub-paragraph, as references to any provision that is equivalent to paragraph 3(2).

(3) Any issue of equivalence arising under sub-paragraph (2)(a) or (b) is for the court to determine.

Evidential presumptions

(1) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), the facts mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) are to be held as admitted unless challenged by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded.

(2) The facts are—
(a) that the person breached an undertaking by reason of failing to appear at court as required by the terms of the undertaking,
(b) that the person was subject to a particular—
(i) investigative liberation condition, or
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill

Schedule 1—Modifications in connection with Part 1

Part 1—Provisions as to arrest

(ii) condition under the terms of an undertaking.

(3) In proceedings to which sub-paragraph (4) applies—

(a) something in writing, purporting to impose investigative liberation conditions and bearing to be signed by a constable, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the investigative liberation conditions imposed under section 14(2),

(b) something in writing, purporting to be an undertaking and bearing to be signed by the person said to have given it, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the undertaking at the time that it was given,

(c) a document purporting to be a notice (or a copy of a notice) under section 16, 21 or 21A, is sufficient evidence of the terms of the notice.

(4) This sub-paragraph applies to proceedings—

(a) in relation to an offence under paragraph 1(1), or

(b) in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(5) In proceedings in which the fact mentioned in paragraph 3(1)(b) is specified in the complaint or indictment, that fact is to be held as admitted unless challenged—

(a) in summary proceedings, by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, or

(b) in the case of proceedings on indictment, by giving notice of a preliminary objection in accordance with section 71(2) or 72(6)(b)(i) of the 1995 Act.

Interpretation

7 In this schedule—

(a) references to an investigative liberation condition are to a condition imposed under section 14(2) or 17(3)(b) subject to any modification by notice under section 16(1) or (5)(a),

(b) references to an undertaking are to an undertaking given under section 19(2)(a),

(c) references to the terms of an undertaking are to the terms of an undertaking subject to any modification by—

(i) notice under section 21(1), or

(ii) the sheriff under section 22(3)(b).

SCHEDULE 1

(introduced by section 52)

MODIFICATIONS IN CONNECTION WITH PART 1

PART 1

PROVISIONS AS TO ARREST

Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

1 The 1995 Act is amended as follows.
These provisions are repealed—
   (a) in section 13, subsection (7),
   (b) section 21.

(1) In section 234A, subsections (4A) and (4B) are repealed.

(2) In subsection (11) of section 234AA, for the words from the beginning to “those sections apply” there is substituted “Section 9 (breach of orders) of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 applies in relation to antisocial behaviour orders made under this section as that section applies”.

Miscellaneous enactments

In section 4 of the Trespass (Scotland) Act 1865, for the words from the beginning to “every” in the last place where it occurs there is substituted “A”.

In subsection (3) of section 1 of the Public Meeting Act 1908, the words from “and if he refuses” to the end are repealed.

In the Firearms Act 1968, section 50 is repealed.

In the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982—
   (a) in section 59, subsections (1), (2) and (5) are repealed,
   (aa) in subsection (3), for the words “he can be delivered into the custody” there is substituted “the arrival”,
   (b) in section 65, subsections (4) and (5) are repealed,
   (c) in subsection (1) of section 80, for the words from “and taken” to the end there is substituted “by a constable”.

In the Child Abduction Act 1984, section 7 is repealed.

In section 11 of the Protection of Badgers Act 1992, paragraph (c) of subsection (1) is repealed.

In the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, section 60B is repealed.

In section 8B of the Olympic Symbol etc. (Protection) Act 1995, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.

In the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995—
   (a) in section 7, subsection (4) is repealed,
   (b) in section 47, subsection (3) is repealed,
   (c) in section 48, subsection (3) is repealed,
   (d) in section 50, subsections (3) and (5) are repealed.

In the Deer (Scotland) Act 1996, section 28 is repealed.

In section 61 of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997, subsection (5) is repealed.

In section 7 of the Protection of Wild Mammals (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph (a) of subsection (1) is repealed.

In the Fireworks Act 2003—
(a) in section 11A, subsection (6) is repealed,
(b) section 11B is repealed.

18 In section 307 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, subsection (4) is repealed.
19 In the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004—

5 (a) section 11 is repealed,
(b) in section 22, subsections (3) and (4) are repealed,
(c) section 38 is repealed.

20 In section 130 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, subsection (3) is repealed.
21 In section 307 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, subsection (4) is repealed.
22 In the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004—
23 In the Animal Health and Welfare (Scotland) Act 2006, in schedule 1—

(a) paragraph 16 is repealed,
(b) in paragraph 18(b)(i), the words “except paragraph 16” are repealed.

24 In section 130 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, subsection (3) is repealed.
25 In section 130 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, subsection (3) is repealed.

PART 2
FURTHER MODIFICATIONS

The 1995 Act

25 The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

26 These provisions are repealed—

(a) sections 14 to 17A,
(b) sections 22 to 22ZB (together with the italic heading immediately preceding section 22),
(c) section 43,
(d) in section 135, subsection (3).

27(1) In section 18—

(a) in subsection (1), the words “or is detained under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed,
(b) in subsection (2), the words “or detained” are repealed.

(2) In subsection (2)(a) of section 18B, for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

28 In each of sections 169(2) and 170(2) of the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2001, the words “arrested without warrant and” are repealed.
(3) In section 18D—
   (a) in subsection (2)(a), the words “or detained” are repealed,
   (b) in subsection (2)(b), for the words “under arrest or being detained” there is substituted “in custody”.

(4) In subsection (8)(b) of section 19AA, the words “or detention under section 14(1) of this Act” are repealed.

27AA In section 28—
   (a) after subsection (1) there is inserted—
      “(1ZA)Where—
      (a) a constable who is not in uniform arrests a person under subsection (1), and
      (b) the person asks to see the constable’s identification,
      the constable must show identification to the person as soon as reasonably practicable.”,
   (b) after subsection (3) there is inserted—
      “(3A) If—
      (a) a person is in custody only by virtue of subsection (1) or (1A), and
      (b) in the opinion of a constable there are no reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has broken, or is likely to break, a condition imposed on the person’s bail,
      the person must be released from custody immediately.
   (3B) An accused is deemed to be brought before a court under subsection (2) or (3) if the accused appears before it by means of a live television link (by virtue of a determination by the court that the person is to do so by such means).”.

27AB After section 28 there is inserted—
“28A Application of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 to persons arrested and detained under section 28
   (1) Section 7(2) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 (“the 2015 Act”) does not apply to an accused who has been arrested under section 28(1) of this Act.
   (2) The following provisions of the 2015 Act apply in relation to a person who is to be brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of this Act as they apply in relation to a person who is to be brought before a court in accordance with section 18(2) of the 2015 Act—
      (a) section 18A,
      (b) section 18B,
      (c) section 18C.
   (3) In relation to a person who is to be brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of this Act, the 2015 Act applies as though—
      (a) in section 18B(2)—

“(c) that the person is to be brought before the court under section 28 of the 1995 Act in order for the person’s bail to be considered.”, and

(ii) paragraph (d) were omitted,

(b) in section 18C—

(i) in subsection (3)(c), for the words “after being officially accused” there were substituted “after being informed that the person is to be brought before a court under section 28(2) or (3) of the 1995 Act”, and

(ii) in subsection (4), for paragraph (c) there were substituted—

“(c) that the person is to be brought before the court under section 28 of the 1995 Act in order for the person’s bail to be considered.”,

(c) in section 35(1), for paragraph (d) there were substituted—

“(d) the court before which the person is to be brought under section 28(2) or (3) of the 1995 Act and the date on which the person is to be brought before that court.”.

27B In section 42—

(a) subsection (3) is repealed,

(b) subsection (7) is repealed,

(c) in subsection (8), for the words “subsection (7) above” there is substituted “section 18C of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”;

(d) in subsection (9), the words “detained in a police station, or” are repealed,

(e) subsection (10) is repealed.

28 In section 74, after paragraph (a) of subsection (2) there is inserted—

“(aza) may not be taken against a decision taken by virtue of section 27 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015;”.

29 In section 79—

(a) for subsection (2)(b)(ii) there is substituted—

“(ii) a preliminary objection under any of the provisions listed in subsection (3A);”;

(b) after subsection (3) there is inserted—

“(3A) For the purpose of subsection (2)(b)(ii), the provisions are—

(a) section 27(4A)(a) or (4B), 90C(2A), 255 or 255A of this Act,

(b) section 9(6) of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 or that section as applied by section 234AA(11) of this Act,

(c) paragraph 6(5)(b) of schedule A1 to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015.”.
261ZB Exception to rule on inadmissibility

Evidence of a statement made by a person in response to questioning carried out in accordance with authorisation granted under section 27 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 is not inadmissible on account of the statement’s being made after the person has been charged with an offence.”.

Other enactments

31 In subsection (2)(a) of section 8A of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986, for the words “section 15A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (right of suspects to have access to a solicitor)” there is substituted “section 24 (right to have solicitor present) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”.

31A In section 6D of the Road Traffic Act 1988, for subsection (2A) there is substituted—

“(2A) Instead of, or before, arresting a person under this section, a constable may detain the person at or near the place where the preliminary test was, or would have been, administered with a view to imposing on the person there a requirement under section 7.”.

31B In Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000—

(a) in paragraph 18—

(i) in sub-paragraph (2), for the words from “and” at the end of paragraph (a) to the end of the sub-paragraph there is substituted—

“(ab) intimation is to be made under paragraph 16(1) whether the person detained requests that it be made or not, and (ac) section 32 (right of under 18s to have access to other person) of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 applies as if the detained person were a person in police custody for the purposes of that section.”;

(ii) after sub-paragraph (3) there is inserted—

“(4) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)—

“child” means a person under 16 years of age, “parent” includes guardian and any person who has the care of the child mentioned in sub-paragraph (2).”,

(b) in paragraph 20(1), the words “or a person detained under section 14 of that Act” are repealed,

(c) in paragraph 27—

(i) in sub-paragraph (4), paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) sub-paragraph (5) is repealed.

31C In the schedule to the Sexual Offences (Procedure and Evidence) (Scotland) Act 2002, paragraph 2 is repealed.

32 In the Criminal Procedure (Legal Assistance, Detention and Appeals) (Scotland) Act 2010, sections 1, 3 and 4 are repealed.

32A In the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011—
(a) in section 65—
   (i) for subsection (1) there is substituted—
   “(1) Subsection (2) applies where the Principal Reporter is informed under sub-section (2) of section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015 that a child is being kept in a place of safety under subsection (3) of that section.”,
   (ii) in subsection (2), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”,

(b) in section 66(1), for sub-paragraph (vii) there is substituted—
   “(vii) information under section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, or”,

(c) in section 68(4)(e)(vi), for the words “section 43(5) of the Criminal Procedure
   (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46)” there is substituted “section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015”,

(d) in section 69, for subsection (3) there is substituted—
   “(3) If—
   (a) the determination under section 66(2) is made following the Principal
   Reporter receiving information under section 42B of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2015, and
   (b) at the time the determination is made the child is being kept in a place of safety,
   the children’s hearing must be arranged to take place no later than the third day after the Principal Reporter receives the information mentioned in paragraph (a).”,

(e) in section 72(2)(b), for the words “in the” there is substituted “in a”.

In section 20 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012, subsections (2) and (3) are repealed.

SCHEDULE 3
(introduced by section 87)

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

“SCHEDULE 2A
(introduced by section 55A)

POLICE NEGOTIATING BOARD FOR SCOTLAND

Status of the PNBS
1 (1) The PNBS—
   (a) is not a servant or agent of the Crown, and
   (b) has no status, immunity or privilege of the Crown.

(2) The property of the PNBS is not property of, or property held on behalf of, the Crown.
Chairing and membership

2 (1) The PNBS is to consist of—
   (a) a chairperson,
   (c) other persons representing the interests of each of—
       (i) the Authority,
       (ii) the chief constable,
       (iii) constables (other than special constables) and police cadets,
       (iv) the Scottish Ministers.

(2) It is for the Scottish Ministers to appoint the chairperson.

(3) Other members are to be appointed in accordance with the constitution prepared under paragraph 4.

(4) A member of the PNBS holds and vacates office in accordance with the terms of the member’s appointment.

(5) The chairperson may—
   (a) resign from office by giving notice in writing to the Scottish Ministers,
   (b) be removed from office if, in the opinion of the Scottish Ministers, the person is unable, unfit or unwilling to perform the functions of the office.

Temporary chairperson

2A(1) The PNBS may have a temporary chairperson if (for the time being)—
   (a) there is no chairperson, or
   (b) the chairperson is unavailable to act.

(2) A reference in this Chapter to the chairperson is to be read, where appropriate to do so by virtue of sub-paragraph (1), as meaning or including (as the context requires) the temporary chairperson.

Disqualification from chairing

3 A person is disqualified from appointment, and from holding office, as the chairperson of the PNBS if the person is or becomes—
   (a) a member of the House of Commons,
   (b) a member of the Scottish Parliament,
   (c) a member of the European Parliament,
   (d) a Minister of the Crown,
   (e) a member of the Scottish Government,
   (f) a civil servant.

Constitution and procedure etc.

4 (1) It is for the Scottish Ministers to prepare the constitution for the PNBS.
(2) The constitution must regulate the procedure for consensus to be reached among the members of the PNBS on the terms of representations to be made under section 55B(1) or 55C(1).

(2A) The constitution—

(a) may require a dispute on representations to be made under section 55B(1) to be submitted to arbitration by agreement among the members to do so, and must not prevent such a dispute from being submitted to arbitration on such agreement (except prevention by way of limitation as allowed below),

(b) may—

(i) authorise the chairperson to submit such a dispute to arbitration without such agreement,

(ii) limit how often within a reporting year such a dispute can be submitted to arbitration (including limitation framed by reference to particular matters or circumstances).

(3) The constitution may contain provision about—

(a) membership (including number of members to represent each of the interests mentioned in paragraph 2(1)(c)),

(b) internal organisation (for example, committees and office-holders),

(c) procedures to be followed (including conduct of meetings),

(d) the content of a report required by section 55D,

(e) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(4) The Scottish Ministers—

(a) must keep the constitution under review,

(b) may revise it from time to time.

(5) Before preparing or revising the constitution, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the Authority,

(b) the chief constable, and

(c) persons representing the interests of constables (other than special constables) and police cadets.

(6) The constitution, or any revision of it, has effect only when brought into effect by the Scottish Ministers by regulations.

Process of arbitration

4A(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies where—

(a) a dispute is submitted to arbitration in accordance with the constitution, and

(b) no arbitration agreement relating to the dispute is in place.

(2) A document submitting the dispute to arbitration is deemed to be an arbitration agreement.
(3) For the application of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010, a reference in this paragraph to an arbitration agreement is to such an agreement as defined by section 4 of that Act.

4B(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of arbitration in accordance with the constitution (whether such arbitration arises by reason of a real or deemed arbitration agreement).

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions disapplying or modifying the mandatory rules in schedule 1 to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010.

4C(1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies for the purpose of the operation of section 55CA.

(2) Regulations under paragraph 4(6) may include provisions specifying, by reference to particular matters or circumstances, what are qualifying cases.

Remuneration and expenses

5 (1) The Scottish Ministers may pay—

(a) such remuneration to the chairperson of the PNBS as they think fit,

(b) such expenses of the members of the PNBS as they think fit.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must pay such expenses as they consider are reasonably required to be incurred to enable the PNBS to carry out its functions.”.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill
[AS PASSED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about criminal justice including as to police powers and rights of suspects and as to criminal evidence, procedure and sentencing; to establish the Police Negotiating Board for Scotland; and for connected purposes.

Introduced by:  Kenny MacAskill
On:  20 June 2013
Bill type:  Government Bill