Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and “As Passed”);
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
• Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;
• Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;
• Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;
• Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available for sale from Stationery Office bookshops or free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.scottish.parliament.uk).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

The annexes containing oral and written evidence to the Justice Committee were not published in hard copy as part of the Committee’s Stage 1 Report, but were available on the web only. This material (the oral evidence taken, and written evidence and supplementary evidence received by the Committee, along with correspondence) is reproduced in full in this volume after the Stage 1 Report.

The Justice Committee also did not publish reports from other committees in hard copy as part of its Stage 1 Report, but made them available on the web only. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee published its report to the Justice Committee in hard copy, but also made the evidence received by it available on the web only. The report of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee is included in this volume after the material relating to the Justice Committee’s Stage 1 Report. All of the evidence received by the Local Government and Regeneration Committee is also included in this volume, including a briefing from Scottish Government officials that was not incorporated in the Committee's report.

The reports of the Finance Committee and the Subordinate Legislation Committee to the Justice Committee were made available on the web only. These reports, along with all oral and written evidence received by the committees, are included in this volume.

After Stage 1, at its meeting on 8 May 2012, the Subordinate Legislation Committee considered and noted the Scottish Government’s response to its report on the Bill at Stage 1. The response and the relevant extracts from the Official Report and from the Committee’s minutes are included in this volume.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about policing; to make provision about fire and rescue services; and for connected purposes.

PART 1
POLICE REFORM

CHAPTER 1
THE SCOTTISH POLICE AUTHORITY

1 The Scottish Police Authority

(1) There is established a body corporate to be known as the Scottish Police Authority.

(2) Schedule 1 makes provision about the Authority’s constitution, members and staff and other matters relating to it.

2 Functions of the Authority

(1) The Authority’s main functions are—

(a) to maintain the Police Service,

(b) to promote and support continuous improvement in the policing of Scotland,

(c) to hold the chief constable to account for the policing of Scotland.

(2) The Authority also has the additional functions conferred on it by virtue of this or any other enactment.

(3) The Authority must try to carry out its functions in a way which is proportionate, accountable and transparent and which is consistent with any principle of good governance which appears to it to constitute best practice.

3 Maintenance of the police

In pursuance of its function under section 2(1)(a)—

(a) the Authority must (in accordance with regulations made under section 49)—

(i) pay constables pay and allowances, and reimburse any expenses reasonably incurred by a constable, and

(b) the Authority may provide and maintain anything necessary or desirable for the carrying out of police functions, including vehicles, equipment, information technology systems, land, buildings and other structures.

4 General powers of the Authority

(1) The Authority may do anything that it considers appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the carrying out of its functions.

(2) The Authority may in particular—

(a) enter into contracts,

(b) borrow money,

(c) acquire and dispose of land and other property,

(d) with the authorisation of the Scottish Ministers, purchase compulsorily land, and

(e) form or promote (whether alone or with another) companies under the Companies Act 2006.

(3) The Authority may not exercise the power in subsection (2)(b) without the consent of the Scottish Ministers.

(4) Such consent may be given—

(a) with respect to a particular case or a particular class of case,

(b) subject to such conditions as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(5) The power in subsection (2)(c) includes power to accept, on such terms and conditions as the Authority considers appropriate—

(a) gifts of money, and

(b) gifts or loans of other property.

(6) The powers in subsection (2)(c) and (d) to acquire and purchase land include power to acquire a servitude or other right in or over land by the creation of a new right.

(7) The Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) (Scotland) Act 1947 applies in relation to the compulsory purchase of land under subsection (2)(d) as if—

(a) that provision were contained in an Act in force immediately before the commencement of that Act, and

(b) the Authority were a local authority.

5 Directions

(1) The Authority must comply with any direction (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers.

(2) A direction may not be given in respect of—

(a) a specific operation being or to be carried out by the Police Service, or

(b) the way in which the Police Service is carrying out (or is to carry out) a specific operation.
(3) The Scottish Ministers must—
   (a) publish a direction given under this section in such manner as they consider appropriate, and
   (b) lay a copy of it before the Scottish Parliament.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may vary or revoke a direction (and subsection (3) applies in relation to an instrument varying or revoking a direction as it applies to a direction).

CHAPTER 2

THE POLICE SERVICE OF SCOTLAND

The Police Service of Scotland

There is to be a constabulary to be known as the Police Service of Scotland comprising—
   (a) a constable holding the office of chief constable,
   (b) one or more constables holding the office of deputy chief constable,
   (c) one or more constables holding the office of assistant chief constable, and
   (d) other individuals holding the office of constable.

Constables: appointment, ranks and terms of office

Senior officers

(1) The Authority must appoint—
   (a) the chief constable,
   (b) one or more deputy chief constables, and
   (c) one or more assistant chief constables.

(2) An appointment of a chief constable has effect only if approved by the Scottish Ministers.

(3) The Authority must consult the chief constable before appointing a deputy or assistant chief constable.

Regular constables

It is for the chief constable to appoint constables (other than senior officers).

Special constables

The chief constable may appoint special constables, being constables who are not entitled to be paid but who may, in accordance with regulations made under section 49, be entitled to receive—
   (a) allowances,
   (b) periodic payments which acknowledge the giving of, or a commitment to give, services.
10 Constable’s declaration

(1) An appointment of an individual as a constable has effect only where the individual has made a declaration in the following terms before a sheriff or justice of the peace—

"I, do solemnly, sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of constable with fairness, integrity, diligence and impartiality, according to law."

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the declaration.

11 Ranks

(1) The ranks which a constable may hold are—

(a) chief constable,
(b) deputy chief constable,
(c) assistant chief constable,
(d) chief superintendent,
(e) superintendent,
(f) chief inspector,
(g) inspector,
(h) sergeant,
(i) constable.

(2) Constables appointed as senior officers under section 7 are to hold the rank corresponding to the office to which they are appointed.

(3) It is for the chief constable to assign, and to make promotions to, ranks below that of assistant chief constable.

(4) A constable may be demoted in rank only—

(a) if the constable consents, or
(b) in accordance with regulations made under section 49.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify subsection (1) to add or remove any rank below that of assistant chief constable.

(6) Before making regulations, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the chief constable,
(b) the Authority,
(c) the representative committees of the Police Federation for Scotland,
(d) such persons as appear to them to be representative of senior officers,
(e) such persons as appear to them to be representative of superintendents (including chief superintendents), and
(f) such other persons as they consider appropriate.
Constables: terms of office

A constable is to hold and vacate office in accordance with—

(a) regulations made under section 49, and

(b) any other enactment (for example, the Police Pensions Act 1976 or section 14 of this Act) which makes provision in that regard.

Rewards

The Authority may, on the recommendation of the chief constable, pay such sums by way of reward as it thinks fit to—

(a) a constable (other than the chief constable) who in its opinion has carried out the constable’s functions with exceptional diligence or in a specially meritorious manner, or

(b) a person who in its opinion has made a substantial contribution to the carrying out of police functions.

Senior officers: retirement for efficiency or effectiveness

(1) The Authority may call on a senior officer to retire from office in the interests of efficiency or effectiveness.

(2) Before calling on a senior officer to retire, the Authority must—

(a) give the senior officer—

(i) an explanation of the reason why the Authority proposes to call on the senior officer to retire, and

(ii) an opportunity to make representations,

(b) consider any representations made, and

(c) where the chief constable is to be called on to retire, consult the Scottish Ministers.

(3) A senior officer called on to retire must retire with effect from—

(a) the date determined by the Authority when calling on the senior officer to retire, or

(b) such earlier date as may be agreed between the senior officer and the Authority.

Constables: service outwith the Police Service of Scotland

(1) The chief constable may make arrangements, or give consent, for constables to be engaged in service outwith the Police Service.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) prescribe types of service in respect of which arrangements are made or consent is given under subsection (1) as being “temporary service” for the purposes of this section, and

(b) make such further provision in respect of constables on temporary service as they consider appropriate.
(3) A constable on temporary service is to continue to hold the office of constable but does not have the powers and privileges of a constable (except where the arrangements or consent provide for the constable to remain under the direction and control of the chief constable or where contrary provision is made by or under this section or any other enactment).

(4) Regulations made under subsection (2) may in particular make provision—

(a) applying any provision of this Act or any other enactment relating to constables (including any such provision or other enactment creating offences against or as regards constables), with such modifications as are considered appropriate, in relation to constables on temporary service,

(b) about the liability for unlawful conduct of a constable while on temporary service.

(5) At the end of a period of temporary service outwith the Police Service, a constable—

(a) is entitled to revert to serve as a constable of the Police Service in the rank in which the constable was serving immediately before the period began, and

(b) is to be treated as if the constable has served as a constable of the Police Service during the period of temporary service for the purposes of any scale prescribed by virtue of regulations made under section 49 fixing the constable’s rate of pay by reference to length of service.

(6) Subsection (5) does not apply where a pension, allowance or gratuity becomes payable to the constable during the period of temporary service by virtue of regulations made under the Police Pensions Act 1976 or section 1 of the Police (Overseas Service) Act 1945.

(7) A constable may, during any period of temporary service, be promoted to a higher rank and in such a case—

(a) the reference in subsection (5)(a) to the rank in which the constable was serving immediately before the period began is to be construed as a reference to the rank to which the constable is promoted, and

(b) the constable is, for the purposes of subsection (5)(b), to be treated as having served in that rank from the time of promotion.

16 Temporary service as constable of the Police Service of Scotland

(1) The chief constable may make arrangements for any person falling within subsection (2) to be engaged on temporary service as a constable of the Police Service.

(2) A person falls within this subsection if the person is a member of—

(a) a police force maintained under section 2 of the Police Act 1996 (c.16),

(b) the metropolitan police force,

(c) the City of London police force,

(d) the Police Service of Northern Ireland,

(e) the Ministry of Defence Police appointed on the nomination of the Secretary of State under section 1 of the Ministry of Defence Police Act 1987 (c.4),

(f) the British Transport Police Force,

(g) the Civil Nuclear Constabulary,
(h) the States of Jersey Police Force,
(i) the salaried police force of the Island of Guernsey, or
(j) the Isle of Man Constabulary.

(3) An individual may be engaged on temporary service under arrangements made under this section only where the individual has made the declaration specified in section 10 before a sheriff or justice of the peace.

(4) An individual engaged on temporary service under such arrangements—
(a) is under the direction and control of the chief constable,
(b) has all the functions conferred on a constable by virtue of this or any other enactment or by rule of law, and
(c) has all the powers and privileges of a constable throughout Scotland.

Chief constable

17 Chief constable’s responsibility for the policing of Scotland

(1) The chief constable is responsible, and must account to the Authority, for the policing of Scotland.

(2) In particular, the chief constable—
(a) has direction and control of the Police Service (see section 21),
(b) is responsible for the day to day administration of the Police Service, including the allocation and deployment of resources received from the Authority,
(c) is to be involved in the preparation of the strategic police plan, annual police plans and the Authority’s annual report (see sections 36 and 40(4)),
(d) must seek to secure continuous improvement in the policing of Scotland (see section 38(2)),
(e) must designate local commanders and ensure that adequate arrangements are in place for the policing of each local authority area (see section 45), and
(f) may be required to provide the Authority with information relating to the Police Service, policing or the state of crime (see sections 41(3), 61(4) and 81(3)).

(3) The chief constable must, when directing constables, police cadets and police staff in the carrying out of their functions, comply with any lawful instruction given by—
(a) the appropriate prosecutor in relation to the investigation of offences,
(b) the Lord Advocate under section 12 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46),
(c) the Lord Justice General, or
(d) the sheriff principal for the place in which the functions are to be carried out.

(4) The chief constable must seek to ensure that the policing of Scotland is done—
(a) with due regard to—
(i) the policing principles, and
(ii) any recommendations made or guidance issued by the Authority on the policing of Scotland, and

(b) in accordance with—

(i) the strategic police priorities,

(ii) the most recently approved strategic police plan, and

(iii) the relevant annual police plan.

(5) Any recommendation made or guidance issued by the Authority for the purposes of subsection (4)(a)(ii) must not be inconsistent with—

(a) the strategic police priorities,

(b) the most recently approved strategic police plan,

(c) the relevant annual police plan, or

(d) any guidance or instructions issued to the chief constable by the Lord Advocate or a procurator fiscal in relation to the investigation or reporting of offences.

18 Delegation of chief constable’s functions

15 (1) The chief constable may direct or authorise any other constable to carry out any of the chief constable’s functions.

(2) A direction or authorisation under subsection (1) does not affect the chief constable’s—

(a) responsibility for the carrying out of delegated functions, or

(b) ability to carry out delegated functions.

(3) The Authority must designate a deputy chief constable to carry out the chief constable’s functions where—

(a) the office of chief constable is vacant, or

(b) the chief constable is unable to carry out those functions by reason of being absent, incapacitated or suspended from duty.

(4) The Authority must designate an assistant chief constable to carry out the chief constable’s functions where—

(a) the offices of chief constable and deputy chief constable are vacant, or

(b) neither the chief constable nor a deputy chief constable is able to carry out those functions by reason of being absent, incapacitated or suspended from duty.

(5) Only one deputy chief constable or, as the case may be, assistant chief constable may be so designated to act at any one time.

(6) This section does not affect any restriction on delegation of the chief constable’s functions contained in any enactment which makes provision in that regard.

Functions of constables

19 Constables: functions and jurisdiction

(1) An individual holding the office of constable has—
(a) all the functions conferred on a constable by virtue of this or any other enactment or by rule of law,

(b) all the powers and privileges of a constable throughout Scotland.

(2) A constable who is the chief constable, a deputy chief constable, an assistant chief constable or a local commander also has all the additional functions conferred on such a constable by virtue of this or any other enactment or by rule of law.

20 Constables: general duties

(1) It is the duty of a constable—

(a) to prevent and detect crime,

(b) to maintain order,

(c) to protect life and property,

(d) to take such lawful measures, and make such reports to the appropriate prosecutor, as may be needed to bring offenders with all due speed to justice,

(e) where required, to serve and execute a warrant, citation or deliverance issued, or process duly endorsed, by a Lord Commissioner of Justiciary, sheriff, justice of the peace or stipendiary magistrate in relation to criminal proceedings, and

(f) to attend court to give evidence.

(2) When taking lawful measures in pursuance of subsection (1)(d), a constable must take every precaution to ensure that a person charged with an offence is not unreasonably or unnecessarily detained in custody.

(3) Subsection (2) does not prejudice the operation of section 135(3) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46).

21 Direction and control of the Police Service

(1) Constables are, in the carrying out of their functions (including any functions held by virtue of being a deputy chief constable, an assistant chief constable or a local commander), subject to the direction and control of the chief constable.

(2) A constable must—

(a) carry out lawful orders, and

(b) punctually and promptly perform all appointed duties and attend to all matters within the scope of that constable’s office.

(3) Police staff and police cadets are, in the carrying out of their functions, subject to the direction and control of (and may be dismissed by) the chief constable.

22 Failure to perform duty

(1) It is an offence for a constable, without reasonable excuse, to be absent from duty.

(2) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 60 days or a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(3) It is an offence for a constable to neglect or violate the constable’s duty.
A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (3) is liable—
(a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years, or to a fine, or to both, or
(b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or to both.

23 Failure to return equipment

(1) It is an offence for a constable, without reasonable excuse or the permission of the Authority, to fail to return to the Authority, immediately upon being ordered to do so, any relevant item.

(2) It is an offence for a person who ceases to be a constable, without reasonable excuse or the permission of the Authority, to fail to return to the Authority, when ceasing to be a constable, any relevant item.

(3) A person who is guilty of an offence under this section is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 60 days or a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(4) Subsection (5) applies where a sheriff or a justice of the peace is satisfied on evidence on oath that—
(a) there has been a failure to return a relevant item, and
(b) the relevant item is in any place.

(5) The sheriff or, as the case may be, the justice of the peace, may grant a warrant to any constable named in the warrant to enter and search the place at any reasonable hour, if necessary by force, and to take any relevant item which is found in the place.

(6) For the purposes of this section, a “relevant item” is anything issued to a constable for the carrying out of the constable’s functions.

24 Liability for unlawful conduct

(1) The chief constable is liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of any person falling within subsection (2) in the carrying out (or purported carrying out) of that person’s functions in the same manner as an employer is liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of an employee in the course of employment.

(2) A person falls within this subsection if the person is—
(a) a constable under the direction and control of the chief constable, or
(b) a member of an international joint investigation team who is not—
(i) a constable,
(ii) a member of the Authority’s staff, or
(iii) a member of the police staff.

(3) The Authority must pay—
(a) any damages or expenses awarded against the chief constable in any proceedings brought by virtue of this section,
(b) any expenses incurred by the chief constable in relation to such proceedings (in so far as not recovered in the proceedings), and

(c) any sum required in connection with the settlement of any claim against the chief constable which has or might have given rise to such proceedings (where settlement is approved by the Authority).

(4) Where the office of chief constable is vacant, references in subsections (1) to (3) to the chief constable are to be read as references to the person who is for the time being carrying out the chief constable’s functions.

(5) The Authority may, in such cases and to such extent as it thinks fit, pay—

(a) any damages or expenses awarded against a constable in proceedings arising in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of that constable,

(b) any expenses incurred by the constable concerned in relation to such proceedings (in so far as not recovered in the proceedings),

(c) any sum required in connection with the settlement of any claim which has or might have given rise to such proceedings.

Police cadets

(1) The chief constable may appoint police cadets to undergo training with a view to becoming constables.

(2) Subject to section 21 and any other contrary enactment, police cadets are to be treated as employees of the Authority.

Police staff

(1) The Authority may appoint individuals to assist constables in the carrying out of police functions.

(2) Individuals appointed under subsection (1) may be—

(a) employed by the Authority, or

(b) provided to the Authority under arrangements between the Authority and a third party.

(3) The chief constable has power to make appointments under subsection (1) on behalf of the Authority.

Terms and conditions of police staff

(1) Police staff may be employed on terms and conditions determined by the Authority.

(2) The Authority may pay or make arrangements for the payment of pensions, allowances or gratuities (including by way of compensation for loss of employment) to, or in respect of, any person who has ceased to be employed as a member of police staff.

(3) The arrangements mentioned in subsection (2) may include—
(a) the making of contributions or payments towards provision for pensions, allowances or gratuities mentioned there, and

(b) the establishment and administration of pension schemes.

28 Police custody and security officers

5 (1) The chief constable may certify a member of the police staff appointed under section 26(1) as having been authorised to assist constables by carrying out functions in relation to custody and security.

(2) An individual so certified is to be known as a “police custody and security officer”.

(3) A police custody and security officer has—

(a) for the purposes of the functions which the officer is authorised to carry out, the powers and duties set out in schedule 2, and

(b) all other functions conferred on police custody and security officers by virtue of this or any other enactment or by rule of law.

(4) A police custody and security officer is to be regarded as acting in accordance with the officer’s powers and duties only if the officer is readily identifiable as such an officer when so acting (whether or not by means of a uniform or badge worn).

(5) Sections 22(3) and (4), 23 and 89 apply in relation to a police custody and security officer as they apply in relation to a constable (and when so applied, a reference to a constable is to be read as a reference to such an officer).

29 Certification of police custody and security officers

(1) The chief constable may issue a certificate under section 28(1) only if satisfied that the member of the police staff concerned—

(a) is a fit and proper person to carry out a police custody and security officer’s functions, and

(b) has received training to such standard as the chief constable considers appropriate for the carrying out of those functions.

(2) The chief constable may revoke a certificate if the certified person appears to the chief constable not to be a fit and proper person to carry out a police custody and security officer’s functions.

(3) The chief constable may (pending consideration of whether to revoke a certificate) suspend the certificate where it appears to the chief constable that the certified person may not be a fit and proper person to carry out a police custody and security officer’s functions.

(4) A certificate is otherwise to continue in force until such date or occurrence as it may specify.

30 False statements in relation to certification

(1) It is an offence for a person to provide information for the purpose of enabling or assisting the person or any other person to be certified as a police custody and security officer if the person knows that, or is reckless as to whether, the information is false or misleading in a material respect.
(2) A person guilty of such an offence is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.

CHAPTER 3
FORENSIC SERVICES

31 Forensic services
The Authority must provide forensic services to the Police Service, the Lord Advocate and procurators fiscal (and may provide forensic services to such other persons as it thinks fit).

CHAPTER 4
PRINCIPLES, PRIORITIES, OBJECTIVES AND PLANS

32 Policing principles
The policing principles are—
(a) that the main purpose of policing is to improve the safety and well-being of persons, localities and communities in Scotland, and
(b) that the Police Service, working in collaboration with others where appropriate, should seek to achieve that main purpose by policing in a way which—
(i) is accessible to, and engaged with, local communities, and
(ii) promotes measures to prevent crime, harm and disorder.

33 Strategic police priorities
(1) The Scottish Ministers may determine strategic priorities for the Authority (“strategic police priorities”).
(2) Strategic police priorities may relate to—
(a) the policing of Scotland, or
(b) the carrying out of the Authority’s functions.
(3) Before determining strategic police priorities, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) the Authority,
(b) such persons as appear to them to be representative of local authorities, and
(c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.
(4) When determining strategic police priorities, the Scottish Ministers must have regard to the policing principles.
(5) The Scottish Ministers must arrange for the strategic police priorities to be published in such manner as they consider appropriate.

34 Strategic police plan
(1) The Authority must prepare a strategic police plan.
(2) A strategic police plan is a plan which—
(a) sets out the main objectives for the Authority and for the policing of Scotland,

(b) explains the reasons for selecting each main objective,

(c) describes what the Authority considers should be done by it or by the Police Service in order to achieve the main objectives,

(d) where reasonably practicable, identifies outcomes by reference to which the achievement of the main objectives may be measured, and

(e) includes any other information connected with the Authority’s functions, or policing, which the Authority considers appropriate.

(3) Before preparing a strategic police plan, the Authority must make arrangements for obtaining views on what the plan should contain from persons whom it considers likely to have an interest in policing.

(4) When preparing a strategic police plan, the Authority must—

(a) send a copy of a draft plan to—

   (i) each local authority,

   (ii) the inspectors of constabulary, and

   (iii) such other persons as the Authority considers likely to have an interest in the plan,

(b) invite the recipients to comment on the draft plan within such reasonable period as the Authority may specify, and

(c) have regard to any comments received within that period.

(5) The Authority must—

(a) submit its strategic police plan to the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) use its best endeavours to secure their approval of the plan (with or without modifications).

(6) If the Scottish Ministers approve a strategic police plan submitted to them, the Authority must—

(a) publish the approved plan in such manner as the Authority considers appropriate (having regard to the desirability of it being accessible to those whom the Authority considers likely to have an interest in it), and

(b) lay a copy of it before the Scottish Parliament.

(7) The Authority—

(a) must review an approved strategic police plan at least once every 3 years (and must, in particular, do so where the strategic police priorities have been significantly revised), and

(b) following such a review, must—

   (i) prepare a replacement strategic police plan, or

   (ii) notify the Scottish Ministers that, having undertaken a review, the Authority has concluded that there is no need to replace the existing strategic police plan.
Part 1—Police reform

Chapter 4—Principles, priorities, objectives and plans

(8) Subsections (3) to (7), and sections 36 and 37, apply in relation to a replacement strategic police plan as they applied in relation to the plan being replaced.

35 Annual police plans

(1) The Authority must prepare an annual police plan for each yearly period beginning on 1 April.

(2) An annual police plan is a plan which—
   (a) sets out the proposed arrangements for—
      (i) the carrying out of the Authority’s functions during the yearly period, and
      (ii) the policing of Scotland during the yearly period,
   (b) describes how those arrangements are expected to contribute towards the achievement of the main objectives set out in the strategic police plan (by reference, where appropriate, to outcomes identified in that plan), and
   (c) includes any other information connected with the Authority’s functions, or policing, which the Authority considers appropriate.

(3) The Authority must—
   (a) publish the annual police plan before the start of the yearly period to which it relates in such manner as the Authority considers appropriate (having regard to the desirability of it being accessible to those whom the Authority considers likely to have an interest in it), and
   (b) lay a copy of it before the Scottish Parliament.

36 Planning: role of chief constable etc.

The Authority must involve the chief constable in the preparation of a strategic police plan and each annual police plan and the chief constable must provide the Authority with such assistance as it may reasonably require in that regard.

37 Planning functions: considerations

In carrying out their respective functions in relation to the preparation of the strategic police plan and each annual police plan, the Authority and the chief constable must—

(a) have regard to the policing principles,
(b) have regard to, and ensure that the strategic police plan and each annual police plan is not inconsistent with, the strategic police priorities, and
(c) ensure that an annual police plan is not inconsistent with the most recently approved strategic police plan.
CHAPTER 5
BEST VALUE

38 Best value

(1) It is the duty of the Authority to make arrangements which secure best value for the Authority (that is, a continuous improvement in the carrying out of the Authority’s functions).

(2) It is the duty of the chief constable to make arrangements which secure best value for the Police Service (that is, a continuous improvement in the carrying out of police functions).

(3) In securing best value, the Authority and the chief constable must maintain an appropriate balance among—
   (a) the quality of the carrying out of functions,
   (b) the cost of carrying out functions,
   (c) the cost to persons of any service provided for them on a wholly or partly rechargeable basis by the Authority or, as the case may be, under arrangements made by the chief constable.

(4) In maintaining that balance, the Authority and the chief constable must have regard to—
   (a) efficiency,
   (b) effectiveness,
   (c) economy, and
   (d) the need to meet the equal opportunity requirements.

(5) The Authority and the chief constable must carry out their duties under this section in a way which contributes to the achievement of sustainable development.

(6) In measuring the improvement of the carrying out of functions for the purposes of this section, regard is to be had to the extent to which the outcomes of the carrying out of the functions have improved.

(7) In this section, “equal opportunity requirements” has the same meaning as in Section L2 of Part 2 of Schedule 5 to the Scotland Act 1998 (c.46).

39 Best value: further provision

(1) In carrying out their respective duties under section 38(1) and (2), the Authority and the chief constable must have regard to—
   (a) any relevant guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers, and
   (b) what are, whether by reference to any generally recognised published code or otherwise, regarded as proper arrangements for the purposes of subsection (1) or, as the case may be, (2) of section 38 (or purposes which include those purposes).

(2) In the event of a conflict in any respect between any matters to which the Authority or the chief constable is to have regard under subsection (1), the Authority or the chief constable must in that respect have regard only to those falling within paragraph (a).

(3) Before issuing relevant guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) the Authority,
(b) the chief constable, and
(c) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may vary or revoke relevant guidance.

(5) In this section “relevant guidance”—
(a) means guidance on the carrying out of the duties imposed by subsections (1) or (2) of section 38,
(b) includes, in particular, guidance on—
   (i) how to make, and what is to be included in, the arrangements mentioned in those subsections,
   (ii) how to implement the duties imposed by those subsections.

CHAPTER 6

ANNUAL REPORTS, ACCOUNTS, AUDIT AND EXAMINATION

40 The Scottish Police Authority’s annual report

(1) The Authority must prepare an annual report as soon as practicable after the end of each reporting year.

(2) An annual report is a report setting out—
   (a) an assessment of the Authority’s performance during the reporting year in carrying out its functions,
   (b) an assessment of the Police Service’s performance during the reporting year in the policing of Scotland, and
   (c) such other information relating to the Authority’s functions, or to policing, as the Authority considers appropriate.

(3) An annual report must, in particular, contain an assessment of the performance by the Authority and the Police Service during the reporting year—
   (a) in achieving, or in working towards achieving, the main objectives set out in the most recently approved strategic police plan (by reference, where appropriate, to outcomes identified in that plan), and
   (b) in implementing the proposed arrangements set out in the annual police plan for the period to which the report relates.

(4) The Authority must involve the chief constable in the preparation of an annual report and the chief constable must provide the Authority with such assistance as it may reasonably require in that regard.

(5) The Authority must—
   (a) publish each of its annual reports in such manner as the Authority considers appropriate (having regard to the desirability of it being accessible to those whom the Authority considers likely to have an interest in it),
   (b) provide a copy of each of its annual reports to the Scottish Ministers, and
   (c) lay a copy of each of its annual reports before the Scottish Parliament.
(6) In this section “reporting year” means a yearly period ending on 31 March.

41 Accounts

(1) The Authority must—
   (a) keep proper accounts and proper records in relation to the accounts, and
   (b) as soon as practicable after the end of each yearly period ending on 31 March, prepare a statement of accounts in respect of that period.

(2) A statement of accounts so prepared must be in such form and contain such information as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

(3) Without prejudice to the generality of section 81, the chief constable must—
   (a) provide the Authority with such assistance and information as it may reasonably require for the purposes of subsection (1), and
   (b) seek to ensure that sufficient information is kept for those purposes.

(4) In particular, the Authority is entitled to require the chief constable to provide, within such reasonable time as it may specify, accounts of such of the transactions relating to the Police Service as it may specify.

(5) The Authority must send a copy of each statement of accounts to the Scottish Ministers.

(6) The Scottish Ministers must lay a copy of each statement of accounts before the Scottish Parliament.

42 Audit

The Authority must send a copy of each statement of accounts to the Auditor General for auditing.

43 Examination of Police Service by Auditor General

(1) The Auditor General may initiate examinations into—
   (a) the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of the Police Service, and
   (b) the arrangements made by the chief constable under section 38(2).

(2) In determining whether to initiate an examination, the Auditor General must take into account any proposals made by the Scottish Parliament.

(3) It is for the Auditor General personally to initiate an examination under this section and to decide who is to carry it out.

(4) In carrying out the examination that person (“the examiner”)—
   (a) is not entitled to question the merits of the policy objectives of the chief constable or the Police Service, but
   (b) may consider the appropriateness of any criteria used to assess the use of resources available to the Police Service.

(5) The examiner (if not the Auditor General) must report the results to the Auditor General, who may report the results to the Scottish Parliament and the Authority.

(6) The Auditor General may publish the results of an examination.
(7) Sections 23A and 24 of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 (asp 1) apply in relation to an examination under this section as they apply in relation to an examination under section 23 of that Act.

44 Examinations of Scottish Police Authority by Auditor General

The reference in section 23 of the Public Finance and Accountability Act 2000 to examinations into the economy, efficiency and effectiveness with which resources have been used is, in relation to the Authority, to include a reference to examinations into the arrangements made by the Authority under section 38(1).

CHAPTER 7

LOCAL POLICING

45 Local policing

(1) The chief constable must ensure that there are adequate arrangements in place for the policing of each local authority area (and any adjacent territorial waters).

(2) For each local authority area, the chief constable must designate a constable as local commander.

(3) A constable may be designated as local commander in relation to more than one local authority area.

46 Local authority role in policing

(1) A local commander must involve the local authority in the setting of priorities and objectives for the policing of its area.

(2) A local authority may monitor and provide feedback to the local commander on the policing of its area, and (in particular) may provide to the local commander—
   (a) its views on any matter concerning or connected to the policing of its area, and
   (b) any recommendations for the improvement of the policing of its area that it thinks fit.

(3) A local commander must provide to the local authority such—
   (a) reports on the carrying out of police functions in its area (including by reference to any local policing plan in force for the area),
   (b) statistical information on complaints made about the Police Service in, or the policing of, its area, and
   (c) other information about the policing of its area, as the local authority may reasonably require.

47 Duty to participate in community planning

In section 16(1) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 (asp 1) (duty to participate in community planning)—

(a) paragraph (c) is repealed, and
(b) for paragraph (e) substitute—
“(e) a local commander within the meaning of Part 1 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (asp 00),”.

48 Local police plans

(1) A local commander must prepare and submit a local police plan to the relevant local authority for approval.

(2) A local police plan is a plan which—
   (a) sets out the main priorities and objectives for the policing of the local authority’s area,
   (b) explains the reasons for selecting each of those priorities and objectives,
   (c) sets out the proposed arrangements for the policing of the local authority’s area (and how those arrangements are expected to achieve the main priorities and objectives),
   (d) where reasonably practicable, identifies outcomes by reference to which the achievement of those priorities and objectives may be measured,
   (e) describes how those priorities, objectives and arrangements are expected to contribute to the delivery of any other relevant local outcomes which are identified by community planning, and
   (f) includes any other information connected with the policing of the local authority’s area which the local commander considers relevant.

(3) In preparing a local police plan, the local commander must—
   (a) have regard to the most recently approved strategic police plan, and
   (b) consult such persons as the local commander considers appropriate.

(4) If the local authority approves a local police plan submitted to it, the local commander must publish it in such form and manner as the Authority may specify.

(5) The local commander must—
   (a) review the local police plan at least once every 3 years, and
   (b) following such a review, prepare and submit a replacement local police plan to the local authority for approval.

(6) Subsections (3) to (5) apply in relation to a replacement local police plan as they apply in relation to the plan being replaced.

(7) The local commander and the local authority may (after such consultation as they agree is appropriate) agree to modify an approved local police plan at any time.

(8) Where a local police plan is modified under subsection (7), the local commander must publish the modified plan in the same manner as if it were an approved replacement local police plan.

(9) In this section “community planning” means the community planning processes described in Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 (asp 1).
49 Governance and administration of police

The Scottish Ministers must make regulations as to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables and police cadets.

50 Appointments, promotions etc.

(1) Regulations made under section 49 may in particular make provision relating to—

(a) eligibility for appointment as constable or police cadet or for appointment or promotion to a particular rank,

(b) the procedure for appointment of senior officers or for the appointment or promotion of other constables,

(c) periods of service on probation,

(d) the efficiency or effectiveness of constables or police cadets,

(e) restrictions on the private life or business interests of constables or police cadets,

(f) resignation or retirement of constables.

(2) Such regulations—

(a) may provide for appointments of senior officers to be for fixed terms, but

(b) must not provide for fixed term appointment to any rank below that of assistant chief constable.

51 Conditions of service

(1) Regulations made under section 49 as to conditions of service may in particular make provision about—

(a) pay, allowances and expenses,

(b) public holidays and leave,

(c) the issue, use and return of police clothing and equipment.

(2) In relation to special constables, such regulations must not entitle them to pay but may make provision entitling them to receive periodic payments in acknowledgment of the giving of services (including provision about the minimum aggregate length of service needed within a period in order to give rise to an entitlement to receive a periodic payment in respect of that period).

(3) Regulations made under section 49—

(a) may make retrospective provision about pay or allowances, but

(b) must not retrospectively reduce any pay or allowance payable to or in respect of any person.
52 Regulations: duties

(1) Regulations made under section 49 may make provision relating to duties of constables or police cadets.

(2) Such regulations may in particular make provision about—

(a) duties which are or are not to be performed,

(b) hours of duty,

(c) the treatment as occasions of police duty of attendance at meetings of the Police Federations and any other body recognised for the purposes of section 64 of the Police Act 1996 (c.16) as representing members of police forces.

53 Disciplinary procedures: conduct and performance

(1) Regulations made under section 49 must establish, or provide for the establishment of, procedures for dealing with a constable whose standard of behaviour or performance is unsatisfactory.

(2) Such regulations may make provision—

(a) setting out—

(i) standards of behaviour which, if breached, may be treated as misconduct,

(ii) standards of performance which, if breached, may be treated as being unsatisfactory performance,

(iii) other circumstances in which a constable’s behaviour may be treated as misconduct or in which a constable’s performance may be treated as unsatisfactory (for example, where performance is inefficient or where there has been a failure to perform functions),

(b) for circumstances in which a constable may be suspended from duty pending investigation into whether the constable has been engaged in misconduct,

(c) subject to subsection (3), for a constable who is found to have been engaged in misconduct or whose performance is found to have been unsatisfactory to be dealt with by being—

(i) dismissed (with or without notice),

(ii) demoted in rank,

(iii) warned that future misconduct or unsatisfactory performance may lead to further disciplinary action,

(iv) admonished, or

(v) dealt with in any other way,

(d) conferring functions on the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner in relation to investigations of whether a constable has been engaged in misconduct or whether a constable’s performance has been unsatisfactory,

(e) applying the procedures (with or without modifications) in relation to a constable engaged on temporary service outwith the Police Service (see section 15).
(3) Such regulations must provide for the Authority to decide how to deal with any case in which a senior officer is found to have been engaged in misconduct or in which a senior officer’s performance is found to have been unsatisfactory.

(4) A constable suspended by virtue of regulations made under section 49 is not entitled to carry out any functions as a constable unless the regulations otherwise specify.

54 Personal records

Regulations made under section 49 may make provision relating to—

(a) the keeping of personal records about constables and police cadets,

(b) the taking of fingerprints and samples from constables and police cadets and the retention, use and destruction of such fingerprints and samples or of information derived from such samples.

55 Consultation on regulations

(1) Before making regulations under section 49 about any matter mentioned in section 61(1) of the Police Act 1996 (c.16), the Scottish Ministers must—

(a) share a draft of the regulations with the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom, and

(b) consider any representations made.

(2) Before making any other regulations under section 49, the Scottish Ministers must—

(a) consult and share a draft of the regulations with—

(i) the chief constable,

(ii) the Authority,

(iii) the representative committees of the Police Federation for Scotland,

(iv) such persons as appear to them to be representative of senior officers,

(v) such persons as appear to them to be representative of superintendents (including chief superintendents), and

(vi) such other persons as they consider appropriate, and

(b) consider any representations made.

56 Regulations: supplementary

(1) Regulations made under section 49 may—

(a) make provision for the delegation of functions to—

(i) the Scottish Ministers,

(ii) the Authority,

(iii) the chief constable,

(iv) a local commander,

(v) the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner, or

(vi) any other person,
(b) authorise or require the delegation of functions by any person.

(2) In the absence of express contrary intention, nothing in this Part affects the generality of the power conferred by section 49.

CHAPTER 9

POLICE APPEALS TRIBUNALS

57 Right to appeal to police appeals tribunal

(1) A constable may appeal to a police appeals tribunal against any decision to dismiss the constable, or to demote the constable in rank, taken in pursuance of regulations made under section 49.

(2) An appeal is competent only if the constable has exhausted any available process of review or appeal provided for in such regulations.

(3) Schedule 3 makes provision about police appeals tribunals, the rules relating to appeals, and other relevant matters.

58 Representation

(1) Before determining an appeal, a police appeals tribunal must—

(a) give both the appellant and the respondent a chance to make representations (whether by way of written submissions or oral hearing), and

(b) consider such representations.

(2) Either party may require that the representations are to be made by way of oral hearing.

(3) Where an oral hearing is to be held, the parties may elect to be represented (including by a legally qualified person).

59 Determinations by tribunal

(1) A police appeals tribunal may determine an appeal by—

(a) confirming the decision being appealed, or

(b) replacing that decision with any less severe decision which could have been made by the person who made it.

(2) Where the determination replaces the decision appealed against, it takes effect from the date of the decision which resulted in the dismissal or demotion in rank of the appellant.

(3) Subsection (4) applies where a determination made by a police appeals tribunal reinstates the appellant—

(a) as a constable,

(b) in—

(i) the rank previously held by the appellant, or

(ii) a different rank.
(4) The appellant is to be deemed, for the purposes of reckoning service for pension and to such extent (if any) as may be determined by the tribunal for the purposes of pay, to have served as a constable, or in the reinstated or different rank, continuously from the date of the decision which resulted in the dismissal or demotion in rank of the appellant to the date of the tribunal’s determination.

(5) In determining an appeal, the tribunal may deal with such other matters relating to the appellant’s reinstatement or period of service as the tribunal thinks fit including, in particular, any periods where the appellant was suspended in consequence of the proceedings which led to the appellant’s dismissal.

60 Powers to obtain information

(1) The person appointed to chair a police appeals tribunal (the chairing member) may require the appellant, respondent or any other person—

(a) to attend a hearing of the tribunal, at such time and such place as the chairing member may specify, for the purposes of giving evidence,

(b) to give to the tribunal, by such day as the chairing member may specify, such documents or information as the tribunal may reasonably require.

(2) Subsection (1) does not authorise the chairing member or the tribunal to require any person to answer any question or to disclose anything which the person would be entitled to refuse to answer or disclose on grounds of confidentiality in civil proceedings in the Court of Session.

(3) It is an offence for any person on whom a requirement under subsection (1) is served to—

(a) fail to attend a hearing of the tribunal as required by the citation,

(b) refuse or fail, while attending such a hearing as so required, to answer any question,

(c) refuse or fail to give the tribunal any document or information so required,

(d) knowingly or recklessly make any statement in respect of any information so required which is false or misleading in a material respect, or

(e) deliberately alter, suppress, conceal or destroy any document so required.

(4) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (3) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 2 on the standard scale.

(5) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under subsection (3)(a), (b) or (c) to show that the person had a reasonable excuse for the refusal or failure.

CHAPTER 10

COMPLAINTS AND INVESTIGATIONS

61 Complaints handling

(1) The Authority and the chief constable must maintain suitable arrangements for the handling of relevant complaints.

(2) The Authority and the chief constable must seek the views of others as to what those arrangements should be.
(3) The Authority must keep itself informed as to the manner in which relevant complaints are dealt with by the chief constable with a view to satisfying itself that the arrangements maintained by the chief constable under subsection (1) are suitable.

(4) Without prejudice to the generality of section 81 the chief constable must provide the Authority with such information about relevant complaints made to the chief constable, or about how they have been dealt with, as the Authority may reasonably require for the purposes of subsection (3).

(5) The chief constable must seek to ensure that sufficient information about relevant complaints is kept to enable compliance with any requirement made under subsection (4).

(6) In this section “relevant complaint” has the same meaning as in Chapter 2 of Part 1 of the 2006 Act.

62 The Police Investigations and Review Commissioner

(1) The Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland (established by section 33 of the 2006 Act) is renamed the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner.

(2) Accordingly—

(a) for the italic cross heading immediately preceding section 33 of the 2006 Act, substitute—

“The Police Investigations and Review Commissioner”

(b) for the title of that section substitute—

“The Police Investigations and Review Commissioner”.

(c) in subsection (1) of that section, for “Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland” substitute “Police Investigations and Review Commissioner”.

(3) Any reference in any enactment or instrument to the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland is to be read as a reference to the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner.

63 General functions of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner

After section 33 of the 2006 Act, insert—

“33A General functions of the Commissioner

(1) The Commissioner’s general functions are—

(a) to maintain, and to secure the maintenance by the Authority and the chief constable of, suitable arrangements for—

(i) the handling of relevant complaints; and

(ii) the examination of the handling of relevant complaints and the reconsideration of such complaints in accordance with sections 34 to 41;

(b) where directed to do so by the appropriate prosecutor—
Part 1—Police reform

Chapter 10—Complaints and investigations

(i) to investigate any circumstances in which there is an indication that a person serving with the police may have committed a serious criminal offence;

(ii) to investigate, on behalf of the relevant procurator fiscal, the circumstances of any death involving a person serving with the police which that procurator fiscal is required to investigate under section 1 of the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976 (c.14);

(c) to investigate and report on certain serious incidents involving the police (see section 41B);

(d) to investigate other matters relating to the Authority or the Police Service where the Commissioner considers that it would be in the public interest to do so (see section 41C); and

(e) to perform any functions imposed on the Commissioner by regulations made under section 49 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (asp 00) in relation to procedures for dealing with constables whose standard of behaviour or performance is unsatisfactory.

An offence is a “serious criminal offence” for the purposes of subsection (1)(b)(i) if—

(a) the conduct constituting the offence results in death or serious injury; or

(b) it is an offence of such other description as the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe.”.

Investigations under supervision of Lord Advocate or procurator fiscal

After section 41 of the 2006 Act, insert—

“Investigations

41A Investigations under supervision of Lord Advocate or procurator fiscal

The Commissioner, when carrying out an investigation in pursuance of a direction issued under paragraph (b) of section 33A(1), must comply with—

(a) any lawful instruction given by the appropriate prosecutor who issued the direction, and

(b) in the case of an investigation carried out in pursuance of a direction issued under sub-paragraph (i) of that paragraph, any instruction issued by the Lord Advocate in relation to the reporting, for consideration of the question of prosecution, of alleged offences.”.

Serious incidents involving the police

After section 41A of the 2006 Act (inserted by section 64), insert—
“41B Serious incidents involving the police

(1) A “serious incident involving the police” which the Commissioner may investigate in pursuance of paragraph (c) of section 33A(1) is—

(a) a circumstance in or in consequence of which a person has died or has sustained serious injury where—

(i) the person, at or before the time of death or serious injury, had contact (directly or indirectly) with a person serving with the police acting in the execution of that person’s duties; and

(ii) there is an indication that the contact may have caused (directly or indirectly) or contributed to the death or serious injury;

(b) any other circumstance in or in consequence of which—

(i) a person has otherwise sustained a serious injury at a time when the person was being detained or kept in custody by a person serving with the police; or

(ii) a person serving with the police has used a firearm or any other weapon of such description as the Scottish Ministers may by regulations specify; or

(c) any other circumstance involving the Authority, the Police Service or a person serving with the police as may be specified in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(2) But a matter is not a “serious incident involving the police” if it is—

(a) a matter which is, or has been, the subject of a relevant complaint;

(b) a matter which is being, or has been, investigated by the Commissioner by virtue of paragraph (b) of section 33A(1); or

(c) a matter which is being, or has been, investigated by any other person under section 1 of the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976 (c.14).”.

66 Investigations of other matters in the public interest

After section 41B of the 2006 Act (inserted by section 65), insert—

“41C Investigation of matters in the public interest

(1) The Commissioner may investigate any relevant police matter where the Commissioner considers that it would be in the public interest to do so.

(2) A relevant police matter is any matter relating to the Authority, the Police Service or a person serving with the police other than—

(a) a matter which is, or has been, the subject of a relevant complaint;

(b) a matter which is being, or has been, investigated by the Commissioner by virtue of paragraph (b) of section 33A(1);

(c) a matter which is being, or has been, investigated by any other person under section 1 of the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976 (c.14);
(d) a matter which is being, has been or is capable of being investigated by the Commissioner by virtue of paragraph (c) of section 33A(1).”.

67 Investigations: procedure etc.

After section 41C of the 2006 Act (inserted by section 66), insert—

“41D Investigations: procedure etc.

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make such provision about investigations by the Commissioner in pursuance of paragraph (c) or (d) of section 33A(1) as they consider appropriate.

(2) Regulations may, in particular, make provision—

(a) requiring the chief constable or the Authority to refer matters to the Commissioner;

(b) about circumstances in which the Commissioner—
(i) must, must not or need not carry out an investigation; or
(ii) may discontinue an investigation;

(c) about the form and procedure of an investigation;

(d) imposing restrictions on the extent of any investigation;

(e) setting time limits within which matters must be investigated;

(f) requiring the chief constable, the Authority or other persons to assist and co-operate with the Commissioner when carrying out an investigation (by providing evidence, attending hearings or otherwise);

(g) lifting obligations of secrecy or other restrictions on disclosure of information which may otherwise prevent information being disclosed for the purposes of an investigation;

(h) for the delegation of functions to the Commissioner.

(3) Before making regulations under this section, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the Commissioner;

(b) the Authority;

(c) the chief constable; and

(d) such other persons as they think appropriate.”.

68 Reports on investigations

After section 41D of the 2006 Act (inserted by section 67), insert—

“41E Reports on investigations

(1) The Commissioner must prepare a report of each investigation carried out in pursuance of paragraph (c) or (d) of section 33A(1).

(2) The Commissioner must—
(a) publish a report prepared under subsection (1) in such manner as the Commissioner considers appropriate; and

(b) provide a copy of the report to—

(i) the person (if any) who requested the investigation;

(ii) the Authority; and

(iii) any other person whom the Commissioner considers appropriate.

(3) Apart from identifying the Authority or the Police Service, a report must not—

(a) mention the name of any person; or

(b) contain any particulars which, in the Commissioner’s opinion, are likely to identify any person and can be omitted without impairing the effectiveness of the report, unless the Commissioner determines that it is necessary to do so (having taken into account the public interest).”.

69 Investigations: obstruction and contempt

After section 41E of the 2006 Act (inserted by section 68), insert—

“41F Investigations: obstruction and contempt

(1) The Court of Session may, on a petition by the Commissioner, inquire into whether a person—

(a) without lawful excuse, is obstructing or has obstructed the Commissioner in the carrying out of an investigation in pursuance of paragraph (c) or (d) of section 33A(1); or

(b) is doing or has done any act, or is failing or has failed to take any action, in relation to such an investigation which, if the investigation were a proceeding in the Court of Session, would constitute contempt of court.

(2) After so inquiring (and, in particular, after hearing any witness who may be produced against or on behalf of the person and any statement which may be offered in defence), the Court of Session may deal with the person as if the person had committed a contempt of court in relation to the Court of Session.”.

70 Complaints against the Commissioner

Before section 43 of the 2006 Act insert—

“42A Complaints against the Commissioner

(1) The Commissioner must maintain suitable arrangements for the handling of any complaint made to the Commissioner by or on behalf of a member of the public expressing dissatisfaction about an act or omission by the Commissioner or by any member of the Commissioner’s staff.

(2) Before making such arrangements, the Commissioner must seek the views of others as to what those arrangements should be.”.
CHAPTER 11
HER MAJESTY’S INSPECTORS OF CONSTABULARY IN SCOTLAND

71 Her Majesty’s inspectors of constabulary in Scotland

(1) There are to continue to be inspectors of constabulary in Scotland.

(2) Her Majesty may by Order in Council appoint such number of inspectors of constabulary as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may designate one of those inspectors as the chief inspector of constabulary.

(4) An inspector of constabulary is to hold and vacate office at Her Majesty’s pleasure.

(5) An inspector of constabulary is otherwise—

(a) to be paid such remuneration or allowances as the Scottish Ministers may determine, and

(b) to hold office in accordance with such other terms and conditions as may be so determined.

72 Assistant inspectors of constabulary

(1) The Scottish Ministers may—

(a) appoint assistant inspectors of constabulary on such terms and conditions as they may determine, or

(b) make arrangements for constables to serve as assistant inspectors of constabulary.

(2) A constable engaged on service as an assistant inspector of constabulary is under the direction and control of the inspectors of constabulary.

(3) The Scottish Ministers are liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of any constable engaged on service as an assistant inspector of constabulary in the carrying out (or purported carrying out) of that constable’s functions in the same manner as an employer is liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of an employee in the course of employment.

73 Staff officers

(1) The inspectors of constabulary may—

(a) appoint staff officers, on such terms and conditions as they may determine, for the purpose of assisting them in the carrying out of their functions, or

(b) make arrangements for constables to serve as staff officers for that purpose.

(2) A constable engaged on service as a staff officer is under the direction and control of the inspectors of constabulary.

(3) The inspectors of constabulary are liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of any constable engaged on service as a staff officer in the carrying out (or purported carrying out) of that constable’s functions in the same manner as an employer is liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of an employee in the course of employment.
74 Functions of inspectors

The Scottish Ministers may direct the inspectors of constabulary—

(a) to make inquiries about any matter relating to the Authority or the Police Service as they consider appropriate;

(b) to inspect annually (or at such other intervals as the Scottish Ministers think fit)—

(i) the state, efficiency and effectiveness of the Authority and the Police Service, and

(ii) the arrangements made by the Authority and the chief constable under section 38(1) and (2).

10 HMICS powers

(1) The inspectors of constabulary have power to do anything which they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in connection with, the carrying out of their functions.

(2) The inspectors of constabulary may authorise any assistant inspector of constabulary, or any of their staff officers, to carry out on behalf of the inspectors of constabulary such of their functions as they may determine to the extent so authorised.

(3) Subsection (2) does not affect the inspectors of constabulary’s—

(a) responsibility for carrying out delegated functions, or

(b) ability to carry out delegated functions.

20 Duty to assist and co-operate with HMICS

The Authority and the chief constable must provide the inspectors of constabulary with such assistance and co-operation as they may require for the purposes of, or in connection with, the carrying out of their functions (and must, in particular, comply with any reasonable request made by the inspectors of constabulary in that regard).

25 HMICS reports

(1) The inspectors of constabulary must give the Scottish Ministers—

(a) a report of any inquiry or inspection carried out in pursuance of section 74, and

(b) any other information relating to the inquiry or inspection that the Scottish Ministers may request.

(2) As soon as is reasonably practicable after giving the report to the Scottish Ministers, the inspectors of constabulary must—

(a) give a copy of the report to the Authority and, where the report relates to the Police Service, to the chief constable, and

(b) publish the report in such manner as they consider appropriate (having regard to the desirability of it being accessible to those whom the inspectors of constabulary consider likely to have an interest in it).

(3) The Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of a report given to them under this section.
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill
Part I—Police reform
Chapter 12—Co-operation, exchange of information etc.

(4) In carrying out their respective functions, the Authority and the chief constable must have regard to any reports given to them under this section and, having done so, must take such measures (if any) as they think fit in relation to the report.

78 Power to give directions after adverse HMICS report

(1) This subsection applies where a report given to the Scottish Ministers under section 77 states that the inspectors of constabulary are of the opinion—

(a) that the Authority or Police Service—

(i) is not efficient or effective, or

(ii) will, unless remedial measures are taken, cease to be efficient or effective, or

(b) that best value for the Authority or the Police Service—

(i) has not been secured in pursuance of subsection (1) or, as the case may be, (2) of section 38, or

(ii) will not, unless remedial measures are taken, be so secured.

(2) Where subsection (1) applies, the Scottish Ministers may direct the Authority to take such measures as may be specified in the direction.

(3) The Authority must comply with any direction given under this section.

79 HMICS annual report

(1) As soon as is practicable after the end of each yearly period ending on 31 March, the inspectors of constabulary must prepare an annual report on the carrying out of their functions during that period.

(2) The inspectors of constabulary must—

(a) give a copy of each of their annual reports to the Scottish Ministers, the Authority and the chief constable, and

(b) publish each of their annual reports in such manner as they consider appropriate (having regard to the desirability of it being accessible to those whom the inspectors of constabulary consider likely to have an interest in it).

(3) The Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of each annual report given to them under this section.

CHAPTER 12
CO-OPERATION, EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION ETC.

80 Co-operation between Scottish Police Authority and Police Service

(1) The Authority and the chief constable may make arrangements under which—

(a) the Authority is to provide assistance to the Police Service, or

(b) the Police Service is to provide assistance to the Authority.

(2) Such assistance may involve—

(a) members of the Authority’s staff providing services for the Police Service, or 81 Police information

(1) The Authority must provide the Scottish Ministers with such reports, statistics or other information relating to the Authority or the Police Service as they may reasonably require.

(2) Such information may, in particular, relate to—
   (a) the Authority or its functions,
   (b) the Police Service or police functions,
   (c) the state of crime.

(3) The chief constable must provide the Authority with such reports, statistics or other information relating to the Police Service, police functions or the state of crime as it may reasonably require.

(4) The chief constable may refer a requirement made under subsection (3) to the Scottish Ministers if the chief constable considers that complying with the requirement would or might prejudice—
   (a) the carrying out of any operation by the Police Service, or
   (b) the prosecution of offenders.

(5) A requirement referred under subsection (4) has effect only if it is confirmed by the Scottish Ministers.

(6) The chief constable must provide the Lord Justice General or a sheriff principal with such reports relating to policing as may be reasonably required.

(7) A requirement by the sheriff principal may relate only to the policing of places in which the sheriff principal has jurisdiction.

(8) The chief constable must seek to ensure that sufficient information about the state of crime is kept to enable the compliance with any requirement made under this section for the provision of information in that regard.

(9) The clerk of any court having criminal jurisdiction must comply with any requirement made by the chief constable to provide any information available to the clerk which the chief constable may require for the purposes of subsection (8).

(10) Nothing in this section requires anyone to provide any report, statistic or other information before the earliest time at which it is reasonable for that person to do so.

82 Scrutiny and investigations: co-operation and information sharing

(1) The inspectors of constabulary, the Auditor General and the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner must—
   (a) co-operate and co-ordinate activity with each other with a view to improving the carrying out of their respective functions in relation to the Authority and the Police Service, and
   (b) in particular, must together make arrangements with a view to—
(i) securing the exchange of information between them about the Authority and the Police Service, and

(ii) preventing any unnecessary duplication in relation to any inspections, investigations, inquiries or examinations carried out, or to be carried out, by them in relation to the Authority or the Police Service.

(2) The duty in subsection (1) does not apply in so far as compliance with it would prevent or delay any of the persons to whom it applies in taking any action which the person considers to be necessary as a matter of urgency.

(3) In complying with the duty in subsection (1), the inspectors of constabulary and the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner must—

(a) comply with any direction (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers, and

(b) have regard to any guidance given by the Scottish Ministers.

(4) A direction or guidance may relate to all the functions of the inspectors of constabulary and the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner or to such of those functions (or to such functions of any or all of them) as are specified in the direction or guidance.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may vary or revoke any direction or guidance.

(6) No obligation as to secrecy or other restriction on disclosure of information prevents the inspectors of constabulary, the Auditor General or the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner from disclosing information to each other—

(a) for any purpose connected with the carrying out of their respective functions, or

(b) for the purpose of enabling or assisting each other to carry out any of their respective functions.

CHAPTER 13

PROVISION OF GOODS AND SERVICES

83 Provision of police services

(1) The Authority may authorise the chief constable to make arrangements, at the request of any person, to provide and charge for police services.

(2) An authorisation under subsection (1) may be of a general or specific nature and may, in particular, set out a scale by reference to which charges for police services are to be made.

(3) Any such charges may include amounts calculated by reference to expenditure which is incurred, or expected to be incurred, otherwise than directly in connection with the provision of the police services concerned.

(4) The Authority, when making such an authorisation, must comply with any code about charging for police services issued by the Scottish Ministers.

(5) Any such code—

(a) may be of a general or specific nature,

(b) may be varied or revoked at any time.
(6) The chief constable must ensure that all sums received by way of charges for police services are paid to the Authority.

(7) Nothing in this section permits the making of any charge for police services which exceeds the cost of providing those services.

(8) Except in so far as authorised or required by any other enactment or rule of law, the chief constable may not make charges in respect of the carrying out of police functions otherwise than in accordance with an authorisation under subsection (1).

(9) In this Part, “police services” means services in connection with the maintenance of order, or the protection of persons or property from harm, which are provided on or in relation to land owned or occupied by the person who requests those services.

84 Provision of other goods and services

(1) The Authority may—

(a) provide goods and services to any other public body or office-holder,

(b) provide goods and services of such type as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify to such other persons as may be so specified.

(2) Goods and services may be provided in pursuance of subsection (1) for such purposes as the Authority considers to be appropriate and consistent with the proper carrying out of its functions.

(3) The Authority may, with the consent of the chief constable, make arrangements for the Police Service—

(a) to provide goods and services (other than police services) to any other public body or office-holder,

(b) to provide goods and services (other than police services) of such type as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify to such other persons as may be so specified.

(4) Goods and services may be provided in pursuance of subsection (3) for such purposes as the Authority considers to be appropriate and consistent with the proper carrying out of police functions.

(5) The Authority may make charges in respect of any goods or services provided by it, or by the Police Service, in pursuance of subsection (1) or (3).

(6) Any such charges may include amounts calculated by reference to expenditure which is incurred, or expected to be incurred, otherwise than directly in connection with the provision of the goods or services concerned.

(7) Nothing in this section permits the Authority—

(a) to make any charge for forensic services it provides to the Lord Advocate or procurators fiscal, or

(b) to make any charge for goods or services which exceeds the cost of providing the goods or services.

(8) Goods and services which may be provided in pursuance of subsection (1) or (3) (or which may be specified in an order made under those subsections) include—
(a) information technology systems and equipment (and services involving the development, provision, procurement, maintenance, management, support or oversight of such systems or equipment),

(b) services involving the inspection, testing, maintenance or repair of vehicles,

(c) any other type of corporate or support service which is provided by the Authority or the Police Service in connection with the carrying out of the Authority’s functions or, as the case may be, police functions.

CHAPTER 14

GRANTS

85 Police grants

(1) The Scottish Ministers may make grants to the Authority of such amounts as they determine.

(2) A grant is made subject to any conditions specified by the Scottish Ministers (including conditions about repayment).

86 Grants to other persons

(1) The Scottish Ministers may make grants of such amounts as they determine, or provide such other financial assistance as they think appropriate, to such persons as they think fit for the purposes of providing services to, or otherwise assisting or supporting, the Authority or the Police Service in the carrying out of the Authority’s functions or, as the case may be, police functions.

(2) Grants may be made or financial assistance provided under this section only where the Scottish Ministers consider it is necessary or expedient to do so for promoting the efficiency or effectiveness of, or securing best value for, the Authority or the Police Service.

(3) A grant is made subject to any conditions specified by the Scottish Ministers (including conditions about repayment).

(4) Any financial assistance provided is subject to any conditions specified by the Scottish Ministers.

CHAPTER 15

OFFENCES

87 Assaulting or impeding police

(1) It is an offence for a person to assault, resist, obstruct or hinder—

(a) a person (“A”) acting in a capacity mentioned in subsection (2), or

(b) a person assisting A while A is acting in such capacity.

(2) The capacities are—

(a) that of a constable,

(b) that of a member of police staff.
(c) that of a member of a relevant police force when such member is executing a warrant or is otherwise acting in Scotland by virtue of any enactment conferring powers on the member in Scotland,

(d) that of a person who—

(i) is a member of an international joint investigation team that is led by a person acting in a capacity mentioned in paragraph (a) or (c), and

(ii) is carrying out functions as a member of that team.

(3) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or to both.

(4) In this section and section 88, a reference to a member of a relevant police force is a reference to a member of—

(a) a police force maintained under section 2 of the Police Act 1996 (c.16),

(b) the metropolitan police force,

(c) the City of London police force, or

(d) the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

88 Escape from custody

(1) It is an offence for a person—

(a) to remove a person from custody, or

(b) to assist the escape of a person in custody.

(2) The reference in subsection (1) to a person in custody is to be construed as a reference to a person—

(a) who is in the lawful custody of a person (“A”) acting in a capacity mentioned in subsection (3) or a person assisting A while A is acting in such capacity, or

(b) who is in the act of eluding or escaping from such custody, whether or not the person has actually been arrested.

(3) The capacities are—

(a) that of a constable,

(b) that of a police custody and security officer,

(c) that of a member of a relevant police force when such member is executing a warrant or is otherwise acting in Scotland by virtue of any enactment conferring powers on the member in Scotland,

(d) that of a person who—

(i) is a member of an international joint investigation team that is led by a person acting in a capacity mentioned in paragraph (a) or (c), and

(ii) is carrying out functions as a member of that team.

(4) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or to both.
Impersonation etc.

(1) It is an offence for a person (not being a constable)—
(a) to impersonate a constable with an intent to deceive, or
(b) to do anything calculated to suggest that the person is a constable.

(2) It is an offence for a person (other than a constable) to possess any article of police uniform without the permission of the Authority.

(3) It is a defence for a person charged under subsection (2) to prove that the article—
(a) was obtained lawfully, and
(b) is in the person’s possession for a lawful purpose.

(4) It is an offence for a person (other than a constable) to wear, without the prior permission of the Authority, any article of police uniform in circumstances where it gives an appearance so nearly resembling that of a constable as to be calculated to deceive.

(5) A person who is guilty of an offence under this section is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 3 months or a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.

(6) In this section an “article of police uniform” means—
(a) any article of uniform or any distinctive badge or mark usually issued to constables, or
(b) any article having the appearance of such article, badge or mark.

CHAPTER 16
INDEPENDENT CUSTODY VISITING

Purpose of custody visiting

The provisions in this Chapter are in pursuance of the objective of OPCAT, that is, the objective of establishing a system of regular visits undertaken by independent international and national bodies to places where people are deprived of their liberty in order to prevent torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Independent custody visiting

(1) The Authority must make arrangements to ensure that independent custody visitors may—
(a) visit detainees,
(b) access information relevant to the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained, and
(c) monitor the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained.

(2) The arrangements must—
(a) provide for the appointment as independent custody visitors of suitable persons who are independent of both the Authority and the Police Service,
(b) authorise independent custody visitors to do anything which the Authority considers necessary to enable them to visit detainees and monitor the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained, and

(c) provide for reporting on each visit.

(3) The arrangements may, in particular, authorise independent custody visitors to—

(a) access, without prior notice, any place in which a detainee is held,

(b) examine records relating to the detention of persons there,

(c) meet any detainees there (in private) to discuss their treatment while detained and the conditions in which they are detained,

(d) inspect the conditions in which persons are detained there (including cell accommodation, washing and toilet facilities and facilities for the provision of food), and

(e) meet such other persons that the visitors think may have information relevant to the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained.

(4) The arrangements may allow access to a detainee to be refused only where—

(a) the Scottish Ministers have determined grounds on which access to detainees (or to a category of detainee) can be so refused,

(b) it appears to a constable of the rank of inspector (or above) that such a ground is satisfied in relation to the detainee, and

(c) any other procedural requirements the Authority considers necessary have been met.

(5) The Authority must—

(a) keep the arrangements under review and revise them as it thinks fit,

(b) prepare and publish such reports on independent custody visiting as the Scottish Ministers may reasonably require.

(6) The Authority and members of its staff, the Police Service and police staff and independent custody visitors must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about independent custody visiting.

(7) Before issuing guidance, or making a determination for the purposes of subsection (4)(a), the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) the Authority,

(b) the chief constable,

(c) independent custody visitors or such persons as appear to them to be representative of independent custody visitors, and

(d) such other persons as they consider appropriate.

(8) The Scottish Ministers must lay a copy of guidance issued or any determination made before the Scottish Parliament.

92 SPT visits

(1) The Authority must make arrangements to ensure that members of the SPT may—
(a) visit detainees,
(b) access information relevant to the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained, and
(c) monitor the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained.

(2) The arrangements must authorise members of the SPT to do anything which the Authority considers necessary to enable them to visit detainees and monitor the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained.

(3) The arrangements may, in particular, authorise members of the SPT to—
(a) access, without prior notice, any place in which a detainee is held (accompanied by such experts as the SPT members think fit),
(b) examine records relating to the detention of persons there,
(c) meet any detainees there (in private) to discuss their treatment while detained and the conditions in which they are detained,
(d) inspect the conditions in which persons are detained there (including cell accommodation, washing and toilet facilities and facilities for the provision of food), and
(e) meet such other persons as the SPT members think may have information relevant to the treatment of detainees and the conditions in which they are detained.

(4) The arrangements may allow access to a detainee to be refused only—
(a) where there are urgent and compelling grounds of public safety, natural disaster or serious disorder in the place to be visited that temporarily prevent the carrying out of such a visit, and
(b) the Scottish Ministers have notified the Authority that such grounds exist and that access should accordingly be refused.

(5) The Authority must keep the arrangements under review and revise them as it thinks fit.

(6) The Authority and members of its staff and the Police Service and police staff must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about SPT visits.

93 Interpretation of Chapter 16

(1) For the purposes of this Chapter, a reference to a detainee is a reference to a person in the lawful custody of a person (“A”) acting in a capacity mentioned in subsection (2) or a person assisting A while A is acting in such a capacity.

(2) The capacities are—
(a) that of a constable,
(b) that of a police custody and security officer,
(c) that of a member of a relevant police force when such member is executing a warrant or is otherwise acting in Scotland by virtue of any enactment conferring powers on the member in Scotland,
(d) that of a person who—
   (i) is a member of an international joint investigation team that is led by a person acting in a capacity mentioned in paragraph (a) or (c), and
(ii) is carrying out functions as a member of that team.

(3) For the purpose of subsection (2) a reference to a member of a relevant police force is a reference to a member of—

(a) a police force maintained under section 2 of the Police Act 1996 (c.16),
(b) the metropolitan police force,
(c) the City of London police force, or
(d) the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

(4) In this Chapter—

“SPT” means the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment established under Article 2 of OPCAT, and “OPCAT” means the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment adopted on 18 December 2002 at the fifty-seventh session of the General Assembly of the United Nations by resolution A/RES/57/199.

CHAPTER 17
MISCELLANEOUS AND GENERAL

94 Dissolution of the Police Advisory Board for Scotland

(1) The Police Advisory Board for Scotland is dissolved.

(2) In section 63 of the Police Act 1996 (c.16) (Police Advisory Boards for England and Wales and for Scotland)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) repeal “and a Police Advisory Board for Scotland”, and

(ii) repeal “in those countries respectively”,

(b) repeal subsection (1ZA), and

(c) in subsection (2), for “each of the Police Advisory Boards” substitute “the Police Advisory Board for England and Wales”.

95 Transfer of constables, staff, property etc.

Schedule 4 contains provision about the transfer of constables, inspectors of constabulary, police cadets, staff, property, rights, liabilities and obligations.

96 Key police definitions

(1) In this Part—

“constable” means an individual holding the office of constable of the Police Service (including the chief constable, other senior officers and any special constable),

“chief constable” means the constable appointed to the office of chief constable under section 7(1)(a),
“inspectors of constabulary” means Her Majesty’s inspectors of constabulary appointed under section 71, “local commander” means a constable designated under section 45(2),
“police custody and security officer” means an individual certified under section 28(1), “Police Service of Scotland” is the constabulary maintained by the Scottish Police Authority, and “Scottish Police Authority” means the body established under section 1.

(2) Except where the context otherwise requires, a reference in any enactment to the chief officer of a police force includes a reference to the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland.

97 Meaning of other words and expressions used in Part 1

(1) In this Part, unless the context otherwise requires—
“the 2006 Act” means the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 (asp 10),
“annual police plan” has the meaning given by section 35, “appropriate prosecutor” means the Lord Advocate or procurator fiscal,
“assistant chief constable” means a constable appointed to the office of assistant chief constable under section 7,
“Auditor General” means the Auditor General for Scotland, “Authority” means the Scottish Police Authority,
“deputy chief constable” means a constable appointed to the office of deputy chief constable under section 7, “international joint investigation team” means any investigation team formed in accordance with—
(a) Council Framework Decision 2002/465/JHA of 13 June 2002 on joint investigation teams,
(b) the Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Member States of the European Union, and the Protocol to that Convention, established in accordance with Article 34 of the Treaty on European Union,
(c) the Convention implementing the Schengen Agreement of 14 June 1985,
(d) the Second Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters, or
(e) any international agreement to which the United Kingdom is a party and which is specified for the purposes of (as the case may be) section 24, 87, 88 or 93 in an order made by the Scottish Ministers.
“local police plan” has the meaning given by section 48,
“member of the Authority’s staff” means an individual appointed under paragraph 7(1) of schedule 1,
“police appeals tribunal” means a tribunal constituted in accordance with schedule 3,
“police cadet” means an individual appointed under section 25; “police functions” means the functions of constables (including the chief constable’s functions and any functions of a deputy chief constable, an assistant chief constable or a local commander), “policing” means the carrying out of police functions (and references to the policing of Scotland are references to the carrying out of police functions in or as regards Scotland),
“the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner” means the Commissioner established by section 33 of the 2006 Act and renamed by section 62, “Police Service” means the Police Service of Scotland, “police services” has the meaning given by section 83(9), “police staff” means staff appointed under section 26(1) (and “member of the police staff” is to be construed accordingly), “senior officer” means a constable who holds the office of chief constable, deputy chief constable or assistant chief constable, “strategic police priorities” has the meaning given by section 33,
“strategic police plan” has the meaning given by section 34, “terms and conditions” includes terms and conditions about payment of remuneration or allowances or about reimbursement of expenses.

(2) In this Part, references to securing best value are to be construed in accordance with section 38.

98  Crown application

(1) No contravention by the Crown of any provision made by or under this Part makes the Crown criminally liable.

(2) But the Court of Session may, on the application of the Scottish Ministers or any public body or office-holder having responsibility for enforcing that provision, declare unlawful any act or omission of the Crown which constitutes such a contravention.

(3) Despite subsection (1), any provision made by or under this Part applies to persons in the public service of the Crown as it applies to other persons.

(4) The power conferred by section 4(2)(d) does not apply in relation to Crown land.

(5) In this section, “Crown land” means land held or used by or on behalf of the Crown (and includes an interest belonging to Her Majesty in right of Her private estates).

FIRE REFORM

The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

(1) After section 1 of the 2005 Act, insert—

“1A The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

(1) There is established a body corporate to be known as the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (referred to in this Act as “SFRS”).

(2) SFRS has the functions conferred on it by or under this Act or any other enactment.

(3) Schedule 1A makes further provision about SFRS.”.

(2) After schedule 1 to the 2005 Act, insert—

(introduced by section 1A(3))

THE SCOTTISH FIRE AND RESCUE SERVICE

Status

1 (1) SFRS—

(a) is not a servant or agent of the Crown, and

(b) has no status, immunity or privilege of the Crown.

(2) SFRS’s property is not property of, or property held on behalf of, the Crown.

Membership

2 (1) SFRS is to consist of not fewer than 7 nor more than 11 members.

(2) The members are to be appointed by the Scottish Ministers.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may appoint as members only persons who they consider to have skills and expertise relevant to the functions of SFRS.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify sub-paragraph (1) by substituting for the minimum or maximum number of members for the time being specified such other number as they think fit.

Disqualification

3 A person is disqualified from appointment, and from holding office, as a member of SFRS if that person is or becomes—

(a) a member of staff of SFRS,

(b) a member of—

(i) the Scottish Parliament,

(ii) the House of Lords,

(iii) the House of Commons, or
(iv) the European Parliament,

(c) disqualified from standing for election as a member of—
   (i) the Scottish Parliament,
   (ii) the House of Commons, or
   (iii) a local authority,

(d) a person of such other description as may be prescribed by order made by the Scottish Ministers.

Tenure

4 (1) A member is to be appointed for a period not exceeding 4 years specified in the appointment.

(2) A member holds and vacates office on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

(3) On ceasing to be a member, a person is eligible for reappointment.

(4) A member may, by notice in writing to the Scottish Ministers, resign office as a member.

5 (1) The Scottish Ministers must appoint one of the members of SFRS to chair meetings of SFRS (“the chairing member”).

(2) The chairing member is to be appointed for a period not exceeding 4 years specified in the appointment.

(3) If a person is appointed as the chairing member for a period that extends beyond the period of the person’s appointment as a member, the person’s appointment as a member is taken to have been extended so that it ends on the same day as the period of appointment as chairing member ends.

(4) Members of SFRS must elect from their number a member to act as deputy to the chairing member.

Removal from office

6 (1) The Scottish Ministers may remove a member from office if—

   (a) the member is an undischarged bankrupt,

   (b) the member is incapacitated by physical or mental illness,

   (c) the member has, without reasonable excuse, been absent from meetings of SFRS for a period longer than 4 consecutive months,

   (d) the member has, without reasonable excuse, been absent from 3 consecutive meetings of SFRS,

   (e) the member has been convicted (whether before or after the member’s appointment) of a criminal offence,

   (f) the member has failed to comply with the terms or conditions of the member’s appointment,
(g) the Scottish Ministers consider that the member is otherwise unfit to be a member or is unable for any reason to carry out the member’s functions.

(2) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1)(a), “undischarged bankrupt” means a person—

(a) whose estate has been sequestrated and who has not been discharged (or against whom a bankruptcy order has been made and is still in force),

(b) who has granted a trust deed for, or made a composition or arrangement with, creditors (and has not been discharged in respect of it),

(c) who is the subject of a bankruptcy restrictions order, or an interim bankruptcy restrictions order, made under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985 (c.66) or the Insolvency Act 1986 (c.45),

(d) who is the subject of a bankruptcy restrictions undertaking entered into under either of those Acts,

(e) who has been adjudged bankrupt (and has not been discharged), or

(f) who is subject to any other kind of order, arrangement or undertaking analogous to those mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d), anywhere in the world.

Remuneration, allowances and expenses of members

7 SFRS may pay to its members such remuneration, allowances and expenses as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

The Chief Officer

8 (1) SFRS must employ a Chief Officer.

(2) The Chief Officer may not be a member of SFRS.

(3) The first Chief Officer is to be appointed by the Scottish Ministers on such terms and conditions as they may determine.

(4) Each subsequent appointment of a person as the Chief Officer is to be made by SFRS.

(5) The appointment of a person under sub-paragraph (4) is subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers.

(6) The terms and conditions of a person appointed under sub-paragraph (4) are to be determined by SFRS.

SFRS’s employees

9 (1) SFRS may employ staff.

(2) Staff are to be employed on terms and conditions determined by SFRS.

(3) SFRS may pay or make arrangements for the payment of pensions, allowances or gratuities to, or in respect of, any person who is, or has ceased to be, a member of staff (including the Chief Officer).
(4) The reference in sub-paragraph (3) to pensions, allowances and gratuities includes pensions, allowances and gratuities by way of compensation for loss of employment.

(5) The arrangements mentioned in sub-paragraph (3) may include—

(a) the making of contributions or payments towards provision for pensions, allowances or gratuities mentioned there, and

(b) the establishment and administration of pension schemes.

Committees and sub-committees

10 (1) SFRS may establish committees for any purpose.

(2) Any committee so established may establish sub-committees.

(3) The members of any committee or sub-committee may include persons who are not members of SFRS but such persons are not entitled to vote at meetings.

(4) A committee or sub-committee must not consist entirely of persons who are not members of SFRS.

(5) SFRS may pay such remuneration, allowances and expenses as are determined by SFRS to a member of a committee or sub-committee who is not—

(a) a member of SFRS, or

(b) a member of staff of SFRS.

Procedure

11 (1) SFRS may regulate—

(a) its own procedure (including quorum), and

(b) the procedure (including quorum) of its committees and sub-committees.

(2) The validity of any proceedings or acts of SFRS is not affected by any—

(a) vacancy in its membership,

(b) defect in the appointment of a member,

(c) disqualification of a person as a member after appointment.

SFRS’s general powers

12 (1) SFRS may do anything that it considers appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, the carrying out of its functions.

(2) SFRS may in particular—

(a) enter into contracts,

(b) borrow money,

(c) acquire and dispose of land and other property,

(d) with the authorisation of the Scottish Ministers, purchase compulsorily land,

(e) form or promote (whether alone or with another) companies under the Companies Act 2006 (c.46).
(3) SFRS may not exercise the power in sub-paragraph (2)(b) without the consent of the Scottish Ministers.

(4) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (3) consent may be given—
   (a) with respect to a particular case or class of case,
   (b) subject to such conditions as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

(5) The power in sub-paragraph (2)(c) includes the power to accept, on such conditions as SFRS considers appropriate—
   (a) gifts of money, and
   (b) gifts or loans of other property.

(6) The powers in sub-paragraph (2)(c) and (d) to acquire and purchase land include power to acquire a servitude or other right in or over land by the creation of a new right.

(7) The Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) (Scotland) Act 1947 (c.42) applies in relation to the compulsory purchase of land under sub-paragraph (2)(d) as if—
   (a) that sub-paragraph were contained in an Act in force immediately before the commencement of that Act, and
   (b) SFRS were a local authority.

Delegation of functions

13 (1) SFRS may delegate any of its functions to a person mentioned in sub-paragraph (2).

(2) Those persons are—
   (a) the Chief Officer,
   (b) any other member of staff of SFRS,
   (c) any of its committees.

(3) Sub-paragraph (1) does not affect—
   (a) SFRS’s responsibility for the carrying out of the delegated functions, or
   (b) SFRS’s ability to carry out the delegated functions.

Location of principal office premises

14 Any determination by SFRS as to the location of the principal office premises of its members or its Chief Officer is subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers.

Grants

15 (1) The Scottish Ministers may make grants to SFRS of such amounts as they may determine.

(2) A grant is made subject to any conditions specified by the Scottish Ministers (including conditions about repayment).
Accounts

16 (1) SFRS must—
   (a) keep proper accounts and accounting records, and
   (b) prepare for each financial year a statement of accounts.

(2) Each statement of accounts must comply with any directions given by the Scottish Ministers as to—
   (a) the information to be contained in it,
   (b) the manner in which the information is to be presented,
   (c) the methods and principles according to which the statement is to be prepared.

(3) SFRS must send each statement of accounts to the Scottish Ministers by such time as they may direct.

(4) SFRS must send each statement of accounts to the Auditor General for Scotland for auditing.

(5) The Scottish Ministers must lay a copy of each statement of accounts before the Scottish Parliament.

(6) In this paragraph, “financial year” means—
   (a) the period beginning on the day on which SFRS is established and ending—
      (i) on 31 March next occurring, or
      (ii) if that period is of less than 6 months’ duration, on 31 March next occurring after that, and
   (b) each subsequent period of a year ending on 31 March.”.

Functions

100 Promotion of fire safety

In section 8 of the 2005 Act (fire safety)—
   (a) in subsection (1), for “Each relevant authority shall” substitute “SFRS must”, and

(ii) for “the authority’s” substitute “its”, and
(iii) for “the authority” substitute “SFRS”.

Further amendments of 2005 Act

109 Assistance

In section 35 of the 2005 Act (the title of which becomes “Assistance”)—

(a) for subsections (1) and (2), substitute—

“(1) SFRS may enter into arrangements with a person for securing the provision by that person of assistance for SFRS in the carrying out by SFRS of a relevant function.

(2) A person may provide assistance under arrangements made under subsection (1) only if the Chief Officer is satisfied that the person has sufficient knowledge, skills and experience to enable the person to provide assistance for SFRS in the carrying out by SFRS of the relevant function.”, and

(b) after subsection (3), add—

“(4) In this section, “relevant function” means a function conferred by or under any of sections 8 to 11, 13 and 61.”.
110 Delegation

In section 36 of the 2005 Act (power to make arrangements for delegating functions)—

(a) for subsections (1) and (2), substitute—

“(1) SFRS may enter into arrangements with a person for the carrying out by that person of a relevant function.

(2) A person may carry out a relevant function under arrangements made under subsection (1) only if the Chief Officer is satisfied that the person has sufficient knowledge, skills and experience to enable the person to carry out the relevant function.

(2A) SFRS may enter into arrangements under this section in relation to its function of extinguishing fires only if the person employs fire-fighters.”;

(b) after subsection (3), add—

“(4) In this section, “relevant function” means a function conferred by or under any of sections 8 to 11, 13 and 61.”.

111 Best value

Before section 40 of the 2005 Act (and the italic cross-heading immediately preceding it), insert—

39A Best value

(1) It is the duty of SFRS to make arrangements which secure best value.

(2) Best value is continuous improvement in the carrying out of SFRS’s functions.

(3) In securing best value, SFRS must maintain an appropriate balance among—

(a) the quality of its carrying out of its functions,

(b) the cost to SFRS of that carrying out of its functions,

(c) the cost to persons of any service provided by SFRS for them on a wholly or partly rechargeable basis.

(4) In maintaining that balance, SFRS must have regard to—

(a) efficiency,

(b) effectiveness,

(c) economy, and

(d) the need to meet the equal opportunity requirements.

(5) SFRS must carry out its duties under this section in a way which contributes to the achievement of sustainable development.

(6) In measuring the improvement of the carrying out of SFRS’s functions for the purposes of this section, regard is to be had to the extent to which the outcomes of the carrying out of the functions have improved.

(7) In this section, “equal opportunity requirements” has the same meaning as in Section L2 of Part 2 of Schedule 5 to the Scotland Act 1998 (c.46).
39B Best value: further provision

In carrying out its duties under section 39A, SFRS must have regard to the matters mentioned in subsection (2).

(2) The matters are—

(a) any relevant guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers,

(b) what are, whether by reference to any generally recognised published code or otherwise, regarded as proper arrangements for the purposes of section 39A(1) (or purposes which include those purposes).

(3) Before issuing relevant guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) SFRS, and

(b) such other persons as they think appropriate.

(4) In the event of a conflict in any respect between the matter to which SFRS is to have regard under paragraph (a) of subsection (2) and the matter to which it is to have regard under paragraph (b) of that subsection, SFRS must in that respect have regard only to matters within paragraph (a).

(5) In this section “relevant guidance”—

(a) means guidance on the carrying out of the duties imposed by section 39A,

(b) includes in particular guidance on—

(i) how to make and what is to be included in the arrangements mentioned in section 39A(1),

(ii) how to implement the duty imposed by that section.

39C Examinations of SFRS by Auditor General

The reference in section 23 of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 (asp 1) to examinations into the economy, efficiency and effectiveness with which resources have been used is, in relation to SFRS, to include a reference to examinations into the arrangements made by SFRS under section 39A.”.

112 Strategic plan

After section 41 of the 2005 Act, insert—

“CHAPTER 8A
PLANNING, REPORTS AND INFORMATION

Strategic plan

41A SFRS’s first strategic plan

(1) SFRS must prepare a strategic plan.

(2) A strategic plan is a plan—

(a) setting out how SFRS proposes to carry out its functions during the period of 3 years beginning with the day appointed by order under subsection (6),
(b) setting out outcomes by reference to which the carrying out of its functions may be measured, and
(c) including such other material relating to its functions or to a period other than the period mentioned in paragraph (a) as SFRS thinks fit.

(3) In preparing the strategic plan, SFRS must—
(a) have regard to the framework document, and
(b) consult the persons mentioned in subsection (4).

(4) Those persons are—
(a) each local authority,
(b) such persons as SFRS considers represent local authorities,
(c) such persons as SFRS considers represent employees of SFRS,
(d) such other persons as SFRS considers appropriate.

(5) SFRS must submit the strategic plan prepared under subsection (1) to the Scottish Ministers for approval.

(6) SFRS must use its best endeavours to secure the approval of the Scottish Ministers to the strategic plan (with or without modifications) before such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(7) If the Scottish Ministers approve the strategic plan, SFRS must—
(a) publish the plan, and
(b) lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of the plan.

41B Review of plan

(1) This section applies where—
(a) a strategic plan is approved under section 41A, or
(b) a new strategic plan is approved under subsection (4) or (6).

(2) SFRS may at any time review the plan.

(3) SFRS must review the plan—
(a) if the Scottish Ministers make an order under section 40(4), and
(b) before the end of the period of 3 years to which the plan relates.

(4) Following a review under subsection (2) or (3)(a), SFRS may prepare and submit to the Scottish Ministers for approval a new strategic plan.

(5) If, following a review under subsection (3)(a), SFRS decides not to prepare a new strategic plan, it must notify the Scottish Ministers of that fact.

(6) Following a review under subsection (3)(b), SFRS must, before the end of the period of 3 years mentioned in that subsection, prepare and submit to the Scottish Ministers for approval a new strategic plan.

(7) A new strategic plan is a plan—
(a) setting out how SFRS proposes to carry out its functions during the period of 3 years beginning with the plan commencement day,
(b) setting out outcomes by reference to which the carrying out of its functions may be measured, and
(c) including such other material relating to its functions or to a period other than the period mentioned in paragraph (a) as SFRS thinks fit.

(8) In preparing a new strategic plan, SFRS must—
(a) have regard to the framework document, and
(b) consult the persons mentioned in section 41A(4).

(9) SFRS must use its best endeavours to secure the approval of the Scottish Ministers to a new strategic plan (with or without modifications) before the plan commencement day for that plan.

(10) If the Scottish Ministers approve a new strategic plan, SFRS must—
(a) publish the plan, and
(b) lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of the plan.

(11) In this section, “plan commencement day” means—
(a) in the case of a strategic plan prepared under subsection (4), the day 8 weeks after the day on which SFRS submits a new strategic plan to the Scottish Ministers (or such earlier day as SFRS and the Scottish Ministers may agree),
(b) in the case of a strategic plan prepared under subsection (6), the day after the end of the period of 3 years to which the previous strategic plan relates.

41C Consideration

(1) This section applies where a strategic plan or a new strategic plan has been approved by the Scottish Ministers under section 41A or, as the case may be, section 41B.

(2) In carrying out its functions, SFRS must have regard to the strategic plan in so far as that plan is not inconsistent with the framework document."

113 Local fire and rescue plans

After section 41C of the 2005 Act (inserted by section 112), insert—

“Local fire and rescue plans

41D Provision of local services

(1) SFRS must ensure that there are adequate arrangements in place for the carrying out of its functions in each local authority area.

(2) SFRS must involve each local authority in determining priorities and objectives for SFRS in connection with the carrying out in the local authority’s area of SFRS’s functions.
Local fire and rescue plans

1. As soon as is reasonably practicable after a strategic plan is approved under section 41A, SFRS must prepare a local fire and rescue plan for each local authority area.

2. A local fire and rescue plan is a plan setting out—
   a. priorities and objectives for SFRS in connection with the carrying out in the local authority’s area of SFRS’s functions,
   b. the reasons for selecting each of those priorities and objectives,
   c. how SFRS proposes to deliver those priorities and objectives,
   d. in so far as is reasonably practicable, outcomes by reference to which delivery of those priorities and objectives can be measured,
   e. how those priorities and objectives are expected to contribute to the delivery of any other relevant local outcomes which are identified by community planning,
   f. such other matters relating to the carrying out of SFRS’s functions in the local authority’s area as SFRS thinks fit.

3. In preparing the local fire and rescue plan, SFRS must—
   a. have regard to the framework document and the strategic plan approved under section 41A,
   b. consult such persons as SFRS thinks fit.

4. SFRS must submit a plan prepared under subsection (1) for approval to the local authority for the area to which the plan relates.

5. If the plan is approved under subsection (4), SFRS must publish it.

6. In this section “community planning” means the community planning processes described in Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 (asp 1).

Power to review plan

1. This section applies where a local fire and rescue plan is published under section 41E(5), subsection (4) or section 41G(5).

2. SFRS may at any time review the plan.

3. Following a review, SFRS may revise the plan.

4. Subsections (3) to (5) of section 41E apply in relation to a plan revised under subsection (3) as they apply in relation to a plan prepared under subsection (1) of that section but subject to the modification in subsection (5).

5. The modification is that the reference in section 41E(3)(a) to a plan approved under section 41A is to be read as if it were a reference to a plan approved under section 41A or, as the case may be, a new plan approved under section 41B.
41G Mandatory review

(1) This section applies where a local fire and rescue plan is published under section 41E(5), section 41F(4) or subsection (5).

(2) SFRS must review the local fire and rescue plan if—

(a) the Scottish Ministers make an order under section 40(4),

(b) a new strategic plan is approved under section 41B, or

(c) the plan is not revised under section 41F(3) or subsection (3) during the period of 3 years beginning with the publication of the plan.

(3) Following a review under subsection (2)(a) or (b), SFRS may revise the plan.

(4) Following a review under subsection (2)(c), SFRS must revise the plan.

(5) Subsections (3) to (5) of section 41E apply in relation to a plan revised under subsection (3) or (4) as they apply in relation to a plan prepared under subsection (1) of that section (but subject to the modification in subsection (6)).

(6) The modification is that the reference in section 41E(3)(a) to a plan approved under section 41A is to be read as if it were a reference to a plan approved under section 41A or, as the case may be, a new plan approved under section 41B.

41H Provision of information to local authority

SFRS must give to a local authority such information or reports relating to the carrying out of SFRS’s functions in the authority’s area as the authority may reasonably request.

41J Local Senior Officers

(1) SFRS must designate an employee of SFRS as Local Senior Officer for each local authority area for the purpose of carrying out on behalf of SFRS the delegated functions.

(2) The delegated functions are—

(a) SFRS’s functions under sections 41E to 41H,

(b) SFRS’s functions under section 16(1)(d) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 (asp 1) (duty to participate in community planning),

(c) any other functions of SFRS which SFRS delegates to the Local Senior Officer.

(3) The duty imposed on SFRS by subsection (1) must be carried out by the Chief Officer in relation to the delegated functions mentioned in subsection (2)(a) and (b).

(4) A person may be designated under subsection (1) in relation to more than one local authority area.

(5) Subsection (1) does not affect—

(a) SFRS’s responsibility for the carrying out of the delegated functions,

(b) SFRS’s ability to carry out the delegated functions.
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill
Part 2—Fire reform

41K Monitoring by local authority

(1) A local authority may keep under review—
   (a) the manner in which SFRS carries out its functions in the authority’s area,
   (b) whether SFRS is carrying out the priorities and objectives set out in the local fire and rescue plan for the authority’s area,
   (c) whether SFRS is otherwise complying with the local fire and rescue plan for the authority’s area.

(2) A local authority may—
   (a) make representations or observations to SFRS in relation to anything arising under subsection (1),
   (b) offer advice or recommendations to SFRS in relation to anything arising under that subsection.”.

114 Annual report

After section 41K of the 2005 Act (inserted by section 113), insert—

“41L Annual report

(1) As soon as is reasonably practicable after the end of each reporting year, SFRS must—
   (a) prepare and publish an annual report, and
   (b) lay a copy of the report before the Scottish Parliament.

(2) An annual report is a report setting out—
   (a) an assessment of SFRS’s performance during the reporting year in acting in accordance with the framework document,
   (b) an assessment of SFRS’s performance during the reporting year in achieving the outcomes set out in the strategic plan approved under section 41A or, as the case may be, 41B, and
   (c) such other information as SFRS thinks fit.

(3) In this section, “reporting year” means—
   (a) the period beginning on the day on which SFRS is established and ending—
      (i) on 31 March next occurring, or
      (ii) if that period is of less than 6 months’ duration, on 31 March next occurring after that, and
   (b) each subsequent period of a year ending on 31 March.”.

115 Provision of information

After section 41L of the 2005 Act (inserted by section 114), insert—
“41M Provision of information

(1) SFRS must provide the Scottish Ministers with such reports, statistics and other information relating to SFRS or its functions as the Scottish Ministers may require.

(2) Information provided under this section may in particular relate to the outcomes of fires, events and other situations in relation to which SFRS makes provision or takes action.

(3) Information to be provided under this section must be provided at the times, and in the form, specified by the Scottish Ministers.”.

116 Directions by Scottish Ministers

After section 42 of the 2005 Act, insert—

“Directions

42A Directions

(1) The Scottish Ministers may give SFRS general or specific directions.

(2) SFRS must comply with a direction under this section.

(3) Directions under this section may vary or revoke earlier directions under this section.

(4) Directions under this section must be in writing.

(5) The Scottish Ministers must—

(a) publish a direction given under this section, and

(b) lay a copy of it before the Scottish Parliament.

(6) Nothing in this section enables the Scottish Ministers to give a direction in circumstances to which subsection (3) or (4) of section 41 applies.”.

117 Inspectors of SFRS

After section 43 of the 2005 Act, insert—

“CHAPTER 8B

INSPECTION

Inspectors of SFRS

43A Inspectors of SFRS

(1) Her Majesty may by Order in Council appoint—

(a) a Chief Inspector of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service, and

(b) such number of Inspectors of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may appoint Assistant Inspectors of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must pay to persons appointed under this section such remuneration as the Scottish Ministers may determine.
(4) The Scottish Ministers may authorise an Inspector to carry out any of the functions conferred on the Chief Inspector by or under this Act or any other enactment if—

(a) there is a temporary vacancy in the office of Chief Inspector, or

(b) the Scottish Ministers consider that the Chief Inspector is temporarily unable to carry out the Chief Inspector’s functions.

(5) A person who, immediately before the coming into force of section 117 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (asp 00), is by virtue of section 43—

(a) the Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities is taken to have been appointed under subsection (1)(a),

(b) an Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities is taken to have been appointed under subsection (1)(b), and

(c) an Assistant Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities is taken to have been appointed under subsection (2).

(6) In this Act—

“Chief Inspector” means a person appointed under subsection (1)(a), and “Inspector” means a person appointed under subsection (1) or (2).

43B Inquiries by Inspectors

(1) An Inspector may inquire into a matter mentioned in subsection (3).

(2) If directed to do so by the Scottish Ministers, an Inspector must inquire into a matter mentioned in subsection (3).

(3) The matters are—

(a) the state and efficiency of SFRS,

(b) whether in carrying out its functions SFRS is complying with its duty under section 39A to make arrangements which secure best value,

(c) the manner in which SFRS is carrying out any of its functions.

(4) In carrying out an inquiry under this section an Inspector may—

(a) require SFRS to provide any information or documents relating to the functions of SFRS that the Inspector may require,

(b) enter and inspect any premises which are used by SFRS,

(c) inspect any equipment which is used by SFRS.

(5) If an Inspector exercises a power of entry by virtue of subsection (4)(b), the Inspector may—

(a) take onto the premises—

(i) such other persons, and

(ii) such equipment,

as the Inspector considers necessary,
(b) require any person present on the premises to provide the Inspector with any information or documents that the Inspector may reasonably request.

(6) An Inspector may not under subsection (4)(b)—

(a) enter or inspect premises occupied as a private dwelling,

(b) enter premises by force.

(7) SFRS must provide such facilities, assistance and co-operation as an Inspector may reasonably request for the purposes of, or in connection with, an inquiry under this section.

43C Inquiries under section 43B(1): reports

(1) This section applies where an inquiry under section 43B(1) has been completed.

(2) The Chief Inspector must give SFRS a report of the inquiry.

(3) If a report given to SFRS under subsection (2) relates to a matter mentioned in section 43B(3)(a) or (b), the Chief Inspector must—

(a) as soon as is reasonably practicable after giving the report to SFRS, give the Scottish Ministers a copy of the report, and

(b) give the Scottish Ministers any other information relating to the inquiry that they may request.

(4) If a report given to SFRS under subsection (2) does not relate to a matter mentioned in section 43B(3)(a) or (b) the Chief Inspector —

(a) may give the Scottish Ministers a copy of the report if the Chief Inspector thinks fit,

(b) may give the Scottish Ministers any other information in relation to the report that the Chief Inspector thinks fit,

(c) must give the Scottish Ministers any information relating to the inquiry that the Scottish Ministers may request.

43D Inquiries under section 43B(2): reports

(1) This section applies where an inquiry under section 43B(2) has been completed.

(2) The Chief Inspector must give the Scottish Ministers—

(a) a report of the inquiry, and

(b) any other information relating to the inquiry that the Scottish Ministers may request.

(3) As soon as is reasonably practicable after giving the report to the Scottish Ministers under subsection (2)(a), the Chief Inspector must give a copy of the report to SFRS.
(4) If the report relates to a matter mentioned in section 43B(3)(a) or (b), the Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament a copy of the report given to them under subsection (2)(a).

43E Inquiry reports: SFRS consideration

In carrying out its functions, SFRS must have regard to a report given to it under section 43C(2) or 43D(3) and, having done so, must take such measures (if any) as it thinks fit in relation to the report.

43F Chief Inspector’s plan

1. The Chief Inspector must prepare a plan setting out—
   - (a) priorities for inquiries to be carried out by Inspectors, and
   - (b) information on how inquiries will be carried out in a way which is proportionate, accountable and transparent.

2. The Chief Inspector—
   - (a) must keep the plan under review, and
   - (b) may from time to time revise the plan.

3. The Chief Inspector must, in preparing a plan (and any revised plan), consult such persons as the Chief Inspector considers appropriate.

4. The Chief Inspector must publish the plan (and any revised plan) in such manner as the Chief Inspector thinks fit.

Co-operation and information-sharing

43G Co-operation and information-sharing: Auditor General

1. The Inspectors and the Auditor General must co-operate and co-ordinate activity with each other with a view to improving the carrying out of their respective functions in relation to SFRS.

2. In particular, the Inspectors and the Auditor General must together make arrangements with a view to—
   - (a) securing the exchange of information between them about SFRS,
   - (b) preventing any unnecessary duplication in relation to any inspections, investigations, inquiries or examinations carried out, or to be carried out, by them in relation to SFRS.

3. The duties imposed by subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in so far as compliance with them would prevent or delay any of the persons on whom they are imposed in taking any action which the person considers to be necessary as a matter of urgency.

4. No obligation as to secrecy or other restriction on disclosure of information prevents the Inspectors or the Auditor General from disclosing information to each other—
   - (a) for any purpose connected with the carrying out of their respective functions, or
(b) for the purpose of enabling or assisting each other to carry out any of their respective functions.”.

General

118 Transfer of staff, property etc.

Schedule 5 makes provision about the transfer of staff, property, rights, liabilities and obligations.

119 Meaning of “the 2005 Act”

In this Part, “the 2005 Act” means the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 (asp 5).

PART 3

GENERAL

120 Subordinate legislation

(1) Any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order, regulations or rules under this Act includes power to make—

(a) different provision for different purposes (for example, for different types or ranks of constable),

(b) such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate.

(2) An order made under section 10(2) or 11(5) is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(3) An order made under section 121 containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(4) All other orders, and any regulations or rules, made under this Act are subject to the negative procedure.

(5) This section does not apply to an order made under section 124(2) or paragraph 2(1)(b) of schedule 4.

121 Ancillary provision

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, or for the purposes of giving full effect to, any provision made by or under this Act.

(2) An order under this section may modify this or any other enactment.

122 Transitional provision etc.

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make such transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider appropriate for purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provision of this Act.

(2) An order under this section may modify this or any other enactment.
123 Minor and consequential amendments and repeals

(1) Schedule 6 contains minor amendments and amendments consequential on the provisions of this Act.

(2) The enactments mentioned in the first column in schedule 7, (which include enactments that are spent) are repealed to the extent set out in the second column.

124 Commencement

(1) This Part (other than section 123) comes into force on the day after Royal Assent.

(2) The other provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(3) An order under this section may include transitional, transitory or saving provision.

125 Short title

The short title of this Act is the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012.
SCHEDULE 1
(introduced by section 1)

PART 1

STATUS, STRUCTURE AND GOVERNANCE

Status

1 (1) The Authority—
   (a) is not a servant or agent of the Crown, and
   (b) has no status, immunity or privilege of the Crown.

10 (2) The Authority’s property is not property of, or property held on behalf of, the Crown.

Membership

2 (1) The Authority is to consist of not fewer than 7 and no more than 11 members.
   (2) The members are to be appointed by the Scottish Ministers.
   (3) The Scottish Ministers must appoint as members only persons who they consider to have the skills and expertise relevant to the functions of the Authority.

15 (4) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify sub-paragraph (1) by substituting for the minimum or maximum number of members for the time being specified there such other number as they think fit.

Disqualification

20 3 A person is disqualified from appointment, and from holding office, as a member of the Authority if that person is or becomes—
   (a) a member of—
      (i) the Scottish Parliament,
      (ii) the House of Lords,
      (iii) the House of Commons, or
      (iv) the European Parliament,
   (b) disqualified from standing for election as a member of—
      (i) the Scottish Parliament,
      (ii) the House of Commons,
      (iii) a local authority,
   (c) a constable,
   (d) a member of—
      (i) a police force maintained under section 2 of the Police Act 1996 (c.16),
      (ii) the metropolitan police force,
(iii) the City of London police force,
(iv) the Police Service of Northern Ireland,
(v) the Ministry of Defence Police appointed on the nomination of the Secretary of State under section 1 of the Ministry of Defence Police Act 1987 (c.4),
(vi) the British Transport Police Force,
(vii) the Civil Nuclear Constabulary,
(viii) the States of Jersey Police Force,
(ix) the salaried police force of the Island of Guernsey, or
(x) the Isle of Man Constabulary,
(e) a member of police staff,
(f) a member of the Authority’s staff,
(g) the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner or any member of the Commissioner’s staff, and
(h) a person of such other description as may be prescribed by order made by the Scottish Ministers.

Tenure

4 (1) A member is to be appointed for a period not exceeding 4 years specified in the appointment.
(2) A member holds and vacates office on such terms and conditions as the Scottish Ministers may determine.
(3) On ceasing to be a member, a person is eligible for reappointment.
(4) A member may, by notice in writing to the Scottish Ministers, resign office as a member.

Chairing member and deputy

5 (1) The Scottish Ministers must appoint one of the members of the Authority to chair meetings of the Authority (“the chairing member”).
(2) The chairing member is to be appointed for a period not exceeding 4 years specified in the appointment.
(3) If a person is appointed as the chairing member for a period that extends beyond the period of the person’s appointment as a member, the person’s appointment as a member is taken to have been extended so that it ends on the same day as the period of appointment as chairing member ends.
(4) Members of the Authority must elect, from their number, a member to act as deputy to the chairing member.

Removal from office

6 (1) The Scottish Ministers may remove a member from office if—
(a) the member is an undischarged bankrupt,
(b) the member is incapacitated by physical or mental illness,
(c) the member has, without reasonable excuse, been absent from meetings of the Authority for a period longer than 4 consecutive months,
(d) the member has, without reasonable excuse, been absent from 3 consecutive meetings of the Authority,
(e) the member has been convicted (whether before or after the member’s appointment) of a criminal offence,
(f) the member has failed to comply with the terms or conditions of the member’s appointment, or
(g) the Scottish Ministers consider that the member is otherwise unfit to be a member or is unable for any reason to carry out the member’s functions.

(2) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1)(a), “undischarged bankrupt” means a person—
(a) whose estate has been sequestrated and who has not been discharged (or against whom a bankruptcy order has been made and is still in force),
(b) who has granted a trust deed for, or made a composition or arrangement with, creditors (and has not been discharged in respect of it),
(c) who is the subject of a bankruptcy restrictions order, or an interim bankruptcy restrictions order, made under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985 (c.66) or the Insolvency Act 1986 (c.45),
(d) who is the subject of a bankruptcy restrictions undertaking entered into under either of those Acts,
(e) who has been adjudged bankrupt (and has not been discharged), or
(f) who is subject to any other kind of order, arrangement or undertaking analogous to those described in paragraphs (a) to (d), anywhere in the world.

Staff of the Authority

7 (1) The Authority may appoint individuals to assist the Authority in the carrying out of its functions.

(2) Individuals appointed under sub-paragraph (1) may be—
(a) employed by the Authority,
(b) provided to the Authority under arrangements between the Authority and a third party, or
(c) engaged on temporary service with the Authority in accordance with arrangements made under paragraph 8(1).

Constables: temporary service with the Scottish Police Authority

8 (1) The Authority may make arrangements for a constable, or any person falling within sub-paragraph (2), to serve as a member of the Authority’s staff in order to assist it in the carrying out of its functions.

(2) A person falls within this sub-paragraph if the person is a member of—
(a) a police force maintained under section 2 of the Police Act 1996 (c.16),
(b) the metropolitan police force,
(c) the City of London police force,
(d) the Police Service of Northern Ireland,
(e) the Ministry of Defence Police appointed on the nomination of the Secretary of State under section 1 of the Ministry of Defence Police Act 1987 (c.4),
(f) the British Transport Police Force,
(g) the Civil Nuclear Constabulary,
(h) the States of Jersey Police Force,
(i) the salaried police force of the Island of Guernsey, or
(j) the Isle of Man Constabulary.

(3) An individual engaged on service with the Authority under arrangements made under this paragraph is under the direction and control of the Authority.

(4) The Authority is liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of any individual to whom sub-paragraph (3) applies in the carrying out (or purported to carrying out) of that individual’s functions in the same manner as an employer is liable in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of an employee in the course of employment.

Terms and conditions of the Authority’s staff

9 (1) A member of the Authority’s staff may be employed on terms and conditions determined by the Authority.

(2) The Authority may pay or make arrangements for the payment of pensions, allowances or gratuities (including by way of compensation for loss of employment) to, or in respect of, any person who has ceased to be employed as a member of the Authority’s staff.

(3) The arrangements mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) may include—

(a) the making of contributions or payments towards provision for pensions, allowances or gratuities mentioned there, and
(b) the establishment and administration of pension schemes.

Committees and sub-committees

10 (1) The Authority may establish committees for any purpose.

(2) Any committee so established may establish sub-committees.

(3) The members of any committee or subcommittee may include persons who are not members of the Authority but such persons are not entitled to vote at meetings.

(4) A committee or sub-committee must not consist entirely of persons who are not members of the Authority.

(5) The Authority may pay such remuneration, allowances and expenses as are determined by the Authority to a member of a committee or sub-committee who is not—

(a) a constable,
(b) a member of the Authority,
(c) a member of police staff, or
(d) a member of the Authority’s staff.

Procedure

11 (1) The Authority may regulate—
(a) its own procedure (including quorum), and
(b) the procedure (including quorum) of its committees and sub-committees.

(2) The validity of any proceedings or acts of the Authority is not affected by any—
(a) vacancy in its membership,
(b) defect in the appointment of a member, or
(c) disqualification of a person as a member after appointment.

Delegation of functions

12 (1) The Authority may authorise—
(a) any of its committees, or
(b) any member of the Authority’s staff, to perform on behalf of the Authority such of its functions as it may determine to the extent so authorised.

(2) A committee of the Authority may authorise—
(a) any of its sub-committees, or
(b) any member of the Authority’s staff, to perform on behalf of the committee such of its functions as it may determine to the extent so authorised.

(3) Sub-paragraphs (1) and (2) do not affect the Authority’s—
(a) responsibility for performance of delegated functions, or
(b) ability to perform delegated functions.

Location of principal offices

13 Any determination by the Authority as to the location of the principal office premises of its members or of the chief constable is subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers.
PART 2

CONSEQUENTIAL MODIFICATIONS

17 (1) The Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 is amended as follows.

(2) In schedule 5 (improvement of public functions: listed bodies), after the entry for “Scottish Natural Heritage” insert “Scottish Police Authority”.

(3) In schedule 8 (information on exercise of public functions: listed public bodies), after the entry for “Scottish Natural Heritage” insert “Scottish Police Authority”.

Public Records (Scotland) Act 2011 (asp 12)

18 In the schedule to the Public Records (Scotland) Act 2011 (authorities to which Part 1 of that Act applies) after the entry for “Scottish Natural Heritage” insert “Scottish Police Authority”.

(introduced by section 28(3))

POLICE CUSTODY AND SECURITY OFFICERS: POWERS AND DUTIES

1 A police custody and security officer has power—

(a) to transfer persons in legal custody from one set of relevant premises to another,

(b) to have custody of persons held in legal custody on court premises (whether or not such persons would otherwise be in the custody of the court) and to produce them before the court,

(c) to have custody of persons temporarily held in legal custody in relevant premises while in the course of transfer from one set of such premises to another,
(d) to apprehend a person who was in the custody of the officer in relevant premises or in such course of transfer but who is unlawfully at large,
(e) to remove from relevant premises any person—
   (i) who the officer has reasonable grounds to believe has committed or is committing an offence, or
   (ii) who is causing a disturbance or nuisance,
(f) in any place to search any person who is in legal custody or is unlawfully at large,
(g) to search—
   (i) any relevant premises or any other place in which there is a person in the officer’s custody who is being transferred from one set of relevant premises to another,
   (ii) any person in such premises or other place who the officer has reasonable grounds to believe has committed or is committing an offence or who is seeking access to a person in the officer’s custody or to relevant premises,
(h) in relevant premises, or in any other place in which a person in legal custody is or may be, to require any person who the officer has reasonable grounds for suspecting has committed or is committing an offence—
   (i) to give the person’s name and address, and
   (ii) either to remain there with the officer until a constable arrives or, where reasonable in all the circumstances, to go with the officer to the nearest police station, but only if before imposing any such requirement the officer informs the person concerned of the nature of the suspected offence and of the reason for the requirement,
(i) in fulfilment of the officer’s duties under paragraph 2(1)(d), to apprehend any person and to detain that person in custody in the premises of the court in question,
(j) at a constable’s direction, to photograph or take relevant physical data from any person held in legal custody, and
(k) to use reasonable force (which may include the use of handcuffs and other means of restraint) where and in so far as it is requisite to do so in exercising any of the other powers, and either (but not both) of the sets of premises mentioned in any of paragraphs (a), (c) and (g) may be situated in a part of the British Islands outwith Scotland.

2 (1) It is the duty of a police custody and security officer—

(a) to attend to the well-being of a person in the officer’s custody,
(b) to prevent such a person from escaping from custody,
(c) to prevent, or detect and report on, the commission or attempted commission by such a person of any other unlawful act,
(d) to act with a view to preserving good order in the premises of any court and in land connected with such premises,
(e) to ensure good order and discipline on the part of a person in the officer’s custody (whether or not in the premises of any court or in land connected with such premises), and

(f) to give effect to any order of a court.

(2) A police custody and security officer provided to the Authority by virtue of section 26(2)(b) does not have the powers and duties mentioned in this schedule in the premises of any court or in land connected with such premises.

(3) In this schedule—

(a) “legal custody” has the meaning given by section 295 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46),

(b) “relevant physical data” has the meaning given by section 18(7A) of that Act, and

(c) “relevant premises” means—

(i) the premises of any court, prison, police station or hospital (within the meaning of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 (asp 13)), or

(ii) the premises of any other place from or to which a person may be required to be taken under that Act of 1995 or that Act of 2003.

SCHEDULE 3
(introduced by section 57)

POLICE APPEALS TRIBUNALS

Constitution and membership

1 (1) A police appeals tribunal is to consist of 3 members, one of whom is to be appointed to chair the tribunal.

(2) The Lord President of the Court of Session must—

(a) establish and maintain a panel of persons who may be appointed as members of a police appeals tribunal, and

(b) from that panel, appoint the members (including the chairing member) of the tribunal.

(3) Every member of the panel must be, and have been for the period of 5 years immediately prior to the member’s appointment, either—

(a) a solicitor holding a practising certificate in accordance with Part 2 of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980 (c.46), or

(b) a member of the Faculty of Advocates practising as an advocate in Scotland.

Member remuneration, allowances and expenses

2 The Authority is to pay to the members of a police appeals tribunal such remuneration, allowances and expenses as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

Expenses of proceedings

3 (1) The appellant is liable for the expenses incurred by the appellant in making an appeal.
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Schedule 4—Transfer of constables, staff and property etc.

(2) But the police appeals tribunal may direct that some or all of the appellant’s expenses must be paid by the Authority.

(3) The other expenses of the appeal (including the expenses of the respondent) must be paid by the Authority.

5 Police appeals tribunal rules

4 The Scottish Ministers may make rules about the procedure on appeals to a police appeals tribunal including, in particular, provision about—

(a) the notices required to start an appeal,
(b) the identity of the respondent, and
(c) holding hearings in private.

(introduced by section 95)

TRANSFER OF CONSTABLES, STAFF AND PROPERTY ETC.

Interpretation

15 1 In this schedule—

“appointed day” has the meaning given by paragraph 2,
“joint police board” means a joint police board constituted by an amalgamation scheme made under the 1967 Act,
“member of the Authority’s staff” means a member of police staff appointed to assist the Authority in the carrying out of its functions,
“police authority” has the same meaning as in the 1967 Act,
“police force” means a police force maintained under the 1967 Act,
“police member of the SCDEA” means an individual appointed in accordance with paragraph 7 of schedule 2 to the 2006 Act, “SCDEA” means the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency, “SPSA” means the Scottish Police Services Authority,
“the 1967 Act” means the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 (c.77),
“the 2006 Act” means the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 (asp 10).

Appointed day

2 (1) The “appointed day”, for the purposes of this schedule, means—

(a) the day on which the Police Service is established (being the day appointed under section 124(2) for the coming into force of section 6), or
(b) such other day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(2) An order under sub-paragraph (1)(b) may appoint different days for different purposes.
Constables to continue to hold office and rank

3 (1) Sub-paragraphs (2) to (6) apply to an individual who, immediately before the appointed day, holds the office of constable by virtue of being appointed in accordance with the 1967 Act.

5 (2) An individual to whom this sub-paragraph applies is, on and after the appointed day—

(a) to continue to hold the office of constable,

(b) to be treated as having made the declaration required by section 10, and

(c) to otherwise be treated as having been appointed in accordance with this Act as a constable of the Police Service.

10 (3) Paragraphs 5 to 7 make provision for the transfer of an individual to whom this sub-paragraph applies on the appointed day.

15 (4) Subject to paragraph 4(2), an individual to whom this sub-paragraph applies is, on the appointed day, to be transferred in accordance with this schedule at the same rank as the individual holds immediately before the appointed day.

20 (5) Sub-paragraph (4) does not affect any temporary promotion arrangements which are in place immediately before the appointed day.

(6) Any contractual terms on which an individual to whom this sub-paragraph applies is appointed to serve as a constable to a police force (for example, in relation to fixed periods of tenure of constables holding the rank of superintendent or above) are, on and after the appointed day, to have effect as if the appointment were originally an appointment to serve as a constable of the Police Service.

Senior officers

4 (1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies to an individual who—

(a) holds the rank of chief constable immediately before the appointed day,

(b) is not appointed to the office of chief constable of the Police Service in accordance with section 7, and

(c) is, in accordance with this schedule, transferred to serve as a constable of the Police Service.

(2) An individual to whom this sub-paragraph applies is, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having been appointed to the office of deputy chief constable in accordance with section 7 but, despite section 11(2), is to continue to hold the rank of chief constable and is otherwise to continue to have the same conditions of service, including rates of pay, as if the individual had continued to be the chief constable of the police force which has ceased to exist.

(3) Sub-paragraph (4) applies to an individual who—

(a) holds the rank of deputy chief constable immediately before the appointed day,

(b) is not appointed to the office of chief constable, or to the office of deputy chief constable, of the Police Service in accordance with section 7, and

(c) is, in accordance with this schedule, transferred to serve as a constable of the Police Service.
An individual to whom this sub-paragraph applies is, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having been appointed to the office of deputy chief constable in accordance with section 7 but is to continue to have the same conditions of service, including rates of pay, as if the individual had continued to be the deputy chief constable of the police force which has ceased to exist or, as the case may be, the Director General of the SCDEA.

An individual who is, in accordance with this schedule, transferred to serve as a constable of the Police Service at the rank of assistant chief constable is, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having been appointed to the office of assistant chief constable of the Police Service in accordance with section 7.

Constables serving in police forces

Any individual serving as a constable of a police force immediately before the appointed day (including anyone on temporary service from another police force) is, on the appointed day, to transfer to serve as a constable of the Police Service.

Constables serving in SPSA or SCDEA

(1) An individual who, immediately before the appointed day, is the Director General or Deputy Director General of, or is a police member of, the SCDEA is, on the appointed day, to transfer to serve as a constable of the Police Service.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) does not apply to a police member of the SCDEA serving as a member of the SPSA’s staff in accordance with an arrangement made by virtue of paragraph 10(3) of schedule 1 to the 2006 Act (see sub-paragraphs (5) and (6)(a) below).

(3) Sub-paragraph (4) applies where, immediately before the appointed day, an individual—

(a) is serving as a member of the SPSA’s staff in accordance with an arrangement made by virtue of paragraph 10(2) of schedule 1 to the 2006 Act, and

(b) is not a police member of the SCDEA.

(4) Where this sub-paragraph applies, it is for the Scottish Police Authority to determine whether the individual concerned is, on the appointed day, to transfer—

(a) to serve as a constable of the Police Service, or

(b) to be engaged on temporary service as a member of the Authority’s staff.

(5) Sub-paragraph (6) applies where, immediately before the appointed day, an individual is serving as a member of the SPSA’s staff in accordance with an arrangement made by virtue of paragraph 10(3) of schedule 1 to the 2006 Act.

(6) Where this sub-paragraph applies, the arrangement is, on and after the appointed day, to have effect as if made by the Scottish Police Authority under section 16 and—

(a) where the individual concerned is a police member of the SCDEA, the individual is, on the appointed day, to transfer to be engaged on temporary service as a constable of the Police Service, or

(b) where the individual concerned is not a police member of the SCDEA, it is for the Scottish Police Authority to determine whether the individual is, on the appointed day, to transfer—

(i) to be engaged on temporary service as a constable of the Police Service, or
(ii) to be engaged on temporary service as a member of the Authority’s staff.

Constables – temporary service arrangements

7 (1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies where, by virtue of any arrangement made or consent given, an individual is, immediately before the appointed day, engaged in service as a constable of a police force.

(2) Where this sub-paragraph applies—

(a) the arrangement or consent is, on and after the appointed day, to have effect as if it were an arrangement or consent for the individual to be engaged in service as a constable of the Police Service, and

(b) the individual concerned is, on the appointed day, accordingly to transfer to be engaged in such service.

(3) Sub-paragraph (4) applies where, by virtue of any arrangement made or consent given, a constable of a police force is, immediately before the appointed day, engaged in service outwith that force which is “relevant service” for the purposes of section 38A of the 1967 Act.

(4) Where this sub-paragraph applies—

(a) the arrangement or consent is, on and after the appointed day, to have effect as if it were an arrangement or consent for the individual to be engaged in service outwith the Police Service,

(b) the individual concerned is, on the appointed day, accordingly to continue to be engaged in such service, and

(c) the individual’s rights under section 38(3)(a) of the 1967 Act are, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having arisen under section 15 of this Act.

(5) An individual who reverts to the Police Service by virtue of sub-paragraph (4)(c) at the rank of deputy chief constable or assistant chief constable is, on and after the day of reversion, to be treated as having been appointed to the office corresponding to that rank in accordance with section 7 (but, where the individual is a deputy chief constable who has not otherwise been appointed in accordance with that section to the office of deputy chief constable of the Police Service, the individual is to continue to have the same conditions of service, including rates of pay, as if the individual had continued to be the deputy chief constable of the police force which has ceased to exist).

(6) This paragraph does not apply in relation to an individual transferred under paragraph 5 or 6.

Acts done before transfer

8 (1) Anything done before the appointed day by or in relation to a police authority, a joint police board, the SPSA or the SCDEA in respect of an individual transferred under any of paragraphs 5 to 7 is to be treated on and after that day as having been done by or in relation to the Scottish Police Authority.

(2) Anything done before the appointed day by or in relation to a chief constable of a police force or the Director General of the SCDEA in respect of an individual transferred under any of paragraphs 5 to 7 is to be treated on and after that day as having been done by or in relation to the chief constable of the Police Service.
(3) Anything done before the appointed day by or in relation to a constable of a police force or a police member of the SCDEA in respect of an individual transferred under any of paragraphs 5 to 7 is to be treated on and after that day as having been done by or in relation to a constable of the Police Service.

Limitation on mobility of transferred constables

9 (1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies to a constable of the Police Service who, immediately before the appointed day, is a constable of a police force (including any such constable who is, at that time, engaged in service outwith that force).

(2) A constable to whom this sub-paragraph applies must not be assigned duties which, in the opinion of the Scottish Ministers, would necessitate that constable moving home to a place outwith what was the area of the police force which has ceased to exist.

(3) Sub-paragraph (2) does not apply to a constable who, immediately before the appointed day, is engaged in service outwith that constable’s force until—

(a) in the case of a constable who is not, on the appointed day, transferred in accordance with this schedule to serve as a constable of the Police Service, such time as the constable reverts to so serve, and

(b) in the case of a constable who is, on the appointed day, transferred in accordance with this schedule to serve as a constable of the Police Service, such time as the chief constable may determine.

(4) Sub-paragraph (2) ceases to apply to a constable if, on or after the appointed day, the constable—

(a) is or becomes a senior officer of the Police Service,

(b) is promoted to a higher rank,

(c) gives the chief constable written consent to the lifting of the limitation imposed by sub-paragraph (2).

Transfer of police staff

10 (1) An individual is a “police employee” for the purposes of this paragraph if the individual—

(a) is employed, immediately before the appointed day—

(i) by a joint police board under section 9 of the 1967 Act (or is otherwise employed by a joint police board),

(ii) by the SPSA under paragraph 9(1) or 10(1) of schedule 1 to the 2006 Act, or

(b) being an employee of a local authority, is identified by a staff transfer scheme made under paragraph 11 as an individual, or type of individual, who is to be treated as a police employee.

(2) A police employee’s contract of employment has effect on and after the appointed day as if originally made between the employee and the Scottish Police Authority.

(3) It is for the Scottish Police Authority to determine whether a police employee is, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having been appointed as a member of the police staff under section 26 or as a member of the Authority’s staff under paragraph 7 of schedule 1.
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill
Schedule 4—Transfer of constables, staff and property etc.

(4) The rights, powers, duties and liabilities of the relevant authority under or in connection with the contract of employment are by virtue of this paragraph transferred to the Scottish Police Authority on the appointed day.

(5) Anything done before the appointed day by or in relation to the relevant authority in respect of the contract of employment or the police employee is to be treated on and after that day as having been done by or in relation to the Scottish Police Authority.

(6) If, before the appointed day, a police employee informs the relevant authority that the person does not wish to become an employee of the Scottish Police Authority—

(a) sub-paragraphs (2), (4) and (5) do not apply in relation to the police employee, and

(b) the employee’s contract of employment is terminated on the appointed day.

(7) A police employee is not to be treated for any purpose as being dismissed by reason of the operation of any provision of this paragraph in relation to the employee.

(8) Nothing in this paragraph affects any right of a police employee to terminate the police employee’s contract of employment if a substantial detrimental change in the police employee’s working conditions is made.

(9) No such right arises by reason only that, by virtue of this paragraph, the identity of the police employee’s employer changes.

(10) In this paragraph “relevant authority” means the joint police board or authority which employs the individual concerned immediately before the appointed day.

Staff transfer scheme

11 (1) The Scottish Ministers may make a staff transfer scheme.

(2) A staff transfer scheme is a scheme which—

(a) identifies or prescribes methods for identifying individuals, or types of individuals, employed by local authorities who are to be treated as police employees for the purposes of paragraph 10,

(b) makes such further provision (including any incidental, consequential, supplementary, transitional, transitory or saving provision) for or in connection with the transfer of individuals identified by or under the scheme to the Scottish Police Authority as the Scottish Ministers think fit.

(3) Before making a staff transfer scheme, the Scottish Ministers must consult any local authority or other person whose rights, liabilities and obligations (or any of them) are to be transferred by virtue of the scheme.

Police staff appointed under contract for services

12 (1) A contract for services entered into by a police authority or a joint police board for the purposes of section 9(1)(b) of the 1967 Act has effect on and after the appointed day as if originally entered into by the Scottish Police Authority.

(2) Accordingly, any individual who, immediately before the appointed day, is appointed by a police authority or a joint police board under section 9(1)(b) of the 1967 Act is, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having been provided to the Scottish Police Authority in accordance with arrangements made by virtue of section 26(2)(b).
(3) The rights, powers, duties and liabilities of the police authority or the joint police board under or in connection with the contract for services are by virtue of this paragraph transferred to the Scottish Police Authority on the appointed day.

(4) Anything done before the appointed day by or in relation to the police authority or the joint police board in respect of the contract for services or an individual falling with sub-paragraph (2) is to be treated on and after that day as having been done by or in relation to the Scottish Police Authority.

Police cadets

An individual who, immediately before the appointed day, is a police cadet by virtue of appointment under section 8 of the 1967 Act is, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having been appointed in accordance with section 25 of this Act.

Police custody and security officers

An individual who is, immediately before the appointed day, certified as a police custody and security officer under section 9(1A) of the 1967 Act is, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as having been certified as such an officer under section 28(1).

Her Majesty’s inspectorate of constabulary in Scotland

(1) An individual who, immediately before the day on which section 71 comes into force, holds office as an inspector of constabulary by virtue of appointment under section 33 of the 1967 Act is, on and after that day, to be treated as having been appointed under section 71.

(2) An individual who, immediately before the day on which section 72 comes into force, is an assistant inspector of constabulary by virtue of appointment under section 34(1) of the 1967 Act is, on and after that day, to be treated as having been appointed under section 72.

(3) An individual who, immediately before the day on which section 73 comes into force, is a staff officer to the inspectors of constabulary by virtue of appointment under section 34(2) of the 1967 Act is, on and after that day, to be treated as having been appointed under section 73.

Police property transfer scheme: transfers to Scottish Police Authority

(1) The Scottish Ministers may make a police property transfer scheme.

(2) A police property transfer scheme is a scheme making provision for or in connection with the transfer to the Scottish Police Authority of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of—

(a) the Scottish Ministers,
(b) a local authority,
(c) a joint police board, or
(d) the SPSA.
(3) A police property transfer scheme may make provision by virtue of sub-paragraph (2) only in so far as the property, rights, liabilities and obligations relate to the Authority’s functions or police functions.

(4) On the transfer date—

(a) any property or rights to which a police property transfer scheme applies transfers to and vests in the Scottish Police Authority,

(b) any liabilities or obligations to which such a scheme applies become liabilities or obligations of the Scottish Police Authority.

(5) A police property transfer scheme may make provision for the payment by the Scottish Police Authority of compensation in respect of property and rights transferred by virtue of the scheme.

Property transfer scheme: transfers to local authorities

17 (1) The Scottish Ministers may make a local authority property transfer scheme.

(2) A local authority property transfer scheme is a scheme making provision for or in connection with the transfer to a specified local authority of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of a joint police board.

(3) On the transfer date—

(a) any property or rights to which a local authority property transfer scheme applies transfers to and vests in the specified local authority,

(b) any liabilities or obligations to which such a scheme applies become liabilities or obligations of the specified local authority.

(4) A local authority property transfer scheme may make provision for the payment by a local authority of compensation in respect of property and rights transferred by virtue of the scheme.

(5) In this paragraph, “specified” means specified in the local authority property transfer scheme.

Property transfer schemes: general

18 (1) This paragraph applies in relation to a scheme under paragraph 16 or 17.

(2) The scheme must specify a date (the “transfer date”) on which the transfer is to take effect.

(3) The scheme may—

(a) specify different dates in relation to different property, rights, liabilities and obligations,

(b) make different provision in relation to different cases or classes of case.

(4) The scheme may make provision for the creation of rights, or the imposition of liabilities or obligations, in relation to the property, rights, liabilities or obligations transferred by virtue of the scheme.

(5) The scheme may make provision requiring the person to whom property is transferred by the scheme to comply with requirements or conditions specified by the Scottish Ministers in relation to the property.
(6) A requirement or condition specified under sub-paragraph (5) may include in particular—
    (a) a requirement that the property may not be disposed of unless the Scottish Ministers consent,
    (b) a condition in relation to use of the property.

(7) A certificate issued by the Scottish Ministers that any property, right, liability or obligation has, or has not, been transferred by virtue of a police property transfer scheme is conclusive evidence of the transfer or the fact that there has not been a transfer.

(8) The scheme may make provision about the continuation of legal proceedings.

(9) The scheme may include such incidental, consequential, supplementary, transitional, transitory or saving provision as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

Transfer of liabilities of chief constables etc.

By virtue of this paragraph, any liabilities of a chief constable of a police force under section 39 of the 1967 Act and of the Director General of the SCDEA under section 22 of the 2006 Act are, on and after the appointed day, to be treated as liabilities of the chief constable of the Police Service under section 24 of this Act.

(introduced by section 118)

TRANSFER OF STAFF, PROPERTY ETC.

Interpretation

In this schedule—

“appointed day” means such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint (and different days may be appointed for different purposes),

“joint board” means a joint fire and rescue board constituted by a scheme made under section 2(1) of the 2005 Act,

“relevant employer”, in relation to—

(a) a person employed by a local authority, means the local authority with which the person has a contract of employment,

(b) a person who is a member of the staff of the Scottish Ministers, means the Scottish Ministers,

“transfer day”, in relation to a person, means the day on which a staff transfer scheme comes into force in relation to the person “transferring employee” means a person who, immediately before the appointed day, is an employee of a joint board.

Joint board staff

(1) A transferring employee’s contract of employment has effect on and after the appointed day as if originally made between the employee and SFRS.
(2) The rights, powers, duties and liabilities of the joint board under or in connection with the contract of employment are by virtue of this paragraph transferred to SFRS on the appointed day.

(3) Anything done before the appointed day by or in relation to the joint board in respect of the contract of employment or the transferring employee is to be treated on and after that day as having been done by or in relation to SFRS.

(4) If, before the appointed day, a transferring employee informs the joint board that the person does not wish to become an employee of SFRS—
(a) sub-paragraphs (1) to (3) do not apply in relation to the transferring employee, and
(b) the transferring employee’s contract of employment is terminated on the appointed day.

(5) A transferring employee is not to be treated for any purpose as being dismissed by reason of the operation of any provision of this paragraph in relation to the employee.

(6) Nothing in this paragraph affects any right of a transferring employee to terminate the employee’s contract of employment if a substantial detrimental change in the employee’s working conditions is made.

(7) No such right arises by reason only that, by virtue of this paragraph, the identity of the transferring employee’s employer changes.

Local authority staff and civil servants

3 (1) The Scottish Ministers may make a staff transfer scheme.

(2) A staff transfer scheme is a scheme making provision for or in connection with the transfer to SFRS of persons who are—
(a) employed by a local authority, or
(b) members of the staff of the Scottish Ministers.

(3) A staff transfer scheme may in particular—
(a) prescribe rules by which the transfer of specified persons, or classes of specified person, can be determined,
(b) provide that specified persons, or classes of specified person, are to become employees of SFRS.

(4) A staff transfer scheme may make provision only in relation to persons whose employment relates to the carrying out of functions conferred on SFRS by or under the 2005 Act or any other enactment.

(5) In this paragraph, “specified” means specified in a staff transfer scheme.

Transfers under paragraph 3: effect on contract of employment

4 (1) This paragraph applies where—
(a) a person is to be transferred by virtue of a staff transfer scheme, and
(b) immediately before the transfer day the person has a contract of employment with a relevant employer.

(2) The contract of employment has effect on and after the transfer day as if originally made between the person and SFRS.
(3) The rights, powers, duties and liabilities of the relevant employer under or in connection with the contract of employment are by virtue of this paragraph transferred to SFRS on the transfer day.

(4) Anything done before the transfer day by or in relation to the relevant employer in respect of the contract of employment or the person is to be treated on and after that day as having been done by or in relation to SFRS.

(5) If, before the transfer day, the person informs the relevant employer that the person does not wish to become an employee of SFRS—
   (a) sub-paragraphs (2) to (4) do not apply in relation to the person, and
   (b) the person’s contract of employment is terminated on the day before the appointed day.

(6) A person is not to be treated for any purpose as being dismissed by reason of the operation of any provision of this paragraph in relation to the person.

(7) Nothing in this paragraph affects any right of a person to terminate the person’s contract of employment if a substantial detrimental change in the person’s working conditions is made.

(8) No such right arises by reason only that, by virtue of this paragraph, the identity of the person’s employer changes.

(9) Before making a staff transfer scheme under paragraph 3, the Scottish Ministers must consult any local authority or other person whose rights, liabilities and obligations (or any of them) are to be transferred by virtue of the scheme.

Property transfer scheme: transfers to SFRS

5 (1) The Scottish Ministers may make an SFRS property transfer scheme.

(2) An SFRS property transfer scheme is a scheme making provision for or in connection with the transfer to SFRS of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of—
   (a) the Scottish Ministers,
   (b) a local authority,
   (c) a joint board.

(3) An SFRS property transfer scheme may make provision by virtue of sub-paragraph (2) only in so far as the property, rights, liabilities and obligations relate to functions of SFRS conferred by or under the 2005 Act or any other enactment.

(4) On the transfer date—
   (a) any property or rights to which an SFRS property transfer scheme applies transfers to and vests in SFRS,
   (b) any liabilities or obligations to which such a scheme applies become liabilities or obligations of SFRS.

(5) An SFRS property transfer scheme may make provision for the payment by SFRS of compensation in respect of property and rights transferred by virtue of the scheme.

Property transfer scheme: transfers to local authorities

6 (1) The Scottish Ministers may make a local authority property transfer scheme.
(2) A local authority property transfer scheme is a scheme making provision for or in connection with the transfer to a specified local authority of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of a specified joint board.

(3) On the transfer date—

(a) any property or rights to which a local authority property transfer scheme applies transfers to and vests in the specified local authority,

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about policing; to make provision about fire and rescue services; and for connected purposes.

Introduced by: Kenny MacAskill
On: 16 January 2012
Supported by: Roseanna Cunningham
Bill type: Executive Bill
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

POLICE AND FIRE REFORM (SCOTLAND) BILL

EXPLANATORY NOTES

(AND OTHER ACCOMPANYING DOCUMENTS)

CONTENTS

1. As required under Rule 9.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, the following documents are published to accompany the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012:
   - Explanatory Notes;
   - a Financial Memorandum;
   - a Scottish Government Statement on legislative competence; and
   - the Presiding Officer’s Statement on legislative competence.

A Policy Memorandum is printed separately as SP Bill 8–PM.
EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

2. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament.

3. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

THE BILL

4. The purpose of the Bill is to create a single police service and a single fire and rescue service. The Bill sets out the governance arrangements and framework for the new services. In addition, it provides:
   - a modern purpose for the police service and updated oath for constables. For fire, the Scottish Government intends that a new purpose will be included in a new fire and rescue framework;
   - a statutory framework for the delivery of police and fire and rescue services and appropriate scrutiny and oversight arrangements; and
   - arrangements for the transfer of existing officers and staff to both services.

5. The Bill also places the arrangements for independent custody visiting in Scotland on a statutory footing. It ensures that independent custody visiting in Scotland complies with the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture.

6. To facilitate the establishment of single services the Bill abolishes the existing unitary police and fire authorities (Fife and Dumfries and Galloway) and the 6 joint police and joint fire boards which are established by amalgamation schemes made under the provisions of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 and the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 by bringing together a number of local authorities (who are individual police and fire authorities under the enabling legislation) to form joint boards.

7. A more detailed explanation of the Bill’s purpose can be found in the Policy Memorandum, which also explains the thinking and policy intentions that underpin it.

8. The Bill is in 3 parts. Part 1 deals with police, and has 17 Chapters and 98 sections. Part 2 deals with fire and rescue, and has 21 sections and Part 3 deals with general provisions with 6 sections. The Bill also includes 7 Schedules setting out the detailed arrangements in relation to a number of areas covered by the Bill.
Part 1 Police Reform

9. Part 1 largely replaces the legislation underpinning policing in Scotland, the Police (Scotland) Act 1967, and puts in place a new modernised framework for policing. The Bill also repeals Part 1, Chapter 1 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 which established the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA). It amends Part 1, Chapter 2 of that Act which established the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland to rename it and extend the provisions in that part to provide for more robust scrutiny of policing. Specifically, it makes provision for:

- The establishment and way of working of the Scottish Police Authority (SPA), responsible for the governance, oversight and maintenance of the Police Service, for holding the Chief Constable to account, and for providing forensic services. The Bill will also give the Scottish Ministers power to direct the SPA, but not the Chief Constable (Chapters 1 and 3 and Schedule 1);

- The responsibilities of the Chief Constable for the direction and control and day to day administration of the Police Service of Scotland (the Police Service), the allocation and deployment of resources received from the SPA, and ensuring adequate arrangements for the policing of each local authority area. The Bill also makes clear that the Chief Constable must account to the SPA (Chapter 2);

- An updated oath, a restatement and reframing of the functions and duties of constables, and provision for the terms and conditions of service of constables and police cadets, as well as that of police staff, police custody and security offices and constables from another jurisdiction on temporary service with the Police Service (Chapter 2 and Schedule 2). In addition, the Bill gives the Scottish Ministers power to make regulations on a range of issues concerning the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables and police cadets (Chapter 8);

- A statement of the policing principles to which the Scottish Ministers, SPA and the Chief Constable must have regard when setting the strategic direction for the service and commanding constables, as well as detailed arrangements for the strategic police plan and annual police plan. It obliges the SPA to involve the Chief Constable in preparing these (Chapter 4);

- A statutory duty on the SPA and the Chief Constable to make arrangements which secure best value for the SPA and the Police Service (Chapter 5);

- Reporting on and examining policing matters, including placing specific obligations on the SPA to produce an annual report. It also provides for the preparation and submission of accounts and arrangements for audit, enables the Auditor General for Scotland to initiate examinations into the delivery of best value, and places a duty on the Auditor General and Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland (HMICS) to work together (Chapter 6);

- The Chief Constable to make arrangements for local policing, including establishing a new formal statutory relationship with each local authority (Chapter 7);

- Arrangements for police appeals tribunals in disciplinary cases where the processes of review or appeal have been exhausted (Chapter 9 and Schedule 3);
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

- A new independent investigatory capacity outside the Police Service (the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC)) to deal with the most serious cases and where it is in the public interest to have an independent investigation (Chapter 10);
- Inspection of the SPA and the Police Service by HMICS, which will retain its existing powers and also be able to examine the delivery of best value. It also requires the Scottish Ministers to lay HMICS inspection or inquiry reports before the Scottish Parliament (Chapter 11);
- A requirement on the SPA and the Police Service, and on the HMICS, Auditor General and PIRC to work together (Chapter 12);
- The Scottish Ministers to pay a grant directly to the Scottish Police Authority (Chapter 14). The SPA and Chief Constable will also be able to charge for goods and services provided by the SPA or police service (Chapter 13);
- A number of offences (Chapter 15);
- Independent Custody Visiting (Chapter 16); and
- The transfer of officers, staff and assets from the existing unitary authorities, joint boards and SPSA to the new service (Chapter 17 and Schedule 4).

Part 2 Fire Reform

10. Part 2 amends the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 to establish the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and transfers to it fire-fighting, fire safety and other functions under that Act. Specifically, it makes provision for:

- The establishment and way of working of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS), responsible for the delivery of fire and rescue functions, and for employing the Chief Officer, fire-fighters and other staff. The Bill will also give the Scottish Ministers power to direct SFRS. (Sections 99, inserting new Schedule 1A, and 116);
- Fire and rescue functions in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 and the Fire (Additional Function) Scotland Order 2005 to be the responsibility of SFRS, and for SFRS to carry out those functions (Sections 100 – 110);
- SFRS to have a specific statutory duty to make arrangements which secure best value (Section 111);
- SFRS to produce, publish and review a strategic plan (Section 112);
- SFRS to make arrangements for local fire and rescue services, including establishing a formal statutory relationship with each local authority (Section 113);
- Monitoring and scrutiny of fire and rescue matters, including placing a specific duty on SFRS to produce an annual report, to prepare and submit for audit accounts and to provide information to the Scottish Ministers. (Sections 100 (paragraph 16 of inserted schedule 1A), 114 and 115);
• Inspection of SFRS by newly established Inspectors of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. It also provides for reports by the Chief Inspector to SFRS, the Scottish Ministers and the Scottish Parliament (Section 117); and

• The transfer of fire-fighters and other staff and assets from the existing unitary authorities, joint boards and the Scottish Ministers to the new service (Section 118 and Schedule 5).

Part 3: General

11. Part 3 makes a number of general provisions relating to subordinate legislation, minor and consequential amendments to other legislation and commencement.

PART 1 – POLICE REFORM

CHAPTER 1 - THE SCOTTISH POLICE AUTHORITY

12. Section 1 provides for the establishment of a new corporate body, the Scottish Police Authority (SPA).

13. Schedule 1 to the Bill, which is introduced by section 1, establishes the SPA as independent from the Crown, and makes provision regarding its constitution, membership, remuneration and location. Paragraphs 2 – 6 provide that the SPA will consist of between 7 and 11 members, though that number may be varied by order made by the Scottish Ministers which would be subject to negative procedure in the Scottish Parliament. Members must be appointed by Ministers on the basis of relevant skills and expertise to govern the Police Service and hold the Chief Constable to account. All appointments will be regulated under the Public Appointments Commissioner for Scotland: Code of Practice for Ministerial Appointments to Public Bodies in Scotland (“the Code”). The Scottish Ministers are to be responsible for appointing the Chair of the SPA, and members of the SPA must elect one of them to act as Deputy. These paragraphs also set out the length of term members and the chairing member can serve; that Ministers can remove members under certain circumstances; and provide a list of people disqualified from membership of the SPA.

14. Paragraphs 7 – 9 of Schedule 1 make provision for the SPA to appoint staff to assist in carrying out its functions, and to second police officers from police services across the United Kingdom to assist in carrying out its functions. They also make provision regarding the terms and conditions on which the SPA’s staff are employed. Paragraphs 10 – 13 of Schedule 1 set out rules regarding the establishment of committees and sub-committees by the SPA, its procedures, delegation of functions (although the SPA will still retain responsibility for the performance of those functions and remain able to perform them), and location of SPA and Police Service office Headquarters (which are subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers). Part 2 of Schedule 1 makes consequential amendments flowing from the establishment of the SPA as a new Scottish public body.

15. Section 2 sets out that the SPA’s main functions are to maintain the Police Service of Scotland (the Police Service), to promote and support continuous improvement in, and hold the Chief Constable to account for, the policing of Scotland. The SPA will also have additional functions conferred on it by this, or any other, enactment. The SPA must try to carry out these functions in a way that is proportionate, accountable and transparent and consistent with best practice.

16. On the first of these roles, Section 3 provides that the SPA has a specific obligation to pay constables pay, allowances and expenses, in accordance with the regulations made under section 49 of the Bill. It also gives the SPA a broad power to provide and maintain anything necessary or desirable for carrying out police functions.

17. Section 4 allows the SPA to do anything it considers appropriate for carrying out its functions. This includes specific power to: enter into contracts; borrow money; acquire and dispose of land and other property; accept gifts of money and gifts or loans of other property; form or promote companies; and compulsorily purchase land. The power to borrow money and to purchase land compulsorily is subject to Ministerial consent and, in relation to borrowing money, the Scottish Ministers can set any conditions they consider appropriate, and their agreement can be given in relation to a particular case or class of cases.

18. Section 5 places an obligation on the SPA to comply with any direction given by the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Ministers may not give directions in relation to specific policing operations. The Ministerial direction must be published and laid before the Scottish Parliament. Ministers will also have powers to vary or revoke such directions, which must be published and laid in the same way.

CHAPTER 2 – THE POLICE SERVICE OF SCOTLAND

19. This Chapter makes a number of provisions relating to the Police Service of Scotland. Police officers are office holders not employees and their terms and conditions of service are set out in statute rather than being governed primarily by employment law. It is for this reason that the legislation has to set out detailed arrangements for the establishment of the Police Service and the appointment etc. of constables, and the provisions in this Chapter largely replicate those in the 1967 Act relating to the appointment of constables. Any differences in approach are set out below. Section 6 establishes the Police Service of Scotland as a constabulary comprising a constable holding the office of Chief Constable, one or more holding the office of deputy chief constable, one or more holding the office of assistant chief constable, and constables. It makes detailed provision for the terms and conditions of members of the constabulary. It sets out the ranks a constable may hold, and makes provision for the appointment, role, functions, jurisdiction, duties, and powers of senior officers, regular constables and special constables, as well as making provision for dealing with offences committed by constables, such as failure to perform duty and failure to return equipment, and for the removal from office of senior officers in the interests of efficiency or effectiveness.

Constable: appointment, ranks and terms of office

20. Section 7 requires the SPA to appoint the Chief Constable of the Police Service, one or more deputy chief constables and one or more assistant chief constables. The Chief Constable appointment is subject to approval by the Scottish Ministers. The SPA is required to consult the Chief Constable before appointing a deputy or assistant chief constable. Regular constables (i.e. any constables aside from senior officers) will be appointed by the Chief Constable (Section 8), who may also appoint special constables (Section 9). Special constables are not paid, but may be entitled to allowances and other payments, which will be set out in regulations made under section 49. The main differences from the 1967 Act are that the Bill provides the flexibility to have more than one deputy chief constable and Ministerial agreement is only required before the SPA appoints the Chief Constable rather than all senior officers.

21. Section 10 provides that, in order to be appointed as a constable, an individual has to have made a declaration before a Sheriff or Justice of the Peace. Section 10(1) sets out the new wording of the declaration, which is included on the face of the legislation for the first time, having previously been included in Police Regulations. The wording of the oath can be modified by the Scottish Ministers by order, which would be subject to affirmative procedure in the Scottish Parliament.

22. Section 11 makes provision for constable ranks. It lists the ranks a constable may hold, and gives the Scottish Ministers a power to make regulations (which would be subject to affirmative resolution in the Scottish Parliament) to add or remove any rank below that of assistant chief constable, and lists the people the Scottish Ministers must consult before doing so. The order making power is a new provision intended to make it easier to add or remove ranks if either is necessary for operational efficiency. Section 11(2) provides that constables appointed to the offices of Chief Constable, deputy chief constable or assistant chief constable under section 7 hold the same rank as the office to which they have been appointed. The Chief Constable is responsible for assigning and promoting individuals to ranks below that of assistant chief constable. A constable can only be demoted if the constable consents or it is done in accordance with the regulations made under section 49. Section 12 provides that a constable holds and vacates office in accordance with those regulations, or any other enactment which makes such provision.

23. Section 13 provides the SPA with a power to pay rewards to any constable below the rank of Chief Constable who it considers has performed their functions with exceptional diligence, or in an especially meritorious manner, or to any person who it deems to have contributed substantially to Scotland’s policing. Such rewards are made on the recommendation of the Chief Constable.

24. Section 14 provides the SPA with a power to require a Chief Constable, deputy chief constable or assistant chief constable to retire in the interests of efficiency or effectiveness. Before calling for this, the SPA must: give the senior officer an explanation of its reasons and an opportunity to make representations, and consider any representations made. In the case of the Chief Constable, it must consult the Scottish Ministers. A senior officer called on to retire in this way must retire from the date set by the SPA, or an earlier date agreed between them and the SPA.

25. Section 15 makes provision for constables to be engaged in service outwith the Police Service on temporary service, with the consent of the Chief Constable. The Scottish Ministers can, by regulations, prescribe types of service as “temporary service”, and make whatever further provision they consider appropriate. Constables on temporary service continue to hold the office of constable, but are not entitled to carry out the functions, or have the powers and privileges of, a constable, except in certain circumstances. Following such a period of temporary service, constables are entitled to return to service in the Police Service at the rank they held previously. Their time spent on temporary service is treated as time served as a constable of the Police Service for pay purposes. These are only applicable if the constable does not become eligible for a pension, allowance or gratuity by virtue of regulations made under the Police Pensions Act 1976 or section 1 of the Police (Overseas Service) Act 1945 during the period of temporary service. Constables can be promoted during their time on temporary service, in which case they would return to the Police Service at the promoted rank and are treated as having served in that rank from the time of promotion for pay purposes. Although this provision largely repeats the current arrangements for temporary service it seeks to make it easier for officers to serve outwith the Police Service.

26. Section 16 allows officers from the rest of the UK and the Crown Dependencies to carry out temporary service as officers in the Police Service, provided they take the oath (section 10). Such individuals are under the direction and control of the Chief Constable, and have all the powers, privileges and functions of a constable in Scotland. This is a new provision to facilitate the inward secondment of officers from outwith Scotland for short term postings.

Chief Constable

27. Section 17 makes it clear that the Chief Constable is responsible, and must account to the SPA, for the policing of Scotland. The Chief Constable has the following responsibilities:

- Direction and control of the Police Service;
- The day to day administration of the Police Service and the allocation and deployment of resources received from the SPA;
- Involvement in the preparation of the strategic police plan, annual police plans and SPA’s annual report;
- Seeking to secure continuous improvement in the policing of Scotland;
- Designation of local commanders and ensuring that adequate arrangements are in place for the policing of each local authority area; and
- To provide the SPA with information about the Police Service, policing and the state of crime.

28. When directing constables, police cadets and police staff, the Chief Constable must comply with any lawful instruction given by the appropriate prosecutor in relation to the investigation of offences, the Lord Advocate under section 12 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the Lord Justice General or the sheriff principal for the area concerned. He or she must also seek to ensure that Scotland’s policing is carried out with due regard to the policing principles set out at section 32 and the recommendations made or guidance issued by the SPA on Scotland’s policing, and in accordance with the strategic police priorities, any strategic police plan approved under section 34, and the most recent annual police plan published under section 35. Any recommendations or guidance made by the SPA must not be inconsistent with the strategic police priorities, the latest approved strategic police plan, the relevant annual police plan and any guidance or instructions issued to the Chief Constable by the Lord Advocate or a procurator fiscal in relation to the investigation or reporting of offences. This section largely brings together the current responsibilities of Chief Constables, updated to reflect the establishment of the Police Service and the new planning and reporting regime established in this Bill. It also makes clear that the Chief Constable is accountable to the SPA for the policing of Scotland.

29. Section 18 provides that the Chief Constable can delegate any of his or her functions to any other constable. He or she is however still responsible for the performance of those functions and remains able to perform them. The SPA is required to designate a deputy chief constable to perform the Chief Constable’s functions if that office is vacant or if he or she is unable to perform their duties due to absence, illness or suspension. If the offices of chief constable and deputy chief constable are vacant or the holders are unable to perform their duties due to absence, illness or suspension, the SPA must designate an assistant chief constable to perform the Chief Constable’s functions. Only one deputy chief constable or assistant chief constable can be designated to take on the functions of the Chief Constable at any particular time. This provision does not affect any restriction on delegation of the Chief Constable’s functions contained in any other enactment.

Functions of Constables

30. Sections 19 to 23 set out the functions, jurisdiction and duties of constables, including command and control. Section 19 sets out that constables will have all of the functions conferred on them by this or any other enactment or by rule of law, and all the powers and privileges of a constable throughout Scotland. It also provides that senior officers and local commanders also have all of the additional functions conferred on them by this or any other enactment or by rule of law. Section 20 sets out constables’ general duties. These are largely a restatement of the duties placed on constables under the 1967 Act, restated and reframed to better reflect the role of modern policing. When taking lawful measures to bring offenders to justice, a constable must take every precaution to ensure that a person charged with an offence is not unreasonably or unnecessarily detained in custody.

31. Section 21 makes clear that constables are subject to the direction and control of the Chief Constable in relation to the performance of their duties, as are police staff and police cadets (who may also be dismissed by the Chief Constable). A constable must carry out lawful orders and punctually and promptly perform all of the duties which fall to him or her.

32. Section 22 updates two offences committed by constables: absence from duty without reasonable excuse or neglect or violation of duty (this also applies to police custody and security officers). Section 23 provides for the offence of failing to return any relevant item requested to the SPA without reasonable excuse or the SPA’s permission. An offence of failing to return any item on ceasing to be a constable, without reasonable excuse or the SPA’s permission, is also provided. Section 23 also creates a power for a Sheriff or Justice of the Peace to grant a warrant for the search and removal of any relevant items. A relevant item is anything issued to a constable for the carrying out of the constable’s functions, e.g. police uniform. The penalty for the offences of being absent from duty and failure to return equipment is imprisonment for a period not exceeding 60 days or a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale. The offence of neglect or violation of duty is subject to a maximum sentence of 5 years imprisonment or to a fine or to both if tried on indictment, or on summary conviction to imprisonment for a maximum term of 12 months or to a fine at the statutory maximum or both. This offence was only subject to summary proceedings under the 1967 Act.
Liability for Unlawful Conduct

33. Section 24 provides for liability for unlawful conduct by constables in line with the provisions currently included in the 1967 Act. This is needed because police officers are office holders, not employees, and the usual liability arrangements whereby employers are liable for unlawful acts on the part of their employees do not apply. Specifically it provides that the Chief Constable will be liable for any unlawful conduct in the carrying out of their functions by (a) a constable under his or her direction and control or (b) a member of an international joint investigation team who is not a constable or member of SPA staff or police staff. The SPA must pay any damages or expenses awarded against the Chief Constable (or the person carrying out his or her functions if the office of Chief Constable is vacant) in any proceedings under this section, any expenses incurred by the Chief Constable and any sum required in relation to the settlement of any claim against the Chief Constable which has or might have given rise to such proceedings. The SPA can, if and to the extent that it thinks fit, pay any damages or expenses awarded against a constable in relation to unlawful conduct by them, any expenses incurred by them, and any sum required in connection with the settlement of any claim which has or may have given rise to such proceedings.

Police Cadets

34. Section 25 allows the Chief Constable to appoint police cadets to undergo training with a view to becoming constables. Such cadets are to be treated as employees of the SPA as they are not attested officers under section 10 of the Bill and do not have the powers of a constable. They are however under the direction and control of the Chief Constable and are subject to regulations made under section 49 in relation to their terms and conditions of service in line with the provisions in the 1967 Act.

Police Staff

35. Sections 26 and 27 of this Chapter make provision for police staff. Section 26 provides the SPA with a power to appoint people to assist constables in carrying out police functions. The Chief Constable has power to make such appointments on behalf of the SPA. Such people can be employed by the SPA or provided to the SPA under contract with a third party. Under section 27 police staff may be employed on terms and conditions determined by the SPA and the SPA may pay or make arrangements for contributing to and paying pensions of police staff.

Police Custody and Security Officers

36. Sections 28-30 and Schedule 2 set out the arrangements for police custody and security officers and for their certification, and put in place penalties for any person who knowingly provides false or misleading information in relation to certification. These provisions replicate those in the 1967 Act relating to police custody and security officers.

37. Under section 28 the Chief Constable can certify a member of police staff to be authorised as a police custody and security officer. By virtue of section 29(1), the Chief Constable can only do so if he or she is satisfied that the member of police staff is a fit and proper person to perform those functions and they have received suitable training to do so. The Chief Constable can suspend or revoke a certificate if it appears to him or her that the officer is not fit and proper, otherwise the certificate continues until the specified date. The powers and duties of police custody and security officers are as set out in Schedule 2, as introduced by section 28(3), and any other enactment or rule of law. They must be readily identifiable as such officers. Section 30 makes it an offence for anyone to provide information enabling themselves or any other individual to be certified as a police custody and security officer if they know that or are reckless as to whether the information is false or misleading. The maximum sentence for anyone guilty of such an offence is a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.

CHAPTER 3 – FORENSIC SERVICES

38. This Chapter places a duty on the SPA to provide forensic services.

CHAPTER 4 – PRINCIPLES, PRIORITIES, OBJECTIVES AND PLANS

39. Chapter 4 sets out the policing principles and new arrangements for setting priorities, objectives and planning. Section 32 sets out the policing principles. The first principle, set out in section 32(a), is that the main purpose of policing is to improve the safety and well-being of persons, localities and communities in Scotland. Section 32(b) states that the Police Service, working with others as appropriate, should seek to achieve that purpose by carrying out its functions in a way that (i) engages with, and is accessible to, local communities and (ii) promotes measures to prevent crime, harm and disorder.

40. Section 33 allows the Scottish Ministers to determine strategic priorities for the SPA in relation to Scotland’s policing or to the carrying out of the SPA’s functions. Sections 33(3) and 33(4) provide, respectively, that, before doing so, the Scottish Ministers must consult the SPA, persons whom they consider represent local authorities and any other persons they consider appropriate; and that they must have regard to the policing principles when determining strategic priorities. The Scottish Ministers are required to publish the strategic police priorities.

41. Section 34 obliges the SPA to prepare a strategic police plan setting out the main objectives for the SPA and for Scotland’s policing. That plan must be approved by the Scottish Ministers. It must: explain why each objective has been selected; describe what the SPA thinks it or the Police Service should do in order to achieve them; where reasonably practicable identify the outcomes against which they can be measured; and include any other material relating to the SPA or Police Service considered appropriate.

42. Sections 34(3) and 34(4) set out the process for consulting on the draft plan, and list those who must be consulted on it (local authorities, HMICS and any others the SPA considers likely to have an interest in the plan). The SPA must invite consultees to respond within a set period and must have regard to comments received. Once that process has been completed, the draft plan must be submitted to Ministers for approval. Once it has been approved, it must be published and laid before the Scottish Parliament. The plan must be reviewed at least once every 3 years or where there has been a significant revision to the strategic police priorities. The modified plan following that review should follow the same process of consultation, approval and publication as the original.
43. Section 35 obliges the SPA to prepare an annual police plan. The plan is to set out the proposed arrangements for the carrying out of both the SPA’s functions and the policing of Scotland in each year and how the arrangements are expected to contribute towards the achievement of the main objectives as set out in the strategic police plan. The annual plan must be published before the start of the year to which it relates and laid before the Scottish Parliament.

44. Section 36 requires the Chief Constable to participate in planning processes by placing an obligation on the SPA to involve the Chief Constable in preparing the strategic police plan, and each annual police plan. It also places a requirement on the Chief Constable to provide the SPA with whatever assistance it may reasonably require in that regard.

45. Section 37 specifies that, in carrying out their respective functions in relation to the formulation and publication of the strategic police plan and each annual police plan, the SPA and Chief Constable must have regard to the policing principles; must have regard to, and ensure that the plan is consistent with, the strategic police priorities; and ensure the annual plan is consistent with the most recently approved strategic police plan.

CHAPTER 5 - BEST VALUE

46. Section 38 places a statutory duty on the SPA and the Chief Constable to make arrangements which secure best value for the SPA and Police Service respectively. This replaces the current duty of best value on police authorities and joint boards under Section 1 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 and places a duty on the Chief Constable for the first time. Best value is defined as meaning a continuous improvement in the performance of their respective functions. Section 39 provides that, in carrying out their duties in regard to best value, they must have regard to: (a) any relevant guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers; and (b) anything regarded as proper arrangements for the purposes of securing best value. Relevant guidance is defined as meaning guidance on carrying out the duties in sections 38(1) and 38(2), including, in particular, guidance on how to make, and what is to be included in, the arrangements to secure best value, and guidance as to how to implement the duty to make such arrangements. Before issuing such guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult the SPA, the Chief Constable and anyone else they consider appropriate. Where there is conflict between (a) and (b), the SPA and Chief Constable should have regard only to (a).

47. In making arrangements to secure best value, the SPA and Chief Constable are required to balance the quality of carrying out their functions, the cost of doing so, and the cost to persons of any service provided by the SPA or Chief Constable on a wholly or partly chargeable basis. In maintaining that balance, they must have regard to efficiency, effectiveness, economy and the need to meet equal opportunities requirements (as set out in Section L2 of Part 2 of Schedule 5 to the Scotland Act 1998 (c.46)). Both the SPA and the Chief Constable are to discharge their duties in a way which contributes to the achievement of sustainable development. When measuring the improvement of the performance of their functions, regard should be taken of the extent to which the outcomes of that performance have improved.
CHAPTER 6 – ANNUAL REPORTS, ACCOUNTS, AUDIT AND EXAMINATION

48. This Chapter sets out new arrangements for reporting on and examining policing matters. Section 40 obliges the SPA to prepare, with the involvement of the Chief Constable, an annual report relating to the carrying out of its functions and policing as soon as practicable after the end of the reporting year. It must contain an assessment of the SPA’s and Police Service’s performance in (a) achieving the main objectives set out in the most recently approved strategic police plan, and (b) implementing the arrangements set out in the annual police plan. It may also include any other matters relating to the SPA’s functions and policing that the SPA considers appropriate. The SPA must publish the annual police report, provide a copy to Ministers and lay a copy before the Scottish Parliament.

49. The Chapter also makes provision for the preparation and submission of accounts and arrangements for audit. Section 41 obliges the SPA to keep proper accounts and records in relation to the accounts, and to prepare a statement of accounts as soon as practicable after the end of the year ending 31 March. It also obliges the Chief Constable to provide whatever assistance or information the SPA requires for these purposes. The form and content of that statement of accounts is to be set by the Scottish Ministers. The SPA must send a copy of the statement of accounts to the Scottish Ministers, who must in turn lay it before the Scottish Parliament, and under section 42 to the Auditor General for auditing.

50. Sections 43 to 44 deal with examinations by the Auditor General outwith the annual audit of the SPA’s statement of accounts. Section 43 provides that the Auditor General may, at any time, initiate an examination into the economy, efficiency, and effectiveness of the Police Service, and the arrangements made by the Chief Constable to secure best value for the Police Service (section 38(2)). It is for the Auditor General personally to initiate such an examination and to decide who is to carry it out, although he or she must take into account any proposals made by the Scottish Parliament. The examiner appointed by the Auditor General may consider the appropriateness of any criteria used to assess the use of resources available to the Police Service but cannot question the merits of the Police Service’s policy objectives. The examiner - if the Auditor General themselves is not carrying out the examination - must report to the Auditor General, who may report to the Scottish Parliament and SPA. The results can be published. Section 23A and 24 of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 apply to any examination under this section, as they apply to examinations in relation to economy, efficiency and effectiveness generally. Section 43 makes it clear that section 23 of that Act includes, in relation to the SPA, a reference to examinations into the arrangements made by the SPA under section 38(1).

CHAPTER 7 – LOCAL POLICING

51. This Chapter sets out the arrangements for local policing, including the new relationship between the Police Service and each local authority. Under section 45 the Chief Constable is under a duty to ensure that there are adequate arrangements in place for policing within each local authority area. The Chief Constable is required to designate a constable as local commander for each local authority area, although one local commander can cover more than one local authority area.
52. Section 46 requires local commanders to involve local authorities in setting priorities and objectives for the carrying out of police functions in the local authority area. The local commander is required to provide the local authority with any reports that it requests on the carrying out of police functions in its area; statistical information on police complaints in its area; and any other information about the policing of its area that the local authority might reasonably require. Section 46 also enables the local authority to monitor and provide feedback, including recommendations for improvement, to the local commander on the policing of the local area. Under section 47 the local commander is placed under a statutory duty to participate in community planning. This replaces the existing statutory duty on the Chief Constable.

53. Section 48 of the Bill requires the local commander to submit a local police plan to the local authority for its approval. When preparing the plan, the local commander must have regard to the strategic police plan and consult others as appropriate. Once it is approved by the local authority, the local commander must publish the plan in a form and manner specified by the SPA. The local commander must review, prepare and submit for approval a replacement plan at least once every 3 years, following the same process as for the initial plan. The plan can be modified at any time if the local commander and local authority agree to do so, following the same procedure for preparation, approval and publication. The plan must set out:

- the main priorities and objectives for policing the local authority area (and, where reasonably practicable, the outcomes by reference to which achievement of the priorities and objectives can be measured);
- the reasons for selecting the priorities and objectives;
- the proposed arrangements for policing the local authority area including how those proposals will meet the stated priorities and objectives;
- how the priorities, objectives and arrangements for policing will help deliver any other relevant local outcomes identified through community planning; and
- any other information linked to policing the local area that the local commander thinks relevant.

CHAPTER 8 – GOVERNANCE AND ADMINISTRATION OF POLICE

54. This Chapter gives the Scottish Ministers powers to make regulations for the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables and police cadets. It then sets out in more detail the areas in which regulations can be made. These provisions are necessary as police officers are office holders and not employees. Their terms and conditions of service are therefore largely set in secondary legislation rather than through a contract of employment governed by employment law. Although cadets are not police officers they are appointed with a view to becoming officers. Their terms and conditions are therefore broadly equivalent and are provided for in a similar way (through legislation). These provisions largely replicate the regulation making powers in the 1967 Act but have been re-ordered and provide more detail than that Act does on the areas that regulations may cover.

55. Section 49 sets out that the Scottish Ministers must make regulations covering the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables and police cadets. Sections 50 – 54 set out in more detail what these regulations may cover. Section 50 provides that regulations may be made for appointment and promotions, including the eligibility and procedure for appointment and for promotion; periods of service on probation; the efficiency and effectiveness of constables and cadets; restrictions on their private lives or business interests; and resignation and retirement. Regulations may provide for appointing senior officers (i.e. at the rank of assistant chief constable or above) for fixed terms, but cannot provide for fixed term appointment to any lower rank.

56. Section 51 provides that regulations may be made which relate to conditions of service including: pay, allowances and expenses; public holidays and leave; the supply and return of police clothing and equipment; and, the remuneration of special constables. Such regulations may make retrospective provision about pay and allowances but cannot retrospectively reduce any pay or allowance payable to or in respect of any person. Under section 52, regulations may be made in relation to officer duties, including provisions about what duties are or are not to be carried out by constables or police cadets, hours of duty and the treatment as police duty of time spent attending meetings of police representative bodies.

57. Section 53 provides that regulations must establish or provide for the establishment of procedures for handling unsatisfactory performance or behaviour. The regulations can set out standards of performance and behaviour which, if breached, might be treated as misconduct or unsatisfactory performance, as well as any other circumstances in which a constable’s behaviour or performance may be treated in this way. Regulations may permit constables to be suspended from duty pending an investigation into alleged misconduct (and when suspended a constable is not permitted to carry out any police functions). The regulations may also provide for how misconduct or unsatisfactory behaviour or performance are to be dealt with, including (but not limited to) admonition, suspension, dismissal or demotion in rank, and permit an officer to be suspended from duty whilst an allegation of misconduct is being considered. Functions may be conferred on the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner in relation to misconduct and unsatisfactory performance. Where a senior officer’s performance has been unsatisfactory or that person is found to have been engaged in misconduct, the regulations must provide that it is for the SPA to determine the sanction.

58. Section 54 provides that the regulations may also make provision for the compilation and retention of personal records about constables and police cadets and the taking of, retention, use and destruction of fingerprints and samples from such officers.

59. Under section 55, the Scottish Ministers must, before making regulations under section 49, consult, share a draft with, and consider representations from: the Police Federation for Scotland; any bodies representing senior officers; any bodies representing superintendents; the Chief Constable; the SPA: and others as they see fit. When making regulations about any matter contained in Section 61(1) of the Police Act 1996 (which deals with the areas to be considered by the Police Negotiating Board for the UK (PNB)) the draft must also be shared with the PNB.

60. Section 56 allows for regulations made under section 49 to provide for delegation of functions to the Scottish Ministers, the SPA, the Chief Constable, a local commander, the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner or any other person and to authorise or allow any persons to delegate functions.
CHAPTER 9 – POLICE APPEALS TRIBUNALS

61. This Chapter makes provision for the continuation of the Police Appeals Tribunal (the tribunal), describing its role in disciplinary cases where an officer has been dismissed or demoted in rank and the processes of review or appeal set out in regulations made using powers under Section 49 have been exhausted. This Chapter largely replicates the provisions in the 1967 Act although they have been re-ordered and updated to provide appropriate independence.

62. Section 57 gives a constable a right of appeal to a tribunal against dismissal or demotion in rank following the conclusion of misconduct or unsatisfactory behaviour or performance proceedings. Schedule 3 makes further provision about these tribunals, including that the Scottish Ministers can make rules relating to appeals. It provides that the tribunal must consist of three members (one of whom is to act as the chairing member) qualified to practice law in Scotland for 5 years and selected by the Lord President of the Court of Session. The Lord President must establish and maintain a panel of persons from whom these members will be appointed. The SPA must meet all the expenses of the appeal including the tribunal members’ remuneration, except the appellant’s expenses; however the tribunal has the power to direct the SPA to meet these costs too. The Scottish Ministers can make further rules and provision about the appeals procedure including the appeal notices, the identity of the respondent and holding private hearings.

63. Section 58 provides that a tribunal must, before considering the appeal, consider any written or oral representations made by either the person bringing the disciplinary action to bear (the respondent) or the constable who is appealing it (the appellant). Either party can require representations to be made by oral hearing, and either party can elect to be represented by another person. Section 59 provides that the tribunal can either confirm the decision being appealed or replace it with any less severe decision that could have been made by the person who made the decision against which the appeal was made. Any decision overturning the original decision has effect from the date of the original decision. A substituted decision has effect for the purposes of pensionable service as though it was made at the time of the decision against which the appeal was made. The tribunal has the option of treating the substituted decision in the same way for the purposes of pay. The tribunal can deal with any other matters that it deems appropriate to the case including any relevant periods where the constable was suspended from duty.

64. Under section 60, the chairing member of the tribunal has specific powers to require appropriate persons (including the appellant and the respondent) to provide information to aid it in its deliberations by attending and giving oral evidence at hearings or by providing relevant documents or information. It is an offence liable to a fine on summary conviction not exceeding level 2 on the standard scale to (without reasonable excuse); fail to attend hearings as required by citation; refuse or fail to answer any question at the hearing or to give the tribunal any document or information required. Knowingly or recklessly making a false statement in respect of any information required by the tribunal or deliberately altering, suppressing or destroying documents so required also constitutes an offence subject to the same maximum penalty. There is no defence of reasonable excuse in these circumstances. However, these powers do not require information to be disclosed which the person would be entitled to withhold on the grounds of confidentiality in civil proceedings in the Court of Session.
CHAPTER 10 – COMPLAINTS AND INVESTIGATIONS

65. This Chapter amends Part 1, Chapter 2 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 (the 2006 Act) to rename the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland as the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC) and to extend the PIRC’s remit. Section 61 places a number of requirements on the SPA and the Chief Constable in terms of dealing with relevant complaints, whose definition is the same as in 2006 Act. Those requirements are as follows:

- the SPA and Chief Constable must maintain suitable arrangements for the handling of relevant complaints, and must seek the views of others on what those arrangements should be;
- the SPA must keep itself informed about how the Chief Constable is dealing with relevant complaints in order to satisfy itself that those arrangements are suitable; and
- the Chief Constable must provide the SPA with whatever information about relevant complaints it reasonably requires, and must seek to ensure that sufficient information is kept for that purpose.

66. Section 62 renames the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland as the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC).

67. Section 63 inserts section 33A into the 2006 Act, setting out the general functions of the PIRC. The PIRC is required to:

- ensure that the SPA and the Chief Constable make and maintain suitable arrangements for the handling and examination of complaints about police constables and staff and the reconsideration of such complaints as set out in sections 34 to 41 of the 2006 Act (section 33A(1)(a));
- when directed by a prosecutor to do so, investigate any circumstances in which there is an indication that a person serving with the police may have committed a serious criminal offence and the circumstances of any death involving a person serving with the police which that procurator fiscal is required to investigate under section 1 of the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976 (section 33A(1)(b));
- investigate and report on deaths, serious injuries or firearms incidents where constables and police staff are involved (section 33A(1)(c));
- investigate other matters relating to the Police Service or SPA that it considers are in the public interest (section 33A(1)(d)); and
- perform any functions prescribed by regulations in relation to allegations about and complaints against officers relating to their standard of behaviour or performance (section 33A(1)(e)).

68. Sections 64 to 69 insert new sections 41A to 41E into the 2006 Act which describe in more detail the PIRC’s powers, duties and functions. Section 64 inserts new section 41A of the 2006 Act which requires the Commissioner to comply with any lawful instruction given by the prosecutor in relation to investigating and reporting alleged serious criminal offences or fatal accidents involving a person serving with the police. Amendments to the Regulation of
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000 to provide for the investigatory powers which the PIRC will have are set out in paragraph 4 of Schedule 6.

69. Sections 65 and 66 insert new sections 41B and 41C of the 2006 Act which explain further the definition of deaths or serious injuries, incidents involving firearms and other weapons, and other matters in the public interest which the Commissioner may investigate using powers in new sections 33A(1)(c) and (d) of the 2006 Act. Section 41B provides that the “serious incidents” that the PIRC may investigate include deaths and serious injuries when the person was detained by and had contact with the police and that contact may have caused or contributed to their death or injury, and incidents where a person serving with the police has used a firearm or other prescribed weapon. The Scottish Ministers may by regulation prescribe other circumstances which constitute a “serious incident”. Such regulations would be subject to negative parliamentary procedure. Provision is made in subsection (2) about matters which are not serious incidents. Section 41C outlines that the PIRC must investigate matters in relation to the SPA, Police Service or a person serving with the police which the PIRC believes to be in the public interest. However, the PIRC cannot use these powers to investigate cases which have been the subject of a relevant complaint or which are being or have been (or, in respect of serious incidents, are capable of being) investigated using the Commissioner’s other powers referred to in new Section 33A(1), or a matter which is being, or has been, investigated by someone else under section 1 of the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976.

70. Section 67 inserts section 41D which gives the Scottish Ministers powers to make, by regulations, further provisions about PIRC investigations under sections 33A(1)(c) or (d) of the 2006 Act. The Scottish Ministers must consult the PIRC, the SPA, the Chief Constable and any other relevant people before making such regulations, which are subject to affirmative parliamentary procedure. The regulations may make provision about: the form, procedure, restrictions and time limits for investigations; the circumstances in which an investigation may be discontinued; requirements on the SPA and Chief Constable to refer matters to the Commissioner and to assist and co-operate with investigations; the disclosure of information; and the delegation of functions to PIRC.

71. Section 68 inserts new section 41E of the 2006 Act which requires the Commissioner to provide a report following an investigation under paragraph (c) or (d) of new section 33A(1). That report should not enable the identity of any person other than the SPA and Police Service to be revealed unless the PIRC considers that it is necessary to do so on the grounds of public interest. The PIRC must publish the report and provide a copy of it to the person who requested the investigation, the SPA and any other person the PIRC considers appropriate.

72. Section 69 inserts a new section 41F into the 2006 Act allowing the Court of Session to investigate whether an individual who is obstructing the PIRC in carrying out an investigation should be treated as though they are a person who has committed a contempt of court in relation to the Court of Session.

73. Section 70 inserts a new section 42A into the 2006 Act to put in place arrangements for the handling of complaints against the PIRC and to seek the views of others as to what those arrangements should be.
CHAPTER 11 – HER MAJESTY’S INSPECTORS OF CONSTABULARY IN SCOTLAND

74. This Chapter describes the role, powers and functions of Her Majesty’s inspectors of constabulary in Scotland (HMICS), which will retain its existing powers and take on an additional power to examine the delivery of best value. Section 71 continues the existence of HMICS. Her Majesty can by Order in Council appoint and dismiss such number of inspectors as determined by the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Ministers may designate one of those inspectors as the chief inspector of constabulary, and set levels of remuneration or allowances. The Scottish Ministers may appoint and set pay levels and terms and conditions for assistant inspectors under section 72. Subsection (2) provides that constables engaged on service as assistant inspectors are under the direction and control of the inspectors of constabulary. Subsection (3) provides that Scottish Ministers are liable in reparation in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of a constable engaged as an assistant inspector of constabulary in relation to the exercise of that constable’s functions. Under section 73, inspectors can appoint staff officers to assist them, and set their terms and conditions of employment. Subsection (2) provides that a constable engaged on service as a staff officer is under the direction and control of the inspectors of constabulary. Subsection (3) provides that the inspectors are liable in reparation in respect of any unlawful conduct on the part of a constable engaged as an inspector of constabulary in relation to the exercise of the constable’s functions.

75. Section 74 provides that the Scottish Ministers may direct the inspectors of constabulary to make inquiries about any matter relating to the SPA or Police Service, as well as to carry out annual inspections - or any other intervals Ministers think fit - and report to them on the state, efficiency and effectiveness of the SPA and the Police Service, and the arrangements made by the SPA and the Chief Constable under their duty to secure best value.

76. Under section 75 the inspectors of constabulary are given general powers to do anything considered necessary or expedient in carrying out their functions, and may delegate these functions to any assistant inspector or staff officer, although they will still retain responsibility for the performance of those functions and remain able to perform them. Section 76 provides that the SPA and Chief Constable must assist and cooperate with HMICS.

77. Section 77 provides that as soon as possible after reporting to the Scottish Ministers, HMICS must give a copy of the report to the SPA and, where the report relates to the Police Service, to the Chief Constable, and publish it. The Scottish Ministers must then lay the report before the Scottish Parliament. The SPA and the Chief Constable must have regard to such reports and take such measures as they see fit in response. Under section 78, where such a report states that HMICS does not consider that the SPA or Police Service are efficient or effective, or will cease to be efficient or effective unless remedial action is taken, or that they are not achieving best value, the Scottish Ministers can direct the SPA to take remedial measures. The SPA must comply with any such direction.

78. HMICS is required under section 79 to prepare and submit an annual report to the Scottish Ministers and the SPA, to publish it and lay it before parliament.
CHAPTER 12 – CO-OPERATION, EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION, ETC

79. This Chapter describes the new arrangements for interaction and co-operation between the SPA and Police Service, and the inspectors of constabulary, the Auditor General and the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner.

80. Section 80 provides that the SPA and Chief Constable can make arrangements under which the SPA and Police Service provide assistance to each other. This includes the ability for their respective staff or constables to provide services to each other.

81. Section 81 places a duty on the SPA to comply with any requirement made by the Scottish Ministers to provide reports, statistics or other information to them on any matter connected with the SPA, Police Service and the state of crime. The Chief Constable must do the same in relation to the Police Service for any request made by the SPA. The Chief Constable can however refer to the Scottish Ministers any such requirement made by the SPA if he or she considers that compliance would or could prejudice the carrying out of a police operation or the prosecution of offenders. If this happens, the requirement will only have effect if it is confirmed by the Scottish Ministers. The Chief Constable can also be required by the Lord Justice General or a sheriff principal (in relation to policing in the sheriff principal’s jurisdiction) to provide such reports relating to policing as may reasonably be required.

82. Section 81(8) places a duty on the Chief Constable to try to ensure that sufficient information about the state of crime is kept to enable compliance with any such request. Section 81(9) also places a duty on the clerk of any court with criminal jurisdiction to provide any information they have to the Chief Constable to enable him or her to meet that obligation.

83. Section 82 places a duty on the inspectors of constabulary, Auditor General and Police Investigations and Review Commissioner to work together in order to improve the carrying out of their functions. In particular, arrangements must be made to ensure the effective exchange of information between them about the SPA and Police Service and to prevent any unnecessary duplication of effort. This requirement does not apply where a matter requires urgent action. In complying with this duty, the inspectors and the PIRC must comply with any direction or guidance given by the Scottish Ministers. Such directions or guidance may relate to all functions of the inspectors and the PIRC, or only to specified functions, and may be varied or revoked by the Scottish Ministers. The Auditor General and the PIRC are not prevented from disclosing information to each other in relation to the carrying out of their functions by any restriction on disclosure of information.

CHAPTER 13 – PROVISION OF GOODS AND SERVICES

84. This Chapter sets out new arrangements to allow the SPA to charge for certain services provided by the Police Service or the SPA. Under section 83, the SPA can authorise the Chief Constable to make arrangements, at the request of any person, to provide and charge for police services. Subsection (9) defines police services as services in connection with the maintenance of order or the protection of persons or property from harm which are provided on or in relation to land owned or occupied by the person who requests the services. An authorisation may be of a general or specific nature and may in particular set out a scale of charges (subsection (2)) and the charges may only cover the cost of providing the services (subsection (7)). This section also allows the Scottish Ministers to issue a code about charging for police services that the SPA must comply with. The Police Service has to ensure all money received from charging is paid to the SPA. No charge may be made in respect of the carrying out of police functions otherwise than in accordance with an authorisation under this section, unless it is authorised by another enactment or rule of law (subsection (8)). Under subsection (7) the SPA is only allowed to charge for the cost of the service provided although subsection (3) makes clear this can include any indirect costs, for example management and administration costs, as well as the direct cost of providing the service.

85. Under section 84 the SPA may provide goods and services to any other public body or office holder. It may also provide such goods and services of a type described in an order made by the Scottish Ministers to other persons described in such an order (subsection (1)). The SPA may, with the consent of the Chief Constable, make similar arrangements for the provision of goods and services by the Police Service (subsection (3)). Subsection (5) allows the SPA to charge for any goods and services it provides, or which it authorises the Chief Constable to provide, including any costs it incurs, or expects to incur, indirectly as a result of the provision of those goods and services, although these charges must only cover the cost of providing the goods and services. Subsection (7)(a) prevents the SPA from charging for forensic services it provides to the Lord Advocate and procurators fiscal. Subsection (7)(b) prevents charges from exceeding the cost of the goods or services provided although subsection (6) makes clear this can include any indirect costs, for example management and administration costs, as well as the direct cost of providing the service. Goods and services may be provided by the SPA for such purposes as it considers appropriate and consistent with the proper carrying out of its functions (subsection (2)) and by the Police Service for such purposes as the SPA considers to be appropriate and consistent with the proper carrying out of police functions. The goods and services which may be provided include, but are not limited to:

- information technology systems and equipment;
- the inspection, testing and maintenance or repair of vehicles; and
- any other type of corporate support service provided by the SPA or Police Service in connection with the carrying out of SPA or police functions.

CHAPTER 14 – GRANTS

86. This Chapter provides for the payment of grants and replaces the current arrangement whereby funding of the police is shared between the Scottish Ministers and local authorities. Section 85 allows the Scottish Ministers to make grants to the SPA. Such grants may be subject to conditions. Section 86 allows grants or financial assistance to other persons for the purposes of providing services to or otherwise assisting or supporting the SPA or the Police Service in the carrying out of the SPA’s functions or police functions. A grant or financial assistance may only be given under this section where it would be necessary or expedient for promoting the efficiency or effectiveness of, or securing best value for, the SPA or the Police Service, and is subject to any conditions specified by the Scottish Ministers.

CHAPTER 15 - OFFENCES

87. This Chapter re-enacts in a modern form the specific offences in the 1967 Act in relation to impeding a member of the police from carrying out their duties. Section 87 makes it an offence to assault or impede a person serving with the Police Service, a member of a police force mentioned in subsection (4) who is executing a warrant or acting under powers conferred on that person in Scotland by any enactment, or a member of an international joint investigation team. Section 88 provides for an offence of aiding escape from or removing a person from the custody of a constable of the Police Service, a police custody and security officer, a constable of a police force mentioned in section 87(4) who is executing a warrant or acting under powers conferred on that person in Scotland by any enactment, or a member of an international joint investigation team. Both offences have penalties of imprisonment for up to twelve months and/or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum on summary conviction, which is unchanged from the 1967 Act.

88. Section 89 makes it an offence for someone who is not a police constable to impersonate a constable with intent to deceive or to do anything calculated to suggest that they are a constable. It is also an offence to possess articles of police clothing without the permission of the SPA (subsection (2)). A person has a defence to a charge under section 89(2) if he or she can prove that the articles of clothing were obtained lawfully and were in the person’s possession for a lawful purpose. Subsection (4) makes it an offence for a person who is not a constable to wear, without the permission of the SPA, an article of police uniform which so nearly resembles that of a constable as to be calculated to deceive. The penalty on summary conviction of an offence under this section is imprisonment of up to three months or a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale which is unchanged from the 1967 Act.

CHAPTER 16 – INDEPENDENT CUSTODY VISITING

89. This Chapter places the arrangements for independent custody visiting in Scotland on a statutory footing for the first time, ensuring that it is compliant with the United Nations Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture (OPCAT). Section 90 sets out the purpose of the provisions in Chapter 16, namely pursuance of the objective of OPCAT. Section 91 places a duty on the SPA to make arrangements to ensure that independent custody visitors can visit detainees and access information relevant to and monitor their treatment and conditions of detention. Subsection (2) provides that it must do that by providing for the appointment of independent custody visitors (ICVs), who are independent of both the SPA and Chief Constable, by authorising ICVs to do anything they require to enable them to visit detainees and monitor their treatment and conditions of detention, and by providing for the reporting of visits. Subsection (3) sets out specific action which ICVs may be authorised to take, including accessing any place of detention without notice, examining records relating to the detention of people there, meeting them and such other persons as they consider relevant to discuss the treatment and conditions of detainees, and inspecting those conditions. Access to a detainee can only be refused if an officer of inspector rank or above considers grounds for refusal of access contained in a Ministerial determination have been satisfied and any other procedural requirements set by the SPA have been met (subsection (4)). The SPA is required to keep these arrangements under review and to prepare and publish any reports required by the Scottish Ministers.

90. Ministers may issue guidance about independent custody visiting, to which the SPA, independent custody visitors and police must have regard. Before issuing such guidance, or making a determination about when access to detainees should be denied, the Scottish Ministers must consult with the SPA, the Chief Constable, ICVs or a representative body, and any others they consider appropriate. Such guidance or determinations must be laid before the Scottish Parliament.

91. Under section 92 the SPA must also make arrangements to allow members of the Subcommittee on the Prevention of Torture and other Cruel, Inhumane or Degrading Treatment or punishment (SPT) established under OPCAT to visit detainees, to access information relevant to their detention and to monitor their treatment and the conditions they are held in. It also describes the arrangements that may be made (subsection (3)) and provides that access may only be refused where the Scottish Ministers have notified the SPA that there are urgent and compelling grounds of public safety, natural disaster or serious disorder that temporarily prevent the carrying out of a visit (subsection (4)). The SPA must keep the arrangements under review and it and its staff and the Police Service and police staff must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about SPT visits (subsections 5 and 6).

92. Section 93 sets out the definitions of the terms used in Chapter 16.

CHAPTER 17 – MISCELLANEOUS AND GENERAL

93. This Chapter makes a number of miscellaneous provisions.

94. Section 94 provides for the dissolution of the Police Advisory Board for Scotland. Section 95 introduces Schedule 4 which sets out the arrangements for the transfer of officers and staff working in the 8 police forces, SPSA and SCDEA to the new Police Service of Scotland and for the transfer of the assets and liabilities currently held by the joint boards and unitary authorities and SPSA. It also makes a number of transitional and transitory provisions to assist in the transition to the new service. Paragraph 1 defines terms used in this schedule, and paragraph 2 sets out that the appointed day is the day the new Police Service is established or such other day as Ministers may appoint. There is no parliamentary procedure attached to this.

95. Paragraphs 3 – 9 cover arrangements for the transfer of police officers. Paragraph 3 makes clear that any person who is a constable immediately before the appointed day continues to hold the office of constable after that day, is treated as though he has made the oath under section 10 of the Bill and is to be treated as though he had been appointed in accordance with the provision in the Bill as a constable of the Police Service. Officers transfer at their current rank, except where they are on temporary promotion in which case they transfer at their substantive rank although the temporary promotion remains in place. Any specific contractual terms, for example fixed term contracts, continue to have effect as if they were made by the Police Service.

96. Paragraph 4 sets out the arrangements that are to apply to senior officers who are not appointed to positions in the Police Service but who exercise their right to transfer. Paragraph 5 makes clear that any constable of a police force transfers to serve as a constable of the Police Service, and paragraph 6 covers the arrangements for constables serving in SCDEA or SPSA immediately before the appointed day. Paragraph 7 sets out the arrangements for police officers who are on temporary service outwith their force immediately before the transfer date. Where the temporary service is to another force, the office transfer to the Police Service. Where it is to another organisation the temporary service continues and the officer has a right to return to the Police Service at the end of the temporary service. Paragraph 8 makes clear that where Paragraph 9 provides safeguards for officers who transfer to the new service. An officer must not be assigned to duties which would necessitate the officer moving home to a place outwith what was the area of the police force that has ceased to exist. Where a constable is engaged on service outwith their home force area on the date of transfer this safeguard only applies on his return to his “home” force area. The safeguard ceases to apply where the constable is or becomes a senior officer, is promoted to a higher rank or the officer consents to the lifting of the limitation.

Paragraphs 10 – 15 cover the arrangements for the transfer of staff and others. Under paragraph 10, a police employee is defined as a person employed by a joint board as a civilian, a member of staff at SPSA and an employee of a local authority who is included in a staff transfer scheme made under paragraph 11. It further applies that a police employee’s contract of employment has effect on or after the appointed day as if originally made between the employee and the SPA. It is for the SPA to determine whether the individual is to be regarded as a member of police staff under section 26 who is under the direction and control of the Chief Constable or as a member of the SPA’s staff under paragraph 7 of schedule 1. Paragraph 10 also makes a number of provisions concerning employees who are subject to a staff transfer order. Sub-paragraphs (4) and (5) establish that contract rights and obligations transfer from the former employer to the SPA on the transfer date. Sub-paragraph (6) provides that employed staff may object in advance of their contract being transferred to the SPA, in which case their contract is terminated at the end of the day before the intended transfer day. This termination will not be treated as dismissal of a person for the purposes of legislation. Sub-paragraph (8) provides that an employee can only terminate their contract of employment by virtue of the staff transfer if they can show that the change of employer was both significant and detrimental.

Paragraph 11 makes provision for a staff transfer scheme for staff employed in the unitary police authorities who are to be treated as police employees for the purposes of paragraph 10. Paragraph 12 covers staff who are appointed under a contract for services. Paragraph 13 covers police cadets and paragraph 14 makes additional provision for Police Custody and Security Officers who will have transferred to the SPA under paragraph 10. Paragraph 15 makes clear that any individuals who are an inspector of constabulary, an assistant inspector of constabulary or a staff officer to the inspector of constabulary on the date sections 71- 73 come into force remain in post.

Paragraphs 16 – 18 cover property transfers. Paragraph 16 allows Ministers to make a police property transfer scheme. This is a scheme making provision for the transfer to the SPA of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of Ministers, a local authority, a joint police board or the SPSA. Paragraph 17 allows Ministers to make a local authority transfer scheme to make provision for the transfer to a local authority of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of a joint board. Paragraph 18 makes general provisions in relation to schemes made under paragraphs 16 and 17.

Sections 96 and 97 provide a list of definitions of terms used in the Bill. Section 98 deals with the issue of Crown application, providing in particular that the Crown may not be made criminally liable for a contravention of a provision of the Bill (but that the Court of Session may make a declarator in respect of any such unlawful act or omission) and that the power of compulsory purchase in section 4(2)(d) does not apply to Crown land.

SECTION 99 – THE SCOTTISH FIRE AND RESCUE SERVICE

101. Section 99 introduces a new section 1A into the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 (the 2005 Act) to provide for the establishment of a new statutory body corporate, the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS) to replace the current 2 unitary authorities and 6 joint fire and rescue boards. SFRS has the functions conferred by the 2005 Act, as amended by the Bill, and additional functions conferred on it by this, or any other, enactment.

102. Section 99 also inserts Schedule 1A into the 2005 Act, which sets out the SFRS’s governance and finance arrangements, general powers and accounting requirements. Paragraph 1 provides that SFRS is established as independent from the Crown. Paragraphs 2 – 7 provide that SFRS will consist of between 7 and 11 members, although that number can be varied through secondary legislation by the Scottish Ministers which would be subject to negative procedure in the Scottish Parliament. Members of SFRS will be appointed by the Scottish Ministers on the basis of relevant skills and expertise to govern the fire and rescue service. The Scottish Government intends that the appointments will be regulated under the Public Appointments Commissioner for Scotland: Code of Practice for Ministerial Appointments to Public Bodies in Scotland (“the Code”). The Scottish Ministers will be responsible for appointing the Chair, and members of SFRS must appoint a member to act as Deputy Chair (paragraph 5). The schedule sets out the length of term members and the Chair can serve (paragraph 4); that Ministers can remove members in certain circumstances (paragraph 6); and provides a list of people disqualified from membership of SFRS (paragraph 3).

103. Paragraphs 8 – 9 make provision for the SFRS to employ the Chief Officer, fire-fighters and other staff. The first Chief Officer is to be appointed by the Scottish Ministers with subsequent appointments made by SFRS subject to the agreement of the Scottish Ministers. Paragraphs 10 – 11 set out the rules regarding the establishment of committees and procedure of SFRS. Paragraph 12 sets out SFRS’s general powers and allows SFRS to do anything it considers appropriate for carrying out its functions. This includes specific power to: enter into contracts; borrow money; acquire and dispose of land and other property; accept gifts of money and gifts or loans of other property; form or promote companies; and compulsorily purchase land. The power to borrow money and to purchase land compulsorily is subject to Ministerial consent, and in relation to borrowing money the Scottish Ministers can set any conditions they consider appropriate, and their agreement can be given in relation to a particular case or class of case. Paragraph 13 makes provision for the delegation of functions to the Chief Officer and other SFRS staff and any committees established by SFRS although the SFRS will still retain responsibility for the performance of those functions and remain able to perform them. Paragraph 14 requires the Scottish Ministers’ approval for the location of the administrative headquarters used by SFRS board members and the Chief Officer. Paragraph 15 allows the Scottish Ministers to provide grants to SFRS. Paragraph 16 makes provision for the preparation and submission of accounts and arrangements for audit. It places a duty on SFRS to keep proper accounts and records in relation to the accounts, and to prepare a statement of accounts for that year as soon as possible after the end of the year ending 31 March. The Scottish Ministers have a power to direct the form and content of that statement of accounts, as well as the accounting methods and principles to be applied. SFRS must send a copy of the statement of accounts to the Scottish Ministers, who must in turn lay it before the Scottish Parliament, and to the Auditor General for auditing.

SECTIONS 100-108 – FUNCTIONS

104. Sections 100 – 108 amend Chapters 2 and 3 of Part 2 of the 2005 Act and Chapter 2 of Part 3 of that Act, replacing references in that Act to “relevant authority” (unitary authority or joint fire and rescue boards) with references to the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. Functions and responsibilities in the amended sections which were previously with joint boards and unitary authorities will now rest with SFRS. This includes the following areas: promotion of fire safety; fire safety enforcement; responding to fires, road traffic accidents and other emergencies and eventualities; provision of other services; provision of centres for education and training; and charging. In relation to the promotion of fire safety, this will enable SFRS to run national publicity campaigns, which are currently done by the Scottish Ministers. Section 101 also transfers responsibility for the enforcement of fire safety in certain Crown and other premises from the Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities to SFRS and amends legislation so that where the enforcing authority is SFRS a matter may be referred by either party for determination of a dispute by the Chief Inspector.

SECTIONS 109-119 – FURTHER AMENDMENTS OF 2005 ACT

105. Sections 109 and 110 amend sections 35 and 36 of the 2005 Act - power to obtain assistance in carrying out functions and arrangements for carrying out functions by others - replacing references in those sections with “relevant authority” (unitary authority or joint fire and rescue board) to the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. The sections also provide that functions can only be delegated and assistance provided in this way if the Chief Officer considers that the persons from whom assistance will be provided or to whom the functions will be delegated have the relevant knowledge, skills and experience to do so. In addition, under section 36, the function of extinguishing fires may only be delegated to fire-fighters.

106. Section 111 inserts new sections 39 A – C into the 2005 Act to place a statutory duty on SFRS to make arrangements which secure best value. This replaces the current duty of best value on fire and rescue authorities and joint boards by Section 1 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. Best value is defined as meaning a continuous improvement in the performance of SFRS’s functions. In carrying out its duties in relation to best value, it must have regard to: (a) any relevant guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers; and (b) anything regarded as proper arrangements for the purposes of securing best value. Relevant guidance is defined as meaning guidance on carrying out the duties imposed in new section 39A, including, in particular, guidance on how to make and what is to be included in the arrangements to secure best value, and guidance as to how to implement the duty to make such arrangements. Before issuing such guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult SFRS and anyone else they consider appropriate. Where there is conflict between (a) and (b), SFRS must have regard only to (a).

107. In making arrangements to secure best value, SFRS is required to balance the quality of the performance of its functions, the cost of doing so, and the cost to persons of any service provided by SFRS on a wholly or partly chargeable basis. In maintaining that balance, SFRS must have regard to efficiency, effectiveness, economy and the need to meet equal opportunities requirements (within the meaning of Section L2 of Part 2 of Schedule 5 to the Scotland Act 1998
(c. 46)). SFRS is to discharge its duties in a way which contributes to the achievement of sustainable development. When measuring the improvement of the performance of SFRS’s functions, regard should be taken of the extent to which the outcomes of that performance have improved. New section 39C confers a power on the Auditor General to examine the arrangements made by SFRS to secure best value.

108. Section 112 amends the 2005 Act to insert new sections 41A, 41B and 41C which set out new arrangements for planning. Section 112 inserts section 41A which places a duty on SFRS to prepare a strategic plan in consultation with specified persons and having regard to the fire framework (see section 40 of the 2005 Act), to which SFRS must have regard in carrying out its functions (by virtue of section 41C). That plan must be submitted to the Scottish Ministers for approval (with or without modifications). The plan must set out how SFRS proposes to carry out its functions during a 3 year planning period, set out outcomes against which performance can be measured, and include such other information as SFRS considers appropriate (including information relating to other years).

109. Section 41A sets out the process for consulting on the plan, and lists those who must be consulted on it. It also provides that SFRS must use best endeavours to secure the Scottish Ministers’ approval to the plan before the start of the planning period. The date for the start of the first planning period will be set by the Scottish Ministers by Order. Once the plan has been approved, it must be published and laid before the Scottish Parliament. Section 41B provides for review of the strategic plan and that any new plan prepared following that review must follow the same process of consultation, approval and publication as the original. SFRS may review and prepare a new strategic plan at any time, but must prepare a new plan for each new planning period (i.e. to take effect on the expiry of the previous planning period). Therefore a review will happen at least once every 3 years. Each new plan must cover a 3 year period which, for plans prepared as a result of a review part way through the previous planning period, will commence 8 weeks after the plan is submitted to the Scottish Ministers for approval, and for plans prepared in anticipation of the expiry of the previous planning period will commence the day after that period expires.

110. Section 113 amends the 2005 Act to insert new sections 41D to 41K which set out the arrangements for local fire and rescue services, including the new relationship between the SFRS and each local authority. New section 41D sets out the role of SFRS in ensuring that adequate arrangements are in place for the provision of fire and rescue services within each local authority area and for the involvement of the local authority in determining priorities and objectives for SFRS locally.

111. New section 41E makes clear that SFRS has responsibility for the preparation of a local fire and rescue plan for each local authority area. By virtue of new section 41J, the function is to be carried out by a Local Senior Officer, designated by the Chief Officer, with delegated responsibility for the local planning functions in sections 41E to 41H. The plan must set out: the main priorities and objectives for fire and rescue services in the local authority area along with the reasons for selecting these and outcomes against which these will be measured; how it will help deliver any other relevant local outcomes identified through community planning; and, the proposed arrangements for carrying out fire and rescue functions in the local authority area including how those proposals will meet the stated objectives. The local fire and rescue plan can also include any other matters linked to fire and rescue services in the local area that the SFRS thinks fit. When preparing the plan, SFRS must have regard to the fire framework (see section 40 of the 2005 Act) and SFRS’s strategic plan and consult others as appropriate. Once it is agreed with the local authority, SFRS must publish it.

112. New section 41G requires SFRS to review the local fire and rescue plan every 3 years, where there has been significant revision to the fire framework, and where a new strategic plan is approved. The plan must be revised if there has been no revised plan published within the past 3 years, and may be revised following any other review. Under new section 41F the local plan may also be reviewed at any time. Any review and revision of the plan must follow the same procedure for preparation, approval and publication as the initial plan. New section 41H makes clear that SFRS must provide the local authority with any information or reports reasonably requested by the local authority about the carrying out of SFRS’s functions in that local authority area.

113. New section 41J requires the Chief Officer to designate a local senior officer for each local authority area (they may cover more than one local authority area) and provides for certain statutory functions to be delegated to the local senior officer, including the production of a local fire and rescue plan, and participation in community planning under section 16 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 although the SFRS will still retain responsibility for the performance of those functions and remain able to perform them.

114. Under new section 41K a local authority can monitor SFRS’s compliance with the local fire and rescue plan for its area and delivery of local fire and rescue services in the area, and make representations or observations to SFRS and offer advice and recommendations for improvement.

115. Section 114 amends the 2005 Act to insert new section 41L which requires SFRS to prepare and publish an annual report as soon as possible after the end of each reporting year. The report must contain an assessment of SFRS’s performance during the reporting year in acting in accordance with the fire framework and in achieving the outcomes set out in the strategic plan, and any other information SFRS considers appropriate.

116. Section 115 amends the 2005 Act to insert new section 41M, requiring SFRS to provide to the Scottish Ministers any reports, statistics and other information they request in relation to its functions. Subsection (2) makes clear that the information may include, for example, statistics relating to fire deaths. The information must be provided when and how specified by the Scottish Ministers.

117. Section 116 amends the 2005 Act to insert new section 42A to allow the Scottish Ministers to give the SFRS a general or specific direction in relation to carrying out its functions. The Scottish Ministers must publish any directions made and SFRS is required to comply with any such directions. A direction cannot be made in relation to adherence to the fire and rescue framework as the existing enforcement arrangements would apply in those circumstances.

118. Section 117 inserts sections 43A to 43G into the 2005 Act. It describes the role, powers and functions of the Inspectors of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. New section 43A allows Her Majesty to appoint a Chief Inspector of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service, and such number of other Inspectors as determined by the Scottish Ministers. Section 43A(5) makes clear that the individual who is the Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities on the date the provision comes into force is to be the first Chief Inspector of the SFRS. The same applies to any Inspectors or Assistant Inspectors in post on that date. It is for the Scottish Ministers to set levels of pay and the terms and conditions for such office holders. The Scottish Ministers can also appoint and set pay levels and terms and conditions for Assistant Inspectors. In addition, Ministers have a power to authorise an Inspector to carry out functions of the Chief Inspector in the event of a temporary vacancy in that office, or if the Chief Inspector is temporarily unable to carry out those functions.

119. Under new section 43B an Inspector has powers to inquire into the state and efficiency of SFRS, the manner in which SFRS is carrying out its functions and whether, in doing so, it is complying with its duty to make arrangements which secure best value. The Inspectors may independently initiate such inquiries, and must do so if so directed by the Scottish Ministers. SFRS must cooperate with the Inspectors’ inquiries and, in particular, must provide any information or documents relating to its functions that the Inspector may require, and must grant them access to SFRS premises or equipment as required. The power of entry is not available in relation to private dwellings, and Inspectors do not have the power to enter premises by force.

120. Under new sections 43C and 43D, the Chief Inspector is required to produce a report of any inquiry completed under section 43B and must in all cases give the report to SFRS. If the inquiry is under section 43B(1) the Chief Inspector must give the Scottish Ministers such information in relation to the inquiry as they may request, and, where it relates to the state and efficiency of SFRS or its compliance with its duties in relation to best value, the Chief Inspector must give the report of the inquiry to the Scottish Ministers and lay it before the Scottish Parliament. If the inquiry relates to SFRS’s carrying out of its functions, the Chief Inspector has discretion to provide a copy of the report to the Scottish Ministers. If the inquiry has been directed by the Scottish Ministers, the Chief Inspector must give them a report of the inquiry and any other information relating to the inquiry that the Scottish Ministers request. If the report relates to the state and efficiency of SFRS or its duty to make arrangements which secure best value, it must also be laid before the Scottish Parliament. New section 43E makes clear that SFRS must have regard to any reports it receives from the Chief Inspector when carrying out its functions, and must take such measures as it considers appropriate following receipt of the report, e.g. to implement any recommendations made by the Chief Inspector.

121. New section 43F puts in place a requirement for the Chief Inspector of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to prepare a plan setting out priority areas for Inquiry by the Inspectors and how such inquiries will be carried out. He or she is required to keep the plan under review and may revise it periodically. The Chief Inspector is required to consult on, and publish, the plan and any revised plan. New section 43G requires the Inspectors and the Auditor General to co-operate and co-ordinate activity in relation to their functions relating to SFRS.

122. Section 118 introduces Schedule 5, which makes provision about the transfer of staff, property, rights, liabilities and obligations to SFRS and to local authorities where appropriate. Paragraph 1 defines terms used in the Schedule, including defining the “appointed day” as the day the Scottish Ministers may appoint. There is no parliamentary procedure attached to this.
123. Paragraphs 2-4 cover the arrangements for the transfer of staff and others. Paragraph 2 covers the transfer of joint board staff. It provides that a joint board employee’s contract of employment has effect on or after the appointed day as if originally made between the employee and the SFRS. Paragraph 2 also makes a number of provisions concerning employees who are subject to a staff transfer order. Sub-paragraph (4) provides that employed staff may object in advance of their contract being transferred to the SPA, in which case their contract is terminated at the end of the day before the intended transfer day. This termination will not be treated as dismissal of a person for the purposes of legislation. Sub-paragraph (6) provides that an employee can only terminate their contract of employment by virtue of the staff transfer if they can show that the change of employer was both significant and detrimental.

124. Paragraph 3 makes provision for a staff transfer scheme for staff employed in the unitary fire and rescue authorities or who are members of staff of the Scottish Ministers. This is because only those employees who are carrying out fire and rescue functions should transfer to the SFRS. It is necessary therefore to identify those employees who are to transfer in a transfer scheme. Paragraph 4 makes further provisions in relation to transfers under paragraph 3. It provides that the contract of employment for the person who is transferring has effect on or after the appointed day as if originally made between the employee and the SFRS. Sub-paragraph (5) provides that employed staff may object in advance of their contract being transferred to the SPA, in which case their contract is terminated at the end of the day before the intended transfer day. This termination will not be treated as dismissal of a person for the purposes of legislation. Sub-paragraph (7) provides that an employee can only terminate their contract of employment by virtue of the staff transfer if they can show that the change of employer was both significant and detrimental.

125. Paragraphs 5 – 8 cover property transfers. Paragraph 5 allows the Scottish Ministers to make an SFRS property transfer scheme. This is a scheme making provision for the transfer to the SFRS of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of Ministers, a local authority or a joint fire and rescue board. Paragraph 6 allows the Scottish Ministers to make a local authority transfer scheme to make provision for the transfer to a local authority of property, rights, liabilities and obligations of a joint board. Paragraphs 7 and 8 make general provisions in relation to schemes made under paragraphs 5 and 6.

126. Section 119 defines the meaning of “the 2005 Act” as the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005.

127. Part 3 of the Bill makes a number of general provisions common to Parts 1 and 2 of the Bill. Section 120 sets out the arrangement for subordinate legislation under Parts 1 and 2. Sections 121 and 122 allow Scottish Ministers to make ancillary and transitional provisions by order to give full effect to the Bill. Section 123 inserts schedules 6 and 7 which, taken together, make minor and consequential amendments and repeals to other legislation as a consequence of the provisions of this Act. The majority of the changes fall into the following categories:

- changing references in legislation to the current 8 police forces or Chief Constables to refer to the Police Service of Scotland and its Chief Constable;
- changing references to Police Authorities and Joint Police Boards to refer to the SPA;
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

- removing references to the SPSA and SCDEA;
- changing references to fire authorities and joint fire boards to refer to the SFRS; and
- making changes to legislation relevant to public bodies, to reflect the establishment of the SFRS and the changes made to the PIRC, Inspectors of Constabulary and Inspectors of the SFRS. (The equivalent changes in respect of the SPA are made in Schedule 1.)

128. A number of more significant changes are highlighted below:

- Paragraph 1 makes a minor amendment to sections 32A and 42 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967. These provisions, which relate to grant expenditure on national security and an offence of causing disaffection, cannot be repealed and re-enacted in this Bill as they are reserved to the UK Government;
- Paragraph 4 makes amendments to the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000 to ensure the authorisation of intrusive surveillance works effectively in a single service and also to give the PIRC the necessary surveillance powers it requires to carry out covert investigations if required;
- Paragraph 22 makes a number of amendments to Chapter 2 of the Police Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 to reflect the single service and the SPA. The amendments also insert provisions allowing the PIRC to appoint staff officers and to designate any member of staff to take charge of, or assist with, investigations. Two order making powers are included in the amendments: one allowing the Scottish Ministers to apply any provision of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act to PIRC staff; and the other allowing the Scottish Ministers to apply any enactment relating to investigation of offences by constables to investigations carried out by PIRC’s designated staff;
- Paragraph 30 amends the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 to provide that “constable” and other expressions relating to the police in Scottish legislation have the meanings given in the Bill; and
- Paragraph 56 makes a number of minor amendments to the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 to replace references to “a relevant authority” with the SFRS.

129. Section 124 deals with commencement of the provisions in the Bill and section 125 provides that the short title of the Act is the Police and Fire (Reform) Scotland Act 2012.
FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

130. Reform of the police and the fire and rescue services in Scotland is essential to keep our communities safer and stronger. The Scottish Government is determined to protect and improve local police and local fire and rescue services in the face of reductions in public finance, by streamlining and modernising services. The main policy objectives of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill are to create a single police service and a single fire and rescue service in order to deliver the policy aims set out below:

- To protect and improve local services despite financial cuts; by stopping duplication of support services eight times over and not cutting front line services;
- To create more equal access to specialist support and national capacity – like murder investigation teams, firearms teams or flood rescue – where and when they are needed; and
- To strengthen the connection between services and communities, by creating a new formal relationship with each of the 32 local authorities, involving many more locally elected members and better integrating with community planning partnerships.

131. The Bill establishes i) the Scottish Police Authority, which will oversee the Police Service of Scotland, and ii) a single Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS). It provides that the functions, staff, resources, assets and liabilities of the current police and fire and rescue services will be transferred to the new statutory Scottish Police Authority and SFRS respectively.

132. The purpose of this financial memorandum is to set out:

- the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill and reforms will give rise, as well as the likely savings;
- the best estimates of the timescales over which the costs and savings are expected to arise; and
- an indication of the margins of uncertainty in these estimates.

133. The financial memorandum has been developed using the best available evidence, as summarised in the police and the fire and rescue Outline Business Cases (OBCs) (described in more detail in the Methodology section below). Additional detail is provided where further relevant information has since become available. The memorandum does not provide a blueprint for how reforms should necessarily be carried out. Therefore, the precise profile of costs and savings may change as the reform and transition programmes progress.

134. Part One (I) of the memorandum sets out the best estimates of costs and savings for policing. Section I(i) outlines the cost implications that may arise directly from the provisions of the Bill. Section I(ii) provides estimates for broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of police reform (i.e. the operational costs associated with running the new service). Section I(iii) outlines the estimated savings.

135. Part Two (II) sets out the same information for the costs of reforming the fire and rescue services. Section II(i) outlines the cost implications that may arise directly from the provisions of the Bill. Section II(ii) provides estimates for broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of fire and rescue service reform (i.e. the operational costs associated with running the new service). Section II(iii) outlines the estimated savings.

136. Many of the costs have been identified as falling within an initial five-year period. However, as the efficiency savings will continue to recur for some time, they have been profiled over a 15-year period.

METHODOLOGY

137. The estimated costs and savings in this financial memorandum are based on information on current levels of costs, information from relevant stakeholders, and the OBCs for police and for fire and rescue services.

The Outline Business Cases

138. The OBCs were published in September 2011 and are available at:
http://scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/09/15153130/0

139. The analysis set out in the police OBC was compiled with input from a range of stakeholders. A team of police officers from across the forces produced an initial assessment of the potential costs and savings from police reform in December 2010. This amounted to the most complete set of information ever produced on the costs of policing in Scotland, and was considered by Directors of Finance from the eight forces. Savings estimates were benchmarked against other public sector reform initiatives.

140. The initial assessment was refined by the team in a second phase of work, together with experts in policing functions from across the forces, into an optimal operating model for policing. External consultants were used to validate assumptions and assist in the assessment of cost, and the report was published in March 2011.

141. The results informed the subsequent development, by the Scottish Government, of the police OBC. In line with HM Treasury guidance, the OBC provided a consistent assessment of the relative costs and benefits of 3 options for reform: a single police service, a 3 force model, and 8 forces with enhanced national delivery. A draft of the OBC was circulated for comment to policing stakeholders in July 2011. The comments received informed further development of the OBC before it was published in September 2011, at the time of the announcement of plans to legislate for the creation of a single police service and a single fire and rescue service.

142. The OBC for fire and rescue services was developed: with input from a short-life external stakeholder group chaired by Steven Torrie, Her Majesty’s Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities; from information provided by the current fire and rescue services; and from information obtained from a series of expert stakeholder workshops. Scottish Government officials visited each of the existing fire and rescue services to obtain a comprehensive picture.
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012 of: their partners and customers; the main outcomes and outputs across their functions; the main processes and activities that need to be undertaken to deliver outcomes; their resource levels; their command, leadership and accountability structures; the major assets used (estate, vehicles, equipment, offices); and, their key information and technology requirements. Information gathered from these visits, together with the outputs of the expert stakeholder workshops, was used to construct the current operating model. The workshops also helped define the optimum delivery models for each key function performed by the fire and rescue services. A draft of the OBC was shared with the Ministerial Advisory Group and stakeholders for comment in July 2011. The methodology and figures in the OBC were then reviewed, refined and improved as part of an iterative process, including as a result of discussions with the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland (CFOAS).

143. As previously described, the financial memorandum summarises the best available evidence and analysis and is largely based on that used in the OBCs to support decisions on the structure of future services in September 2011. It does not provide a plan or blueprint for the future delivery of the services and it is not intended to be used to set future budgets. As such, the actual costs and savings achieved may differ in detail as transition progresses, and indeed as decisions are taken by the new services. The profiling of figures (in tables 1A, 1B, 1C, 2.1, 2.2, 2.3, 3.1, 3.2 and 3.3 below) assumes that 1 April 2013 is the earliest possible date that the new services could come into being. The precise profile of figures will depend on the actual date that this occurs.

Cost and Efficiency Figures

144. The financial memorandum provides ranges for cost figures where there is a margin of uncertainty in the best estimates, in line with Standing Order rule 9.3.2.

145. The cost figures in the OBCs were adjusted for optimism bias in accordance with HM Treasury Green Book guidance. Adjusting for optimism bias is the recommended method of mitigating the risk that the costs of major projects are underestimated, particularly in the early stages of development. The likely level of optimism bias was assessed individually for each element of cost, informed by evidence of the costs of other UK public sector reforms and advice from government analysts and members of the current police forces who were part of the Sustainable Policing Project Team (which looked at the implications of reforms). The adjustments for optimism bias ranged between zero and 100%, depending on the margin of uncertainty. For most elements of cost an adjustment of 53% was adopted. The exceptions to this included police programme/project management costs (which were increased by 10%) and police information and communication technology (ICT) costs (which were increased by 100%).

146. Where appropriate, ranges have been provided for cost estimates which were not calculated as part of the OBC process. In some cases, the estimates were increased by 53% to account for optimism bias. In other instances, ranges have been based on relevant guidance documents. No adjustments were made where there was a limited margin of uncertainty and, in these cases, a single estimate is shown.

147. Efficiency estimates have been decreased by 30% to provide a range which accounts for potential margins of uncertainty.
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012.

148. Best estimates of costs and efficiencies for police and fire reform are provided in tables 2.1 and 3.1 respectively. This includes the financial implications of the Bill provisions, the broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated reform process, and estimated savings. Tables 2.2 and 3.2 provide this same information adjusted for potential optimism bias and margins of uncertainty.

149. As previously stated, tables 2.1 and 3.1 give the best estimates of the financial implications of police and fire reform. However tables 2.3 and 3.3 present an alternate way of looking at the figures, by assuming that some costs and savings may potentially have been incurred by means other than establishing single services, for example, by enhancing national delivery and increasing collaboration. It is difficult to predict exactly which costs and savings will be attributable to the single service structures and those which may have been achieved by taking other measures, particularly given that much of the current work, costs incurred and savings anticipate the establishment of a single service. Therefore, for consistency, figures in tables 2.3 and 3.3 were calculated by looking at the difference between the costs and savings estimates for an 8 service model with enhanced national delivery (police) and increased collaboration (fire and rescue) and those associated with a single service as appraised in the OBCs.

150. It should be noted that the costs and savings of reforms arise over different timeframes for the police and fire and rescue services. In the main, the total costs and savings have been assessed in both cases over a 15-year period. However, for fire and rescue service reform there are some minimal costs prior to the start of the 15-year period which have also been included. For police, year 1 is 2011-12 and the total costs and savings are calculated to 31 March 2026. For the fire and rescue services year 1 is 2013-14 and the total costs and savings (including those in year 0) are calculated to March 2028. This approach reflects, and is consistent with, the timeframes which were considered in the two OBCs.

SUMMARY OF FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS

151. Table 1A sets out a summary of the financial implications of police reform. Table 1B sets out a summary of the financial implications from fire reform. These tables include the costs that arise from the Bill provisions, the broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated reform processes, and estimated savings. All figures are at 2011-12 prices. Table 1C sets out a summary of the total cost and savings from reform, across both the police and fire and rescue services.

*As already noted above in the methodology section, the costs and savings of reforms arise over different timeframes for the police and fire and rescue services. PART ONE (I): ESTABLISHING THE SCOTTISH POLICE AUTHORITY AND THE POLICE SERVICE OF SCOTLAND

Background

152. Police forces across Scotland continue to perform strongly, with recorded crime at a 35-year low, improved detection rates, and high levels of public satisfaction. In the face of significant cuts to public sector budgets, the Scottish Government wishes to protect this level of performance as far as possible. It is not possible to meet this challenge in the current structure and organisation of policing in Scotland. The decision to move to a single police service provides for long-term sustainability. It provides the best way to deliver savings - through reduced duplication, rationalised and simplified support functions and standardised business processes - while protecting front-line services to communities.

Costs and Efficiencies: Overview of Sections I(i)-I(iii)

153. This part of the financial memorandum sets out the estimated costs and savings associated with Part 1 of the Bill. Whilst the Bill provides for structural change, the existing functions of the police will continue and many of the costs associated with providing the police service will not change as a result of the Bill. However, there are areas of potential additional costs. As such, this part of the financial memorandum considers new costs which are directly associated with the provisions of the Bill, estimates the broader costs which may result as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of police reform, and outlines the expected efficiencies.

154. Part I(i) outlines estimates of the cost implications arising from Bill provisions. These include:

- Scottish Administration Grant Support;
- Appointing the Scottish Police Authority Members, Senior Officer and Chief Constable;
- Remuneration of Scottish Police Authority Members, Senior Officer and Chief Constable;
- Establishing the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner;
- Scrutiny;
- Independent Custody Visiting;
- Police Appeals Tribunals;
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

- Forensic Services;
- VAT;
- Pensions;
- Property Transfer Schemes;
- Rewards;
- Costs to Local Authorities; and
- Costs to Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses.

155. Part I(ii) outlines the broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of police reform. This includes:

- Shadow Leadership;
- Programme and Project Management;
- Technology Costs;
- Training;
- Relocation/Excess Travel;
- Voluntary Redundancy Payments;
- Pay Harmonisation;
- Carbon Reduction Commitment;
- Other;
- Costs to Local Authorities; and
- Costs to Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses.

156. Part I(iii) outlines the estimated savings, under the categories of:

- Officers;
- Staff;
- Vehicles;
- Supplies and Equipment;
- Estate Management;
- Transfer of Functions and Outsourcing;
- Enforcing Existing Service Provision Arrangements;
- Road Traffic Efficiency; and
- Annual Audit.
Part I(i) Cost implications from Bill provisions: Costs to the Scottish Government

Scottish Administration Grant Support

157. Total police revenue funding in 2011-12 is £1.370m. About two thirds of this funding is provided directly by the Scottish Government. As well as providing police grant to joint boards and unitary authorities, it includes funding for police pensions, the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA), and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA); the Gartcosh Crime Campus; the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland; the Scottish Safety Camera Programme; the commitment to 1,000 additional officers; police information and communication technology (ICT); counter-terrorism; and Airwave and Police national databases.

158. The remaining third is contributed by local authorities who provide funding to the joint police boards or, in the case of unitary police authorities, direct to the police service, alongside the Scottish Government police grant.

159. Funding for police capital is currently contained as part of the General Capital Grant allocations within the local government settlement. Police boards and unitary authorities also receive loan charge support, which is provided by the Scottish Government for an agreed level of borrowing undertaken by the boards prior to 2004-05. Since 2004-05 the boards’ capital requirements have been funded by grant rather than by borrowing consents, and so the Scottish Government provides no support for borrowing undertaken by the boards after 1 April 2004.

160. Following enactment of the Bill, the police service will receive all its funding – both revenue and capital – from the Scottish Consolidated Fund through the annual Budget Bill, rather than via the local government settlement and the current separate Scottish Government funding streams. This will include the actual costs of police officer pensions (£211m in 2011-12). Funding will be paid by the Scottish Ministers direct to the Scottish Police Authority.

161. Currently, individual local authorities can provide additional funding to supplement policing activity in their area: this facility will remain.

Appointing the Scottish Police Authority Members, Senior Officer and Chief Constable

162. The Bill provides for some flexibility in the number of members of the Scottish Police Authority. It will be for the Scottish Police Authority to determine its staffing requirements. However it is likely that it will require a Senior Officer. The police service will require a Chief Constable. Filling these positions will incur recruitment costs (advertising and selection), and it is estimated that costs for the initial appointment round would amount to approximately £30k-£40k.

163. It is estimated that subsequent appointment rounds would cost approximately £10k. However, there will be savings from no longer having to appoint SPSA board members (which are approximately £10k per round). As such, the changes are expected to be cost-neutral overall in respect of subsequent appointment rounds.
Remuneration of the Scottish Police Authority, Senior Officer and Chief Constable

164. Estimates of the ongoing costs of the Scottish Police Authority members and Chair have been based on the published Public Sector Pay Policy for Senior Appointments. Assuming an 11-member board (10 members plus a Chair) annual fees are estimated to be between £168k - £316k (which includes Employers’ National Insurance Contributions (ERNIC)). The best estimate (based on the mid-point of this range) is £242k.

165. There will be an estimated annual saving of £82k on the cost of remunerating the SPSA board.

166. No decision has been made in relation to remuneration of any Senior Officer. However, based on the Public Sector Pay Policy for Senior Appointments, a reasonable estimate of employment costs, including pensions and ERNIC, would be between £114k and £164k per annum. The best estimate (based on the mid-point of this range) is £139k.

167. The costs and savings associated with the Chief Constable and other senior posts in the new service have been included in the calculations of efficiencies that were undertaken for the OBC and are outlined below.

Establishing the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner

168. Complaint review work is currently carried out by the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland (PCCS). The budget in 2011-12 for the PCCS was £930k.

169. The Bill confers on the PCCS additional functions to undertake investigations into the most serious complaints, allegations of misconduct or complaints about Chief Officers, and to undertake investigations into other incidents, including those involving deaths and serious injury at the hands of the police. To reflect these additional functions, the PCCS will be renamed the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC). The PIRC will be appointed by the Scottish Ministers. Recruitment costs, based on previous experience, are estimated to be £10k. The changes are expected to be cost-neutral, as the PCCS would have incurred such costs in any case.

170. Estimates of the costs to the PIRC, for undertaking investigations, have been calculated from figures produced by the Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC) which operates in England and Wales. Based on IPCC average costs for the same types of investigations, these costs are estimated to range from £2m - £4m. These costs are already being incurred by the current forces and so there will be a matching efficiency saving for the new service.

171. It is expected that the PCCS will carry out necessary preparatory work to ensure that the PIRC becomes operational at the same time as the single service. The Commissioner will recruit and appoint investigations staff, including a Director of Investigations. Some of these staff will be appointed in advance of the PIRC commencing all of its functions, so that they can work along with the PCCS’s existing staff. The costs of this transitional arrangement are estimated to be about £80k. Taking into account optimism bias, the range is £80k – £122k.
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

172. It is anticipated that the PIRC will be located in offices currently occupied by PCCS in Hamilton. There may be some changes needed to accommodate new staff; these are likely to cost in the region of £50k. Taking into account optimism bias, the range is £50k – £76.5k.

Scrutiny

173. HM Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland (HMICS) is currently responsible for inspecting the current eight Scottish police forces, and will inspect the single police service. HMICS has a budget of £1.1m in 2011-12. It is not anticipated that there will be a need for any additional budget for HMICS. Efficiencies may be achieved in respect of shared backroom functions, and possibly accommodation, with other inspectorates or public bodies - including the PIRC.

Independent Custody Visiting

174. The existing Independent Custody Visiting network in Scotland is administered and largely financed by the eight police boards and authorities. It is estimated that the total cost to boards and authorities in Scotland for provision of independent custody visiting is £196k per annum. In addition to this, the Scottish Government provides an annual grant for administration of independent custody visiting averaging £30k.

175. Currently some of the schemes are not fully resourced: in one police area the scheme is administered by a volunteer. The legislation is not seeking to make significant changes to the operation of the network. Although there may be some increase in costs for required improvement to service delivery, there will also be opportunities to achieve future economies of scale. Overall, it is estimated that the reforms associated with independent custody visiting will be cost-neutral.

Police Appeals Tribunals

176. There will be an additional cost for Police Appeals Tribunals, as the Bill imposes a requirement for there to be three independent members. It is difficult to judge how many days Police Appeals Tribunals will sit. However, based on information from previous years, it is not envisaged that the costs associated with this will be significant.

Forensic Services

177. Under the Bill, forensic services will be a function of the Scottish Police Authority. This arrangement is expected to be cost-neutral because these services are already provided, currently by the SPSA, and funded directly by the Scottish Ministers.

VAT

178. At present, the police forces are able (under section 33 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994) to recover VAT costs incurred. A move to a single service may alter this. Therefore, it has been assumed that a single service may be liable for irrecoverable VAT on all goods, estimated to be around £21.5m per annum (a recurring cost from the fourth year – there is no cost in the first two years, and in the third year it is £21.8m). However, the Scottish Government is currently liaising with HM Revenue and Customs and HM Treasury regarding whether the service could be given section 33 status and therefore be able to recover all VAT incurred. Other options for reducing any VAT liability will continue to be explored in the planning for the new service.
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

Pensions

179. On moving to a single service, police officers will remain in their existing pensions schemes (the Police Pension Scheme 1987 or the New Police Pension Scheme (Scotland) 2007). Secondary legislation will be necessary to amend pension regulations to enable this, facilitated by limited consequential amendments to primary legislation in the Bill. However, no additional pensions costs in respect of police officers will arise as a consequence of reforms.

180. Police support staff will remain in the Local Government Pension Scheme (LGPS) and will remain in the fund they are in at the time the new service comes into being. It is intended that they remain in that fund for the duration of their employment, regardless of whether they change location. There are 11 LGPS pension funds in Scotland. Police support staff are in eight of these. Police support staff appointed after the new service comes into being will join the LGPS pension fund most appropriate to the location of the new headquarters / corporate service base. No significant additional pension costs are anticipated to arise from this.

Property transfer schemes

181. The Bill enables the Scottish Ministers to make provision for payment of compensation in respect of property and rights transferred. Such payments would only be considered in exceptional circumstances and the potential cost, if any, will only be known at the time that any asset transfer scheme is made. Potential stamp duty land tax liabilities may also have to be considered if compensatory payments are made in respect of property transfers.

Rewards

182. The Bill provides the service with a power to pay such sums as it considers fit, by way of reward, to constables (other than the Chief Constable) or indeed to any other person who, in its opinion, has made a substantial contribution to the carrying out of police functions. This is not a new power and, as such, is cost-neutral.

Part I(i)b Cost implications from Bill provisions: Costs to Local Authorities

183. The Bill provides for the service to engage with local authorities and, in particular, to work with local authorities when setting priorities and objectives. Local authorities will also have a role in monitoring the exercise of functions in their areas and in providing relevant feedback. It is difficult to estimate the costs associated with this, particularly given that it is open to individual local authorities to determine the most appropriate local mechanism in each case for performing their role. The Scottish Government has been working with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (CoSLA) on this matter.

184. CoSLA has collected information from local authorities and provided the Scottish Government with an estimate of £3m-£4m for engaging with the new police service and the SFRS, based on costs for elected members, policy support, research and analysis and administrative support. On this basis, it is assumed that the impact of the Bill is largely cost-neutral - as efficiency savings from not having the current police and fire and rescue joint boards and unitary authorities are estimated to equate to this amount. However, there may be efficiencies and less expensive ways of undertaking local engagement and these will continue to be explored.

Part I(i)c Cost implications from Bill provisions: Costs to Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses

Charging for Services

185. Police forces and the SPSA currently can, and do, charge users for various services. Examples include: charging for the policing of major events (such as T in the Park and football matches) and airports; charging for firearms licences; and, charging for the provision of collision reports to insurance companies. The SPSA also charges police forces and criminal justice partner organisations for the development and implementation of certain ICT solutions. In 2010-11 charging for services generated income in the region of £17m for the eight police forces. It is intended that the Bill will clarify the powers of the new service to charge for services. It is not anticipated that either the type of services charged for, or the level of charges, will vary significantly from current charges. Therefore, the overall impact, in terms of cost, is expected to be neutral.

Part I(ii)a Broader Costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of Police Reform: Costs to the Scottish Government 186. The costs detailed in this section are those which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the reform process taken forward in the single police service.

Shadow Leadership

187. Appointments will be made for a new Chief Constable and for other senior officers and police staff to form the new executive team for the single service. This team will be in place before the establishment of the new service, in parallel with the existing leadership of the eight police forces, SPSA and SCDEA. The estimated cost for this is based on a period of six months of additional planning and preparation, and includes estimated salaries for the new Chief Constable, senior officers and staff. This is estimated to be £1.72m. Taking into account optimism bias provides a range of £1.72m - £2.63m.

Programme and project management

188. The delivery of the programme of wider reform will require a dedicated team and an appropriate programme and project structure. One-off programme and project costs have been estimated for a four-year period. It is assumed that the project team includes police officers and police staff. The costs of procuring specialist knowledge and expertise - such as in programme and change management and financial analysis - have been estimated. Project costs also include those associated with stakeholder engagement (external and internal communication to facilitate change), the management of process improvement costs, and due diligence.

189. On this basis, total one-off programme management costs, which occur over the first 4 years, are assessed as £23m. Allowing for rounding of figures, this includes core team costs (£12m), procured expert advice and support (£2.41m), Scottish Government reform staff
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

(£3.27m for both police and fire), due diligence (£400k), and force engagement resources (£4.95m). Adjusted for assessed optimism bias, this provides an estimated range of £23m – £25.3m.

Technology Costs

190. Based on advice from the police service ICT professional lead, a proportion of the initial ICT consolidation and rationalisation to support a single service can be achieved using existing infrastructure and systems.

191. Common infrastructure already exists in some areas, and the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) Business Change Programme already considers current Scotland-wide technology-enabled business change. In addition, it is expected that the ACPOS Business Change Programme and in-force ICT projects will be re-prioritised to focus on the requirements and the business needs of a single service.

192. There is already considerable expenditure on ICT - approximately £15m a year on the ACPOS Business Change Programme and the development of shared national applications for incident management (Command and Control), HR and custody. Additional costs of £12m, spread over years 2 – 4, have been estimated for ICT costs associated with reforms. This includes a one-off capital cost of £1m, in line with expert estimates to consolidate specified current functional systems. A further provision of £11m has been added to cover acceleration of projects and parallel running as appropriate.

193. Precise additional ICT costs are difficult to estimate in advance of decisions on specific requirements. In line with Treasury Green Book guidance, an adjustment for optimism bias of 100% has been made to provide a range of estimated additional cost of £12m - £24m. However, given that there is already a significant programme of ICT convergence within the forces, in practice it is expected that much of this risk will be managed from within existing budgets.

Training

194. There is likely to be a need for training officers and staff to optimise effectiveness, particularly where there are changes to business processes and technology. It is expected that this will be delivered in part through regular refresher training that is routinely scheduled (for example, on firearms, roads policing and public order). The additional training requirement has been estimated at £16.5m (spread over years 3 and 4), which allows for an additional 2 days per annum of training for each officer (at £200 per day) and member of staff (at £100 per day). An adjustment for potential optimism bias results in an estimated cost range of £16.5m - £25.2m.

Relocation / Excess Travel

195. Depending on decisions of the new service, there may be costs associated with making relocation and excess travel payments. An estimate of £2.75m (spread over years 5 – 6) has been made for this based on the assumptions of 0.25% of employees relocating at £10k each, and 0.75% claiming excess travel compensation of £3k each per annum for 4 years from transition (based on force terms and conditions). The range of £2.75m - £4.22m is provided to reflect an adjustment for potential optimism bias.
Voluntary Redundancy Payments

196. Depending on decisions of the new service, it is likely that rationalisation will be required in support functions with resultant voluntary redundancy costs. To account for this, redundancy costs have been estimated based on the actual cost incurred through recent police and SPSA voluntary redundancy programmes. A natural attrition rate of 3% has been assumed, with redundancy required to address the remaining Full-Time Equivalent (FTE) reductions. On this basis, voluntary redundancy costs have been calculated to be in the order of £80.8m (spread over the first 5 years).

Pay Harmonisation

197. The Bill provides for officers and staff to transfer to the new service retaining their current terms and conditions. As such, it will be for the new service to decide and negotiate on any pay harmonisation and other changes to terms and conditions. A range of potential costs have been estimated to account for the fact there may be a cost associated with this. The SPSA experience indicates an increase to the staff paybill of around 1.8% in the first 2 years following implementation of restructuring, due to the uplift of some staff salaries and the short-term protection of other salary levels. It is assumed that the increase to the paybill is reduced by a small amount (0.2%) after the pay protection for those staff “above the line” ceases.

198. The estimate of £2.89m per annum (a recurring cost from year 6– there is no cost for the first 3 years, and in years 4 and 5 costs are estimated as being £3.26m) is based on the SPSA’s experience of harmonising pay and grading across the current 8 services. Given the uncertainties described above, this creates a pay harmonisation range of £0 - £2.89m. Taking a conservative approach, £2.89m has been used as the best estimate for this particular cost.

Carbon Reduction Commitment

199. The new service may participate in Phase 2 of the Carbon Reduction Commitment Energy Efficiency Scheme from 2013-14, based on likely future energy usage. Potential financial costs have not been estimated at this stage, as these cannot be identified until eligibility for, and details of, the simplified scheme are known (expected in late 2012-13); the associated allowance price has been announced by HM Treasury; and the total emissions level of the new service is known.

200. The current allowance price for the first year of Phase 1 is £12 per tonne CO₂, and it is anticipated that this will increase during later phases. Strathclyde Police are the only existing police participants within Phase 1 of the scheme. Their CO₂ level for 2010-11, as recorded in the Environment Agency’s Performance League Table, is 20,515 tonnes CO₂ equating to a cost of £246k per annum.

Other

201. The police estate is complex, and at the time of compiling the OBC there was little available audit information. Whilst the future requirement is uncertain, there is a real opportunity to optimise and rationalise existing assets. Although there are likely to be costs associated with the development of the estate (for example dilapidations, change of use, change of requirement), there are also likely to be benefits from rationalising requirements. Reforms are likely to lead to costs as well as efficiencies and, given these factors, this has been assumed to be cost-neutral over the 15-year period.

202. Some investment will be required to achieve re-branding (for example, badging and livery). However, to most citizens the main brand is assumed to be the “police” brand. As such, it is assumed that, in the main, re-branding will be undertaken on a replacement basis and is therefore cost-neutral. Brand values, and communication of change to ensure public confidence in policing is maintained or enhanced, has been included in project management costs.

203. The transfer of, or exit from, contractual obligations is also assumed to be cost-neutral over the 15-year period.

Part I(ii)b Broader Costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of Police Reform: Costs to Local Authorities

204. In some cases ICT support for police is currently provided by local authorities. The potential for centralising existing systems as a result of the move to a single service will have an impact on this provision. However, it is expected that this will be cost-neutral over the reform period as local authorities continue to utilise existing systems for their own purposes (for example, payroll and pension schemes), while reducing excess capacity and support.

Part I(ii)c Broader Costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of Police Reform: Costs to Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses

Criminal Justice Organisations

205. There are close linkages between police and partner systems, to ensure the effective management of cases throughout the criminal justice system. It is anticipated that there will be some costs associated with changes to ICT systems, resulting from the establishment of a single police service. For example, there may be consequential costs arising from changes to the policing landscape, which make existing geographic references to force areas within ICT systems redundant. Over time it is recognised that there may also be scope to achieve efficiency savings from a reduction in the number of systems currently used by police forces and greater standardisation of practices. These costs and efficiencies are currently unknown and are complex to estimate accurately. Scoping the extent of such changes will be required to provide a precise indication of costs. Indicative figures for these costs have been provided by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (approximately £160k – £180k) and the Scottish Court Service (approximately £50k).

206. There is already significant work on police ICT convergence taking place outwith the reform process. Whilst the timescales for convergence may change due to reform, the costs are likely to have been incurred in any case. In addition, over the 15-year period, there will be benefits for criminal justice organisations from dealing with one police service (and converged ICT systems). It is recognised that there may initially be a number of set up and testing costs, and it may take time to realise the benefits from efficiencies. However, it is expected that overall, costs will be neutral over a 15-year period.
Other

207. Potential implications for Scottish businesses from the reforms have been considered as part of the Business Regulatory Impact Assessment. A number of business organisations and firms were contacted in relation to the potential impacts of police reform. No issues were identified in this respect at this time.

Part I(iii) Estimated Savings

208. Moving to a single service structure will provide for the delivery of savings, such as removing duplication and streamlining processes. This would include rationalisation, management de-layering, benefits from economies of scale, improved asset utilisation and consolidation of resources, assets, training and contracts. The figures set out below are mainly derived from analysis undertaken for the police OBC. The savings listed are long-term recurring savings and have therefore been provided on a per annum basis rather than as a total. All figures are quoted relative to costs actually incurred in 2010-11, as this represents the latest available baseline data. Over the full 15-year period under consideration in the OBCs, the savings substantially outweigh the costs identified in the sections above. On the basis of best estimates, efficiencies start outweighing costs after the fourth year.

Officers

209. Cashable savings relating to officers have been estimated to be £23.6m per annum (from the fifth year). The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £16.6m - £23.6m. This includes an estimate of efficiencies that arise from a reduction to the per capita costs of police officers which primarily comprise changes negotiated on terms and conditions that have already been agreed and reductions in the costs of overtime. These are savings that have been made since the 2010-11 baseline and, whilst not attributable to structure, are included so as to give a full representation of the budgets and how they will change from the baseline. Other cashable efficiencies include savings on local policing due to adoption of a standard span of control ratio and savings on senior force command and executive.

210. Non-cashable efficiencies relating to officers have been valued at £23.3m per annum. The range is estimated to be £16.3m - £23.3m. However, as the OBC assumes that officer numbers will be maintained at 17,234, this is expressed in terms of greater productivity (the opportunity to deliver more with the same resources) rather than cashable efficiency (i.e. fewer officers).

Staff

211. The potential for savings in police staff costs is estimated to be £66m per annum from the fifth year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £46.2m - £66m. The two main components are:

- those efficiencies (rationalisation, process improvement etc) that reduce the FTE requirement for police staff which may result in a cashable efficiency (fewer staff) or greater productivity (the opportunity to deliver more with the same resources); and
- those efficiencies that arise from a reduction to the per capita costs of police staff. These efficiencies relate to a reduction to required overtime and changes to allowances and terms that have already been agreed. These are included as savings that are in the process of being made since the 2010-11 baseline and, whilst not attributable to structure, give a full representation of the budgets and how they will change from the baseline.

Vehicles

212. Savings related to vehicles are estimated to be £702k per annum from the fifth year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £491k - £702k. This relates to the potential reduction in the number and capital cost of vehicles. It does not include potential savings in fleet maintenance and management, which is captured under the Staff and Supplies and Equipment categories.

Supplies and Equipment

213. Savings from supplies and equipment (e.g. for special operations, support services, ACPOS, and the executive team) are estimated at £23.4m per annum from the fifth year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £16.4m - 23.4m. This includes reduction to specific equipment requirements through the rationalisation of functions and reduction in the cost of supplies achieved through the rationalisation of need (for example, the need for training) and procurement.

Estate Management

214. Savings relating to estate are estimated as amounting to £5.3m per annum from the fifth year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £3.71m - £5.3m. They relate only to the rationalisation of managing the estates function, and include areas such as estates management staff and outsourcing cleaning services at a lower overall cost. They do not include savings that might expect to be achieved through the rationalisation of the physical estate.

Transfer of Functions and Outsourcing

215. Savings of £7.21m per annum (from the fifth year) arise from opportunities to transfer responsibility for functions to other bodies (such as traffic wardens) or to outsource the provision of services to a third party at a reduced cost. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £5.05m - £7.21m.

Enforcing Existing Service Provision Arrangements

216. Savings amounting to £250k per annum (from the third year) relate to benefits arising from ensuring existing service provision arrangements are enforced and avoiding the need for policing to provide the service, for example maximising the use of contracted transport. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £175k - £250k.

Road Traffic Efficiency (termed Income Generation in the OBC)

217. Savings amounting to £1.75m (from the third year) have been estimated to arise from standardising procedures and delivering road traffic functions in a cheaper and more efficient way. A national approach means that the service can more efficiently police the movement of abnormal loads and spend less on doing this work, while economies of scale will help with better management of vehicle recovery (i.e. reduced overheads). The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £1.23m – £1.75m.

Annual Audit

218. The creation of a single service will also deliver savings in terms of annual audit costs. The current cost for auditing the eight services and SPSA/SCDEA is £365k. It is anticipated that future costs, from the second year, will potentially be around 50% of current levels; and therefore there would be savings of around £180k per annum. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £126k - £180k.

Summary of Estimated Costs and Savings

219. Table 2.1 sets out a summary of the financial implications of police reform (this includes costs that arise from the Bill provisions, the broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated reform process, and estimated savings). Table 2.2 sets out the same information as table 2.1, but applies an addition to costs to take account of the potential for optimism bias and applies a potential reduction to savings of 30% to account for possible margins of uncertainty.

Table 2.1: Best-estimated costs and savings (£) from 1 April 2011 to 31 March 2026 arising from police reform. (This includes costs that arise from the Bill provisions, the broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated reform process, and estimated savings.)

220. Table 2.1 gives the best estimates of the financial implications of police reform. Table 2.3 presents an alternate way of looking at the figures, by assuming that some costs and savings may potentially have been incurred by means other than establishing the single service, for example by enhancing national delivery under the 8 service model. It is difficult to predict exactly which costs and savings will be attributable to the single service structure and those which may have been achieved by taking other measures, particularly given that much of the current work, costs incurred and savings anticipate the establishment of a single service. Therefore, for consistency, the figures in table 2.3 were calculated by looking at the difference between the costs and savings estimates for an 8 service model with enhanced national delivery and those associated with a single service as appraised in the OBC.

These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

* These costs/(savings) are recurring. All other costs/(savings) are one-off and result from the setting up of the Police Service of Scotland.
 Totals might not equate to the sum of constituent parts due to rounding.

221. In relation to the best estimates, over the 15-year period assessed, the total net saving delivered from police reform is £1,135m. This figure differs from that presented in the Outline Business Case, which was £1,201m (excluding optimism bias), due to the inclusion of additional and revised costs and efficiencies based on work completed subsequent to the publication of the OBCs.

PART TWO (II): THE SCOTTISH FIRE AND RESCUE SERVICE (SFRS)

Background

222. Scotland’s fire and rescue services have performed well, helping to reduce deaths from fire by almost 50% over the last 10 years. In the face of significant cuts to public sector budgets, the Scottish Government wishes to protect this level of performance as far as possible. It is not possible to meet that challenge in the current structure and organisation of fire and rescue services in Scotland. The decision to move to a single fire and rescue service provides for long-term sustainability. It provides the best way to deliver savings - through reduced duplication, rationalised and simplified support functions and standardised business processes - while protecting front-line services to communities.

Costs and Efficiencies: Overview of Sections II(i)-II(iii)

223. This part of the financial memorandum sets out the estimated costs and savings associated with the Part 2 of the Bill. Whilst the Bill provides for structural change, the existing functions of the fire and rescue service will continue and many of the costs associated with providing the service will not change as a result of the Bill. However, there are areas of potential additional costs. As such, this part of the financial memorandum considers new costs which are directly associated with the provisions of the Bill, estimates the broader costs which may result as a consequence of the Bill and associated process of fire and rescue reform, and outlines the expected efficiencies.

224. Part II(i) outlines the cost implications arising from Bill provisions:

- Scottish Administration Grant Support;
- Appointing the SFRS Board Members and Chief Officer;
- Remuneration of the SFRS Board Members and Chief Officer;
- Changes to External Scrutiny and Complaints;
- The Inspection of Crown Premises;
- Determination of Disputes and Publicity;
- VAT;
- Pensions (additional pension costs due to transfer of staff);
- Property Transfer Schemes;
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

- Costs to Local Authorities; and
- Costs to Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses.

225. Part II(ii) outlines the broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of fire and rescue service reform:

- Shadow Leadership;
- Programme Management, Training and Change;
- Capital Build and Refurbishment;
- ICT Costs;
- Transaction Costs;
- Voluntary Redundancy Payments;
- Pay Harmonisation;
- Carbon Reduction Commitment;
- Other;
- Costs to Local Authorities; and
- Costs to Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses.

226. Part II(iii) outlines the estimated savings, under the categories of:

- Learning and Development;
- Corporate Services;
- Fleet and Estate;
- Prevention and Protection;
- Response; and
- Annual Audit.

Part II(i)a Cost implications from Bill provisions: Costs to the Scottish Government

227. Currently, the fire and rescue services receive their revenue funding from their constituent local authorities (there are six joint boards and two unitary authorities), via the local government settlement. The combined revenue spend in 2011-12 is £264.4m. Funding for fire and rescue service pensions, some £60m in 2011-12, is provided directly by the Scottish Government. In addition, the Scottish Government provides direct revenue support for the Scottish Fire Services College at Gullane and for Firelink (£6.2m and £4.5m respectively in 2011-12). Services also receive loan charge support, which is provided by the Scottish Government to local authorities for an agreed level of borrowing undertaken by the boards prior to 2004-05. Since 2004-05, the boards have been funded by grant rather than by borrowing consents, and so the Scottish Government provides no support for borrowing undertaken by the boards after 1 April 2004.
228. The Fire Capital Grant currently forms part of the local government settlement as a ring-fenced capital sum and is administered by the Scottish Government. Allocations are made to each of the eight services on a formula share (all eight receiving a sum) and top slice (prioritised projects) basis. Allocations are agreed jointly between the Scottish Government and Fire Conveners, with the Scottish Ministers granting final approval. In 2011-12, the services will receive £20.2m Fire Capital Grant. A further £260k will be spent by the Scottish Government on capital investment on the Scottish Fire Services College.

229. Following enactment of the Bill, the SFRS will receive all its funding, both revenue and capital, from the Scottish Consolidated Fund through the annual Budget Bill, rather than via the local government settlement and the current Scottish Government funding streams. Funding will be paid by the Scottish Ministers directly to the SFRS.

Appointing the SFRS Board and Chief Officer

230. The Bill provides for some flexibility in the number of members of the SFRS board. The SFRS will also require a new Chief Officer. Filling these positions will incur recruitment costs (advertising and selection). It is estimated that these costs would amount to approximately £20k - £30k.

231. Based on past experience, costs associated with the re-appointment of board members are expected to be in the region of 10k.

Remuneration of the Board and Chief Officer

232. Estimates of the ongoing costs of board members and the Chair have been based on the published Public Sector Pay Policy for Senior Appointments. Assuming an 11-member board (10 members plus a Chair) annual fees are estimated to be between £168k - £316k (which includes ERNIC). The best estimate (based on the mid-point of this range) is £242k.

233. The costs and savings associated with the Chief Officer and other senior posts in the new service have been included in the calculations of efficiencies that were undertaken for the OBC and are outlined below.

Changes to External Scrutiny and Complaints

234. Under the Bill, it is proposed that the Chief Inspector of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and other inspectors will have external scrutiny powers in relation to the SFRS.

235. There will be costs associated with this enhanced scrutiny role, and there is a degree of uncertainty regarding the extent and frequency of the scrutiny and the amount of external assistance that may be required. Overall, however, the principle of proportionality will apply and a significant increase in costs is not anticipated. (The Chief Inspector’s unit currently has a budget allocation of £730k for 2011-12.)

236. It is intended that the Chief Inspector’s unit will co-operate with HMICS with a view to sharing support resources with associated cost savings.
These documents relate to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

237. Self-assessment, appraisal and performance management will be a normal function of the SFRS, and co-operating and dealing with the external scrutiny body will not require additional staffing resources.

238. Currently, each of the eight services operates its own Complaints Handling Procedure, which is based on the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman guidance. There are no proposed changes to this procedure – the SFRS will have obligations to handle complaints in the same manner. As such, no additional costs are expected in this respect.

The Inspection of Crown Premises

239. The Crown premises fire safety enforcement role will transfer from the Chief Inspector to the SFRS. The current annual cost of this enforcement is around £130k. It is estimated that the Crown premises fire safety enforcement role cost itself could fall to approximately £25k per annum if undertaken by the SFRS. This is because the amendment would make Crown premises subject to the same enforcement regime as non-Crown premises. As such, some Crown premises which are at present subject to routine inspection would cease to be inspected because the level of risk is not high enough to justify it. The removal of some Crown premises from routine inspection is in line with Scottish Government guidance that resources should be targeted at those premises which present the greatest risk to life.1 The £105k saving from this change will be used to cover the enhanced scrutiny role (described above) of the Chief Inspector.

240. The Bill aims to make the current process for determination of fire safety disputes (under section 67 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005) easier to access. Depending on the referral criteria, this could lead to an increase in the number of referrals for determinations and therefore an increase in cost to the Chief Inspector and to SFRS. It is difficult to estimate what the increase (if any) would be, but the number of referrals will be controlled by the referral criteria so that additional cost will not be significant. There could be some associated savings in Scottish Government staff costs and reductions in burdens to business if this change improves enforcement practice by encouraging a more risk proportionate approach.

241. The Bill proposes that the SFRS will be responsible for undertaking publicity work to promote fire safety. The current fire and rescue services already have responsibility to undertake this work at a regional/local level. If, in the future, the SFRS also took on a national publicity role, then it could incur an additional cost. Costs of up to £330k per year have been estimated for this, based on overall costs to the Scottish Government for national publicity this year. The range, to account for optimism bias, is £330k – £505k.

VAT

242. At present, the services are able (under section 33 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994) to recover VAT costs incurred. A move to a single service may alter this. Therefore, it has been assumed that the SFRS may be liable for irrecoverable VAT on all goods, estimated to be around £4m per annum. However, the Scottish Government is currently liaising with HM Revenue and Customs and HM Treasury regarding whether the SFRS could be given section 33 status and therefore be able to recover all VAT incurred. Other options for reducing any VAT liability will continue to be explored in the planning for the new service.

Pensions

243. On moving to a single service fire-fighters will remain in the Firefighter’s Pension Scheme 1992 and the New Firefighter’s Pension Scheme (Scotland) 2006 as appropriate. Secondary legislation will be necessary to amend pension regulations to enable this, facilitated by limited consequential amendments to primary legislation in the Bill. However, no additional pensions costs in respect of fire-fighters will arise as a consequence of the reforms.

244. Fire support staff will remain in the LGPS, and will remain in the fund they are in at the time the new SFRS comes into being. It is also intended that they remain in that fund for the duration of their employment regardless of whether they change location. There are 11 LGPS pension funds in Scotland. Fire support staff belong to eight of these. Support staff appointed after the SFRS comes into being will join the LGPS pension fund most appropriate to the location of the new headquarters/corporate service base. No significant additional pension costs are anticipated to arise from this.

245. A small number of Scottish Government staff, estimated to be fewer than 20, are likely to transfer to the SFRS and become employees of the new body. These staff will no longer be eligible to be in the Civil Service Pension Scheme and a bulk transfer of these staff to the LGPS will be required with the option of transferring previous service. For bulk transfers of staff out of the Civil Service pension arrangements a bulk transfer payment is paid out of the Civil Superannuation Vote arranged by Cabinet Office Civil Service Pensions as managers of the pension arrangements. This process is at no cost to Scottish Government. The additional cost included in this financial memorandum is based on the assumption that a price adjustment may occur if actuaries representing the respective interests of the Scottish Local Government Pension Fund and Scottish Government come to an agreement that additional funding is required for the bulk transfer. Precedent indicates that in some similar circumstances such costs have not arisen. The need for any price adjustment will be subject to negotiation at the time of the transfer and is subject to various factors, including the number of staff transferring and the pensions options they will exercise. On the basis of actuarial advice and an assumption that 50% of members will transfer their accrued pension benefits to the LGPS the cost has been estimated to between £0 and £100k.

Property transfer scheme

246. The Bill enables the Scottish Ministers to make provision for payment of compensation in respect of property and rights transferred. Such payments would only be considered in exceptional circumstances, and the potential cost, if any, would only be known at the time that any asset transfer scheme is made. Potential stamp duty land tax liabilities may also have to be considered if compensatory payments are made in respect of property transfers.

Part II(i)b Cost implications from Bill provisions: Costs to Local Authorities

247. The Bill provides for the SFRS to engage with local authorities and, in particular, to work with local authorities when setting priorities and objectives. Local authorities will also have a role in monitoring the exercise of functions in their areas and providing relevant feedback. It is difficult to estimate the costs associated with this, particularly given that it is open to individual local authorities to determine the most appropriate local mechanism in each case for performing their role. The Scottish Government has been working with CoSLA on this matter.

248. CoSLA has collected information from local authorities and provided the Scottish Government with an estimate of £3m-£4m, for engaging with the new police service and the SFRS, based on costs for elected members, policy support, research and analysis and administrative support. On this basis, it is assumed that the impact of the Bill is largely cost-neutral - as efficiency savings from not having the current police and fire and rescue joint boards and unitary authorities are estimated to equate to this amount. However, there may be efficiencies and less expensive ways of undertaking local engagement and these will continue to be explored.

Part II(i)c Cost implications from Bill provisions: Costs on Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses

249. It is not expected that the Bill provisions will impose costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

Part II(ii)a Broader Costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of Fire and Rescue Service Reform: Costs to the Scottish Government

250. The costs detailed in this section are those which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the reform process taken forward in the single fire and rescue service.

Shadow Leadership

251. Appointments will be made for a new Chief Officer, other senior officers and support staff to form the new executive team for the single service. This team is likely to be in place before the establishment of the new service, in parallel with the existing leadership of the current services. The estimated cost of this is £500k, based on a period of six months of additional planning and preparation and includes estimated salaries for the new Chief Officer, senior officers and staff. Accounting for optimism bias, the range is £500k - £765k.

Programme Management, Training and Change

252. There will be costs associated with staff involved in managing the establishment of the SFRS, such as programme management, training and change costs. Programme management, training and change costs are estimated to be £3m, and are spread over years 2 – 4. This includes £2m to manage the transition planning process and internal redeployed team, and £1m for training and change, plus professional fees (such as legal and technical). Accounting for optimism bias, the range is estimated to be £3m - £4.59m.

Capital build and refurbishment

253. It is not envisaged that the national headquarters will require additional accommodation, as there will be a relatively light tier of management with the majority of resources engaged in frontline delivery. As such, it could be attached to a current delivery unit. Furthermore, the rationalisation of functions (such as HR, procurement and finance) will provide opportunities for discrete functions to be spread across different parts of Scotland. Specialist functions and maintenance teams may be managed as national functions, but could be deployed on a regional delivery unit basis to enable effective support and response within local areas, thereby optimising any specialist resources and assets. However, it is recognised that establishing the SFRS is likely to require some capital refurbishment of office accommodation and incur relocation costs. Training facilities and depots will be required to facilitate changes in management and delivery arrangements. These costs are estimated to be in the range of £10m, and are spread over years 1 – 4. This increases to £15.3m when accounting for optimism bias. This includes costs associated with the refit of office accommodation (approximately £5m), depot capacity (approximately £2m) and training sites (approximately £3m).

254. It has been assumed that non-operational asset sales of around £15m could be realisable given the current scale of local fire and rescue service and Scottish Government estate assets (this represents less than 5% of the estate), and that these sales would be used to offset the transition costs associated with change. As such, overall, capital build and refurbishment is estimated to be largely cost-neutral.

255. Any capital gain which may arise from the sale of assets owned by the SFRS could attract liability for corporation tax of 25%. It is difficult to estimate what this might be, given it is dependent on the assets sold and the level of any capital gain made.

ICT Costs

256. Technology costs are estimated to be £9m, spread over years 1 – 4. A range of £9m - £13.8m is provided to take into account optimism bias. These relate to costs associated with transition and rationalisation of ICT support (a key enabler to the reform process), the rationalisation of the control room model, and a progressive rationalisation of supporting ICT back office systems.

257. These ICT costs include:

- Costs associated with upgrading ICT infrastructure, programme management, industry liaison and additional software development to establish a single ICT platform that ensures efficiencies in communication and consistent and accessible information flows. The most significant ICT costs are mainly associated with control room consolidation. This includes ICT telephony, command and control, and project management costs associated with control rooms. These costs are estimated to amount to approximately £6.5m.

- A single suite of systems will exist at a national platform level, aligned with business strategy and need, with operational support provided at a local level. Data migration and costs associated with common HR, payroll, asset management and other common service systems are estimated to be approximately £2.5m.

Transaction costs

258. A number of transaction costs may also be incurred by moving to national structure. These include site disposal (approximately £300k) and contract break costs (HR and ICT – approximately £600k). They are estimated to amount to £900k, spread over years 1 - 4. The range provided is £900k - £1.38m to take account of optimism bias.

Voluntary Redundancy Payments

259. Depending on decisions of the SFRS, some rationalisation may be required and result in redundancy costs. To account for this possibility, redundancy costs have been estimated to be in the order of £4m, spread over years 1 – 4, and have been calculated based on the assumptions that:

- any reduction in uniform members could be managed through staff turnover and retirements (current fire and rescue service projections suggest that 30-50% of senior managers are expected to retire over the next three years) and no redundancy costs would be incurred; and
- as determined in the efficiencies analysis, between a third and half of non-uniform headcount reductions would have some sort of voluntary redundancy package.

Pay Harmonisation

260. The Bill provides for staff to transfer to the new service retaining their current terms and conditions. As such, it will be for the SFRS to decide and negotiate on any harmonisation of pay and other terms and conditions. A range of potential costs has been included to account for the fact that there may be a cost associated with this.

261. In addition to one-off investment costs, there may be some recurrent costs associated with pay harmonisation. These have been estimated at around £1m per annum, based on 50% of the 1,250 non-uniformed staff requiring harmonisation by an average of 5%. On this basis, pay harmonisation has been calculated to be from £0- £1m per year from the sixth year (it is estimated at £200k in the second year, £400k in the third, £600k in the fourth and £800k in the fifth year). Taking a conservative approach, £1m per annum has been used as the best estimate for this particular cost.

Carbon Reduction Commitment

262. The new service may participate in Phase 2 of the Carbon Reduction Commitment Energy Efficiency Scheme from 2013-14, based on likely future energy usage. Potential financial costs have not been estimated at this stage, as these cannot be identified until: eligibility for, and details of, the simplified scheme are known (expected in late 2012-13); the associated allowance price has been announced by HM Treasury; and the total emissions level of the new service is known.

263. The current allowance price for the first year of Phase 1 is £12 per tonne CO₂, and it is anticipated that this will increase during later phases. There were no participants in Phase 1 from among the existing fire and rescue services.

Other

264. Some investment will be required to achieve re-branding. However, it is assumed that the main re-branding will be undertaken on a replacement basis and that will be cost-neutral.
Similarly, relocation and excess travel costs have been considered to be negligible due to the numbers affected.

Part II(ii)b Broader Costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of Fire and Rescue Service Reform: Costs to Local Authorities

265. In some cases ICT support for fire and rescue services is currently provided by local authorities. The potential for centralising existing systems as a result of the move to a single service will have an impact on this provision. However, it is expected that this will be cost-neutral over the reform period as local authorities continue to utilise existing systems for their own purposes (for example, payroll and pension schemes), while reducing excess capacity and support.

Part II(ii)c Broader Costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated process of Fire and Rescue Service Reform: Costs on Other Bodies, Individuals and Businesses

266. The Scottish Ministers do not consider that there will be any material direct cost implications for other bodies, individuals and businesses. The potential implications for Scottish businesses have been considered as part of the Business Regulatory Impact Assessment. A number of businesses were contacted in relation to the potential impacts of fire and rescue service reform, and no issues were identified in this respect at this time.

Part II(iii) Estimated Savings

267. Moving to a single service structure will result in efficiencies, such as removing duplication and streamlining processes.

268. The financial benefits and efficiency savings have been identified using the optimum delivery model for a single service and comparing the service changes and opportunities for delivering greater efficiency and/or lower costs with the current model. These opportunities have been collated by functional area: learning and development; response; prevention and protection; corporate services; and fleet and estates. For each opportunity, an estimate has been made of the likely scale of savings which could be delivered.

269. Most of the figures set out below are derived from the analysis undertaken for the fire and rescue service OBC. The savings listed are long-term recurring savings and have therefore been provided on a per annum basis rather than as a total. All figures are quoted relative to costs actually incurred in 2010-11, as this represents the latest available baseline data. Over the full 15-year period under consideration in the OBCs, the savings associated with reform substantially outweigh the costs identified in the section above. On the basis of best estimates, efficiencies start outweighing costs from the second year.

Learning and Development

270. Savings from changes to learning and development have been estimated, on the basis of data and advice from experienced fire and rescue learning and development staff, to be £3.65m per annum from the fourth year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £2.56m -
£3.65m. These savings are based on: reduction of support staff roles across the current services and the Scottish Fire Services College; saving in procurement and learning and development contracts; a reduction of manager posts; and rationalisation of physical learning and development assets to prevent the duplication of facilities, particularly those of a specialist nature.

Corporate Services

271. Corporate services savings have been estimated as amounting to £8.03m per annum from the third year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £5.62m - £8.03m. These include: savings from shared service arrangements; a shared transaction service for finance/shared service arrangements; a shared transaction service for Human Resources/shared service arrangements, consolidation of health and safety teams and recruitment and management delayering; reduction in management layers, helpdesk and administration for ICT Hardware, Software and Administration and reduction in over-provision of ICT and telephony resources (particularly server capacity); savings achievable by consolidating pensions administration functions; and senior management reductions.

Fleet and Estate

272. Savings for fleet and estate were estimated to be £2.45m per annum from the fourth year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £1.72 - £2.45m. These savings include: spend reduction from collaborative procurement facilities for management services; reduction in contract costs from collaborative procurement of specialist equipment; reducing specialist maintenance costs; reduction in non-operational estate footprint/running costs; consolidation of fleet and equipment facilities into fewer sites; and improvement in asset utilisation.

Prevention and Protection

273. Savings for prevention and protection have been estimated at £2.96m per annum from the second year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £2.07m - £2.96m. This includes: reductions in duplication of senior management protection roles; more targeted enforcement visits to higher risk properties; and reductions in duplication of senior management prevention roles.

Response

274. Savings for response are estimated to be £13.5m per annum from the third year. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £9.47m - £13.5m. This includes: rationalisation of common risk analysis tools and licences; smaller expert teams carrying out consolidated risk analysis and data input; reduced need for duplication and numbers of teams covering operational guidance and procedures; reduction in duplication of research and development teams; reviewing distribution and asset requirements for national resilience equipment; risk assessing and reviewing crewing and emergency cover practices; consolidating control rooms; and revenue generation from additional charging for certain special services such as lift rescues.

Annual Audit

275. The creation of a single service will also deliver savings in terms of annual audit costs. The current cost for auditing the eight services is £188k. It is anticipated that future costs, from the second year, will potentially be around 50% of current levels - and therefore there will be savings of around £90k per annum. The range, to account for margins of uncertainty, is £63k-£90k.

Summary of Estimated Costs and Efficiency Savings

276. Table 3.1 sets out a summary of the financial implications of fire and rescue service reform (this includes costs that arise from the Bill provisions, the broader costs which may arise as a consequence of the Bill and the associated reform process, and estimated savings). Table 3.2 sets out the same information as table 3.1, but applies an addition to costs to take account of the potential for optimism bias and applies a potential reduction to savings of 30% to account for possible margins of uncertainly.

277. Table 3.1 gives the best estimates of the financial implications of fire and rescue reform. Table 3.3 presents an alternate way of looking at the figures, by assuming that some costs and savings may potentially have been incurred by means other than establishing a single service, for example by increasing collaboration between the current 8 services. It is difficult to predict exactly which costs and savings will be attributable to the single service structure and those which may have been achieved by taking other measures, particularly given that much of the current work, costs incurred and savings anticipate the establishment of a single service. Therefore, for consistency, figures in table 3.3 were calculated by looking at the difference between the costs and savings estimates for an 8 service model with increased collaboration and those associated with a single service as appraised in the OBC.

POLICE AND FIRE REFORM (SCOTLAND) BILL

POLICY MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy rule 9.3.3(c) of the Parliament’s standing orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 8–EN.

POLICY OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

2. Scotland has an excellent police service and fire and rescue service, with crime at a 35 year low and detection rates improving, helped by the 1,000 additional police officers the Government has put into communities, and fire deaths almost 50% lower than a decade ago. The Scottish Government is determined to protect and improve local police and local fire and rescue services in the face of reductions in public finance, by streamlining and modernising services.

3. The main policy objectives of this Bill are to create a single police service, and a single fire and rescue service, to deliver the policy aims set out below:

   - To protect and improve local services despite financial cuts, by stopping duplication of support services eight times over and not cutting front line services;
   - To create more equal access to specialist support and national capacity – like murder investigation teams, firearms teams or flood rescue – where and when they are needed; and,
   - To strengthen the connection between services and communities, by creating a new formal relationship with each of the 32 local authorities, involving many more local councillors and better integrating with community planning partnerships.

4. The Bill sets out the framework for the new services and modernises the governance of the Scottish police and Scottish fire and rescue services by providing:

   - A clear, modern purpose and principles for the police service and an updated oath for constables. For fire and rescue the purpose will be included in the new Fire and Rescue Framework;
   - A clear statutory framework for national governance including clear roles and responsibilities for the Scottish Ministers, the proposed Scottish Police Authority, the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board, and the Chief Officers of both services;
   - Clear powers for local authorities in relation to the provision of fire and rescue services and the policing of their area;
This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

- Appropriate scrutiny and oversight arrangements;
- Clear funding arrangements; and
- Clear arrangements for the transfer of existing officers and staff and the appointment of new officers and staff to both services.

5. In addition the Bill places the arrangements for independent custody visiting in Scotland on a statutory footing, in line with the rest of the UK. It ensures that independent custody visiting complies with the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture (OPCAT).

6. The legislation underpinning policing in Scotland, the Police (Scotland) Act 1967, is over 40 years old. This Bill largely repeals that legislation and puts in place a new modernised framework for policing. The Bill also repeals Part 1, Chapter 1 of the Police, Criminal Justice and Public Order (Scotland) Act 2006 which established the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA). It amends Part 1, Chapter 2 of that Act which established the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland (PCCS) to provide for more robust scrutiny of policing. The statutory framework governing the fire and rescue services was modernised in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 and the Bill therefore amends that Act to establish a single service.

CONSULTATION

7. The Scottish Government conducted parallel formal consultations on police1 and on fire and rescue service reform2 from 10 February to 5 May 2011. The consultations presented three options for reform: a single service; a regional model of three or four services; and, retaining the existing eight service model with greater collaboration. The fire and rescue consultation made clear the Government’s preference for a single service. The police consultation recognised that significant arguments had been made in favour of a single police force, but that questions remained about accountability and centralisation of services.

8. There were 219 responses to the police consultation and 171 to the fire and rescue consultation. Responses3 were published on the Scottish Government website. Over fifty consultation events and meetings were held during the consultation period to complement the process. The majority of respondents recognised that the status quo was untenable but said that more detail was required to allow them to reach an informed decision, that reform should not endanger the provision of local services, partnership working or accountability, and that there was a need for robust arrangements for national governance including clearly defined roles that ensured separation between the Scottish Ministers and the services. There was no consensus on structure; however some stakeholders, particularly those in rural areas, expressed views in opposition to a single service.

9. Over summer 2011, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, the Minister for Community Safety and Legal Affairs and their officials carried out extensive discussions with stakeholders to explore these concerns and build a consensual approach to reform.

10. On 8 September 2011 the Cabinet Secretary for Justice announced details of the Government’s intention to create a single Police Service of Scotland and a single Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. In parallel, the Scottish Government published:

- A consultation\(^4\) on the legislative framework for the new services;
- Two outline business cases (OBCs)\(^5\,^6\) which provide detail on the costs and benefits of the three options for reform;
- A partial Equality Impact Assessment;\(^7\) and
- A partial Business Regulatory Impact Assessment.\(^8\)

11. In response to the views expressed in the first consultation paper, this consultation set out in detail the Scottish Government’s proposals:

- To protect and enhance local accountability and partnership working by creating new formal relationships between the services and each of Scotland’s 32 local authorities, involving many more local councillors and better integration with community planning partnerships. These proposals are outlined at para 42.
- For robust national governance with clear roles and responsibilities and a separation between the Scottish Ministers and the services. These proposals are set out at paras 72 to 94.

12. The second consultation ran from 8 September to 2 November 2011 and was issued to around 250 organisations. One hundred and forty-five responses were received in total, including 30 from individuals and 115 from groups and organisations. This included 26 local authorities, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (COSLA) and the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE), 6 police forces, 6 police joint boards or unitary police authorities, 4 fire and rescue services, 4 fire and rescue joint boards and unitary fire authorities, 18 police and fire specific organisations and a further 51 from NHS, voluntary sector and other stakeholders.

13. In the main, respondents to the consultation welcomed the opportunity to influence the design of the single services. There was general consensus about the main policy proposals on a modern purpose for policing, workforce arrangements for police and fire and rescue, scrutiny arrangements along with funding and finance. Views on the need to change the police oath were mixed. The main issues cited across the responses to the police and fire and rescue proposals were the need for the retention of policing by consent and operational independence and the need for local democratic accountability and core improvements to community outcomes for the new services.

14. The most substantive comments were raised in relation to governance and accountability. There were requests for more clarity on both local and national accountability mechanisms, including local authorities’ oversight of the local policing plan, the relationship between local committees and the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board, and the roles and responsibilities of the local commander/senior officer and their chief officers. The composition of the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board was also raised as one of the most important factors in ensuring the long term success of the single services.

15. An independent analysis of responses has been carried out and a summary report was published along with consultation responses on 16 December^9^ and a detailed report will be published in early 2012.

BILL CONTENT AND STRUCTURE OF THIS POLICY MEMORANDUM

16. The Bill is structured in the following Parts:

Part 1 - Police Reform, puts in place new arrangements for the structure, governance and management of policing in Scotland, in particular:

- The establishment of the Scottish Police Authority responsible for the governance, oversight and administration of the Police Service of Scotland and the provision of forensic services;
- An updated oath, restating of constables’ functions and duties, and provisions for establishing their terms and conditions;
- Responsibilities of the Chief Constable for the policing of Scotland;
- A statement of policing principles to set the strategic direction for the Service and a requirement on the Scottish Police Authority to provide a strategic and annual plan;
- Statutory Best Value duties for the Scottish Police Authority and the Chief Constable;
- Statutory reporting requirements including the production of an annual report and accounts;
- New arrangements for strengthening local engagement and partnership working including the establishment of local commanders, powers for local authorities in relation to the policing of their areas, and development of local policing plans;
- New arrangements for police appeals tribunals for certain disciplinary cases;

^9^ Keeping Scotland Safe and Strong: a Consultation on Reforming Police and Fire and Rescue Services in Scotland - Research Findings December 2011 - http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/12/12130956/0
This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

- A new complaints process for the Police Service of Scotland, including an independent investigatory capacity for the most serious cases;
- Inspection powers for Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland (HMICS) and a more structured relationship between HMICS and the Scottish Parliament;
- New funding arrangements with the Scottish Ministers agreeing the funding settlement for payment directly to the Scottish Police Authority along with a power for the Scottish Police Authority and Chief Constable to charge for services; and,
- Placing independent custody visiting on a statutory footing.

Part 2 - Fire and Rescue Reform, amends the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 (the 2005 act) relating to Scottish Fire and Rescue Services, in particular:

- The establishment of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service responsible for the governance, oversight and administration of fire and rescue services in Scotland;
- Ensuring that the functions and duties of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service set out in the 2005 Act apply to the new single service including the promotion of fire safety;
- Restating of powers to obtain assistance in carrying out fire and rescue service functions;
- Statutory Best Value duties for the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service;
- Statutory planning and reporting requirements including providing statistics, production of a strategic plan for the approval of the Scottish Ministers, and an annual report and accounts;
- New arrangements for strengthening local engagement and partnership working including the establishment of local senior officers and development of local fire and rescue plans, along with powers for local authorities in relation to the provision of fire and rescue services in their area; and
- Abolishing the post of Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities and replacing it with a Chief Inspector, Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors (Inspectors of the SFRS).

Part 3 – makes general and supplementary provisions.

17. This Policy Memorandum identifies the main policy issues throughout the Bill, covering police and fire and rescue services together. It starts with the measures in the Bill designed to meet the three main policy aims of reform, followed by other legislative measures required to facilitate the establishment of single services with robust national governance. It identifies where alternative policy approaches were considered and highlights some of the key issues raised in response to the second consultation paper. The Scottish Government’s approach has generally been to take the same approach for police and fire and rescue on the key issues and structuring the document in this way allows us to highlight and explain any departures from this approach.
BILL PROVISIONS TO MEET THE THREE MAIN POLICY AIMS OF REFORM

18. This part of the Policy Memorandum addresses:
   - Establishing single services; and,
   - Strengthening the connection between services and communities.

Establishing single services

19. The Scottish Government believes that the best way to address 2 of the 3 main aims of reform - to protect and improve local services and to create more equal access to specialist support and national capacity - is to create a single police service and a single fire and rescue service for Scotland.

20. The Bill therefore sets out proposals to establish a Scottish Police Authority to maintain the Police Service of Scotland. The Police Service of Scotland will comprise of police officers and police staff under the direction and control of the Chief Constable. The services currently provided by the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA) will be brought within the single service although special arrangements will apply to forensic services (see para 82 below).

21. The Bill also sets out proposals to establish a Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to provide fire and rescue services across Scotland. This will include capacity currently provided by the Scottish Government including the Scottish Fire College, the Firelink communications system and specialist capacity to respond to chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear incidents. The Bill will also consolidate the fire safety responsibilities currently divided between Scottish Government and the eight fire and rescue services into the new single service.

22. Scotland’s existing eight police forces and eight fire and rescue services, along with the joint boards and unitary authorities that maintain them will be abolished as will the SPSA and SCDEA.

23. Scottish police forces and Scottish fire and rescue services are performing well. Crime levels are at their lowest for thirty five years and detection rates are improving, helped by the 1,000 additional police officers the Government has put into communities. Fire deaths are almost fifty per cent lower than they were a decade ago. Both services are key players in the delivery of a wide ranging set of outcomes, for example working with partners to improve the life chances of children and young people, and supporting economic growth.

24. However, it will prove increasingly difficult to maintain these positive outcomes in the face of budget reductions by the UK Government. Work done by the Association of Chief Police Officers Scotland (ACPOS) under the auspices of the Scottish Policing Board\(^{10}\) indicated that planned efficiencies would not be enough to fill the funding gap for policing. Audit Scotland\(^{11}\), the Scottish Fire and Rescue Advisory Unit (SFRAU)\(^{12}\), the Health and Safety

\(^{10}\)Scottish Policing Board - Papers from Fifth Meeting - ACPOS - Update on Efficiencies

\(^{11}\)http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/media/article.php?id=86
Executive (HSE)\textsuperscript{13} and the Scotland Together report\textsuperscript{14} all concluded that the fire and rescue services faced considerable challenges if they were to continue to maintain their high levels of performance in the face of decreasing budgets.

25. The outline business cases published on 8 September 2011 looked at three reform options and clearly demonstrated that single services were the strongest option for both police and fire and rescue, as they would deliver the highest level of benefits and the greatest savings compared with either regional or eight service options.

26. Based on these findings, the Scottish Government believes that the establishment of single services is the best way to protect and improve local services in the face of significant reductions in public finance, by stopping duplication of support services eight times over and not cutting frontline services. It also considers that single services are the best way to create more equal access to specialist support and national capacity, where and when they are needed. For both police and fire and rescue this includes capacity to respond to adverse weather conditions or terrorist threats. In policing, specialist support includes murder investigation teams, firearms teams and tackling e-crime. For fire and rescue this includes flood rescue or specialist resources to respond to a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear incident.

27. In addition, single services will facilitate more streamlined partnership working at a national level between police and fire and rescue with other emergency services and partners such as the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, the Scottish Prison Service and the Scottish Courts Service. Both police and fire and rescue services play a major role in the work of Strategic Coordinating Groups (SCGs) which bring together partners to plan for, and respond to emergencies, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Contingencies Act 2004. The Scottish Government will work with the new services in order to ensure that future arrangements allow all responder organisations in SCGs to work together as effectively as possible, recognising the key role often played by the police and fire and rescue ahead of, and during emergency situations.

28. A single police service and a single fire and rescue service will facilitate flexible, responsive local delivery that is embedded within and tailored to the needs of communities, but, crucially, is also part of a Scotland-wide service not hampered by internal boundaries. This structure is enabling, but not operationally prescriptive. The operational design of the new services and deployment of resources will be the responsibility of the new services.

Consultation

29. Twenty-two respondents to the first police reform consultation and twenty-nine respondents to the fire and rescue consultation supported the single service option. Seventy-seven of the responses to the police consultation said they did not know, or did not select one of the three reform options. Several of these respondents noted that this was because of a lack of information on which to base their decision.

\textsuperscript{13} http://www.hse.gov.uk/services/fire/

30. Key stakeholders in favour of the single service option were the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents (ASPS), and the SCDEA. ASPS argued that “A single Police Service will allow us to maintain existing levels of high performance and public confidence. There will be opportunities to retain and enhance local accountability and governance. Importantly it will also increase capacity for counter terrorism and serious organised crime, whilst maintaining a focus on local, accountable community policing. The proposal to introduce a single Police Service is financially and operationally the way forward”. SCDEA argued that a single service would offer the best service compared to other options, providing greater flexibility to respond to changing needs such as international crime; consistency across Scotland; the integration of specialist functions; and improved partnership working and resource sharing.

31. The need to centralise or rationalise support functions, management, procurement and training functions was raised in fire and rescue responses that supported the single service option. Some respondents said that that a single service would provide a better, more efficient, effective and sustainable option than the alternatives. "We believe that both arrangements could deliver safe communities and fire service employment protection; provided there are clear and distinct responsibilities invested in regional structures to deliver risk based emergency cover within each regional structure to an agreed and consistent National Standard. But of the two, we consider the single structure would be easier to deliver” (Fire Brigades Union).

32. Respondents to the second consultation acknowledged that the decision to legislate for single services had been taken and in the main did not contest this but welcomed the opportunity to comment and to assist with the design of the new services. They also emphasised that there will be a need for the Scottish Government, current forces, fire and rescue services, boards and local authorities to work together to ensure successful transition to the new services.

Alternative approaches - other structural options considered

33. The outline business cases for police and fire and rescue both considered in detail a regional delivery model and also the possibility of a more collaborative approach within the current eight service model.

34. The outline business cases found that a move to a regional structure with a smaller number of boards would offer some opportunities to protect budgets, deliver better outcomes and reduce the variation in delivery approaches to some extent. However, it would deliver less efficiency than single services (around £20 million per year less for police, and £12 million per year less for fire and rescue) and would not remove unnecessary duplication or create operational consistency across Scotland. A regional structure would restrict the ability to move resources and expertise to areas of greatest need and to create and maintain effective national capability. In addition, it would not provide a direct relationship with local authorities and local communities or strengthen local accountability, but would in effect create an extra tier of governance because it would need to be accompanied by additional national and local accountability mechanisms. For these reasons, this model was rejected.

35. While an 8 service structure was considered the least challenging to deliver in transition terms, the outline business cases concluded it would present a significant risk to the delivery of a cohesive programme of change. While national police and fire and rescue functions could be delivered through collaborative arrangements, they would have required significant effort to set up and maintain capability, as well as formal frameworks to enable effective resourcing, investment, decision making, management and deployment. Collaborative arrangements were therefore considered to be less effective, efficient, robust and sustainable than national arrangements over the longer-term. It was noted that additional national provision, such as an enhanced version of SPSA, would also be required to deliver the consolidated and rationalised back office support needed for these regional and national arrangements. With this in mind, an enhanced service structure was considered to be least likely to deliver the optimum range of efficiencies required, and to be financially sustainable in the medium term.

36. The evidence and arguments clearly point to single services in both police and fire and rescue as presenting the best option for reform. The arguments set out in the first consultations have been strengthened since by specific responses to the consultations, the independent Phase 2 Report of the Sustainable Policing Project produced by subject specialists from Scotland’s police forces, the responses to the second consultation, and the outline business cases for police and fire and rescue.

37. A single service model will drive out duplication, ensure consistency, and rationalise existing systems and structures. Efficiencies will be realised through economies of scale; expertise, capability and budgets will be pooled at a national level then targeted to meet local need; existing weaknesses in national accountability will be addressed; and local accountability will be enhanced through greater engagement at local authority level.

38. The outline business case for policing highlighted that a single service model is the strongest option for reform as it presents the:

- Least complex and most efficient option;
- Best opportunity to reinvest to improve local policing outcomes;
- Highest potential for long-term financial sustainability; and
- Best opportunity to co-ordinate change, optimise benefit and minimise risk.

39. In the case of fire and rescue, the outline business case highlighted that a single service model is the strongest option for reform as this presents the:

- Greatest potential to generate the required savings; and
- Potential to deliver the highest level of qualitative benefits, including improved outcomes, necessary to secure equitable and sustainable delivery of fire and rescue services to communities across Scotland.

40. The Financial Memorandum provides further detail on the cost and savings implications of the Bill and reform.

Strengthening the connection between services and communities

41. The third aim of reform is to strengthen the connection between services and communities. The Scottish Ministers intend to achieve this in the Bill by establishing a new formal statutory relationship between the police and fire and rescue services and each of Scotland’s 32 local authorities which will involve many more elected members and better integrate police and fire and rescue services with Community Planning Partnerships.

42. Section 45 and Section 113 of the Bill provide for a local commander (police) and a local senior officer (fire and rescue) to be designated for each local authority area. He or she will be the first point of senior contact for the local authority and other partners locally and the lead officer for the services in community planning. Local authorities will have a new formal role in shaping services delivered in their area and in scrutinising and monitoring delivery and performance. This will replace their current role as a police authority and as a fire and rescue authority.

43. This new relationship will be built around the joint development of a local plan setting out the shared priorities and outcomes to which police and fire and rescue services are to be directed. The local commander or senior officer will have a duty to involve the local authority in setting priorities and objectives and to provide information and reports to the local authority, to enable it to effectively scrutinise and monitor performance and local service delivery. Each local authority will have powers to agree the local police and fire and rescue plan; to scrutinise and monitor performance; to seek reports and information from the local commander and local senior officer; and to provide advice and recommendations on local policing and fire and rescue services.

44. The Bill does not set out how this relationship should operate locally. It will be for the local authorities to determine the most appropriate local mechanism for exercising their role outlined in the Bill, and formalising their relationship with the local commander and local senior officer and other partners to help shape and deliver local outcomes. Responses to the second consultation were supportive of the proposals for local policing and local fire and rescue services to be based around local commanders or senior officers as this approach already exists informally in many areas across Scotland.

45. This new role for local authorities will support the Government’s aim of seeing many more councillors playing a direct and formal role in police and fire and rescue services in their area so that they can better shape local priorities in order to meet local needs and challenges and scrutinise service delivery and performance in achieving local outcomes. At present only around 1 in 8 (146 out of 1,222) local councillors are involved in police committees, or regional joint police boards. Similar numbers are involved in fire and rescue committees or regional joint fire boards. This compares with over 500 local councillors involved in education services through local education committees or similar mechanisms. Furthermore, at present, many local authorities have only a few members on a regional joint board. For example, Argyll and Bute council has 2 members on Strathclyde Police Authority which has 34 members from 12 local authorities. The Bill enables each local authority to establish local arrangements, including as few or as many councillors as they see fit to work with the local commander and senior officer.

46. The new arrangements will also facilitate better integration with Community Planning Partnerships and other partnerships. Most partnerships which involve police and fire and rescue services are based around local authority areas, including Community Safety Partnerships, Alcohol and Drug Partnerships and Adult Protection Committees. Currently, police and fire and rescue structures do not always align with these boundaries, making local partnership less straightforward. There is a significant opportunity to better align police and fire and rescue structures with other community planning partners through reform, and to strengthen local scrutiny and engagement in community planning.

47. The Scottish Police Authority, the Chief Constable and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will be required to ensure effective local delivery of services. The local commander and the local senior officer will be required to participate in community planning.

Consultation

48. Responses to the consultation paper highlighted the importance of safeguarding local engagement and accountability in national services and the need to ensure that police and fire and rescue services remain able to deliver outcomes for local communities. The Scottish Government recognises that most policing and fire and rescue services are delivered locally and considers that the provisions in the Bill provide the necessary checks and balances to maintain and improve local services and to ensure effective local engagement within a national framework.

49. In their responses to the second consultation, the key concern of COSLA and SOLACE was maintaining meaningful local government interest in the new structure and the protection of multi-agency working. Many of the responses from local authorities, police and fire and rescue joint boards and unitary authorities also supported this position. The Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) supported many of the main policy proposals in principle, particularly the intention to strengthen and embed local policing in local communities, but raised a number of concerns regarding local accountability and the need for further clarity on proposed national and local governance structures. Similarly, the Chief Fire Officers Association (Scotland) (CFOA(S)) was supportive of the main policy proposals in principle but raised some concerns about how the relationship between the new Board and local authorities would operate.

Alternative approaches – local service delivery responsibilities

50. The provisions in the Bill ensure that local service delivery responsibilities for policing and fire and rescue services are set within a statutory framework that provides a new distinct leadership role at a local level, placing duties on the local commander and local senior officer. Within existing local structures, senior officers in some areas already perform similar functions without discrete statutory responsibilities, and this could continue within single services if the Bill were to remain silent on such functions. However, by placing local delivery and engagement responsibilities in legislation, the intention is to ensure that local service delivery remains among the foremost priorities of the Police Service of Scotland and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and embeds best practice in local service delivery across Scotland. The responsibilities placed on the local commander and local senior officer are complemented by a broader duty on the Chief Constable and on the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to ensure adequate local service provision. By holding the Chief Constable and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service ultimately responsible for the delivery of local services, the Bill requires the services to balance national and local priorities.
51. The Scottish Government considered the alternative of placing all statutory duties for local policing on the local commanders, and local fire and rescue services on local senior officers, but this might have raised concerns about the potential for conflict within the service between local and national policing and fire and rescue and created less flexibility for the deployment of resources across areas when required. By placing statutory responsibilities for local services on the Chief Constable and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service as well as the local commander or senior officer, the policy intention is that the leader of the service will be ultimately responsible for ensuring a balance between local and national performance. In the case of police, the Bill ensures that all constables, including local commanders, remain under the direction and control of the Chief Constable in the discharge of their functions. Local senior officers, as employees of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Services are under the direction and control of that service.

Alternative approaches – community resilience hubs

52. The Scottish Government considered the option of legislating to establish community resilience hubs; where fire stations are grouped together, working with local communities beyond the traditional community fire safety role of the fire and rescue services and supporting community safety across a wider range of emergencies.

53. A number of fire and rescue services already provide community resilience functions; these vary from area to area across Scotland, depending upon local circumstance and need. As such, the Scottish Government does not propose to introduce a legislative requirement, as this could potentially restrict positive activity or create duplication of effort. As with other functions, it is expected that integrated risk management planning will be used to identify priorities for community work and to identify need in the future. This would support flexible use of resources and align services with local community planning to promote local service integration and partnership working.

OTHER KEY PROVISIONS IN THE BILL

54. The Bill includes a number of other provisions designed to support the main policy aims of reform. The next section of this Policy Memorandum describes the policy in these areas:

- Clear, modern purpose and principles for each service;
- Robust statutory framework for national governance;
- Appropriate scrutiny arrangements;
- Streamlined arrangements for funding;
- Arrangements for appointing officers and staff and for transferring officers and staff from the current services to the new services; and
- Placing Independent Custody Visiting on a statutory footing.

A CLEAR MODERN PURPOSE AND PRINCIPLES FOR EACH SERVICE

55. The Bill sets out and modernises the functions of a police officer and for the first time provides statutory principles including a core purpose to inform the strategic plans and priorities for policing in Scotland. For the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service this will be set out in a new Fire and Rescue Framework under the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005.
This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

Purpose and principles

56. As outlined above, the Scottish Government intends to set a clear modern purpose and principles for both the Police Service of Scotland and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. This will reflect the reality of their broad roles and the excellent work the services now carry out supporting and promoting community safety and well-being; through, for example, community safety initiatives and collaboration with health, education, and local authorities focused on prevention and early intervention in order to improve outcomes.

57. Section 32 of the Bill sets out the policing principles which provide that the main purpose of policing is to improve safety and well-being in Scotland by working in collaboration with others in ways which are accessible to and engaged with communities, promoting measures to prevent crime, harm and disorder. The Scottish Ministers and the Scottish Police Authority will be required to have regard to the policing principles when developing the strategic priorities and plans for the service, as will the Chief Constable when directing constables. In this way the policing principles will underpin the core of the work of the new police service.

58. For fire and rescue, the Fire (Scotland) 2005 Act already allows priorities and objectives to be set through the Fire and Rescue Framework. A new Fire and Rescue Framework will be produced which will set out a modern purpose for the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and underpin delivery of its functions; for example by an outcomes based approach and through the promotion of community engagement.

Functions

59. The Bill does not make any fundamental changes to the statutory duties of a police constable or the functions of the fire and rescue services.

Police functions

60. The statutory duties of a police constable, as set out in the 1967 Act, capture the broad range of policing activities directed toward improved safety and well-being and the Scottish Government proposes to preserve these in an updated form. These duties are set out in section 20 of the Bill and relate to crime prevention and detection, the maintenance of order, the protection of life and property, as well as duties relating to the apprehension of offenders, the execution of warrants and attendance at court. Constables remain subject to a range of other functions (powers and duties) under legislation and common law.

61. Section 10 of the Bill places the police oath in primary legislation for the first time and updates the wording of the oath. This oath has remained unchanged since 1892. The current wording has served its purpose well:

“I hereby do solemnly and sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of constable”.

62. The Bill sets out a new form of words for the oath:

“I, do solemnly, sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of constable with fairness, integrity, diligence and impartiality, according to law”.

63. This is intended to recognise the changing role of the police service and to emphasise the nature of the role and the relationship between the police and all individuals in society.

Fire and rescue functions

64. Sections 99 – 108 of the Bill provide for the functions of the Fire and Rescue Authorities/ Joint Boards set out in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 (the 2005 Act) to be transferred to the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. The Bill therefore proposes no changes to the functions set out below:

- Promoting fire safety;
- Fire fighting;
- Responding to road traffic accidents;
- Enforcing fire safety legislation in relevant premises; and
- Responding to any other eventualities likely to cause death, injury or illness, or harm to the environment (including buildings).

65. Some fire and rescue functions are in the Fire (Additional Function) Scotland Order 2005, made under section 11 of the 2005 Act. The Scottish Government intends to amend the Order by secondary legislation, so that these functions are transferred to the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. The functions are:

- Responding to chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear incidents;
- Providing urban search and rescue capability;
- Responding to serious flooding; and
- Responding to serious transport incidents.

66. A new Fire and Rescue Framework will be prepared and brought into effect through secondary legislation, to reflect these existing statutory functions, and give them a renewed focus by placing them within a context of promoting community engagement, prevention and partnership working to improve outcomes. Sections 100 and 101 of the Bill will also consolidate the fire safety responsibilities currently divided between the Scottish Government and the eight fire and rescue services into the new single service. Currently fire and rescue services provide advice, information, publicity and encouragement to prevent fires and death or injury from fires and to reduce losses. The Scottish Government works with fire and rescue services to promote fire safety including running regular national Fire Safety Campaigns. The Bill enables responsibility for promoting fire safety to be placed on the new service at local and national level.
Consultation responses

67. A number of responses to the second consultation broadly supported the proposed purpose for both policing and fire and rescue services, recognising the value of making clear the role of both services working in partnership with other services. A number of police and local authority respondents called for the purpose to include explicit references to core policing and partnership activity and to be supported by national guidance and, for police, assurances that the unique nature of the Office of the Constable is retained. The ACPOS response noted that the purpose in the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 based on “guard, patrol and watch” no longer fully reflects modern policing.

68. For fire and rescue a number of responses supported the use of the Fire and Rescue Framework to further define the purpose of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and there was support for including Fire Safety within the remit of the new service.

69. Responses to the second consultation had mixed views on the need to change the oath. The Scottish Government acknowledges respondents’ views that the oath has remained unchanged since 1892 and has served its purpose well, but other respondents highlighted that the police oath should be modernised to better reflect policing in the 21st century.

Police and fire and rescue functions, purpose and principles - alternative approaches

70. The Scottish Government considered setting out in statute a number of new, detailed functions for the police in recognition of the broad scope of activity in which the police are currently engaged. However the Scottish Government concluded that adapting the existing broad functions, particularly to emphasise prevention, would capture these wider activities, without the need for discrete statutory duties.

71. No alternative approaches were considered for fire and rescue.

ROBUST STATUTORY FRAMEWORK FOR NATIONAL GOVERNANCE

72. The Bill sets out a clear legislative framework to ensure effective national governance for policing and fire and rescue services across Scotland. It makes clear statutory provision for the:

- Role of the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board;
- Composition of the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board;
- Role of the Chief Constable and Chief Officer;
- Role of the Scottish Ministers; and
- Role of the Scottish Parliament.
The new governance arrangements respond to the weaknesses in police governance and accountability highlighted by the HMICS discussion paper of June 2011.\textsuperscript{15} In particular, HMICS was critical of the inconsistent way in which national policing functions are exercised - a mix of lead Force, collaborative agreements, SCDEA, and other less formal arrangements - and that decisions made by ACPOS which affect local, regional and national policing do not fall within the standard public sector governance arrangements.

The Role of the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board

Section 1 of the Bill establishes a new statutory body, the Scottish Police Authority, to maintain the Police Service of Scotland and hold the Chief Constable to account.

Section 99 of the Bill establishes a new statutory body, the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. It will provide fire and rescue services throughout Scotland and be governed by a Board. The Chief Officer, as an employee of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will be held to account by the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board.

The establishment of the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service provides a clear separation between the Scottish Ministers and the services. In particular, it ensures that the Chief Constable is free from undue political influence in making decisions about the investigation of crime.

The Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board are intended to provide strong governance arrangements and clear accountability for both services and, in the case of police, to respond to the weaknesses in governance and accountability highlighted by HMICS.

The Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will be required to undertake strategic planning and reporting and to consult stakeholders on the use of this new power. The Scottish Police Authority, the Chief Constable and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will also be subject to a statutory duty of Best Value and subject to examination and inspection by the Auditor General, HMICS and the Inspectors of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (the Inspectors of SFRS). This is essentially a continuation of the existing duty of Best Value on local authorities and joint boards, although the Bill has extended the duty to include the Chief Constable.

In the case of police, the provisions maintain the existing office of the Chief Constable, distinct from the Scottish Police Authority. The Bill further provides that all constables in the Police Service of Scotland (who are also office holders) are under the direction and control of the Chief Constable.

Consultation

80. The Scottish Government recognises the concerns raised in the first consultation about ensuring appropriate separation between the Scottish Ministers and services, the need for clear roles and responsibilities and for the national boards to be given robust powers to hold the chief officers to account. In particular, there was concern to ensure that the Chief Constable is free from undue political influence in making decisions about the investigation of crime. The Scottish Government considers that the proposals in the Bill address those concerns.

Alternative approaches – national governance

81. The Scottish Government considered whether both services should be established as agencies under the direct control of the Scottish Ministers. It examined a range of governance structures for both fire and rescue and policing in other countries and hosted an international summit on policing to explore this further in August 2011. It considered structures, common in countries such as Finland and Denmark, which would place the services more directly under the control of the Scottish Ministers. However, the Scottish Government was keen to establish a more transparent, arms length relationship with the Scottish Ministers which, especially in the case of policing, ensured a clear separation.

Independence of the forensic service from the Chief Constable

82. In order to maintain public confidence in the criminal justice system, the new structure will reflect the need to maintain a “sterile corridor” between police investigations and forensic investigations. In Scotland there is currently a ‘crime scene to court’ forensic service which has, since 2007, been part of the SPSA and independent from police forces. In order to maintain this arrangement, section 31 of the Bill requires the Scottish Police Authority to make arrangements for the provision of a forensic service which is accountable directly to the Scottish Police Authority: not to the Chief Constable.

Forensic service – consultation and alternative approach

83. The Scottish Government consulted with stakeholders on the approach to forensic services. This included ACPOS, the SPSA (which currently provides the forensic service), the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, the Information Commissioner’s office and academics with expertise in forensic science and ethics. Alternative approaches suggested were to house the forensic service within the Police Service of Scotland, reporting to the Chief Constable, or to establish a stand alone body to deliver forensic services. In order to maintain public confidence in the criminal justice system and forensic evidence presented in court, it is important that the process for gathering and analysing forensic evidence is visibly independent from the police investigation. On this basis, the option of placing forensic services under the control of the Chief Constable was discounted. The option of establishing a stand alone forensic service as an NDPB was also discounted on the basis that this would not have been in line with the Scottish Government’s aim of simplifying the public bodies landscape; and that the required degree of separation between the police and the forensic investigation could be achieved by establishing the forensic service within the Scottish Police Authority. This option is also more cost-effective and enables the forensic service to secure corporate services, such as Information
This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

Technology and Human Resources, from the Police Service of Scotland rather than having its own corporate services or buying them in from another body.

Composition of the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board

84. The Bill provides that members of the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board will be appointed by the Scottish Ministers on the basis of relevant skills and expertise to govern the services and hold the Chief Constable and Chief Officer to account. The Scottish Government recognises that local councillors, especially those with experience of police and fire and rescue services, will have much to offer the governance of the new services, and the appointments process will allow the Scottish Ministers to appoint a number of members to both on the basis of skills and expertise relating to local government. All appointments will be regulated under the Public Appointments Commissioner for Scotland: Code of Practice for Ministerial Appointments to Public Bodies in Scotland (“the Code”). The Bill will provide for the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board to have between 7 and 11 members although the Scottish Ministers will have a power to alter that number.

Alternative approaches - membership of the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board

85. The consultation paper invited views on the proposition that the Scottish Ministers should appoint a number of serving councillors, nominated by COSLA, in order to represent the collective voice of local government on the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board. The role of the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board is to ensure the effective delivery of policing and fire and rescue services across Scotland. As such, members are not attending meetings as representatives but to act in the best interests of the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. There is, therefore a potential conflict that arises from representative membership and the Scottish Government has concluded the Bill should not include any statutory requirement for representative members. Board members will be sought with a range of skills and expertise, including current or recent expertise of local government.

Consultation

86. The composition of the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board was seen as a critical issue by respondents to the second consultation. There was wide acceptance that members of the national boards should have a range of skills including knowledge of the public sector, business, ethical or human rights issues, audit and finance plus specific skills in policing, local government and justice. There were diverse views on the number of national board members required for the depth and breadth of roles needed or to represent the diversity and regional spread of communities. Local authorities and police and fire and rescue joint boards were of the view that all or at least the majority should be elected members and police forces, fire and rescue services and other organisations were of the view that it should be balanced.
Role of the Scottish Ministers

87. The Scottish Ministers will continue to be accountable to the Scottish Parliament for policing and fire and rescue services. However, the provisions in the Bill provide a clear separation between the Scottish Ministers and the services by ensuring their role is primarily a strategic one focussed on the appointment of members of the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board; approving the appointment of the Chief Constable and the Chief Officer; and setting national budgets and strategic priorities.

88. The Bill provides the Scottish Ministers with a power of direction in relation to the Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. This power is a normal feature of public bodies created by the Scottish Ministers and is used very rarely. The power to direct the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will encompass the Scottish Ministers’ existing powers to direct fire and rescue services for public safety purposes, in relation to use of equipment and services, and to issue emergency directions. The new power of direction will not impact on the Scottish Ministers’ existing power of direction where there is a failure to act in accordance with the fire and rescue framework; this is retained as a distinct mechanism for enforcing adherence to the framework.

89. The Scottish Ministers will have no power of direction in relation to the Chief Constable or Chief Officer.

Consultation

90. A number of responses to the second consultation sought more information on the circumstances in which the power of direction might be used and sought safeguards on the face of the legislation to ensure the power could not be misused.

Alternative approaches – role of the Scottish Ministers

91. The Scottish Government considered whether a Ministerial power of direction was necessary. It concluded that such a power, which is a feature of virtually every significant public body, was a necessary link in the chain of accountability to the Scottish Parliament. It is required to enable the Scottish Ministers to act in the public interest and to execute the will of the Scottish Parliament if necessary. Like all such powers, it would be used sparingly if at all. The Scottish Government also considered specifying the circumstances in which the power might be used but concluded that this was undesirable.

Role of the Lord Advocate and Procurators Fiscal

92. The Bill proposes no changes to the powers and responsibilities of the Lord Advocate and Procurators Fiscal. The Lord Advocate and Procurators Fiscal will continue to have responsibility for the direction of criminal investigations, including criminal allegations against police officers. The Chief Constable will continue to be under the direction of the Procurators Fiscal and be accountable to the Lord Advocate in these matters.
Alternative approaches

93. No alternative approach was considered for the role of the Lord Advocate in relation to the Police Service.

Role of the Scottish Parliament

94. The Bill provides the Scottish Parliament, for the first time, the opportunity to have a formal role in scrutinising the police and fire and rescue services. The current structural framework for policing in Scotland pre-dates the establishment of the Scottish Parliament and, with the exception of the SPSA and the SCDEA, the Scottish Parliament currently has a limited role in the scrutiny of policing. The Scottish Parliament passed new legislation for fire and rescue in 2005 and has a role in approving the strategic priorities set by the Scottish Ministers in the Fire and Rescue Framework. This will be augmented in the Bill. The Scottish Parliament will approve the budget for the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service through the budget process. The Bill requires the key strategic and planning documents as well as the annual report and accounts for each service to be laid before the Scottish Parliament. The Bill also requires the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner, HMICS and the Inspectors of SFRS (which replaces CIFRA as described below) to publish their reports and to lay them before the Scottish Parliament.

SCRUTINY ARRANGEMENTS

95. The Scottish Police Authority and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board will play a critical role in scrutinising the services and holding the Chief Constable and Chief Officer to account. Effective external scrutiny will also be an important part of the accountability framework for the new services. Scrutiny mechanisms are proposed for both police and fire and rescue which will provide professional and independent inspection.

Police audit and inspection

96. Part 1, Chapter 11 of the Bill provides that the Scottish Police Authority and the Police Service of Scotland will be inspected by HMICS, which will retain its existing powers and take on an additional power to examine the delivery of Best Value. The Bill puts the relationship between HMICS and the Scottish Parliament on a more structured footing than at present by requiring HMICS to publish its reports and make them available to the Scottish Parliament. HMICS is also required to present its reports to the Scottish Police Authority. This will be done simultaneously, in line with the recommendations of Professor Crerar’s review of external scrutiny\(^{16}\) in 2007. Section 42 of the Bill gives responsibility for audit of the Scottish Police Authority to the Auditor General who will also have powers under Section 43 of the Bill to examine the delivery of Best Value and the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of the service.

Fire and rescue: audit and inspection

97. At present the Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities (CIFRA), who is appointed by virtue of section 43 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005, may undertake inquiries into the services when directed to do so by the Scottish Ministers.

98. The Bill abolishes CIFRA and replaces it with a Chief Inspector, Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors (Inspectors of the SFRS). The Scottish Government intends that, as with CIFRA, these post holders should be non-Ministerial office holders within the Scottish Administration. Existing inspectors will be retained.

99. The Chief Inspector and Inspectors are to be appointed by Her Majesty by Order in Council (the present incumbent also carries a Royal Warrant), while Assistant Inspectors are appointed by the Scottish Ministers. The Inspectors of the SFRS will take over and strengthen the inspection role carried out by CIFRA.

100. Section 117 of the Bill provides that the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will be inspected by the Inspectors of the SFRS who may independently initiate inquiries as well as inspecting on direction by the Scottish Ministers. The Bill puts the relationship between the Inspectors of the SFRS and the Scottish Parliament on a clear footing by requiring the Inspectors of the SFRS to publish its reports and make reports relating to the state and efficiency of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service available to the Scottish Parliament. The Inspectors of the SFRS are also required to present its reports to the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. This will be done simultaneously, in line with the recommendations of Professor Crerar’s review of external scrutiny in 2007. Section 99 of the Bill inserts new Schedule 1A into the 2005 Act which requires the Scottish Fire And Rescue Service to send statements of accounts to the Auditor General for audit. The Auditor General will also have powers under Section 111 of the Bill to examine the delivery of Best Value in addition to his powers to examine the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of the service under Section 23 of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000.

Consultation responses

101. The proposals for the retention of independent audit and inspection arrangements for police and fire and rescue were supported across the majority of respondents to the second consultation. The Auditor General and HMICS’ response to the second consultation welcomed the arrangements for audit and inspection and indicated they would continue to develop their working relationship via Audit Scotland to ensure inspection and audit remained risk based, proportionate and complementary.

Alternative approaches

102. The Scottish Government considered adding to the existing functions of HMICS so that they also had responsibility for reviewing non criminal complaints and carrying out investigations into the more serious complaints. However the consultation responses suggested a preference for retaining a separation between the inspection and complaints reviewing and investigation functions.
103. Retaining the status quo for fire inspection was considered and rejected on the basis that a more robust arrangement was required.

104. The Scottish Government considered not placing the new services under a statutory duty of Best Value which applies to local authorities but to follow the more usual precedent for nationally funded bodies, by relying on the provisions of the Scottish Public Finance Manual to secure Best Value. However, given the current statutory duty placed on the current joint boards and unitary police and fire and rescue authorities in relation to Best Value, the Scottish Government has concluded that the Best Value duty should be continued in the new arrangements.

Police and fire and rescue complaints

105. The policy intention is to ensure robust and transparent procedures for handling complaints made in relation to the new services.

Fire and rescue complaints

106. For fire and rescue the intention is to follow the approach of other public bodies by making the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service a listed authority for the purposes of the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002.

Police complaints and serious cases and incidents

107. In the case of police, there is a need to provide public reassurance by ensuring that the most serious criminal allegations against police officers are investigated independently where appropriate.

108. Currently, complaints against the police and police staff range from complaints about quality of service to complaints about their conduct, behaviour and actions. The vast majority of complaints are currently handled through the complaints handling and line management functions within each force, with oversight from the relevant police authority or joint board. The police authority or joint board also has a direct responsibility for dealing with complaints about senior officers.

109. The Bill creates an independent investigatory capacity outside the Police Service of Scotland to investigate the most serious cases, including complaints and allegations of misconduct about senior officers and other incidents, particularly those involving death or serious injury, where it is in the public interest to have an independent investigation. In the current structure such cases are referred to another force.

110. The Bill provisions mean that the new Scottish Police Authority will have an important role in holding the Police Service to account. This includes monitoring and scrutinising complaints, dealing with complaints or allegations of misconduct about constables and ensuring that the service learns from, and acts on them, to improve performance and maintain public confidence.
111. There are a range of incidents, such as deaths in custody, serious and fatal road accidents involving police vehicles and serious crimes where the police may be at fault, where it is useful and necessary for the actions of the police to be reviewed or investigated independently. This also applies where there is significant doubt about the robustness or conduct of an investigation and it is deemed to be in the public interest to review an investigation. At present, this is normally carried out by a different force at the request of the force concerned.

112. The Bill gives additional powers to the Police Complaints Commissioner Scotland (PCCS), which will be renamed the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC). PIRC will undertake the investigation and review of the range of complaints and incidents described above. As at present, less serious criminal allegations will continue to be handled within the Police Service of Scotland under the independent direction and control of Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS). Non-criminal complaints will be handled within the service as happens at present and complainants will be able to seek a review of their complaint by the PIRC.

113. In addition the PIRC will retain all the existing functions of the PCCS. COPFS will continue to control and direct all investigations into criminal allegations against officers and police staff and will also retain the power to instigate a criminal investigation without prior referral from the police.

Alternative approaches and consultation – police complaints and serious incidents

114. The second consultation set out a number of options for how complaints and scrutiny could be handled in relation to the new independent investigatory capacity required in a single police service. Other options considered included transferring the complaints review handling functions to the Scottish Public Service Ombudsman (SPSO) which would have brought police complaints review into line with other public sector complaints.

115. In addition the Scottish Government considered bringing together the investigatory capacity and complaints handling reviews with the inspectorate functions of HMICS.

116. Responses to the second consultation provided a range of different views on these issues and in particular whether complaints against the police could be adequately handled by the SPSO and whether a single body, incorporating HMICS, should undertake all these functions. Responses were in the main supportive of the option of creating an independent body whose functions would include PCCS with additional investigative functions. Responses were supportive of the need for HMICS to retain its separation and independence from other bodies and that it should be separate from the investigation of serious incidents and criminal allegations in order to maintain public trust and confidence.

117. The Scottish Government concluded that there was merit in retaining the distinct role of HMICS and that both complaints and criminal allegations, serious incidents and reviews of investigations should be handled by a single independent Commissioner – the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner.
118. No alternatives were considered for complaints handling reviews for Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR FUNDING

119. The Bill establishes a new simplified funding model under which the Scottish Ministers will agree a funding settlement which will be paid directly to the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service following the Parliamentary budget process. This means that the services will be subject to a single system of financial control the same as that which applies to other public services established and funded by central government.

Police funding

120. Total police revenue funding in 2011-12 is £1,370m. About two thirds of this funding is provided directly by the Scottish Government. As well as police grant to joint boards and unitary authorities, this includes funding for police pensions and for the SPSA and the SCDEA; the Scottish Crime Campus at Gartcosh, the PCCS; the Scottish Safety Camera Programme; the 1,000 additional officers; police information and communication technology (ICT); counter-terrorism; the police radio system (Airwave) and police national databases.

121. The remaining third is contributed by local authorities, who provide funding to their joint police boards and unitary authorities alongside the Scottish Government police grant.

122. The Bill will put in place simplified arrangements for funding the police service with 100% funding provided to the Scottish Police Authority by the Scottish Government. The Scottish Police Authority will hold the Chief Constable to account for the bulk of the expenditure but will be able to retain a proportion of the money to fund its own governance functions and the forensic service. The Scottish Police Authority will be responsible for preparing accounts to be audited by the Auditor General and for those accounts to be placed before the Scottish Parliament.

Fire and rescue funding

123. Expenditure on the fire and rescue service amounted to £372 million in 2010-11. This comprised £273 million in local government expenditure, and £39 million in central government support, including for the Firelink communications system, national learning and development and fire capital grant. A further £60 million supports the firefighter and new firefighter pension scheme costs.

124. The Bill will put in place simplified arrangements for funding the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service with 100% funding provided to the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service by the Scottish Government. The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board will hold the Chief Officer to account through the internal delegation of responsibilities for expenditure on fire and rescue services, and will be responsible for preparing accounts to be audited by the Auditor General and for those accounts to be placed before the Scottish Parliament.
Charging for services

125. The Bill gives the Scottish Police Authority and the Chief Constable powers to charge for providing police services in certain circumstances. This power is primarily intended to permit the continuation of charging for the policing of major sporting events and music festivals. The Bill also gives the Scottish Police Authority powers to provide other goods and services, including forensic services, ICT and training to other public bodies, as well as in specified circumstances to private organisations and individuals, and to charge for the provision of those goods and services in order to recover its costs. These are not new powers but instead update and clarify the powers currently contained in the 1967 Act, the 2006 Act and the Local Authorities (Goods and Services) Act 1970 as amended by the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. Other more specific charging powers such as the power to charge for firearms licences are being continued through consequential amendments. The Scottish Ministers will expect the Scottish Police Authority to develop, publish and then regularly update guidance on charging for services, including a scale of charges, in consultation with relevant stakeholders, in order to ensure consistency in this area.

126. The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will retain powers conferred on fire and rescue services by the 2005 Act to charge for various activities, which appear to be working effectively.

Consultation

127. There was general support for the proposal in the second consultation paper to simplify the funding arrangements for police and fire and rescue. Concerns were, however, expressed about the need for a transparent model for allocation of resources to local areas that took account of local demand factors and to prevent the transfer of resources to the central belt.

128. The need to ensure a fair transfer of assets and liabilities was highlighted.

129. There were mixed views on the delegation of budgets. ACPOS did not support fully delegated budgets to local commanders. Other responses range from calls for a limited budget to allow local commanders to contribute to local partnerships, to support for the COSLA view that control by local authorities of local budgets to deliver the local policing plan was necessary for effective local accountability.

Police funding – alternative approaches

130. The Scottish Government considered whether local authorities should retain some control over funding for the new service. This would mean funding for the new national service being assembled from 33 different sources. It would not best support the new national service which is designed to provide more efficient and equitable access to resources and capability across Scotland, based on need and linked to local and national outcomes. Neither would leaving funding decisions at a local level provide the best way of removing inefficiencies and providing clarity or consistency at a national and a local level.

131. Funding for national initiatives, priorities and organisations (SPSA and SCDEA) currently provided by the Scottish Government through Police Central Government funding will also be consolidated and provided to the new Scottish Police Authority. The Scottish Government considered that retaining these funding streams at Government level, while transferring responsibility for providing the capabilities to the new service, would make for unnecessarily complex arrangements and would not provide a clear and transparent link between provision and financial accountability.

132. Overall, the Scottish Government considers that allocation of funding should be based on consistent assessment of national and community risk, and that this is best achieved by consolidating funding streams and aligning them with the new national governance and delivery structures.

Fire and rescue funding – alternative approaches

133. Local authorities currently provide revenue funding for the eight fire and rescue services. They have considerable discretion over these amounts, and there are differences in the levels of funding provided by the joint boards and the unitary authorities. The Scottish Government considered whether local authorities should retain some, or all, control over funding for the new service. However this would not best support the new national service which is designed to provide more efficient and equitable access to resources and capability across Scotland, based on need and integrated risk management planning and linked to local and national outcomes. Neither did the Scottish Government believe that leaving funding decisions at a local level would provide the best way of removing inefficiencies and providing clarity and consistency at a national and a local level.

134. The option of leaving the fire capital grant within local government, without the board structure, would not enable it to be allocated in a consistent way or make use of integrated risk management planning. The Scottish Government considers that the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service is best placed to identify local and national need and allocate resources accordingly, with the Scottish Ministers retaining the power to make grant conditions.

135. Funding for national capability currently provided by the Scottish Government will also be consolidated and granted to the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service, specifically for the National Fire College at Gullane and for Firelink, the national communications system. The Scottish Government considers that retaining these funding streams at Government level, while transferring responsibility for providing the capabilities to the new service would make for unnecessarily complex arrangements and would not provide a clear and transparent link between provision and financial accountability.

136. Overall, the Scottish Government considers that allocation of funding should be based on consistent assessment of national and community risk, and that this is best achieved by consolidating funding streams and aligning them with the new national governance and delivery structure.

Borrowing – police and fire and rescue – alternative approaches

137. No other alternative approaches to borrowing were considered. The Scottish Government expects the new bodies to be able to deliver their objectives within their allocated budgets and concluded that, like other government funded services, they should not routinely require to resort to borrowing. However in order to provide an element of flexibility for the future the Scottish Government has included a provision to borrow with Ministerial consent.

Assets – police and fire and rescue

138. Schedules 4 and 5 of the Bill make provision for the transfer of the assets and liabilities currently owned by police and fire and rescue boards and unitary authorities and used for police and fire and rescue purposes when the functions transfer, by means of a transfer scheme.

139. The Bill also allows for assets currently owned by the Scottish Government used for police and fire and rescue purposes to transfer to the new Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.

Alternative approaches – assets

140. No alternatives were considered for the transfer of assets.

WORKFORCE

141. The Bill sets out arrangements for the appointment of police officers, firefighters and other staff to the new services. The Scottish Government’s policy is that staff transferring within the public sector should do so as far as possible without any detriment to the individual in accordance with the Cabinet Office’s Statement of Practice on Staff Transfers in the Public Sector. The Bill sets out arrangements for the transfer of police officers, firefighters and all other staff in post on the day the services are established to the new services retaining their terms and conditions on that date. Joint board staff will transfer by virtue of the Bill provisions; other staff will transfer by transfer schemes.

142. Under current arrangements, the Chief Constable or Chief Officer can require an officer to serve anywhere within the police or fire and rescue service area or, if agreed locally, a specific part of that area. In a single service model, the equivalent of the area would be the entire country. The creation of a single police and a single fire and rescue service creates more professional and career opportunities for officers and staff in both services to serve in a variety of roles across Scotland. One of the advantages of the single service is the greater flexibility that it will provide to deploy officers and assets wherever they are needed. However, the Scottish Government does not intend that reform should bring hardship to individual officers or staff at the time the new Police Service, Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service are established. Any existing mobility arrangements will transfer with them to the new service restricted to their current force area. It will be for the leadership of the new service to negotiate any changes should it consider them necessary.

Police workforce

143. Police officers are office holders, not employees. This means their terms and conditions of service are primarily governed by legislation not employment law. Chapter 2 and Chapter 8 of the Bill set out the arrangements for the appointment of officers and for the making of regulations in relation to their detailed terms and conditions of service. Chapter 9 sets out arrangements for the continuation of the Police Appeal Tribunal to hear appeals where an officer has been dismissed or demoted in rank following disciplinary proceedings.

144. The Bill provides that responsibility for appointing the Chief Constable will be for the Scottish Police Authority, subject to the agreement of the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Government considers that this provides the right degree of separation between this key appointment and the Scottish Ministers.

145. Appointments to the offices of Deputy Chief Constable (DCC) and Assistant Chief Constable (ACC) will be made by the Scottish Police Authority following consultation with the Chief Constable. The Scottish Ministers anticipate that all appointments should be made following a fair and open competition. Appointments and promotions below the rank of Assistant Chief Constable will be for the new Chief Constable to determine in line with the regulations.

146. The Bill allows the Scottish Police Authority to employ staff who are under the direction and control of the Chief Constable to act in support of constables. These staff are to be known as police staff. It also allows the Scottish Police Authority to appoint staff to support it in its scrutiny role and to make arrangements for the provision of forensic services.

147. Section 95 and Schedule 4 of the Bill make arrangements for the transfer of police officers and staff to the new service. The following will apply:

- Police officers working in the eight police forces and SCDEA will transfer to the new Police Service of Scotland on the date the new service is established, to be under the direction and control of the Chief Constable, continuing to be governed by police regulations;
- Officers on secondment to SPSA will also transfer to the new service but any officer who is deployed to work on forensic services will be on secondment to the Scottish Police Authority;
- Officers on temporary service will remain on secondment and will have a right to return to the new service at the end of that temporary service;
- Any officer on secondment to any of the existing forces or SCDEA from a non-Scottish police force will remain on secondment but that secondment will be transferred to the new service; and
- Police staff in forces and SPSA will transfer to the Scottish Police Authority. The majority of these staff will be police staff transferred to work under the direction and control of the Chief Constable. Staff who work in forensic services or on the Scottish Police Authority’s scrutiny role will be Authority staff under the direction of the Scottish Police Authority.

148. Officers transferring to the new service will continue to be governed by police regulations and the Bill provides safeguards relating to mobility beyond current force areas. Any changes to police officer terms and conditions will continue to be subject to UK wide negotiation, provided by the Police Negotiating Board (PNB) at present.
149. It will be for the leadership of the new service to decide their approach for pay and the terms and conditions of service for new and existing police and Scottish Police Authority staff following negotiations through the trade unions; including whether to harmonise terms and conditions for staff previously employed by each of the eight existing authorities and joint boards and SPSA.

150. The Scottish Government will ensure that reform does not result in any detriment for members in respect of their pension scheme entitlements and will ensure police officers remain eligible for the Police Pension Scheme and police staff remain eligible to be members of the Local Government Pension Scheme (Scotland). There may be other changes as a result of wider public sector pension reform, but negotiations on this will be separate from the reform of the services.

Offences

151. The Bill re-enacts from the 1967 Act three offences committed by constables: absence from duty without reasonable excuse; neglect or violation of duty; and failure to return equipment. The first and last of these will carry the same penalties as in the 1967 Act. The specific offence of neglect or violation of duty will be subject to an increased maximum sentence of 5 years imprisonment, or to a fine, or both, if tried on indictment. This offence was only subject to summary proceedings under the 1967 Act, and any proceedings have therefore usually been taken on common law grounds to allow for a higher sentence. The policy intention is therefore to make prosecutions in relation to this offence easier by having a clear statutory offence with an appropriate penalty.

Consultation

152. Respondents to the second consultation including key stakeholders such as the Scottish Police Federation and the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents supported proposals on the retention of police officer and staff terms and condition and that officers and staff will retain their right to remain within their existing force area. The HMICS response notes that the proposals can be seen as recognising the concerns of existing staff and officers. There were however consistent calls across many responses on the need to harmonise police staff terms and conditions. This will be a matter for the Scottish Police Authority to determine in consultation with the trade unions.

Alternative approaches – police senior appointments

153. A number of respondents highlighted the need to make an early appointment of the first Chief Constable to allow him/her to play an active part in the transition to the new service. The Scottish Government considered whether the Scottish Ministers should make the first Chief Constable appointment to provide more planning time, but concluded that this would not provide the right degree of separation between the Scottish Ministers and the leader of the new service. The Scottish Government also considered that the relationship between the Chief and the Chair of the Scottish Police Authority would be crucial to the successful governance of the new service and that this would be assisted by the Chair leading the recruitment process.
Alternative approaches – Police Negotiating Board

154. The Scottish Government considered putting in place separate police negotiating arrangements for Scotland to replace the current UK wide arrangements in the Police Negotiating Board, but recognising that the current consensus within Scottish policing is that Scotland should remain within the UK wide negotiating structure, the Scottish Government is not proposing any changes to existing arrangements. The Scottish Government will however want to work with the Independent Chair of the PNB to ensure it continues to operate effectively in Scotland and meets the needs of Scottish policing. The Scottish Government will also need to take account of the implications for Scotland of any recommendations arising from Part 2 of the Winsor Review into the future of PNB.

Fire and rescue workforce

155. The Bill allows the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to appoint staff to ensure that it remains sufficiently resourced and able to carry out its duties. The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will, after negotiation with the trade unions, establish the terms and conditions which will apply for new officers and staff. The Scottish Ministers will be responsible for appointment of the first Chief Officer of the new service. Subsequent Chief Officers will be appointed by the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board, subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Ministers anticipate that all appointments should be made following a fair and open competition.

156. Reform will not change the status, or terms and conditions of service, of existing firefighters or support staff. The Bill sets out that all firefighters, officers, control room and support staff (including those on secondment to other bodies) employed by the Joint Boards, relevant staff employed by unitary authorities and the Scottish Government who are in post immediately before the new body is established should transfer to the new body on the day of establishment and should retain their terms and conditions of service on transfer. Once the new fire and rescue service is operational, any changes to terms and conditions, including harmonising the terms and conditions of service for support staff previously employed by each of the eight existing Fire and Rescue Authorities and Joint Boards, will be an issue to be negotiated between the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and the trade unions.

157. National pay and conditions for firefighters and support staff up to area manager level are set by the National Joint Council (NJC) Scheme of Conditions of Service. The 11 roles covered range from firefighter to area manager (and their control room equivalents). Additional elements of pay and allowances rest with the employer and are determined locally. Similar arrangements are in place for brigade managers (“Principal Officers”). There are no plans to change these negotiation arrangements during transition to a single service. Any changes to existing pay scales, for example to align with existing public sector pay frameworks, will require discussions between the new body and the trade unions.

158. The Scottish Government will ensure that fire and rescue reform does not result in any detriment for members in respect of their pension scheme entitlements and that firefighters retain their right to be members of the New Firefighters Pension Scheme and control room staff and support staff remain eligible to continue to be in the Local Government Pension Scheme (Scotland). There may, of course, be other changes as a result of wider public sector pension reform but negotiations on this will be separate from discussions around the reform of the fire and rescue services. Any Scottish Government staff who transfer to Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will no longer be eligible for membership of the Civil Service pension scheme. Arrangements will be put in place for a bulk transfer of these staff to the Local Government pension scheme.

Consultation

159. Respondents to the second consultation included key stakeholders such as the Fire Brigades Union and Unison. They supported proposals for the transfer of officers and staff to the new service although Unison expressed concerns in relation to workforce planning for control room staff and sought clarification around pensions and terms and conditions for support staff. There were however consistent calls across many responses on the need to harmonise staff terms and conditions. This will be a matter for the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to determine in consultation with the trade unions.

Alternative approaches – fire and rescue workforce - National Joint Council (NJC)

160. The Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 gives the Scottish Ministers the power to set up Scottish arrangements for negotiating pay and conditions. The Scottish Government considered using these powers to set up separate arrangements to replace the existing UK wide arrangements in the National Joint Council (NJC). However the Scottish Government considers that decisions on how best to review future arrangements are best made by the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board in due course. The Bill is repealing these powers (section 49 and 50 of 2005 Act).

PLACING INDEPENDENT CUSTODY VISITING ON A STATUTORY FOOTING

161. Independent custody visiting was introduced into Scotland in 1999. Under this scheme volunteers attend police stations to check on the treatment of people held in custody and the conditions in which they are held. Currently police authorities and joint boards have responsibility for organising and overseeing the delivery of independent custody visiting, in consultation with Chief Constables. The Bill places the arrangements for independent custody visiting on a statutory footing, as is currently the case in the rest of the UK.

162. The UK ratified OPCAT\(^\text{17}\) in March 2009. It is an international human rights treaty which sets out the measures which should be in place to monitor the treatment of and conditions of detainees. It created a Sub-Committee for the Prevention of Torture (SPT) which has issued guidance on implementation of OPCAT. While OPCAT does not dictate the structure of provision, the SPT has set out key criteria that should be met, most importantly that the scheme should be independent and impartial, with its mandate and powers set out in statute. Independent custody visiting schemes are statutory in England & Wales and Northern Ireland.

163. The Bill places the arrangements for independent custody visiting in Scotland on a statutory footing, in line with the rest of the UK. It ensures that independent custody visiting in Scotland is OPCAT compliant, building as much as possible on the existing skills and expertise across the custody visiting network. Duties which will be placed on the new Scottish Police Authority include:

- Ensuring that independent custody visiting schemes are in place and comply with Scottish Government guidance;
- Arranging publication of statistics and findings from custody visiting schemes; and
- Reviewing the arrangements for independent custody visiting as and when necessary and acting to address any issues.

Consultation

164. Proposals to put independent custody visiting on a statutory footing were broadly supported across all the respondents to the police reform proposals with wide acceptance that this will ensure this important service will continue to be delivered across Scotland.

Alternative approaches - independent custody visiting

165. No alternatives were considered as a statutory scheme of this nature is required to implement the Scottish Ministers’ obligations under OPCAT.

EFFECTS ON EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES, HUMAN RIGHTS, ISLAND COMMUNITIES, LOCAL GOVERNMENT, SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT ETC.

Equal opportunities

166. The provisions reforming the Police Service of Scotland and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, transgender status, marital status or religion. An Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) has been developed to better understand the issues that affect people in these groups, and any effects that the reforms may have. As part of this process, the first formal consultation sought views on potential impacts on equality. Officials also met with equality stakeholders, and equality and diversity leads and staff associations in the police and fire and rescue services, to obtain their insights and input into developing the EQIA.

167. Initial findings included the fact that both services’ workforces are predominantly male, with most female, disabled and ethnic minority staff being employed in support staff roles. As such, decisions affecting staff need to consider any impacts on these groups of people and implications on the diversity of the workforce. There are also a number of equality issues affecting communities, however reform will aim to help provide greater consistency in service delivery for equality groups throughout Scotland, and bring benefits in terms of economies of scale, best practice, shared budgets and resources. Key findings in relation to this include the need to retain and enhance the knowledge, relationships and current good work which has been taking place to address these issues; and to ensure that equality issues affecting communities are addressed going forward. Building relationships and effective local engagement, to understand the specific needs of individual communities, and the local impact of decisions affecting service delivery will be important going forward.
EQIA - Consultation

168. A draft of the EQIA was also included in the second consultation. Respondents welcomed the intention to allow those police and fire and rescue services which currently display good practice in service response and workforce issues across all the equality strands to lead the way in setting the equality agenda across the services. Responses will feed into further development of the EQIA and the findings will be considered as part of the transition process and operational delivery of the new services.

Human rights - police

169. The Scottish Government is committed to creating a modern, inclusive Scotland which respects, protects and realises human rights. The police have obligations across all their duties and powers under the Human Rights Act 1998. This will be continued under the new Police Service.

170. The police have a pivotal role in ensuring that people’s human rights are not infringed by others. They uphold the laws that, for example, protect people’s right to life (Article 2 ECHR), the right to respect for private and family life (Article 8), the prohibition of discrimination (Article 14) and the protection of property (Article 1 of Protocol 1). However, in performing this role the police are sometimes required to use force and/or to limit the right to liberty and security of individuals. Article 5 of the ECHR sets out the circumstances in which this can take place.

171. Given the above, the Scottish Government has carefully considered the effect of the Bill on human rights and considers that its provisions are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

172. The Bill makes no changes to the existing legal powers of the police to use force or to arrest or detain individuals and, in that respect, has no human rights implications. Nonetheless, provisions on the governance and accountability of policing; on independent complaints and investigations; on the provision of forensic services; and on Independent Custody Visiting will serve to enhance and protect human rights.

173. In terms of governance and accountability, the Scottish Police Authority will hold the Chief Constable to account for the performance and actions of the Police Service of Scotland, across the full range of policing. The Bill also provides more routine opportunities for the Scottish Parliament to consider and scrutinise policing by, for example, ensuring that the Scottish Policing Plan and Annual Reports of the Authority, HMICS and PIRC are laid before the Scottish Parliament. In its response to the second consultation, Amnesty International welcomed this.

174. The provisions of the Bill ensure that individuals continue to have recourse to an independent body, the PIRC, if they are not satisfied with the police’s handling of a complaint. This is consistent with the public’s right to an effective remedy as required under Article 13.
175. Articles 2 and 3 of ECHR protect the right to life and prohibit inhuman or degrading treatment. Taken together these Articles place a positive requirement on the state to investigate effectively incidents such as death or mistreatment where there is police involvement and to ensure both hierarchical and institutional independence in such investigations. The provisions of the Bill achieve this by establishing PIRC and giving it powers to investigate such incidents. It also supports Articles 2 and 3 by placing the arrangements for independent custody visiting, whereby volunteers attend police stations to check on the treatment of people held in custody and the conditions in which they are held, on a statutory footing.

176. The Bill establishes a forensic service which will be directly accountable to the Scottish Police Authority, rather than the Chief Constable, for its operation and performance. This provides an important separation between forensic and police investigations and in doing so, supports an individual’s right to a fair trial under Article 6.

Human rights - fire and rescue

177. There are no human rights issues raised through the Bill for fire and rescue services.

Human rights – consultation

178. In response to the consultation, organisations such as Amnesty International, the Scottish Human Rights Commission and the Human Rights Consortium Scotland, focused on the human rights implications of the proposals for a single Police Service of Scotland. They emphasised that reform provides an opportunity to embed human rights standards into the structure, policy and practice of policing in Scotland through, for example, explicit reference to human rights in the police purpose and oath. They also indicated that reform could enhance transparency and accountability; that there were useful lessons from the establishment of the Police Service for Northern Ireland; and that it was important that existing good practice on human rights was not lost in the process of reorganisation. Other responses highlighted the need for the composition of the Authority to include individuals who have the skills, experience and expertise to constructively challenge the Chief Constable (or agreed delegated chief officer) over the exercise of his or her powers across all types of policing.

179. Consultation responses showed wide support for the establishment of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC).

Rural and island communities

180. The Bill will have a positive impact on island communities, strengthening the connection between services and local communities by creating a formal relationship between each service and the 32 local authorities. The new roles of local commander and local senior officer will afford the three island local authorities a much greater role in the shaping of service priorities and delivery of local outcomes than would have been the case with joint boards on the mainland. The Bill will also ensure more equal access to specialist support and national capacity where it is needed.
181. The objective of police and fire and rescue reform is to protect and improve local services. Under new services, the majority of policing and fire and rescue services will continue to be delivered locally. The Bill provisions on local plans will help to ensure that the design and delivery of local services are tailored to the areas they serve, reflecting the particular needs of rural communities where appropriate and directed towards the distinct priorities of those areas.

Local government

182. As outlined, the Bill will create a new formal relationship between the services and local authorities, involving many more local councillors and better integrating with community planning partnerships.

183. Local government currently has a range of statutory functions including duties to:

- Appoint senior officers and set the terms of such appointments;
- Oversee the work of the Chief Constable / Officer and hold them to account;
- Control the budget for the force / service and provide the Chief Constable / Officer with necessary resources;
- Make arrangements to secure best value and report publicly on performance, in accordance with statutory guidance;
- Be informed of policing / fire and rescue provision in their area and call for reports from the Chief Constable / Officer in relation to particular policies; and
- Keep themselves informed of the manner in which the Chief Constable / Officer deals with complaints made by a member of the public.

184. Police and fire and rescue authorities also carry out a number of administrative functions, in particular handling finances, procurement and contractual issues (and in some cases clerking joint boards) but the discharge of these functions may be delegated to officials or to the Chief Constable and Chief Officer who may in turn arrange for the discharge of such functions by their staff.

185. For 30 of the 32 local authorities, these statutory functions are currently exercised by 6 regional joint boards, which cover between 3 and 12 local authority areas and are made up of representatives from those constituent areas. With the repeal of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 and the creation of the Scottish Police Authority, local authorities will cease to be police authorities, whilst changes to the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 mean that local authorities will cease to be fire and rescue authorities. In their place, the Bill creates a new, direct and formal relationship between the national services and each of Scotland’s 32 local authorities, involving many more local councillors in monitoring and challenging the services locally and better integrating service provision with community planning partnerships.

186. Responsibility for appointing senior officers, estates, assets and staff of joint boards and unitary police and fire and rescue authorities will transfer to the Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service respectively. As covered in paragraph 119, funding for both services will no longer fall to local government. Although the management of these assets and resources will transfer, the role of local authorities in working with the services to shape service design and delivery will be strengthened. The provisions will bring engagement and influence closer to communities than is the case for those 30 local authority areas currently covered by regional joint boards. This shift from regional to local engagement and monitoring will better align with arrangements for community planning and the development of Single Outcome Agreements. The benefits of co-terminous boundaries enjoyed by the two unitary police and fire and rescue authorities - Fife and Dumfries and Galloway - in helping facilitate effective and efficient partnership working will be adopted across Scotland.

Sustainable development

187. As with other public bodies in Scotland the new services will be subject to the requirements of the Climate Change (Scotland) Act 2009 and as such will be required to contribute to and report on the achievement of ambitious carbon reduction targets to reduce Scotland’s emissions of greenhouse gases by 80 per cent by 2050, with an interim target for 2020 of at least 42 per cent reductions in emissions.

188. The creation of single services will provide the opportunity to take a strategic approach to reducing energy-use, minimising waste and reducing transport.

Conclusion – fit with the wider public sector

189. The Scottish Government established the Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services, led by Dr Campbell Christie, in November 2010. The Commission was asked to undertake a strategic review of public service delivery in Scotland and to provide a road-map to guide the future reform of public services. The Commission was tasked specifically to make recommendations that would improve the quality of public services in Scotland and ensure the lasting financial sustainability of public service provision given the significant challenges ahead.

190. In June 2011, the Commission published its conclusions stating that the four key objectives of a reform programme must be to ensure that:

- Public services are built around people and communities, their needs, aspirations, capacities and skills, and work to build up their autonomy and resilience;
- Public service organisations work together effectively to achieve outcomes;
- Public service organisations prioritise prevention, reducing inequalities and promoting equality; and,
- All public services constantly seek to improve performance and reduce costs, and are open, transparent and accountable.

191. The Scottish Government’s response to the Christie Commission report was published on 21 September 201118. The Scottish Government committed itself to a public service reform programme which, over the term of this five-year Parliament, will intensify the focus on improving service outcomes for the people of Scotland. It will be built on four pillars:

This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

- A decisive shift towards prevention;
- Greater integration of public services at a local level, driven by better partnership, collaboration and effective local delivery;
- Greater investment in the people who deliver services through enhanced workforce development and effective leadership; and
- A sharp focus on improving performance, through greater transparency, innovation and use of digital technology.

192. Police and fire and rescue reform is one important element of that public sector reform programme, which is being developed following the principles of all four pillars of public sector reform.

193. There is a clear case for structural reform of police and fire and rescue. The performance of our vital frontline services depends on it, as there is strong evidence that creation of a single police and a single fire and rescue service is the best way to safeguard the vital frontline services communities depend on. The planned reforms will improve performance by retaining local services for local communities while giving all parts of Scotland access to national expertise and assets whenever and wherever they are needed. The new services will enhance partnership working at a local level by establishing strong, formal relationships between each service and each of Scotland’s 32 local authorities. Local officers will be designated for each local authority area to work with them, and other partners, to meet local priorities. In this new arrangement more local councillors will have a say in shaping services in their area. At a national level too, the Scottish Parliament will have more opportunities to scrutinise the performance of services and hold them to account.

194. The Scottish Government’s response to the Christie Commission also stressed the importance of public money being spent wisely to achieve better outcomes and improve value for money. In police and fire and rescue reform, estimated savings of £130 million per year can be achieved by making sure money is spent on the frontline and not on unnecessary duplication across eight services. Single services for Scotland are the best way to protect communities from cuts by freeing up resources for frontline policing and fire and rescue services.
POLICE AND FIRE REFORM (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE

1. This memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Scottish Parliament’s Standing Orders, in relation to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. It describes the purpose of each of the subordinate legislation provisions in the Bill and outlines the reasons for seeking the proposed powers. This memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

2. The contents of this Memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

BACKGROUND

3. The purpose of the Bill is to create a single police service and a single fire and rescue service. The Bill sets out the governance arrangements and framework for the new services. In addition, it provides:

   - a modern purpose for the police service and updated oath for constables;
   - a statutory framework for the delivery of police and fire and rescue services and appropriate scrutiny and oversight arrangements; and
   - arrangements for the transfer of existing officers and staff to both services.

4. To facilitate the establishment of single services the Bill abolishes the existing unitary police and fire authorities (Fife and Dumfries and Galloway) and the 6 joint police and joint fire boards which are established by amalgamation schemes made under the provisions of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 and the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 by bringing together a number of local authorities (who are individual police and fire authorities under the enabling legislation) to form joint boards.

5. A more detailed explanation of the Bill’s purpose can be found in the Policy Memorandum.

Outline of Bill provisions

6. The Bill is in 3 Parts. Part 1 deals with police, Part 2 deals with fire and rescue and Part 3 deals with general provisions. The Bill also includes 7 schedules setting out the detailed arrangements in relation to a number of areas covered by the Bill.

This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012
Part 1 Police Reform

7. Part 1 largely replaces the legislation underpinning policing in Scotland, the Police (Scotland) Act 1967, and puts in place a new modernised framework for policing. The Bill also repeals Part 1, Chapter 1 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 which established the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA). It amends Part 1, Chapter 2 of that Act which established the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland to rename it and extend the provisions in that Part to provide for more robust scrutiny of policing.

8. Police officers are office holders, not employees. This means their terms and conditions of service are set out in statute rather than being governed primarily by employment law. It is for this reason that the bill sets out detailed arrangements for the establishment of the Police Service and the appointment etc. of constables, including, in section 49, the power for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations governing the appointment and terms and conditions of service of police officers. The Scottish Government anticipates that the regulations made under this section will largely replicate those currently in force under the 1967 Act.

Part 2 – Fire Reform

9. Part 2 amends the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 to establish the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and transfers to it fire-fighting, fire safety and other functions under that Act.

Part 3 – General

10. Part 3 makes a number of general provisions relating to subordinate legislation, minor and consequential amendments to other legislation and commencement.

APPROACH TO USE OF DELEGATED POWERS

11. The Bill contains a number of delegated powers provisions which are explained in more detail below. In deciding whether these provisions should be specified on the face of the Bill or be included in subordinate legislation, the Scottish Government has carefully considered the importance of each matter against the need to:

- Ensure sufficient flexibility to respond to changing circumstances and to make changes quickly in the light of experience without the need for primary legislation; and

- Allow detailed administrative arrangements to be kept up to date within the basic structures and principles set out in the primary legislation.

General subordinate legislation provision

12. Section 120 contains general provisions about subordinate legislation. It provides for different provision to be made for different purposes and permits the powers to be used to make supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provisions as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate. Subordinate legislation made under the provisions relating to the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner will be subject to the procedures set out in section 103 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, as amended by paragraph 22(11) of schedule 6 to this Bill. Subordinate legislation made under the provisions introduced by Part 2 of the Bill will be subject to the procedures set out in section 88 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005.

13. An order made under section 10(2), an order made under section 11(5), an order made under section 41D(1) of the 2006 Act (to be inserted by section 67 of the Bill), orders made under paragraphs 7A(8) or 7B(4) of schedule 4 to the 2006 Act (to be inserted by paragraph 22(13)(b) of schedule 6 to the Bill) and an order made under section 121 containing provisions which add to, replace or omit the text of an Act are subject to the affirmative procedure. No procedure is specified for commencement orders, orders to appoint days for staff and constables to transfer to the new services, staff, constables and property transfer orders and schemes. All other powers are subject to the negative resolution procedure.

DELEGATED POWERS

14. The delegated powers provisions are listed below, with a short explanation of what each power allows, why the power has been taken in the Bill and why the selected form of Parliamentary procedure has been considered appropriate.

PART 1 – POLICE REFORM

Section 5(1) The Authority must comply with any direction (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: direction
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

15. Section 5(1) requires the Scottish Police Authority (the Authority) to comply with any direction given by the Scottish Ministers.

16. The power cannot be used for directions in relation to a specific operation being or to be carried out by the Police Service, or the way in which the Police Service is carrying out (or is to carry out) a specific operation.

Reason for taking power

17. This power enables the Scottish Ministers to direct the Authority to undertake particular actions which are in the wider public interest or to address significant concerns about the operation of its functions or the policing of Scotland.

18. The Authority will be responsible for a significant proportion of the Scottish Budget and an important area of public policy. It is therefore appropriate, as is common in wider Scottish Government public bodies policy, for the Scottish Ministers to have a power to direct the Authority which will be exercised only under exceptional circumstances. The Scottish Ministers have no power of direction over the Chief Constable.
Choice of procedure

19. No Parliamentary procedure applies, however the directions are required to be published and laid before the Scottish Parliament.

Section 10(2) – Power to modify the declaration for appointment of an individual as a constable

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

20. Section 10 provides for an individual to be appointed to the office of constable only where the individual has made a declaration before a sheriff or justice of the peace. Sub-section (2) enables the Scottish Ministers to modify that declaration by order.

Reason for taking power

21. This power is considered necessary and appropriate to enable the Scottish Ministers to modify the declaration if required for whatever reason. Under the 1967 Act the declaration is included in secondary legislation. As part of the framework for a new single service the Scottish Government considered that the declaration should be modernised and placed on the face of the Bill. The order making power provides the flexibility to further amend the declaration in future without the need for primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

22. An order made under this provision will be subject to affirmative procedure. This is appropriate as any change to the declaration would be an amendment to the primary legislation.

Section 11(5) – Power to add and remove ranks

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

23. Section 11(1) provides the ranks which a constable may hold in the Police Service of Scotland. Subsection (5) enables the Scottish Ministers to add or remove ranks, but only where that rank is below that of assistant chief constable.

Reason for taking power

24. This power is considered necessary and appropriate to ensure that the Scottish Ministers can facilitate organisational change within the Police Service of Scotland, either by adding or deleting ranks to respond to changing operational requirements.
Choice of procedure

25. Regulations made under this provision will be subject to affirmative procedure. This procedure is appropriate given the list of ranks appears on the face of the legislation. Furthermore, the regulations will also be subject to statutory consultation to ensure the views of those directly affected by the regulations are considered by the Scottish Ministers.

Section 15(2) – Power to prescribe types of service as being “temporary service” and to make further provisions as necessary.

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary Procedure: negative procedure

Provision

26. Section 15 makes provision for constables to be engaged in service outwith the Police Service on temporary service (or secondment), with the consent of the Chief Constable. Under section 15(2)(a) the Scottish Ministers can, by regulations, prescribe types of service as “temporary service”, and under section 15(2)(a) make whatever further provision they consider appropriate. A constable on temporary service is to continue to hold the office of constable, but does not have the powers and privileges of a constable unless they remain under the direction and control of the Chief Constable or the nature of the temporary service means it remains appropriate for them to retain their police powers. At the end of the temporary service, a constable is entitled to revert to the Police Service in the rank in which they were serving immediately before the period began and to be treated as if the constable had continued to serve in the Police Service for the purposes of the constable’s rate of pay. Subsection (2)(b) enables the Scottish Ministers to make further provision in this respect as they consider appropriate.

Reason for taking power

27. As police officers are office holders and their terms and conditions of service are set by statute it is necessary to make statutory provision to enable those officers to work outwith the Police Service whilst they remain police officers. Over time the types of temporary service are likely to change and there needs to be flexibility to make any changes without the need for primary legislation. This power enables the Scottish Ministers to ensure that a police officer is able to undertake temporary service with a wide range of other employers or services and for that range of services to change over time to take account of newly established bodies or to facilitate new types of joint working. It is preferable to have the capacity to do this without the need to await a suitable vehicle in primary legislation and providing for this in secondary legislation means that it will be possible to make arrangements for temporary service as best serves the Service, without the need for primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

28. Regulations made under these provisions will be subject to negative procedure. In essence the effect of the order is to define the types of service which are to be considered as temporary service and to make clear the conditions that attach to that service. This procedure is appropriate given the administrative nature and detail of these regulations and the probability of the power being used regularly as a result of the negotiation of terms and conditions.
Section 49 – Power to make regulations as to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables and police cadets

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

29. Section 49 gives the Scottish Ministers powers to make regulations for the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables (including special constables) and police cadets. Sections 50 to 54 set out in more detail the areas in which regulations can be made. These cover appointments; promotions; probation; efficiency and effectiveness; restrictions on private life or business interests; resignation; retirement; conditions of service; duties; disciplinary procedures; and personal records. Section 55 requires the Scottish Ministers to consult and share a draft of the regulations with the Chief Constable, the Authority, the staff associations and where appropriate the Police Negotiating Board for the United Kingdom and section 56 allows regulations to make provision for the delegation of functions.

Reason for taking power

30. These provisions are necessary as police officers are office holders and not employees. Their terms and conditions of service are therefore largely set in secondary legislation rather than through a contract of employment governed by employment law. Although cadets are not police officers they are appointed with a view to becoming officers and their terms and conditions are therefore broadly equivalent and are provided for through regulations. The Scottish Government anticipates that the first set of regulations made under section 49 of this Bill will be largely the same as those currently in operation under the 1967 Act, updated to take account of the establishment of a single police service. Regulations will be amended from time to time following appropriate statutory consultation and formal negotiation with the Chief Constable, the Authority and the staff associations. That, and the detailed technical and administrative nature of the material that will be included in these regulations and the need to have flexibility to amend at regular intervals, means that it is not thought appropriate to incorporate these matters in the Bill.

Choice of procedure

31. Regulations made under these provisions will be subject to negative procedure. This procedure is appropriate given the administrative nature and detail of these regulations and the probability of the power being used regularly as a result of the negotiation of terms and conditions.
Section 63, new section 33A:- Power to prescribe what is a “serious criminal offence” for the purposes of investigation by the PIRC

Power Conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

32. Section 63 inserts section 33A into the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 (the 2006 Act). Section 33A provides for the general functions of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner. Section 33A(2)(b) gives the Scottish Ministers power to prescribe offences as being a serious criminal offence for the purposes of section 33A(1)(b)(i).

Reason for taking power

33. The Commissioner will investigate any circumstances in which there is an indication that a person serving with the police may have committed a serious criminal offence. This will be done under the direction of the appropriate prosecutor, and will include offences resulting in death or serious injury, or other offences prescribed by regulations.

34. This power could be used to expand the types of offences that the Commissioner may investigate under the direction of the appropriate prosecutor without the need for amending primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

35. Regulations made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. The power only categorises an offence as a serious criminal offence which the appropriate prosecutor may then direct to the PIRC to investigate; the appropriate prosecutor is not obliged to order an investigation, nor would the outcome of the investigation be influenced as a result. Negative procedure therefore provides the appropriate degree of scrutiny.

Section 65 – Power to specify other circumstances as being serious incidents involving the police

Power Conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

36. Section 65 inserts section 41B into the 2006 Act. Section 41B(1)(b)(ii) and 41B(1)(c) provide respectively the Scottish Ministers with power to specify additional types of weapon which may have been used, and other circumstances which constitute a serious incident involving the police, for the purposes of investigation by the Commissioner.
Reason for taking power

37. The Commissioner will investigate serious incidents involving the police including incidents where firearms or other weapons are used by the police, where direct or indirect contact with the police may have contributed to death or serious injury, or any other circumstances as specified in regulations.

38. This power could be used to expand the types of incidents involving the police which would be considered serious and may be investigated by the Commissioner without the need for amending primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

39. Regulations made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. The power categorises a matter as being a serious incident involving the police which the Commissioner may then investigate; the outcome of the investigation would in no way be influenced as a result. Negative procedure therefore provides the appropriate degree of scrutiny.

Section 67 – Power to make provision about investigations by the Commissioner

Power Conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

40. Section 67 inserts section 41D into the 2006 Act. Section 41D(1) gives the Scottish Ministers power to make provision about investigations by the Commissioner in relation to serious incidents involving the police and the investigations undertaken by the Commissioner in the public interest. The provision sets out what the regulations may cover in particular. This order is made under section 103 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, as amended by paragraph 22(11) of schedule 6 to this Bill.

Reason for taking power

41. This power will allow the Scottish Ministers to prescribe in the regulations such matters as: a requirement on the Chief Constable and the Authority to refer matters to the Commissioner; the circumstances in which the Commissioner must, may or need not carry out investigations; time limits for investigations; and the delegation of functions to the Commissioner.

Choice of procedure

42. Regulations made under this provision will be subject to affirmative procedure. This procedure is appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament the opportunity to consider the detail of the form and procedures of investigations, the circumstances under which the Commissioner will carry out investigations and other matters relating to investigations by the Commissioner.
This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

Section 71(2) – Power to appoint inspectors of constabulary

Power conferred on: Her Majesty the Queen
Power exercisable by: Order in Council
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

43. Section 71(2) gives Her Majesty power to appoint such numbers of inspectors of constabulary in Scotland by Order in Council as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

Reason for taking power

44. The appointment by Order in Council provides for the appointment of an individual to be made without the need for new legislation whenever a new inspector is to be appointed.

Choice of procedure

45. The power will be subject to no procedure. This is suitable for administrative matters such as this and is consistent with the equivalent provision in the Police (Scotland) Act 1967. The Order in Council would be required to be laid before the Scottish Parliament under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010.

Section 84(1)(b) – Power to specify the type of goods and services the SPA may provide

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

46. Section 84 makes provision for the Authority to provide goods and services to any other public body or office-holder. Subsection (1)(b) provides the Scottish Ministers with power to specify the type of goods and services that may be provided to persons other than public bodies or office holders, and the persons to which they may be provided.

Reason for taking power

47. This power provides flexibility around the type of goods and services that can be provided and the persons or bodies which are to receive them. Over time this list is likely to change and there needs to be flexibility to do this without the need for primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

48. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. This procedure is appropriate given the administrative nature of the provision and the likelihood of the power being used regularly.
Section 84(3)(b) – Power to specify the type of goods and services the Police Service may provide

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

49. Section 84 makes provision for the Authority, with the consent of the Chief Constable, to make arrangements for the Police Service to provide goods and services (other than police services) to any other public body or office-holder. Subsection (3)(b) provides the Scottish Ministers with power to specify the type of goods and services that may be provided to persons other than public bodies or office holders, and the persons to which they may be provided.

Reason for taking power

50. This power provides flexibility around the type of goods and services that can be provided and the persons or bodies which are to receive them. Over time this list is likely to change and there needs to be flexibility to do this without the need for primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

51. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. This procedure is appropriate given the administrative nature of this provision and the probability of the power being used regularly.

Section 97(1) paragraph (e) of definition of “international joint investigation team” – Power to specify an international agreement to which the United Kingdom is a party and in accordance with which an investigation team is formed

Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

52. The definition of “international joint investigation team” lists 4 international agreements under which joint international agreements may be formed. Paragraph (e) of the definition gives the Scottish Ministers power to specify other international agreements to which the UK is a party for the purposes of section 24, 87, 88 or 93.

Reason for taking power

53. This power allows the Scottish Ministers to keep the definition of a joint investigation team in line with any changing international agreements, without the need for primary legislation.
Choice of procedure

54. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. It is expected that the necessary scrutiny, including any changes to devolved legislation, will already have been applied before the UK becomes a party to applicable international agreements and therefore the same level of scrutiny will not be appropriate here. Negative procedure therefore provides the appropriate level of scrutiny.

PART 2 – FIRE REFORM

Section 99, new schedule 1A, paragraph 2(4) – Power to modify minimum and maximum number of members of SFRS

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

55. Section 99 inserts Schedule 1A into the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. Paragraph 2 provides for the Scottish Ministers to appoint members of SFRS. Subsection (4) provides that SFRS is to consist of no fewer than seven nor more than eleven members, including a chairing member. Sub-paragraph (4) provides power for the Scottish Ministers to amend by order the minimum and maximum number of board members.

Reason for taking power

56. These arrangements reflect current best practice on optimum board size and have flexibility built into them. It is considered appropriate that there should be power to amend the minimum and maximum number of board members if this proves necessary in the light of experience without requiring further primary legislation. Sub-paragraph (4) provides power for the Scottish Ministers to amend by order the minimum and maximum number of board members.

Choice of procedure

57. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. The power allows for altering the number of SFRS members without changing the structure or functions of SFRS, as agreed by the Scottish Parliament, in any way.

Section 99, new schedule 1A paragraph 3(d) – Power to specify persons of such other descriptions who may be disqualified from membership of the SFRS Board

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure
Provision

58. Paragraph 3 of new Schedule 1A of the 2005 Act describes persons who are disqualified from appointment and from holding office, as a member of SFRS. Sub-paragraph (d) of paragraph 3 gives the Scottish Ministers power to prescribe other descriptions of persons who should be disqualified from appointment.

Reason for taking power

59. This power is considered appropriate to ensure no conflict arises between the role of board members and any other role they may hold. It also allows the necessary ability to respond to new and emerging circumstance and legislation.

Choice of procedure

60. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure, given its administrative nature.

Section 112, new section 41A(6) – Power to set the start date of the 3 year period to which the first strategic plan relates

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

61. Section 112 requires SFRS to prepare a strategic plan setting out how it proposes to carry out its functions during a period of 3 years. The plan sets out outcomes by reference to which the carrying out of its functions may be measured and any such other material relating to its functions or to any period as SFRS thinks fit.

Reason for taking power

62. Section 112 inserts section 41A into the 2005 Act. Sub section (6) of section 41A gives the Scottish Ministers power to appoint a day before which SFRS must endeavour to secure the approval of the Scottish Ministers to the strategic plan. The 3 year period to which the strategic plan relates is then defined as the 3 years starting on that day, as provided in subsection (2)(a) of section 41A.

63. The 3 year planning period will need to be set in accordance with when SFRS is established and the timing of any new or amended fire and rescue framework. It will also be necessary to take into account prevailing circumstances when SFRS is established and to allow SFRS sufficient time to prepare, consult on and submit a plan for approval. Given these variables, it is appropriate for the date to be set by the Scottish Ministers by order at a later date, in discussion with SFRS.
Choice of procedure

64. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. The start of the 3 year period is of an administrative nature and therefore affirmative procedure is unnecessary.

Section 116, new section 42A – Power to give SFRS general or specific directions
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: direction
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

65. Section 116 inserts section 42A into the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. The provision enables the Scottish Ministers to give SFRS general or specific directions.

Reason for taking power

66. This power enables the Scottish Ministers to direct SFRS to undertake particular actions which are in the wider public interest to address significant concerns about the operation of its functions.

67. SFRS will be responsible for delivering a core public service, and with it will have responsibility for a significant proportion of the Scottish Budget and an important area of public policy. It is therefore appropriate, as is common in wider Scottish Government public bodies policy, for the Scottish Ministers to have a power to direct SFRS which will be exercised only under exceptional circumstances.

Choice of procedure

68. No Parliamentary procedure applies, however the directions are required to be published and then laid before the Scottish Parliament.

Section 117, new section 43A – Power to appoint by Order in Council Inspectors of SFRS
Power conferred on: Her Majesty the Queen
Power exercisable by: Order in Council
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

69. Section 117 gives Her Majesty power to appoint by Order in the Council a Chief Inspector of SFRS and such number of Inspectors as the Scottish Ministers may determine.
This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

Reason for taking power

70. The appointment by Order in Council provides for the appointment of an individual to be made without the need for new legislation whenever a new Chief Inspector or Inspector is to be appointed.

Choice of procedure

71. The power will be subject to no procedure. This is considered to be an appropriate level of scrutiny for administrative matters such as this and is consistent with the equivalent provision in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. The Order in Council would be required to be laid before the Scottish Parliament under section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010.

PART 3 - GENERAL

Section 121 - Ancillary Provision

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative / affirmative procedure

Provision

72. Section 121(1) enables the Scottish Ministers to make such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in consequence of or for giving full effect to, any provision made by or under this Bill.

Reason for taking power

73. To enable the Scottish Ministers to adequately give effect to the provisions in this Bill.

Choice of procedure

74. An order made under this section which contains a provision which adds to, omits or replaces any part of an Act is subject to the affirmative procedure. Any other order made under this section is subject to the negative procedure. These procedures are typical for ancillary powers.

Section 122 – Transitional Provision

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

75. Section 122(1) enables the Scottish Ministers to make transitional, transitory and savings provisions in connection with the coming into force of any provision of this Act.
Reason for taking power

76. This order is necessary to allow for flexibility as provisions within the Bill are brought into force. Without the power, it may be necessary to return to the Scottish Parliament, through subsequent primary legislation, to deal with a matter which could be dealt with through this power. That would not be an effective use of resources by the Scottish Parliament or the Scottish Government. The power, whilst potentially wide, is limited to the extent that it can only be used if the Scottish Ministers consider it necessary or expedient in connection with the coming into force of any provision of the Bill.

Choice of procedure

77. This is a residual power that is included to ensure that any unforeseen obstacle to the transition to the Scottish Police Authority or to SFRS can be addressed. There are precedents for this kind of power, which is restricted by the fact that only transitional and transitory provision can be made. Bearing in mind the limited scope of the power, in terms of the subject matter and nature of the provision that can be made, it is felt that the negative procedure will provide sufficient Parliamentary scrutiny.

Provision

78. Section 124(2) enables the Scottish Ministers to appoint days on which the provisions in the Bill come into force (other than sections 120, 121, 122 and 125 which come into force on the day after Royal Assent).

Reason for taking power

79. To enable the Scottish Ministers to appropriately commence the provisions in the Bill.

Choice of procedure

80. The power will be subject to no procedure which is standard for commencement powers.

SCHEDULES

Provision

81. Schedule 1 paragraph 2 enables the Scottish Ministers to appoint members of the Scottish Police Authority. Sub-paragraph (1) provides that the Authority is to consist of no fewer than seven nor more than eleven members, including a chairing member. Sub-paragraph (4) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to change the minimum or maximum number of members.

Reason for taking power

82. These arrangements reflect current best practice on optimum board size and have flexibility built into them. It is considered appropriate that there should be power to amend the minimum and maximum number of Authority members if this proves necessary in the light of experience without requiring further primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

83. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. The power allows for altering the number of Authority members without changing the structure or functions of the Authority, as agreed by the Scottish Parliament, in any way.

Schedule 1 paragraph 3(h) - Power to specify persons of such other descriptions who may be disqualified from membership of the Scottish Police Authority

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

84. Paragraph 3 of schedule 5 describes persons who are disqualified from appointment or from holding office as a member of the Authority. Sub-paragraph (h) gives the Scottish Ministers power to prescribe other descriptions of persons who should be disqualified from appointment.

Reason for taking power

85. This power is considered appropriate to enable the Scottish Ministers to ensure that no conflict arises between the role of Authority members and any other role they may hold. It also allows the necessary ability to respond to new and emerging circumstances and legislation.

Choice of procedure

86. An order made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure, given its administrative nature.
This document relates to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 8) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012

Power exercisable by: rules made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: negative procedure

Provision

87. Paragraph 4 of schedule 3 provides the Scottish Ministers with power to make rules pertaining to the police appeals tribunal procedure.

Reason for taking power

88. The rules will set out in detail what are largely administrative provisions. It is not considered appropriate to include such detailed provisions in primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

89. Rules made under this provision will be subject to negative procedure. This procedure is appropriate for detailed technical matters and is consistent with other types of court or tribunal rules.

Schedule 4 paragraph 2(1) – Power to appoint a day (or days) for the transfer of constables, staff, property, etc.

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

90. Schedule 4 provides for the transfer of constables, staff and property etc. Paragraph 2(1) of schedule 4 gives the Scottish Ministers power to specify the date on which police constables and staff will transfer to the Police Service of Scotland or Scottish Police Authority.

Reason for taking power

91. In preparation for the establishment of the service, it will be necessary to ensure that constables and staff transfer at the appropriate time. It may be necessary for different staff to transfer on different dates or for all staff to transfer on a particular date to support the smooth and effective transition to the new service. The date or dates cannot at this stage be specified as it will depend on work undertaken with and by the existing services and the result of timescales for transition. It is therefore appropriate for the date or dates to be set by order in due course.

Choice of procedure

92. An order made under this provision will be subject to no parliamentary procedure as it is simply determining the date on which constables and staff will transfer in accordance with the provisions set out in the Bill and is therefore analogous with a commencement order.
Schedule 4 paragraph 11(1) – Power to make a staff transfer scheme
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: scheme
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

93. Paragraph 3 and paragraph 10 of schedule 4 provide for the transfer of constables, joint board staff and employees of a local authority who are to be treated as police employees to the Police Service of Scotland or Scottish Police Authority on a day the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

94. Paragraph 11 of schedule 4 makes provision for the transfer to the Police Service of Scotland or the Authority of persons who are employed by a local authority and whose employment relates to the carrying out of functions conferred on the police service. The Scottish Ministers may make a staff transfer scheme which makes provisions for the transfer of such persons.

95. Sub-paragraph (3) of paragraph 11 provides that before making a staff transfer scheme, the Scottish Ministers must consult any local authority or other person whose rights, liability and obligations are to be transferred.

Reason for taking power and choice of procedure

96. The scheme will need to make detailed provision in order to capture all appropriate staff and ensure that they are dealt with in an effective and principled fashion. Individual local authorities will be best placed to set the arrangements for their own areas, subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers. Bearing in mind the level of detail involved, and from the perspective of maintaining confidentiality, it is not thought that these matters could practicably be dealt with on the face of the Bill, or that they require the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament.

Schedule 4 paragraph 16(1) – Power to make a police property transfer scheme
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: scheme
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

97. To ensure a seamless transition to the Police Service of Scotland, the intention is that property belonging to the Scottish Ministers, local authorities, joint police boards or the SPSA can be transferred to the Authority or a local authority on such date as the Scottish Ministers specify.

Reason for taking power and choice of procedure

98. Paragraph 16 of schedule 4 provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to make a police property transfer scheme which makes provision for or in connection with the transfer to the Authority of property, rights, liabilities and obligations currently belonging to the Scottish Ministers, local authorities, joint police boards or the SPSA, and which relate to the Authority’s functions or police functions.

99. The scheme will need to make detailed provision in order to capture all property, rights, liabilities and obligations and ensure that they are dealt with in an effective and principled fashion. Local authorities, joint police boards and the SPSA will be best placed to set the arrangements for their own areas, subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers. Bearing in mind the level of detail involved, it is not thought that these matters could practicably be dealt with on the face of the Bill, or that they require the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament.

Schedule 4 paragraph 17 – Power to make a local authority property transfer scheme

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: scheme
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

100. Paragraph 17 of schedule 4 provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to make a local authority property transfer scheme, which makes provision for or in connection with the transfer to a specified local authority, rather than the Authority, of property, rights, liabilities and obligations currently belonging to a specified joint board.

Reason for taking power and choice of procedure

101. As for police property schemes, it is not thought that these matters could practicably be dealt with on the face of the Bill, or that they require the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament.

Schedule 5 paragraph 1 – Power to appoint a day (or days) for the transfer of staff, property, etc.

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

102. Schedule 5 provides for the transfer of staff, property etc. Paragraph 1 of schedule 5 gives the Scottish Ministers power to specify the day or dates on which SFRS staff will transfer to the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.

Reason for taking power

103. In preparation for the establishment of the service it will be necessary to ensure that SFRS staff transfer at the appropriate time. It may be necessary for different staff to transfer on different dates or for all staff to transfer on a particular date to support the smooth and effective transition to the new service. The date or dates cannot at this stage be specified as it will depend on work undertaken with and by the existing services and the result of timescales for transition. It is therefore appropriate for the date or dates to be set by order in due course.
Choice of procedure.

104. An order made under this provision will be subject to no parliamentary procedure as it is simply determining the date on which SFRS staff will transfer in accordance with the provisions set out in the Bill and is therefore analogous with a commencement order.

Schedule 5 paragraph 3 – Power to make a staff transfer scheme
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: scheme
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

105. Paragraph 2 of schedule 5 provides for the transfer of all joint board staff to SFRS on a day the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

106. Paragraph 3 makes provision for the transfer to SFRS of persons who are employed by a local authority or are members of the staff of the Scottish Ministers and whose employment relates to the carrying out of functions conferred on SFRS. The Scottish Ministers may make a staff transfer scheme which makes provisions for the transfer of such persons.

107. Paragraph 4 sets out the effect on a contract of employment of a staff transfer scheme. Sub-paragraph (9) provides that, before making a staff transfer scheme, the Scottish Ministers must consult any local authority or other person whose rights, liability and obligations are to be transferred.

Reason for taking power and choice of procedure

108. The scheme will need to make detailed provision in order to capture all appropriate staff and ensure that they are dealt with in an effective and principled fashion. Individual local authorities and staff of the Scottish Ministers will be best placed to set the arrangements for their own areas, subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers. Bearing in mind the level of detail involved, and from the perspective of maintaining confidentiality, it is not thought that these matters could practicably be dealt with on the face of the Bill, or that they require the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament.

Schedule 5 paragraph 5 – Power to make an SFRS property transfer scheme
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: scheme
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

109. To ensure a seamless transition to SFRS, the intention is that property belonging to the Scottish Ministers, local authorities and joint fire and rescue boards can be transferred to SFRS on such date as the Scottish Ministers specify.
110. Paragraph 5 of schedule 5 provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to make an SFRS property transfer scheme which makes provision for or in connection with the transfer to SFRS of property, rights, liabilities and obligations currently belonging to the Scottish Ministers, local authorities and joint fire and rescue boards, and which relate to SFRS functions.

Reason for taking power and choice of procedure

111. The scheme will need to make detailed provision in order to capture all property, rights, liabilities and obligations and ensure that they are dealt with in an effective and principled fashion. Local authorities and joint fire and rescue boards will be best placed to set the arrangements for their own areas, subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers. Bearing in mind the level of detail involved, it is not thought that these matters could practicably be dealt with on the face of the Bill, or that they require the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament.

Schedule 5 paragraph 6 – Power to make a local authority property transfer scheme
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: scheme
Parliamentary procedure: no procedure

Provision

112. Paragraph 6 of schedule 5 provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to make a local authority property transfer scheme, which makes provision for or in connection with the transfer to a specified local authority, rather than SFRS, of property, rights, liabilities and obligations currently belonging to a specified joint board.

Reason for taking power and choice of procedure

113. As for SFRS property schemes, it is not thought that these matters could practicably be dealt with on the face of the Bill, or that they require the scrutiny of the Scottish Parliament.

Schedule 6, paragraph 22(13)(b) - Power to apply provisions of the Bill etc to staff of the Police and Investigations Review Commissioner
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

114. Paragraph 22(13)(b) of Schedule 6 provides for the Scottish Ministers to apply any provisions of the 2012 Act to the constables or other persons appointed by the Commissioner as members of staff under paragraph 7A of schedule 4 to the 2006 Act. This order is made under section 103 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, as amended by paragraph 22(11) of schedule 6 to this Bill.
Reason for taking power

115. The Commissioner’s staff may be seconded from police services in the UK or elsewhere or recruited directly. In order to carry out investigations staff members will have all the powers and privileges of a police constable.

116. This power may be used by the Scottish Ministers to apply provisions within the Act to the Commissioner’s staff such as those in relation to the functions of constables set out in section 20 of the Bill. For example, the duty to attend court to give evidence, or the duty to make such reports to the appropriate prosecutor as may be needed. Other provisions, such as section 22 which relates to failure to perform duty and section 23, failure to return equipment, may also need to be applied.

Choice of procedure

117. The order will be subject to affirmative procedure. This provides the appropriate level of Parliamentary scrutiny because the power would involve the application with modifications of primary legislation.

Schedule 6, paragraph 22(13)(b) - Power to apply enactments relating to investigation of offences to PIRC investigations

- Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: order made by statutory instrument
- Parliamentary procedure: affirmative procedure

Provision

118. Paragraph 22(13)(b) of schedule 6 inserts section 7B into the 2006 Act and provides power to apply any enactment relating to investigations by constables to investigations by the Commissioner’s staff. This order is made under section 103 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, as amended by paragraph 22(11) of schedule 6 to this Bill.

Reason for taking power

119. The Commissioner’s staff will carry out investigations into a range of incidents involving persons serving with the police. Some will be under the direction of an appropriate prosecutor, others at the request of the Chief Constable or the Authority.

120. This power is in relation to investigations under the direction of an appropriate prosecutor into circumstances in which there is an indication that a person serving with the police may have committed a serious criminal offence including circumstances in which death or serious injury has resulted. Other types of serious criminal offences that the Commissioner may investigate will be defined in regulations (as set out in paragraphs above).

121. The Commissioner may designate a member of his staff to take charge of any investigation and other staff members to assist the member designated to take charge. As set out above in paragraph 39 these staff members will have the powers and privileges of a constable throughout Scotland. Investigations may include gathering evidence, questioning witnesses, surveillance, and obtaining prints and samples. Part II of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 sets out police functions in relation to, for example, questioning potential witnesses and obtaining samples.

122. The Scottish Ministers may use the power in 22(13)(b) to apply provisions such as those set out in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to investigations carried out by the Commissioner’s staff.

Choice of procedure

123. The order will be subject to affirmative procedure. This provides the appropriate level of Parliamentary scrutiny because the power would involve the application with modifications of primary legislation.

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

General

1. The majority of the Committee supports the general principles of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill1.

Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board

Role, size and composition

2. We are of the strong view that the primary function of the SPA and of the SFRS Board is to govern the new services and to hold the chief constable and chief fire officer to account.

3. We are not convinced that the Bill should specify a set number of either lay or local authority members to sit on the boards, as we believe that flexibility is required to ensure the most suitable individuals are appointed.

4. The Committee is reluctant to stipulate the size of the SPA and SFRS Board, as we believe that the quality and experience of their members are far more important than numbers. However, we lean towards the view that a board of fewer than 11 members would not provide the breadth of knowledge and experience required to demonstrate effective governance, nor would it allow for the vacancies and absences that will inevitably arise.

5. The Committee recommends that part of the Boards’ initial work should include suitable training for all members to ensure they are equipped to contribute effectively to the work of the boards.

6. The Committee agrees with witnesses that the SPA must be transparent in delivery of its functions, including holding its meetings in public and publishing its papers, to demonstrate accountability and gain trust, particularly with the public.

1 Alison McInnes MSP did not support the general principles of the Bill.
7. We believe that the same principles of transparency should apply to the SFRS Board.

Relationship between the SPA and SFRS Board and local government

8. We are not convinced that there is a need for a formal mechanism to be included on the face of the Bill to help resolve disputes between the national police or fire and rescue boards and local authorities.

9. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide greater clarity on the relationship between the national boards and local authorities, perhaps within the guidance it is developing on local scrutiny mechanisms.

Power to specify the type of goods and services the SPA may provide

10. The Committee notes the Subordinate Legislation Committee’s concerns that the power to specify the type of goods and services the SPA may provide appears to be “very general”. On balance, however, we accept the Scottish Government’s reassurances that the power will only be exercised in certain circumstances and that the Scottish Parliament will have an opportunity to examine the related subordinate legislation.

Reserves

11. The Committee is unclear as to why the Bill does not give the SPA and SFRS the ability to accrue reserves. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to provide an explanation as to why this power, which was available to the police and fire and rescue authorities and joint boards, is being removed.

Role of the Scottish Ministers

12. The Committee believes there must be a balance between operational independence and democratic accountability of the police and therefore accepts the Scottish Government’s position that use of the power of direction may be necessary in very limited circumstances and in relation to non-operational matters only. Furthermore, we are not convinced that including a definition of operational independence on the face of the Bill would be helpful.

13. We do however acknowledge the genuine concerns of witnesses on this matter and would urge the Scottish Government to work with stakeholders to try to allay these fears, perhaps by developing guidance or a protocol and making use of suggested definitions of operational independence, such as that provided by the Scottish Police Federation, as a starting point.

Role of the Scottish Parliament

14. The Committee accepts that the move to national services and the abolition of local government authorities and boards places an onus on the Scottish Parliament to enhance and formalise its scrutiny of the police and fire and rescue services. Accordingly, we welcome provisions in the Bill requiring strategies and plans to be laid before the Parliament.

15. The Committee considers that there is a strong case to be made for the Bill securing Parliamentary oversight of the police.
16. The Committee agrees with the Finance Committee that effective post-legislative scrutiny of the move to single services will be crucial and would welcome a commitment by the Scottish Government to provide sufficient information to assist this process.

Priorities, strategic and local plans, and annual reports, including local scrutiny

17. The Committee notes that the chief constable is to be involved in preparation of the strategic and annual plans, but we are unclear as to exactly what “involve” means in practice. We therefore seek clarification on this and on why there is no similar requirement to involve the chief constable in the preparation of the strategic police priorities.

Local accountability and scrutiny

Local budgets

18. The Committee believes that, in the interests of transparency and accountability, a “snapshot” of resource allocation within local authority areas as of 1 April 2013 should be given to local authorities so that they can measure any future changes, such as the transfer of funds, assets, and human resources.

19. The Committee would welcome clarification as to whether, in practice, local authorities will have a degree of influence over local police resources.

20. The Committee notes that funding for additional police officers is currently provided by local authorities. The Scottish Government has indicated that there appears to be no reason why this cannot continue under the Bill. The Committee seeks clarification on how this would work in practice.

Rank of local commander and local senior officer

21. The Committee agrees with the Local Government and Regeneration Committee that the rank of local commander and local senior officer is not significant, and endorses the view that the knowledge and relationships that they build will be a more significant factor in negotiations on resources.

Local scrutiny

22. The Committee does not believe that the manner in which local authorities are to scrutinise the local plans should be included on the face of the Bill, as we believe this would be too prescriptive and would not allow any flexibility for local authorities to develop scrutiny mechanisms best suited to their own local areas.

23. However, the Committee agrees that guidance for local authorities on this matter would be helpful and therefore supports the Scottish Government’s plan to develop such guidance, informed by the outcomes of the pathfinder projects, which are currently underway. We urge the Scottish Government to ensure that this guidance is available for local authorities in time for them to put in place any scrutiny mechanisms before the single services become operational.
Community planning
24. The Committee is not convinced by the argument put forward by some witnesses that the statutory duty to participate in local community planning should be extended to the chief constable and chief fire officer and is satisfied that this is a role more suited to local commanders and local senior officers.

25. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee considered in more detail witnesses’ views on how the new services could engage with the public and recommended that local commanders and local fire officers should develop strategies for engaging with the public on policing and fire services. The Committee seeks the views of the Scottish Government on this matter.

Assets and liabilities
26. The Committee seeks clarification as to how the assets and liabilities of the current police and fire and rescue authorities and joint boards will be redistributed.

Implementation

Appointment of the chief constable and chief fire officer
27. The Committee agrees with the overwhelming evidence that the chief constable and chief fire officer should be appointed as early as possible, and certainly before the proposed date of December 2012.

28. We note that the first chief fire officer may be appointed by the Scottish Ministers and would urge that this is undertaken as soon as possible.

29. The Committee urges the Scottish Government to consider the options suggested by witnesses and others, with a view to a chief constable being in place at the earliest opportunity, while ensuring that the independence and robustness of the process is not undermined.

Outline business cases
30. The Committee seeks clarification from the Scottish Government as to (a) when the full business cases for the police and fire and rescue services will be completed, and (b) whether, in principle, the annual budgets for the services will be adjusted on the basis of the full business cases.

31. The Committee notes witnesses’ concerns regarding the ability to achieve the projected savings contained in the outline business cases within the expected timescales. Therefore, we seek clarification as to the impact of the projected redundancies of civilian posts on the front line.

Value Added Tax
32. Regardless of whether the cost of VAT is to be met by the police and fire and rescue services or whether alternative arrangements are in place, the Committee is concerned at the possibility of a significant annual recurrent loss from the Scottish budget. The Committee urges the Scottish Government to pursue with HM Treasury all possibilities to resolve this issue, for example, (a) by treating the Police Service of Scotland in a similar way to the Police Service of Northern Ireland, and/or (b) by giving local authorities the capacity to contribute to police and fire budgets, so as to help clarify that the new bodies can “draw upon local taxation”.

Cross-border arrangements
33. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide an update on the outcome of discussions with the UK Government regarding negotiations on cross-border arrangements.

Policing

Failure to perform duty
34. The Committee seeks clarification as to why the Scottish Government feels that it is necessary for the offence of neglect or violation of duty on the part of a constable to be prosecuted under solemn procedure, when witnesses have argued that this matter can be adequately dealt with under common law.

Police appeals tribunal
35. On balance we are persuaded by the argument that police appeals tribunal should have membership composing solicitors and advocates, in the interests of ensuring that proceedings are impartial and determined by an appropriately qualified body.

Retirement of senior officers
36. The Committee notes the concerns of witnesses on the provision in the Bill to require a chief constable, a deputy chief constable or an assistant chief constable to retire in the “interests of efficiency or effectiveness”, and asks the Scottish Government to consider and respond to these concerns.

Forensic services
37. The Committee accepts the Scottish Government’s rationale behind giving the Scottish Police Authority the responsibility to provide forensic services so as to create a “sterile corridor” between police investigations and forensic investigations.

38. We do, however, seek clarity on how this will work in practice, and in particular whether forensic services will still be required to attend a crime scene where requested to do so by the police service.

39. The Committee recommends that the Bill should include a provision specifying that forensic services should be supplied to the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner at no cost.

Complaints and investigations
40. The Committee seeks clarity on how the relationship between the Lord Advocate and the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner would work regarding criminal investigations, and in particular as to the role of the PIRC in relation to serious incidents involving the police. We further seek the Scottish Government’s views on comments by some witnesses that the power of the PIRC in relation to public interest investigations is too wide.

41. As with the chief constable and chief fire officer, we consider that the PIRC should be appointed as early as possible to enable their investigating team to be in place before 1 April 2013, but that the appointments process must be both independent and perceived to be independent.

42. The Committee also seeks clarification as to whether the Scottish Government intends the PIRC to be a self-contained body or whether its staff will be seconded from the police.

43. The Committee agrees that the PIRC should have qualified privilege to protect him or her from defamation proceedings, as suggested by the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland.

44. The Committee invites the Scottish Government to clarify whether it considers there to be sufficient independent oversight of the PIRC’s complaints handling procedures.

Independent custody visiting
45. The Committee is broadly content with provisions on independent custody visiting. However, we note some witnesses’ concerns about the potential for access to be denied and invite the Scottish Government to clarify whether it is satisfied that this is consistent with international obligations.

Human Rights
46. The Committee notes the good practice from Northern Ireland in relation to embedding human rights within all aspects of policing and recommends that the Scottish Government gives consideration to the Bill being more explicit on human rights.

Fire and rescue

Fire and rescue functions
47. The Committee accepts that it would be helpful for the rescue aspect of the fire and rescue service’s functions to be clarified to a greater degree, but does not believe that this should necessarily be included in the Bill. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to discuss with fire bodies where best to clarify or codify their rescue functions, such as in the Fire and Rescue Framework or the next Fire (Additional Function) (Scotland) Order.

Fire officer and staff issues
48. The Committee notes the comments of the Fire Brigades Union and the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland regarding the provision in the Bill which removes section 49 (on negotiation arrangements in relation to conditions of service) from the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. We therefore invite the Scottish Government to explain the rationale for removing this provision.
INTRODUCTION

Parliamentary scrutiny

49. The Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill\(^2\) was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 16 January 2012. The Parliament designated the Justice Committee as lead committee to report on the general principles of the Bill at Stage 1, and the Local Government and Regeneration (LGR) Committee as secondary committee.

50. The Justice Committee issued a call for written evidence on the Bill, to which it received 43 written submissions and seven supplementary responses. The Committee took evidence on the Bill at five meetings between 28 February and 27 March, hearing from a range of police and fire bodies, unions, inspections, complaints and finance organisations, and police and fire authorities and joint boards, as well as the Cabinet Secretary for Justice.

51. The LGR Committee agreed to focus its scrutiny on those parts of the Bill relating to the arrangements for local authorities and implementation of local policing and fire service arrangements.\(^3\) It took evidence on 21 February and reported on 19 March.

52. The Finance Committee reported on the Financial Memorandum on the Bill on 20 March\(^4\), while the Subordinate Legislation Committee published its report on the Delegated Powers Memorandum on 22 March\(^5\).

Background to the Bill

The Police in Scotland

53. The earliest form of policing in Scotland was the duty of watch and ward, carried out by burgesses in burghs from at least the 12\(^{th}\) century. Scotland’s first constables were appointed in 1617, and in 1800 Glasgow was the first burgh in the UK to establish a police force along modern lines. The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1833 gave powers to Scottish burghs to create police forces, if they had not already done so; this meant that an individual act of parliament to form a specific police force was no longer required.\(^6\) Throughout the 19\(^{th}\) and into the 20\(^{th}\) centuries, the police service was largely seen as a responsibility of local government.

54. In 1960, a Royal Commission was appointed to review the constitutional position of the police throughout Great Britain. Its terms of reference were to consider and make recommendations on: (a) the constitution and functions of local police authorities; (b) the status and accountability of police forces, including chief officers; (c) the relationship of the police with the public and dealing with public complaints, and (d) remuneration of constables. The Commission reported in 1962 and recommended securing a more effective system of control and accountability over the police, by moving towards a more centralised model. It had two main concerns with the existing arrangements: (a) the problem of controlling chief constables, and (b) the lack of technical competence and an inadequate system of inspection within police authorities.

55. The Police (Scotland) Act 1967 (the 1967 Act) was informed by the work of the Royal Commission and remains to this day the legislation underpinning policing in Scotland. The 1967 Act created the ‘tripartite’ sharing of responsibility for policing in Scotland between the Secretary for State, police authorities or joint police boards, and the chief constables of each of the forces. It has been argued that the main mechanism for obtaining ‘policing by consent’, the principle by which police forces operate with the support and co-operation of the public, has been through the tripartite system.

56. The police authorities or joint police boards, which are made up of local councillors, have responsibility for the following:

- setting the budget for their force;
- appointing senior police officers (with the agreement of the Scottish Ministers);
- determining the numbers of police officers and civilian support staff for their area;
- appointing civilian support staff; and
- playing a role in securing Best Value and continuous improvement within their force.

57. While the 1967 Act does not refer to the term ‘operational independence of chief constables’, this concept has become “common currency amongst those concerned with and commenting on policing in Scotland”.12 The Scottish Government’s online publication on police powers and functions explains:

“Scottish Ministers retain the overall responsibility for policing policy. Police authorities and joint police boards are responsible for setting police budgets and ensuring that best value is attained for the public purse. Chief constables are responsible for the operational aspects of policing within their force areas.”13

58. Police forces in Scotland are established under the 1967 Act. The current structure of eight police forces in Scotland dates from local government regionalisation in 1975. The eight forces are: Central Scotland Police; Dumfries and Galloway Constabulary; Fife Constabulary; Grampian Police; Lothian and Borders Police; Northern Constabulary; Strathclyde Police, and Tayside Police. The forces vary substantially in terms of size, area, population and levels of funding.

59. From 1975, the forces reflected geographically the regional tier of local government, with the exception of the Lothian and Borders force, which covered two regional council areas, and Northern Constabulary, which covered Highland Region and the Island Authorities of Orkney, Shetland and Comhairle nan Eilean Siar (Western Isles). Following the most recent local government reorganisation in 1996, when regional and district councils were abolished and replaced with a single tier of 32 local authorities, the direct link between local government boundaries and the police service all but disappeared. However, Fife Council and Dumfries and Galloway Council continued to cover the same geographical areas as their constabularies.

60. With devolution in 1999, the majority of policing functions were transferred to Scotland.14 The tripartite arrangements remain unchanged, except that the functions of the Secretary for State were passed to the Scottish Ministers.

61. Police forces are currently funded by the Scottish Government and local authorities. The requirement on local authorities to match central government funding to a formula is no longer in place. However, in practice most local authorities have continued to match central government funding at a ratio of 49 per cent from local government to 51 per cent from central government. Funding is also provided by the Scottish Government for national policing services provided by the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA), and for other national priorities, such as police ICT and counter terrorism.15

14 The police functions that remain reserved under the Scotland Act 1998 are those relating to the Firearms Acts 1968 to 1997, immigration and national security.
62. Before the 2007 Scottish Parliament elections, the Scottish National Party included in its manifesto a commitment to deliver 1000 additional police officers (to reach a number of 17,234). This policy was given effect through the Scottish Budget and Spending Review 2007 and the Scottish Government has since continued its commitment to maintain police numbers at a minimum of 17,234. The economic downturn has resulted in significant budget cuts to the public sector in Scotland, including to the police, which has increased the pressure for some sort of structural reform which would allow frontline policing at current levels to be maintained. It is against this backdrop that a number of reviews into policing and its structure have been conducted over recent years. Many of these are discussed below.

63. In January 2008, the then Justice Committee of the Scottish Parliament conducted an inquiry into the effective use of police resources, which concluded that resources were inadequate to meet policing commitments at that time, including the Scottish Government’s proposal for an increase of 1000 officers. The inquiry also highlighted other areas where improvements could be made in the operation and governance of the police, and recommended that the Scottish Government initiate an independent review of the role and responsibilities of the police in Scotland “to ensure that we have a service that is fit for the 21st century”.

64. Later that year, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice invited Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland (HMICS) to conduct an independent review of policing in Scotland, as recommended by the then Justice Committee. This review noted that policing in Scotland is a “relatively expensive concern costing more than £1 billion per annum” and that “forces are facing increasing financial pressures, arising both from current commitments and from a lack of robust costing of new demands”.

65. HMICS published a discussion paper in 2011, this time on the governance and accountability of policing in Scotland, which highlighted “weaknesses in police governance and accountability which have perpetuated since the 1962 Royal Commission and which, it is contended, must be redressed in supporting any future model of policing in Scotland”. HMICS was also critical of the inconsistent way in which national policing functions were exercised—through a mix of lead police force, collaborative arrangements, the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency, and other less formal arrangements. The Scottish Government claims in its Policy Memorandum that the new governance arrangements proposed in the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill will address these weaknesses.

19 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 73.
66. In 2011, the Scottish Government conducted two consultations on police reform. The first, ‘A Consultation on the Future of Policing in Scotland’, ran from 10 February until 5 May. It presented three options: a single service; a rationalised regional model; or retention of the existing eight service model with greater collaboration.

67. The consultation document outlined the Scottish Government’s position that the status quo was untenable and that reform was necessary. In his foreword to the paper, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice indicated that there was a growing consensus that the eight force structure was unsustainable given the financial situation. However, he did not make clear at that stage whether the Scottish Government favoured a single service or regional model.

68. While there was general agreement that the adverse economic climate required changes to policing in Scotland, the consultation did not produce a consensus on a particular policing structure. Of the 219 respondents, 35 per cent gave no view or said there was insufficient information to enable an informed choice on structure; 21 per cent chose a regional model; 27 per cent preferred the status quo, and 10 per cent opted for a single service structure. Key issues highlighted in responses included the need to (a) protect local policing in communities, (b) strengthen local accountability, and (c) put in place arrangements for national governance to avoid political interference in enforcing the law.

69. In July 2011, the Scottish Government invited comment from stakeholders on a draft Outline Business Case (OBC) for the reform of the police service, which had been developed by professionals, experts and stakeholders, building on work started in 2010 by the Scottish Policing Board. Each OBC used Target Operating Model (TOM) methods to assess the most efficient way of delivering the key service functions, and this was then applied to the three reform options. Non-financial benefits were also estimated by identifying a series of outcomes, applying weighting to them and ranking each option for reform in terms of their potential to deliver against these options. This exercise identified the single service structure as performing best in relation to non-financial benefits.

70. The police OBC concluded that substantial efficiency savings could be made regardless of force structure and that most of these savings could be realised within the first five years. However, it identified the single service option as achieving the most significant savings. The OBC assumes that a level of savings will continue over a projected 15-year period. The costs of reform are estimated to peak after five years, reduce the following year, and remain on a level for the projected 15-year period.

23 The OBC describes a TOM as an optimum model for service delivery, allowing an informed assessment of the costs, benefits and risks associated with each option.
Fire and rescue services
71. The first organised public fire brigade in the United Kingdom was formed in Edinburgh in 1824 and, by the early years of the 20th century, there were over 180 municipal fire brigades operating in Scotland. The Fire Services Act 1947 established 11 fire brigades in Scotland and gave local authorities control of them through joint boards. This structure was streamlined to eight brigades in 1975 with the regionalisation of local government.24

72. The statutory framework governing the fire and rescue services was modernised in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 (the 2005 Act), which placed a greater emphasis on the rescue aspect of the services, and established local authorities as the fire and rescue authorities for their area.25 Scotland has two unitary fire boards: Fife, and Dumfries and Galloway, and six joint boards: Grampian, Tayside, Central, Lothian and Borders, Highland and Islands, and Strathclyde. As with the police, fire and rescue authorities and joint boards are made up of local councillors. They have responsibility for:

- establishing the fire and rescue services’ local strategic direction and aims, in conjunction with the fire and rescue service senior management team;
- ensuring accountability to the public for the fire and rescue service performance; and
- ensuring that the service is managed effectively, with probity and integrity.26

73. The majority of funding for the fire and rescue service is paid through revenue support grant made available directly to the 32 local authorities.

74. The Scottish Government’s initial consultation27 on reform of the fire and rescue services ran from 10 February until 5 May 2011, parallel to that on police reform. It outlined the Scottish Government’s view that the eight brigade model could not maintain (or improve) performance and meet public expectations in the face of “unprecedented budget cuts” because of the way it was structured and organised. In the foreword to the document, the Minister for Community Safety made clear the Scottish Government’s preference for a single fire and rescue service. Views were sought on proposals to decentralise resources and support functions, and suggestions invited on improvements, accountability mechanisms, and the balance between national and local involvement.

75. There was general agreement among the 171 respondents that the number of fire and rescue services in Scotland needed to be reduced but, of those who expressed a preference, more chose a regional structure than a single structure.

However, a majority of submissions suggested that there was insufficient information on which to make an informed decision on structure.

76. Stakeholders were invited to comment on a draft fire and rescue service OBC\(^{29}\) in July 2011, which had been developed in the same manner as that of the police service, building on work by a Ministerial Advisory Group. TOM methods were used to assess the most efficient way of delivering the key service functions and assessing the three reform options: the status quo (with enhanced collaboration), a regional structure of three or four brigades, or a single fire and rescue service.

77. The fire and rescue service OBC, like that of the police, suggested that significant financial and non-financial savings would be achieved by reform, but that these savings would vary depending on which of the three structural options were selected. However, the OBC suggested that the single service model would produce the largest savings, both financial and non-financial.

Scottish Government joint consultation on the police and fire and rescue services

78. On 8 September 2011, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice announced to the Parliament the Scottish Government’s intention to introduce legislation to create a single national police service and a single national fire and rescue service, indicating this would deliver estimated savings of £130 million a year and £1.7 billion over 15 years.

79. The Policy Memorandum on the Bill outlines the main issues raised during this consultation, including the need for more clarity in respect of local and national accountability mechanisms, the composition of the new oversight organisations, and the roles and responsibilities of local and chief officers.\(^{32}\)

80. A majority of political parties represented in the Scottish Parliament made commitments similar to those of the Scottish Government on establishing single police and fire and rescue services within their manifestoes for the 2011 election. It would appear that many of those organisations and individuals initially opposed to a single service model have since accepted that it is now inevitable. Despite any previous reservations, witnesses have engaged fully with the Committee’s Stage 1 scrutiny of the Bill and have appeared genuinely committed to making the new structures and processes work as effectively as possible. The Committee wishes to thank all of the witnesses and those who provided written submissions for their valuable contribution to Stage 1 scrutiny of the Bill.

\(^{32}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 14.
Outline of the Bill

81. According to the Scottish Government’s policy memorandum, the main policy aims of the Bill are:

- to protect and improve local services despite financial cuts, by stopping duplication of support services eight times over and not cutting front line services;
- to create more equal access to specialist support and national capacity – like murder investigations team, firearms teams or flood rescue – where and when they are needed; and
- to strengthen the connection between services and communities, by creating a new formal relationship with each of the 32 local authorities, involving many more local councillors and better integrating with community planning partnerships.33

82. The Bill has two main parts.

83. Part 1 largely repeals the legislation underpinning policing in Scotland, the 1967 Act, and puts in place a new modernised framework for policing. The Bill also repeals Chapter 1 of the Police, Criminal Justice and Public Order (Scotland) Act 2006 (the 2006 Act), which established the SPSA and the SCDEA. The Bill also amends Chapter 2 of the 2006 Act to rename the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland and add investigatory powers in certain circumstances.

84. Part 2 amends the 2005 Act to establish the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and transfers to it fire fighting, fire safety, and other functions under that Act. Aside from centralisation, reforms to the fire and rescue services are less extensive than those of police services because they were significantly updated relatively recently through the 2005 Act.

85. Further background to the Bill and its overall aims are set out in the Policy Memorandum and explored further in the briefings produced by the Scottish Parliament Information Centre on the Bill34 and on the Financial Memorandum35.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE BILL

86. The Committee is required under Rule 9.6.1 of Standing Orders to report on the general principles of the Bill. The general principles of the Bill are to merge both the police and the fire and rescue services into single services, transferring the governance and oversight responsibilities of local authorities to new national boards. The key issue for the Committee in considering the general principles of the Bill was whether the new national structures could deliver the services effectively throughout Scotland.

---

87. The general acceptance that reform is now inevitable\(^{36}\) led the majority of witnesses not to focus on the general principles of the Bill, but instead to make constructive suggestions on how it might be improved, and their comments are included throughout the report. Only two respondents to the Committee’s call for evidence made it absolutely clear that they remained opposed to the key principle of a single police force. UNISON Scotland stated that it “believes that the centralisation of police services in Scotland is wrong in principle”\(^{37}\), while Reform Scotland argued that the Scottish Government had “not provided sufficient justification for taking a service which has historically been delivered at a local level and running it from the centre”\(^{38}\).

88. The Committee looked at how the traditional role of local authorities would change under the Bill and whether this could hamper the services’ ability to deliver their functions locally. The Bill does not specify if, or how many, local authority members should sit on the national boards and removes responsibility for setting local budgets for the services from local authorities. It does give local authorities a clear role in approving the local plans to be produced by the new services, but is silent on how they should make arrangements for doing so and on scrutiny of the services more generally. The Committee explores these arrangements further in the later in this report.

89. A further consequence of centralisation appears, at this stage, to be the loss of the ability to recover VAT for the provision of services under the Value Added Tax Act 1994. The Committee considers that, while it is important to highlight this issue at this stage, we do not believe that it is of such significance as to affect our decision on the general principles either way. VAT recovery is considered in more detail later in our report.

90. While the Scottish Government argued that the connection between services and communities would be strengthened by the Bill, the Committee heard evidence that it would in fact erode the local authority role in policing and fire and rescue services. Professor Jim Gallagher of Nuffield College, Oxford, argued that the new local authority powers were much weaker than at present and questioned whether they provided greater accountability\(^{39}\), while Councillor Pat Watters, President of COSLA, agreed that local authorities would no longer have any “real powers” or “something that the police are accountable for to local communities”\(^{40}\). A number of witnesses suggested that some local accountability could be achieved if budgets were devolved to local authority level; this issue is considered in more detail later in the report.

91. However, there was a strong belief amongst many police and fire bodies that the changes would not be detrimental to local policing or fire and rescue services and indeed could benefit them. For example, Chief Constable Kevin Smith, \(^{36}\) Paragraph 32 of this report.

President of ACPOS, said “we and the Government agree absolutely with each other on the objectives of reform”\(^{41}\), while Brian Sweeney of the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland stated “where a certain service has been bound administratively and financially by its borders and boundaries, the fact that they will be removed will offer a tremendous opportunity”\(^{42}\).

92. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee he believed that the single services would “strengthen the links between police and fire and rescue services and the communities they serve by enabling individual local councils, not regional joint boards, to take on a new role at a national level and to shape services in the local area”.\(^{43}\)

93. In June 2011, the Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services, chaired by Dr Campbell Christie CBE, proposed an “urgent, sustained and coherent programme of public service reform”.\(^{44}\) The Commission identified a number of priorities for public service reform, including concentrating efforts on delivering integrated services and recognising that effective services must be designed with and for people and communities—not delivered ‘top down’ for administrative convenience. The Scottish Government responded by committing to a public service reform programme over this session of the Parliament with an emphasis on, among other things, a shift towards prevention, greater integration of public services at a local level, effective leadership, and improved performance.\(^{45}\)

94. In its Policy Memorandum on this Bill, the Scottish Government states that police and fire and rescue reform is one important element of its public sector reform programme.\(^{46}\) However, UNISON Scotland argued that the proposals on police and fire and rescue reform are “exactly the sort of ‘top down’ approach the Christie Commission warned against”.\(^{47}\)

95. The Committee recognises there is an economic driver for reform. However, the majority of the Committee also accepts that reform of the police and fire and rescue services provides an opportunity to enhance service delivery across communities in Scotland. We are not convinced by the argument that, because policing and fire and rescue services have traditionally been delivered through local authorities, this structure should always remain. However, we do see a key role for local authorities in the new structure and an opportunity for them to determine their own mechanisms for involvement best suited to their local areas. Some of us think that some changes might be required to strengthen and secure their role. We explore these issues in more detail later in the report.

96. Therefore, the majority of the Committee supports the general principles of the Bill.
97. One member of the Committee was not convinced that local policing and fire and rescue services could be delivered successfully through a national structure and is concerned that local accountability is being lost in the Bill. That member therefore does not support the general principles of the Bill.48

Policy and Financial Memorandums

98. The lead committee is required under Rule 9.6.3 of Standing Orders to report on the Policy Memorandum which accompanies the Bill. We consider that the Memorandum provides adequate detail on the policy intention behind the provisions in the Bill and explains why alternative approaches considered were not favoured. The Committee was also content with the details of the consultations conducted by the Scottish Government prior to introduction of the Bill.

99. The same rule also requires the lead committee to report on the Financial Memorandum (FM). While the Committee considers the FM and comments from the Finance Committee later in this report, we wish to highlight here that there were concerns amongst some witnesses regarding the figures contained in the outline business cases (OBCs) used to inform the FM.

Structure

100. The remainder of this report is structured around three overarching themes relating both to the police and fire and rescue services which arose in evidence gathered by the Committee. These are: national governance; priorities, plans and reports, including local scrutiny; and implementation. The final two sections of the report explore specific issues relating to provisions on the police and on the fire and rescue service respectively.

NATIONAL GOVERNANCE

101. The Bill removes the current tripartite arrangements and puts in place new arrangements for national accountability and governance.

102. The Policy Memorandum on the Bill states that “the Bill sets out a clear legislative framework to ensure effective national governance for policing and fire and rescue services across Scotland and makes clear statutory provision for the:

- role of the Scottish Police Authority (SPA) and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS) Board;
- composition of the SPA and SFRS Board;
- role of the chief constable and chief fire officer;
- role of the Scottish Ministers, and
- role of the Scottish Parliament.”49

103. A key theme arising in the evidence was the need to strengthen the national governance and accountability mechanisms set out in the Bill, including by enhancing the role of some of these organisations and individuals. This is explored in more detail below.

The Scottish Police Authority and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board

Role, size and composition of the SPA and SFRS Board

104. The Bill establishes two new statutory bodies: the SPA and the SFRS.

105. The SPA’s main functions set out in section 2 of the Bill are to:

- maintain the Police Service;
- promote and support continuous improvement in the policing of Scotland; and
- hold the chief constable to account for the policing of Scotland.

106. The SFRS will replace the existing fire and rescue authorities and joint boards and all functions currently carried out by them will be transferred to the new body. It will provide fire and rescue services throughout Scotland and be governed by a Board. The chief officer of the SFRS will be held to account by the SFRS Board.

107. The SPA and SFRS Board will each consist of between seven and 11 members, appointed directly by the Scottish Ministers on the basis of relevant skills and expertise and in accordance with the Code of Practice for Ministerial Appointments to Public Bodies in Scotland.50

108. The Policy Memorandum states that the new services will be “governed” by the SPA and SFRS Board, while both of these bodies will also “hold to account” the chief constable and the chief fire officer, and “play a critical role in scrutinising the services”.51 It further states that “the Scottish Government recognises that local councillors, especially those with experience of police and fire and rescue services, will have much to offer the governance of the new services, and the appointments process will allow the Scottish Ministers to appoint a number of members to both on the basis of skills and expertise relating to local government”.52

109. The Policy Memorandum goes on to state that—

“The role of the SPA and SFRS Board is to ensure the effective delivery of policing and fire and rescue services across Scotland. As such, members are not attending meetings as representatives but to act in the best interests of the SPA and SFRS. There is therefore a potential conflict of interest that arises from representative membership and the Scottish Government has concluded the Bill should not include any statutory requirement for representative members. Board members will be sought with a range of skills and expertise, including current or recent expertise of local government.”53

50 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 84.
51 Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 74, 75 and 95.
52 Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 74, 75 and 95.
53 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 84.
110. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice indicated in evidence to the Committee that the Scottish Government currently proposes a local authority membership of four for the SPA and SFRS Board.54

111. In its report on the Bill, the LGR Committee recommended that the SPA and SFRS Board should each consist of 14 to 16 members to “provide the flexibility to allow for sufficient democratic and regional representation, as well as allow for practical considerations, such as vacancies or absences”.55 It further agreed that local authority members should be appointed on merit through the public appointments process and that it was not necessary for a majority of board members to be from local authorities.56

112. The Committee noted differing expectations amongst witnesses as to the role of the SPA and SFRS Board. Some argued that the boards should primarily be governing bodies, overseeing and maintaining the police and fire and rescue services, while holding the chief constable and chief fire officer to account. These witnesses were broadly content with the size and composition of the board as proposed in the Bill.

113. Others took the view that the SPA and SFRS Board should take on more of a scrutiny role; these witnesses tended to favour a larger membership to ensure adequate local government involvement.

114. Robert Black, the Auditor General for Scotland, was content with the existing proposals on the basis that “the average number of members on a FTSE 100 company is about 11, which resonates with the Bill”. He went on to say—

“I am comfortable with that order of magnitude, but it will only be possible … if we are clear that it is a board of governance, not a board of representation. If it becomes a board of representation, it will inevitably become much larger and, consequently, operate at two speeds at once. At the first speed it will focus on the governance role, while at the second speed it will focus on the role of holding to account on behalf of communities, which is really difficult.”57

115. In his written submission, the Auditor General referred to an Audit Scotland report on the SPSA which found “that the composition of the SPSA Board (which was structured to reflect the local governance arrangements for policing) created tensions in the competing roles and duties of some of its members”.58

116. Brian Sweeney of the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland said his organisation was also “broadly content on the membership of the national board”59 and Councillor George Kay from Fife Police, Fire and Rescue Committee preferred 13 members, but was “prepared to live with 11”\textsuperscript{60}.

117. Many of those witnesses who favoured a larger membership were local elected members, who had varying suggestions as to the optimum size of the board\textsuperscript{61}, but tended to the view that “councillors must be the foundation of the SPA and SFRS Board”\textsuperscript{62}.

118. Members of the Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum agreed that a minimum of 50 per cent of SPA members should be drawn from suitably experienced locally elected representatives.\textsuperscript{63} The Society of Local Authority Chief Executives shared this view but further argued that half of the board should be appointed by the Scottish Government and the other half by local government to create “a genuine partnership between national and local government”.\textsuperscript{64} Councillor Stephen Curran of Strathclyde Police Board stated that “diversity in the broadest sense is really significant” and is “an area that has been flagged up as a weakness in some police boards in policing generally”.\textsuperscript{65}

119. Reform Scotland believes that the SPA should be made up entirely of representatives of each of the 32 Scottish local authorities\textsuperscript{66}, but accepted the need for “people representing specialist national policing” along with Ministerial or senior civil servant representation on the board\textsuperscript{67}. Professor Jim Gallagher of Nuffield College, Oxford, was also of the view that the SPA could be a local government body—

“There is no reason in principle why a single force could not be part of local government. Rather than a quango appointed by Ministers, the SPA could be a local government body, consisting of elected councillors, perhaps with appointed members added. There would need to be rules about how the councillors were chosen, perhaps by a form of indirect election.”\textsuperscript{68}

120. Other witnesses favoured some representation from local elected members on the boards, but did not agree that they needed to be in the majority.\textsuperscript{69} Indeed, Deputy Chief Constable Gordon Meldrum, Director General of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency stated that “the strength of the SPA will be in its balance and blend of democratically elected representatives … and independents”.\textsuperscript{70}

\textsuperscript{61} Northern Joint Police Board, Highland and Islands Fire Board and Highland Council proposed a membership of 15 members, while COSLA and Dumfries and Galloway Council (Police and Fire and Rescue Service) suggested at least 15 members. Councillor Whyte of Lothian and Borders Police Board opted for between 15 and 18 members.

121. A number of other witnesses were less concerned with the size or balance of membership on the boards and more with the skills and experience of members.\footnote{Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountability. Written submission.} For example, Richard Haigh of the Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland said “it is not just about numbers, size and shape, but about the skill set and the expertise that are brought to the board”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 13 March 2012, Col 1125.}} while Professor John McNeill, the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland, told the Committee that his “primary concern is that the individuals on the Scottish Police Authority are competent, in the sense that they hold the command team to account”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 6 March 2012, Col 1078.}}. He went on to state that “there is a world of difference between hearing an account and holding to account” and that the national boards should concentrate on the latter.\footnote{Ibid.}

122. The Bill provides for the SPA and SFRS Board to establish “committees for any purpose” and for those committees to create sub-committees. Members of these committees and sub-committees may include individuals who are not members of the SPA or SFRS board.\footnote{Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, schedule 1 and schedule 1A to Fire (Scotland) Act 2005.}

123. Some witnesses, including the Scottish Police Federation and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency, told the Committee that to service any such committees or sub-committees the boards would need a larger membership.\footnote{Scottish Police Federation and Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency. Written submissions.}

124. The Northern Ireland Policing Board is made up of 10 elected members from the Northern Ireland Assembly appointed under a system of proportional representation, and nine independent members who apply through an advertisement and are selected by the Northern Ireland Department of Justice. Assistant Chief Constable Alistair Finlay of the Police Service of Northern Ireland confirmed to the Committee that the board of 19 members was sufficient to staff its six sub-committees. He said that the size of the sub-committees enabled “good dialogue … purposeful engagement and conversation” and indeed, that this was where much of the detailed work was done.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 6 March 2012, Cols 1051-1052.}}

125. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee that the Scottish Government had opted for a board of up to 11 members on the basis of the Auditor General’s comments on the boards of the top FTSE companies. He pointed out that a large board would be “unworkable” and that he “was certain the issue should be quality, not quantity” of members, however, “we need sufficient membership not only to reflect the fact that this is a national service, but to take account of gender, ethnicity and Scotland’s geographical differences”. He said he was further not persuaded that the majority of the board should be local authority members, but would be “happy to take on board the committee’s advice” in relation to the size and composition of the boards.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 27 March 2012, Col 1232.}
Time commitment and salaries of SPA and SFRS Board members
126. The Committee was asked by the LGR Committee to consider views on “the need for clarity over the status of the part or full time nature of the SPA members”. 79 The Cabinet Secretary for Justice confirmed to the Committee that he expected positions on the boards would be part-time to allow those who have other roles and commitments to participate. 80 A Scottish Government official added that consideration was being given to the salaries of the board members but that these still had to be finalised. 81

Transparency of the SPA and SFRS Board
127. The Bill states that the SPA is expected to carry out its functions in a proportionate, accountable and transparent way. 82

128. The Committee heard evidence that the transparency of the workings of the SPA would be vital in providing a necessary link with the public. Sir Hugh Orde, President of the Association of Chief Police Officers, spoke of his experience as a previous chief constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland, where transparency of the board was one of the most important areas in gaining the trust of the public—

“The policing board was, without question, independent and it had legitimacy, which was a vital factor. It could also, in law, hold me to account in public. We used to have 10 or 11 public meetings a year at which my senior management team and I would be held to account in front of television cameras—broadcast live if there was an exciting set of questions, not live if there was not. I would also be available afterwards for interview by the media. … The need for transparency is the main point.” 83

129. When asked whether the meetings of the SPA should be held in public and fully minuted, Chief Constable Smith of ACPOS said “anything less would be a deficit” 84, and Councillor Martin Greig of Grampian Joint Police Board made “a heartfelt plea for the SPA to meet in public and to publish its minutes, agenda and all of its business” 85.

130. The LGR Committee heard concerns that there was no reference in the Bill to any requirement for engagement between the SPA, local authorities and the public. 86 In its written submission to that Committee, the Scottish Police Federation said this “had the potential to create a disconnection” that could “harm local policing”. 87 Integrity4Scotland was also of the view that “adequate provision is not included within the Bill for the people’s direct involvement in and control of the police services”.

Committee view

131. The Committee notes the differing views of witnesses in relation to the role, size and composition of the SPA and SFRS Board. We are of the strong view that the primary function of the SPA and of the SFRS Board is to govern the new services and to hold the chief constable and chief fire officer to account. We do not see the SPA and SFRS Board as bodies of local representation.

132. Notwithstanding these comments, the Committee agrees that the boards should have a balance of lay members and local elected representatives who can bring a range of experience, knowledge and perspectives to the table. We are not convinced that the Bill should specify a set number of either lay or local authority members to sit on the boards, as we believe that flexibility is required to ensure the most suitable individuals are appointed. We are of the view that all members should have equal status and should be appointed in the same manner (regulated under the Public Appointments Commissioner for Scotland: Code of Practice for Ministerial Appointments to Public Bodies in Scotland, as proposed in the Bill).

133. The Committee is reluctant to stipulate the size of the SPA and SFRS Board, as we believe that the quality and experience of their members are far more important than numbers. However, we lean towards the view that a board of fewer than 11 members would not provide the breadth of knowledge and experience required to demonstrate effective governance, nor would it allow for the vacancies and absences that will inevitably arise.

134. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary for Justice’s statement that membership of the boards should take account of gender, ethnicity and Scotland’s geographical differences.

135. The Committee notes that the positions on the SPA and SFRS Board are likely to be part-time, but would suggest that the Scottish Government makes clear to candidates that, during the ‘setting up period’ members will have considerable demands placed on them. The Committee recommends that part of the Boards’ initial work should include suitable training for all members to ensure they are equipped to contribute effectively to the work of the boards.

136. The Committee agrees with witnesses that the SPA must be transparent in delivery of its functions, including holding its meetings in public and publishing its papers, to demonstrate accountability and gain trust, particularly with the public. We recognise that there may be occasions that necessitate consideration of items in private, but would urge that this be subject to a formal decision of the board.

137. We believe that the same principles of transparency should apply to the SFRS Board.

Relationship between the SPA and SFRS Board and local government

138. The Bill does not place a duty on the SPA or the SFRS Board to establish formal mechanisms through which to engage with local authorities, which the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA), amongst others, argued were needed “to ensure proper dialogue and discussion of finite police resources to meet both national and local demands.”

139. The LGR Committee also noted views of “many stakeholders” that there was a lack of clarity in the Bill in terms of ensuring that “there is a sufficiently robust and structured relationship between the national boards and local authorities”.

140. Councillor Kay of Fife Police, Fire and Safety Committee told the Committee that the issue that still needed to be addressed in the Bill was the communication between the SPA and local authorities, which he described as “crucial”. The SCDEA suggested that this could be achieved through establishment of a sub-committee of the SPA with responsibility for oversight in relation to national and local connectivity, similar to the Northern Ireland Policing Board’s community engagement committee. Deputy Chief Constable Gordon Meldrum from the SCDEA told the Committee that national accountability and local accountability could not each “sit in splendid isolation from the other”.

141. Councillor Whyte of the Lothian and Borders Police Board warned the LGR Committee of a possible “disconnect” between a national police board and local government if too much emphasis is placed on “centralised national issues” to “the detriment of local policing.”

142. Some witnesses highlighted concerns at the lack of detail in the Bill on how disagreements between national and local authorities regarding such matters as funding would be resolved. For example, Councillor Durham of the Scottish Fire Conveners Forum told the Committee that “given the level of savings that will have to be found in the years ahead, there are almost certainly going to be tensions between local aspirations for service provision and what the national plan might say” and that “if that happens there must be resolution”. He added that “ultimately, either the Parliament or the Ministers will have to engage in resolving disputes.”

143. Brian Sweeney of the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland agreed that tensions will emerge between the national boards and local government and suggested that there might be “a natural ombudsman role for Her Majesty’s Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities”. Councillor Blake from Dumfries and Galloway Council (Police and Fire and Rescue Authority) said that conflict between national government and local authorities regarding resources could be resolved through an element of devolved local budgeting flexibility\(^98\) (an issue which is discussed later in the report).

144. Chief Constable Smith of ACPOS said that there needed to be “direct connectivity between the local and the national”\(^99\) and explained this further in evidence to the LGR Committee—

“We want dispute prevention, rather than a complicated process of dispute resolution. Things will happen the way they happen just now—through effective relationships and through being able to speak to the next person up the chain. Many things will be resolved in the way that they are today—through effective dialogue and good relationships.”\(^100\)

145. Councillor Whyte agreed and said he did not think that any of his colleagues on the Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum would advocate a fixed dispute resolution mechanism as “the problem with those is that we would get into dispute resolution very quickly”.\(^101\)

146. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee that any disagreements between the national boards and local government “will have to be dealt with by those who are involved at the time … it will depend on the nature of the problem” and that “representations could be made by the local authority to the police authority”.\(^102\)

147. The Committee accepts the view expressed by some witnesses that including a formal dispute resolution mechanism in the Bill could encourage use of formal channels rather than retaining an element of flexibility to resolve such disagreements. We are not convinced that there is a need for a formal mechanism to be included on the face of the Bill to help resolve disputes between the national police or fire and rescue boards and local authorities.

148. We do however believe that further clarity on the relationship between the national boards and local authorities could help to avoid some of the disputes that witnesses suggest might occur. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide greater clarity on the relationship between the national boards and local authorities, perhaps within the guidance it is developing on local scrutiny mechanisms (to be informed by the pathfinder work, which is discussed later in this report).

Power to specify the type of goods and services the SPA may provide

149. Section 84(1)(b) provides that the SPA may provide goods and services of such type as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify to such other persons "as may be so specified".

150. The Subordinate Legislation Committee was concerned “that this power appeared to be very general in its terms, and (at its broadest) might be taken to enable the Scottish Ministers to make regulations permitting the Authority to supply goods and services of any description to any person". In its report on the Bill, that Committee explained that “the Scottish Ministers indicate that this power would only be exercised where they are satisfied that it was appropriate for particular goods and services to be supplied to particular categories of person, and that by making it exercisable by subordinate legislation then the Parliament also has an opportunity to satisfy itself as to the appropriateness of what is proposed”. The Scottish Government also said that they envisage that the power might be used, for example, to enable the SPA to charge overseas governments and police forces for the provision of forensic services.

151. The Subordinate Legislation Committee still however considered that the power in section 84(1)(b) was capable of being exercised “in a particularly broad manner so as to specify goods and services of any nature”. It further argued that “given the apparent intention of the Scottish Ministers is to permit the Scottish Police Authority to supply goods and services which are connected with its functions, … the power ought to be so drafted as to reflect that intention.”

152. The Committee notes the Subordinate Legislation Committee’s concerns that the power to specify the type of goods and services the SPA may provide appears to be “very general”. On balance, however, we accept the Scottish Government’s reassurances that the power will only be exercised in certain circumstances and that the Scottish Parliament will have an opportunity to examine the related subordinate legislation.

Reserves

153. The Police and Fire Services (Finance) (Scotland) Act 2001 currently allows police authorities, joint police boards and joint fire boards to carry forward unspent balances from one financial year to the next. In this way, reserves of up to 5% of revenue budgets can be held. However, the 2001 Act would be repealed by Schedule 7 of the Bill, and as a consequence, the SPA and SFRS will be unable to accrue financial reserves.

154. Concern was expressed regarding the loss of the ability to hold reserves, including by the Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum which argued that “the necessity of being able to hold and utilise reserves to smooth out unexpected operational demand is essential and well proven by current police authorities. The Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland had similar concerns regarding fire reserves—

"... the new service is not permitted to hold reserves, something which is recognised as sound financial management practice. These detrimental impacts on the service when compared to current practices are matters which we would ask the Scottish Government to consider when reviewing the proposed legislation and legal standing of the new single service."109

155. Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland suggested that for the first three years post-reform the police service should retain the ability to create and carry forward reserves and that this arrangement could be reviewed at the end of this period.110

156. A Scottish Government official told the Finance Committee that the majority of public services in Scotland are managed without reserves. He went on to say that the Scottish Government did “not think that the loss of capacity to hold reserves will impact adversely on either service” and “there ought to be enough scope for effective financial management within those budgets to manage without building up reserves.”111

157. The Committee notes the views of some witnesses that the ability to accrue reserves is sound financial practice. The Committee is unclear as to why the Bill does not give the SPA and SFRS the ability to accrue reserves. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to provide an explanation as to why this power, which was available to the police and fire and rescue authorities and joint boards, is being removed.

158. The Policy Memorandum states that, while the Scottish Ministers will continue to be accountable to the Scottish Parliament for policing and fire and rescue services, the provisions in the Bill “provide a clear separation between the Scottish Ministers and the services by ensuring their role is primarily a strategic one.”112 The Scottish Ministers will be responsible for appointing members of the SPA and SFRS Board, approving the appointment of the chief constable and chief fire officer, and setting national budgets and strategic priorities.113

159. Section 5 of the Bill also requires the SPA to comply with any direction (general or specific) given by the Scottish Ministers and for such directions to be published and laid before the Parliament. Such a direction may not be given in respect of (a) a specific operation being or to be carried out by the police service, or (b) the way in which the police service carries out (or is to carry out) a specific operation.

109 Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland. Written submission.
110 Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland. Written submission.
112 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 87.
113 Ibid.
160. Section 116 of the Bill will amend the 2005 Act to allow the Scottish Ministers to give the SFRS general or specific directions that must be complied with. The Policy Memorandum states that “this new power of direction will not impact on the Scottish Ministers’ existing power of direction where there is a failure to act in accordance with the fire and rescue framework; this is retained as a distinct mechanism for enforcing adherence to the framework”.\(^{114}\)

161. The Policy Memorandum states that the Scottish Government did give consideration to whether a Ministerial power of direction was necessary but concluded that the power “is required to enable the Scottish Ministers to act in the public interest and to execute the will of the Scottish Parliament if necessary”. It further states that the Scottish Government had also considered specifying the circumstances in which the power might be used but concluded that this was “undesirable” and confirms that “like all such powers it would be used sparingly if at all”.\(^{115}\)

162. Some stakeholders were concerned that the powers of the Scottish Ministers within the Bill bordered on political interference. ACPOS said that the powers risked threatening the operational independence of the police, which the Scottish Government had appeared to be attempting to protect.\(^{116}\) Professor Jim Gallagher took the view that there were particular dangers in relation to increasing the powers of Ministers over policing, which did not apply to other public bodies—

“I am sure that present Ministers will want to have these powers so that they can make the police service run better: that is proper ambition, but such a wide suite of powers might also be misused. Such misuse may be unlikely, but it would happen, if at all, only insidiously and gradually. It might be better to draw some rather firmer boundaries around Ministers’ powers to affect operational policing to be as sure as possible that does not happen”.\(^{117}\)

163. COSLA questioned whether the Scottish Ministers’ power to set strategic police priorities (discussed in the next section of this report) might relate to operational matters\(^{118}\) and the Scottish Police Federation (SPF) considered that the provisions requiring the chief constable to police Scotland with regard to these priorities could “impinge on operational independence”. The SPF agreed that this provision for Scottish Ministers to set strategic police priorities, along with the requirement for the SPA to submit its strategic police plan to the Scottish Ministers for approval, could amount to “a shift in the mechanics of accountability and governance to the detriment of operational independence”.\(^{119}\)

164. Witnesses had particular concerns that the provision for Ministerial direction in section 5 could open the police service to accusations of political control or inappropriate Ministerial influence. The Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum argued that, “if one aim of the Bill is to keep policing separate from Ministerial control, then the general or specific power of direction does not provide the essential separation”. 120 Scottish Women’s Aid agreed—

“In terms of overall independence, accountability and decision-making powers of the Authority, we would question how this will be maintained if Ministers are to have a power of direction over the Authority, regardless of how little this power would be used in practice.”121

165. Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland also questioned why a Ministerial power of direction for the SPA was needed at all and suggested that the Parliament should be given a role in the scrutiny of any direction, in order to move from ministerial influence towards democratic accountability.122

166. The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents, amongst other witnesses, argued that safeguards were required regarding use of the power of direction to ensure that it cannot be misused.123 The Scottish Police Federation (SPF), for example, suggested that such safeguards could be achieved by amending the Bill so that “a direction may not be given in respect of any operation or on any issue which may affect an operational matter”.124 Others suggested that protection could be achieved by defining ‘operational’ in the context of this provision125 and Calum Steele of the SPF provided the Committee with a possible definition, which could be used as a starting point for discussions on the matter126.

167. Professor John McNeill, the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland, told the LGR Committee that he did not “subscribe to the myth of operational independence” as this could be construed as independence from local communities rather than from political control. He preferred “the concept of operational primacy”.127 Andrew Laing, Her Majesty’s Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland took a similar view that “it is not independence from the citizen or the system of governance, but independence to exercise the law free from undue influence”.128 The Auditor General for Scotland, who drew a parallel between this part of the Bill and legislation setting out his own role, told the Committee that it was possible to guarantee independence “without the need to define in statute such things as operational independence, which is almost impossible anyway—otherwise it would have been done by now”.129

168. However, other stakeholders were perfectly content with the provision, such as the Scottish Institute for Policing Research, which singled out section 5 as “embodying a fundamental principle that the Scottish Ministers should not issue directions to the Authority in respect of a specific police operation or the way in which the Police Service is carrying out a specific operation”.

169. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee that “the power of ministerial direction does not allow me to interfere with operational matters, because it refers to the Scottish Police Authority”. He said he was aware of the concerns of the Committee and others, “but we have built into the Bill clear requirements to ensure that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, whoever he or she is, cannot interfere with the operational decisions by the chief constable, whoever he or she is”.

170. Very few views were expressed about section 116, the equivalent provision to section 5 covering fire and rescue. It appears witnesses had few concerns with this provision.

Committee view
171. The Committee acknowledges the concerns of witnesses regarding the role of Scottish Ministers and, in particular, views on the possible misuse of the power of Ministerial direction, but also notes that the power applies to the national boards rather than to the chief constable or chief fire officer.

172. The Committee believes there must be a balance between operational independence and democratic accountability of the police and, therefore, accepts the Scottish Government’s position that use of the power of direction may be necessary in very limited circumstances and in relation to non-operational matters only. It is not possible to be completely certain whether the statutory test set out in the Bill is entirely robust, but it appears to codify an appropriate balance. Furthermore, we are not convinced that including a definition of operational independence on the face of the Bill would be helpful.

173. We do however acknowledge the genuine concerns of witnesses on this matter and would urge the Scottish Government to work with stakeholders to try to allay these fears, perhaps by developing guidance or a protocol and making use of suggested definitions of operational independence, such as that provided by the Scottish Police Federation, as a starting point.

Role of the Parliament
174. The Scottish Parliament has always had the ability to inquire into the police and fire and rescue services. For instance, as noted in the introduction, the predecessor Justice Committee in Session 3 of the Parliament conducted a major inquiry into police resources in 2008.

175. However, it could be argued that the centralisation of police and fire and rescue services under the Bill requires the Scottish Parliament to have an enhanced, more institutionalised, and more formal role, especially given the abolition of police and fire authorities and joint boards, which hitherto have provided the main democratic oversight. The Committee accepts that such a role should consist of examining the policies and strategies of the police service that are of public interest rather than querying operational matters.

130 Scottish Institute for Policing Research. Written submission

176. Parliamentary oversight of the police varies across Europe. In general, where there is a single national chief constable or commissioner, the constable or commissioner is responsible to the Minister for Justice, who is in turn answerable to Parliament. Some countries, like Sweden, have an ombudsman system, with the ombudsman dealing with the public’s complaints and reporting their findings to the Parliament. As outlined earlier, in Northern Ireland, parliamentary scrutiny of a sort is provided by the Northern Ireland Policing Board (NIPB), 10 of whose 19 members are also Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly. However, the NIPB is more akin to the SPA rather than being a parliamentary oversight body. The Committee does not consider that MSPs should be members of the SPA as we consider that might create confusion as to its primary role which, we reiterate, should be as a body responsible for ensuring the effective governance of the Scottish police service.

Provisions in the Bill—evidence
177. The Policy Memorandum states that the Bill will, for the first time, enable the Scottish Parliament to have a formal role in scrutinising the police and fire and rescue services, and will, therefore, enhance the Parliament’s oversight. The Memorandum also notes that the Parliament’s role in approving the fire and rescue framework will continue under the Bill.132

178. Under the Bill, the key strategic planning documents, as well as the annual report and accounts for each service (all discussed later in the report), must be laid before the Parliament. The Bill also requires the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner, Her Majesty’s inspectors of constabulary in Scotland, and the inspectors of the SFRS to lay their published reports before the Parliament. This was welcomed by the LGR Committee, which said that the requirements to lay the fire and police annual reports and strategic plans before the Parliament "will provide an opportunity to establish a degree of democratic accountability for the services, and to provide parliamentary scrutiny of their progress".133

179. Not all witnesses were persuaded that the Scottish Parliament should have a scrutiny role extending beyond what was already set out in the Bill. For instance, Councillor Whyte of Lothian and Borders Police Board considered that it was the SPA’s role to provide governance and accountability and did not see how the Parliament having a further oversight role would fit into that.134

180. However, most witnesses who expressed a view agreed that the Parliament should have an enhanced role. For instance, the Fire Brigades Union agreed that “the Scottish Parliament must take an active role in both the scrutiny and setting the direction of the [fire and rescue] service”135, while Councillor Durham of the

132 Policy memorandum, paragraph 94.
135 Fire Brigades Union. Written submission.
Scottish Fire Conveners Forum said an enhanced role for the Parliament would give confidence as “there is always a concern about the centralisation of power”\(^{136}\).

181. The most detailed contribution on parliamentary scrutiny came from the Auditor General for Scotland, who called for a formal mechanism to give the Parliament “a major role in ensuring there is open, participative and transparent oversight of policing in Scotland”.\(^{137}\) He made a number of suggestions as to how this might be achieved. These included establishing a specific committee\(^{138}\) or giving additional responsibilities to the Justice Committee. In relation to the second suggestion, however, he noted the tendency for successive Justice Committees to be heavily burdened with legislation, which might compromise any enhanced scrutiny role.

182. Another suggestion from the Auditor General was the creation of a Commission, similar to the Scottish Commission for Public Audit, “which was put in place to safeguard the independence of the Auditor General … while ensuring public scrutiny of Audit Scotland”.\(^{139}\) The Auditor General’s view was that these arrangements had worked very well. (The SCPA is a body set up by virtue of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000, which laid out some of the “ground rules” for effective scrutiny of public spending, post-devolution. It is not formally a parliamentary committee but consists of five MSPs assisted and resourced by the Scottish Parliament.\(^{140}\)

183. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee that the Scottish Government accepted “the logic and merit” of the argument that there should be parliamentary involvement and scrutiny of the single services and were “open to discussion”. However, it was ultimately for the Parliament “to decide on the shape of that scrutiny.”\(^{141}\)

Switch to single services – parliamentary scrutiny of efficiency / effectiveness

184. In relation to the key question of whether a move to single services would increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the police and fire services, the Finance Committee made the specific recommendation that (should the Bill be enacted) the Scottish Parliament should monitor the financial and non-financial consequences of the move to single forces over the first 15 years. It also recommended that the Scottish Government should ensure that the appropriate data is collated over this period.\(^{141}\)

Committee view

185. The Committee accepts that the move to national services and the abolition of local government police and fire and rescue authorities and boards places an onus on the Scottish Parliament to enhance and formalise its scrutiny of the police and fire and rescue services. Accordingly, we welcome provisions in the Bill requiring strategies and plans to be laid before the Parliament. We also note that the Scottish Parliament has considerable discretion to order its own affairs in relation to this issue and that individual committees, such as the Justice Committee, always have the power to inquire into matters within their remit.

\(^{137}\) Auditor General for Scotland. Written submission.

\(^{138}\) It is within the power of the Scottish Parliament to set up committees for specific purposes. There is no need for the relevant legislation to “permit” the Parliament to set up a committee. Auditor General for Scotland. Written submission.

186. However, the passage of the Bill affords a unique opportunity to discuss how best to secure that enhanced scrutiny and, in particular, to consider whether some principles are so important that they should be enshrined in the founding legislation in order to ensure that the appropriate checks and balances are in place in relation to the new national services, and in particular the national police service.

187. The Committee considers that there is a strong case to be made for the Bill securing Parliamentary oversight of the police. The Committee notes that it would be possible for this enhanced scrutiny role to be undertaken for example by the Justice Committee, or by an ad hoc Committee appointed by the Parliament, or by a statutory Parliamentary body along similar lines to the Scottish Commission for Public Audit. We would wish such options and others to be explored further. There is a particular importance and public interest attached to the policing of Scotland, and the long-established principle that policing should be carried out with the consent of the people. We leave open the question whether such oversight should extend beyond the police to other bodies covered by the Bill.

188. The Committee agrees with the Finance Committee that effective post-legislative scrutiny of the move to single services will be crucial and would welcome a commitment by the Scottish Government to provide sufficient information to assist this process.

PRIORITIES, STRATEGIC AND LOCAL PLANS, AND ANNUAL REPORTS, INCLUDING LOCAL SCRUTINY

189. This section considers the strategic police priorities, strategic and local plans, and annual reports that are required to be produced under the Bill, including the role of local authorities in scrutiny of the local plans.

Strategic police priorities

190. Under section 33 of the Bill, the Scottish Ministers may determine strategic priorities for the SPA, which may relate to (a) the policing of Scotland, or (b) the carrying out of the SPA’s functions. Before determining these priorities, the Scottish Ministers must consult with the SPA, persons whom they consider represent local authorities, and others as they consider appropriate. The strategic police priorities must be published in a manner the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.\(^\text{142}\)

\textsuperscript{142} Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. Section 33(5)
191. There was a variety of views on who should be consulted by the Scottish Ministers in the preparation of the strategic police priorities. For example, some witnesses were of the view that local elected members should, in addition to the local authority representative bodies, be included in the consultation on strategic police priorities. For example, Highland Council and Northern Joint Police Board, jointly argued—

“There may be merit in specifying in the Bill the need for Ministers to consult [on the strategic police priorities] with local elected representatives involved in the scrutiny of their local police plans, especially if the strategic police priorities are to be informed (at least in part) by community safety issues and priorities in communities. This approach may also reduce the time required to consult local authorities on the strategic police plan.”

192. Others, including Scottish Women’s Aid, argued that the Scottish Ministers should conduct a public consultation on the strategic police priorities and “have regard to any comments received” within the set period. The Scottish Police Federation suggested that the chief constable be consulted on the priorities, while Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland asked that it be included as a statutory consultee on the priorities, the strategic plan, and all other policing consultations provided for in the Bill.

Fire and rescue framework for Scotland

193. Under the 2005 Act, the Scottish Ministers are required to produce a framework document setting out priorities and objectives for ‘relevant authorities’ in connection with the carrying out of their functions. The Scottish Ministers also have a duty to report to the Scottish Parliament on (a) the extent to which relevant authorities are acting in accordance with the framework document, and (b) any steps taken by them for the purpose of securing that relevant authorities so act. The Bill does not amend this section of the 2005 Act.

Strategic plans

194. The Bill provides that the SPA and SFRS are responsible for developing strategic plans. Under section 36, the SPA must “involve” the chief constable in preparation of the strategic plan, but there is no equivalent provision for the chief fire officer. The Committee understands this distinction is because the chief constable is not an employee of the SPA, whereas the chief fire officer is directly employed by the SFRS.

195. Section 34 of the Bill requires the SPA, when preparing its strategic plan, to send a draft to each local authority, inspectors of constabulary, and others it considers likely to have an interest. The SPA must have regard to any comments it receives and must then submit its final plan to the Scottish Ministers for approval. Once approved, the SPA is required to lay a copy of its strategic plan before the 146 Fire (Scotland) Act 2005, Section 42(1).

Parliament. The strategic plan must be reviewed by the SPA at least every three years or where strategic police priorities have been revised. The consultation process outlined above applies to any revised strategic plan.

196. Similarly, section 112 of the Bill requires the SFRS, when preparing its strategic plan, to have regard to the fire and rescue framework document and to consult with each local authority, persons it considers to represent local authorities, persons it considers to represent employees of the SFRS, and others as it considers appropriate. The plan would then be submitted to the Scottish Ministers for approval, and once approved, laid before the Scottish Parliament.

197. The Scottish Police Federation argued that the chief constable should be responsible for preparing the strategic plan for approval by the SPA, rather than the SPA merely being ‘involved’ in its preparation. John Duffy from the Fire Brigades Union told the Committee that “there should be a national vision of where we are all going, combined with practical station-based plans that set out what the stations will deliver and that are clustered together to form a local plan for the local authority”.

Annual police plans

198. Section 35 of the Bill requires the SPA to prepare an annual plan setting out arrangements for carrying out its functions and for the policing of Scotland for that annual period. Again, the chief constable must be “involved” in the preparation of this plan and it must be laid before the Scottish Parliament. There is no similar provision in the Bill requiring the SFRS to produce annual fire and rescue plans.

Local plans

199. The Bill provides that, for each local authority area, the chief constable must designate a constable as local commander and the chief officer must designate an employee of SFRS as local senior officer. Each local commander or local senior officer may cover more than one local authority area. The Policy Memorandum states that the local commander and local senior officer “will be the first point of senior contact for the local authority and other partners locally and the lead officer for the services in community planning”. The Bill does not stipulate the rank of the local commander or senior officer.

200. Section 48 places a duty on the local commander to prepare the local police plan, first having had regard to the most recently approved strategic police plan and, after “appropriate” consultation, to submit the plan to the local authority for approval. The plan is to set out the main priorities, objectives and arrangements for the policing of the local authority area. It is also to describe how these priorities and objectives will “contribute to the delivery of any other relevant local outcomes identified which are identified by community planning”. Local plans must be reviewed at least once every three years and may be revised at any time following agreement between the local commander and the local authority.

201. Section 113 places a statutory duty on the SFRS to prepare the local fire and rescue plan for each local authority area. Again, the plan will set out the main priorities and objectives for the SFRS in the local authority area and show how these “contribute to the delivery of any other relevant local outcomes identified by community planning”. In preparing the plan, the SFRS must have regard to the fire and rescue framework for Scotland and the strategic plan, and consult such persons as it thinks fit. It must then submit the plan to the local authority for approval. The SFRS can at any time review the plan.

202. Provisions in the Bill giving local authorities the power to ‘approve’ the local plans were welcomed by witnesses, many of whom had raised concerns during the Scottish Government’s second consultation on reform in September 2011, when it had appeared that local authorities would only be able to ‘comment’ on the plans.

203. The LGR Committee stated in its report that the requirements to lay the fire and police annual reports and strategic plans before the Scottish Parliament, will provide an opportunity to establish a degree of democratic accountability for the services, and to provide parliamentary scrutiny of their progress.

Annual reports

204. Sections 40 and 114 of the Bill further provide for the SPA and SFRS to prepare annual reports containing assessments of the performance of the SPA and police service, and SFRS respectively during the reporting year. Both annual reports must be laid before the Scottish Parliament.

205. The Committee generally welcomes provisions in the Bill on strategies and plans.

206. However, the Committee notes that the chief constable is to be involved in preparation of the strategic and annual plans, but we are unclear as to exactly what “involve” means in practice. We therefore seek clarification on this and on why there is no similar requirement to involve the chief constable in the preparation of the strategic police priorities.

LOCAL ACCOUNTABILITY

207. The role of current police and fire and rescue authorities and joint boards is outlined in the opening section of this report. The Committee takes the opportunity to explore local accountability under the Bill in the section below.

---

153 Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, section 113(2)(e).
Local budgets

208. With reform, it is intended that funding for the new services will be provided entirely by the Scottish Government. Some stakeholders argued that budgets should be devolved to local authorities and local commanders so that there would be a form of accountability to the local authority for policing within that area. Councillor Stephen Curran from Strathclyde Police Authority argued that “it is difficult to get buy-in at local level and true accountability” if the budget is nationally controlled, while Councillor Greig of Grampian Joint Police Board, added—

“There is a very significant democratic deficit in the new set-up, because policing is a local government function. We rely on community policing to operate according to the principle of policing by consent. That means that decisions on budgets and performance relating to police forces need to be made locally.”

209. However, Chief Superintendent O’Connor of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents said that, there have always been and always will be concerns from rural parts of the country that resources will be drawn towards the central belt, but on the other hand, some in the central belt fear that their resources will be drawn to rural areas. Chief Constable Smith of ACPOS reassured the Committee that “we will come up with a resource allocation model that will consider things such as crime and incidence, and the community-based style of policing that we want.”

Additional police officers funded by local authorities

210. Councillor Pat Watters of COSLA told the Committee that some local police authorities and boards were providing additional funding to employ extra police officers to work on particular priorities within their local authority areas. He added that between 600 and 800 additional police were being funded in this manner and sought clarity on what would happen to them after the transfer to a single force.

211. In a supplementary written submission to the Committee, COSLA commented further on this matter—

“Councillor Watters questioned whether councils would continue to fund these posts in 2012/13, given that the additional funding being provided would likely transfer with the posts out of local government and into the new single service budget to subsidise the commitment to 1000 extra police officers in the new single service. … the simplest way for a council to avoid losing the funding on 31 March 2013 is not to be funding a post at that time.”

155 COSLA. Written submission.
161 COSLA. Supplementary written submission.
212. A Scottish Government official explained he expected that the arrangements that were currently in place would continue in the new single service.¹⁶²

Rank of local commander and local senior officer

213. Specific concerns were also expressed by some witnesses that, depending on their rank, local commanders and local senior officers will have varying degrees of influence within their respective services. However, the LGR Committee reported that rank of local commanders and local senior officers was not an issue; “it is the skill set of these officers that will be central to their success, especially in engaging with local communities and community planning partnerships”.¹⁶³

214. The Scottish Institute for Policing Research noted that “ranks are likely to vary across Scotland, depending on the nature and complexity of the policing arrangements of different areas” and this “may result in some local authorities that in the past have dealt with a chief officer now engaging with somebody of lower rank, which may have implications in negotiations for resources”.¹⁶⁴ Highland Council shared these concerns—

“In rural or smaller local authorities a lower ranking officer will be appointed because in an organisation with a hierarchical structure, they would have a lower level of authority within the SPS potentially limiting their capacity to influence the national policing plan and the resources required for the local police plan.”¹⁶⁵

215. Bob Jack, spokesperson for community safety at the Society Of Local Authority Chief Executives told the LGR Committee that, while all 32 local commanders could not be of the same rank “because they will be looking after areas of considerable difference in size, geography and so on”, he felt that a large span of ranks was unacceptable due to the “huge difference in seniority and authority”.¹⁶⁶

216. However, Chief Constable Smith of ACPOS suggested that the rank of the local commander was “a bit of a red herring” and that “the important thing is the professional relationships that exist locally”.¹⁶⁷ In Northern Ireland, the equivalent of local commanders under the Bill, were formerly of different rank, but now are all chief superintendents. Assistant Chief Constable Finlay of the Police Service of Northern Ireland said that rank was probably not an issue in the past in determining how much leverage local commanders had over resources.¹⁶⁸

217. The Committee believes that, in the interests of transparency and accountability, a “snapshot” of resource allocation within local authority areas as of 1 April 2013 should be given to local authorities so that they can measure any future changes, such as the transfer of funds, assets, and human resources.

218. The Committee notes and welcomes the evidence from Chief Constable Smith that he envisages an appropriate resource allocation model which strikes a balance between the national priorities and local community-based policing. The Committee would welcome clarification as to whether, in practice, local authorities will have a degree of influence over local police resources.

219. The Committee notes that funding for additional police officers is currently provided by local authorities. The Scottish Government has indicated that there appears to be no reason why this cannot continue under the Bill. The Committee seeks clarification on how this would work in practice.

220. The Committee agrees with the Local Government and Regeneration Committee that the rank of local commander and local senior officer is not significant, and endorses the view that the knowledge and relationships that they build will be a more significant factor in negotiations on resources.

Local scrutiny

221. The Bill is silent on how local authorities should make arrangements for their scrutiny of local policing and local fire and rescue services and their consideration and approval of the local police plan. The Policy Memorandum explains that this is deliberate—

“It will be for the local authorities to determine the most appropriate local mechanism for exercising their role outlined in the Bill, and formalising their relationship with the local commander and local senior officer and other partners to help shape and deliver local outcomes.”

222. The Scottish Government has asked local authorities to run ‘pathfinder’ projects to pilot these local arrangements prior to implementation of the legislation, if passed. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice confirmed that there are currently 16 pathfinders in operation, with more expected after the local government elections. A Scottish Government official confirmed that the pathfinders would “inform national guidance on operation of the scrutiny and accountability arrangements”, which was to be in place for 1 April 2013. He added that “instead of putting any prescriptions in the bill, we will take what we learn from the pathfinder process and put it into guidance outwith primary legislation.”

223. A number of respondents were of the view that these local arrangements should be specified on the face of the Bill. For example, Dumfries and Galloway Council (Police and Fire and Rescue Authority) argued that “a statutory basis for councils in relation to local committee arrangements for police and fire and rescue

169 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 44.
services would be helpful, perhaps in the form of a framework setting out the role of committees, but avoiding being prescriptive, given that best practice and guidance might come from the pathfinder projects.172 Councillor Ross of the Northern Joint Police Board (NJPB) agreed—

“It is important that there is not a large and ineffective talking shop; there needs to be something with substance and influence. The real test will be whether it has those—reassurance on that is needed. Clarity on the Bill might give such reassurance.”173

224. The policy memorandum states that the impact of the Bill on local authorities is likely to be cost neutral as efficiency savings from not having police and fire and rescue boards and authorities are likely to balance out the cost of local scrutiny.174 Others suggested that having 32 local councils rather than eight boards scrutinising local policing could increase costs.175

225. The LGR Committee stated in its report that clarity from the Scottish Government on how any new committee structures would be financed would be welcome.176 In addition, the Finance Committee asked the Justice Committee to “seek assurances from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice that local authorities will be adequately resourced in order to effectively carry out their police and fire and rescue monitoring and scrutiny functions under the Bill”.177

226. Stakeholders also noted that no provision was made in the Financial Memorandum for funding to be given to local authorities to support their new role, and called for such resources to be made available.178 Furthermore, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountability suggested that, “the risk is that, local authorities could elect not to maintain committees without an appropriate funding stream”.179

227. Under current arrangements, officials, such as a clerk and treasurer, provide administrative support and professional advice to police and fire authorities and joint boards. The Committee heard that it was unclear what the arrangements for transferring such staff would be. For instance, Councillor Greig of Grampian Joint Police Board said—

“The boards have built up a great deal of expertise and the clerking function has built up the professional aspect. I am not yet clear about how that will transfer to the new local policing committees. It is important for the committee to think about that too.\textsuperscript{180}

228. The LGR Committee also considered this issue and recommended that the Scottish Government “takes such measures as are necessary, including working with staff and their representatives, in order to minimise any negative impact on staff morale”.\textsuperscript{181}

229. The Committee does not believe that the manner in which local authorities are to scrutinise the local plans should be included on the face of the Bill, as we believe this would be too prescriptive and would not allow any flexibility for local authorities to develop scrutiny mechanisms best suited to their own local areas.

230. However, the Committee agrees that guidance for local authorities on this matter would be helpful and therefore supports the Scottish Government’s plan to develop such guidance, informed by the outcomes of the pathfinder projects, which are currently underway. We urge the Scottish Government to ensure that this guidance is available for local authorities in time for them to put in place any scrutiny mechanisms before the single services become operational.

231. One member is, however, concerned at the speed of the process and believes that the role of local authorities in the new services should at this stage be clear.\textsuperscript{182}

Community planning

232. The Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 places duties on all local authorities to initiate, facilitate and maintain community planning, including consulting and co-operating with communities and core partners, which includes police and fire authorities and joint boards\textsuperscript{183}.

233. Section 47 of the Bill places a statutory duty on local commanders to participate in community planning, replacing the duty on chief constables under the 2003 Act. The Bill places a similar duty on local senior officers (section 113 inserting new section 41J into the 2005 Act). A number of witnesses, including Dumfries and Galloway Council (Police and Fire and Rescue Authority) called for the statutory duty to participate in local community planning activity to be extended to the chief constable and chief fire officer (in addition to the local commander and local fire officer)\textsuperscript{184}, while Professor Jim Gallagher of Nuffield College, Oxford highlighted an apparent inconsistency as regards the chief constable’s local policing duties—

\textsuperscript{181} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee. 5\textsuperscript{th} Report, 2012 (Session 4). \textsuperscript{184} Dumfries and Galloway Council (Police and Fire and Rescue Authority). Written submission.
“At present, the duty to participate in community planning falls on the chief constables. Under the Bill this will devolve to local commanders. This is in practice where it would be discharged for the most part, but it is anomalous that although the chief constable is under a duty to provide local policing, no community planning duty falls on him or her or the SPA.”

234. The Committee is not convinced by the argument put forward by some witnesses that the statutory duty to participate in local community planning should be extended to the chief constable and chief fire officer and is satisfied that this is a role more suited to local commanders and local senior officers.

235. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee considered in more detail witnesses’ views on how the new services could engage with the public and recommended that local commanders and local fire officers should develop strategies for engaging with the public on policing and fire services. The Committee seeks the views of the Scottish Government on this matter.

Assets and liabilities

236. Schedules 4 and 5 of the Bill make provision for the transfer of the assets and liabilities currently owned by police and fire and rescue boards and unitary authorities by means of a transfer scheme. The Bill is not explicit on how assets and reserves from the current boards and authorities will be allocated under the new structure. A submission from ACPOS states its understanding that the police reserves currently held by police authorities and boards will be returned to the Scottish Government and COSLA on a 51 per cent / 49 per cent split.

237. The Finance Committee considered this matter in more detail and sought clarification on the Government’s plans for the transfer of assets and reserves and how the funding will be re-distributed.

238. Correspondence jointly issued by the Cabinet Secretary for Justice and the President of COSLA to police and fire board conveners dated 12 April 2012 confirmed that they had reached an agreement on how existing reserves would be allocated—

“At a national level, we have agreed that all remaining uncommitted reserves at the date of establishment of the single services will be divided between central and local government on an agreed basis, with 100 per cent of fire reserves and 49 per cent of police reserves being passed back to constituent authorities and 51 per cent of police reserves to the Scottish Government”.

239. The Committee welcomes the agreement between the Scottish Government and COSLA in relation to the allocation of existing reserves. However, the Committee seeks clarification as to how the assets and liabilities of the current police and fire and rescue authorities and joint boards will be redistributed.

IMPLEMENTATION

240. On 21 February 2012, the Scottish Government announced that the single services would begin operating from 1 April 2013. A number of witnesses expressed concern that this timetable may be difficult to achieve, but highlighted a number of issues on implementation that, if resolved at an early stage, may make the timescale more realistic. These are outlined below.

Appointment of chief constable and chief fire officer

241. Chief constables are currently appointed by the police authority/joint police board for their area, subject to the approval of the Scottish Ministers. The Bill provides for the SPA to appoint the chief constable, on approval of the Scottish Ministers, and for the first chief officer of the SFRS to be appointed by the Scottish Ministers, with subsequent chief officers appointed by the SFRS, on approval of the Scottish Ministers.

242. It is understood that the first chief constable and chief fire officer will be in post around December 2012 (after the SPA and SFRS Board are in place to appoint them).

243. The Policy Memorandum explains that the Scottish Government gave consideration to whether the Scottish Ministers should make the first chief constable appointment to provide more planning time, but concluded that this would not provide the right degree of separation between the Scottish Ministers and the leader of the new service.

244. A significant body of opinion formed during the Committee’s scrutiny on the pressing need for early appointment of the chief constable and the chief fire officer, and a number of supplementary written submissions were provided to this effect. For example, Chief Constable Smith of ACPOS stated in his supplementary submission, supported by all other chief constables, the Scottish Crime Drug Enforcement Agency and Scottish Police Services Authority, that—

191 ACPOS. Supplementary written submission.
192 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 153.
193 ACPOS, SPF, SCDEA, SPSA, HMICS, Auditor General, COSLA, and Councillor Kay of Fife Police, Fire and Safety Committee supported the view that the chief constable and/or the chief fire officer should be appointed as early as possible.
“As currently scheduled, there is insufficient time between December 2012 and 1 April 2013 for the new chief constable to be fully prepared to take control of a new organisation and be ready for Day 1.” 194

245. Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland agreed that this was “an emerging priority for police reform” and one which he considered was “so critical ... that failure to address it now is likely to present a significant barrier to progress in the interim period and, indeed, to deliver the stated aims in the mid and longer-term within the context of the Comprehensive Spending Review.” 195

246. Councillor Pat Watters, President of COSLA, suggested this might be achieved through the current police conveners working jointly with the Cabinet Secretary. 196 The Auditor General for Scotland suggested that the Bill be amended so that the first appointments of the conveners of the SPA and SFRS, the chief constable and the senior fire officer be made by the Parliament, with the possible involvement of the Crown Office in the case of police appointments, and with the agreement of the Cabinet Secretary for Justice.” 197

247. Similar comments were made by fire bodies in relation to the early appointment of the chief fire officer. 198 Highland and Islands Fire Board suggested that, if appointments to the SFRS could not be fast-tracked under provisions in the Bill, the first appointment should be made by the new chairs of the joint boards to enable the chief fire officer to be in place by September 2012. 199

248. The LGR Committee noted the suggestion of some of its witnesses that transitional board members be appointed on an interim basis to progress the work towards the establishment of the services 200, including early appointments of the chief constable and chief fire officer.

249. In response to evidence received, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice said that, while ministerial appointment of the chief constable had to be avoided, he was prepared to “listen and reflect” on the concerns raised in evidence. 201

250. The Committee agrees with the overwhelming evidence that the chief constable and chief fire officer should be appointed as early as possible, and certainly before the proposed date of December 2012.

251. One member of the Committee, while accepting the case for early appointments under the current timetable, believes that the fundamental problem is that the timetable for reform is unrealistic and considers that, rather than bringing forward the appointments, the entire timetable for reform should be revisited.\textsuperscript{202}

252. \textbf{We note that the first chief fire officer may be appointed by the Scottish Ministers and would urge that this is undertaken as soon as possible.}

253. While we understand the Scottish Government’s position that ministerial appointment of the chief constable must be avoided, the Committee considers that other procedures could be put in place for appointment of the first chief constable.\textsuperscript{203} The Committee urges the Scottish Government to consider the options suggested by witnesses and others, with a view to a chief constable being in place at the earliest opportunity, while ensuring that the independence and robustness of the process is not undermined.

\textbf{Outline business cases}

254. The Financial Memorandum (FM) on the Bill “summarises the best available evidence and analysis and is largely based on that used in the outline business cases (OBCs) to support decisions on the structure of future services in September 2011”. The FM “does not provide a plan or blueprint for the future delivery of the services and it is not intended to be used to set future budgets.”\textsuperscript{204}

255. The Finance Committee explored in more detail concerns surrounding the use of the OBCs to inform the FM, along with the projected savings and redundancies it proposes, and invited this Committee to pursue the matter with the Cabinet Secretary for Justice.\textsuperscript{205}

256. A number of witnesses said that they expected a full business case (FBC) to be developed by the Scottish Government to inform the FM and were concerned that “best estimates” for the costs and savings from the OBC were instead being relied upon.\textsuperscript{206} Chief Constable Smith of ACPOS warned of the dangers of basing “significant decisions about investment” and savings on the OBCs which “outlined at a high level what might be achieved” but did not set out any timescales.\textsuperscript{207} Mr Haigh of the Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland had similar concerns that the Bill was moving forward on the basis of the fire OBC.\textsuperscript{208}

257. Chief Constable Smith further explained that, while savings would be made, his “personal and professional view was that the savings set out in the Bill will not be achieved in the coming years” and that this is “the biggest risk to the reform and redesign of a critical public service”.\textsuperscript{209}

258. Witnesses commented on the difficulties in achieving the projected savings within the context of the Scottish Government’s on-going commitment to maintain a level of 17,234 police officers and no compulsory redundancies. Councillor Grant of COSLA spoke of the impact on front-line officers of losing civilian staff through redundancies—

“The Government has a policy of no compulsory redundancies, so if people do not decide to take voluntary redundancy they will transfer, and the new police authority will have to manage the situation. If the authority is to make savings of the order that is being talked about, something like 2,000 support staff will have to go. If those support staff go because the money must be saved, the cops will have to take up the slack. We really do not want to pay police, who should be out there doing business on the street, to sit behind a desk and pick up a phone. That does not seem sensible at all.”

259. Dave Watson from UNISON Scotland told the Committee that “the chief officers will have no choice; if they are stuck with 17,234 as an absolutely rigid and no-budge figure, the chief officer will simply have to take officers off the streets to do civilian jobs”. He went on to convey the results of a recent survey of UNISON members which he says “illustrates that we are already getting police civilian posts being substituted by police officers”. However, Chief Constable Smith disputed this “notion” earlier in the meeting.

260. A large number of witnesses believe that there needs to be a balanced workforce, with duties being undertaken by the most appropriate person regardless of whether that be a police officer or a civilian member of staff. Mr Watson said—

“In five or six years, we will be sitting round a table like this with Audit Scotland, who will say that the situation is ridiculous because we are paying police officers, at great cost, to do jobs that they are not qualified to do. We should not wait until then. Let us take the opportunity of the establishment of a new police force to consider the right balance between police officers and civilians.”

261. However, Calum Steele from the Scottish Police Federation suggested that “we must look at the jobs that we do and ask ourselves not who does them, but whether they need doing in the first place”. He cited a number of existing civilian positions, including ‘change manager’, ‘business manager’ and ‘performance manager’ where he was unclear whether they were essential to the delivery of policing.

262. John Duffy of the Fire Brigades Union indicated that the fire and rescue OBC did “not allow for the protection of the front line and financial savings; it will have to be one or the other”. Some fire service bodies were concerned that the OBC significantly underestimated the costs allocated to cover the projected redundancies in the fire and rescue service, and that rather than costing £4 million the figure would be nearer £10 million.218

263. Others highlighted that significant savings, which had not been anticipated in the FM had already been made both in policing and in the fire and rescue service. For example, Councillor Whyte of Lothian and Borders Police Board said that police authorities and joint boards had already considered the hard choices so it was “difficult to see how we will go about producing the savings”.219

264. The Committee seeks clarification from the Scottish Government as to (a) when the full business cases for the police and fire and rescue services will be completed, and (b) whether, in principle, the annual budgets for the services will be adjusted on the basis of the full business cases.

265. The Committee notes witnesses’ concerns regarding the ability to achieve the projected savings contained in the outline business cases within the expected timescales. Therefore, we seek clarification as to the impact of the projected redundancies of civilian posts on the front line.

Merging of services – VAT consequences

266. Currently, police and fire services are able to recover VAT costs incurred (under section 33 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994) because they (a) carry out local authority functions, and (b) have a power to draw on local taxation. The FM indicates that the new services may not qualify for section 33 exemption status due to centralisation. It further states that, if the new bodies were subject to VAT, this could be a recurring annual cost of £21.5m for the single police service and £4m for the single fire and rescue service.220

267. The Finance Committee explored this issue in more detail and wrote to HM Treasury to seek some clarity. In its response, HM Treasury explained that—

“The Section 33 refund scheme was introduced together with VAT in 1973, following a commitment that VAT would not become a burden on local taxation. Since then, successive Governments have maintained its original policy objective by only granting access to bodies which both carry out local authority functions and have a power to draw upon local taxation.”221

268. The Finance Committee invited this Committee to seek an update from the Cabinet Secretary “on all steps that the Scottish Government is taking to try to resolve this issue”.222

220 Financial Memorandum, paragraph 178.
269. The Committee heard from Assistant Chief Constable Finlay that the Police Service of Northern Ireland has VAT exemption status under section 99223 of the 1994 Act—

“It is a long-standing arrangement that affects not only the PSNI but other public services in Northern Ireland. The reason is the structure of public services in Northern Ireland. A centralised model was put in place some considerable time ago due to conditions in Northern Ireland over previous years during the troubles and so on. Centralised units were put in place such that, for example, housing came from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. That model included a decision being made—I do not know by whom or in what capacity—that we would be treated like a local authority.”224

270. Many witnesses, including Councillor Grant of COSLA, expressed concern that, if VAT could not be recovered, the new services would be required to find more savings, which could equate to additional job losses.225 Highland and Islands Fire Board agreed that this “additional cost to the public purse” will “reduce resources for the new services”226, and the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland argued that the potential loss of VAT recovery would cost around £10 million annually, rather than the £4 million per annum suggested in the outline business cases227.

271. Chief Constable Smith of ACPOS told the Committee that, although the VAT issue was important in the context of reform, it was “not the most critical issue” and he was confident that the Scottish Government was “doing everything it can do to resolve the issue”.228 However, Dave Watson from UNISON Scotland said he was “not confident” that the VAT issue would be resolved as “we have not solved it with the Scottish Police Services Authority” and suggested that this would mean “another 600 jobs will go”229.

272. Although not commenting specifically on the issue of obtaining VAT recovery, Professor Jim Gallagher observed that the SPA could be a local government body, consisting of-elected councillors, perhaps with appointed members added”.230 It is unclear whether making structural changes along these lines might strengthen the legal case for VAT recovery. However, the Committee has already recommended that the SPA and SFRS Board should not be local scrutiny bodies.

273. In evidence to the Committee, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice highlighted the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the security services of the UK as examples of similar ‘national’ bodies that were still able to recover VAT and insisted that negotiations on VAT recovery with HM Treasury were continuing.\textsuperscript{231}

\textit{Committee view}

274. The Committee notes that the Scottish Government was aware that removing policing and fire and rescue services as local authority functions could lead to removal of their entitlement to recover VAT under section 33 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994, and indeed accounted for this within the outline business cases. We acknowledge that the Scottish Government’s view is that there is a strong financial case for a move to single bodies, even if the VAT issue is not resolved to its satisfaction.

275. The Committee further notes that the Scottish Government is in negotiations with HM Treasury to establish whether this situation can be avoided.

276. \textbf{Regardless of whether the cost of VAT is to be met by the police and fire and rescue services or whether alternative arrangements are in place, the Committee is concerned at the possibility of a significant annual recurrent loss from the Scottish budget. The Committee urges the Scottish Government to pursue with HM Treasury all possibilities to resolve this issue, for example, (a) by treating the Police Service of Scotland in a similar way to the Police Service of Northern Ireland, and/or (b) by giving local authorities the capacity to contribute to police and fire budgets, so as to help clarify that the new bodies can “draw upon local taxation”.}

\textbf{Cross-border arrangements}

277. The British Transport Police (BTP) and British Transport Police Authority highlighted that the Bill would repeal the existing mutual aid and collaboration provisions in the 1967 Act. They added that the Bill does not cover how mutual aid and collaboration between the police service of Scotland and the BTP are to be provided in the future and suggested that existing mutual aid provisions and collaboration provisions be retained.\textsuperscript{232}

278. Mr Sweeney of the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland indicated that Lothian and Borders Fire and Rescue Service had questioned whether the indemnification and insurance of Scottish-based fire fighters operating in England would be valid and, if so, whether the principles of Scots law or English civil law would apply.\textsuperscript{233} He provided supplementary evidence explaining that “this is a technical matter which needs to be resolved by the UK and Scottish Governments”.\textsuperscript{234} It is unclear whether this issue arises through the Bill or is an ongoing issue of concern.

279. John Duffy of the Fire Brigades Union said that “boundaries just disappear” when someone dials 999 and he did not expect that to change with a single service.²³⁵

280. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice wrote to the Committee to clarify that work was ongoing to allow reciprocal arrangements north and south of the border to continue after reform—

“Scottish Government officials are currently engaging with those in the UK Government to identify and agree amendments required to UK legislation, (and related legislation in Scotland) as a consequence of police and fire reform. This includes provisions for cross-border mutual assistance between the Scottish Fire and Rescue Services and fire and rescue services in England and Wales. Some amendments will have to be made under Scotland Act orders at Westminster. I can confirm that we expect amendments to provide any necessary clarity.”²³⁶

281. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide an update on the outcome of discussions with the UK Government regarding negotiations on cross-border arrangements.

Policing

Police officer and staff issues

282. The impact of projections contained in the outline business case on police staff numbers and related matters are explored in the implementation section of this report. A number of other police and staff issues were considered during evidence and these are outlined in the section below.

Failure to perform duty

283. Section 22 of the Bill provides for offences and penalties in relation to a constable who, without reasonable cause, is absent from duty or who neglects or violates his or her duty. The Bill allows the offence of neglect or violation of duty, which under the 1967 Act could only be prosecuted under summary procedure, to be tried under either summary or solemn procedure.²³⁷ The Policy Memorandum outlines that “this offence was only subject to summary proceedings under the 1967 Act, and any proceedings have therefore usually been taken on common law grounds to allow for a higher sentence”. It goes on to state that “the policy intention is therefore to make prosecutions in relation to this offence easier by having a clear statutory offence with an appropriate penalty”.²³⁸

284. The Scottish Police Federation, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents, and ACPOS, all argued that sufficient powers were available at

common law to deal satisfactorily with this matter and requested that the provisions be removed from the Bill.\(^{239}\)

285. The Committee seeks clarification as to why the Scottish Government feels that it is necessary for the offence of neglect or violation of duty on the part of a constable to be prosecuted under solemn procedure, when witnesses have argued that this matter can be adequately dealt with under common law.

Police appeals tribunal

286. Chapter 9 provides for a constable to appeal to a police appeals tribunal against any dismissal or demotion in rank, provided he or she has exhausted other available processes, and sets out the arrangements for the tribunal in such cases. This chapter largely replicates the provisions of the 1967 Act.\(^{240}\) Schedule 3 to the Bill provides that the tribunal should consist of three members, one of whom is to be appointed as chair. The Lord President of the Court of Session is responsible for appointing members (including the chair). All three members must be solicitors or members of the Faculty of Advocates with at least five years’ experience.

287. Currently, the membership of police appeals tribunal differs in appeals involving senior officers (of chief officer rank) and constables (of chief superintendent rank and below), but both have only one member nominated by the Lord President, with the others appointed from police boards or from those with a background in the service.\(^{241}\)

288. The Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum said it could not support the proposal that all members of the tribunal must be practising solicitors or advocates and would prefer membership to be similar to current arrangements for non-senior officers, to ensure expertise in police procedures and practice.\(^{242}\) Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland agreed that “the removal of tribunal members who have direct experience of the context of policing and the replacement of them with solicitors, is likely to be perceived by some as a further increase in the quasi-legal background for misconduct cases at a time when practice elsewhere is indicating that a de-escalation is likely to be more effective for all parties”.\(^{243}\)

289. However, the Scottish Police Federation had serious concerns about the way misconduct hearings were run currently and about “disregard for processes”, including “disclosure only of statements which support the ‘prosecution’” and “the admission of statements in lieu of oral evidence where no agreement between the parties has been reached”. It added that a tribunal constituted in accordance with the provisions of the Bill and with a chair from the Faculty of Advocates would assist in enforcing compliance with proper processes.\(^{244}\) The Police Complaints

Commissioner for Scotland also supported the new membership arrangements for tribunals.245

290. The Committee notes the views of some witnesses that police appeals tribunal should include a member or members with direct policing experience. However, on balance we are persuaded by the argument that police appeals tribunal should have membership composing solicitors and advocates, in the interests of ensuring that proceedings are impartial and determined by an appropriately qualified body.

Retirement of senior officers
291. Section 14 provides the SPA with the power to require a chief constable, a deputy chief constable or assistant chief constable to retire “in the interests of efficiency or effectiveness”. Before calling on a senior officer to retire, the SPA must provide an explanation and an opportunity to make representations. Similar powers in relation to retirement “in the interests of efficiency” were provided under the 1967 Act.

292. Some witnesses expressed concerns regarding this provision, particularly when read alongside the power of direction in section 5 (discussed above).246 Professor Jim Gallagher of Nuffield College, Oxford, argued that “the powers are capable of misuse” as “there appears to be no reason why [they] could not be exercised in the event of a disagreement between the Board and the chief constable about how operational responsibilities should be exercised”.247

293. The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents echoed these concerns and sought clarity on the appeals process in such circumstances (as this is not provided for in the Bill).248

294. The Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association (SCPOSA) said that section 14 is of “considerable concern to its members in relation to the security of their employment” and argued that use of this power could potentially be challenged—

“Whilst a similar provision existed within the terms of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 it has never, to knowledge, been used and indeed legal opinion currently to hand indicates that any attempt to use such a wide and unchecked power would be challengeable by Judicial Review. In the circumstances of senior officers, it would appear that what is being envisaged is requiring senior officers to resign with immediate effect with no compensation at all”.249

295. Deputy Chief Constable Andrew Barker of SCPOSA further told the Committee that he had “taken legal advice on the matter and been told that there is no similar power in the public or private sectors”. He went on to say that the decision could come down to “a whim of the police authority or others as to whether an individual is surplus to requirements and could be required to retire”.250

296. The Committee notes the concerns of witnesses on the provision in the Bill to require a chief constable, a deputy chief constable or an assistant chief constable to retire in the “interests of efficiency or effectiveness”, and asks the Scottish Government to consider and respond to these concerns. The Committee also notes that similar powers found in the 1967 Act have not required to be used.

Regulations on governance, administration and conditions of service

297. Section 49 of the Bill requires the Scottish Ministers to make regulations as to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables and police cadets. More specifically, regulations made under section 49 can make provision relating to, among other things, the resignation or retirement of constables; pay, allowances and expenses; duties and hours of duty; disciplinary procedures; and the keeping of personal records and taking of fingerprints and samples from constables and police cadets.

298. The Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum expressed concern as to “the substantial volume of regulations” under Section 49 “to be produced within such a short timescale”251, while the Subordinate Legislation Committee said this power was “a very wide one”. It went on to state—

“On balance, given the detailed nature of the matters which are to be dealt with in delegated legislation, the Committee finds the delegation of these matters to be acceptable in principle. However, the Committee draws the breadth of the regulation-making power to the attention of the lead committee so that it may consider whether it would be more appropriate for any of the subject matter of Chapter 8 [on governance and administration of police] to be dealt with in the Bill itself.”252

299. The Committee notes the Subordinate Legislation Committee’s view regarding the breadth of the power of the Scottish Ministers to make regulations as to the governance, administration and conditions of service of constables and police cadets. We also acknowledge that the Subordinate Legislation Committee finds the delegation of these matters to be acceptable in principle and therefore, on balance we make no recommendation on this matter.

Forensic Services

The ‘sterile corridor’

300. Chapter 3 of the Bill provides that the SPA must provide forensic services to the Police Service, Lord Advocate and procurators fiscal (and others as it thinks fit). The Scottish Government’s Policy Memorandum on the Bill explains the rationale for this—

[251 Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum. Written submission.]
[252 Scottish Parliament Subordinate Legislation Committee, 16th Report, 2012 (Session 4). Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, paragraph 26.]
“In order to maintain public confidence in the criminal justice system, the new structure will reflect the need to maintain a “sterile corridor” between police investigations and forensic investigations. In Scotland there is currently a ‘crime scene to court’ forensic service which has, since 2007, been part of the SPSA and independent from police forces. In order to maintain this arrangement, section 31 of the Bill requires the SPA to make arrangements for the provision of a forensic service which is accountable directly to the SPA and not to the chief constable.”

301. A number of the police bodies were opposed to this proposal, with some, including ACPO, the Scottish Police Federation and the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents suggesting that specific responsibility for crime scene examinations should lie with the chief constable. ACPO argued that “examination of a scene is intrinsically linked to the investigative process, responsibility for which falls under the direction of the police in accordance with the senior investigator’s policy and decision-making”.

302. Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland agreed that the chief constable should have “clear operational direction over forensic crime scene examination” and suggested that the proposal to place it under the responsibility of the SPA “appears to commensurately reduce the chief constable’s accountability in relation to the prevention and detection of crime”.

303. However, the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) said in its written submission that “clear demonstrable impartiality is important in maintaining confidence in forensic evidence presented within the criminal justice system and also protects the police from any impression of undue influence”. Andrea Quinn from the SPSA told the Committee that—

“I agree that the chief constable and his command team should decide what scenes we go to and when we should go ... However, I believe that we can do that with a national forensics gateway. At the moment, we have eight gateways doing things in eight different ways, which is simply inefficient. We would put in place an SLA [service level agreement]—one exists today, and that is how we respond to policing demands. I envisage that that is how we would be held to account in the future.”

Provision of forensic services to others

304. The Bill permits the SPA to charge for the services it provides to public bodies and officeholders, other than for the provision of forensic services to the Lord Advocate or procurators fiscal. The Bill does not extend this exception to the new Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC).

305. Professor McNeill, the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland, said he assumed that the PIRC would not be charged for any forensic services provided by the SPA, but he would prefer if this was made explicit on the face of the Bill. The Scottish Police Federation agreed that forensic services should be made available to the PIRC at no cost.

306. The Committee accepts the Scottish Government's rationale behind giving the Scottish Police Authority the responsibility to provide forensic services so as to create a “sterile corridor” between police investigations and forensic investigations.

307. We do, however, seek clarity on how this will work in practice, and in particular whether forensic services will still be required to attend a crime scene where requested to do so by the police service. The Committee accepts that, once the forensic services have been called to a crime scene, it is for them to determine how they conduct the forensic examination.

308. The Committee recommends that the Bill should include a provision specifying that forensic services should be supplied to the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner at no cost.

Complaints and Investigations

Functions of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner

309. Chapter 10 of the Bill amends the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 to rename the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland (PCCS) as the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC) and to extend the PIRC’s remit.

310. The PIRC’s remit in relation to complaints remains largely the same as that of the PCCS. However, Section 61 of the Bill places a number of requirements on the SPA and chief constable in relation to dealing with complaints, including maintaining suitable arrangements for the handling of relevant complaints and seeking views on these arrangements. The SPA must “keep itself informed about how the chief constable is dealing with relevant complaints” and the chief constable must provide the SPA with “whatever information about relevant complaints it reasonably requires” for this purpose.

311. Section 63 of the Bill extends the remit of the PIRC to include the investigation, when directed by a prosecutor, of any circumstances in which there is an indication that a person serving with the police may have committed a “serious criminal offence” and the circumstances of any death under the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976. The Commissioner may also investigate and report on deaths, serious injuries or firearms incidents where constables and police staff are involved.

259 Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland. Written submission.
261 A “serious criminal offence” for the purposes of this section is where the conduct constituting the offences results in death or serious injury.
312. The PIRC may also investigate ‘a serious incident involving the police’, defined as including deaths and serious injuries when the person had contact (directly or indirectly) with the police or was detained or held in custody at or before the time of death or serious injury, and incidents where a person serving with the police has used a firearm or other prescribed weapon.

313. Generally speaking, most witnesses welcomed the creation of the PIRC. For example, ACPOS stated in written evidence that “it is crucial public confidence in the police remains high but also that they have confidence in how we investigate complaints and the recourse available when they have concerns about investigations”.

314. Professor John McNeill, the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland, claimed that, “unlike those cases in which there is an indication of criminality”, the Bill does not specify how investigations into “serious incidents involving the police” would be triggered. He stated in written evidence—

“The prompt referral of such cases will be of critical importance to the exercise of PIRC’s functions and the integrity of its investigations. The PCCS therefore considers that the notification arrangements ought to be specified in the Bill, rather than within regulations which may (or may not) be made. All other police oversight bodies in the UK and Ireland operate on the basis of mandatory referrals by the police of cases involving death or serious injury. In the absence of a similar provision, it is unclear how PIRC might be alerted to a serious incident of the kind it is expected to investigate.”

315. Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland supported Professor McNeill’s suggestion that referrals to the PIRC be mandatory in such cases. However, the Scottish Police Federation argued this can be adequately dealt with in regulations.

‘Public interest’ investigations

316. Under section 66 of the Bill, the PIRC may also investigate ‘any relevant police matter’ that it considers is in the public interest. Any relevant police matter is defined as “any matter relating to the Authority, the Police Service or a person serving with the police”.

317. The Scottish Institute for Policing Research argued that this section is “very important and provides an area of truly independent initiative for the Commissioner in which to act”. It added that “it is particularly the inclusion of this ‘public interest’ clause which moves police complaints in Scotland from a position in which it lags behind other comparable jurisdictions to one in which it potentially leads the field”.

263 ACPOS. Written submission.
265 Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland. Written submission.
267 Scottish Police Federation. Written submission.

318. There was, however, confusion surrounding the meaning of ‘public interest’. The Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA) sought a clearer definition of the term.\(^{269}\) The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents also had concerns that the term ‘any police matter’ could be interpreted very widely—

“We are concerned that the wording of this section empowers the PIRC to conduct investigations without limit. We do understand the need for public interest investigations but would encourage the Justice Committee to question whether it is appropriate to invest such significant power to commence such investigations in one person.”\(^{270}\)

319. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee that the Scottish Government was “happy to look at any further change to the bill if it is necessary to ensure that, while we maintain public confidence, we do not perhaps provide for a role that would be prospective rather than reactive.”\(^{271}\)

Appointment of the PIRC and team

320. Clarity was sought from witnesses on “where the specialist knowledge and skills would be sourced from” to provide the PIRC’s staff.\(^{272}\) The SCDEA questioned whether the police service would be expected to provide the relevant knowledge and expertise to staff the PIRC and, if so, whether this would provide the necessary independence required of the role.\(^{273}\)

321. Many of the main police bodies in Scotland argued that the PIRC and head of investigations should be appointed as soon as possible.\(^{274}\) The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents said it was particularly concerned that there is insufficient time available to implement the introduction of the PIRC prior to the establishment of the police service.\(^{275}\)

Defamation

322. Professor McNeill, the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland, told the Committee that he had been subject to the threat of defamation proceedings on a number of occasions and, therefore, suggested that the PIRC be provided with “absolute, or at the least, qualified privilege” to protect the position from such proceedings. He added that other complaints bodies, such as the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman, have this protection.\(^{276}\)

Complaints against the PIRC

323. Section 70 of the Bill inserts a new section 42A into the 2006 Act providing for the PIRC to “maintain suitable arrangements for the handling of complaints” and to seek the views of others “as to what those arrangements should be”. The

Bill includes the PIRC as one of the bodies to whom a referral may ultimately be made to the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO). However it also provides that “action taken by the PIRC for the purposes of or in connection with the investigation or prevention of crime or the protection of the security of the State” may not be so referred.277

324. The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents expressed concern “about the fairness of the proposed method for dealing with complaints against the PIRC” and proposed that “there must be included ... a clearly defined procedure to address this shortfall in the current Bill, including a role for the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman”.278 The Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency agreed that the SPSO would seem an appropriate body to fulfil the external scrutiny role necessary “to ensure public confidence in the new role and responsibilities of the PIRC”.279

325. The Committee seeks clarity on how the relationship between the Lord Advocate and the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner would work regarding criminal investigations, and in particular as to the role of the PIRC in relation to serious incidents involving the police. We further seek the Scottish Government’s views on comments by some witnesses that the power of the PIRC in relation to public interest investigations is too wide.

326. As with the chief constable and chief fire officer, we consider that the PIRC should be appointed as early as possible to enable their investigating team to be in place before 1 April 2013, but that the appointments process must be both independent and perceived to be independent.

327. The Committee also seeks clarification as to whether the Scottish Government intends the PIRC to be a self-contained body or whether its staff will be seconded from the police.

328. The Committee agrees that the PIRC should have qualified privilege to protect him or her from defamation proceedings, as suggested by the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland.

329. The Committee notes that the Bill specifies that complaints against the PIRC may ultimately be referred to the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO), but that there appears to be a number of areas which the SPSO cannot investigate. The Committee invites the Scottish Government to clarify whether it considers there to be sufficient independent oversight of the PIRC’s complaints handling procedures.

Independent custody visiting

Background

330. Since 1999 independent custody visiting (ICV) has been carried out by volunteers. Their role is to visit police stations unannounced to check on the welfare of those in police custody. All police authorities and joint police boards provide and support a scheme for their area.\(^{280}\)

331. Chapter 16 of the Bill seeks to place the arrangements for ICV in Scotland on a statutory footing, in line with the rest of the UK. The Scottish Government believe that this is necessary to ensure that ICV in Scotland is fully compliant with the United Nations Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OPCAT). The grounds on which access to detainees (or to a category of detainee) can be refused are determined by the Scottish Ministers. Before making such a determination or issuing any relevant guidance on ICV, the Scottish Ministers must consult the SPA, the chief constable, independent custody visitors or their representative body, and such other persons as they consider appropriate. The Scottish Ministers are required to lay a copy of any such determination or guidance before the Scottish Parliament.

332. Access to a detainee may only be refused where it appears to a constable of the rank of inspector (or above) that a ground set out in a determination by the Scottish Ministers is satisfied in relation to the detainee, and where any other procedural requirements the SPA considers necessary have also been met.\(^{281}\)

333. The intention behind the decision to place ICV on a statutory basis was broadly welcomed by witnesses. The SIPR said that making ICV a statutory requirement was "very much in line with recommendations that it made in its evaluation of custody visiting in Scotland".\(^{282}\) However, some witnesses, such as Robert Wyllie of Lincoln College, Oxford, had concerns that the arrangements fall short of the OPCAT requirements—

"The Bill does not provide for a comprehensive visiting scheme. It allows for access to be denied to custody visitors. This is inconsistent with Articles 19(a), 20(c) and 20(e) of OPCAT together with paragraphs 24 and 25 of the Guidelines.\(^{283}\). The justification of this is unclear, especially given the unlimited powers of access which are given to other bodies. Indeed it can be argued that it is precisely when serious incidents take place that custody visiting is most required."\(^{284}\)

334. The Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC)\(^{285}\) also had concerns regarding the determination to refuse access to a detainee, and the UK National Preventative Mechanism\(^{286}\) argued that—

\(^{286}\) The UK National Preventative Mechanism is a group of 18 organisations which monitor places of detention across the UK in accordance with OPCAT.
“The exceptional nature of any refusal of access should be made clear in guidance and there should be a memorandum of understanding between custody visitors and the police service regarding how operational issues will be dealt with and how necessary security measures will be taken.”

335. The Committee is broadly content with provisions on independent custody visiting. However, we note some witnesses’ concerns about the potential for access to be denied and invite the Scottish Government to clarify whether it is satisfied that this is consistent with international obligations.

Human Rights

336. The Committee received evidence suggesting that human rights standards should be embedded into the structure, policy and practice of policing in Scotland, following the lead of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Indeed, the Scottish Institute for Policing Research argued that there should be a reference in the Bill to all police duties being carried out in compliance with the Human Rights Act 1998 and a specific duty on the SPA to monitor this compliance (in line with duties of the Northern Ireland Policing Board).

337. The SHRC stated that the development of a single police force and oversight structures in Scotland provides a “unique opportunity to embed human rights into the new police structure” but added that “regrettably there are no references to human rights in the bill despite the distinct human rights obligations for the police under the Human Rights Act.” The SHRC also called for a duty to be placed on the SPA to issue, following consultation, a code of ethics for the Police Service of Scotland laying down standards of conduct and practice for police officers and making them aware of the rights and obligations under ECHR.

338. Amnesty International Scotland said that accountability for the human rights performance in the new police structure in Scotland could be achieved by “including human rights references in the police purpose, the oath, a Scottish Police Service code of ethical practice, and in training and appraisals.”

339. Sir Hugh Orde, President of the Association of Chief Police Officers, told the Committee that human rights was at the core of policing in the PSNI, including the oath that constables are required to take which refers to “upholding fundamental human rights”. He added—

“The human rights agenda was embedded in every training course. I was inspected on our compliance with that agenda by independent people. The people who held me to account were independent advisers to the policing board, not to me. The principle was not just window dressing; it was embedded in everything that we did. The human rights agenda was embedded in our system, and public order and everything else were policed against that agenda, which was hugely important.”

340. The Committee notes the good practice from Northern Ireland in relation to embedding human rights within all aspects of policing and recommends that the Scottish Government gives consideration to the Bill being more explicit on human rights.

FIRE AND RESCUE

Fire and rescue functions

341. The Bill provides for the functions of the fire and rescue authorities and joint boards set out in the 2005 Act to be transferred to the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. Additional fire and rescue functions are contained in the Fire (Additional Function) (Scotland) Order 2005. The Policy Memorandum indicates that the Scottish Government intends to transfer these functions to the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service by secondary legislation.

342. The Policy Memorandum indicates that a new fire and rescue framework will be brought into effect through secondary legislation, to “reflect these existing statutory functions, and give them a renewed focus by placing them within a context of promoting community engagement, prevention and partnership working to improve outcomes.”

343. The Fire Brigades Union (FBU) argued that the 2005 Act “crucially changed fire brigades into fire and rescue services” but that the legislation “did not anticipate that the public understanding of the definition of ‘rescue’ would mean a much wider and altogether more onerous role for the service.”

344. The Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland (APFOS) suggested that “it is timely to introduce new functions which better reflect the contribution that the fire and rescue service already makes to a much wider community safety agenda”, and Brian Sweeney from the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland (CFOAS) told the Committee that the legislation “needed to be clear about the purpose and functions of a 21st century fire and rescue service”. Steven Torrie, Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities and Head of the Fire and Rescue Advisory Unit, said “it would be helpful if the bill broadly recognised the fire and rescue service as the rescue organisation for Scotland, as long as we do not get caught up in too much detail at the level of the law.” He went on to explain—

292 These functions are: (a) promoting fire safety; (b) fire fighting; (c) responding to road traffic accidents; (d) enforcing fire safety legislation in relevant premises; and (e) responding to any other eventualities likely to cause death, injury or illness, or harm to the environment (including buildings).
293 Additional functions are: (a) responding to chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear incidents; (b) providing urban search and rescue capability; (c) responding to serious flooding; and (d) responding to serious transport incidents.
294 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 66.
295 Fire Brigades Union. Written submission.
296 Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland. Written submission.
“If you try to be too clever and precise about defining functions, you could end up tying the service up in knots with different arguments. For example, when is a serious flooding incident a serious flooding incident and not a rescue from rapidly moving water, such as a river? I could give you countless examples; that is just one.”

345. Stakeholders, including the CFOAS, commented that prevention, including road safety should also have featured more prominently in the fire and rescue functions specified in the Bill, while the APFOS and FBU argued that the community safety role should have had more emphasis placed on it.

346. The LGR Committee noted views expressed by the FBU and CFOAS that the Scottish Government should take the opportunity to amend the 2005 Act to ensure that those functions regularly carried out by the fire and rescue services are defined and funded as fire service responsibilities.

347. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice told the Committee “we think we have the correct balance” and said “there is a danger that if it goes too far in that regard, the service will become too specific.” A Scottish Government official, added—

“The service’s functions were last reviewed by the Parliament in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. We have not been persuaded that anything has changed significantly enough in the intervening period to change what is in the legislation. That said, in addition to the legislation there is the fire and rescue framework [for Scotland], which we are consulting on at the moment. That document is much more flexible and easier to change, so our preference would be to have more detail on the Government’s priorities in the framework, which is a document that comes before the Parliament.”

348. The Committee accepts that it would be helpful for the rescue aspect of the fire and rescue service’s functions to be clarified to a greater degree, but does not believe that this should necessarily be included in the Bill. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to discuss with fire bodies where best to clarify or codify their rescue functions, such as in the Fire and Rescue Framework or the next Fire (Additional Function) (Scotland) Order.

Fire officer and staff issues

349. The impact of projections contained in the outline business case relating to fire and rescue staff redundancies and related matters are explored in the implementation section of this report. A number of other fire fighter and staff issues were considered during evidence and these are outlined in the section below.
Industrial relations

350. The Bill removes section 49 from the 2005 Act on statutory negotiation arrangements regarding conditions of service of employees of the fire authorities and joint boards. The Fire Brigades Union argued that a partnership approach on negotiation of conditions of service could be harder to achieve without this provision. Mr Sweeney of the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland said “as a result of consultation and negotiation with management, we have reached a stable industrial relations position where most authorities throughout Scotland work directly in partnership with all the unions, not just the Fire Brigades Union, in a mature, stable environment”. However he added that there was a lack of clarity about what the negotiating and consultation arrangements would be on pay, terms, conditions and pensions of fire fighters and staff.

Fire service pensions

351. The Finance Committee welcomed a commitment from the Scottish Government that, “should the position in relation to fire fighter pensions change, then any resulting financial implications will fall on the Government and not on the new fire service”. It invited the Scottish Government to confirm that this would be the case where there is a permanent reduction in pension income.

352. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice provided a written submission which stated that “there were no plans to change the current benefits for pension scheme members as a result of the reform of Scottish fire and rescue services”. He added that separately, the “Scottish Government is continuing to work closely with stakeholders, including the trades unions, on the implications of the UK Government’s proposed pension changes”.

353. The Committee notes the comments of the Fire Brigades Union and the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland regarding the provision in the Bill which removes section 49 (on negotiation arrangements in relation to conditions of service) from the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. We therefore invite the Scottish Government to explain the rationale for removing this provision.

ANNEXE B: EXTRACTS FROM THE MINUTES

2nd Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 17 January 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee agreed to issue a call for evidence on the Bill at Stage 1.

3rd Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 24 January 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1 and agreed (1) to forward the Finance Committee’s correspondence on the Stage 1 timetable to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice; (2) the proposed timetable for Stage 1 scrutiny of the Bill; (3) witnesses for evidence sessions on 28 February and 6 and 13 March; and (4) to delegate to the Convener authority to agree the final composition of witness panels.

7th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 28 February 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
- Chief Constable Kevin Smith, President, Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland;
- Chief Superintendent David O’Connor, President, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents;
- Deputy Chief Constable Gordon Meldrum, Director General, Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency;
- Andrea Quinn, Chief Executive Officer, Scottish Police Services Authority;
- Deputy Chief Constable Andrew Barker, Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association;
- Calum Steele, General Secretary, Scottish Police Federation;
- Dave Watson, Scottish Organiser (Bargaining and Campaigns), Unison Scotland.

John Finnie declared that he was formerly a police officer and full time official of the Scottish Police Federation. Graeme Pearson declared that he was formerly a police officer and member of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, and that he had previously advised software companies about information and communication technology.

8th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 6 March 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—
- Assistant Chief Constable Alistair Finlay, Police Service of Northern Ireland;
- Professor Nick Fyfe, Director, Scottish Institute for Policing Research;
- Dr Kenneth Scott, Director of the Centre for Criminal Justice and Police Studies, University of the West of Scotland;
- Alison Payne, Research Director, Reform Scotland;
Professor John McNeill, Commissioner, and Ian Todd, Director, Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland; Andrew Laing, Her Majesty’s Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland, and Chief Superintendent David McCracken, Principal Inspection Manager, Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland; Robert Black, Auditor General for Scotland, Audit Scotland.

John Finnie declared that he was previously on a police appeals tribunal. Graeme Pearson declared that he was previously a member of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill - witness expenses: The Committee agreed to delegate to the Convener responsibility for arranging for the SPCB to pay, under Rule 12.4.3, any expenses of witnesses on the Bill.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered the evidence received and agreed to invite an additional witness to give evidence at a future meeting. The Committee also agreed to seek an extension to the timetable for completion of Stage 1.

9th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 13 March 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Richard Haigh, Scottish Regional Secretary, Association of Principal Fire Officers (Scotland);
Brian Sweeney, Chief Officer (Strathclyde Fire and Rescue), Chief Fire Officers Association (Scotland);
Steven Torrie, Head, Scottish Fire and Rescue Advisory Unit;
Councillor Richard Durham, Highland and Islands Fire Board, Scottish Fire Conveners Forum;
Sir Hugh Orde, President, Association of Chief Police Officers;
John Duffy, Scottish Secretary, Fire Brigades Union;
Sarah Duncan, Regional Organiser and Secretary of the Scottish Fire Committee, Unison.

John Finnie declared that he is a member of Amnesty International. Colin Keir declared that he is a member of the City of Edinburgh Council.

The Committee agreed to request a paper from SPICe on models of Parliamentary scrutiny in relation to the Bill.

10th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 20 March 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Councillor Ian Blake, Convener, Dumfries and Galloway Police, Fire and Rescue Committee; Councillor George Kay, Convener, Fife Police, Fire and Safety Committee; Councillor Martin Greig, Convener, Grampian Joint Police Board; Councillor Iain Whyte, Convener, Lothian and Borders Police Board; Councillor Ian Ross, Vice Convener, Northern Joint Police Board; Councillor Stephen Curran, Convener, Strathclyde Police Authority; Councillor Pat Watters, President, and Councillor Barbara Grant, Community Safety Spokesperson, Convention of Scottish Local Authorities.

Colin Keir declared that he is a member of the City of Edinburgh Council.

11th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 27 March 2012

Decisions on taking business in private: […] The Committee also agreed to consider the main themes arising from the evidence received on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, as well as the draft Stage 1 report on the Bill, in private at future meetings.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice;
Liz Sadler, Head of Policy and Legislation Unit, Nick Bland, Head of Police Reform Unit, and Lorna Gibbs, Head of Fire and Rescue Reform Unit, Scottish Government.

13th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 17 April 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered the main themes arising from the evidence received on the Bill at Stage 1 in order to inform the drafting of its report.

14th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 24 April 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered a draft Stage 1 report. Various changes were agreed to and the Committee agreed to consider a revised draft report at its next meeting.

15th Meeting, 2012 (Session 4) Tuesday 1 May 2012

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered a revised draft Stage 1 report. Various changes were agreed to and the Committee agreed its report on the Bill.

The next agenda item is our first evidence session on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill at stage 1.

I welcome our first panel of witnesses. They are: Chief Constable Kevin Smith, who is president of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland; Chief Superintendent David O’Connor, who is president of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents; Deputy Chief Constable Gordon Meldrum, who is director general of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency; and Andrea Quinn, who is chief executive officer of the Scottish Police Services Authority. Thank you for your very full submissions—I know that they are very full, because I read them all.

We will move straight to questions from members. Witnesses should self-nominate if they wish to respond to any question that is not specifically directed at them, and I will come to them in turn. The microphones will come on automatically—at least, that is the plan.

Humza Yousaf (Glasgow) (SNP): All at the same time—that was very good.

Chief Constable Smith: It is the only thing we agree on. [Laughter.]

Humza Yousaf: I would like to hear from each of the panel members—as long as they self-nominate, of course—about the financial savings, which have been much discussed. I am particularly interested to hear whether Mr Smith and Mr O’Connor think that the savings that have been mentioned are reasonable and achievable and what the constraints might be in that regard.

Chief Constable Smith: Savings are the biggest issue in the reform and raise the question whether we will have the opportunity to reform and redesign what is a very important part of public services or have to focus on financial cuts. At this stage, there is a risk that the latter will happen.

Let me articulate what I mean. The savings are to be made in three main areas. First, a small amount—£5 million—is to be saved in police officer delayering, or rationalisation. Secondly, another £30 million is to be saved in non-staff costs. That element must be explored to the nth degree before we get into the third and most critical part: the potential reduction in police staff, which is to account for up to 60 per cent of the savings. Because of the commitments on police numbers, on there being no voluntary redundancies and on there being limited changes to terms and conditions, that is the biggest issue.

For example, according to the business case in the bill, we are expected to lose more than 1,100 people by 2013-14. That is a significant figure. I stress that it is not that we do not want to do it, but if we follow the law, due diligence and due process in relation to redundancies, such a move will make running the organisation impossible. The earliest possible date for the new police service of Scotland to be a legal entity is 1 April 2013; in other words, that will be the first opportunity for the new chief constable and police authority to engage in meaningful consultation and dialogue with the union, to present plans and to secure agreement. We all know how long that process takes. At the very least, there has to be 90 days’ consultation with the union and the individuals who will be affected.

The very recent—indeed, current—experience of forces is that the consultation period is followed by an implementation phase; for example, it took Strathclyde Police more than 18 months and four phases to take 200 people out of the organisation through voluntary redundancy. Based on what our professional human resources people have told us about recent experiences, our professional assessment is that, at the very best, it might be the third or even the final quarter of 2013-14 before we achieve the redundancies, which will very quickly eat into the savings that have already been set out in the bill.

Of course, the other practical question is whether—because of the limitations on compulsory redundancy—we will get that number of volunteers. Our assessment, based on recent experience, is that over the next two to three years we will not attract the expected 2,000 people. That is not because of lack of commitment in the police service: the simple fact is that not enough people will leave the organisation.

We have reached this point because of the outline business case, which was—although it has been very much informed by people in the service and subject experts—never intended by the police officers who were party to it, or by the consultants, to be a document that contained sufficient detail on which to base significant decisions about investment and savings. Moreover, although it outlined at a high level what might be achieved, it did not set out any timescales. Finally, it did not say anything about what I would call due diligence and whether you could actually move up to 2,000 people out of the organisation in that time.

That, for me, is the biggest risk to the reform and redesign of a critical public service. The service is as one in trying to deliver a new reformed and redesigned national police service, in trying to do everything that we do locally and in trying to deliver what we can nationally within a very constrained financial envelope. We will make savings, but my personal and professional view is that the savings that have been set out in the bill will not be achieved in the coming years. I do not say that easily, but I would rather say it now than come back here in two years to answer your questions about why the savings have not been made.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I will build on that. There is a clear need to focus on maintaining a balanced workforce in the new service: there must be a balance between police officers and police staff. There is no doubt—because more than 84 per cent of the police budget is spent on staff costs—that there will be an impact on staff as we go forward. We have heard from Kevin Smith about the position on maintaining officer numbers, having no compulsory redundancies, the terms and conditions of police officers and, potentially, a dispersed service delivery model in the future.

I sense that the challenges that we face are about maintaining service delivery. Police performance is very high and crime is at a 35-year low. We must maintain public confidence and reassure the public about the service as we move from the current eight-force structure to the new single-service structure. Fundamentally, we need to maintain staff confidence and staff morale as we build the new model and the new service. That is about striking the right balance between police officers and police staff—the right people with the right skills must be doing the right jobs. I sense that that will be a significant challenge for everybody in the service.

Andrea Quinn: I will build on the support-staff side of the discussion. The specialist professionals in my organisation and across the forces play a crucial part in policing. We often hear of staff being badged as either front-line or back-office staff: that is disingenuous. I will give a few examples. Would we call an accountant who was working to track down a serious organised crime group and their ill-gotten gains “back-office staff”? Would we call a forensic scientist who is dealing with the body of a murdered child “back-office staff”? Would we call information and communications technology experts in restoring police communications “back-office staff”? No. We would not.

It is vital that you appreciate the balanced team that all my colleagues have mentioned and the importance of getting the balance right.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: I agree with everything that has been said and can be reasonably brief. As Andrea Quinn said, it is helpful to put into perspective what we mean by “police staff”. Perhaps it is not the case in this room, but when people elsewhere talk about police staff they conceptualise that as someone who is in an indoor back-office job.

I have a number of crucial staff at the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency in disciplines such as e-crime, cybercrime, technical support, forensic accountancy and so on. They are police staff who have unique skills that many police officers do not have and they work as close to the front line as you can get without wearing a uniform. The notion that some police staff are tucked away in back offices and so on does not hold; many of them perform critical front-line operational roles.

The Convener: That is a very helpful elaboration of the definition.

Humza Yousaf: I find those comments very useful and reiterate that it is somewhat “disingenuous”—to use the word that Ms Quinn used—to make a simple black-and-white differentiation between back-room and front-line staff. Does it really become an operational matter, as it should be, for the chief constable or local commanders in terms of how best to deliver the service in the appropriate manner? Perhaps you can elaborate on that. I suppose the point, before I let other members plug away—

The Convener: No: I will let them plug away.

Humza Yousaf: Yes, indeed.

The Convener: I have to keep sorting this young man out.

Humza Yousaf: That’s me telt.

The Convener: That’s you telt, all right.

Humza Yousaf: Many of you indicate in your submissions that the Government is in negotiations about a VAT exemption. How much of an impact would it have if you did not have to pay that £22 million liability?

Chief Constable Smith: I will touch on the first point that you made about whether such decisions should be left to the chief constable. There is a need for a mature debate about the workforce mix.

My colleagues can probably articulate the point far better than I can.

For me, as a chief constable and someone who is leading reform, there is an issue of pragmatism. An elected Government has said that we will have 17,234 police officers. For the avoidance of doubt, I think that that is not a bad thing; it is a good thing. The Government has also said that there will be no compulsory redundancies. That is a strong statement to our people and is also a very good thing. However, when such factors come together we get pushed certain ways. Is it about the money that will be saved if those factors cannot be altered, or is it about phasing? I hope that I have articulated the problem.

The VAT issue is important and we have been trying to resolve it since the SPSA came into existence in 2007. I am confident that the Government is doing everything that it can to resolve the issue—I do not think that anyone wants it. However, in the context of reform, VAT liability is not the most critical issue; the most critical issue is the savings that are anticipated, particularly in year 1, and the timing, given the due diligence and legal process that we need to go through. We will not deliver the savings that are based on the expected reduction in staff numbers if we follow due process and do what is right, legal and fair to our people—we will save only a very small proportion of that part of the budget. That is the single biggest threat and risk in relation to reform and the single biggest threat to what we want to do for the Parliament, the Government and the people of Scotland, which is to redesign and reform an effective public service and make it even more effective.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: From an operational commander’s perspective, the mature debate that Kevin Smith talked about will be critical. In the potential 32 local area commands, and whatever structure sits beyond them, there will need to be a debate about how to strike the right balance between police officers and police staff in the range of public protective services that will need to be available in each area. That is key, and the debate must be had in the near future.

Humza Yousaf: Perhaps I did not express my question well. If the police had additional money, be it from VAT exemption or anything else, would you cut fewer police staff, or can you achieve an effective single police force alongside such a reduction in staff?

Chief Constable Smith: My understanding of the Government’s current position is that the savings that are anticipated in our budget are expected and that VAT liability, if it becomes an issue, will be for the Government to resolve. I speak as a public servant in the wider sense when I say that I do not think that any of us would want £22 million to be taken out of the public sector, because we would expect at least part of the effect to drip down to policing at some point. In essence, it is for Government to determine where it wants to go in that regard. However, I understand that as recently as last week the Government said that the savings that we are expected to deliver would remain the same and the VAT liability would be for Government to resolve.

Jenny Marra (North East Scotland) (Lab): I want to pick up on two points that have been raised. First, Kevin Smith said that the police service will not attract the number of volunteers for voluntary redundancy that would enable you to make the savings that the Scottish Government is asking you to make over the first year. Is there anything that would make it easier to meet those demands?

Chief Constable Smith: The difficulty with the process is the commitment to there being no compulsory redundancies. That is a laudable and positive contribution to policing, but it restricts the people who are expected to deliver reform in their ability to make savings. If there is a commitment to having 17,234 police officers and to there being only voluntary redundancies, we must ask whether the anticipated savings are too high, or whether the time in which they are expected to be made is too short.

My view is that it is all about phasing. I think that most of us follow the logic of investing in reform and expecting the outcome in the following year. However, the budget has been set in such a way as to expect the investment in voluntary redundancy and so on and the savings in the same year. Government has also told us that if we do not spend all the money that has been laid aside for redundancy in that year, simply because of a process, the money will be lost to us. If we are looking for a logical, strategic way of reforming a service, that does not seem to be the best approach.

Jenny Marra: What if there was more time to meet the demands of the process? Am I right in saying that, if you are getting rid of resources and human resources quickly in order to construct a service that will be fit for purpose three to 20 years down the line, you cannot immediately get rid of people whom you might need in two years?

Chief Constable Smith: Absolutely. The problem with voluntary redundancy is that it restricts us to making redundant only the people who raise their hands. Redundancy cannot then be decided on the basis of who we need, where we need them and what posts we could do without. It is, at best, an ad hoc way to reform a service.

As you have said, we may lose our human resources people and finance people, but when we are trying to manage our redundancy process during a period of reform, those are the very people whom we need in the organisation to help us deliver it. Equally, if we were to lose people who serve an important function that is part of the savings, for example staff in police control rooms, but were then unable to reach the reform stage quickly enough, that would be counter to good management of reform.

I am absolutely committed to maintaining police numbers and to avoiding compulsory redundancies, about which there are also strong Government commitments. If the Government expects savings to be made as part of a wider budget, we are the very people who will turn every stone to find them, but my professional view is that what is expected cannot be done according to the suggested timescale, for simple reasons of employment law and due process, which were never factored into the outline business case. It came upon us.

Jenny Marra: I will ask David O'Connor about the balance between police officers and civilian staff. At a time when we are trying to make savings, it seems to be counterintuitive to have police officers stepping in for civilian staff who are being made redundant. In effect that means, for example, a police officer who earns £45,000 might be doing a job that could be done by someone who would earn £25,000. At a time of financial savings, is that counterintuitive? Is there an optimum balance between civilian staff and police officers that would make the police force more effective?

Chief Superintendent O'Connor: There has to be a balance. From the operational commander’s perspective, police officers are highly skilled and highly trained and come fully equipped. We would much rather see them out in communities, performing the jobs of preventing and detecting crime, and enforcing the law. We need to consider the skills that are needed for the critical roles that are performed by police staff and which allow officers to stay on the street. I sense that some of that debate still needs to take place, because we are still talking about the structures, what they will look like in the 32 areas and how they will work in the relationship between the 32 areas, the chief constable and the team.

To expand on Kevin Smith’s point, we have to be careful in the short term that we do not throw the baby out with the bath water. We have a lot of very loyal, competent and experienced police staff with a lot of corporate knowledge, skills and expertise. I fear that at some point down the line it may dawn on us that we still need those skills and, indeed, that we may have to buy them back.

The Convener: I remind members to keep their questions brief, because nearly all the panel members have already given evidence to the Finance Committee. I do not want to prevent members from asking questions about finance, but I remind them that the Finance Committee has already done so, as recorded in the Official Report of its meeting of 22 February, which I am sure members have read, along with lots of other stuff. We need to leave space in this meeting to ask about other matters, such as the independence of the police and other important principles.

Lewis Macdonald (North East Scotland) (Lab): I want to follow up on Kevin Smith’s evidence on staff redundancy and the potential savings. You said clearly that the envisaged savings could not be delivered on time in line with legal requirements on the employer. What will happen if the Government maintains its commitment to introducing the reforms on 1 April next year?

Chief Constable Smith: That is a difficult question. I stress—in case there is any doubt—that we will do absolutely everything that is humanly possible to squeeze out money from the police-officer side and from the non-staff part. That is something that we do year on year.

It is a really difficult issue. The convener talked about making sure that we do not just focus on finance but look at other aspects of reform. For me, however, finance is the most critical part, because if it is not handled properly it will undermine the key objectives of reform, which are to maintain local policing, to enhance the national capacity and to increase local engagement. The savings are critical to those things. If there is no movement, the savings requirements will be pushed into the following year, which will compound the problem, or we will return to debates and discussions about, for example, police numbers and compulsory redundancy, which we do not want to do.

For the avoidance of doubt, I suggest that having 17,234 cops in Scotland and no compulsory redundancies are good things and we want to maintain those. We stress however that, because of the timing, not all the expected savings will be made in year 1. We can provide evidence of that, given recent experience. There is, therefore, a discussion to be had with the Government about how to proceed.

The Convener: The only reason I said that we should not focus solely on finance is that I do not want us to duplicate the work of another committee. If the other committee has asked cogent and thoughtful questions and has received responses already, I do not want us to duplicate that when there is much else in the bill. I am aware of how serious finance is, but we do not want to duplicate effort. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee is looking at another aspect of the reforms.

Lewis Macdonald: The way that you have described redundancies, savings and the outline business case suggests that you are being asked to meet a fairly arbitrary target of 2,000 posts over the period. In other words, there is no design that says, “In merging the forces, these are the posts that we will save and this is the financial consequence of that.” Is that approach not the wrong way round? Am I right in thinking that, if you are struggling to find 2,000 volunteers for redundancy, you will really struggle to say no to anyone who volunteers, no matter what post they hold?

Chief Constable Smith: I am sorry; can you please repeat your last question?

Lewis Macdonald: You said that you had struggled to find enough volunteers to meet the redundancies target. Does that mean that, if members of staff whom the police service wants to keep are among the volunteers, it will be very difficult for the police service to refuse them?

Chief Constable Smith: Absolutely. One force received 500 expressions of interest over the past couple of years but could release only 200 people. The other 300 people were in roles that were such that it would have been expensive to allow them to go. More critically, they were in posts that had to be maintained—posts in control rooms, custody, front-office counters and so on. If those people were released, the force would have been in the silly situation of taking cops off the streets. I and other chief constables will make every effort to ensure that we do not pull cops back in, but if the redundancy situation is not managed properly, that is unfortunately a threat and a risk.

Lewis Macdonald: So, there is no design behind the target of 2,000 posts.

Chief Constable Smith: Last year, in trying to find out how we were going to meet the financial challenge, the sustainable policing team looked across a range of policing functions and, over a period of six weeks, along with support from consultants, reported to Government on what might be achieved. That work was never intended by those who did it, nor by the consultants who advised them, to be used in making such a significant decision on police reform. It was seen as a means by which Government could consider three options—a single force, a regional model and the status quo—and say, based on a level playing field, which one looked the best. The Government’s intention was that, thereafter, that would be subject to a full and robust business case, which would more fully articulate costs, savings and achievability and would do the bit of work that I call due diligence, which would involve an examination of the mechanics of achieving the financial savings, if they amounted to the loss of upwards of 2,000 posts, and what the timescale for that would be. That was not done. We are doing that now.

Lewis Macdonald: I have a simple yes or no question for all the witnesses. Would an additional year make the process more manageable and effective?

Andrea Quinn: Yes.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: Yes.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes.

Chief Constable Smith: What I would say is that we will start the new single service on day 1. It will be functional and operational and it will deliver what we are delivering today. What is required is greater thought in terms of the phasing of savings and investment. Just now, there is investment upfront, with anticipated savings at that point. Our sense suggests that the savings will filter through in due course, following the investment. However, I do not want that to be construed in any way, shape or form—as, unfortunately, it can be—as representing a lack of commitment to police reform. Our approach is about making reform work. In order to make reform effective, we need to get these wicked issues out in the open, challenge them and resolve them.

The Convener: I think that we follow that.

Graeme Pearson (South Scotland) (Lab): I suppose that I should state my personal background. I was previously a police officer and a member of ACPOS and, as a result, I have a particular interest in these matters.

Following on from what Mr Smith has just said, it occurs to me that day 1 is April fool’s day. If we were not debating such a serious issue, I would note that that was probably a good choice of day to begin the exercise that we have just discussed.

You have mentioned the issue of redundancies among civilian staff. Hopefully, the fact that some of us have been raising that issue on the floor of Parliament over the past six months will give you some comfort.

Mr Smith concentrated on the fact that maintaining 17,234 officer posts is a good thing. However, maintaining those posts has implications, in terms of the 2,000 redundancies. You have made a clear statement of the damage that can be done in relation to that. The issue has obviously been discussed at length in the development of the current position. What has been the response from Government and the civil service in connection with the options that are available to you? Has it just been the pressure of time that has meant that a gateway review of the current business case and the development of due diligence that you mentioned earlier has been avoided?

Chief Constable Smith: The discussion has been that the Government is committed to maintaining police numbers. It is a very strong statement. I absolutely believe that that is a good thing and I am committed to there being no redundancies. However, you are right that that clashes with the other concerns. That is why one of the resolutions involves a more informed phasing, which should combat that to some extent.

What was the second part of the question?

Graeme Pearson: Let me deal with what you have just said, first. It is one thing to say that the Government wants to maintain 17,234 officers. However, is the subtext therefore that we should just get rid of 2,000 staff? Surely the budget should come along to maintain the service, in addition to the 17,234 officers.

Chief Constable Smith: While we and the Government agree absolutely with each other on the objectives of reform, we differ with regard to the practicalities of the financial aspects. The Government’s position is that the outline business case was the most informed position ever on policing, and that the savings that were highlighted were achievable. That is the Government’s position, and I disagree with it.

Graeme Pearson: Was it merely the timescale that prevented due diligence and a gateway review?

Chief Constable Smith: The Government’s position was that it would do an outline business case and then a full business case. It moved from that to an expectation that we would do the full business case. That is what we are doing. Given your experience, you can imagine that we are going through a complex and detailed analysis of what we have now, what we want on day 1 and what we want for the future. It takes time to ensure that that is done properly.

The Convener: When do you expect to conclude the preparation of your business case?

Chief Constable Smith: I will attend workshops tomorrow with the executive leads. I expect to have the day 1 position by the end of next month. The work on savings will go on thereafter.

The Government’s position was that the savings could be made, but my view was that there had been no due diligence. We are now going through that, and part of that process is looking at employment law and how we deal with redundancies. My professional view, based on current experience, is that we will not move out 2,000 people in the time given, particularly through a voluntary scheme.

Graeme Pearson: May I ask Andrea Quinn a question, convener?

The Convener: I was waiting to see whether anybody else had a question. Is your question on the same point?

Graeme Pearson: Yes.

The Convener: You did not nominate yourself, Ms Quinn, so I was leaving you in peace. However, you can comment if you want to.

Graeme Pearson: My question is about the types of people who would be released from the civilian side of things or the support side, as it is sometimes described. Do police officers necessarily have the skills to replace the expertise that would be released through redundancies?

Andrea Quinn: I would say that they do not have the skills. On average, it takes four years for an accountant, a forensic scientist or an information and communications technology expert to qualify to do the job that they do.

Graeme Pearson: Thank you.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (SNP): Like Graeme Pearson, I declare that I am a former police officer and full-time official of the Scottish Police Federation.

I address my question to the panel collectively, but ask Mr Smith to respond first. It relates to the term “balanced workforce”, which has been much used today and in the evidence that we have received. Accepting the 17,234 figure and the no-redundancy figure, I wonder whether the debate that seems to be skewed as support staff against police officers in some quarters is not the correct debate, given that there is, and will remain, a statutory requirement to have an efficient police service, as gauged by HM chief inspector of constabulary. That being the case, the police would not allow any highly trained accountant or forensic scientist to leave, because they would not be in a position thereafter to discharge the obligation to have an efficient police service.

I wonder whether I can move the discussion slightly further on to the resource allocation model, which of course is key to everything. The written submission from ACPOS refers to the implications of that for the local resourcing of the police service. Paragraph 43 of the submission states:

“ACPOS does not anticipate this will have a detrimental effect on local policing”.

So, it would have a positive effect. How would efficiency be reflected in a resource allocation model so that it would deliver better local policing?

Chief Constable Smith: In this debate there have always been concerns, which generally come from areas outwith the large urban areas that are primarily in the central belt, that we will see a migration of resources towards the cities and towns. My own experience would reflect such concerns. However, elected members, members of the public and police officers in the large urban areas have an equal concern that the resources that they currently have will be spread more thinly. There are two sides to the issue.

To give some reassurance before we get into the technical aspects of the resource allocation model, every one of the existing chief constables was brought up from being a young cop to their current rank with community policing in their DNA. Whether someone is the chief in a large urban area or in a small rural force, delivering local policing remains the fundamental building block.

One force, Strathclyde, is often mentioned because it covers half of Scotland. However, it can ensure not only that there are enough officers on the streets in the city centre of Glasgow, in Govan and in the housing schemes but that there are enough officers in Tiree, Oban, south Lanarkshire, south Ayrshire and so on. I have little doubt that whichever chief constable comes into place in the new service will have a desire to maintain the delivery of local policing, irrespective of any governance influences to ensure that he or she maintains that element. I am in no doubt that there will be greater scrutiny by local authorities to ensure that what we have on day 1 continues.

We will come up with a resource allocation model that will consider things such as crime and incidence, and the community-based style of policing that we want. We hope that the model will be open and transparent so that people can see what is there.

There are two other parts to that. Local policing is delivered not only by the well-known local community cop. It is delivered by the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency and by counter-terrorism and public protection people. Those are all key components. The issue should not be a mere pursuit of numbers, but that is what we will have on day 1 and we want to maintain it. Ultimately, if the will of Government and Parliament is that savings are to be made, the chief constable will need some degree of flexibility in moving resources across the country.

John Finnie: The key point is that there will still be a statutory requirement to provide an efficient service.

Chief Constable Smith: Absolutely.
John Finnie: To return to the issue of support staff, the service could not be delivered if you were to dispense with the services of those people.

Chief Constable Smith: I have a couple of points to make about support staff. There is a notion that for every member of support staff that goes out, we put a cop in, but we have not done that. In the past two or three years, we have reduced our support staff by about 1,000 people, and that has not been followed by cops simply migrating in.

The fact that we have already lost 1,000 people indicates that there is a diminishing pool of people who might be willing to take voluntary redundancy. The blunter the instrument of redundancy becomes, the greater likelihood there is that it will not work.

One of the key considerations will involve deciding which jobs we can stop doing, support staff-wide, before we even think about putting cops in.

John Finnie: Which jobs can we stop doing eight or nine times?

Chief Constable Smith: Chief constables, deputy chief constables, assistant chief constables, staff officers, directors of human resources, directors of finance and so on: there will, for the avoidance of doubt, be opportunities for savings there. However, although those posts have high salaries, there is a small number of them.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Building on Mr Smith’s points in response to Mr Finnie’s questions, there will, with regard to the resource allocation model, certainly be fears in some of the more rural parts of the country that resources will be drawn to the centre. Likewise, however, we have members in the central part of Scotland who fear that their resources will be drawn to rural parts of the country.

We must remember that police resources belong to the people of Scotland and should be deployed in the areas in which they are most needed. In addition to the points that have been made about resource allocation, although there must be a focus on demand, crime, incidence and the number of calls, there must also be a clear focus on rurality and sparsity. Geography and logistics are significant matters in policing Scotland.

The Convener: I am sorry to say this, but we are nearly three quarters of an hour on. We have been wandering, but we have focused mainly on finance. That is perfectly right, but the committee needs to ask about so much else. I ask for discipline from committee members when it comes to asking questions that have already been asked.

Graeme Pearson can ask a short supplementary, and then I will bring in Roderick Campbell. I think that Mr Meldrum wants to say something first.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: If I may, convener, I will respond briefly to Mr Finnie’s point.

The Convener: Of course—we are here to listen to you.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: With regard to the resource allocation model for policing the national threats that we face—which Kevin Smith already mentioned—I firmly believe that there is a great opportunity in Scotland’s police service to bring together all the assets that are currently within the eight forces and the SCDEA that police counter-terrorism, organised crime, major crime and public protection and brigade them in certain parts of the country. We can then use them in an intelligent manner, based on the threats, intelligence and risks that we have. That will enable us to deploy a balanced workforce of police officers and staff to protect 5.2 million people in a very good fashion.

The Convener: Thank you—that was very helpful.

Graeme Pearson: Have any police officers replaced some of the 1,000 staff who have already disappeared? Are you saying that no police officers have been redirected?

Chief Constable Smith: Never say never, as they say. It would be rash to say that in relation to the 1,000. However, my understanding and my view—certainly in my force—were that, as a general policy, police officers would not be put in such roles. I am confident that, as a matter of policy, cops would not backfill posts. That would not be a good operational use of the resource, and making someone redundant then filling their post with a cop would be challengeable.

The Convener: I will let Jenny Marra ask a short question on the same point. After that, I must take Roderick Campbell, then we must move on.

Jenny Marra: Mr Smith said that he was not aware of police officers filling a whole backroom staff member’s role, but is there function creep? Are police officers doing some roles that civilian staff used to do, but not as their full-time jobs?

Chief Constable Smith: In the past 10 to 15 years, the number of civilian posts has grown. Some of those roles were never done by police officers—for example, the growth of data protection and freedom of information has required growth in posts. However, there are still police officers in roles that would be more appropriately done by support staff. My answer to Mr Pearson was that we have not as a matter of policy reduced the number of support staff and filled their posts with police officers. I am confident that that has not been done.

Every year, forces go through a process of challenging posts. Having said that, there will still be non-operational roles in the back office—I know that we try not to use that phrase—that are done by police officers.

Jenny Marra: So some functions are being filled.

Chief Constable Smith: Not every police officer is out on the street wearing a yellow jacket, but the way to protect the people of Scotland is not by having everyone out there in a yellow jacket.

The Convener: I call Roderick Campbell, who has been patient, after which Alison McInnes will ask about a completely different topic, thank goodness. We must get through this.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): Good morning. I just want some clarity. Mr Smith, you talked about the difficulties of achieving 2,000 volunteers—I took your main reason to be employment law and due process. However, according to your submission, 2,000 is a cumulative figure for 2015-16. According to the figure work that I see, the number of voluntary redundancies by the end of 2013-14 is only 1,146.

Chief Constable Smith: I think that I said that. I referred to upwards of 1,100 at the end of 2013-14. At the end of the spending review period, the figure is about 2,000. Of course, as you know, further cuts are planned for the next spending review. The question of phasing will become more difficult.

Roderick Campbell: I am still a bit troubled by how the employment law timetable would have a serious impact.

Chief Constable Smith: In year 1, the first point at which we can sit down and have meaningful negotiations with the trade union is when the new service comes into place. At the earliest, that will happen on 1 April 2013. Dialogue and consultation will be required, including a 90-day period of consultation with the union and individuals. For those who are involved, phasing will be required—we have done that in the past few years. The process will not simply involve turning on a tap at a point in time and everyone leaving the organisation; people will want to determine when they will leave.

I will give an example, so that I am not giving simply my view of the world. One force recently had to phase the departure of 200 people in four blocks over 18 months.

Roderick Campbell: My point is that the 2,000 figure creeps in only in 2015-16, so it is some way hence.

Chief Constable Smith: The 2,000 figure applies in 2014-15—

Roderick Campbell: It is cumulative and relates to 2015-16, according to paragraph 4.2 of your submission.

Chief Constable Smith: To achieve the full-year savings, all that needs to be in on 1 April—the start of the financial year. Any delay would reduce the savings.

Roderick Campbell: I will leave it there.

The Convener: We have only another 20 minutes at most with the panel and we have lots more to ask about the bill. At the end, I can ask whether the panellists want to raise any other issues. We also have the evidence to the Finance Committee. We must move on to other subjects.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I will ask about the impact that the proposals will have on local accountability. The bill sets up tensions between a local policing plan and a strategic policing plan but is silent on how those tensions will be resolved. I would be interested to hear the witnesses’ views on how local accountability can be maintained or, indeed, enhanced under the proposals.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: As the bill stands, local police plans will need to be submitted to the local authority for approval. We believe that the wording should be that the local policing priorities should be submitted for agreement.

I sense that, if approval is not given for those plans, there will be potential for dispute. We are a disciplined service that operates on accountability and, from a police perspective, the dispute resolution process would be to send the matter from the local commander to the chief constable. As we now have positive and progressive working relationships between local authorities and local commanders, I hope that such a situation would be the exception as opposed to the rule, but there is no doubt that it could arise. I sense that there would also be scope for the local authority to go to the Scottish police authority in such circumstances.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: Whatever local accountability ends up looking like, it must be closely connected to national accountability. Neither of them can sit in splendid isolation from the other. If the national authority—the Scottish police authority—wished to consult the 5.2 million people in Scotland on something, a natural vehicle for it to use would be the 32 local entities.
Local accountability is critical. The shape of that local accountability—what it looks like and the relationship with the local commander—is key but the relationship between the 32 units of local accountability and the one unit of national accountability, the Scottish police authority, is equally vital. That should be a top-down and bottom-up relationship between the two layers of governance and accountability for the police service of Scotland.

Alison McInnes: Is the bill clear enough on that?

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: As my submission articulates, I am not convinced that we are as clear as we should be on that or that the bill is as clear as it should be on it.

Alison McInnes: Local accountability is, indeed, critical but it is being watered down from what is currently in place. Is that not the case?

Chief Constable Smith: It will be different. Of that, there is no doubt. It is not for the police to determine how we are held to account; it is for politicians to determine how we are held to account nationally and locally. However, if you are asking for a professional view on the arrangements, the first thing that I will say is that there is a danger that we think that the current arrangements are perfect. They are not; they are in need of improvement locally and nationally.

The reform debate that we have gone through over the past year started out being about improving local governance and accountability. I will make two comments on that. There is certainly a diminution in local governance and accountability because local elected members will not be able to select their chief, will not have a policing budget and will have less direct influence over the chief. However, equally there is an opportunity for more people to be engaged in the process, which will be significantly different from the current arrangements. That puts the onus on the local authorities.

The test is how local authorities, wider community planning partners and police engage with the current pathfinder projects to ensure that, whatever we do, we do not lose the jewel in the crown, which is local community policing. There is no doubt that the arrangements that are being introduced are significantly different from those that went before.

Alison McInnes: At the moment, we are fairly well respected for the way that we carry out community planning in Scotland. We have round the table chief constables and chief executives who are able to action things quite quickly. The new proposals will bring local commanders to the table, sitting with chief executives. Will they not have to go up the line to get approval for things and will it not be much harder to progress with community planning?

Chief Constable Smith: Concern has been expressed to me about lack of direct access to the chief constable. However, I cannot ignore the fact that people in half of Scotland—in Strathclyde—do not have that concern. They have direct access to their divisional commander. If we speak to some chief executives and elected members, we find that they are pretty comfortable with what they have.

It is going to be different. For me, it is not about the rank of the individual. When I gave evidence to one of the other committees, I compared my time as a divisional commander in the east end of Glasgow with the experience of one of my current force—the chief inspector in Clackmannanshire. He is far closer to the community and the local elected members of the council than I ever was. Although I appreciate that chief executive colleagues become exercised about their rank, my professional view is that that is a bit of a red herring. The important thing is the professional relationships that exist locally. As long as we have a mature tasking and co-ordinating process to ensure that the local is supported by the national, I am confident that there should not be a significant bar to moving forward. However, there is no doubt that it will be different.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I agree. There is no doubt that many community planning issues straddle local authority boundaries. I sense that, if we are to have the economies of scale, the capacity and capability that are needed and the resilience that is necessary to deal with many community planning issues, there will have to be some structure above the designated commander in order to ensure that community planning can operate across the various local authority boundaries.

The Convener: There are supplementary questions on the issue from Graeme Pearson, Colin Keir and Lewis Macdonald.

Graeme Pearson: I have a quick question on the connection between local accountability and national governance. I do not imagine that there will be huge conflicts at the local level, but how will concerns that develop at the local boards be represented at the national board level? Has there been any discussion about that link?

Chief Constable Smith: No, and our submission would be that is a gap in the bill. There needs to be direct connectivity between the local and the national. It might be rarely used, but the local must inform the national and vice versa. Gordon Meldrum spoke far more eloquently than I could on that.
Graeme Pearson: No options have been offered in the exchange with the Executive.

Chief Constable Smith: No. We have the bill, and we have articulated that concern in relation to it. It may well be that the Government will take the issue on board and address it in an amendment. We would welcome that, because we believe that the local must inform the national and vice versa.

Graeme Pearson: I am obliged. Thank you.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: In doing research for my submission, in which I comment on the Scottish police authority and some concerns that I have about resilience, capacity and capability, I noted with interest that one of the six sub-committees in the Northern Ireland Policing Board’s structure is its community engagement committee, which has as specific terms of reference

“To ... promote, support and monitor the effectiveness of the District Policing Partnerships”

and

“To ... monitor the implementation of Policing with the Community as the core function of the police service”.

In answer to the question, that is a possible model, but only one, for how we connect the local with the national.

Colin Keir (Edinburgh Western) (SNP): Good morning. My question relates partly to Graeme Pearson’s question a moment ago. I have not been a member of a local police board but, having been on the outskirts of such things in local government, I am interested in local accountability and scrutiny and I know that problems can arise because board members do not have security clearance. It is difficult to bring reasonable scrutiny to local issues when the people who are meant to be doing it are unable to do so. How could the bill improve the situation?

Chief Constable Smith: If the new police authority is to properly hold the chief constable to account, at least some, if not all, of its members must be vetted to an appropriate level. That would allow them to access secret material and look at the covert side of policing, which would ensure that that very high risk area was properly scrutinised by the authority. That should be a given for the make-up of the new authority. If it is simply about people who can bring in corporate, financial or human resources experience, we will be missing a trick. It must be about people who can get into the nuts and bolts of one of the more critical areas, which is the one that Gordon Meldrum focuses on in his day-to-day job. That area needs to be scrutinised, and security clearance is essential to that.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: My own submission calls for the vetting of the Scottish police authority members for that very reason. As Kevin Smith says, we could either vet the entire authority, or vet just a subset of it to a higher level, with that subset then forming one of the committees. A good conversation could then be held in some kind of scrutiny session with the lead chief officer team on the side of the business that required that level of vetting.

Colin Keir: This clearly identifies a problem that we have at the moment with police boards, in that they cannot possibly scrutinise to the level that is perhaps required in this day and age.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: I do not report to a local board; I report to the board of the Scottish Police Services Authority. Over the past four and a half years, we have had a workaround with that board, to which Andrea Quinn also reports. There are two chief constables on the board, both of whom are vetted to developed vetted status, so if I need to have a conversation about such issues, I have it with those two members as opposed to with the entire board.

Without this being too much of a hospital pass, regarding the local level there are others on the panel—

Colin Keir: Yes, perhaps it would have been better to direct my question to someone else.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: Apologies, Mr Smith.

Chief Constable Smith: I can fully corroborate Gordon Meldrum.

The Convener: You are operating as a single police force before my very eyes. You are all chummy. It has been a long morning.

Colin Keir: You also appear to be discussing corroboration.

Chief Constable Smith: Mr Meldrum just needs to remember that he is the deputy and I am the chief. [Laughter.]

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: Touché.

The Convener: That was an evil comment.

Chief Constable Smith: Mr Keir is right that there is a gap in current governance arrangements at the local level. I cannot say whether this applies to every board, but insufficient numbers of people are vetted to the degree that allows for scrutiny of that aspect of policing. My view is that this is a very small part of what local boards do, and they clearly scrutinise and hold us to account on a whole range of local policing issues. Much is said about the quality of the current governance arrangements, and I think that everyone would acknowledge that they can improve, but they have overseen policing at a time of record performance and there has to be some acknowledgement of that.

The Convener: Mr Meldrum wants to come in, but I do not think that it is an application for promotion yet.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: No, but I just wanted to briefly mention to Mr Smith that I am sure I heard him say in response to the community planning question that rank is not important—[Laughter.]

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I want to build on Mr Keir’s point about security clearance and vetting. Section 46(3) outlines the information that will be supplied, ending with “other information about the policing of its area, as the local authority may reasonably require.”

Further clarification about what that information looks like is needed. There will be occasions locally when, in the interests of the prevention, detection and disruption of crime, it will be necessary for some information to be withheld. If information is to be exchanged as detailed in that section, what will it look like, and do the new committee members need to have the security clearance?

The Convener: I remind members that another committee—the Local Government and Regeneration Committee—is dealing with certain issues. It is good that there is some overlap. I do not mean to prevent members from asking questions, but I ask that we move on to issues that other committees are not dealing with. Lewis Macdonald, John Finnie, Humza Yousaf and Graeme Pearson all have questions on this topic. If anyone wants to drop out because their question has been asked, they should let me know, because I want us to move on to the question that David McLetchie wants to ask, which is on a completely different topic. We must be thorough in dealing with the bill.

Lewis Macdonald: I have a couple of questions. David O’Connor said that it is inevitable that community planning issues will cross local authority boundaries. I presume that police operations, as planned and delivered strategically, will also cross local authority boundaries. Is there a risk that, in seeking to improve on the current police board structure, we might throw away a significant strategic level of accountability? For example, in my area, Grampian Police reports to Grampian joint police board. Under the planned proposals, the police will have to report three times to three different authorities on smaller areas. Having to service a larger number of committees will presumably involve greater cost and greater effort for the police. Is there an argument for retaining a regional level of scrutiny to reflect the police’s regional operations?

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Work on that area is on-going as part of the reform programme. We still do not know what the structures involving the 32 local commanders, the 32 local authorities and the chief constable will look like. There is no doubt that criminality and community problems straddle boundaries. As we move forward and it becomes clear what the structures will look like, I have no doubt that we can put in place the structures to deal with the problems.

We have a tried and tested tactical tasking model, which works from local force level right up to national level. That model will continue to be refined and developed so that it can fit into the work of the new police service of Scotland from next year.

Lewis Macdonald: That is helpful.

The other aspect that I am interested in exploring, which there has been some discussion of, is how we can link local accountability with national accountability. Given that the proposal is to have a very small national authority, the members of which will be appointed entirely by ministers, would it improve accountability and the local link to have on the national authority, for example, elected members from the regions who are chosen by their peers or who, in some other way, have a personal link that will ensure local accountability, rather than simply to have posts that are in the gift of the minister?

Chief Constable Smith: I believe that the worth of the authority would be greater if there was a degree of representation from elected members. My view is that they should not be in the majority. It is a question of balance. There will be a local bit and a national bit. I think that the national authority, which will have on it independents, if that is the right term, who will have experience in finance, strategic management and so on, would be informed if it were assisted by a number of people who have a record in and experience of local issues—in other words, local elected members. They should be appointed on the same basis as the other members, so that there are not two tiers of representation. They should go through the public appointments process so that they are there on the strength of their own skills, merits and worth. The national board would benefit from such representation.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: With the new policing committees or whatever they are called, there will be opportunities to build on the democratic accountability that currently exists. There is no doubt that, at a national level, some form of democratic accountability needs to be built into the process. What that looks like and what shape it takes is a matter for further discussion. I believe that democratic accountability will be reinforced locally, but we need to be quite clear about how, in future, we ensure that there is democratic accountability nationally.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: I agree with those points. I think that the strength of the Scottish police authority will be in its balance and blend of democratically elected representatives who are appointed in the manner that Kevin Smith has talked about—I fundamentally agree with that—and independents. With all the authority’s members operating as corporate members, the authority’s strength will be in the balance that both sets of individuals will bring. The democratically elected representatives are critical, as citizens should be able to see a natural link through the democratic process to members of the authority.

The Convener: I will take two more questions on local accountability. We will then move on to another topic.

John Finnie: My question again relates to ACPOS’s evidence. Paragraph 1.2 in appendix A of that evidence says:

“we firmly believe that reform will not fundamentally change the policing that the vast majority of the public see ... but it will change how the service is organised.”

People have alluded to possible tensions between the local and the national. One thing that will not change is that a chief superintendent will explain his concerns about operational policing to a chief constable, and the chief constable will share concerns about operational policing down the way. David O’Connor talked about tactical tasking. Chief Constable Smith, can you reassure people that that will not do away with the good practice that already exists in sharing information across forces?

Finally, does any panel member have a view on what the contingency should be if an elected representative fails to pass the vetting process that is imposed?

Chief Constable Smith: I certainly do not have an answer to the second question, other than that, if he or she does not pass the vetting process, they cannot get access to material. How that would be managed is probably more of an issue for MSPs.

John Finnie: There would be a public manifestation of that fact.

The Convener: We will leave that question. We have been given a response, whatever we take from it.

Chief Constable Smith: From his first question, I think that John Finnie is looking for a reassurance that what currently happens with chief constables and chief superintendents ensuring that the force informs the local level and vice versa will continue to happen. That is how we have been brought up as police officers. I have said that community policing is in our DNA. It is about the whole tasking process and ensuring that where and when resources are required, we have a process for that. That does not mean that everybody will get everything where and when they want it. It is about ensuring that we make the best use of scarce resources. The processes that are in place are part of the professionalisation of policing that has happened over the past 10 to 15 years, and I am confident that that will be a key part of what we will have in Scotland.

I hope that we can give some comfort on the notion that areas will lose out. The chief constables whom I know would certainly want to ensure that what is best about Scottish policing—what we see as the jewel in the crown—is maintained. I suppose that we bring greater capacity and capability in the national stuff where and when that is required. The good thing, of course, is that that specialist resource is not required all the time in most of Scotland, as most places in Scotland remain pretty safe and free from harm. We should look at the big issues that there have been in policing in my time. I was at Lockerbie. What happened there happened in the area with the smallest police force in the United Kingdom. Dunblane was in a small force area, and there was the Chinook helicopter disaster. Big things happen in small places. We often say that we are the biggest gang in Scotland. It is about ensuring that, on the rare occasions on which we are required, we can muster resources to help out.

The Convener: Did you call yourselves “the biggest gang”?

Chief Constable Smith: I did.

The Convener: That may be the headline tomorrow.

Chief Constable Smith: It will be now that you have said that.

The Convener: Don’t mess with me. [Laughter.]
The Convener: I thank Humza Yousaf for withdrawing his question so that we can move on.

Graeme Pearson: One of the virtues of the current set-up is that joint boards operate in public, so the public are able to access their discussions and hear what is going on, but the bill is silent about that in terms of both national and local accountability. One presumes that the local boards will meet in public—I hope that that will be the case, without any debate. The only comparative board at national level is the SPSA, which operates outwith the public gaze. Do you accept that there would be a virtue to the national board operating in public, subject to arrangements to go in camera for the confidential and challenging issues that will need to be discussed in that way? Will meetings of the national board be held in public and fully minuted?

Chief Constable Smith: Anything less would be a deficit. To be honest, that has not come up during discussions. I assume that it will happen.

Graeme Pearson: I just want it on the record.

Chief Constable Smith: Absolutely. I think that that should happen.

The Convener: It is a good question. I want to move on. David McLetchie has been extremely patient.

David McLetchie (Lothian) (Con): It is not like me.

The Convener: No, indeed. I do not know what has happened to you. Is this the real David McLetchie?

David McLetchie: Good morning, everyone. I want to ask some questions about operational independence and the separation of the police service and police authority from Government. Some have suggested that the concept of operational independence should be enshrined in the bill itself, but I want to explore the issue from the other way round: what are the limits of operational independence, and what is the legitimate role of Government in giving directions? What some might regard as political interference in operational independence might for others be a reflection of the democratic accountability of the service. Where does the boundary lie, and what is a legitimate direction from a minister?

Chief Constable Smith: Far more informed people than me have spent a lifetime debating operational independence and whether we truly are operationally independent. National and local government has a legitimate role in influencing people in relation to the type of policing and strategic priorities that they want.

On the direction and nature of specific policing operations, an easy example to highlight is the policing of industrial disputes. One of the criticisms of policing during the miners' strike some years ago—this is probably more true of England and Wales than Scotland—was that the police were politicised to a degree. I am not offering a view on that—it is a political issue—but it would be folly to ignore it. It is difficult to describe an elephant, but we know one when we see it, and the same principle relates to decision making for specific operations or specific classes of operations.

HMIC has made a significant contribution to the debate on the bill. During its evidence to a committee last week, it said that there was an opportunity to tease out some of the issues so that there is clarity for all as we enter this new era.

Chief Superintendent O'Connor: There has been a great deal of discussion of operational independence, operational primacy, operational responsibility and other such terminology. The starting point for us is that it is the first duty of Government to protect its citizens. Mr McLetchie's point about democratic accountability is, therefore, absolutely right. However, operational independence has been enshrined in case law and has been commented on in many cases over many years. The enforcement of the law is a technical exercise that requires mutual expertise. I think that there needs to be accountability, but that accountability should not go to the stage of issuing directions in relation to specific policing operations. That has to remain the responsibility of the commander or, indeed, the chief constable.

David McLetchie: I take that point in relation to specifics. Some of the evidence has discussed the minister's power of general direction over the authority, and some concerns have been raised about the exercise of such a power.

I will give a couple of examples of what I am talking about—they might not be good ones, but hopefully they are. As you will be aware, a few years ago there was some controversy about whether police officers should be entitled to use tasers. Would it be a valid matter of specific direction by a minister to the Scottish police authority that police officers in Scotland should not use tasers? I just throw that into the pot for discussion.

Chief Constable Smith: Ultimately, there will always be conflicting priorities and competing demands for a finite resource, even within the new service. Knowledge, experience and understanding will be shared but, ultimately, professional judgment will have to be applied, whether that be by the chief constable or the local area commander. It will be very much part of the national intelligence model.

In Parliament, as you know, we recently passed legislation concerning offensive behaviour at football matches. Whatever you might think of the merits of the Offensive Behaviour at Football and Threatening Communications (Scotland) Act 2012, it has been passed by Parliament and would appear to reflect the general public concern that that sort of behaviour needs to be tackled more vigorously. Would it be a reasonable subject of ministerial direction to the police authority that resources and priorities in the service should be adjusted to reflect the law that Parliament has passed, which reflects an underlying public sentiment that that matter should be dealt with?

I simply throw those relatively recent examples into the discussion. Where do you see those examples fitting into the divide between operational independence and accountability?

Chief Constable Smith: There is never an easy yes or no answer to these questions.

The first part of the answer is, yes, I think that it is right and legitimate that elected members of the Parliament should be interested in an issue such as whether the number of police officers who are armed with tasers should be increased. I say that as an example—I do not want anyone to construe that as meaning that that is what I am advocating. However, ultimately, I think that it would be a matter for the chief constable, based on threat and risk and his or her duty to protect his or her officers and the people of Scotland.

On the second issue, I think that there should be an expectation that, if Parliament passes a law, the chief constable would take due cognisance of that. However, there are many laws that the chief constable should be expected to take cognisance of, and it should be left to him or her to make the operational decisions about the resource that should go into them. Equally, he or she should be held to account for those decisions. If the chief constable does not do enough, a scrutiny committee such as this one, the police authority or the local mechanisms should have the role of challenging the chief constable on that.

The basic example is that politicians should not be able to say to me, “Arrest that man!” but they should be able to say, “Why did you arrest that man?”

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: I agree strongly with everything that Kevin Smith has just said.

The Convener: That is helpful for you.

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: I was going to make a point about whether chief constables should take cognisance of Parliament’s passing of a law when they allocate resources and so on. Kevin Smith has already said that there are many laws, and that we have to take cognisance of them all. Critically, as well as our role in balancing the many laws that are passed and the responsibilities that that places on us, there is a 24-hour process of balancing all the threats, all the intelligence and all the risks that all our communities face. We have to be incredibly light on our feet in balancing and analysing all of that and deploying our resources as we see fit. That should always take precedence, as those are the pressing threats and risks that members of our communities face. I believe that that is firmly a matter of operational independence for the chief officer and their command team.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Police officers have a great number of powers at their disposal, including the power of discretion in many circumstances. When it comes to accountability, I have no doubt that the first thing that goes through police officers’ minds is their accountability to the courts for any acts or omissions in the way in which they perform their duties.

David McLetchie: Let us get to the content of the bill in this area. I hope that I am not putting words into people’s mouths. If you know what operational independence is but it is difficult to describe, I presume that it is difficult to define for the purposes of statute. That suggests that having the phrase “operational independence” in the bill would not be very helpful. Equally, it would be generally accepted that ministers should not have a power to make the specific direction, “Arrest that man!” as Chief Constable Smith graphically illustrated. That leaves the issue of a general direction up in the air. Where do you sit in relation to that? What should we, as legislators, do relative to the content of the bill on the aspect of general direction?

The Convener: I think that Chief Superintendent O’Connor told us that there was much case law defining operational independence. As a lawyer, Mr McLetchie, you will know that that is quite often what happens with statute.

Chief Constable Smith: When I said that operational independence is difficult to define—like the elephant—it would probably have been more accurate to say that it is difficult to get an agreed definition because many commentators have a different view on what operational independence would do.

When we have asked Government about ministerial direction, we have been told that it is rarely used. Therefore, our question is why we would have it. We have also been told that, as a national body, we should be no different from any other national body or Government department. Critical services such as health are still subject to ministerial direction. However, in our view, we are different because we are the only people with coercive powers and authority, so we need to be seen as something more than just a Government department. Although we operate on behalf of Government, local authorities and citizens, we cannot be seen simply as a department of Government.

We ask that there be further articulation in the bill of where and when ministerial direction can be used. Although it cannot be used directly in respect of the chief constable, if the direction is to the authority, there is still a degree of influence that the authority can impose. We are uncomfortable because we are not used to it. At the time of the consultation last summer, the cabinet secretary recognised that there is some discomfort around the politicisation of the police and the ministerial control of policing, so he took some time to explore that with people. We all recognise, as we move into the new era, that there is an issue of perception. Therefore, we ask for greater articulation in the bill of where, when and how ministerial direction can be used and for the definition to be broader than just saying that it should not be in relation to specific crimes.

The Convener: That issue might be for guidance rather than primary legislation.

Committee members can see the time. Graeme Pearson and John Finnie have supplementary questions on the same issue, and Alison McInnes and Roderick Campbell want to start new areas of questioning. Do members want to sit here until 3 in the afternoon?

11:30

Graeme Pearson: Definitely.

David McLetchie: Yes.

The Convener: You are rotters. I wish that I had not said it now. Well, I do not want to be here until 3 in the afternoon.

I ask for short answers, because we have to explore other issues in the bill. We have full written submissions, so we also have those to work on.

I want to finish this evidence session, for the sake of the witnesses as well, by 11.45, so we have another 15 minutes. That means that we will have overrun by half an hour. I thought that I would tell you that, because I am getting cross.

Graeme Pearson: Thanks, convener. I know that you appreciate that we are dealing with a very important issue. It deserves the time that we are allocating to it.

We have spent a great deal of time talking about redundancy issues and so forth, but a major part of ACPOS’s submission is about operational independence. It states that “provisions within the Bill threaten ... operational independence”.

If I can summarise—and save a bit of time, convener—is your basic concern that the minister chooses the board of the authority, directs the board, pays the board, provides the budget to the board, approves the appointment of the chief officer and the policing priorities set by the board, which are decisions that are outwith the influence of the chief constable, who is left to try to manage a police service with operational independence? Is that the bottom line?

Chief Constable Smith: You have read our submission.

The Convener: I do not think that he missed anything out.

Chief Constable Smith: He did. He missed out that there is also the “Power to call on Chief Constable to retire in the interests of efficiency and effectiveness”.

One would imagine that that is actually in the interests of inefficiency and ineffectiveness. We believe that that provision has been lifted from the Police (Scotland) Act 1967. It comes without any safeguards.

Graeme Pearson: In fairness, you mixed up identities in your first response to David McLetchie about policing by consent, when you talked about Parliament directing. In fact, as far as the bill is concerned, it is the Government that directs, and Parliament has very little oversight. Given that we are talking about policing by consent, is that not a major issue?

Chief Constable Smith: I anticipate that, in the new era, people such as members of the Justice Committee will play a crucial role in scrutinising aspects of policing, whether that is directed at the chief constable or the police authority. Although that might not be articulated in the bill, given that there will be a single national service and it is a very important public service, my expectation is that whoever is lucky enough to get the job as the chief constable and whoever is convener of the new authority will come before the committee reasonably regularly to discuss significant issues.

Graeme Pearson: As a panel, would you welcome that?

Deputy Chief Constable Meldrum: Yes.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: Yes.
Chief Constable Smith: Absolutely. It is an important aspect.

The Convener: Thank you. I am sorry for keeping your responses short, but we spent far too much time on finance, which is being done by somebody else, so we are now squeezing the other stuff in.

John Finnie: This is an important issue. It is not only the police that have a significant influence on people's lives. Social workers can take children into care, teachers can exclude pupils from school and housing officials can evict people. I am not aware of them calling for their operational independence to be enshrined in statute. Is it not the case that the bill is very clear that ministers cannot direct the chief constable or, indeed, make directions on any specific operation? Section 17 makes it clear that only the chief constable "has direction and control of the Police Service."

Given that provision, I am not sure that I understand your concerns.

Chief Constable Smith: We are concerned that there is a power of ministerial direction, and when we have asked what it would look like very few examples have been given.

John Finnie: Does section 17 not say that only the chief constable "has direction and control of the Police Service"?

Chief Constable Smith: It is a question of influence. Our view is that if there is ministerial direction to the authority on the allocation of resources or on the style or type of policing—

John Finnie: With respect, we are not talking about the operational autonomy of the police authority, because it is not an operational body; it is the chief constable who is responsible. It is clear that direction and control lie with the chief constable.

Chief Constable Smith: Despite the fact that the bill says that the authority will be subject to ministerial direction, we remain concerned that the authority itself will still have significant influence over the chief constable. We are not saying that there should be no ministerial direction but, in the brave new world of national policing, the provision needs to be refined more and articulated better; for example, it should be made clear that it applies more broadly than specific police operations.

The Convener: We can put these questions to the cabinet secretary, Mr Finnie, so I suggest that we move on.

Alison McInnes: At the moment, the bill separates out forensic services and gives responsibility for them to the SPA instead of the chief constable. According to the Government, such a move will create a necessary "sterile corridor between police investigations and forensic investigations".

I note from the panel's written submissions that there are differing views on the matter and think that it would be worthwhile to take some time to explore that.

The Convener: Rather than replicate the views set out in the written submission, we should simply focus on the SPSA's very clear points about forensic examination at the locus of a crime and investigation back at the laboratory, as it were.

Andrea Quinn: ACPOS and SPSA differ on the issue of scene examiners. Instead of repeating all of what I say in my submission, I should, as you suggest, focus on that point.

I must point out that, over the past five years, we have operated in exactly the way that the bill suggests we should operate and that the bill itself suggests no change in the relationship between policing and forensics. What is different is the proposal that forensic services be accountable not to the SPSA board but to the SPA.

Since as far back as 2006, the police themselves have acknowledged the value of putting scene examination and laboratories together. Because we believe that the sterile corridor begins with the collection of evidence, through its analysis and on to its reporting to the procurator fiscal, we think that scene examination should stay where it is. To do anything else would be a retrograde step.

The Convener: So the only change is to do with accountability.

Andrea Quinn: It is also about preserving and demonstrating the impartiality of evidence to ensure that the police are not open to claims of undue influence. As I have said, going back would be a retrograde step.

Alison McInnes: I would be interested to hear what the other panel members think.

Chief Superintendent O'Connor: Clearly we take a different view from Andrea Quinn on this matter. We believe that a sterile corridor can be created by separating analysis in the laboratory from scene examination and the local gathering of evidence.

The bill focuses quite rightly on the delivery of local police services, and we see no trust and confidence issues arising from scene-of-crime examiners, photographers, fingerprinters and others working with senior investigating officers and local commanders in the service and collating evidence for submission to the laboratories. If you accept the other argument, where will it stop? Will it be applied to the gathering, collation and submission of other productions to the courts? I accept the proposal to create a new national forensics authority with responsibility for laboratory analysis but, nevertheless, I think that we should separate out and retain local services working in local communities.

Alison McInnes: Are you saying that that is not the status quo or are you simply saying that, given the bill before us, such a change should be made?

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: We are making the case that, operationally, the control and direction of those assets should be at the disposal of the local commanders and the chief constable.

Andrea Quinn: I agree that the chief constable and his command team should decide what scenes we go to and when we should go—I do not dispute that. However, I believe that we can do that with a national forensics gateway. At the moment, we have eight gateways doing things in eight different ways, which is simply inefficient. For me, becoming part of a single force means having the opportunity to design a national gateway that would task forensic services nationally, which in turn means that we would manage the priorities across Scotland, and do so better. We would put in place an SLA—one exists today, and that is how we respond to policing demands. I envisage that that is how we would be held to account in the future.

The Convener: I am grateful to Graeme Pearson for telling me that an SLA is a service-level agreement. That is for anybody else who is as daft as me and does not know what it means—although nobody is admitting to it.

Mr Smith, do you want to come in?

Chief Constable Smith: I will take just 30 seconds because we articulated our view in our written submission. We do not believe that the case for questioning the independence of police involvement is made at all. We have asked for evidence in that regard, but have seen little. We laid out our case in our paper. What we have are two professional views about a very important service. ACPOS’s view is that if what the bill proposes is the will of the Government and Parliament, the two services together will ensure that it works seamlessly. I have asked scientists and scenes-of-crime people whether they have ever felt any compulsion to do anything that was not right, and their reply is “Absolutely not.” Their own professional integrity would not allow it, but they have never felt any pressure anyway.

The main point for the committee to recognise is that there are different professional views. Whatever is decided, we will make it work.

The Convener: I am going to move on now. Roderick Campbell has a question.

Roderick Campbell: Rather helpfully, convener, I want to ask questions on the same area. I will keep it brief. Has anything happened since the 2007 regime came in that you would say has been detrimental to the interests of criminal justice? The question is primarily for Mr O’Connor and Mr Smith.

Chief Constable Smith: In relation to crime scene examination?

Roderick Campbell: Yes. Can you point to examples of problems that have occurred since 2007?

Chief Constable Smith: There has been none that I am aware of.

Chief Superintendent O’Connor: I am aware of none.

Roderick Campbell: That is fine.

The Convener: I am going to conclude this long session. Thank you very much, gentlemen.

Chief Constable Smith: I just want to say that Mr Campbell was right regarding the figures for 2014-15 and 2015-16.

Roderick Campbell: I took the figures from your submission.

Chief Constable Smith: Absolutely. You were right, but the issue of unachievability remains the same, no matter what the figures are.

The Convener: I do not want to go back to the issue of finance. Thank you very much indeed. I see that you are all still friends.

I suspend the meeting for eight minutes.

11:42

Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: We move on to our second panel of witnesses. Welcome, gentlemen. I understand that you were in the public seats while the previous panel was giving evidence. Deputy Chief Constable Andrew Barker is from the Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association; Calum Steele is general secretary of the Scottish Police Federation; and Dave Watson is Scottish organiser, bargaining and campaigns—an intriguing title—at Unison Scotland. Thank you all for your full and helpful written submissions. I invite questions from members.

Humza Yousaf: Like all elected members, I talk to police officers on the ground and, from my limited perspective, I do not find them particularly resistant to change. There are concerns, of course. The Scottish Police Federation said in its submission that it represents more than 98 per cent of all Scottish police officers, right through the ranks. I imagine that there is no homogenous view among your members; what is the broad picture on reform and a single police force? What are people’s main concerns?

I have a second question—

The Convener: Let us first have an answer to your first question, so that we do not confuse people.

Calum Steele (Scottish Police Federation): Thank you. The broad position for police officers—and I suspect for almost everyone who is in employment—is that they must put bread on the table and clothes on their children’s backs, and anything that enables that to happen is a good thing and anything that threatens that is a bad thing. We know that there is a general shrinking of expenditure in the public sector in the United Kingdom across all areas of life. The police service is no different in that regard.

Police officers in Scotland take a slightly more positive view than their colleagues in England and Wales, who regard themselves as being on the receiving end of a particularly poor deal. In England and Wales, officers’ terms and conditions are being eroded and politicians and the Government’s general attitude towards and language about the police service is negative, which does not inspire much confidence or trust in the service. In general, the police service in Scotland is much happier than our colleagues south of the border.

In respect of the bill, it is fair to say that our concerns are not deal breakers but issues that the service and politicians locally and nationally can work through. Our concerns centre around the issues that the previous panel explored, such as the relationships that will exist in respect of governance and accountability and the link between local and national in that regard, various aspects of staffing, the locus and capacity of the police investigations and review commissioner and the operational independence of the chief officer.

I have nothing startling to say. Police officers in Scotland are generally happier than our poor colleagues in England and Wales.

The Convener: That is a start.

Humza Yousaf: The SPF said in its submission that, in relation to section 5(2):

“SPF has asked Scottish Government if this sub-section means:

‘A direction may not be given in respect of any operation or on any issue which may affect an operational matter.’

SPF received a positive response that this was the meaning and therefore the Bill should be amended to state that precisely.”

How would your proposed approach differ from what sections 5(2)(a) and 5(2)(b) currently say?

Calum Steele: I suspect that this is almost identical to the earlier debate between Mr McLetchie and the president of ACPOS, Kevin Smith, around the inability almost to define what is meant by operational independence; it is inherently understood, but difficult to write down. That said, we in the Scottish Police Federation have made an attempt to write down what is meant by operational independence, which expands on the sentence in our written submission. With the convener’s indulgence, I will share these 140 words with the committee. It is our view that “Police operational independence means that the police should carry out their duties in accordance with the law, but without direction from any other person or agency. It is for the chief constable, taking cognisance of the law, to decide which incidents and matters are to be policed and how they are to be policed.

Police should apply their discretion where it appears to them appropriate.

Police should consider the views of all interested parties in assessing how to carry out their duties and whether, and to what extent, they exercise discretion.

In these matters, what to police, how to police it and whether to exercise discretion, the police are accountable to the law alone.

Operational independence, free from undue central or local political influence, underpins policing by consent and ensures policing is of the people, not the State.”

We believe that those 140 words would not only provide the comfort that the service needs, but address the general unease that exists among the wider population that we may be on the verge of a police state. However valid or otherwise those concerns may be, I think that those 140 words could go some significant way towards addressing them.

Humza Yousaf: You think that those 140 words should be in the bill—that is interesting. Thank you.

The Convener: I go, “Ouch!” to suggesting putting 140 words in the bill. I think that I might take you to task on that, but we will see.

Still on this topic, it is Jenny Marra next, followed by Roderick Campbell.

Jenny Marra: Is it okay to address at this point the balance of civilian staff in the police force?
The Convener: Yes, certainly.

Jenny Marra: I will return to a point that the first panel raised. We heard a powerful endorsement from the four earlier panellists of the critical role that civilian staff play in the police force. It is my understanding from the conversations that I have had on the issue that it is important in a modern and efficient police force to get the balance of civilian staff absolutely right. What do the present panellists perceive to be the optimum ratio for civilian staff and police officers, bearing in mind the points that I raised earlier about efficiency savings and how financial stability is achieved through the ratio?

Dave Watson (Unison Scotland): Our concern is that there will not be a balance, because we are essentially talking about the large-scale decivilisation of the Scottish police force. The last major study of civilisation in Scotland’s police was the Stewart report in 2009, entitled “Civilisation of Police in Scotland”. At that stage, civilians made up 28 per cent of the Scottish force, whereas in the force in England and Wales they made up 39 per cent, although that figure is 32 per cent if we exclude what are called in England police community support officers, which we do not have in Scotland. The best Scottish forces met that English average, but the worst did not. There were huge variations among forces in Scotland, with some achieving a higher figure in that regard than others.

Where are we going? In 2009 we were talking about around 6,300 police civilians and we are now talking about 1,000 of those having already gone. The committee heard earlier that, under the current plans, about 2,000 police civilians will go, but the position is far worse than that. If our members do not accept massive pay cuts, the ACPOS evidence shows that another 400 will go. If the VAT issue does not get resolved—we have not solved it with the SPSSA, so I am not confident that we will solve it now—that will mean that another 600 jobs will go. On that basis, we are talking about 3,000 police civilian jobs coming out.

We have just completed a survey of members in which we got lots of feedback that, I am afraid, illustrates that we are already getting police civilian posts being substituted by police officers. Our recent survey shows that it is rare for police officers to substitute in full: the figure for that is between 10 and 17 per cent. However, 30-odd per cent of the police civilian posts are being substituted in part by police officers. We are talking about 53 per cent of the police civilian posts that have already gone being covered in part or in full by police officers. If we extrapolate that to another 2,000 to 3,000 police officers substituting on that basis, we are talking about 2,000 police officers by the end of the process being taken off the street, in part to cover for police civilian staff. I accept entirely that there are statistical risks in making that extrapolation, but one police officer taken off the streets is one too many, and 2,000 is clearly a scandal.

We know that in hard numbers police civilianisation will come down from where it was at 28 per cent to around 15 per cent, in comparison with the England and Wales figures, which are double—and more—that particular figure. That takes policing in Scotland back to the 1980s. I enjoy watching back episodes of “The Sweeney” like anybody else, but it is not a model for a modern police force.

Jenny Marra: Just to clarify, the Government’s commitment is for 1,000 front-line police officers on the beat. Are you saying that a lot of those police officers will be doing back-room or civilian tasks?

Dave Watson: Yes. That is inevitable. That is the only way that the Government can do it. You have heard the evidence—not only from us, but from everybody else—about the roles that police civilian staff now occupy. It is inevitable that those roles will require police officers. That is already happening, and it will happen in greater numbers in future unless we get a proper balance.

Jenny Marra: How does that affect the Government’s savings targets? Is it correct that those jobs are being done on much higher salaries than your members were expecting or were used to?

Dave Watson: You can see from the figures that police civilian staff salaries make up 15 per cent of the cost, in comparison with police officers at 75 per cent. That is more expensive, but it is not just about cost; it is, as you have heard in other evidence, about particular skills. There are specialist skills that did not exist in the 1980s: the world has moved on and crime is more complex. The generic police officer is fine, but specialist roles are required and that is what police civilian staff do.

Jenny Marra: Does any other panel member have anything to add?

Calum Steele: Yes. As was discussed with the previous panel, we should never get into a situation in which we talk about the value of a police officer versus the value of a support member of staff. A balanced workforce is very important.

Before we start talking about staff numbers, we must remember what our original starting point is. The commitment to 1,000 police officers came at the beginning of the previous parliamentary session. In the 10 years prior to that, from 1997 to 2007, police officer numbers in Scotland grew by only eight per cent at what was a time of general growth in overall expenditure in the public sector. In the corresponding period, police support staff numbers in Scotland grew by 71 per cent. That is undoubtedly a consequence in some ways of how the police service has evolved, but it would be beyond the pale to suggest that those levels of growth were a consequence of essential civilisation where it took place. I am sure that many roles were undertaken and created not because they were essential, but because they were desirable or nice to have.

Although there are any number of titles and job roles that contribute very much to what is generally termed front-line policing, the stark truth—and it is hard to say—is that there are countless others that do not. I do not believe for a minute that by rhyming off six or seven of them we would identify 2,000 people, but if the police service wants to be considered as more businesslike, it must take a businesslike approach to such things. We must look at the jobs that we do and ask ourselves not who does them, but whether they need doing in the first place. I may be doing someone a disservice here, but I do not know what a change manager, a performance manager, a service delivery manager or a business manager is. I can guess what a graphics officer is, but I do not know whether that officer is essential to the delivery of policing. Posts such as marketing officer and environmental awareness co-ordinator exist.

We must not lose sight of the fact that the provision of those 1,000 extra officers was the Government’s commitment, although I am sure that Mr McLetchie would say that his party was strong in ensuring that that commitment was delivered on. I know that, as elected members, we stop doing those roles, police officers will not know whether anyone in the room was at it. A speaker at the conference challenged the collective genius of the SPF by asking whether we wanted to live in a society that had a police officer on every street corner or whether we wanted to live in a society that did not need a police officer on every street corner. The answer in the hall—which, I would like to think, would also be the answer among the rest of the 5.2 million citizens of Scotland—was that we would very much want to live in the latter, but that we would not get to the latter unless we put considerable investment into the former. That is what we have seen with the provision of 1,000 extra police officers.

I take the committee back a few years to a Scottish Police Federation annual conference; I do not know whether anyone in the room was at it. A speaker at the conference challenged the collective genius of the SPF by asking whether we wanted to live in a society that had a police officer on every street corner or whether we wanted to live in a society that did not need a police officer on every street corner. The answer in the hall—which, I would like to think, would also be the answer among the rest of the 5.2 million citizens of Scotland—was that we would very much want to live in the latter, but that we would not get to the latter unless we put considerable investment into the former. That is what we have seen with the provision of 1,000 extra police officers.

We must not lose sight of the fact that the provision of those 1,000 extra officers was the Government’s commitment, although I am sure that Mr McLetchie would say that his party was strong in ensuring that that commitment was delivered on. I know that, as elected members, you hear on the doorsteps that is what the communities of Scotland have been crying out for. They have not been crying out for fewer police officers. They want more police officers because they want to feel safe. They want to ensure that the success of the 35-year low in crime, the increases in detection rates and the reduction in violent crime will continue.
I know that many academics argue that the correlation between the number of police officers and the amount of crime is tenuous and that many more sophisticated elements come into play, such as overall environmental considerations, but given the present financial situation in the country, why on earth would we jeopardise a key element of keeping crime down by reducing police officer numbers when the economic circumstances indicate that the propensity for an increase in criminal activity is probably greater now than it has been for a long time?

Graeme Pearson: You mentioned the 35-year low. You will know that, in America, crime is at a 43-year low and that, across Europe, crime figures are plummeting. No one has an explanation for that. In the American context, crime is still going down, even though there is a depression.

I did not ask the first panel directly whether an officer was taken off the beat to replace a member of support staff. I asked whether any officers were now doing office work rather than street duty. Are you saying that, regardless of the duties that support staff perform and the specialisms that they have, it would be better to invest in police officers and to utilise those officers in such posts? Would you not acknowledge that there are many specially trained support staff members—people such as intelligence analysts and crime intelligence managers—who are paid less than police officers, and that using their services would give a better focus and be more efficient?

Calum Steele: I start by acknowledging your greater knowledge than mine of worldwide crime trends.

Graeme Pearson: Thank you.

Calum Steele: I am grateful for the courtesy that you extend me in thinking that I could possibly have the same information as you.

I am not sure whether what I said earlier contradicted in any way the question that you just posed. I acknowledge that many individuals perform many vital roles. Dave Watson and Andrea Quinn listed the roles and functions that are performed, which are vital to policing and the delivery of the police service. However, what I stand by is the point that some roles—I caveat that heavily by saying that I am not stating that the number will come to 2,000—are not immediately obvious to me. I do not know whether the service would necessarily suffer if those roles were not undertaken in the future.

Graeme Pearson: Do you feel that that figure must be more than 1,000?

Calum Steele: One thousand people have already gone.

Graeme Pearson: You are not missing them.

Calum Steele: In some areas, the loss of support staff has caused problems—that probably links to the question that Mr Macdonald asked the earlier panel. I have spoken to many operational police officers in one force where a number of support staff have been lost and where something that is called a virtual typing pool has been created. That has been described to me as meaning that all that happens now is that virtually no typing takes place.

Graeme Pearson: The job does not change.

Calum Steele: There are of course areas in which such losses have an impact, but to suggest that the consequence is that police officers do the typing, for example, is maybe taking it a wee bit too far. However, the situation has changed since I undertook operational policing—I was going to say that it was not that long ago, but it was that long ago. The practice of police officers undertaking elements of secretarial work and the like will continue regardless, because of the nature of recruits—they are far more keyboard literate than many of those in the past.

Dave Watson: The important point to grasp is that the 17,234 figure was not built up as an operational police number—it is arbitrary. We started with a figure and added 1,000 to it, which was how we got to 17,234. The creation of a new national police force provides the opportunity to review what the requirements are for police officers and civilians, and I urge the committee to do that.

A simple fact of life is that large numbers of police officers in one force do what are considered to be essentially civilian roles in other forces. Police officers are even doing HR functions in Scotland’s larger forces, although they have no qualifications to do such work. We could give many other such examples.

Humza Yousaf referred to falling crime rates. The reasons for that are complex. I would not claim that it is the expertise of our members or of Calum Steele’s members that has resulted in those numbers. However, I know that our members tell us that police officers have at least in part covered half the 1,000 posts that have gone. Only 9 per cent of that work is not being done at all.

Calum Steele can produce a few job titles that he has never heard of; equally, I could show the committee lots of police officers who do jobs that mean that they never get out on the streets. We need not to focus on such an approach but to work out the right balance between the two groups of staff.

Jenny Marra: Mr Steele is right that the public ask us regularly—it happened this weekend—about police officers on the beat. Do you agree that the public expect to see every one of the 1,000 extra police officers that the Government talked about on the street performing front-line duties and not doing desk jobs in police stations?

Calum Steele: The honest answer is no. The nature of police work means that, once an officer lays hands on an individual and takes him or her back to the police station, that officer is off the street. There is no naivety in the public that police officers will spend eight, 10 or 12 hours of their shift on the streets. If that happened, it would create an interesting relationship between the police officer or police service and members of the public.

Jenny Marra: Perhaps I misworded my question. I did not necessarily mean the difference between being on the street and in the police station; I meant front-line policing duties that keep communities safe, rather than duties that could be done by the balance of civilian staff.

Calum Steele: Again, the answer is no. I would like to think that the general understanding is that much of what is involved in keeping communities safe cannot necessarily be undertaken when police are out on the street.

In preparation for today—well, I used today’s meeting as an excuse—I watched the “Coppers” programme on television. The episode was based in rural Perthshire, which is a very fine part of the world. A lot of what those police officers did every day did not require them to be visible in the community all the time. If you take every aspect of what a police officer does in relation to being visible in the community—which, in its widest sense, involves things like appearing in schools and attending community council meetings—and ask whether it requires a policing power, you get into quite complex areas. That is what has happened in policing over the years. We have micro-analysed aspects of the police service’s work and asked whether specific elements—such as visiting a school—required a policing power. If the answer was no, we said that that was 15 minutes, half an hour or an hour of a police officer’s day that could be more productively spent doing something else, and have created various roles along the lines of school liaison officers to fill those functions.

The role of a police officer is highly complicated. It is not just as simple as turning up and giving the bad man the jail. A lot of what we do does not demand coercive powers; the point is that, when they are called for, we can exercise them.

Because of what they do, police officers can be expected to perform a particular function at the whim of the chief constable, at any time of day or night, any day of the week. It is not just as simple as saying that a public-facing policeman in a yellow jacket provides confidence. There must be a greater appreciation of the sophistication that is associated with policing. Part of that, clearly, involves the ability to rely on many valuable members of support staff, who enable the police officer to perform in that way.

The Convener: I am most fascinated by the chief constable exercising whims, but I will not pursue that.

Roderick Campbell: Mr Steele, could you elaborate on the point that you make in your written submission that the chief constable should prepare the strategic police plan, not merely be involved in its preparation. Can you make the case for that?

Calum Steele: As is often the case, it comes down to defining your definitions. If the plan involves nothing more than high level governmental objectives, I have no problem with the bill as drafted. If what is meant by “strategic” becomes more advanced than that, I would have some concerns. The strategic direction of the police service, in broad terms, must be informed by the professional opinion of the chief constable. Andrew Barker will be able to give you the views of the Scottish Chief Police Officers Association on that.

The issue is simply to do with the definition of “strategic”. If it simply involves general statements, such as “healthier, fitter, stronger”, the bill is fine. However, at the moment, we do not know how it is defined.

Deputy Chief Constable Barker: I continue to draw the line between my position, as the chief officer of the SCPOA, and the position of ACPOS.

On the point that Calum Steele makes, the definition of “strategic” is important. What does the word mean? It is a relatively loose term. As Calum Steele said, if it involves statements on high level objectives, we do not have an issue with that. However, if it involves priorities of policing at a more specific level, it needs further explanation and clarification.

John Finnie: I understand the challenges that Mr Watson faces in representing his members at this juncture. The history of the current proposals goes back to 1996, with removal of central establishment controls, single-line budgets and a large measure of chief officers’ discretion in how they configured staff.

I would like to ask about what you said about having a better workforce mix of civilian and uniformed staff. None of the changes regarding establishment controls or the funding arrangements altered the requirement to have an efficient police service. Surely, if a police chief has an evidence-based position that he has an efficient service, that is something that you would need to accept. In saying that, I acknowledge that the maintenance of the 17,234 figure is likely to impact more on your members than on Mr Steele’s.

Dave Watson: If only that were the case. We certainly welcome the fact that the bill will put a duty of best value on the new national police force. At present, there is only an “accountable officer” arrangement. However, in the years to come, it will be difficult to demonstrate best value if only 15 per cent of the police force are civilians. I have represented police civilian staff for more than 30 years. I remember, before 1996, going into police headquarters and stations where detective sergeants and detective inspectors were doing the work of clerks—I am sure that Mr Finnie remembers that, too—which is the sort of situation that we are going back to because of the numbers. I agree entirely with Calum Steele on micro-analysing police officers’ duties, but large numbers of police officers never need to use their warrant cards, because they only carry out roles that can be done by civilians.

The public want to see police officers on the street, as is absolutely right. Part of the function and role of police civilians is to free up police officers to be on the streets. Other jobs that police civilians do are specialist functions that have grown since the days when I first represented police staff. The chief officers will have no choice; if they are stuck with 17,234 as an absolutely rigid and no-budge figure, the chief officer will simply have to take officers off the streets to do civilian jobs. There is no other way of doing the tasks.

That will not lead to an efficient force or to best value. In five or six years, we will be sitting round a table like this with Audit Scotland, who will say that the situation is ridiculous because we are paying police officers, at great cost, to do jobs that they are not qualified to do. We should not wait until then. Let us take the opportunity of the establishment of a new police force to consider the right balance between police officers and civilians. We should work that out from the bottom up, rather than from the top down, and we can then have a reasonable debate about what that balanced police force ought to be.

John Finnie: How many of the posts that you suggest are presently filled by police officers involve police officers who are on rehabilitative or return-to-work programmes or protected duties?

Dave Watson: There will be some, but such numbers are misleading. The Stewart report considered the establishment arrangements on that basis. For example, in some forces, staff in control rooms were almost all civilian, whereas in other forces they were almost all police officers. Some forces have large numbers of police custody officers and fewer police officers, while other forces’ numbers differ. The convener used the term “whim”. Frankly, I suspect that the way in which civilisation has developed is probably down to the “whim” of the chief constables. We know that different forces have developed in different ways, because reports have shown that to be the case.

John Finnie: Do you acknowledge that, through a combination of such arrangements, in any force at any given time, a number of officers—although I would not say that it is a significant number—fulfil functions that were hitherto undertaken by civilian staff?

Dave Watson: It is perfectly reasonable to have posts to cope with those arrangements, but that is entirely different from the issue that I am talking about. To give an example from our current survey, police civilian staff tell me that, in some police stations, no police officers go on routine patrol because they are doing paperwork. The police officers—Calum Steele’s people—say that they do not want to be doing that. They want to do their job and not the paperwork that was previously done by people who were qualified to do it. That is about getting the balance right.

John Finnie: If I recall correctly, the outline business case alludes to an attrition rate of 3 per cent, which is fairly modest. I understand that, in the local government experience, a figure of 10 per cent is more realistic.

Dave Watson: We have looked at a figure of 7 per cent. However, as others have pointed out, we now have good experience of managing a job-loss programme, which is already pretty massive. It is relatively easy to lose people in the first stages of such a programme, but the further we go, the more difficult it gets to find people who are prepared to go. Age is a key factor, because the people who are left are younger. Another key factor is the current economic circumstances, and there is also the simple reality that some jobs cannot be released. Those three factors together make the process difficult.

John Finnie: Has the package—for want of a better phrase—improved since the initial offer?

Dave Watson: The situation depends on the different arrangements in different places. Of course, a huge package might attract people, but any package that will not rightly attract the attention of your colleagues on the Finance Committee is not going to solve the problem. We are talking about job functions, age and other opportunities. In the context of people who are prepared to retire at 55 to 65, the numbers will be... few if we must lose another 2,000 or even 3,000 civilian posts during the next few years.

John Finnie: The Unison submission says:

“The certification and ‘fit and proper person’ test”—

The Convener: Wait a minute, John. A couple of members want to follow up the point about civilian staff. I will come back to you so that you can start a new line of questioning.

Lewis Macdonald: I guess that my question relates principally to civilian staff. Do witnesses think that the bill is properly drafted in relation to transfer of undertakings from the existing employer to the new employer?

Dave Watson: In our view, it is not. The arrangements in the bill have largely been lifted from the approach that was taken when the SPSA was established. The world has moved on since then and there have been changes in the UK situation, under Cabinet Office rules.

We need to go back to arrangements that were used previously, for example in relation to the Water Industry (Scotland) Act 2002 and the most recent local government reorganisation. We need a full statutory transfer order, which covers all the issues in the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 2006. In essence, we simply say that if TUPE does not apply—it could be argued that it does not apply, because we are talking about an administrative transfer—the principles of TUPE should apply. In fairness, I will say that the Scottish Government has consistently applied such an approach. However, it is not currently applying it, as the bill stands. I do not think that that is malicious or intentional; I think that it is an oversight.

We have concentrated on police and civilian staff, but we should remember that local authority staff also provide services to police in a number of forces and would come into the scope of TUPE. That is another area that is missing. There is a particular issue with Fife Constabulary and Dumfries and Galloway Constabulary, which are much more integrated with the local authorities than some other forces are. The bill is vague and unclear in that regard.

Calum Steele: There is a significant matter in respect of how TUPE relates to staff who are currently employed by the Strathclyde Police Authority. As far as I am aware, no other authority employs full-time members of staff, and if we follow the general and, indeed, the specific provisions of TUPE there is almost a read-across whereby such individuals would become staff members in the new Scottish police authority. I am not saying that those staff members would not have the skills and abilities to do that, but there might well be an issue to do with balance across the expectations of wider areas of local government, in relation to whether such an approach is fair. That is a general observation.

By and large, the provisions for police officers mirror those for the previous amalgamation schemes, with the notable exception that an officer’s protection from the expectation that they must move house in the event of amalgamation would be lost as a consequence of promotion. That is a step too far; such provision did not exist in 1976 and it does not need to exist now.

Lewis Macdonald: The committee has had discussions about civilisation and decivilisation of posts. In essence, the question is whether it is possible to plan in a way that identifies essential jobs and ensures that the right balance is struck. I think all the witnesses have talked about balance.

I asked the previous witnesses whether they thought that a transition year or further period in which to implement the new arrangements properly would make it easier for the police service to strike the right balance and get the right people in place. Do you think that a transition year or some other period would be helpful in that respect?

Dave Watson: It would be helpful, but it is not the solution. The solution is to say, “We have a national police force, which is differently structured and has different requirements; let’s build the staffing structures from the bottom up and work out what we need.” That is how we would find the right balance and work out how to make the changes. If we did that, we would get a more balanced workforce and avoid many of the difficulties that Kevin Smith and other witnesses have highlighted to you this morning.

The Convener: I agree, but we have covered that subject, so I ask for shorter answers. The question was fair, and you have said that the suggestion is not the solution but might be helpful. That was the essence of your answer. Do other witnesses feel that a transition period would be helpful?

Calum Steele: For the sake of brevity, my answer mirrors Dave Watson’s.

Deputy Chief Constable Barker: Yes.

The Convener: I like that; I really like that.

12:30

John Finnie: I want to ask about two matters in Mr Watson’s submission. At the bottom of page 3, you mention double jeopardy. I do not understand what you mean, so could you explain it?

In the second paragraph on page 2, you say:
“UNISON Scotland is also concerned that this could lead to police staff being redeployed to other areas, possibly at short notice and disruption to work life balance.”

I would have thought that such issues would be covered by existing terms and conditions.

Dave Watson: The bill contains separate provisions on the need for a certificate for police custody officers, because of their particular duties, and I will give members of the committee an example of how double jeopardy might arise.

If misconduct leads to disciplinary action and a final written warning, the situation might arise—under the bill as drafted—in which the chief constable decided to take away the PCSO certificate on the ground that the person was not a fit and proper person. So, following a disciplinary procedure, the person could suffer double jeopardy if the chief constable intervened. The chief constable would not have been part of the original disciplinary action, which would have been dealt with by a more junior officer or a civilian member of staff. The risk of double jeopardy is not necessary. Every police officer and every police civilian member of staff has to be a fit and proper person in order to do their job—that is implied in their contract of employment. I do not understand why it should be written into the bill. It is unnecessary, and could be abused.

Mobility clauses can be a grey area in law. Our police civilian staff have a contract of employment. Unlike the situation for police officers, that is not set down by regulations; there will be individual contracts. Arguments might arise over whether a particular move was reasonable, but the same protections that the bill builds in for police officers are not built in for police civilians. Risks might therefore arise. This would not be written into the bill, obviously, but our members are concerned that, if there is just one police force, they could end up being shunted around Scotland. Most of our members who are police civilians are women and they may have caring responsibilities, so moving may well not be a practical option.

John Finnie: That situation is not unique to the bill. Were anyone to be unreasonably shunted, I am sure that employment action from their union would follow.

Dave Watson: That is not necessarily the case. At the moment, the employer has a limited geographical area; under the new arrangements, the employer will cover the whole of Scotland. The issue has arisen during other centralising reorganisations with quangos, for example. It is not a theoretical problem; it is a real problem. The bill might not be where the problem should be sorted, but we would certainly seek reassurance from the minister on application of the policy.

John Finnie: Could there be red circles?

Dave Watson: Yes—a range of possibilities exists that are not dissimilar to the arrangements that apply to police officers.

The Convener: I remind members that we are considering the bill, not contractual matters.

John Finnie: They have been mentioned in evidence.

The Convener: That may be so, but it may be that not all the evidence is relevant.

John Finnie: Okay.

The Convener: Tush, tush.

I should not have said that, but I have.

Graeme Pearson: Andrew Barker mentioned considerable concerns over section 14 and the opportunity for the authority to "call on a senior officer to retire from office in the interests of efficiency or effectiveness".

Is it fair for legislation to include such a measure? What is the kernel issue for you?

Deputy Chief Constable Barker: My members certainly feel that they are placed at significant risk by the fact that the bill has no definitions of “efficiency” or “effectiveness”. I highlighted in written evidence that, by the very nature of the amalgamation, a number of my members will not have substantive posts within the new organisation. There is undoubtedly a fear that the “efficiency and effectiveness” proposal, which gives no process or right of appeal for what would be summary dismissal, could be viewed as an easy way to get rid of officers who are regarded as surplus to requirements as we move into the new organisation.

We completely accept the need for a system to deal with inefficient or ineffective senior officers—we do not question that. However, what we seek is fairness and protection for officers. I drew on comparisons in my written evidence, which I will touch on now very briefly. At present, a matter of misconduct on the part of a chief officer requires an independent investigation by a chief constable, consideration by a joint police board or a police authority and an independent solicitor’s view. Thereafter, the Lord President of the Court of Session appoints a panel to take action on the misconduct of the chief officer or senior officer.

It appears, however, from the wording of section 14 of the bill that the police authority can conclude that an individual is inefficient or ineffective, give the individual “an opportunity to make representations”, then require that person to retire.
Graeme Pearson: Are you aware, from your research, of a similar power elsewhere in the public sector or the private sector?

Deputy Chief Constable Barker: I have taken legal advice on the matter and have been told that there is no similar power in the public or private sectors. There are opportunities to dismiss very senior people, but they entail financial recompense and an examination of the circumstances. At the minute, my feeling is that, as section 14 is drafted, the decision can basically come down to—I will use the word that the convener used earlier—a “whim” of the police authority or others as to whether an individual is surplus to requirements and could be required to retire. I stress that there could be massive financial and career penalties for such individuals.

The Convener: On what Graeme Pearson said, I note that you state in paragraph 6.3 of your submission:

“Whilst a similar provision existed within the terms of the Police (Scotland) Act, 1967 it has never, to knowledge, been used and ... would be challengeable by Judicial Review.”

Is it not the case that if a fair process is not in place for calling on a senior officer to retire, such a request would be challengeable under article 6 of the European convention on human rights, which gives the right to a fair hearing? An individual who was called on to retire would be entitled to challenge that, irrespective of employment law. I take your point about the drafting of section 14, but if it remains challengeable as it is, I have no doubt that the Government will take cognisance of that.

Deputy Chief Constable Barker: Officials have acknowledged that work is required on the matter. The similarity to the 1967 act is in relation to the word “efficiency”; the word “effectiveness” has come from left-field, to put it bluntly, into the bill.

The Convener: Humza Yousaf has a question.

Humza Yousaf: It is on a completely different matter, if that is okay.

The Convener: Good. I might give sweeties for completely different matters. Do we have many more questions?

David McLetchie: I have one.

The Convener: David has one. Are there any more? That will give me an idea of our timetable. No? Right—Humza.

Humza Yousaf: The other panellists might have a view on this, but on the bill’s proposals for the police investigations and review commissioner, the Scottish Police Federation’s submission suggested an amendment for section 63, which is:

“S. 63(1)(d) – Change ‘Commissioner’ to ‘Lord Advocate’.”

That amendment refers to proposed new section 33A(1)(d) of the 2006 act in section 63 of the bill, which states that among the commissioner’s functions would be investigation of other matters relating to the Authority or the Police Service where the Commissioner considers that it would be in the public interest to do so”.

Why do you suggest replacing the commissioner with the Lord Advocate? Would not there, in that case, be a danger that the Crown would be tied in too closely with the police authority? Should it not remain for the independent police investigations and review commissioner to decide what is in the public interest?

Calum Steele: Vesting in an individual—I appreciate, of course, that the Lord Advocate is an individual—the power to decide what is in the public interest raises the questions of whose public and whose interest, I do not think that those aspects are necessarily easily understood. In any event, a decision on any investigation that takes place in Scotland is ultimately for the Lord Advocate.

Our concern about “public interest” is that it can be construed very widely and that reference to it in section 63 could provide, depending on circumstances that could unfold at any time, the ability to go on a fishing expedition. To be clear, we have nothing against the principle of a police investigations and review commissioner. There is nothing wrong with external scrutiny of the police service. In fact, I am pretty confident that a PIRC will show what we have said for many years, which is that the police service is not a closed shop but is highly efficient in its investigation of itself and deals appropriately with misdemeanours when they occur.

Humza Yousaf: I heard some grumbling in the corner when the Daily Mail was mentioned.

David McLetchie: The circulation figures are high in Scotland.

Humza Yousaf: Mr McLetchie is a robust defender of the Daily Mail.

I can understand why you might be concerned about the public interest aspect, but you have not really explained why “Commissioner” should be changed to “Lord Advocate”. As you rightly pointed out, the Lord Advocate is still one individual. Do you accept that there is a perception—even though it may be incorrect—that the relationship between the Crown and the police service is a bit too cosy and that they are a bit too close, which could undermine the Lord Advocate having that function?

Calum Steele: That perception may well exist, but when legislation is being drafted we should deal with reality. I do not think that the Crown and the police service are overly close on such matters. If we try to legislate on the basis of perception, we will be on very shaky ground indeed.

Humza Yousaf: I admit that, but with such a role, when a complaint comes in from the public, there has to be confidence in the role. Would that not be undermined by having the Lord Advocate involved? I still do not understand the rationale for shifting the responsibility for determining what would be in the public interest to the Lord Advocate. I do not feel that you have explained it. You have explained your difficulty with the term “the public interest”, but what is the rationale for shifting the onus on to the Lord Advocate?

Calum Steele: Our view is that the Lord Advocate is in a position to take a more informed position on what is in the public interest, because of their general understanding of what goes on in the criminal justice system.

Now that we have touched on the PIRC, I make the point that there are some areas of conflict with regard to independence and the separation of functions. An example of that relates to external scrutiny. The provisions of the bill indicate that the PIRC will be responsible for monitoring complaints against himself or herself. That seems to me simply to move the problem from one place to another.

There is also an obvious deficiency in the proposed arrangements in circumstances in which the PIRC may be responsible for investigating a matter that turns out to be criminal, but which goes back to being misconduct. Is there a conflict in that role? To me, it seems that there is an obvious conflict, in that the PIRC, after deciding that the matter is criminal, will be expected to determine whether it could amount to misconduct. Such conflicts and difficulties will prevail. It is to ensure that the PIRC has clean hands that we believe that it would be more appropriate for the Lord Advocate to have a role in something as significant as a public interest investigation into the police service.

The Convener: I should never ask whether there are any more questions. David McLetchie and Graeme Pearson will ask the final questions, unless something really compulsive appears—I did not mean you.

David McLetchie: I am an obsessive compulsive, on occasion.

In relation to back-office and front-office functions, phrases such as “officers on the beat”, “officers in the community” and “officers on the streets” are seen as a shorthand for what policing is supposed to be. If we were to do a head count of our 17,234 officers on a typical Tuesday in Scotland, how many of them would we find were on the streets and in the community? Would you like to hazard a guess at that?

Calum Steele: I would hazard the guess that the figure is probably less than 10 per cent, but there are reasons for that. Police work is a 24/7 profession. If we accept that that is the nature of the beast, we must accept that police officers will work shifts and that, as a consequence of that, they will have days off. Many shift patterns have evolved over time. A common shift pattern across the police service at the moment is a five-shift rotating shift pattern, which will result in 40 per cent of the staff being on days off at any one time. If the other three shifts are allocated across a 24-hour period, 20 per cent of the police officers will be on duty at any one time. This is pure finger-in-the-air stuff, but it is not unreasonable arithmetic to suggest that half of those are probably on the street.

The Convener: That was wonderful. We should have you do part 1 of the Criminal Cases (Punishment and Review) (Scotland) Bill, because we do not understand the arithmetic in that.

David McLetchie: I will follow up the point about the number of officers who are on the street and in the community. At this moment in time, how many officers are working not on management functions but on operational matters, such as investigating things and writing reports—all of which is a necessary part of the criminal justice system—in police stations and headquarters?

Calum Steele: Now we really are getting into guesswork. I suspect that not even ACPOS could answer your question, despite all the resource that is at its disposal.

The Convener: My advice is to quit while you are ahead, Mr Steele.

Calum Steele: In many ways, the question links back to the exchange between me and Ms Marra about the fact that policing is not always about doing something that is linked with the criminal justice system. Policing also involves being there and providing comfort and assurance. A lot of what takes place in police stations is linked to providing comfort to the community, although it is not necessarily directly linked to the criminal justice system.

David McLetchie: Being in a police station does not mean that someone is not doing police work.

Calum Steele: Absolutely.

David McLetchie: Lots of valuable investigative work can be done by sitting at a desk, making calls and all the rest of it. That is just as valuable as knocking on a door in the community.

Deputy Chief Constable Barker: We are getting into the huge area of difficulty about what is what. That shows the complexity of the police service. We could argue about rural policing, urban policing, public order policing, child protection and domestic violence measures—I could go on and on. The point was made that all such functions protect the communities of Scotland and that people might sit behind a desk to do such work.

Do we want our e-crime investigators, who deal with internet pornography and child abuse, to be out on the street in a yellow jacket? I do not want that; I want them to be doing their specialist task and to be protecting the public. The number of officers who are on foot on the streets of Scotland becomes largely irrelevant; the issue is the totality of policing rather than the specifics in each area.

Dave Watson: I accept that, but the phrase “on the streets” is where the political target comes from—that description was used. We would not have a difficulty with getting police officers on to the streets, which includes doing some of the tasks that my colleagues on the panel have described. However, we should not forget—we get this all the time—that large numbers of police officers are still doing tasks that are better done by civilians.

The Convener: We have explored that. I am not cutting you off, but we have the evidence on that issue.

Graeme Pearson: I ask for a brief response on one issue that we did not manage to discuss with the earlier panel, which was ICT and the challenges that the police service faces in providing a good intelligence background and information technology support. I presume that a specific plan will be needed to ensure that ICT is well supported in the single police force and that people with the skills to do such work are available.

In fairness to the committee, I should declare an interest: I previously advised software companies about ICT and I may well go back to that in the future.

Deputy Chief Constable Barker: I will speak with my day job hat on, rather than my staff association hat. I am closely involved in the programme of looking at how we rationalise eight organisations’ systems. We will prioritise the crucial systems for moving forward, rather than the desirable systems, and we will try to enhance value for money across the piece.

Dave Watson: We represent a lot of the staff who do the ICT work. It has been pointed out not just by us but by others that some of the expected savings in ICT are optimistic, given experience from past reorganisations.

The committee should also consider cost displacement. It is easy to put in place a new system when all that it does is displace work to operational staff.

Calum Steele: One of the many benefits that will come about as a consequence of the single service is undoubtedly a more joined-up approach to IT. I do not mean to be in any way disparaging about ACPOS, but it used to be said that the only thing that ACPOS could agree on was the colour of a tie—and it later transpired that even that was not the case.

The Convener: What a happy little family you are.

Calum Steele: Even when we had ACPOS working together to come up with common IT solutions and agreements, what we got was down to the individual negotiations and approaches that were taken in forces. Despite the fact that we started off with a high-level agreement for universality, we did not get that. The opportunities that arise for investment in IT will make the service better.

I will expand on a point that I made at the Finance Committee. I highlighted the fact that the police service, probably like nothing else in society, holds a fascination for the general public and, indeed, politicians. You will find that more people have an opinion on the police service than do on anything else, other than football and the family.

The Convener: Believe you me, they have an opinion on politicians.

Calum Steele: Obviously, much of the scrutiny that is directed at the police service is understandable, but it comes at a cost as the service needs to have the IT and the individuals to feed that requirement.

This is very much a quick analysis, but I checked the Scottish Parliament website and found that, in the previous session of Parliament, the word “police” features in almost 1,950 speeches in parliamentary debates. Mentions of nurses and doctors collectively come to 250 and there were 500 mentions of teachers.

Similar but broader statistics indicate that crime and justice hold a greater fascination than health and education. Although health accounts for approximately 35 per cent of the Scottish budget, it does not account for 35 per cent of the scrutiny that is applied by elected members. If that level of scrutiny is, rightly, going to be directed at the police service, our argument is that it is entirely right that politicians step up to the mark and put the arguments over funding more vociferously to ensure that the police service is properly resourced.

The Convener: On that public relations submission for the police service, I will close the evidence session. I thank you all very much for your evidence.
10:02

The Convener: Agenda item 2 is our second evidence session on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill at stage 1. I welcome to the meeting our first panel of witnesses: Assistant Chief Constable Alistair Finlay of the Police Service of Northern Ireland; Professor Nick Fyfe, who is director of the Scottish institute for policing research; Dr Kenneth Scott, who is director of the centre for criminal justice and police studies at the University of the West of Scotland; and Alison Payne, who is research director at Reform Scotland. Good morning to you all and thank you very much for your written submissions.

As usual, we will go straight to questions from members.

Graeme Pearson (South Scotland) (Lab): Will Alistair Finlay give us some insight into the lessons that he has learned in connection with the governance and local accountability challenges that have been faced with a single national police force?

The Convener: If other members of the panel want to self-nominate, I will indicate that I will call them to speak.

Assistant Chief Constable Alistair Finlay (Police Service of Northern Ireland): I thank the committee for inviting me to the meeting.

The subject that the member raises is so broad and deep, and experiences are so different, that I will try to keep my comments on it relatively short in the first instance.

The challenge that Scotland faces is how to get national accountability with local buy-in and the local feel that we need for policing. It is clear that that is achieved in Northern Ireland through district policing partnerships, which will change to become policing and community safety partnerships from 1 April.

As the committee will be aware, the model was devised by the Patten commission, which 10 years ago studied the future of policing in Northern Ireland and was involved in the coming into existence of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. The model has worked better in some areas than in others; it depends on who is involved in a particular district policing partnership and the make-up of the committee. However, the context is different because the politics of Northern Ireland is different, and positions are pretty polarised.

For example, in north and west Belfast, the district policing partnership meeting has become... very challenging for the local police commander. There is a difference between the role of the policing board nationally, which is to hold the chief constable and the organisation to account, and the role of the district policing partnership, which is to be informed about local performance and to inform local issues. However, sometimes that line, which is fairly indistinct at the best of times, is definitely blurred. The area commanders, who are chief inspectors in all areas in Northern Ireland, are held strongly to account in quite a bruising and confrontational way. Success for some people is strongly to account in quite a bruising and confrontational way. Success for some people is sometimes pretty peripheral at best.

In other areas, the approach is much more constructive and the balance is different. It all depends on the personalities on and management of the committee, and how it has been set up over time. Some area committees and district policing partnerships are much more enabling and contribute a lot. They reflect local people’s needs and concerns and gain an understanding of what is happening in policing in their local area and how policing can be supported locally. That last aspect is often missed out; it is not just about holding to account and being informed, but about how we galvanise support for policing in areas where that is sometimes pretty peripheral at best.

Graeme Pearson: Can you give us some insight into how the Northern Ireland Policing Board operates and who is on it? How does the board manage the governance issues and at the same time acknowledge operational independence?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: The board is made up of 19 members: 10 are independents and nine are elected members of the Northern Ireland Assembly. The elected members are appointed under a system of proportional representation—the d'Hondt system—in order to get cross-party representation on the board. The independent members put themselves forward in response to an advert and are selected by the Northern Ireland Department of Justice through a process that is designed to reflect community background, the particular skills that can be brought to bear on the board and other issues.

The board operates through its principal public meetings, which are held 10 times a year. They can attract significant public interest through the media, because policing in Northern Ireland is still very political. The board also operates below that in a less visible way. It does most of the business through a number of thematic committees, such as human rights and professional standards, human resources, and resources and improvement. They deal with the people, the infrastructure, the resources and the approach to policing, which is often done through the human rights and professional standards committee.

Human rights are a core bit of the business. The difference between the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill and what we have in Northern Ireland is that human rights are absolutely up there in lights and up front as the underlying, core principles for policing in Northern Ireland. That is reflected in how we deal with our code of ethics, the number of human rights advisers involved and how the issues inform training and manifest themselves in policing on the ground.

That is all done against a background of Patten designing a new police service for a different time and seeking to involve all communities. It is only a short time since Sinn Féin became actively involved in the governance of policing, so we are relatively young, in terms of our overall governance involving people from across the political spectrum.

Patten talked about operational accountability, and we are operationally accountable for, but independent of decision makers on, what we do and our priorities. Our priorities are set through the policing plan, but operational priorities are developed as they arise and as we go about our business. My experience is that we are held to account particularly on the policing of public order, which is contentious, forceful and impactive in Northern Ireland. People hold us to account for the style of policing, the amount of force that is used and why we took certain decisions.

Graeme Pearson: I will ask one last question and then allow others to come in.

The Convener: No, I will allow others to come in, Graeme. You are doing a Humza.

Graeme Pearson: Sorry.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay mentioned different styles of local accountability and accountability through the national board. One of the matters that exercised the committee at last week’s meeting was how to connect local issues to the national board to get an effective response. Is there a connection between the local community safety partnerships and the board? If so, how does that operate and how is it traced through the system?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: The principal connection is within two plans: the policing plan, which the board produces for and in conjunction with the PSNI, and the local policing plans, which are developed by the district policing partnerships—or the policing and community safety partnerships, which is what they will become.

In developing the national plan, the board consults to find out what key issues exercise the local areas, some of which are gathered up. They are unsurprising and tend not to differ from area to area. They tend to concern antisocial behaviour, burglary—or housebreaking, as it is known in Scotland—and road safety. Road safety is more of a concern in some areas than others. Northern Ireland had a long history of road deaths, but we have managed to turn that round quite successfully.

The local and national plans have a large degree of overlap. We have eight policing districts, each of which is headed by a chief superintendent and within each of which there are a number of area commanders, who are chief inspectors. The challenge for the district commanders, as we term them, is to strike the balance between performing against the organisational aims under the policing plan and meeting local needs. That involves some footwork in resource allocation, addressing most of the overlapping aims and doing some local initiatives to try to tackle issues that are specific to a particular area and about which people are exercised—it can be as localised as the impact of antisocial behaviour in a particular housing estate.

Graeme Pearson: If local people are unhappy and do not feel that they are receiving a response from the community safety partnership, is there a mechanism for raising that with the national board?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: The structure of the public meetings that we hold 10 times a year has changed. The board recently decided that it would be useful to allow the public to ask questions of the chief constable and the senior management team. What happens depends on the number of people who come along. Most questions are answered by correspondence in the first instance, but the facility exists to ask a question at the meeting. More often, questions are asked by a member of the board on behalf of the community.

The other principal route is through the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland. It is more normal for people to make a complaint to the ombudsman, who will pursue it in his usual fashion.

Humza Yousaf (Glasgow) (SNP): Good morning. I will pick up on what you just said and then move on to ask other questions.

In your opinion, as long as its concerns are heard, is the local community really bothered who sits on the board for the 10 public meetings that take place every year? Do people demand that board members are local councillors, for example? Do they mind the fact that those involved are MLAs and independents, or are they just worried about whether their concerns are being dealt with adequately? Are they bothered who the individuals on the board are?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I do not think that they have been asked that question or have found it an issue. The board was designed to have that balance between political and independent members. The same structure is reflected in the district policing partnerships, which have a balance of 10 political representatives and nine independent members, utilising councillors rather than MLAs. I do not know whether the public have thought about options to replace the board—that has not really been considered.

Within the structure of public services in Northern Ireland, which is significantly different from the structure in Scotland, the 26 councils have few functions. Many functions are delivered nationally in different ways, such as through a national roads service or education and library boards. That completely different public services structure may influence policing. However, the contentiousness of and the political interest in policing are such that there must be some political involvement in the representation of communities.

Humza Yousaf: Thank you. I turn to Reform Scotland’s written submission. As we can see, local accountability is a huge issue. The Reform Scotland submission states that "the Scottish Police Authority should be made up of representatives of each of Scotland’s local authorities".

It adds:

“Due to the national elements of policing, we would be happy for representatives from the Scottish government, whether minister or senior civil servant, to also sit on the board.”

How big does Reform Scotland envisage that the Scottish police authority board will be?

Alison Payne (Reform Scotland): That is more a question about the number of local authorities in Scotland. The 32 local authorities in Scotland need to be represented to ensure that local voices are heard. However, you should not reform the police because you do not like the number of local authorities.

You asked whether the public mind who represents them. If you asked whether a function should be removed from Holyrood and MSPs and given to Westminster and MPs, there would be an outcry. Why should there not be an outcry when a function is removed from local government and given to Holyrood? Policing is a local government function at present and we feel that, although there has been a lot of debate around and justification of the bill on the basis of financial savings, no justification has been made for removing the function from local government.
Humza Yousaf: Are you suggesting that there should be a restructuring of local authorities before we proceed with the bill?

Alison Payne: No. The policy memorandum accepts that policing is largely a local function, and we are saying that, to reflect that, we need local representatives in the system.

There are potential problems that we are concerned about. We think that it is a fantastic idea to have local commanders matching up with local authority areas—that is brilliant and long overdue. However, what would happen if a local authority pushed one idea and the chief constable pushed another? The local commander would be caught in the middle. Also, what would happen when a local authority was of one political persuasion but the Scottish Government was of another? Unless the police board is made up of councillors, so that the chief constable is, in turn, answerable to councillors from across Scotland and can take all the local circumstances into account, the system will be messy. A more accountable policing structure is not created by removing councillors and replacing them with unelected, appointed quangos.

Humza Yousaf: If we pushed ahead with the bill but kept the current local authority set-up, taking on board your suggestion of having on the same board one representative from each of the 32 local authorities—different local authorities of different political persuasions—how would we be able to hold anybody to account, and how would the board be able to come to a decision on any matter, given all the local perspectives?

Alison Payne: It is not about the political persuasions; it is about the local needs and the different priorities of the different communities. For example, members of a political party who represent the Highlands may have a completely different view about policing in their area from that of members of the same political party who represent the Highlands may have a completely different view about policing in their area from that of members of the same political party who represent an urban area. It is more about taking account of the needs and priorities of local communities. We do not think that a centrally appointed quango can represent our local communities better than our elected councillors already do.

Humza Yousaf: No—I get the idea of the local police plan and the fact that there might be a conflict between national priorities and local priorities, which was mentioned at last week’s meeting. People need to be open to compromise in relation to such matters.

The aspect of Reform Scotland’s proposal that I am struggling with is the idea of having 32 local representatives on one board, each of whom would have their different priorities, depending on whether they were from the Highlands, an urban area or a rural area. I cannot see those 32 local representatives having any influence whatever, because there would be numerous different voices all speaking at once and numerous different perspectives. How could the board possibly come to any joint decision?

Alison Payne: That arrangement would reflect the structure of local government in this country. We have 32 local authorities. Equally, 32 local commanders would be involved. Those local commanders would come together and have meetings to discuss what was going on. Rather than unelected, appointed quangos being involved, it would simply be a case of bringing together individuals who represented the interests and priorities of their communities to ensure that the policing structure linked back to our communities.

Humza Yousaf: I do not know whether anyone else wants to comment.

The Convener: I am leaving it up to witnesses to nominate themselves if they want to comment. If none of them does, we will move on to the next question.

Dr Kenneth Scott (University of the West of Scotland): There is an issue with the size of the police authority and the link between the local and the national, but we must recognise that not all policing is local. We welcome the fact that the bill puts a duty on the chief constable to provide local policing—that is absolutely correct—but one of the benefits of having a single force is that it will be possible to take a much wider strategic view and to develop a capacity for operating beyond the local level.

For example, as members will know, we already have a national organisation that deals with crime and drug enforcement but which does not fit into any pattern of local accountability. It should be accountable, and the way of making it accountable is to ensure that the Scottish police authority can review what happens not just at the local level but at the national level. My suspicion is that, in the context of a single force, there will be more police operations at a national level. It would be a surprise if the capacity to investigate major incidents, serious crime and serious organised crime were not likely to be organised at a level above the local. That is important from the point of view of making best use of the resources and the experience of the police service.

Although local accountability is important and local policing will make up the bulk of policing in Scotland, the bill offers the opportunity to develop a framework that goes beyond that at a national level.

Professor Nick Fyfe (Scottish Institute for Policing Research): I will add a footnote to that.
One of the other issues that the bill raises is that it assumes that there is something called “local policing”, but it does not offer any definitional clarity on where the boundaries of local policing begin and end. That is a crucial issue as regards the responsibilities of local authorities. If local authorities are to be involved in the development of local policing plans, what can they expect to see in such a plan, given that, as other witnesses have indicated, there are so many connections with regional and national issues?

There needs to be some clarity on what local policing means, particularly as “local” will have very different meanings in different parts of Scotland. In Edinburgh or Glasgow, “local” might mean neighbourhood based, as opposed to something on a larger scale. It would be useful to have a better understanding of that.

The Convener: Is there not already a pragmatic understanding of that on the ground? If we were to ask a policeman, they would know perfectly well what was meant by “local policing”—they would know exactly what area was being talked about. Is it not the case that in different areas, such as the Highlands and Islands, my part of the country in the Borders or Edinburgh, there is already an understanding of what that means? Are we bothering about something that we do not need to bother about?

Professor Fyfe: The issue arises more in the context of the resources that are available to a local community when it requires more specialised policing support, which might be offered at a regional or a national level.

The Convener: Is it not also the case that if something happens in my area or in the Highlands, such as a murder or a missing person, the local divisional commander can call on aid from outwith the area? That already happens: the police already share resources. The commander can say that they do not have the resources—that they do not have an aircraft, say, to do a heat search for a missing person. As far as I know, that happens already. We are not starting from nothing.

Professor Fyfe: That is right, but it is about understanding where those regional resources will be based within the configuration of the new police service for Scotland and how local areas will be able to access them.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Perhaps I can help from a Northern Ireland perspective. The local is scalable, from the neighbourhood all the way up. We have to judge what local means in the context of what whoever is speaking to us means by local. We describe district policing as local policing; it is what happens with the resources at the district commander and area commander level. The national level consists of the equivalent of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency—the serious crime branch, which is headed up by one of my colleagues—and my own resources, which are road policing and specialist uniform support. We deploy those resources and it is our job to deploy them to the right place at the right time. We weigh up risk and use all the information that we have to achieve the desired outcome, and we go in to support the district commander.

There is sometimes tension between the local and the national, and sometimes we have not been good at keeping our local level informed of a national development, which means that we step into an area with unforeseen consequences. We have recognised that and are working on ways to improve the situation. It is down to the police leadership to sort out those issues. The effect of such a scenario is that the local—right down to the neighbourhood cop—might blame the national for something that happened that was outwith our control. That creates tension in the organisation, which can potentially come to the policing board as an issue.

The Convener: I want to move on. I will bring in David McLetchie, because he will also cover local accountability. He is not jumping the queue, as he was ahead of Lewis Macdonald. We will then have questions from Lewis, Rod Campbell, John Finnie and Alison McInnes. I tell you that just to keep you all sweet, but I know that you always are—David is always sweet.

David McLetchie (Lothian) (Con): Good morning. Within our current eight-force structure, is there a misallocation of resources between different parts of the country? In other words, if we started tomorrow with a Scottish police force and you had to allocate resources for local policing, would the resources go to exactly the same places tomorrow to which they are allocated today? Are some places overpoliced and overresourced, if I can put it that way, and others underpoliced and underresourced? Do you expect the formation of a national police force to change or correct imbalances that exist in the current force structure?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I will have to lean on my knowledge from before I was in Northern Ireland. The resources that we have in particular areas may reflect the funding that has been given to particular police authorities and police boards to construct their organisation. My guess is that there will not be huge changes to the funding pattern. I do not know whether the Highlands and Islands could do without a whole load of resource but, equally, I do not know whether it justifies a whole load more resource.
The whole organisation would have to look at where the risks were and at how you shape the organisation so that you put the resources in the appropriate places to meet the right level of risks. That must be balanced with not denuding areas of a standard of policing that is accepted locally in respect of its accessibility and responsiveness and its local contact and accountability. I am not sure that there would be huge or wholesale change; something might happen over a period of time, but I would have thought that whatever happened would be more marginal.

What is more likely to happen is the use of national resources or the brigading of some resources across the eight police forces to create the national force. That will sit above the local element and will float around, providing additionality and ensuring a more flexible response than we might have at the moment.

The Convener: What exactly do you mean by national resources?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: From my point of view, national resources would cover roads policing, specialist searches and crime investigations or surge operations, in which we would put a footprint of people on the ground over a period of time to achieve a particular outcome. That outcome might be reassurance, higher visibility after a serious crime or participation in a wide-area search and we might use, say, the air support unit and other such assets across the province or the country. The eight districts work to a resource allocation model that covers, for example, the size of demand, the number of crimes, the number of calls made, the size of the population and other issues. The allocation is constantly being reshaped in fairly small ways to reflect changes in the country’s composition or particular issues at particular times.

Professor Fyfe: This is a very interesting question to which there is not necessarily any straightforward answer. Part of the issue is the relationship between demand and need, and the police carry out a lot of work to determine risk in particular communities and therefore the need for particular resources. However, that might not necessarily map to the demand in particular communities for, say, highly visible forms of policing. As a result, balancing demand and need is a crucial issue in resource distribution and work is clearly being carried out on a resource allocation model that will ensure a level of transparency about the allocation of resources across Scotland within a national structure.

As for the style of policing that communities want, some styles, particularly those in a community-focused model of policing, require a much higher visible police presence, whereas other styles might reflect a more response-based model. Again, that will affect the level of resources required to police particular areas.

David McLetchie: Some have expressed a fear that the answer to the question of demand and need that you have identified might be different under a single-force structure than it is under the present eight-force structure. Under the current structure, there is greater political pressure and higher demand for a particular model of community-based policing; however, when all of that is dissolved into a single-force structure, there will not be the same local political pressure as evinced through police boards, local councillors and so on. The fear is that resources might be transferred from local policing needs to national policing, national priorities, surge operations and the other types of operations that Assistant Chief Constable Finlay described. Is it reasonable for people to have that fear and those concerns?

Dr Scott: The problem with that view is that it perhaps overestimates the degree of political influence on policing at the local level.

In the present structure, police forces are aware of the views of not only their police boards, but their communities, because they encourage people to express such views in surveys and so on. There is already clear thinking in Scottish police forces that community policing, for example, is an important strategy that needs to be engaged with and put in place, so I do not think that it is simply a result of external pressure. In the thinking about how best to police Scotland, there is now a clear view that community policing is a significant and important approach, and we can see that if we look at the structures of the current forces on the ground.

Although I do not disregard the fact that there might be political influence at a local level, it is probably more important to consider the influence of the public at that level, and the response of the current forces to that. I do not see that position changing as we go forward.

Alison Payne: Our concern is about who determines the balance of need. How can central decisions about resources take into account different communities’ demands for different styles of policing? If you remove local government’s ability to increase the policing budget—or decrease it, if resources are needed elsewhere—one sort of resource will be imposed on Scotland from the centre. Local authorities need to be able to take differences into account and they are best placed to judge their local communities’ needs and the different styles of policing that are needed in, say, urban Glasgow versus the Highlands. Reform
Scotland’s position on the finance is that we need to keep local government involved.

David McLetchie: In Edinburgh, the council has paid additional funds to the police board to enable it to recruit additional police officers specifically for community policing. In effect, the council has taken a political decision, in response to public pressure or demand, to provide an additional measure of funding support so that additional officers could be recruited for community policing. Under the funding model of the single police force, where would be the incentive for that to happen? How could it happen?

The Convener: Our witnesses are making faces at one another.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I am not entirely sure. I do not know whether that is the right question. Is that what we want to achieve? Is it not that we want to spell out what we want the chief constable to achieve and he or she will then be held to account for achieving that? The chief constable, with the board or the authority, will discuss the total resource and be held to account for how he or she and the management allocate that resource and meet communities’ needs.

I would have thought that Strathclyde Police is evidence of that approach, which has been in operation for some time. It has to balance the pull of Glasgow, including the city centre and major events, and the rural areas, islands and dispersed communities down in Ayrshire. There has never been a perfect balance, because it is an imprecise science, but things have been pretty well balanced over a period of time in the 12 council areas within Strathclyde.

The Convener: We will move on, if that is all right, David.

David McLetchie: Absolutely.

The Convener: I have Lewis Macdonald, then Rod Campbell, John Finnie and Alison McInnes.

Lewis Macdonald (North East Scotland) (Lab): We heard in evidence last week that, under a single Scottish police force, much of the strategic planning and operational management might happen not at the level of the 32 local authorities or at the level of Scotland as a whole, but at a regional level. You mentioned Strathclyde, but whether that happens at the level of city regions or in another way, it is likely that there will be an important tier of service delivery that is between the local and the national. Is there a gap in the plans in relation to accountability that we need to address?

Alison Payne suggests that the 32 councils be represented on the national board, but might there instead be a case for regional accountability that comprised local councillors, which would then be represented at a national level? Would that provide the link between local communities and their concerns and the strategic level of delivery, whether it is regional or ultimately national? I would be interested to hear the views of all the witnesses on that.

Dr Scott: There may be a case for that, but the danger is that it might take us back—partly, at least—to the current situation. We have to moderate the argument about local council involvement by recognising the fact that Audit Scotland’s work in recent years has shown that there are problems with the way in which police boards operate and with their effectiveness in holding chief constables to account.

Perhaps the best way to consider the issue would be to approach it from the top, rather than the bottom. The bill enables the Scottish police authority to form sub-committees whose membership could include people who are not necessarily part of the authority. That would provide a mechanism for identifying and monitoring certain types of policing that are performed at the in-between level. The move towards a single force means that it would not necessarily be the best step to go back to the current wards model, which has been shown, in certain respects, not to be as effective as it could be.

The Convener: Ms Payne, you have been offered a middle way.

Alison Payne: Reform Scotland disagrees with the current structure of eight boards. The general public are not really aware of where their representation lies within it. We want the structure to be recreated. Equally, however, we want to see greater accountability targeted downwards.

Although 32 board members, plus people representing specialist national policing, would result in a large board, that reflects local government structure in Scotland. Whether 32 local authorities are too many for Scotland is a completely separate issue. We should not structure the police on the basis that we think that the local government structure is wrong. If we continue to believe, as the policy memorandum states, that policing is largely a local service, it should be structured to reflect the local government structure.

If we do not want policing to remain a local service, we should say so. If that is the case, what is next? What else would be brought into the centre because it was believed that that was the best place to deal with it? It could be housing or social work. We are concerned about setting a bad precedent for local government functions. Although 32 may seem a large number, that is what we have.
Lewis Macdonald: Do Nick Fyfe and Alistair Finlay have a view on the regional tiers? Alison Payne and Ken Scott have given us two different answers, one saying that it is the local stuff that really matters and that that is where accountability should lie, and the other saying that we can deal with the regional tier from the top, rather than the bottom. What do others think?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I do not know whether regional tiers are needed or not. Perhaps we need to try something to see whether it works.

One of the frustrating things for those encouraged to get involved in and join the district policing partnerships in Northern Ireland—perhaps I did not make this clear in response to Graeme Pearson’s first question—is that they do not have the power to change some of the things that they thought they did. Whatever the number of tiers, it is important to delineate their capacity and function; otherwise, we risk frustrating those people who will develop an interest in policing.

Public interest in policing is slightly overstated. People tend not to be hugely interested until they need to use the service; then, if they are dissatisfied, we get calls. If the expectations of those who are encouraged to get involved in the governance and accountability of policing are not met, that can be frustrating for them and lead to negative energy.

Professor Fyfe: The only other point that I would add is that a lot of activity is already happening at the regional level, particularly in partnership working between police forces, health, social work and housing. It is crucial to see what happens to that under the new structure. Where will that activity move? Will it move down to the local level? Will that compromise what can be achieved in the existing strategic partnerships at a regional level, or will it be pushed up to the national level? The regional level is critical and there needs to be careful scrutiny of how it plays out under the new structure.

Lewis Macdonald: I think that roads policing was mentioned in relation to Northern Ireland. There will not be a separate strategy for roads policing for each of the 32 local authorities in Scotland, although there will be separate strategies for different parts of Scotland, depending on the character of the roads and the challenge facing roads policing.

Is there a risk that we will end up with a national board overseeing what is happening throughout the country but no accountable tier for regional decisions? For example, an assistant chief constable would be in charge of strategy at a regional level, yet the only accountability would be to the local council or to the minister.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: The terms “strategy” and “strategic” can be flexible, if you like, in terms of what is strategic at any one time.

Using the example of road policing, I envisage that we would have key strategic aims on reducing the number of road deaths, on pedestrian safety and on how we educate people. There will be core aims, and below those there is the issue of how that is delivered, which will depend on the geographic space, however that is defined. How that is supported will depend on whether it is on a regional or a local basis—it will be done differently in rural areas.

Analysis will have to be done of the information that we have. For example, we have done analysis and discovered that road policing is needed in rural areas in the early hours of the morning more than it is needed on motorways, because motorways are the safest roads. It is about putting the right resources into the right place at the right time, being held to account for doing that, and achieving the overall aims. How we layer that overall strategy and who is responsible for the bits of that strategy will probably depend on the structure of the organisation.

The Convener: I have a practical question. I understand what you are saying about strategy and so on. Taking roads as an example, the divisional commanders in Borders, East Lothian, the City of Edinburgh and Midlothian all co-operate practically because that is the way life is—roads do not stop at the boundaries. Do you see that changing under the legislation? Will there be any change for the public? At the end of the day, although other things are important, will we have that practical co-operation without any problems and without having to set up the middle structure that was being suggested for accountability?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I think that it will continue. From the day before the new structure is introduced to the day after, people will, broadly speaking, still be talking to the same people. The noticeable difference will perhaps be how the resource is utilised.

For example, how we police the roads is not down to the roads policing branch per se—it is a policing issue. That goes right down to local involvement in speed detection: local contributions to partnerships on speed detection and whether fixed cameras are used, whether SPECS schemes are used, how marked vehicles are deployed and the use of specialists and suchlike. That becomes a policing deployment and management issue. I do not anticipate that that will be significantly different, but the resources of the specialists will perhaps be used differently to be more effective and efficient.

The Convener: It might be better.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Absolutely.

The Convener: I keep thinking about how ordinary people will see it. They want to know that if the bill becomes an act after stage 3, nothing will change, or that things will be a bit better rather than worse. That is the most important test.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: There is a strong potential for that.

Lewis Macdonald: Alistair Finlay talked about the size of the board at Northern Ireland level—which was 19 if I heard him correctly—and the important layer of working that is done by thematic committees made up of board members.

Is it your view that the number of board members is appropriate to the number of tasks—in other words, to the work that is required of the sub-committees? Are there too many or too few board members? Is the balance between elected members and appointed members correct? What are the other witnesses’ views on the optimum size of a board and the optimum balance between elected and appointed members?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: A difference of size and scale is involved. The population of Northern Ireland is 1.7 million or thereby. Geographically, a person can drive from one end of Northern Ireland to the other in two and a half hours. That will cover the province. There are now just under 7,000 police officers and just under 3,000 support staff in its police service. Its population of Northern Ireland is 1.7 million or thereby. Geographically, a person can drive from one end of Northern Ireland to the other in two and a half hours. That will cover the province. There are now just under 7,000 police officers and just under 3,000 support staff in its police service. Its size and scale are different from Scotland’s, and the context is different. That is a health warning about reading across.

I have never really thought that a board of 19 is too big or too small. The number should have moved up or down a bit, and that would have been fine. That number of people is manageable, and the balance between the elected members and the non-elected members is probably right. All the non-elected members come with some perspective—the design is that they should do that—so there will be a breakdown of groupings. The non-political representatives will align with various parts at various times. I do not think that the model is particularly bad.

Lewis Macdonald: Are 19 people enough to staff the committees?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Yes. Nineteen people are enough to staff the sizes of committees that are utilised. The sizes of the sub-committees enable pretty good dialogue. Most of them have five members, which is a good number for purposeful engagement and conversation. That is where the detailed work is done.

Lewis Macdonald: Do the other witnesses have a view on the optimum size of a board?

Dr Scott: As members know, the bill does not make any statement at all about any balance between appointed and political members. It says: “The Scottish Ministers must appoint as members ... persons who ... have the skills and expertise relevant to the functions of the Authority”, although I believe that there is a policy statement from the Government on local government representation on the SPA. That would obviously be appropriate, but the “skills and expertise relevant” phrase is vital. It is also vital that those who are appointed to the authority are supported so that they can do the job properly, and part of that support must mean the SPA being separate from the Scottish Government and the civil service. There is no comment or statement on that in the bill, but it seems to me that that is central to the business of getting public confidence in such an authority and to the authority’s ability to carry out the stated purpose of holding the chief constable to account.

The Convener: Should the SPA posts be full time or part time? Should they be salaried or should there be appearance money? I do not know how often the board will sit.

Dr Scott: I do not have a particular view on that. I take it that the remuneration will be in line with other arrangements for such bodies. The point that I am making is that, if the SPA is seen simply as an adjunct to the work of the civil service, that will carry certain dangers.

Alison Payne: Our concern about the creation of a quango that is separate from the Scottish Government is who will be accountable. When something goes wrong, somebody on the political side must answer for that. If a quango is separated from the person in the street, they need to know where and who they can go to when something goes wrong, because ultimately there must be somebody who takes the blame or is in control. If councillors are on the board, there is at least a link to the public. Our concern about appointed board members is that, irrespective of their skills or their background, they will not represent anybody and will lack accountability.

The Convener: Is it not the case that if policing went belly up in a major way in Scotland, the ultimate responsibility would lie with the Cabinet Secretary for Justice and that he or she might have to resign?

Alison Payne: Equally the situation could be as happened with the Scottish Qualifications Authority when there was a big mix-up with all the exams. It was not a huge problem, but it was a big one. It was not the responsibility of a minister but was passed over to the quango, and it was the quango’s heads who went. We feel that such a situation is wrong and that there must be political accountability.

Having councillors on the board will ensure that, if there is a difference between what a local authority wants its local commander to do and what the chief constable says, everything will be connected back and the chief constable will be answerable to local councillors.

The Convener: With respect, Ms Payne, it depends where the fault lies at the end of the day. If the fault lay with operational personnel, then it would be appropriate that they went. If it lay somewhere else, it might be appropriate that a politician bit the bullet.

Jenny Marra wants to come in, then we will go on to Rod Campbell. [Interruption.] Oh, sorry, Lewis, do you still want to come in? I do not mind your competing with Jenny. It is not my problem.

Lewis Macdonald: I think that Professor Fyfe wants to respond, and I am keen to know the witnesses’ views on the question of how many people it takes to run a national police authority and its committees.

Professor Fyfe: Echoing Ken Scott’s points, I do not have a strong view about the number of people, because it is the quality of the engagement that is critical, both at the local and the national level. The issue of the information to which the police authority has access and its ability to generate its own information about police performance is vital. One of the issues that has emerged from work in England and Wales is that the existence of masses of what has been described as unrefined police performance data has hindered proper debate about policing. Giving the Scottish police authority the ability to research, understand and investigate issues so that it can put that information alongside information that the chief constable provides is vital to enriching the debate about the nature of policing.

The Convener: Lewis, I do not want to pursue that line of questioning because I think that the Local Government and Regeneration Committee has asked those questions, rather like the Finance Committee. We will wait and see what the Official Report says about that.

Jenny Marra (North East Scotland) (Lab): Just on the back of Ms Payne’s point, is it a good thing for the balance between citizen and state for the police to be a quango?

Alison Payne: No.

Jenny Marra: I wonder whether Professor Fyfe can call on his international research to answer on that.

Professor Fyfe: What is striking about the international context is the variety of different relationships between police organisations and the state. At one extreme is France, which has a very centralised system with little local political involvement in policing, and at the other extreme is the United States, which has a hugely decentralised policing system in which there is a strong relationship between policing and electoral politics.

The different relationships between the police and state have evolved through the political traditions and cultures of countries. We have to work within the political traditions of the country in which we live, in which there has been a distribution of power between central Government and local government and the police in determining issues of governance and accountability.

Jenny Marra: Is this the ideal model for designating police?

Professor Fyfe: Clearly, the bill moves a lot of power towards a centralised model. There are concerns that that will begin to create a democratic deficit in terms of local political involvement because, historically, we have managed and governed policing in the United Kingdom by distributing power between central and local government and the police.

Jenny Marra: Does it bring the police closer to Government?

Professor Fyfe: It certainly leads to a more centralised model.

Jenny Marra: I wonder whether the other panel members have a take on this.

11:00

Dr Scott: In our policing system the crucial element is the much-quoted ideal of constabulary independence and, as far as the bill is concerned, we need to carefully consider the extent to which the chief constable has the freedom to conduct police operations in the way that is best suited to their conduct. After all, that is what is meant by constabulary independence; it means that the chief constable is not at the beck and call of politicians or ministers but is able to make operational decisions independently. This is a crucial area of the bill, which makes statements about the chief constable’s independence, which are put negatively: for example, ministers are not entitled to have any say in operational matters. That is fundamental. The extent to which the chief constable is permitted to get on with his or her job without unnecessary interference will be the crucial test of the whole impact of this proposal on policing and the relationship between the police and the state—after all, that is the principle on which our policing system has been built—but of course that does not mean that there should not be proper monitoring and accountability.

Jenny Marra: Does the bill provide for all that?

Dr Scott: It goes a long way in that respect. One might raise questions or concerns about a couple of areas, including, for example, the fact that this is by and large a centrally funded single force and, crucially, the need for the process of appointing the chief constable to be seen as robust and independent.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Chief constables will want strong governance and accountability, because a strong accountability mechanism that is routed back to elected members and the people gives legitimacy to policing by consent and gives the police the authority to do what they do. After all, they tend to be the agency that employs coercive force on citizens and strong and transparent governance and accountability are critical to giving them the right operational independence. I think that that is best achieved through the local level and through elected members, but certainly policing will look to be held strongly to account.

In recent years, the lengths of the legs of the tripartite or three-legged stool that we have hung on to have become different, with a strengthening of the central Government rather than the local leg. The bill seems like a step towards following that particular route through.

Jenny Marra: Is a non-departmental public body the ideal model for designating police?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: An NDPB would work, but the question is less if it is structured than what it comprises and how people get into it.

The Convener: Members have been very patient. I call Roderick Campbell, John Finnie and Alison McInnes. Believe it or not, Alison, you are on my list—I know that it seems like you have been waiting for a long time.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): I want to take up with Alison Payne the issue of just how big the Scottish police authority should be. Scotland’s local authorities vary in size from Clackmannanshire to Glasgow, but nevertheless you suggest that the police authority should comprise at least one representative from each of those local authorities—I do not know whether you think Glasgow should have more than one—as well as Scottish Government representation by ministers or civil servants. However, you do not mention the involvement of anyone else with skills and expertise. Is that not perhaps a little impractical? If you are not going to include others with skills and expertise on the authority, you are replacing one body of which you are critical with another that is simply lopsided.

Alison Payne: Do you feel that the councillors who are currently on the joint boards do not have the necessary skills and expertise?

The Convener: The answer to that is probably yes.

Roderick Campbell: Why is it right for Glasgow City Council to have only one representative and for Clackmannanshire Council also to have one?

Alison Payne: We accept that our local authorities are diverse—we have done work on that at a local government level—but we have structured our response to the bill to reflect the current structure of local government. There are a number of issues to do with local government in Scotland that need to be considered, but we believe that policing should reflect the current local government structure. Ideally, there should be a representative from each local authority on the board, so that they have an input. That would be our preference. However, perhaps there is a middle ground whereby there could be a committee for each of the current eight forces, and they could be represented on the board, ensuring that it would have locally elected representation.

We accept that a board comprising 32 members based on the current structure of local government, plus additional members, would be huge. We are not kidding ourselves that that would work; we are simply saying that that is the structure of local government in Scotland. If there is a middle way, that would be better than what is proposed as long as the local electorate knew who their voice was on the board.

Roderick Campbell: What about the issue of skills and expertise? That does not feature in your model of a police authority; you have just got local people and civil servants from the Scottish Government on the board.

Alison Payne: At the moment, councillors are responsible for housing, local education and other local government functions. If you want to remove functions from local government because you do not believe that the participants have the necessary skills, that is another issue. However, we believe in local accountability, which means having councillors on the board.

Roderick Campbell: What do the rest of the witnesses think about the balance between local and national accountability and the general skills and expertise that are required on the SPA?
Dr Scott: Initially, it would make sense to use the experience of local councillors who have been conveners of police boards. My personal view is that, in the longer term, it may not be necessary to specify a local government presence, but it makes sense initially to make use of that experience, especially during the critical period of transition and change.

Professor Fyfe: I echo that. A lot of expertise has been built up over many years through local authorities’ involvement with police boards, and it is vital that we make use of that in the transitional period. That will be a critical time in the implementation of the new police service.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: The support that is provided to an independent police authority will be important as well. We ask elected members—whether MSPs or councillors—to be a Jack-of-all-trades in representing the interests of their communities and constituencies across a range of issues. Getting people up to the required level of knowledge, skill and insight in something as complex as policing can take quite a while and those people cannot be immersed in it full time because they have other things to do. The support of officials and the support infrastructure around performance, finance and such things will therefore be very important in helping the elected members to discharge their obligations by providing detailed briefing.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (SNP): My question is for Professor Fyfe and Assistant Chief Constable Finlay and concerns the tensions that can exist between certain elements in any system, old or new. We have heard about accountability and ministerial direction. Professor Fyfe, you state in your written submission that the bill will “secure and maintain ‘constabulary independence’.”

You go on to say that it “embodies a fundamental principle that Scottish Ministers should not issue directions to the Authority in respect of a specific police operation or the way in which the Police Service is carrying out a specific operation.”

We know that ministerial power of direction is common across the public service. How can ministers exercise the will of Parliament without that power?

Professor Fyfe: Can I pass that over to Ken?

He drafted that bit.

The Convener: You are passing the buck—Mr Scott, you will notice that he called you Ken when he was passing it over.

Dr Scott: Yes, he is always very polite when he is putting me in it.

That statement repeats the wording in the bill, and brings us back to the dilemma around constabulary independence, which I mentioned earlier. We do not live in an ideal world, so such things are not 100 per cent one way or the other, and there is a balance to be maintained. However, there is rightly suspicion among the public about politicians telling chief constables what to do. Equally, it is a valid point that Governments are elected on policies, some of which have to do with maintaining law and order and dealing with crime.

It is a question of the level of generality at which such direction or advice may be offered. It would be quite appropriate—as has happened—for the Government to say, “We have a concern about the growth of serious organised crime in Scotland, and we would like the chief constable to take account of that.” That is different from saying, “This is what you will do in order to counter the growth of serious organised crime.”

John Finnie: And the minister would be reflecting the will of Parliament.

Dr Scott: Yes.

John Finnie: I want to ask Mr Finlay about policing in the north of Ireland. If I have noted it correctly, you said that the area commanders were chief inspectors and the district commanders were chief superintendents. We have received a lot of information to suggest that there could be tensions between certain areas based on the police hierarchy. Was it a conscious decision by Patten to have the same rank in each area, or was that subsequently developed by the PSNI?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: The history is that the eight districts and the eight district commanders, which is the situation that we have now, developed post-Patten. Patten used the terms “area commander” and “district commander”. When the PSNI was first formed, we had an area commander for each of the 26 councils. The rank of those commanders and the size of the areas varied depending on the geography and the nature of each council. We moved from a dispersed model to brigade those in a structured way, and we now have the eight district commands. They might have been better called area commands—we should perhaps have used your language rather than the other way round.

The district commands carve up the space of Northern Ireland into eight chunks. Each of those is coterminous with a number of the councils, and each council area has a chief inspector. Not all council areas have their own chief inspector; in some cases, one chief inspector will cover more than one council area. The legislation designates the area commander as “a rank not less than that of chief inspector.”
That will change in due course as the Northern Ireland Assembly examines the council structure, as it has undertaken to do.

We did not start from there: we ended up with that model because we were ahead of the game. Northern Ireland was going to rationalise its public administration and go down to seven councils. We moved ahead of that, and then the political decision was taken not to do that. That is how we ended up with eight areas: there were going to be seven councils, but we split Belfast into two districts. It is part of the history of the review of public administration, and is linked to getting what we think are the right spans of command and brigading those. Each of the eight districts will have broadly similar resource structures.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Was the decision to move to that structure taken in light of what I presume was the Assembly’s intention to move to seven councils?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Was the decision to move to that structure taken in light of what I presume was the Assembly’s intention to move to seven councils?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Was the decision to move to that structure taken in light of what I presume was the Assembly’s intention to move to seven councils?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Two different processes went on. The review of public administration was an Assembly/Executive-driven process, which the councils were fully involved in, because they were to be reduced from 26 to a much smaller number. It was because of the difficulties in getting engagement with some of the councils that the decision was taken to walk away from that. The proposal is now back in the programme for government, but it involves a different number of councils—off the top of my head, I think that the figure is 11, rather than the seven that was envisaged initially.

We had recognised that we needed to reorganise to make better use of resources and to change our spans of control, our rank ratios and how we organised ourselves. We moved ahead of the game. We went to that structure and then local government did not go to the same structure, but we have stuck with that structure and we will continue to stick with it until we see what happens in due course with local government structures and what functions councils are vested with in the future. As I said, the functions of councils in Northern Ireland are significantly different from the functions of a Scottish council.

John Finnie: Given that the reform of the local authorities did not go ahead—

The Convener: Before you go ahead with that, you asked an interesting question, which I do not think was answered—I am not saying that not all your questions are interesting.

John Finnie: I will remember that.

The Convener: I think that you asked about a pecking order of ranks. If I am right, you asked whether, if the divisional commanders are of different rank and someone with more scrambled egg and braid asks for something from central resources, such a request will command more weight than a request from a divisional commander who is of a lower rank. Was that not your question? I thought that you asked about a pecking order.

John Finnie: No—

David McLetchie: It is a good question, though.

The Convener: I know.

John Finnie: With respect, I feel that Mr Finlay answered that very adequately. I asked about the parity of the two.

The Convener: If you did, I got lost. I was waiting for the answer to that.

John Finnie: Yes, it was about everyone of a certain designation being the same rank, so we have the chief superintendents for the divisions and the chief inspectors for the districts.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: The convener asked for clarity on whether that meant that a commander in one area could lever in more resource because they had more influence as a result of having a higher rank. The answer to that is probably no, because we have regional assistant chief constables. They are the people you work with in your management team—they oversee the whole of that—so, at that stage, their rank leverage did not have an impact.

We resolved all that in 2006, when we moved to the current structure of eight districts, with chief superintendents—

The Convener: So they are all the same rank.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: They are all the same rank.

The Convener: I need to be told things simply.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: It is now the case that they are all the same rank. We moved from a more patchwork model to a universal model.

The Convener: But that is not what the bill proposes.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: No.

The Convener: Should it?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: In Northern Ireland, the structure and the size are significantly different, so I do not think that the pattern that we have used can necessarily be replicated.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to comment on whether all the commanders should have the same rank?

Dr Scott: Increasingly in policing, the role and function that someone carries out is what matters, rather than the rank that they have. I know that the public perception is that ranks are still extremely important, but my feeling, as someone who has worked with police forces quite a lot, is that, at certain levels, ranks are slightly less important on the inside than they are on the outside. What is important is the function, the boundaries of that function and what is expected of the people who fulfil that function. I am sure that there are many chief inspectors who can argue their case just as effectively as chief superintendents.

The Convener: We have got that on the record now.

John Finnie: Now that you have moved to that model, is there any push to revert to a previous model? You say that the present model has been in place since 2006. Is there any dissatisfaction?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: No. We have not had any great push. The eight commanders have had to work with the councils, the chief executives and the district policing partnerships to manage people’s expectations and make them appropriate to the roles that people undertake. There was always a demand from people for the commander to come to their meetings, but the commander covers a large span of Northern Ireland and the appropriate person to go to the meeting might be the inspector, or it could be the area commander as the chief inspector. It took time to get buy-in to that approach, but we have built and sustained local relationships and demonstrated that those people have the capacity and capability to change things in their local area by using the tools within the organisation.

John Finnie: “Local” is seen as an extremely positive word, as we heard from Ms Payne. Is it correct to say that you would not expect your local police areas to have plans on human trafficking, terrorism, drugs or cybercrime, which would be covered in larger plans?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Indeed. The local is based on what local communities feed into the district policing partnership. It is about the volume issues that we deal with in terms of visibility and responsiveness, and key issues around antisocial behaviour, burglary and car crime, particularly speeding. There are local plans for those things.

There are organisational plans on counterterrorism, people trafficking and serious organised crime. All those big issues happen somewhere on the ground, and there is a connection with the local neighbourhood constable who feeds information and intelligence back up within the organisation. That information is assimilated, which allows things to happen.

All the people who commit crime and all the people who are vulnerable live somewhere and have some rooting in the geography, so the local has an essential role to play. On a day-to-day basis, officers deal with the volume issues and suchlike, but their local knowledge of what is happening in their area, who lives there and the changes that are happening there is imperative to the national.

John Finnie: If it is not possible to implement the local plan with the resources that are available, how is that dealt with?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: That is usually dealt with on a tasking and co-ordinating basis. People bid for resources, if you like, from the centre, whether that is for roads policing, for specialist uniform support or for additional detectives from serious crime to work on a particular case. Wherever the requirement emits from, there will be a bid for additionality against a justified business case, and we will prioritise the need with a view to fulfilling as many requirements as we can. We seek to strike the right balance with regard to not just threat and risk but geography, which is also important.

John Finnie: You used the term “business case”. Just to be clear, is that an evidenced position that does not relate to the rank of the individual local commander?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Absolutely.

The Convener: I have got that sorted in my head now. Rank does not count. Is that not true? I ask the police officers in front of us to agree that rank does not count. I am sure that they will agree. [Laughter.]

Graeme Pearson: We saw that at our last meeting.

David McLetchie: Yes.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: We prioritise threat and risk in a measured and structured way, and that is how we allocate additional resources to a particular task for a particular period of time. Locally, we can also use tools such as overtime.

The Convener: I know that Alison Payne wants to come in, but I want to move on. Perhaps she can chip in with her comments later.
Alison McInnes has been so patient. She has almost knitted a jumper—not that she has been doing that; that is not on the record, Alison. You have been paying close attention for hours. On you go.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): Thank you, convener. I have a couple of questions on any lessons that can be learned from the police reforms in other European countries. Mr Finlay spent some time at the beginning of the meeting talking about how the new Police Service of Northern Ireland had to build confidence. He said that a great deal of work needed to be done. In contrast, in Scotland, there is significant confidence in the police, so we do not have that problem.

We are about to introduce to the system strong political direction, which has not previously existed in it. The minister responsible for justice will appoint the chair and members of the SPA—provided that it has a complete budget—and approve the policing plan. Does that reform put at risk our confidence in the police service in Scotland?

Dr Scott: Personally and from an operational perspective, until it begins biting on the ground—if it ever does—I am not sure whether the vast majority of people would notice.

Alison McInnes: We know from the Danish research that public satisfaction with local policing fell dramatically as a result of reform: public confidence in the police as a whole fell by 14 per cent over the three years during which the reform was implemented. Does Dr Scott think that there are lessons to be learned from that?

Dr Scott: I will do what Nick Fyfe did to me earlier and let him answer.

The Convener: I have heard someone say something similar before: “I agree with Nick.”

Professor Fyfe: We have done a lot of work on police reform in other parts of the world, in particular in Europe. It is disappointing that there is remarkably little evidence on and systematic evaluation of police reform, although Denmark and Finland commissioned long-term studies of its impact.

Denmark is an interesting case. The University of Copenhagen was commissioned to do a four-year study of the reform programme’s impact. As Alison McInnes alluded to, one of the things that it tracked was citizens’ perceptions of local policing, including local visibility. It also focused on officers’ knowledge of local crime and policing problems and discovered that, as a result of police-force mergers, officers’ knowledge of local neighbourhoods decreased dramatically, which began to undermine trust and confidence.

The study made some other interesting findings. It looked at the impact of the police-force mergers on police officers. It was agreed in Denmark that police officers did not have to relocate to the new regional headquarters; they were allowed to remain in their local policing areas. An unanticipated effect of that was that they had problems staffing many of the specialist policing functions that take place at a regional headquarters, because a lot of officers were not prepared to disrupt their family lives by commuting longer distances to work. Deployment of resources during the period of transition was an issue.

The work in Finland revealed that senior officers’ perception of the impact of reform was different from that of more junior officers. Senior officers tended to be quite positive about it and what it was achieving, but there was a significant decrease in the morale of junior officers during the reform process, partly because they felt that there was a lack of communication about what was happening and partly because there was a huge degree of uncertainty about what their jobs might entail.

The useful lessons from those studies are that you will need to monitor the implementation process carefully, to recognise that the way in which a reform is implemented will have different effects in different locations, and to realise that there is value in tracking the impact of reform so that, if things are not going as intended and amendments need to be made, you can introduce revisions to the process.

Alison McInnes: May I continue, convener?

The Convener: I feel that I should let you go on, because you have been waiting to speak for such a long time.

Alison McInnes: I believe that policing is part of the local authority family for good reason, at present. Modern policing carries out a lot of preventative work that links to social work, education, criminal justice and even the work of the fire and rescue service, which are all local authority responsibilities. The evidence from Denmark is that there is less time for preventative activity when there is no local police presence. Our community planning processes are quite well developed. What risks are involved and can you suggest safeguards for us to insert in the bill that would ensure that reform does not spoil the community planning networks?

Dr Scott: To come back to local policing, an issue that has emerged during consideration of the bill is that the more important local relationship is not between the local council and the police but between the community planning partnership and... the police. However, I believe that I am right that the bill says little—if anything—about that significant relationship. It could be argued that, at local level, the police's prime link should be not with the local council—which is, after all, also part of the CPP—but with the CPP itself. There is a risk in that only one of the partners in the partnership is restructuring and reorganising, so a great deal of care needs to be taken to ensure that the impact of restructuring of policing has no adverse effect, that the other partners understand what is happening with policing and that policing is flexible enough to fit in. The police do not lead on all areas at local level—for example, child protection might be led by social work—so in restructuring for whatever reason, the police must accommodate the links that are not going to change and ensure a seamless transition. The point about CPPs is that budgets are getting tighter, local authorities should still be able to weigh up priorities and be able to choose to put resources not into the police but into, say, criminal justice, social work, improving housing or other measures that can help to prevent crime in the first place. However, they will not be able to do that under the current proposals, and I think that that is a risk.

Alison McInnes: That was useful.

Alison Payne: On resources, we believe that, given all the areas that link into policing and the fact that budgets are getting tighter, local authorities should still be able to weigh up priorities and be able to choose to put resources not into the police but into, say, criminal justice, social work, improving housing or other measures that can help to prevent crime in the first place. However, they will not be able to do that under the current proposals, and I think that that is a risk.

Alison McInnes: Can Mr Finlay quantify the amount of time the PSNI spends on community planning and preventative work?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I am not sure that I can do that, but I can say that Northern Ireland is particularly envious of Scotland's CPPs. Northern Ireland has neither those statutory partnerships nor the crime and disorder reduction partnerships that exist in England and Wales, so it is extremely difficult to achieve partnership working there.

On the back of the review of public administration and moves to reduce the number of councils in Northern Ireland, there was a lot of interest in, and activity on, the community planning model that was adopted in Scotland and there were many mutual exchanges in order to develop such a system. However, all that came to an end when the plans for local authority reform fell. I would guard against putting in place anything that might dilute something that is so valuable that you do not actually realise how valuable it is until you do not have it any more.

As for being able to quantify prevention work, I think that our primary purpose is to prevent crime and prevent people from coming to harm. Even police patrols and police visibility are all about prevention; for example, road patrols are all about modifying people's behaviour on the roads. As a result, it is very difficult to quantify our prevention work. We have crime prevention officers who deal specifically with prevention, but part of the raison d'être of policing is to keep people safe.

The Convener: Two members want to ask brief questions on issues that have not been raised, but I am afraid that I cannot take supplementary questions if the committee wants to finish at a reasonable time. Graeme Pearson has a question on forensic science and Rod Campbell has one on VAT. I am sure that Rod knows that the Finance Committee is dealing with VAT in relation to the bill.

Graeme Pearson: Last week we heard evidence that people are in a quandary about the separation of forensic science from a chief constable's ambit and direction. There seems to be anguish about it. I think that in Northern Ireland forensic science is independent of the PSNI. How have you resolved who directs and who is responsible for management of crime investigation using forensic science?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: There are regular meetings between the director, the deputy chief constable and Drew Harris, who leads in the serious crime branch, about prioritisation of work in, and the capacity and capability of, the Northern Ireland forensic science service. In addition, as I understand it, there are mutual relationships with the forensic science set-ups in Scotland whereby their capacity is utilised, and vice versa with regard to specialisms that perhaps all laboratories do not need to have.

As you will be aware, the forensic science world has been thrown up in the air a wee bit with the Westminster decision to disband the Forensic Science Service in England and Wales, which has created some issues.

We work on the basis of having regular meetings to understand what the role of each organisation is. Those meetings feed up to the NI Department of Justice because the forensic science laboratory is a non-departmental body of the DOJ, which is where round-table discussions will take place if there is a resourcing issue.

Graeme Pearson: The crux is who makes the decisions at the crime scene. Is it fair to say that the police say what they want done and that forensic science dictates how it will be done?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Yes. The scene-of-crime aspect is dealt with internally in the PSNI. We have scenes-of-crime officers who do all the forensic recovery with partners, and will do that package in such a way that we can get the low-copy number DNA analysis, if that is appropriate. That process is directed by a forensic manager, who is part of the organisation, and the information then goes to the forensic science laboratory. I do not think that we should tell the laboratory scientists what to do, but we tell them what we want them to look for; it is then for them to decide the order of events in which things are processed to recover the best evidence.

Graeme Pearson: Do you manage the scenes-of-crime officers or are they managed by forensic science?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: We manage scenes-of-crime officers.

Graeme Pearson: Is that different from the setup in Scotland?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: Yes.

Roderick Campbell: The Police Service of Northern Ireland is able to recover VAT on supply of goods or services. What discussions have you had with the Treasury on that? Can you give advice to the Scottish Government on that issue?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I can tell you what I know about it.

The Convener: That is all we can expect.

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: It is a long-standing arrangement that affects not only the PSNI but other public services in Northern Ireland. The reason is the structure of public services in Northern Ireland. A centralised model was put in place some considerable time ago due to conditions in Northern Ireland over previous years during the troubles and so on. Centralised units were put in place such that, for example, housing came from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. That model included a decision being made—I do not know by whom or in what capacity—that we would be treated like a local authority. As a consequence of that, we recover VAT.

The Convener: Should the police perhaps ask the Scottish Government to treat it as a local authority?

Assistant Chief Constable Finlay: I think that—

The Convener: Anyway, I hear what you are saying.

Jenny Marra: Can I ask a brief supplementary?

The Convener: I am not taking supplementaries because I know that the Finance Committee is considering VAT in relation to the bill: forgive me. I suspend the meeting for 10 minutes. The next witnesses have been waiting for a long time.

11:39
Meeting suspended.

11:50
On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses and thank them for their patience. We are joined by Professor John McNeill, Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland, and Ian Todd, director of the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland; Andrew Laing, Her Majesty’s inspector of constabulary for Scotland, and Chief Superintendent David McCracken, principal inspection manager at HM inspectorate of constabulary for Scotland; and Robert Black, Auditor General for Scotland, and Miranda Alcock from Audit Scotland.

As panel members saw in the previous evidence session, your microphones will come on automatically when you indicate that you wish to speak. If you want to answer a question, please indicate that to me and I will call you to speak.

I thank you all for your written submissions. For anyone who thinks that the Justice Committee does not work, I am holding up the written submissions—this pile does not even include the additional pieces that have come through. I thank the Scottish Parliament information centre for an extremely helpful briefing paper on international comparisons of police reform.

Do members have questions? I will take John Finnie first this time, followed by Alison McInnes—you get in there, Alison—and Humza Yousaf.

John Finnie: Good morning, panel—it is still morning.

I have a question for Professor McNeill. It is important that the public have confidence that their complaints about individual police officers are properly investigated. Given that there remains a requirement for any matter suggesting criminality to be referred to the fiscal service, with a serious incident is there the potential for three layers of investigation?

Professor John McNeill (Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland): It is important to recognise at the outset that, when it comes to confirming public confidence in policing, the bill’s proposals raise the bar significantly through the establishment of an independent commissioner. There are a couple of areas in which we could strengthen it further, and Mr Finnie has referred to one of those areas.

At the moment I have a memorandum of understanding with the Crown, which works very effectively. I would have thought that this is a clear instance in which a well-defined MOU between the Crown and the new police investigations and review commissioner would strengthen the existing provision rather than confuse it further. However, that opens up a much wider area because, as you know, there is a provision in the bill for all serious incidents involving the police—serious incidents being defined as any indication that the police may have caused or contributed to the death or serious injury of an individual, serious injury that is suspected of happening in police custody, and the use of firearms—to be referred to the commissioner.

To avoid any confusion, I would recommend that rather than there being a provision for referral by the police, referral is mandatory—there is an automatic trigger. That would do a lot to confirm public confidence in policing. The basis on which all oversight bodies operate is that an automatic trigger refers such cases—those in which there is a suggestion that the police may have caused or contributed to death or serious injury, where there is a suspicion that serious injury has occurred in police custody, or where firearms have been used—in a mandatory manner to the independent body. That would go a considerable way to confirming public confidence in policing.

John Finnie: I will give you a specific incident, and you can tell us how you and your staff would respond to it.

For instance, a pre-planned police operation may involve authorised firearms officers being dispatched to a location in anticipation of an armed robbery. If, unfortunately, a police officer had to discharge their firearm, where would the investigation of the armed robbery and the investigation of the use of firearms be referred to? That would go a considerable way in confirming public confidence in policing.

The primary issue from my perspective is access to forensics. The bill currently provides for the Scottish police authority to make forensic services available to the police and to the Crown at no cost. I understand that it also provides that those services may be made available to the proposed independent investigations and review commissioner. However, if they were to be made available to the commissioner at cost, that could seriously disrupt the capacity of the independent body to carry out some investigations.

One thing that we need to nail at an early stage is that, in order to conduct any independent investigations—however complex they might be, and before we start getting into MOUs about who has primacy in some areas and who does not—we need to make a clear provision that the PIRC will be provided with forensic services free of cost and will therefore be operationally effective.

With regard to what happens in the investigation of the crime, and in relation to satisfying the public about the appropriateness of the police actions, we can learn a fair bit from the experiences of Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland and England and Wales.

I concede that I do not have any direct knowledge of how that operates. Perhaps Ian Todd can add to what I have said.

Ian Todd (Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland): The example that Mr Finnie gave is something that has happened in the past few days—

John Finnie: If there has been such an incident, that is not what I am alluding to. It is a general point.

Ian Todd: Okay, but it is that type of incident. The police must continue with the investigation of the crime. The investigation of the use of the firearm might currently involve an outside force. Given that there will not be an outside force in existence—and there are questions that arise from that under article 2 of the European convention on human rights—the bill proposes that PIRC would be responsible for carrying out the investigation around the use of that firearm.

The Convener: I need to know who or what “puck” is.

Ian Todd: Sorry—the PIRC is the police investigations and review commissioner, which is what the bill proposes to rename the current Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland.

I would envisage that, as happens now, there would be two twin-track investigations: one into the crime and one into the use of the firearms. It is important that proper MOUs exist between the new body—the PIRC—and the police force to ensure that neither of those investigations would be compromised or hampered.

Professor McNeill: One element that must be strengthened to ensure that that happens is the requirement for the police—and the proposed Scottish police authority—to co-operate fully with the new independent body. Currently, a fair amount of that is expected to be addressed in regulations.
It is crucial that, up front, no gap opens up between the police and the independent investigative body and that no time is lost in investigating any alleged incidents.

12:00

Such considerations would be strengthened if the bill required the police service of Scotland and the Scottish police authority to have a duty to co-operate. If we had the combination of mandatory referrals for serious incidents involving the police, free forensic services and a requirement for the police to co-operate, a lot of other matters could be addressed in detailed memorandums of understanding. Indeed, such a package would strengthen public confidence in policing at a time of fundamental change.

John Finnie: That kind of public confidence is important. Do you envisage such memorandums of understanding covering every effort to avoid duplication?

Professor McNeill: It is in no one’s interest to have duplication of effort, not least because it is an additional expense on the public purse and a waste of scarce specialist resources. Moreover, it sends out very confusing messages to the public and it is crucial to have clarity about who has primacy. If, as I recommend, the bill’s provisions governing referral to the independent body are strengthened by requiring it to be mandatory in all serious incidents, if the police and police authority are subject to a duty to co-operate and if the forensics are available at no extra charge, the independent body has a real chance of confirming its independence and impartiality.

John Finnie: Do you envisage people from your department attending the locus of such events?

Professor McNeill: Yes. Indeed, that is the norm in other oversight bodies.

This brings me back to my point about the police having a duty to co-operate fully with the new independent body. We do not want any delay in securing the crime scene or the possibility of erosion of evidence. I should make it clear that this is not my area of expertise—I have no investigative background—but other oversight bodies have demonstrated that with the police’s co-operation and through an on-call service they have been able to secure scenes. They can be at the scene very quickly and, thereafter, can take control and have primacy.

John Finnie: So you would envisage your department having primacy.

Professor McNeill: In the categories that are set out, it is essential that the independent body has primacy. Otherwise, we simply retain the current system in which, in effect, the police investigate the police.

Andrew Laing (Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland): Although HMIC largely supports the bill’s proposals, I support Professor McNeill’s call for clarity and his suggestion that referrals to the PIRC be mandatory. However, with regard to the example of a shooting during a pre-planned firearms operation, we must be aware of the many tensions within that. First of all, there is the initial crime, the investigation of which is under the direction of the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service; there might also be a subsequent crime, depending on the legality of the shooting. The PIRC would absolutely have a locus in providing an independent response—as, indeed, an independent force would do at the moment—but it would do so in concert with the Crown agent with responsibility for directing the investigation. In that case, it would be up to the Crown to sort out primacy. That would not happen quickly, and the important thing will be to secure both scenes quickly in a way that allows the best preservation of evidence.

As I said, there are tensions. If the bill is very prescriptive in setting out who has primacy and in determining powers that individuals have, we will not have the flexibility that will be necessary if we are to be able to adapt. We must be careful in that regard. The PIRC will be very new, and we need to allow it to evolve. If it is set in legislation, it will be difficult to unravel it.

The position that I am promoting is that the general principle should be set out, and the bill should not be overly prescriptive.

The Convener: Graeme Pearson has a question on this specific point. After that, I will let Alison McInnes in. She had to wait a long time last time.

Graeme Pearson: Given that we are aiming for April 2013, is there sufficient time for the necessary recruitment and preparation to ensure that the PIRC will be in place in time?

Professor McNeill: Subject to a number of important conditions being met, the answer is yes. In the Republic of Ireland, the Garda Síochána oversight commission required six months to develop an investigative capacity. The clock started ticking on those six months with the appointment of a head or director of investigations, who was someone who already had considerable experience of carrying out investigations. That individual had sufficient resources allocated to them to ensure that the commission was set up properly.

The provision in the bill is for some £2 million to £4 million to establish the investigative capacity, based on the notion that there might be around 35 investigations a year. If you have enough money to appoint the body of investigators that you need for that, and sufficient time, that will be doable. One of the weaknesses in the current provision is that it is less clear that there will be sufficient for set-up costs, as opposed to running costs. For example, there are fairly heavy demands with regard to securing suitable and secure information technology, and there will be other issues to do with the accommodation and equipment that is required in order to get that body up and running.

Overall, the task is doable. The timeframe is tight, and the question of whether it can be met will be determined largely by how quickly an investigations and review commissioner is appointed. That individual will appoint a head of investigations, who will start to assemble the apparatus. In fairness, we have already scoped some of the work and have shared our experiences and the experiences of the other oversight bodies with the Crown, the forensic services, the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency and the Scottish Government. Currently, we are working with the Crown and ACPOS on a Government-led project to make a reality of the proposals.

Alison McInnes: A couple of my points have already been explored.

The confidence in the independence of the new police complaints commissioner is important. It is important that it is there from the outset rather than being layered in after the new police authority has been set up. However, as you have commented, a number of things in the bill that relate to the new service rely on statutory instruments being introduced down the line. Do you have a view on whether the things that would trigger investigations into serious incidents involving the police, for example, should be included in the bill?

Professor McNeill: I accept fully the primacy of the Crown in relation to the direction of investigations. That being said, there might be a slight difference between Andrew Laing and me with regard to how they are triggered. In some circumstances, I favour an automatic trigger. The definition of a serious incident is set out quite clearly in the bill as one in which there is an indication that the police may have caused or contributed to the death or serious injury of an individual, or in which there has been a serious injury in police custody or firearms have been used. I accept that it is by no means clear cut how the process should proceed, but I remain of the view that such circumstances should be specified as triggering a mandatory referral.

There are a number of other areas in relation to which it is possible to confirm the notion that the new body will be independent. There is an extremely important provision whereby the commissioner will be able to carry out public interest investigations. That could move Scotland from being at the rear of the pack to being the front-runner. I think that we can go further. The bill talks about the commissioner holding public interest investigations when certain things have not happened. Perhaps not unexpectedly, I recommend that no qualification should be placed on that. It should be a matter for the commissioner what investigations are carried out in the public interest. Again, there is a clear link to the role and the primacy of the Crown.

Alison McInnes: That was helpful—thank you.

Andrew Laing: Just for clarity, I am comfortable with the mandate that Professor McNeill is talking about. There should be scope, outwith that mandate, for others to make referrals as and when they feel that it is in the public interest to do so. I do not think that we are in any disagreement on that.

The Convener: Can you give me an example of what it might be in the public interest to investigate?

Professor McNeill: I do not anticipate that the power would be used very often. The bar to trigger its use would have to be pretty high. There might be public concern about, for example, the use of kettling by the police. In Scotland, we are fortunate in that we have not had widespread concern about kettling, notwithstanding the fact that I have recently published a complaints-handling review which it would be used very often. The bar to trigger its use would have to be pretty high. There might be public concern about, for example, the use of kettling, notwithstanding the fact that I have recently published a complaints-handling review that dealt with the issue.

The provision might be used to investigate an issue such as that or some systemic, on-going concern about police practices. It might be used to investigate a suggestion that there were blanket practices in the police—in regard to handcuffs, say. It is difficult to determine the circumstances in which it would be used. What is crucial, and what distinguishes Scotland from some of the other jurisdictions, is that no ministerial direction is required for such an investigation to be held. This is a matter for the commissioner. The fact that there has been no attempt on the part of Government ministers to have any qualification on the use of the power moves Scotland ahead of places such as the Republic of Ireland.

The Convener: Sometimes we get into extremely technical language. Members of the public might like to know what is meant by certain things, and an example helps with that.

Humza Yousaf: My question is largely directed at the Auditor General, but I am, of course, happy for any of the witnesses to respond to it.
If I went outside on the street and asked 100 people, "Who sits on your local police board?", I would be astounded if one person could tell me anyone who sat on their local board so, in my view, although we have local representation, there is still a degree of accountability deficit. What reason for that did the Auditor General find in his report? How do we overcome it?

Robert Black (Auditor General for Scotland): Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to respond to that question, because I think that it strikes at the heart of one of the most important issues that the committee will consider: the democratic accountability of a single police force in Scotland.

Although I would prefer not to look back too much but to concentrate on looking forward, I will begin by looking back very briefly. As committee members will be aware, Audit Scotland has conducted best-value reviews of each police authority in Scotland on behalf of the Accounts Commission, which is formally responsible for the oversight of local authorities. We found a mixed picture. We found that some police authorities are strong in some aspects of their work and others are strong in other aspects. It is difficult to generalise, and we need to recognise that the local circumstances and context of each police authority differ. Even within a police authority, the circumstances of individual local authorities differ.

My second point is not something that has emerged from Audit Scotland reports, but I venture to make it from my long experience in local government as a local authority chief executive. Councillors, perfectly properly, are concerned primarily with the interests of their community and their local authority. That tends to mean that the commitment that they can give to the governance role of policing is limited. They do not necessarily have the background to be able to fulfil that role, and the pressure on the diary means that they might not always have the time to do so.

I commenced my written submission with quite a strong statement for an Auditor General. I said:

"the Scottish Parliament should have a much greater role in providing democratic oversight of the new national force than is currently proposed."

I went on to remind us all that the Scottish Parliament operates in a very democratic way. It is open to the public, meetings are televised and Official Reports are produced. Somewhere in there, there must be a really good model for ensuring that there is no democratic deficit in Scottish policing.

From my reading of Official Reports from this and other committees, it seems that there is, understandably, much concern about the proper role of councillors in the oversight of policing. I recognise and respect the role and, as a former local authority chief executive, I would value it, but there must also be a significant critical role for this Parliament. You, ladies and gentlemen, are elected to represent the community of Scotland and you are by far and away the best-placed people to take the lead in holding the new Scottish police service to account on behalf of the people of Scotland.

In my submission I suggested two or three models, about which you might want to think seriously. There might not be time to go into that today. However, as we look to the future—and this brings me back to Mr Yousaf’s question—there is an opportunity to create a democratic forum at the level of the Scottish Parliament, which has a profile with the people of Scotland and will be recognised and trusted for what it does to hold the service to account.

Humza Yousaf: I appreciate your comments. You mentioned difficulties with the involvement of councillors in governance, given their diaries and their interest in local communities. Does the same not apply to MSPs? Might we fall into the same trap?

Robert Black: Yes, indeed. There is an issue in that regard. I observe your work at close quarters on a daily basis, and I am conscious of the huge pressures on your time. That is why I suggest in my paper that we might need to think about some kind of vehicle within the Parliament, which would have a specific focus aside from what we might call the on-going issues to do with the making of legislation and policy, and which could sit back from time to time and consider objectively the performance of policing in Scotland and the relationships with local communities. The approach would require careful attention, but the situation merits it.

Humza Yousaf: I am sure that the convener wants to move on to other questions, but—

The Convener: No, this is an important issue. The proposal is interesting and, given the pressure on parliamentary committees and their personnel, it needs substantial consideration.

Humza Yousaf: On that point, what about going down the route of the public appointments process? The Auditor General seemed fairly happy with that, in the context of his role.

Robert Black: Are you talking about appointing members of the Scottish police authority or the chief constable?

Humza Yousaf: Sorry, I should have clarified that I meant the Scottish police authority.
Robert Black: Let me try to help your thinking on the matter. There are some parallels between the need to preserve the independence of the Auditor General and the need to preserve the independence of the chief constable and the discretion that is available to the Scottish police authority. Ever since I became Auditor General, I have said that the greater the independence of judgment that is given to office-holders, the more important it is to have good systems of accountability, so that they are held to account for their decisions and for the use of resources. That is certainly true for the post of Auditor General, and I think that it will be at least as true for the chief constable and the Scottish police authority.

I have an Audit Scotland board, which consists of me in my official capacity, the chair of the Accounts Commission in his official capacity and three non-executives—we do not need a big board—who are appointed by the Scottish Parliament through the Scottish Commission for Public Audit. That means that the board has a non-executive majority, and it has the full confidence of the Parliament because it was the Parliament that appointed it.

I am conscious that, in making such comments, one tries to go with the grain of the legislation, but I encourage the committee to seriously consider whether it might play a role, at the very least in confirming the confidence that the Parliament has in the members who are appointed to the police authority. People need to have confidence in those being appointed, and the general public would, I think, welcome the committee having such a role.

Yet again, that was a rather long answer, but this is an important issue. I am comfortable with the public appointments process—it has great strengths—but I wonder whether it could be flexed a bit, to allow the Parliament to be satisfied with the make-up of the board.

The Convener: Would that be a process along the lines of the one for the appointment of the Scottish Information Commissioner, which has to be ratified by the whole Parliament?

Robert Black: It most certainly could be.

This is such an important issue that I want to add one more thing, while I am in full flow, and then I will be quiet. I understand that there is a genuine concern to ensure that that independence of the chief constable is safeguarded, and I again encourage the committee to think about the parallel with the Auditor General. Members might know that I am demitting office fairly soon, and that there is a process under way to appoint my successor. An appointments panel, chaired by the Presiding Officer, will go through a rigorous process. Once a candidate has been identified, the Presiding Officer will put a motion to the Parliament, which will then vote on it, and the candidate’s name will be presented to Her Majesty and the appointment will be made by the Crown. That person will have secure tenure of office for eight years.

I have never felt that the arrangement compromises me at all but, at the same time, I have never felt that it does not make me accountable to the Parliament through the Scottish Commission for Public Audit and the Public Audit Committee. There are arrangements that guarantee independence without the need to define in statute such things as operational independence, which is almost impossible anyway—otherwise it would have been done by now.

Professor McNeill: I have a long-standing interest in this area, having been on a police authority, studied police authorities and looked at other models, including the Northern Ireland one. This is a critical element of the bill, opening up as it does the potential for a strong axis between the police authority and the investigations and review commissioner to raise the standard of complaints handling, but that is predicated on the competence of the authority. I am not making light of any suggestion of a democratic deficit, but my primary concern is that the individuals on the Scottish police authority are competent, in the sense that they hold the command team to account. I have repeatedly said that there is a world of difference between hearing an account and holding to account. What characterises the current provisions leans more towards hearing an account than holding to account.

The Convener: We are all nodding—about police boards.

Professor McNeill: It is essential that the members of the police authority do not subscribe to any notion of operational independence. It is operational primacy. It is not a blank cheque. It is part of holding to account. They should hold the command team to account for the deployment of resources.

Andrew Laing: I am in grave danger of simply repeating what you have already heard, but the point is so important that perhaps I should do that. Perhaps I can give it a slightly different tint.

Last year, as a supplement to the best-value 2 reviews that we and Audit Scotland conducted jointly of authorities and forces, HMIC published a report on the governance and accountability of policing in Scotland. I do not wish to take up too much of your time, but I will paraphrase it. It stated that local elected members were highly interested in policing and were dedicated to it, but they were appointed to their positions through a process of election, not selection. We found deficits in relation to the professional knowledge and competences that we might expect to see on a professional board, and that extended to some of the back-office support.

In professionalising the Scottish police authority, the bill will address much of that. However, that leaves the question of democratic accountability. If we have a completely professional board, where does democracy come in? There are two areas in which I believe it can come in. The first is through the Parliament, which will have an oversight responsibility, and the Auditor General has suggested a number of ways in which that could be exercised. The second lies in some definition of what accountability is.

I am in danger of stealing Professor McNeill's adage about holding to account, but a clear statement is needed that accountability comes with consequences. In the model that is proposed at a national level, accountability of the chief constable has to be drawn by the board. The chief constable needs the freedom to exercise day-to-day management of his staff and resources, but that does not preclude those at a local level, including local authorities and elected members, from calling on local commanders to answer questions and provide reports.

At the moment, policing is largely self-regulated. Chief constables often provide police boards with reports according to their timescales and on subjects that they select, and they invite the boards to question them on those reports. We need to strengthen that significantly.

The other aspect is around operational independence and primacy. Professor McNeill and I tend to use different language, but I think that we largely agree. The question that has to be drawn out and answered in the bill is what the independence part means and what it will be independent from. As I think I said at the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, it is not independence from the citizen or the system of governance, but independence to exercise and execute the law free from undue influence. The bill does not go far enough in setting that out.

That presents two problems. The first is that we have evidence through some of the earlier reports that chief constables have the liberty of exercising their better knowledge of operational independence over boards. They can use it, in effect, as a defence mechanism. Secondly, in the absence of that definition, we will get into muddy waters at the Scottish police authority when we start to talk about the use and allocation of resources. The bill goes some way towards defining what is meant by independence, but there needs to be a clear statement that draws it closer together for the benefit of both parties.

The Convener: We look forward to somebody presenting us with an amendment on that.

I will take members in the order in which they put their hands up, because we are now mixing lots of questions and I do not think that there are any clear supplementaries. I have Rod Campbell, then Colin Keir, then Graeme Pearson, then Lewis Macdonald, then David McLetchie.

Roderick Campbell: We have heard a lot of evidence this morning about local accountability. Mr Black, I note that in your written submission you say that "a vital element" is provided by the "local policing plans to be considered by local authorities". However, you go on to say that "the SPA board could establish its own mechanisms for engaging with local communities and ... councillors."

Will you elaborate on what those mechanisms should be?

Robert Black: That is a good and somewhat challenging question. One must talk about the matter in context. It is very important that the members and officials of the proposed Scottish police authority be able quickly to build trust and confidence with local councillors, particularly if the model will be of the Scottish police authority being primarily a body that operates at national level.

It is extremely important that the members of the board get a good understanding of the real and proper concerns that councils will have in their areas, and that they have an informed discussion around that because the circumstances in local authority A will be significantly different from the circumstances in local authority B.

What kind of discussion might that be? For me, it would involve asking the local council about what issues are of major concern to it in respect of effective and proper policing in the interests of the safety of its community, and how that might be reflected in the local plan—the Scottish police authority must take an interest in that—and the national plan.

I understand that HMIC is working intensely on some key performance indicators for the police service. We welcome that and are supporting it, so the discussion could also be about what performance measures the local authority and councillors would want to be incorporated in the local plan and reflected in the national plan, so that we can have a good conversation about the performance of policing.

That is just to give an indication of the range of conversations that could take place. In the interests of time I will stop there, although I can think of other ways that local accountability could happen. However, that set of conversations is really important.

One other thing I would mention—

The Convener: I am sorry to interrupt, but if you have additional comments that you want to make that are not in your submission and that you have not given us in oral evidence, I ask you to write to the committee about them. That goes for all panel members.

Robert Black: I will take that opportunity.

Roderick Campbell: Could I ask about something else?

The Convener: I think that Mr Black has finished.

Robert Black: That is fine. I will stop there.

The Convener: If you have cut yourself off it would be helpful if you would give us the supplementary information in writing.

Professor McNeill: One area in which there is an opportunity to strengthen local accountability is in complaints handling. As I understand it, there is a requirement on the local commander to provide the local authority with statistical information about complaints, which the local authority can interrogate for patterns and trends. That will also give the local authority an opportunity to escalate any concerns, not just within the police on professional standards but to the Scottish police authority. Admittedly it is fairly narrow, but there is an opportunity to address complaints handling at local level.

Andrew Laing: Perhaps I can paint a bit of a picture that is more practical than what you would see from the bill. What we are talking about generally is a fundamental change to policing in Scotland; it will bring about a fundamental change to the governance system. However, governance is not just the board, and accountability is not just at the top and bottom levels—it is that whole thing about scrutiny, inspection, audit, performance reporting and how public those are.

My expectation of the proposals in the bill is that there will be a national policing plan, which will filter down to local-commander level. There will continue to be a close relationship between local commanders and local partners, although it is yet to be established whether that will come through community planning partnerships or some other body. Perhaps I can come back to touch on the pathfinders.

With regard to scrutiny, audit and inspection, HMIC will stop looking at eight forces and will start to look at 32 building blocks—the local authority areas. That will include performance information and best-value reviews at local level. Best-value reviews are based on the characteristics of good governance and good police forces. Within that, we will be looking to see how the relationships are. Although there is, in my view, no direct accountability at local level, there is an absolute need for a strong relationship, and we will report that back through the governance system and, ultimately, to the Scottish police authority.

Pathfinders have been set up within local authority areas to try to establish how that relationship can be built up. There is a danger, in some areas, that significant bureaucracy will be created, with a divisional commander of whatever rank servicing the needs of local policing, the community planning partnership, the local vulnerable people board and a new police committee. There is a grave danger that local commanders will be stuck in that bureaucracy and will not have time to pay attention to policing. At the moment, the pathfinders are set up to go in a number of directions. Some relate to community planning partnerships and some are new police committees. HMIC has a concern about how that will evolve over the coming period.

Chief Superintendent David McCracken (Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary for Scotland): To emphasise the role of Parliament, I should say, as Andrew Laing said, that we would submit the reports about best value and the effectiveness and efficiency of the police service not only to the Scottish police authority but to Parliament. There has been discussion about the mechanism by which Parliament would scrutinise, of course, but the point is that for the future service to be effective and efficient it has to be able to cater to local and national needs.

The Convener: Perhaps the next Justice Committee will have less legislation to deal with and will have time for other matters. At the moment, we are not really in that position.

Colin Keir (Edinburgh Western) (SNP): All the questions that I had written down have been answered, but there is one other question that I would like to ask.

With regard to national priorities and local priorities, councillors are always going to think about their local area and national politicians might think more about the strategic concerns. That will be reflected in the board; but how do you see that situation being resolved, when those two levels will be pulling in different directions?

Andrew Laing: I do not think that the situation will be greatly different from the situation that we have at the moment. Nationally, ACPOS creates a Scottish strategic assessment, which outlines the pressures that are building up around policing in the period ahead. That is disseminated among the forces, each of which adopts it and creates a force plan, which is disseminated among local... commanders who, in a slightly different way, create their local priorities and police towards them, and also take on board the views of local people, the community planning partnerships and so on. That will be perpetuated.

Will there be tensions? The independent review of policing, which was dealt with by this committee’s predecessor committee in 2009, highlighted those tensions. I suggest that there is always overdemand for policing. Everybody would like police on the beat—rightly so, because that provides confidence and reassurance. In the background, we know that we have more to do around serious organised crime, terrorism and crimes involving sexual offences and so on, which are hidden from the public eye.

The challenge is for the chief constable to devise a system that ensures that local and national needs are met, and for the governing body to hold them to account on that. As I said previously, tensions should be highlighted through the performance review scrutiny and audit mechanism. The system will deal with that.

Outwith that, on whether there should be an escalation or resolution mechanism in the bill, I genuinely believe that, on 95 per cent of occasions, the national and local plans will be reflective. They will not be completely different aspects. Where they are not reflective, the mechanism that is being designed will allow for communication back up through the system. That might mean that an individual goes to their local councillor, who then takes up the issue with the local commander. Alternatively, that person might go to an MSP, who takes the issue to the Scottish police authority. There are mechanisms built into the bill to allow that communication to take place.

The Convener: The national policing plan must have a degree of flexibility. In my patch—the Scottish Borders—the issues will not be about terrorism or serious organised crime. They are more likely to be road traffic accidents and vulnerable missing persons. In other patches, there will be different issues. I take it that, although there will be priorities in the national plan, flexibility will have to be built in for local areas. Consider the diversity of areas that members of the committee represent.

Andrew Laing: That is absolutely right. The majority of policing happens at the local level. Earlier, the committee heard evidence about Ireland. If we cast our minds back, we will see that the reality of counterterrorism is that it does not just happen in big cities; it also happens in the Borders and in central Scotland, for example. The local plans will focus on local issues that are absolutely important to local people and communities, but they must take cognisance of the overarching aims.

The Convener: I do not dismiss the prospects of such issues arising in those areas—heaven forbid that they do—but the volume and nature of policing will be different in different parts of the country.

Andrew Laing: Yes.

Robert Black: I simply want to reinforce your line of thinking, convener, and to return to the conversation that I had with Mr Campbell a few minutes ago. It is important that there is good dialogue between local commanders and councillors—with the involvement, as appropriate, of the Scottish police authority—about councils’ perception of the needs and priorities of their areas. It is also important that the chief constable, along with the SPA, help to give local commanders the confidence and skills to enter into such dialogue and to have a good discussion that builds local trust and confidence.

Some time ago, for another purpose, I asked someone in Audit Scotland to list all the things that police do; it came to a list of more than 50 things. Not all those activities are relevant to local policing in all parts of Scotland: for example, wildlife crime might be more relevant in one area than it is in another; royal and VIP visits tend to take place in some parts of Scotland and not in others; and counterterrorism activity appears randomly across the country. It is important that we build local diversity into the mesh of police planning, which is exactly the point that HMIC is making.

Chief Superintendent McCracken: Rightly, there is much discussion about the tension between local and national priorities, but there is a difference between a healthy tension and an unhealthy one. It is fair to say that there will be a set of ministerial priorities that many people will not recognise as being relevant to them. The bill contains certain facilities that go some way towards obviating the issue and, in our submission, we suggest other things.

For example, sequencing is important. We have said that, before the ministerial priorities are set, the Scottish ministers should pay due regard to the professional assessment of need that the service produces. At present, the bill says that the Scottish Government should consult people, but that provision should be strengthened. A professional and independent assessment of need throughout Scotland should be placed before ministers before they make the decision.

While we are talking about checks and balances, a second point is simply the fact that the service cannot be effective and efficient unless it manages to balance local and national need appropriately.

Graeme Pearson: I declare an interest, as a member of ACPOS and because all my previous writings and submissions are completely in sympathy with what Mr Black has said. I had no reason to expect that, so I am grateful for his submission today.

Mr Laing has indicated that governance is not only about the board. However, if we get the oversight and governance of the service right and that process is displayed in public view, that will form a healthy beginning to what will be a step change in how policing is delivered in Scotland. If policing is to be by consent, that consent can only be knowing, and that knowing can be based only on information.

The only model that we currently have in Scotland is the Scottish Police Services Authority, which was formulated largely by many of the people who have contributed to the bill that we are considering. I checked the website last week to find out what is going on in the SPSA—for public knowledge—and discovered that the most recent minutes were from June last year.

Given that the suggestion that Mr Black made in his submission would cause some inconvenience in trying to reorganise public governance and put some pressure on people in Parliament, does the panel have any view on whether it is worth the effort? Will we be satisfied instead that a minister will be in the very strong position of influencing the membership of the board, paying for the board, providing the budget and having the board be accountable to them?

The bill is silent on the citizen and on the duties of Parliament. Proper governance is the key issue in the bill, and I would welcome the panel’s view on that.

Professor McNeill: In my view, a board takes on a life of its own once it is established; it is not static. I will go back a little bit and talk about my experience of board appointments. The role of ministers in the process is perhaps overemphasised. It is the public appointments process, and there is a prioritised list. There may occasionally be attempts—it has happened most markedly in Northern Ireland—to reflect political realities, but in general, ministers throughout these islands have, in my experience, taken a fairly cautious approach.

As I mentioned, boards take on a life of their own, which means that they flex their muscles. I have had direct experience of boards holding officials to account. They can—and many do—account to the public by giving people an opportunity to question them; we heard from Alistair Finlay that that is quite common practice in Northern Ireland. They can also do that by moving around the country, and by checking their performance against that of other bodies such as the National Audit Office south of the border and the equivalent body here.

I am more of a glass-half-full person with regard to boards and their ability to hold people to account in a way that is not constrained by political whim.

Robert Black: You will not be surprised to hear that, as an auditor, I am more of a glass-half-empty person.

The Convener: You are smiling when you say it.

Robert Black: I will say simply that I think that Mr Pearson’s comment is absolutely on the button. As I mentioned earlier, the bill is significantly deficient in giving recognition to the role that the Scottish Parliament should play in holding the new policing system to account on behalf of the people of Scotland. I encourage you to give that issue serious consideration—as, I am sure, you will.

I will draw on the experiences that we took from the performance audit of the Scottish Police Services Authority that we carried out a couple of years ago. It is important to distinguish between the role of holding to account in governance terms—that is the Scottish Police Services Authority’s role of ensuring that the authority uses its resources properly, efficiently and in accordance with the Scottish police plan—and democratic accountability, which involves members of Parliament and councillors. I acknowledge and understand the arguments that the committee has heard for having councillors on the Scottish police authority, but I caution you and encourage you to bear in mind the distinction between the two functions.

It is important that the Scottish police authority has a clear task to undertake, which is to hold the police to account. That involves having the right skills and expertise around the table, independent of the chief constable, and it involves issues such as vetting and security clearance, so that the authority can get into the really important issues of Scottish policing in a way that is not possible in a forum such as this committee, almost by definition.

My report on the Scottish Police Services Authority commented on tensions in the composition of the SPSA’s board. We said that some key people on the board, such as chief constables and police conveners, sometimes came up against a tension or conflict of roles because of the offices that they held. Elected members on police boards or authorities have a duty to their councils and their constituents but, at the same time, they have a fundamental duty to support the board. That can lead to difficulties.
I will give one or two examples of scenarios that could arise—it is useful to do in our minds a stress test, as the private sector says, of what could happen. Let us say that local authority A challenges the Scottish police authority about the allocation of resources to its area. If a councillor from that area is a member of the authority, which way do they jump? Are they there to speak out on behalf of the local authority to which they were elected, or are they there to make the case for the police authority?

If a councillor from council B made representations to the police authority about the allocation of resources, but councillor A was a member of the authority, councillor A would have the inside straight in such a discussion. What role would councillor A play?

Another area in which a stress test is useful is civil unrest and policing of demonstrations, which I am sure has been mentioned in the committee’s discussions with others. If council C is concerned—rightly or wrongly—about police engagement in policing a demonstration or civil unrest, and a councillor from that council is on the police authority, what is that councillor’s role on the authority? Is it to represent their constituents and their local council? What happens if the unrest occurs in the area of council D, which is not represented on the authority? All sorts of tensions could be created, which need to be worked through. I am not sure whether all of us have thought clearly enough about that.

I return to the point that we must make a clear distinction between the governance arrangements, which the bill provides for well; in that respect, I think that the glass is more than half full.

The Convener: I am glad.

Robert Black: We must make a distinction between those arrangements and the separate set of arrangements for democratic scrutiny, which must involve members of the Parliament and councils, through the various mechanisms that we have begun to talk about today.

The Convener: Section 40 says that the SPA must lay its annual report before the Parliament, so it is open to any Justice Committee to call anyone to speak to that report. In the first parliamentary session, our predecessor committees often took evidence from Her Majesty’s chief inspector of prisons after he had laid an annual report, and they raised issues about particular prisons or the general rise in the prison population. That mechanism exists, but I caution that, as Mr Black knows, committees are under continual pressure, although they must make their own time to some extent.

As you were talking about having a councillor on the SPA, I was mindful of planning committees, on which members have a quasi-judicial role, which means that they either absent themselves when a planning issue arises in which they have an interest, or take no part in representing their constituents on the issue. Committee members might already be aware of examples of when it is difficult to have representatives on quasi-judicial, independent committees. Do you want to comment on that, Mr Laing?

Andrew Laing: I do not want to perpetuate the half-empty or half-full glass analogy, but as a member of the inspectorate I would be interested in what was in the glass and whether it was clean.

The Convener: Yes, indeed: the forensics and the questions of where and why. We are with you.

Graeme Pearson: And who pays for it.

Andrew Laing: Those are perhaps the points that Mr Pearson was driving at. I agree with Mr Pearson and have said throughout the programme of reform that the key is good governance. We have not necessarily had bad governance in the past, but it has not been as strong as it could be. As we move towards a national system, good governance will be essential.

It is interesting that that was the very question that the 1962 commission tried to resolve. We see in England and Wales a significant divergence in that the governance system has been put in place locally, whereas in Scotland we are moving more towards a national system. The biggest distinction is that in the Scottish police authority we are looking at a professionalised body and at competence, capacity and capability, whereas in England and Wales they are looking at a localised system. I think that we will see marked differences over the period.

There are two important aspects to that, the first of which is about democracy. I believe that there is scope in the bill for the democratic will and need of the people, reflecting the views of communities and citizens, to set priorities and to ask for and get reports on how policing performs against those. The key to governance is whether the chief constable will be properly held to account, whether the priorities that have been set will be achieved and whether that will be done in an effective and efficient way. We are probably talking largely about the same kind of thing across the board. The board must exercise significant strength in holding the chief constable to account.

On a slightly separate, spin-off note, we talked about all that the public appointment process brings and whether it is the right mechanism. One of the issues centres on the timescales that we have and is about how quickly we can pull everything together. We have asked how easy it will be to pull together the PIRC in the time... available. The same question must be asked about the police force itself.

At the moment, the timescale for the appointment of the chief constable, the chair and the support office for the chair is back-ended and loaded towards the latter part of this year. That is about putting the primary postholders in place. If that happens towards the latter quarter of this year, the support teams—the deputies, assistant chiefs, chief executives and so on—will come into place within only a few weeks of the force going live. I know that that is not a matter for the bill, but it is a significant area of concern that needs close attention paid to it.

The Convener: Thank you. That is now on the record.

Five more members want to ask questions. I am mindful of the time—I will not say that that is the end of the questions, but time is running on—so I ask for short questions and short answers. That request is not for people who are coming in for the first time, but for those who are re-entering the scene. Lewis Macdonald is next, then David McLetchie. Alison McInnes has been in before and I believe that John Finnie has been in before, then there is Rod Campbell. Those who are coming in for a second bite should ask shorter questions, but I am not putting a constraint—except for letting you know of my hunger—on those who are coming in for the first time.

Lewis Macdonald: Thank you, convener. I will take that into account. My question is for the Auditor General. We heard earlier this morning that in Northern Ireland the police board of 19 members was adequate and appropriate for carrying out the role of a national body for the PSNI and for operating important thematic committees such as those on human rights, professional standards and human resources. Clearly, those are important governance issues. Does the Auditor General have a view as to what size of board will be necessary in Scotland, given that the SPA, too, will presumably rely heavily on thematic committees? What number of board members will be necessary in order to deliver effective committees as well as an effective national authority?

Robert Black: This is an area in which I can be of assistance to the committee, because we produced a report, “The role of boards”, some time ago. It is a complicated issue. We looked at boards in a number of public sector bodies and found that they varied enormously in size and that it was difficult to specify an ideal number. It is important to balance the skills and expertise needed for a board to fulfil its governance function with ensuring that it has enough people to carry out the workload.

Interestingly, one of the statistics that we dropped into the report was that the average number of members on a FTSE 100 company board is about 11, which resonates with the bill. I am comfortable with that order of magnitude, but it will only be possible—I am sorry to sound like a stuck record—if we are clear that it is a board of governance, not a board of representation. If it becomes a board of representation, it will inevitably become much larger and, consequently, operate at two speeds at once. At the first speed it will focus on the governance role, while at the second speed it will focus on the role of holding to account on behalf of communities, which is really difficult.

A number of years ago—I am sure that members will recall this—the SQA went through an extremely difficult period. We did not do an audit of that, but one of the problems that struck me from observing it was that, when the SQA was originally constituted, it tended to be a large representative board with lots of interests on it and, frankly—this was not the fault of anyone on the board—it lost the ability to do the tight governance role, to measure risk management and to hold the executives to account. Of course, we know what the consequences were. I think that the bill has it about right on the board of governance.

Finally, I find it interesting to talk to boards around Scotland. A significant public body—I would prefer not to name it, because this is based on a private conversation—has done away with its committees, because it believes that all the big issues should involve all the board members, who think that their knowledge and understanding of the business will improve by not operating committee silos. They find that that works extremely well and they form ad hoc groups for particular purposes. I am not saying that that is a model, but it demonstrates that it is important not to over-legislate and to allow the new system to evolve and develop.

Lewis Macdonald: I have a quick question for Mr Laing about his comments on reorganisation. You said that you will cease to look at the current eight forces and look instead at the 32 council areas for KPIs and accountability, but that you are concerned that there is a danger that that could generate a lot of bureaucratic burden for local commanders. Could that burden be reduced by placing some of the accountability and KPIs at a regional level? That is the level at which decisions will be taken if the ACPOS work on structure and operational practice, which was explained to us last week, is borne out.
Andrew Laing: That raises two issues. On the debate on regionalisation, a bit of me strongly says that once a chief constable has been given day-to-day responsibility for the force, they should have the flexibility to manage. Whether that becomes functional, or regional at certain levels, is a matter for which they should be held to account.

My comments about bureaucracy may have caused confusion. My concern about the 32 local authority areas is that, if we have 32 police committees in addition to 32 community planning partnerships, the local commander will be sunk administratively. The reason why HMIC is going down the road of developing performance information based on 32 local authority areas is that the relationship, as set out in the bill, is at the local authority level, and that allows comparisons to be drawn.

The technology that we hope to invoke and the programme of inspection that we hope to bring in will not add on a huge layer of bureaucracy; in fact, over the past year, chief constables have commented on HMIC’s light-touch but very focused approach and we hope to promote that in future. It is vital that we provide those building blocks for cross-comparison with local elected members and, if there are 32 committees, to be able to combine them in two, three or six regions and get the relevant information. I am concerned about the bureaucracy that will be brought not by HMIC’s approach, but by additional committees at a local level.

David McLetchie: I will ask Mr Laing a couple of questions about the inspectorate. Paragraph 4.9 of HMIC’s submission suggests that the inspectorate be given the status of “a body corporate”. What is the inspectorate’s current status and what would such a transition mean?

Andrew Laing: We have recently spent a lot of time trying to clarify that suggestion. Perhaps I can begin my response with a bit of pragmatism: although my post in the HMIC is an independent position appointed under royal warrant, it is not always perceived that way. Because I sit in St Andrew’s house, I am often seen as being part of the civil service and as being very close to the minister; conversely, as an ex-police officer, I am seen as being very close to the chief constables. We must ensure that, with a single Scottish service and a single Scottish police authority, and given the issue of ministerial direction that we have raised, HMIC is seen to be and is perceived as being wholly independent.

The move to corporate body status is relatively simple. As far as other legislation is concerned, my position and the body’s position would stay the same, but I would be able to employ people. At the moment, I can take people only on secondment, which will present difficulties if, after the creation of the single Scottish force, I need to draw officers from that force and tell them to inspect their chief constable. Having corporate body status will allow me to employ people and to create a separate corporate entity. That would be an overt statement of independence and will be really important as we move forward. At the moment, we are not even a non-departmental public body; we are simply a body that has no definition other than that it is set out in a list with 15 or 16 other agencies.

David McLetchie: I am always puzzled by the different categories of public body; I have never quite understood why one group falls into one category and not another. I suspect that there are historical aspects that have never been fully rationalised, although I wonder whether, given the present context, we should be carrying out such rationalisation.

HMIC wants to be a body corporate. Can we be clear whether, under the proposal, the SPA and the PIRC will be bodies corporate?

Professor McNeill: We are a non-departmental public body. I think that I operate what is described as a corporation sole—in other words, the body operates in so far as the commissioner exists.

The Convener: A corporation what?

Professor McNeill: A corporation sole, spelled S-O-L-E.

The Convener: Not S-O-U-L, then.

David McLetchie: So you are not a poor soul.

Is there any logic to these different statuses? I understand why we need independent bodies and why, for example, the PIRC, the inspectorate and the SPA should be independent, but why are they independent in different ways and to different degrees?

Andrew Laing: Having done some work on this, I can perhaps venture an explanation. There are different levels of tie-in to the Government and the Administration. I have just checked HMIC’s official status; it is “another national body”, which means that I am not directly accountable to the Parliament or the Administration. In fact, my appointment—and the appointment of HMIC itself—is a non-ministerial appointment of the Scottish Administration; in other words, I have a link back to the Scotland Office that provides a level of independence.

David McLetchie: Mr Black, can you enlighten us?

Andrew Laing: My answer might not have helped much, but that is the position.

David McLetchie: No, it was interesting to learn that there is a reserved element in your status.
The Convener: That has cheered David McLetchie up. The union is not lost.

Robert Black: At the risk of prolonging the session, convener, I will express a degree of sympathy with the sentiment that Mr McLetchie is expressing. In our report, “The role of boards”, we categorised public bodies into: colleges of further education; non-departmental public bodies, of which there are 29; NHS bodies, of which there are 23; executive agencies, of which there are 11; non-ministerial departments, of which there are three; and a public corporation—Scottish Water. When we were doing the work we had difficulty identifying quite how some bodies are defined in the way that they are, particularly in the NDPB category.

The point that is worth making is that it would be helpful to the committee to keep the focus on the accountability line.

The Convener: I want to leave the issue of why we have all those animals—we can leave it for David McLetchie’s bedtime reading.

Robert Black: For the purposes of the committee’s current consideration, the nature of the accountability that is attached to the Scottish police authority, HMIC and the chief constable is important. Who appoints the accountable officer is also important, whether it is the Parliament or the Scottish ministers.

The Convener: I am getting light-headed.

Professor McNeill: There is a direct consequence attached to my role as police complaints commissioner, which will continue into the role of the police investigations and review commissioner. Given that everything is vested in that individual, it is essential that they have legal protection against, for example, threats or actions of defamation. In the past three years, at least three complainants have sought to raise defamation actions against me. Unlike the other public ombudsmen, I have no protection against defamation, and, as far as I can see, there is no provision in the bill to afford such protection to the police investigations and review commissioner. A key element of the oversight is that the commissioner be afforded such protection.

David McLetchie: Mr Laing, in your submission you said that the bill does not provide for HMIC involvement in the appointment of senior officers—chiefs, deputies and assistant chiefs—but you think that you should continue to provide an advisory service in a fully independent body. Is a fully independent body that is charged with inspecting a police force somewhat compromised if it has played a part in the appointment of the senior management of the force? Is your independence best preserved by having nothing to do with the appointment of the senior officers, so that you can in no way be compromised in relation to the provision of advice on the merits or suitability of candidates?

Andrew Laing: HMIC’s role is one in which we must tread a pretty difficult line from time to time. HMIC is the independent professional adviser to ministers, boards and chief constables on a variety of matters, yet it is charged with inspection and with ensuring effectiveness and efficiency. There is undoubtedly a difficulty in treading that line.

As we move to a single force in Scotland and a Scottish police authority that might have no professional police experience on it, I question where such independent professional advice on policing will come from. In my current position it is important that I offer independent advice, to balance the commentary from a number of stakeholders. Such advice will be vital to the Scottish police authority in future. The reality is that the vast majority of professional information passed to the SPA will come from the single force, so I think that there is a role for HMIC in that regard.

On my quest to retain my role in appointments, which has come about by history or impute, the role is, again, advisory. It is simply to sit in on the selection process, ensure that procedures have been followed, and provide those who will make the decisions with a commentary on the level of evidence provided—whether it is professionally competent, for example. I am not sure where else we would get that from.

Robert Black: One of the last substantive jobs that I did as chief executive of Tayside Regional Council was to help the authority to appoint a new chief constable, and the expert advice that HMIC provided was absolutely invaluable. I want to support the previous comment by saying that it was not HMIC’s role at that time to recommend a candidate, but its involvement was absolutely invaluable in providing assurance about the appointability of the candidates among whom the police authority was making a choice.

The Convener: I really am going to stop after the next two questions, otherwise we will be here until teatime—if that is not an old-fashioned word.

John Finnie: What are the panel’s views on the proposal in the bill to alter the composition of the police appeals tribunal? I should declare an interest: I was on the tribunal for a very short period, but did not complete any cases.

The tribunal is currently made up of four people. It is chaired by someone appointed by the Lord President of the Court of Session, and also includes a retired chief officer, someone from the...
The Convener: That is on the record, but it is for me to regulate proceedings, John.

John Finnie: Yes, of course.

The Convener: The room has to be vacated at 20 to 2 to allow another committee to sit and we still have business to get through. I am conscious that you have raised an important issue, but there is nothing to prevent the witnesses from providing us with additional written evidence on the important question that you have asked.

I am ruling that we will move on. I ask Rod Campbell for a short question, because we have several other items on the agenda and, whether we do them or not, I have to dispose of them in the time that we have before we have to vacate the room. I apologise to you, John, but that is the position. Rod, will you ask your question quickly, please?

Roderick Campbell: I will be very brief. It is a short question for Mr Laing. I have seen your comments on forensic services in your written submission, but are you aware of anything that has been detrimental to the interests of criminal justice in the forensics regime that has existed since 2007?

Andrew Laing: I will be as brief as I can. The segregation of forensic services from the force is an important issue. It is appropriate that services that concentrate on identifying individuals, marks, crime scenes and so on, and which hold responsibility for the maintenance of databases should be segregated from the force, but I hold a strong view that the flexibility that is needed to direct scenes-of-crime officers in the collation of marks should sit with the force and the chief constable.

The reality is that crime trends develop quickly in different parts of Scotland, and the chief constable needs the flexibility to direct his or her resources towards tackling that. If that means that, for a period of time, every car that is broken into in Glasgow should have a scenes-of-crime officer attending to it, the chief constable should have the opportunity to allow that. In the system that is being proposed, under which scenes-of-crime officers will sit within forensic science services, we get into a debate over the memorandum of understanding and who pays for services, and that flexibility is reduced.

The two points are, first, that the analysis of scenes-of-crime marks and evidence should sit separately from policing but, secondly, that the ability to collate them should sit within policing to provide the flexibility to respond to public need.
Roderick Campbell: The proposal in the bill is slightly different from the current position. Are you aware of any instances in which the situation that has prevailed since 2007 has been detrimental to criminal justice?

Andrew Laing: In relation to the description that I have just given, I am aware of discussions about budget constraints in the SPSA, which led to a quick conclusion that the number of scenes-of-crime officers would have to be reduced. That led to some difficult conversations between ACPOS and the SPSA, but it happened over a prolonged period. It is that sort of inflexibility and lack of control that cause me concern.

The Convener: Thank you for your evidence. I know that John Finnie would like you to follow up on the question that he asked. If you wish to provide any other supplementary evidence, including comments on questions that we did not ask but ought to have asked, please write to the clerk and your comments will be supplied to the committee and included in its consideration. Thank you.
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Christine Grahame): Good morning and welcome to the ninth meeting of the Justice Committee in 2012. I ask everyone to switch off mobile phones and other electronic devices completely as they interfere with the broadcasting system even when switched to silent. No apologies for absence have been received and once again I welcome Lewis Macdonald to the meeting.

The first and only item on the agenda is our third evidence-taking session at stage 1 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. I welcome our first panel of witnesses: Councillor Richard Durham, who is representing the Highlands and Islands fire board and the Scottish fire conveners forum; Steven Torrie, head of the Scottish fire and rescue advisory unit; Brian Sweeney, who is chief officer with Strathclyde Fire and Rescue and is representing the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland; and Richard Haigh, who is Scottish regional secretary for the Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland. Thank you for your written submissions.

As usual, we will go straight to questions. If the witnesses wish to answer a question, they should let me know and I will call them — the light on the microphone will come on to show that it is live. If they have a supplementary answer, they should indicate and, as with committee members, I will bring them in.

Graeme Pearson will begin the questioning.

Graeme Pearson (South Scotland) (Lab): When asked about preparations for the legislation’s implementation, the police service expressed major concern about timescales and the ability to deliver in the time available. By way of opening up the discussion, will the witnesses say something about the time that is available, problems that might be arising with the plans for implementation and any other issues that they want to bring to the committee’s attention?

Brian Sweeney (Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland): The Chief Fire Officers Association is broadly content with the timetable, although events in one or two strands are perhaps not as aligned with the legislation as we might, in ideal circumstances, have chosen.

First, we think that running the legislation in advance of learning the outcomes of the pathfinder projects for local blue-light committees might give rise to tensions. Secondly, a review of community planning partnerships and single outcome agreements is under way. Given that Parliament is — correctly — considering the context of police and fire services in CPPs and will consider the outcomes of the pathfinder projects over the next 12 months, the association believes the legislation to be somewhat ahead of those material considerations.

Out with that, we are broadly content with the timetable. Not everything needs to change before April 2013, but the legislative base, the insurance liabilities and the service’s purpose and function need to be clear. We will focus on those aspects in our evidence this morning.

Richard Haigh (Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland): The Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland has been critical of the pace of development of the outline business case. Although there was an opportunity for all stakeholders to engage with the process, we felt that it was limited and we are concerned that the bill is moving forward on the basis of the outcomes of that work and the latest outline business case. We believe that the timescale is challenging and we question the ability to deliver an efficient and effective fire and rescue service on 1 April 2013.

That said, APFO will contribute as much as it can to meeting that timescale. It is important that a chief fire officer is appointed at the earliest possible date, because clear leadership and direction are needed to support moves towards the commencement date.

Steven Torrie (Scottish Fire and Rescue Advisory Unit): To reinforce a comment that Mr Sweeney made, I make it clear that no one who views reform of the fire and rescue service as a large technical piece of work expects it to be completed by 1 April 2013; it will be an on-going process. A good partnership has developed between Scottish Government officials and fire and rescue service leads on reform to clarify exactly what needs to be done by next year’s cut-off point and what can be put off and developed in due course.

Graeme Pearson: Richard Haigh mentioned the outline business case. In the normal process, one would expect a gateway review to check the detail of the outline business case and, quite properly, look at budget arrangements. You said that, largely, you will be able to deliver the mechanics of what the bill requires. Are you happy that the financial arrangements will be in tune with those deliverables?

Brian Sweeney: There are some questions, which colleagues from the Chief Fire Officers Association provided to the Finance Committee—I do not want to rehearse those. The association broadly has no disagreement with the quantum of savings that the Government is setting out to achieve over the next three years. In the Government’s outline business case, the quantum of savings is somewhere between £21 million and £31 million.

At the consultation stage, the association opted for the regional model, within which we identified savings of some £23 million. If we take the mid-point of the optimism bias—around £25 million in the Government’s figures and £23 million in the CFOA figures—the difference is around £2 million. There is a difference of opinion, in principle or in practice, on the quantum of the savings. The difficulty will come in year one, when the difference between costs and savings will amount to some £8 million. That is clearly a concern for us.

However, CFOA’s key concern is that we do not believe that the functions of the new service are sufficiently clear.

The Convener: Will you develop that point?

Brian Sweeney: The bill sets out the purpose of the fire and rescue service. The provisions on the fire part of the service are nice and clear, but the provisions on the rescue part, in my opinion and that of the Chief Fire Officers Association, are unclear in a number of material ways.

Fire and rescue services have been criticised through the years in relation to inland water rescue. A recent fatal accident inquiry criticised my service for not rescuing four fishermen on Loch Awe. The Government then commissioned an inquiry, led by Paddy Tomkins, Her Majesty’s former inspector of constabulary, under which he made a number of recommendations, including that duties should be given to the fire and rescue service in relation to co-ordinating the registration of assets. No effect is given to that in the bill.

We have also been criticised in relation to line rescue. I will not enter into further discussion on those criticisms, but it is not clear whether the fire and rescue service is responsible for line rescue. On inland water rescue, the bill is silent. On line rescue—

The Convener: What is line rescue?

Brian Sweeney: An example of line rescue is a situation where someone is trapped in a collapsed building, a mineshaft or something similar.

The bill is silent on line rescue and water rescue. It gives us duties to prevent fires, but not road traffic collisions. If the purpose of the bill is to clarify the role of the fire and rescue service, we believe that more work needs to be done on it.

The Convener: Thank you. It is helpful to have that on the record. We will now have questions from Jenny Marra, to be followed by Alison McInnes and John Finnie.

Jenny Marra (North East Scotland) (Lab): My question follows on quite well from what Mr Sweeney said, as it is about the prevention agenda. I notice that the Chief Fire Officers Association states in its written submission that it is unfortunate that more attention is not being paid to the prevention agenda. I have been impressed with the performance of Tayside Fire and Rescue, which was recently rated top in Audit Scotland’s report for its success in the area of prevention. Will you elaborate on the prevention agenda in the bill and say where you think that it should be stronger?

Brian Sweeney: I will try to be as brief as I can as I am conscious of the limits of time. The question strikes at the heart of the issue. On the prevention agenda, we are broadly satisfied with the arrangements for preventing fire and educating people about its consequences, but we do not believe that the legislation gives enough weight to the prevention of road traffic collisions, the development of young people—the young firefighters programme in Tayside is an excellent example—or water safety. It does not give enough weight to safety in contexts other than fire. It would be helpful if the committee could point out those issues with the framing of the legislation and the functions.

The fire provisions in the bill are okay, but the rescue provisions are not okay. The bill gives us no statutory functions to educate teenagers who get their driving licence and go on to the roads, no functions on water safety, and nothing to encourage the service to work with children and young people in the fantastic way that we do to save lives. The prevention agenda needs more work, particularly in the rescue context.

Jenny Marra: Is there a cost implication if the prevention agenda is to be as robust as you, the committee and the public would like it to be?

Brian Sweeney: The cost implications are broadly negligible. The staff are in post. The programmes are delivered, in the main, by station staff, who may be full time or part time. The programmes need resourcing, energy, partnership and power. This is only the second time that the legislation has been changed in 50 years. If something is not mandated and the bill does not give effect to it, it will become someone else’s problem—it will become a road safety initiative or a police-only initiative. The legislation needs to be clear about the purpose and functions of a 21st century fire and rescue service. That is what we are calling for.

Jenny Marra: Are you saying that your service is best placed to deliver the most effective road safety and prevention programmes?

Brian Sweeney: No, that is not quite what I am saying. I am saying that we are one of a number of agencies that need to be mandated, almost in a neutral, third-party sense, to work with young people at secondary 5 and 6 in Scottish schools—which all services do. Unlike, perhaps, our colleagues in the police, we take a much more neutral stance. We come at the issue from the point of view that it is about young people’s safety, their lives, and peer pressure. There are some fantastic examples from Fife to Tayside to Grampian, where the fire and rescue service’s involvement is critical, but that work is part of a broader partnership. We do not want to be, and we are not, the sole agency with such responsibility.

The Convener: The Cabinet Secretary for Justice’s office will be noting your written and oral evidence, and I am sure that he will take that issue on board.

Richard Haigh: I will pick up on two points to reinforce what Brian Sweeney has said. First, to the association, the functions that the bill sets out do not harness the potential contribution of the fire and rescue service in its wider community safety role, which is work that we are already very much involved in right across Scotland.

Secondly, and probably as important, the bill does not meet the public’s expectations. In 2005, when we changed from fire brigades to fire and rescue services, the public developed certain expectations. The functions that are set out in the bill do not meet those expectations.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I, too, am interested in exploring the concerns that have been expressed that the bill does not fully capture the functions that you carry out. Jenny Marra successfully explored the issue of prevention. To go back to the rescue part of the service, have you estimated the resources that would be required if the bill was to make it clear that that was part of your remit?

Brian Sweeney: Rather than go through all the funding issues, if the committee were so minded and it would be helpful, I would be more than happy to provide a short paper that sets out the functions that we believe are missing and the associated costs. That might help you in your deliberations.

The Convener: That would be helpful. Did you respond to that question when you went before the Finance Committee?

Brian Sweeney: I was not at the Finance Committee; it was the deputy chief who was there. However, having read the Official Report of the proceedings, I do not believe that the issue was specifically raised.

The Convener: If you are not in a position to provide that information to Alison McInnes today, we would be most obliged to have it in writing.

09:45

Alison McInnes: The point is important. You make a cogent case for putting such functions in the bill, but we need to understand the implications of that.

Will you elaborate on the Chief Fire Officers Association’s concern about the legality of cross-border operational activity?

Brian Sweeney: The concern relates to our border with our colleagues in England and I clarify that it applies to only two services: Lothian and Borders Fire and Rescue Service and Dumfries and Galloway Fire and Rescue Service. There are issues of insurance and insurance liability when firefighters travel from the area in which they are insured and liable for operating to another country, but I believe that that is being considered in relation to technical components of the bill.

Lothian and Borders Fire and Rescue Service raised the issue of its cross-border movement. It asked whether the indemnification and insurance of firefighters are still valid when they operate as firefighters in England and whether the principles of Scots law or English civil law apply.

The question is technical and I would be happy to provide further information on it. We are broadly content that it is being addressed in the technical context of the bill.

The Convener: The system must function just now. I have a border constituency and I know that people nip backwards and forwards. What is the position now?

Brian Sweeney: The issue relates just to technical liability, indemnification and insurance.

The Convener: Surely the position must be resolved at the moment.

Brian Sweeney: I am unaware whether that is the current position. In Strathclyde, I do not have a border with England.
The Convener: We will require that information, but I pretty well think that the issue will have been resolved by now. I do not think for one minute that, when English firefighters come over here, indemnification problems arise. Clarification would be helpful.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (SNP): Good morning, panel. My questions are to Mr Torrie. Some submissions suggest that an opportunity has been missed for the bill to pick up on a number of issues. The review of open water and flood rescue in Scotland that Mr Tomkins undertook recommended that a register of water rescue assets should be held. Does that have broader application? Coastguard services have been retracted. Does an opportunity relate to that? If so, how would that fit with the framework document and the integrated risk management planning system?

Steven Torrie: I—

John Finnie: And, sorry—

The Convener: Wait a minute, John. I am happy to let you ask several questions, but it helps witnesses if you ask one question at a time, after which you can add another question.

John Finnie: I have a comment rather than a question, which is that all that I have described leads to the suggestion of the service’s designation as the primary rescue service.

Steven Torrie: I will try to deal with that. On water rescue, the Fire (Additional Function) (Scotland) Order 2005, which derives from the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005, asks the existing fire and rescue services to provide facilities to deal with serious flooding. As part of that, the Scottish Government has provided funding over the past few years for boats and other water rescue equipment such as personal protective equipment. There is a range of functions across Scotland at the moment.

Mr Sweeney was absolutely correct to say that Paddy Tomkins have not been fully implemented. Some of Mr Tomkins’s recommendations about fire and rescue services taking on a broader co-ordination role have not been carried through to their natural conclusion. The opportunity exists to clarify that through legislation or, beyond legislation, in the fire and rescue framework.

I will make a broader observation about fire and rescue services. I understand and agree pretty much across the piece with what Mr Sweeney and Mr Haigh said about specialist rescue functions because, when it boils down to it, the fire and rescue service is often the only service that can adapt to and provide a rescue in unusual and unpredictable circumstances. Something could be usefully said about that.

I caveat that with another observation that is part of our current conversations in the service about specialist rescue, which is that, if you try to be too clever and precise about defining functions, you could end up tying the service up in knots with different arguments. For example, when is a serious flooding incident a serious flooding incident and not a rescue from rapidly moving water, such as a river? I could give you countless examples; that is just one.

Is that a reasonable answer to your question?

John Finnie: Yes, it is.

Would it help if the bill designated the service as being the primary rescue service? I agree that it would probably never be possible to tie down all potential situations.

Steven Torrie: It would be helpful if the bill broadly recognised the fire and rescue service as the rescue organisation for Scotland, as long as we do not get caught up in too much detail at the level of the law.

Brian Sweeney: I agree with the principle that it does not matter whether we are the primary rescue service; as a rescue service, we should be involved in co-ordinating and engaging with partners to plan, prepare and deliver whatever the rescue is. It would be most helpful if that were clear in the bill.

I want to pick up on the observation about the coastguard that the honourable member made.

The Convener: We are not “honourable members” here.

Brian Sweeney: I am sorry, convener.

The Convener: Some of us may be, but we do not boast.

Brian Sweeney: In my eyes, you are all honourable.

The point that John Finnie made in relation to the coastguard is most apposite: coastguard services are being withdrawn from around the coastline of Scotland. In addition to the review of coastguard services, there has been a review by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency and withdrawal of the maritime firefighting response that was provided by Lothian and Borders Fire and Rescue Service, Strathclyde Fire and Rescue and Highlands and Islands Fire and Rescue Service. Again, we see no mention of that in the purpose and function of the new service, but Scotland as a nation is served non-stop by ferries to the Western Isles—both the Inner Hebrides and Outer Hebrides—the Orkneys and the Shetlands. We believe that there must be capability to deploy firefighters, should there be a fire on one of those vessels, but that capability is being lost; United Kingdom funding for it ends in a couple of weeks, on 1 April. That is another purpose or function of the service that should not be lost.

Lewis Macdonald (North East Scotland) (Lab): I had intended to raise the point about marine firefighting. I want to generalise on some of the other rescue functions that the panel has described. If the bill were to reflect—as has been suggested—a formal responsibility for rescue and prevention, what would be the implications in legislative terms? In other words, is what is being suggested merely the addition of a couple of lines of formal description, or would it require significant change in resourcing the bill’s provisions or in its timetable?

Brian Sweeney: That would require a fairly simple amendment. The arrangements are already being effected practically, so the bill would merely formalise arrangements that already exist in respect of all the functions. It would be a technical legislative amendment to reflect what already happens in real life.

Lewis Macdonald: Is that also Mr Torrie’s view? Clearly, you have advised ministers.

Steven Torrie: That is absolutely my view.

Lewis Macdonald: That is very helpful.

Starting with Councillor Durham, I want to hear about accountability. Some submissions have raised issues such as the relationships between a national service and local authorities, and between a national service and regional responsibilities. Would panel members like to comment on that—in particular, on the composition and size of the central board or authority?

The Convener: Councillor Durham—that is your cue.

Councillor Richard Durham (Scottish Fire Conveners Forum): Thank you, convener. The Scottish fire conveners forum has always had some concern about that. When reform was first discussed with CFOA and the forum about two years ago, there was a clear view within the forum that reform had to come, although the general view of the forum was that the service should remain within local government rather than be centralised. Now that the principle of a single service has been established and is being implemented by the bill, the forum has come on board. Everybody has come on board and is going forward willingly into the new framework.

However, I am concerned, based on my experience as convener for the past five years, about the proposed size of the board. I am aware of the various sub-committees within my area’s fire board, and I know that people get sick and are unable to attend. The forum’s view is that between seven and 11 members—I believe that the thrust is for 11—is still tight for a board of such significance. I believe that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has suggested that the number of board members should be 15. The conveners forum would be more comfortable with that number.

The other issue—

I should probably stop at that point, as I do not want to prejudice questions.

The Convener: It is so tempting when somebody says, “The other issue...” and then stops. Why not just say it, please? If there is another issue that you want to raise, the committee would like to hear it.

Councillor Durham: There seems to be a gap in the bill. There is a clear route whereby the Scottish fire and rescue service will produce a plan and, having agreed that plan with Parliament and Scottish ministers, will then produce local plans. However, given the level of savings that will have to be found in the years ahead, there are almost certainly going to be tensions between local aspirations for service provision and what the national plan might say. There is a clear route in the bill whereby the service will engage with the 32 local authorities and, when agreement is reached, the local plan will be published. However—I have been in this scenario recently—change of local service provision can be hugely emotive, and it is crucial, so I foresee scenarios in which there is intransigence in the local authority and the SFRS. If that happens, there must be resolution. It cannot be left hanging, otherwise the reform will be seen from the local perspective as being just centralisation of the power within the service, which would be a great loss.

I could make suggestions as to what that resolution might be.

The Convener: What are they?

10:00

Councillor Durham: There are two democratically elected sides: a Parliament and Government on the one hand, and local councillors and a local authority on the other. To me, the resolution must be found between those two elected bodies. I cannot in my mind get past the fact that, ultimately, either the Parliament or the ministers will have to engage in resolving disputes. From experience over the past five years, I say that disputes are inevitable.

The Convener: I want to keep to this topic because it is a fresh one for us, so we will stay on the number of people on the fire board and disputes between national and local plans. I will take supplementaries on those issues.

Lewis Macdonald: Councillor Durham suggests that there might be different ways of dealing with the issue. During evidence on the police service, we heard the suggestion that a link between the national and local levels might be achieved by having a number of local representatives—people with local government or other local connections—involved in the national authority. Is that applicable to the fire service or do different circumstances mean that that would not work?

Councillor Durham: Such representation is very important, particularly in the transition board of SFRS. You have to take existing expertise into the new set up.

I have lost my train of thought.

The Convener: I know the feeling. A few of us on the committee are the same. The members concerned will not admit to it, but I know who they are.

Councillor Durham: The problem is that when local authority representatives—local councillors—come on to the board, they have to leave behind their local issues, because once they join the board they will be responsible for the whole service across Scotland.

The Convener: It has been put to us that the role would be about holding to account rather than being representational. You are making the same point. It is necessary to leave the local hats on the hat rack outside the door.

Steven Torrie: I will make a brief comment to add to Councillor Durham’s argument. The concern that he articulates is something that I have heard from day one, when reform was first discussed: if you create a large national organisation, you become remote from local communities and decisions are taken remotely. I will offer a couple of thoughts on that. The fire and rescue service is fundamentally a local service. Its only purpose is to operate at local level; that is all that it does. The fire and rescue services currently engage well at local level. In my past life, I have attended local community meetings here in Edinburgh to try to persuade people that it would be a good idea to shut their local fire station and move it up the road a bit. If you want an example of local accountability and local engagement, you should come along to one of those challenging events.

The Convener: MSPs also have such meetings.

Steven Torrie: I do not recommend it.

The Convener: I will not comment on behalf of MSPs.

_Steven Torrie:_ Whatever the shape and form of the management of the service, it exists only at local level and will always be accountable at local level. Mr Sweeney is responsible for an organisation that provides services to 49 per cent of Scotland’s population but is designed to work at local level. Everything is about the design of the new service and ensuring that things happen at the local level.

The Convener: Has Lewis Macdonald finished on this point?

Lewis Macdonald: Mr Sweeney perhaps wants to respond to the initial question. I am interested to hear his view.

Brian Sweeney: We are broadly content on the membership of the national board. The suggestion is that its composition will give councillors, local government and COSLA their voices on the board. Our submission points to the need for business, commerce, insurers and the fire industry also to have their voices on the board. In the context of the board, it is not so much about quantity but about quality; the bill needs to take into account the quality of the board membership.

We believe that tensions will emerge between the national and the local. It makes no difference whether the service is a national one that is delivered locally or a local one that has a national framework. Accountability can be dual, but responsibility must be solo. If there is responsibility locally for development of a local plan that might, let us say, close a fire station, that might clash with the national board’s ambition. The sensible work that is being done through the pathfinder projects, the blue-light committees and the review of community planning partnerships needs to focus on the tensions that might emerge between national and local Government and how we will resolve them.

Obviously, it is for the bill to specify this, but one suggestion is that there might be a natural ombudsman role for Her Majesty’s chief inspector of fire and rescue authorities. I have not rehearsed or discussed this with Mr Torrie, so I apologise for putting him on the spot somewhat. Perhaps we could have someone who is wholly independent to adjudicate in cases in which a local plan disagreed with the national strategy; surely the independent inspectorate would be the suitable home for that type of consideration.

The Convener: There you are, Mr Torrie. I will let you think about that.

I will take supplementary questions, if they keep to the numbers or the tensions between the local and the national. I think that David McLetchie wants to ask about that.
David McLetchie (Lothian) (Con): I want to ask about local accountability and local plans.

The Convener: Fine. We will then have questions from John Finnie and Jenny Marra on the same train.

David McLetchie: The bill envisages that local plans will be devised and will fit into the overall national plan. At present, with our eight fire and rescue services, do we have eight local plans or 32, or do we have none?

Brian Sweeney: There are eight local plans, which are referred to as integrated risk management plans. Some of the eight existing fire and rescue services subdivide their plans into individual plans for their constituent authorities, but others do not. There are definitely eight plans, although there might be more, because some services break down their plans for their constituent authorities. Of course, two of our eight authorities are unitary ones—Fife and Dumfries and Galloway.

David McLetchie: What, in that case, is the logic of the proposal to have 32 local plans? Will we end up with a situation in which one plan is duplicated, a new cover is stuck on it and we say that it is the plan for Clackmannanshire rather than for Falkirk? Is it the reality that there will not be 32 separate plans, but a number of regional plans, broadly corresponding to the present fire board areas and, within that, there will be further plans with different covers on them just to appease local sensibilities?

The Convener: Mr Torrie, do you want “to appease local sensibilities”?

Steven Torrie: I will try my best, convener. In addition to the integrated risk management plans from the eight fire and rescue services, there are 32 single outcome agreements and 32 community planning partnerships and community safety partnerships. All that detailed work at local level goes on at present in the 32 authority areas.

Councillor Durham: We must remember that Scotland is a varied place. Delivering fire and rescue services in a town in the central belt is different from delivering them on far-off islands in Shetland or Orkney, so plans vary. Fire and rescue services have worked under the current system since some time between 1993 and 1996—I cannot remember exactly when the relevant statutory instruments were put in place. One of the culture changes that will happen relates to funding for the services, which has been done in a historical manner. From a local government perspective, it has been done in a somewhat unusual way, whereby central Government has maintained the capital funding and then headed it out, but the revenue funding has come through the constituent local authorities.

To some extent, that pattern of funding over the past 15 years has dictated community expectation throughout the eight different fire and rescue areas.

There is a huge opportunity in the coming of a single service, because resources will be pooled. However, expectations in various parts of Scotland will probably have to change. I have a standard example that I use. In the Highlands and Islands, Fort William has a retained fire station, but 30 miles away, Oban—a town of similar size, Oban, but which is in a different fire and rescue service area—has a whole-time station. I mention that simply as an illustration that, over time there has been evolution in fire services throughout Scotland. In reality, and in difficult financial times, there will be pressure on the new SFRS to balance out how it provides services. There are tensions on the road ahead for everybody.

David McLetchie: I understand that—

The Convener: Before you come in, Mr McLetchie, I think that Mr Sweeney wants to say something.

Brian Sweeney: Thank you, convener. I just wanted to pick up on the point. The opportunity that a national service will have to consider Scotland irrespective of boundaries should not be lost; there is a fantastic opportunity to examine the issues that Councillor Durham raises. Where a certain service has been bound both administratively and financially by its borders and boundaries, the fact that they will be removed will offer a tremendous opportunity.

The problem will come when decisions are to be made. To give a brief example, in Strathclyde, we closed some fire stations two years ago. It was a sensitive issue. The stations were in Parkhead, which is in the city of Glasgow, and in Cambuslang, which is in South Lanarkshire. That was done under the aegis of the board, where corporate responsibility was brought to bear, and although individual local members, including members of the Scottish Parliament, might not have been happy with the principle, there was collective ownership.

The Chief Fire Officers Association’s fear is that the national board could take such a decision, but it would then face two blue-light committees that might or might not share the same view. What will we do in those circumstances? How can we sensibly ameliorate such concerns?

David McLetchie: Thank you.

I move on to the related topics of local accountability and the relationship between local senior officers and local groups. From the evidence, it strikes me that people are most concerned about the creation of duplication in bureaucracy at local level. I hope that I am not putting words in anyone’s mouth, but it seems to me that the idea of a freestanding local fire consultative committee—or whatever title it would be given—is not being met with great favour. There seems to be a view that the existing mechanisms, through the community planning partnerships, are all that is required, and that there is no need for duplication with a parallel set of committees that focus only on fire and rescue services. Is that a fair summation of your evidence and your view?

Brian Sweeney: I very much concur with that. It is an important point. There is little that a police service or a fire service does in isolation. In fire and rescue, we routinely work with health, housing and social work services, social services, the education authorities and others to advance our agenda. “Scotland Together: A study examining fire deaths and injuries in Scotland”, which was provided to Parliament late in 2009, gives effect to consideration of those points. Merely by creating 32 blue-light committees, we would create a silo within which police and fire and rescue services would operate, whereas the reality is that they operate in a common environment with health, housing, social work and other colleagues. I therefore concur whole-heartedly with the point.

David McLetchie: Councillor Durham, would you like to give a view on that?

Councillor Durham: Perhaps not surprisingly, you would not get quite the same view from local government. As the Government led on the issue, it took the view that local councillors were not all engaged in the process of governance and accountability, and that the joint boards were perhaps not the best way to govern.

The local government view is that fire services will become national, by virtue of which they will be centralised to a large extent. There is concern within the local government community about what the local role will be. The minister has said in various announcements that the bill will enhance the role of local councillors and give them more say in the process, but the view on the ground contains a degree of scepticism on that point. The bill is not clear on what the role of democratically elected local councillors will be.

David McLetchie: Is the problem partly that community planning partnerships are full of professionals and do not have enough local councillors on them, beyond the heads of the council administrations concerned?

Councillor Durham: That is a fair comment.

David McLetchie: So, the problems with accountability stem from the fact that the vehicle that is meant to create co-ordination does not have enough elected representatives on it to represent the people in the community. If we are going to have an integrated accountability mechanism, we should look at who is included. I see that Councillor Durham and Brian Sweeney are both nodding; I am glad that we have some agreement on that. I will put that in my report. [Laughter.] I am sure that there will not be a dissenting report.

I just want to ask Councillor Durham what the convener of Fife police, fire and safety committee was so exercised about that he did not put his name to your submission, as is stated in big, bold capital letters at the end. Is there a substantial issue of principle in that regard, or is it an issue of lesser significance?

Councillor Durham: There is more of a historical framework to it. As I said at the outset, the fire conveners forum started debating reform together with CFOA quite a while before the major decision came from the Government and Parliament.

From the outset, the convener of the Fife committee took the view that the Government’s position is right. The remaining seven conveners fought for fire and rescue and police services to remain as local government services rather than becoming centralised services. That was the origin: the Fife convener has consistently gone against that view and has rather disassociated himself from the rest of us.

David McLetchie: I am sure that that is a fair representation of his views. Your group is saying that it has now accepted—if not enthusiastically—that we will have a single service, and that we are now considering the bill in the context of how the service will work.

Councillor Durham: It is fair to say, now that the principle has been established, that everybody in our group wants to do their best to make the single service a success for everybody in Scotland, from the northern tip of Unst to Dumfries and Galloway and Campbeltown.

The Convener: That is a diplomatic answer.

Rod Campbell has been waiting for a long time. Rod, is your question on a completely separate issue or on much the same stuff?

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): To be perfectly honest, most of my points have been covered by what has been said so far. Just for my benefit, if for no one else’s, will the panel clarify what the local plan is expected to contain, particularly if there is an overlap with community planning? What do you expect to see in local plans, whether the number of services be eight, 32 or one?

Steven Torrie: I will be very brief, because I am sure that my colleagues will want to add some thoughts. Earlier, Mr Sweeney mentioned something called an integrated risk management plan, which is a clunky title for an important piece of behaviour for fire and rescue services. What it means is that the fire and rescue service needs to understand the risks in its local community and design its services around them, along with putting a great deal of emphasis on prevention work. The fire and rescue service would much rather prevent fires and accidents than deal with the consequences. Integration means that we can apply all that collectively.

The local plan needs to describe risk as the fire and rescue service sees it and describe the kind of response that the fire and rescue service will give in terms of protection, prevention and operation.

Brian Sweeney: What I would say is broadly similar. The integrated risk management plan has three facets. We seek to prevent incidents from occurring, whether that is a road traffic collision, someone drowning or someone having an accidental fire in the home. Prevention is clearly a multi-agency function; it cannot be and is not a sole function of the fire and rescue service. There might be health workers and social workers in the home, and there might be lots of duplication of data about vulnerable people who are at risk but, when the fire and rescue service arrives, we find out that we did not know about that. In a community planning partnership in Scotland in 2012, that cannot be allowed to continue. The fire and rescue service working on prevention in a community planning partnership context is absolutely unavoidable; it must happen.

Protection also involves multi-agency engagement. The only facet that is left is the response element. How many fire stations do we have? Should they be full time or part time? How quickly does the service arrive? How many officers are there? How well trained are the staff?

The first two facets are absolutely multi-agency issues.

Councillor Durham: I concur with the professional advice that the committee has been given, but I have something to say with my layman’s hat on. The most important thing to the general public is that, when someone’s house is burning and they dial 999, they get a fire engine as quickly as possible. Driving risk down has become a fundamental part of fire and rescue services in the past few years, and it has been hugely successful—risk has been driven down. However, there is a danger in simply saying that because, for example, the likelihood is that a life will be saved once every 3,000 years in a remote community, there is no need for the response element. That will not be the view of that community.

I totally take on board the point about reducing resources and the point that in today’s world resources must be prioritised, but statistics can take us too far. That is an issue and we in Highland have come across it recently in looking at how to use our resources. I have learned quite recently that it is ultimately very difficult and politically unacceptable to a great extent to close stations, but stations will probably have to be closed. That is a hugely sensitive issue that the service will face, and I can see intransigence between local interests and the wider national interest.

The Convener: MSPs are well aware of what will happen if there is an attempt to close fire stations, schools or post offices—there is a list of things. Obviously, councillors, MSPs and members of Parliament represent their constituents. There will, understandably, be a great deal of community resistance.

Members should ask short questions, as the time that the next witness has for giving evidence before he must leave is tight. Members are in a big queue, but let us move things along.

John Finnie: Councillor Durham, until you made the comment that you have just made, I was not going to mention the following issue, but I will be gentle—I think that you know what I am going to touch on. I take it that you do not think that everything in the existing arrangements is sound. Such a position is certainly not borne out by the Audit Scotland review of the role of boards. The northern joint police board’s submission says:

“The Board seeks continuity in the performance of police and fire and rescue services” in the Highlands. I take it that you hope to enhance performance. People want a fire appliance to arrive, but do you concede that they want adequately equipped and trained people to arrive with that vehicle?

Councillor Durham: Yes.

John Finnie: I have a question for the panel about an issue that came up in relation to the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the tension that can exist between resources. We heard from the assistant chief constable of that organisation that it has a tactical tasking service, so that if additional resources are requested locally, they are bid for centrally. Does Mr Torrie envisage such a system working in the national fire service?

Steven Torrie: Less so, I think. The functional arrangements for operational cover in the fire and rescue service are pretty different from the police arrangements. Fundamentally, they are based on local fire stations, and attendance times, for example, have been worked out over long periods. When large incidents occur, there will be support from a broader area. The current services have mutual assistance agreements so that they can pass resources between them but, as a general principle, a local resource will attend operational incidents.

John Finnie: Can I touch on the issue—

The Convener: Does Mr Sweeney want to come in on that point before John Finnie asks another question?

Brian Sweeney: I agree with HMI Torrie. Such activity would not routinely occur in fire and rescue services, but there will be peak or spate conditions in the eight services on bonfire night or if flooding or storms and high winds occur, and all the services will prioritise the order in which they respond to incidents. For example, it would not be unusual in Strathclyde to have 50 or 60 incidents stacked in a queue on bonfire night and for officers to prioritise on that basis. The same goes for flooding.

John Finnie: I will touch on the cross-border issue. Do the mutual aid arrangements apply across the border? It is clear that Lothian and Borders wants to be a good neighbour to Northumbria and that Dumfries and Galloway wants to be a good neighbour to Cumbria. What reassurance can you give about terms and conditions, the pension aspect and liability?

Steven Torrie: I cannot give the committee any reassurance on any of those things, but my understanding is the same as Mr Sweeney's. The Scottish Government and the UK Government are looking at the issue as a technical matter.

The Convener: We will be able to clarify that. Some arrangement must be in place.

Steven Torrie: Both our existing border services have mutual assistance arrangements with our neighbours in Cumbria and Northumberland.

10:30

Jenny Marra: John Finnie touched on the question that I will ask. Councillor Durham, do you think that local accountability currently works well? I suggest that a number of issues have come together and the situation has finally come to a head.

Councillor Durham: Indeed.

The Convener: In fairness to Councillor Durham, he is here talking on behalf of all the boards.

Councillor Durham: This is probably not the right place.

Jenny Marra: So the issue is historical problems rather than local scrutiny and holding the service to account.

Councillor Durham: I suggest that a number of issues have come together and the situation has finally come to a head.

The Convener: In fairness to Councillor Durham, he is here talking on behalf of all the boards.

Councillor Durham: Indeed.

The Convener: It is rather difficult for him to talk about the specifics of the Highlands and it would also be unfair to the other fire conveners. As a convener myself, I am always fair to other conveners.

Colin Keir (Edinburgh Western) (SNP): My question is close to what Jenny Marra was going on about and is for Mr Haigh. In the submission by the Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland, the comments under point 4 about the principle of councillors taking part in decision making and the scrutiny of performance seem to be both supportive and non-supportive of the idea, so I would like to hear your expanded view. Given the difficulties that you point out, how do you see that working?

The Convener: Colin, you should declare an interest. You are still a councillor.

Colin Keir: I apologise.

The Convener: I am only teasing.

Richard Haigh: Your point is at the heart of the matter. Engaging more councillors in the framework sounds very good in theory, and the association would support that, but how will it operate in practice? How will more councillors across the 32 councils be engaged on fire issues? I do not have an answer, but I would be keen to see the idea worked through, and you will be aware that a number of pathfinder projects are being developed to put it into practice. The difficulty, perhaps, will be that each pathfinder project will have the resources of the relevant fire and rescue service behind it to support and drive it and help its delivery, whereas with a single service the support, drive and direction will be more remote. There are therefore questions about whether the pathfinders will truly reflect how things will operate in a single service.

Brian Sweeney: I will make a brief observation about the functioning of joint boards—I cannot speak for unitary authorities because I have never worked in one. In a joint board context, the arrangements have some difficulties because of the third-hand nature of elected member involvement. Members are elected to their council and have council responsibilities in social work, licensing or education, for example, but they are also members of a fire or police committee, so the engagement of some of them can be third hand and at arm’s length. That does not place blame on any existing elected members but reflects the reality of politics and the level of engagement and busyness of elected members.

Audit Scotland’s reports show that, across Scotland, especially where there are joint board arrangements, some elected members are clearly fully engaged with, and on top of, the strategy and policies of the service, while others are less so. That is a product of the arrangements rather than a commentary on individual councillors.

Colin Keir: Given the comments that we have just heard, do you think that the present arrangements with the boards are satisfactory?

Richard Haigh: No. I do not believe that the arrangements are satisfactory at the moment.

I will go back to a previous question on the size and composition of the new board. For APFO it is not about numbers, size and shape but about the skill set, the experience and the expertise that are brought to the board. If we bear in mind that consideration and the current board arrangement, significant development is required of board members—of councillors—to enable them to fulfil their role effectively. That is not a derogatory comment about councillors; it is about getting to understand the nature and practice of a fire and rescue service to enable them to scrutinise and support the effective delivery of front-line services.

Alison McInnes: It has been a pretty upbeat panel, which has talked about “a huge opportunity” and so on. Others might think that it is a serious risk to local provision. Much has been made of the fact that local plans already exist and will continue to exist. The difference is that local plans are resourced locally now. The proposals mean that local plans will be drawn up locally and resourced nationally—or not, depending on the small board of 11 people. Does the panel think that financial and human resources can be properly allocated by such a small national board?

Councillor Durham: I see no reason why not. Richard Haigh commented that it is about the quality of the person who sits on the board. I will qualify that to an extent in that, although I agree with him, it is terribly important that the people who sit on the board have an understanding of matters of fire and rescue.

I think the world of the Scottish fire and rescue service now, under the existing system, and I am quite sure that I will think the world of it under a single service. Those in the service are fantastic men and women of this country who do a wonderful job.

Whatever number of people sit on the board, the concern is that they understand what the Scottish fire and rescue service is and does. It will be a challenge to achieve that in the first board.

The Convener: Will you address the funding issue? Should it be local, central or whatever?

Brian Sweeney: We are in an extended period of austerity, which affects resourcing in the fire and rescue service, like every other service. Between the professional voice—the Chief Fire Officers Association—and the Government’s outline business case, the saving looks like being a quantum of about £25 million. That is against the baseline budget of £388 million.

There is a certain reality around the figures that we are arriving at, which need to be considered in one important context. Either we reorganise the service in Scotland to remove duplication and examine the back office to save £25 million or we make between 600 and 700 operational front-line firefighters redundant. That is already happening in certain parts of Scotland, such as Fife, where firefighters have been challenged by redundancy and transferred to other authorities.

When it comes down to tough choices, the choice is between reorganising the back office and removing the duplication or losing front-line resources. I am for the former.

Alison McInnes: So you see the pattern of, for example, retained fire service stations being very similar to what we have at the moment. You see all the savings being achieved through back-office services.

Brian Sweeney: I would see some fairly significant changes coming through in the new single fire and rescue service, but I would be very surprised if the existing footprint of full-time and part-time stations changed or there was any large movement in the number of stations. I do not think that stations across Scotland will close now or in the next five years.
The Convener: I will move on to Graeme Pearson, then David McLetchie and Jenny Marra. I hope that these will be the last few questions. I do not want to curtail members—I know that we like to ask questions—but we have overrun again.

Graeme Pearson: A lot has been said about the conflict and rub between national accountability and local responsibilities. Last week, we heard persuasive evidence from the Auditor General about the involvement of democratic accountability in the governance process. I note that the Fire Brigades Union refers specifically to the need for the Scottish Parliament to be involved in such processes. Indeed, it suggests a number of roles for Parliament to play and identifies a committee to fulfil them.

No one on the panel has mentioned the role of Parliament in resolving the issues of the single fire service and the challenges that we have discussed over the past hour or so. We will speak to the union later this morning, but do members of the panel think that Parliament should play an additional role? Are you happy that the bill properly records what you want from the Parliament?

The Convener: Is there no response?

Brian Sweeney: I was waiting before answering in case any of my colleagues had a strong view. I have read the FBU’s submission, which makes a valid point on the issue. Perhaps fellow witnesses were in danger of commenting on the existing arrangements and the factual aspects of the bill, rather than seizing the opportunity to examine another level of scrutiny and engagement.

The point is well made by the union. Parliament has a role to play. The single fire and rescue service is, after all, being discussed by a committee of the Parliament and its officers will be appointed by ministers. Parliament should retain an interest in the matter. Neither I nor any other chief fire officer would have any objection to any regular scrutiny by a standing committee, this committee or any other parliamentary committee in order to make sure that the service delivers exactly what it says it will.

We will not get a second chance to deliver a single service. The more value that can be added at this stage, and the more scrutiny that the Parliament can give to the arrangements, the better. I whole-heartedly support the FBU’s proposal.

The Convener: It is, of course, open to any committee of the Parliament, within its remit, to conduct an inquiry and hold witnesses to account. It might be the Local Government and Regeneration Committee or this committee that will hold people to account for the delivery of the fire and rescue service in Scotland.

Graeme Pearson: My question was more about the process of governance than conducting an occasional review.

The Convener: That would happen as well. There are too few members to serve on and do justice to all the Parliament’s committees. My comment was meant merely as an observation.

David McLetchie: The FBU’s submission states:

“The fire service has a range of industrial relations practices that reflect the individual circumstances within the current 8 FRS.”

I will ask the union about that, but I would also like a management view. To what extent is the range of industrial relations practices likely to be standardised when we have a single fire service? Do some of them need to be standardised, or should they be preserved in the aspic of the eight current fire and rescue services?

Brian Sweeney: I am happy to open the responses. Industrial relations across Scotland are stable. During the past 10 years, there has been a process of modernisation and reform, with stations closing and shift arrangements changing, and I commend the FBU’s approach. As a result of consultation and negotiation with management, we have reached a stable industrial relations position where most authorities throughout Scotland work directly in partnership with all the unions, not just the FBU, in a mature, stable environment.

We are unclear at present about what the negotiating and consultation arrangements will be, particularly on pay, terms and conditions and the pensions of not just firefighters but our 1,000 support staff.

The question is very apposite. More flesh needs to be put on the bones of consultation, negotiation, pay and conditions of service and pensions before we get to the end of the process.

David McLetchie: Would anyone else like to comment?

The Convener: No one else has indicated that they would like to speak—I am sorry; Councillor Durham has a comment to make.

Councillor Durham: I would support the Parliament having any such role as proposed. If that could be worked into the bill, it would be welcome, certainly from the perspective of the existing fire conveners. It would give confidence. There is always a concern about the centralisation of power. It would be good for the bill to give the Parliament a role.

When I became a convener, I went back and read the previous legislation, which was written a long time ago. Once the bill is enacted, it will probably be in place for a very long time. All the people who are currently involved will be long gone, so any effective role that could be found for the Parliament would be a good thing.

The Convener: Thank you very much.

Jenny Marra has waived her supplementary, so there are no further questions on the table. If, on reflection, members of the panel have any additional information that they wish to provide, I invite them to submit it in writing.

I suspend the meeting for eight minutes.

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel. Sir Hugh Orde is president of the Association of Chief Police Officers. He is accompanied by Oliver Cattermole, who is ACPO’s director of communications. Good morning—yes, it is still morning. It feels as if it is the afternoon.

We will move straight to questions from members.

Humza Yousaf (Glasgow) (SNP): Good morning, Sir Hugh. The discussions that we have had about a single police force always tend to come down to the importance of local policing. You will identify with that. The idea of a single police force is always played off against the idea of local policing. From your experience, is it possible that a single police force could enhance local policing and, indeed, levels of accountability?

Sir Hugh Orde (Association of Chief Police Officers): The short answer is yes. The size and scale of the operation are not such that, by definition, the bigger the organisation gets, the less commitment there is to local policing. During my time in Northern Ireland between 2002 and 2009—it was seven years to the day—we had a substantial report to implement. The whole focus of the Patten report was on a local style of policing that was based on a human rights training agenda. It was about allowing my officers to belong to the Gaelic Athletic Association and to play its sports. That was delivered by the association by 2005 or 2006.

The Convener: You had 174 recommendations to implement.

Sir Hugh Orde: Yes. Looking back, I think that the Patten report was an incredibly sensible report. It was sensible because it was not rocket science—it was a very practical report. It put forward a model of policing that could be implemented around the world, albeit that there were some bespoke issues.

It goes back to commitment. We had delivered pretty much everything in the report that we could deliver by the time I left. There were two recommendations whose implementation was outside our control. One was to build a police college which, sadly, is only now being built; it should have been built long before now. The other was about allowing my officers to belong to the Gaelic Athletic Association and to play its sports. That was delivered by the association by 2005 or 2006.

Humza Yousaf: In your experience, whether from your time in Northern Ireland or from your work in England and Wales, what is the best model when it comes to reconciling the tensions that may exist between local and national priorities? The fact that such tensions exist was borne out when we looked at the creation of a single fire and rescue service but, in the police context, what is the best model for reconciling the differences that will inevitably emerge?

Sir Hugh Orde: There will always be tensions. The reality is that we have a decreasing resource. It seems to me that one of the strongest arguments for building a single force is that it involves removing overheads and focusing on the front line. Although the police in England and Wales are not going down that line—the present UK Government and, indeed, the previous UK Government decided that they were not persuaded of the need to reorganise the basic policing model of 44 forces, including the Police Service of Northern Ireland—I am seeing huge efforts being made on collaboration and cross-boundary working to drive out efficiencies, whether from back-office functions or operational units, to maintain front-line service delivery. That challenge is not faced if there is just one force, but it is necessary to work out the balance in the policing model between local and national.

In the 21st century, the biggest threats to the country come from cybercrime, organised crime, international crime and terrorism. It is not possible to address those at a local level, but it is necessary to have the confidence of communities to keep them safe at local level. Every chief officer whom I have the privilege to represent recognises that, without that confidence, it will not be possible to deliver at the national level. One is a function of the other. Indeed, there are case studies that show that critical information from communities that has been gleaned through policing at local level has been fed up through what is quite a tight chain—even in our case, where we have 44 forces; you will have one organisation, plus security services—and serious terrorist offences have been prevented. Chief officers will not give that up.

Nevertheless, robust debate is needed and a robust accountability model that makes the police chief realise that they are being held to account and truly challenged on where their people are. In Northern Ireland, I had a policing board of 19 people, which was two more than my colleagues in England and Wales had. Ten of those board members were not directly elected but were nominated by the major parties in keeping with the d’Hondt principle, whereby the number of board members from each party depended on its success in the local elections. At the beginning, Sinn Féin was not engaged with policing at all, so Sinn Féin was not represented on the board. Those 10 members were balanced by nine independent members who were appointed by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

The policing board was, without question, independent and it had legitimacy, which was a vital factor. It could also, in law, hold me to account in public. We used to have 10 or 11 public meetings a year at which my senior management team and I would be held to account in front of television cameras—broadcast live if there was an exciting set of questions, not live if there was not. I would also be available afterwards for interview by the media. It was a very transparent process, which was critical to the success of what we had to deliver in Northern Ireland.

Humza Yousaf: Previous panels have discussed the need for accountability and transparency and the idea of holding public meetings.

Following on from our discussion of accountability, do you have any reservations about the proposed size of the Scottish police authority and its make-up as suggested by the bill?

Sir Hugh Orde: It is not for me to form a view on your plan, but I will describe what I think worked.

When I took over in Northern Ireland, there was a far larger police service there—much closer in size to the police service in Scotland—than there is now. When I left, I had 7,500 sworn officers; when I started, I had more than 10,000 plus support staff, even though we covered only 5,500 square miles, not the substantial territory that the Scottish police service is responsible for looking after. At the time, Northern Ireland had a population of between 1.6 million and 1.7 million. My sense is that people who did not live in Belfast, which is seen as the hub, felt that they had a clearly identifiable police leader to whom they could relate in their area. They also had a structure of accountability at a local level in district policing partnerships, whereby the local police leader, who might have been only a chief inspector or chief superintendent, would report every month to the local board, which was a mixture of elected and non-elected members with a full-time manager employed by the police board at the centre, so there was connectivity. At the centre, frankly, I could not have delivered in Northern Ireland, given its history, without a board whose legitimacy was rooted in a set of democratic principles and which had a number of members who could be related to because they were MLAs or others from political parties in the province. That was critical.

The board had numerous sub-committees that were very effective. Reflecting on the fact that I am due to appear before Lord Leveson’s inquiry next week or the week after, I recall that we even had a sub-committee that would hold the PSNI’s equivalent of Oliver Cattermole to account two or three times a year on the PSNI media strategy. The process was forensic and detailed, but the board was a big organisation with about 60 members of staff and quite a substantial budget. Critically, it sat independently in separate buildings. It also had quite a lot of grip under the legislation, and I could be ordered to attend board meetings—“required” was the slightly more polite word that was used. The board never had to use that power, though. If the chairman said, “Will you please attend?” of course I went. I had to answer questions and had limited grounds on which to refuse to do so. I could have appealed to the secretary of state on national security grounds, but I never did so.
The need for transparency is the main point. The more open and straightforward you are in your accountability structure, the more credibility you will have with the communities. There was great interest in policing in Ireland, although there is perhaps less in England and Wales. I suspect that there is a substantial interest in policing here.

John Finnie: I declare an interest in my membership of Amnesty International, which has provided the committee with evidence. It is that evidence, along with evidence that we have received from the Scottish Human Rights Commission, that I would like to ask about.

Good morning, Sir Hugh. Accepting that the situation in Northern Ireland then was totally different from the situation now, can you comment on the significance of human rights to the progress that has been made by the PSNI? In particular, I am thinking about the inclusion of human rights in the oath that is sworn by officers.

Sir Hugh Orde: The first thing that I did was take the oath. It is very important. Lord Patten was trying to deliver a police service for all the communities. He wanted it to be seen not as a force serving one side or the other but as an inclusive police service. It had to be set up using a set of clearly recognisable principles. He, quite rightly, chose the human rights agenda. That is not a soft, flaky notion; it is a recognition of the basic rights of all citizens and it is about how we manage it when policing impacts on and, on occasion, collides with those rights.

The human rights agenda was embedded in every training course. I was inspected on our compliance with that agenda by independent people. Again, that goes back to the point about transparency. As an aside, I should say that all this was reassuringly expensive and we did have money. The people who held me to account were independent advisers to the policing board, not to me. The first was Keir Starmer, who is now the Director of Public Prosecutions, and the second was Jane Gordon, who is an eminent barrister and human rights expert. The principle was not just window dressing; it was embedded in everything that we did.

I have an example. Sadly, I had a fully armed service. One of the recommendations was that we had to review every six months, although we never managed to reduce substantially the level of armament that our officers carried. When officers retrained, as they all had to do twice a year at a minimum, the first input was not about how to shoot at a target but about article 2 of the European convention on human rights.

The human rights agenda was embedded in our system, and public order and everything else were policed against that agenda, which was hugely important.

David McLetchie: The experience of embedding human rights in processes has been explained in the submissions that we have received. To what extent should those practices be imported into police forces in Scotland or, indeed, in England and Wales? In many ways, what was done in Northern Ireland is promoted as an exemplar for other forces and is not seen as unique to Northern Ireland’s circumstances. Do you believe that to be the case? Should those practices be imported into police forces in the rest of the UK, or are there unique aspects in Northern Ireland that mean that those practices are not suitable for importation?

Sir Hugh Orde: One of the unique aspects was the starting point, which was a substantial change in name and then the implementation of a substantial independent report. In a way, my job was quite straightforward in that I had a roadmap. All the clever thinking had been done, but we had to make it happen, and implementation is always challenging.

The human rights agenda is more implicit than explicit in the rest of the country. In my judgment, we in the UK operate against a background of human rights. We have the European code of police ethics; it is not just a British thing. Forces are becoming ever more aware of their obligations under human rights legislation. One has only to look at the debates about public order after the recent disturbances and previous demonstrations, and the new approach to demonstrations in the UK, to see how seriously it is being taken. It is difficult and challenging, but it is a good base on which to deliver effective policing based on what I—hopefully without sounding sentimental—call the Peelian principles, which go back to 1829, have stood the test of time and are still good for the next century.

David McLetchie: So we should import them then.

Sir Hugh Orde: They are there already, but they are not as explicit.

David McLetchie: That is the question for us. Should such practices be explicit rather than implicit?

Sir Hugh Orde: Far be it from me to dictate what you should be doing. As I said at the beginning, the Patten reform programme is a good blueprint for policing if one distils out some of the specifics, such as 50:50 recruiting, which was bespoke for Northern Ireland. It is a very good model for policing.

I am not persuaded that there is a huge gap between Lord Patten’s vision for policing and what we have here already, but we made some things more explicit. To an extent, that was to do with transparency and ensuring that the public, who knew their rights very well, were clear about where we were going and what our plan was. The process was very open.

The police board and the district policing partnerships were critical but, in my judgment, the informal relationships were as important as the formal ones, and I include the third sector in that. I think that I met Amnesty International, as well as the pressure groups, the single-issue groups and others with an interest in the whole history. I set a benchmark that I would speak to anyone who wanted to make a difference to policing. That was quite a good bedrock and it allowed me to speak to many people from many organisations, some of which had been quite difficult.

Graeme Pearson: I want to cover two areas. One follows on from our discussion with the earlier panel on how to resolve the tension between national interest and local demand. You were in the public gallery earlier, so you will have heard the views that were expressed about where conflict and friction can occur between the local delivery of service and national strategic aims. From your experience in Northern Ireland, and perhaps in your role in ACPO, how would you best resolve those issues? Given that we are at the planning stage for a Scottish police service, what lessons can we learn and how can we avoid some of the pitfalls?

Sir Hugh Orde: Thank you for the easy question, Graeme.

I have a number of points on that. When I took over in Northern Ireland, as one would expect, we had a fairly substantial central structure for firearms, intelligence, major crime investigation and anti-terrorism operations. It was a large and well-resourced service so, in a way, the huge challenge did not come until later in my time, when budgets started to reduce and we had to think about and do all the things that other forces had been doing, such as the necessary but unpopular closing of police stations and the amalgamation of small units into slightly larger ones. We went from 26 or whatever policing districts to a smaller number. The four regions in Belfast were reduced to two.

We implemented all the best practice to minimise the impact and maintain front-line service delivery. We ensured that the local resource was controlled by an empowered local district commander. Whether it was a chief inspector or chief superintendent, they were given the resource and the permission to deliver bespoke policing in their territory. Although Northern Ireland is nothing like as big as Scotland, like Scotland it has some very different areas. Belfast is a big conurbation, but much of Northern Ireland is made up of small rural and agricultural hamlets and communities, all of which need policing. The district commanders had permission to deliver local policing in keeping with the local policing plans, which were drawn up by the district policing partnerships.

We also had a central plan, which was owned by the policing board. Because the policing board had the authority, there was a sort of connectivity between the two aspects, so the arrangement never created a huge tension. Unsurprisingly, the local communities wanted exactly what the national board wanted, which was to reduce crimes that impacted on communities, such as burglary, car crime and antisocial behaviour. Therefore, tensions never arose.

The process of deciding how much of the resource went where was more difficult. However, as I said, the approach was based on the principle that, if you lose communities, you lose the rest of it. Therefore, I did not want to denude my neighbourhood policing teams. For example, we set a rule that no officer could move to a specialist post—in a TSG, for example—within the first three years of their service. Officers were required to stay in their communities for the first three years as a minimum before they could move on and specialise.

The Convener: Sorry, but what is a TSG?

Sir Hugh Orde: Sorry—it is a territorial support group.

The Convener: I am not sure that I am any wiser after that.

Sir Hugh Orde: It involves the sort of officers who are trained in public order that Scotland kindly sent down to help to deal with the English riots not that long ago. In Northern Ireland, they are full-time officers who operate in units, whereas many such officers here are not full-time. That is a specialist post. By definition, those officers routinely deal with conflict. We said that we were not prepared to have an officer in that role, or in other specialist roles such as intelligence, with less than three years' service. Officers had to stay at the front end and learn their trade, for want of a better description, before they moved on.

At the end of the day, that is a decision that the chief has to make, but the important part of that message is that they must then be held to account for it. We were routinely challenged, quite properly, at the central board. For example, we were rightly challenged if we wanted to close police stations, because that is a highly emotive issue. The challenge was not just on the deployment of officers but on the deployment of equipment, too. The issue of tasers caused particularly difficult tensions around operational independence and the role of the policing board, but we managed that without a meltdown of the structure, although it took us 18 months. Those difficult issues can be handled, but there must be a completely independent structure to hold the chief to account for where they put their people.

Graeme Pearson: You mentioned that board meetings were televised. Do you feel that the rehearsal of those arguments in public was healthy?

11:15

Sir Hugh Orde: There is no question about that. Frankly, I do not think that any chief constable thinks that operational independence means that you can do what you want and you simply pay lip service to the police authority. In my experience—and, indeed, in my current role, in which I speak to them all the time—chief constables take the police authorities’ role very seriously. The public aspect is critically important and entirely proper, because it goes to the heart not only of transparency but of the relationship between the police and the press. It should be an obligation on chief constables to speak to the press about what they are doing because it is another form of accountability. Whether they were held in public at each month’s main board meeting or held in the sub-committees, those conversations without question shaped and changed what we did without interfering with the role of the board or the independent chief.

Graeme Pearson: The move to a single Scottish police force will mean that many of the previous organisations and connections will go. What might that mean for the national UK response with regard to information and communications technology, organised crime and other such issues?

Sir Hugh Orde: I do not think that those connections should or indeed need to go as a result of reorganisation. Without consent, any model of collective policing that involves—crikey—65 million people and 140,000 or 150,000 police officers just will not work. Of course, things can go wrong. For example, in the recent riots, in which my role was not only to keep the Prime Minister informed of what was going on through the Cabinet Office briefing room but to co-ordinate the movement of officers around the country, there came a point where I had a conversation with the president of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, as a result of which you kindly sent us critical support at a critical time. The situation was tight, but the whole national infrastructure held. I am mindful of the Olympics and, indeed, the G8, when several thousand officers travelled south to north to support policing in Scotland. That kind of collective effort has to survive; it cannot fail.

On an equally important issue, the incident at Glasgow airport very clearly shows that people involved in terrorism do not respect any boundaries that we try to draw on maps. Those connections must be maintained and I am very keen to do anything I can to ensure that they are. We have an extremely good relationship with ACPOS; its president comes to my meetings and I go to its meetings as often as I can. We certainly have connectivity at an operational level.

Graeme Pearson: But you will appreciate that, with the move to a single police force, ACPOS—if there are sufficient numbers to maintain something like ACPOS—and the committees within that structure will change. Should we make it a priority in Scotland to ensure that whatever mechanism exists connects properly with the UK environment?

Sir Hugh Orde: Again, I do not know what will happen to ACPOS post-event. Although with its 300 or so members, including senior support colleagues, ACPO is far bigger, it, too, is shrinking. Although the law requires each force to have a chief constable and a deputy chief constable, an assistant chief constable might be shared between two forces. Interestingly, however, ACPO and the Police Superintendents Association of England and Wales together account for only about 1.5 per cent of the whole policing organisation, so perhaps we need to think differently about who leads these things. Chief superintendents and superintendents are highly able people who I am sure could take on some of that work for the collective good, but we simply must not allow this effort to fail.

The Convener: John, do you have a supplementary?

John Finnie: I had, but Sir Hugh covered the point in his final comment. It is all about positions rather than ranks.

The Convener: I think that we have already decided that rank is not relevant. I have to say that I am still chewing that over.

Roderick Campbell: With regard to the debate about having a sterile corridor between the police and forensic services, what in your view should the chain of command be in that respect?

Sir Hugh Orde: I note that the plan is for an independent structure. I am not a forensics expert, but I can say that, when I was in the PSNI, I had officers involved in forensic recovery to ensure that there was no confusion about who was doing what. Such work is not beyond the wit of front-line officers; indeed, because of resource issues, we spent considerable effort on training new officers in it at training school. It can be expensive if you do not allow people to make professional judgments about the likelihood of recovery and about what they should be recovering. It would be easy to have a Rolls-Royce model. In a world in which, in my judgment, we are sadly becoming increasingly risk averse and less encouraging of people to take more risk, I can envisage situations in which an expert could require a lot to be done, which would cost the service a lot of money. I have read about and understand the service’s concerns, and I encourage you to listen to them. Could what is proposed work? Yes, of course it could. A great thing about the police is that they will make anything work, but I am not sure whether the numbers add up for a completely independent service.

Lewis Macdonald: I am interested in your overview of policing across the United Kingdom. A body that we have not touched on, and which is perhaps an exception to the traditional local authority base of policing, is the Metropolitan Police. My question is similar to Graeme Pearson’s questions about learning lessons. From the ACPO perspective, are there lessons to be learned for Scotland from how the Metropolitan Police balances ministerial command with local accountability?

Sir Hugh Orde: That is a nice way of reminding me that I came second in the competition for commissioner. Thank you. It is not for me to comment on London, and I am sure that the commissioner would be delighted to attend the committee.

I did 26 years in the Met—under a different system—and because of my current role I occasionally speak to the deputy mayor of London about the Met’s contribution to accountability and legitimacy. If the Met does not contribute to the national agenda, we are in trouble. The commissioner is extremely supportive of the agenda. The Met is living proof that neighbourhood-style policing can be delivered for a very large population, but what Bernard Hogan-Howe does not have is the huge geography that you have here. I am not persuaded that geography is a killer on this, but it might be a limiting factor, because in some remote areas coverage is very low. I remember the chief of Northern Constabulary pointing out to me that he had to fly to get to some of his parishioners. There is a visibility issue, but size and scale are not issues for local policing.

The advantage that the Met has is that, in the majority of cases, the commissioner has enough resource to consume his own issues. Public order is an exception, and the Met is probably now more a recipient of aid in that area than a contributor, because of how public order demonstrations have moved on. There is no question but that it is more efficient if there is one force, because the individual in charge has a far larger army—for want of a better description—to deploy and can generally manage without looking for additional aid. The big challenge that I had in the public order situation was that I had to deal with 44 chiefs rather than a smaller number. That debate is not live in the United Kingdom, but the ACPO view would be that it should be. With lines of command, there should be simplicity and a clear leader.

In Ireland, I made the decision early on that the chief constable has to be a visible leader—and not just the chief constable but their whole command team. I was lucky after the first year, which was challenging, to have a command team that stayed with me pretty much for the other six. I learned that it was important to have a consistent approach and to empower local commanders to be highly visible and accessible in their local communities. London’s borough system is similar to that. Each borough has a chief superintendent who is the figurehead for local policing.

Regarding the national structure, the Met is hugely important in the world of anti-terrorism, and ACPO’s terrorism and allied matters committee is routinely chaired by the assistant commissioner for specialist operations. The Met has a national function regarding multi-site terrorist attacks and, in certain situations, the national co-ordinator will have overall command across other jurisdictions. That is an example of our putting structures in place because we do not have a national or a regional service. I am sure that Bernard Hogan-Howe would be delighted to come up and help out.

Lewis Macdonald: Do you see any difference between London and the rest of England and Wales?

Sir Hugh Orde: It is simply scale.

Lewis Macdonald: Could you say something specifically on consent and community engagement with the police service?

Sir Hugh Orde: All services are committed to that, but certainly the Met, under all the commissioners whom I can remember, was very much organised around neighbourhood teams led by a sergeant, with a mixed team of police community support officers. Indeed, routinely, whenever those numbers come under threat, there are questions in the House of Commons—not only does Bernard Hogan-Howe have a mayor and a deputy mayor looking at what he is doing, it is not unusual for London MPs to raise issues in the House of Commons about such things as the resourcing of community teams in south London.

The Convener: The situation would be the same with MSPs in the Scottish Parliament, I think.

Jenny Marra: Have you found that there is an optimum ratio between police officers and backroom staff that maximises the effectiveness and the financial efficiency of policing?

Sir Hugh Orde: The short answer is no. In England and Wales, we are seeing an absolute commitment from chiefs to drive money out of anything that is not operations. However, in the complex legal world in which we all operate—I am not an expert on your legal system, but I suspect that the issues that I am about to talk about are similar—it is impossible to run a police service without a substantial back-office capacity. You can do certain things to minimise that, and we can see things going on, such as outsourcing work to civilians rather than having directly employed staff. A lot of effort is being put into finding ways to deliver the back-office functions. However, you have to step back and look at the national picture. Some forces in England—one or two in particular—have more than 50 per cent unsworn staff. If every force has that level of unsworn staff, when we get the next instance of serious disorder, we could be struggling to be able to inform the Prime Minister that we have enough sworn officers to meet our commitments.

Issues to do with serious crime, such as disclosure, are hugely resource intensive, and much of that work requires someone with the skills of an officer—either an officer or a recently retired officer—to deliver it.

My answer is probably unsatisfactory, because, although we have continually tried to drive money out of that part of the business by bringing smaller units together and creating efficiency savings by having bigger units delivering to a wider audience, there will come a point when police services in the UK say that they cannot get any more out of the back office. Again, it is something that a police authority should constantly challenge chief officers on, and it is something that chief officers are undoubtedly challenging themselves on.

Your advantage is that you will have one force to drive the measures through. The challenge that we have is that collaboration is, by definition, suboptimal. It requires police authorities to agree on where they are focusing and chief officers to agree on what they are focusing on. That creates a situation in which there are all sorts of different collaborations across the UK, which cannot be the most efficient way of operating.

The Convener: We have no further questions, but you might want to speak about issues that you feel we have not touched on.

Sir Hugh Orde: You took me slightly by surprise by moving straight to the questions, but I think that you asked about all the issues that I wanted to raise.

If there were a point that I would stress from my experience of the world that I inherited in Ireland, it would be the critical importance of a legitimate oversight body that had the confidence of a majority of communities—which was not the case at the beginning—and could hold me to account in a transparent and open way, coupled with an absolute determination to communicate in a far wider way and to talk about what we were trying to deliver in a way that gave confidence to the communities that were preparing to move towards us rather than away from us. Of course, that is different from the situation in Scotland.

The continual concern for the seven years that I was there was neighbourhood policing. I do not think that you can do enough to reassure communities that every chief officer is committed to the neighbourhood structure as the building blocks of the service, and is prepared to be held to account for any move away from that or any unnecessary centralisation. On the empowerment agenda, we found that, if we gave our district commanders the ability to fly, they flew. We gave them permission to deliver bespoke policing, which meant that, in parts of Northern Ireland where the threat was high, neighbourhood police officers were—sadly—heavily armed while, in other parts, they were lightly armoured and did not even wear body armour in the routine work of their days. That was because I wanted not a standard response that was right for the cops but one that was right for the people in the communities. That was hugely important.

I came from London, which is geographically small, which meant that we could move officers around quite quickly. However, I found that the larger geographical spread of Northern Ireland was not an inhibitor to a neighbourhood policing model, and neither is having a single force. Both elements can go together hand in hand.

Given the threats that we are facing, I can understand why you are going in the direction in which you are going. I am trying to deliver against 21st century threats with a modern model of policing that was created in 1962, before colour television and the internet.

As Graeme Pearson pointed out, the special relationship—that seems to be quite a current phrase, these days—between ACPOS and ACPO is a good one, and it is important in terms of day-to-day delivery.

The Convener: I think that Graeme Pearson was trying to indicate that he wanted to ask a supplementary question, despite my ruling. He is not getting to ask it, as that would give him a very special relationship with me, which he is not going to have, and the rest of the committee members might also pitch in with questions.
Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our third and final panel of witnesses: John Duffy, Scottish secretary of the Fire Brigades Union, and Sarah Duncan, regional organiser and secretary of the Scottish fire committee within Unison.

The Fire Officers Association was due to give evidence as part of this panel, but regrettably its representative is now unable to attend. That is a pity.

I thank the witnesses for their written submissions. As they were here for the previous session, they know that I go straight to questions. David McLetchie will go first, followed by Humza Yousaf.

David McLetchie:

Good morning. I flagged up this issue with the first witness panel. The FBU's submission mentions a range of industrial relations practices that reflect individual circumstances within the current eight fire and rescue services. Can you give me some examples of that variety?

John Duffy (Fire Brigades Union): Without going into specific details, the current arrangements rely heavily on relationships. There are eight different chief officers and eight different deputies and assistants. We have an internal structure that matches that: we have eight brigade branches throughout Scotland, and brigade secretaries and chairs who interact on a daily basis.

With regard to our terms and conditions of service, our pay and holidays and the basic framework of our discipline and grievance procedures are set at a UK level, but there is a range of local variation. How that has developed over the years very much comes down to those individual relationships. There is an industrial relations protocol that represents an attempt by the national joint council for local authority fire and rescue services—the UK-wide body—to improve industrial relations, but even that has been implemented to varying degrees across the country.

Today is unusual for me, because I have not before sat down for such a protracted period and listened to the chief officers agreeing with the Fire Brigades Union.

The Convener: You should try to be happy about it.

John Duffy: Absolutely. I am hopeful that it is an indication of where we are going, rather than where we have been.

We are making the point that the reform process as it stands is quite unusual, because we do not have an employer. We are still employed by the eight fire and rescue services and will continue to be so until 1 April 2013. However, in order to implement something cohesive on that start date, we need to discuss a number of issues in detail with what would be our employer, even though we do not have one. We have put in place four workstreams that cover the development work of the new service. The Fire Brigades Union is heavily involved in that, and we are working closely with our management colleagues.

In the past three or four months, we have made considerable progress on not only the detail of what will be in the service in future, but how we conduct our business. If that developing relationship is an indication of what we might see in the new service, the Fire Brigades Union is quite optimistic. We have developed an encouraging working relationship, and we hope that it will continue and get better. We put that in our submission as we do not particularly want to emphasise the past—we want to look to the future.

David McLetchie: Would Ms Duncan like to comment on that as far as her members are concerned?

Sarah Duncan (Unison): We have the same issues about being employed by eight separate employers. The divergence in local practices and policies will inevitably cause a bit of tension when we become one service. People are fearful that their terms and conditions might be downgraded and that their good local policies might be changed to take them down to the level of slightly less adequate policies elsewhere.

Industrial relations between Unison and the employers have always been good. The situation is a bit more tense right now because of the focus on front-office versus back-office staff, which makes a lot of our members feel marginalised. They are as essential to the smooth running of the fire service as the firefighters are—our colleagues in the FBU recognise that.

The constant attention from yourselves and the media about cutting back-office costs makes back-office staff feel, in some cases, that they are not valued as much. With financial imperatives driving the reform and some doubt over the amount of savings that can be achieved, our members look at some of the predictions for savings and think, "They're not going to cut firefighters' jobs; they're going to cut all our jobs instead." That makes them feel a lot more insecure.
David McLetchie: Among your respective members, will there be pressure for standardisation at national level from groups who are currently employed in one board area and who believe that the locally negotiated terms in another area are superior? Will they expect you to get them up to the same level?

Sarah Duncan: Yes, of course. That is human nature. If people see someone who does the same job as them in a different location being paid more to do it, they will want to be paid at that level. I understand that all the boards have done job evaluation schemes to ensure that jobs are correctly graded internally to minimise problems with equal pay and so on.

Once we have moved to a single employer, if there are widely diverging terms and conditions for finance officers, secretaries or clerks and, for example, somebody who is based in Aberdeen and who is technically doing the same job as somebody who is based in Motherwell gets different rates and different overtime allowances, we will be back in the situation that we found ourselves in in local authorities with big equal pay problems.

David McLetchie: Does the financial model work on the basis of a levelling up, a levelling down, or settling somewhere in the middle?

Sarah Duncan: In terms of staff morale and motivation, which will obviously take a dip with all the uncertainty that is caused by merging services, it would not be sensible for people to talk about levelling down terms and conditions. Staff are already concerned about the future of their jobs. If they think that there is any threat to their earning power when, like everyone else in the public sector, they have suffered pay freezes and are suffering from the increased cost of living, you will find it very difficult to motivate staff to go into the new single service with the right attitude and make it work from day one.

David McLetchie: I am sure that that is the case.

John Duffy: A factor that must be taken into account for uniformed staff is that a lot of the duplication that is the focus of attention is at the upper end of the organisation. Our membership covers all uniformed staff. Our members work on the whole-time system and the retained-duty system. Some members work in the control rooms and our membership goes through the rank structure from a new firefighter walking through the door on their first day right the way up. A number of our members who are in quite senior posts are concerned that those posts will not exist. We are keen to ensure that, when the music stops and somebody takes the chair away, the individuals are protected. We raised with the Finance Committee that how the shape of the structure is manoeuvred into the future has perhaps not been factored in.

Chief Officer Sweeney picked up on the point that in some areas of the country we are short of firefighters and short of people on fire engines. We may well end up with a situation in the future in which, although there are currently people in elevated posts, we have too many of those posts. The question is how to reshape the structure over time without disadvantaging those individuals who happened to occupy such posts before they went.

David McLetchie: My understanding of your original description is that it is a two-tier system at present. The UK level sets national pay terms and conditions, and the localised level is represented by the present eight-force structure. I presume that we will move to a three-tier system consisting of a UK level, a Scottish level and certain localised elements that you will seek to preserve.

John Duffy: It would be fair to say that the basic pay and conditions will remain at a UK level, as set by the national joint council. National conditions will be standardised across Scotland, but that may result in anomalies, some of which it may be to the advantage of the organisation to keep. For example, local arrangements are made if someone has to travel from their home station to an away station. One journey in particular—between Aberdeen and Elgin—involves a great deal of travel and there are local payments to cover that. It would make absolute sense to maintain such provisions as a local feature within a Scottish environment.

The Convener: The submissions are rightly detailed—we are talking about people's livelihoods. Have you provided evidence to the Finance Committee?

John Duffy: We have given some evidence to the Finance Committee, but it was not as detailed as this.

The Convener: I do not want to duplicate what other committees are doing.

Humza Yousaf: I was interested in the first panel's discussion of functions and how the bill could provide an opportunity to redefine them. How do you get the balance right between enshrining vital functions and not being too prescriptive?

John Duffy: My colleagues on the first panel made a valid point that the current Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 does not reflect the much wider role that the fire service actually plays. With all due respect to those who drafted the 2005 act, they probably did not foresee that, when they changed the name from fire brigade to fire and rescue, the public would not read the small print, which was that the rescue was from road traffic accidents. It is now the public’s perception that if they get into difficulty and need to be rescued, the fire service will rescue them.

To be clear, our members have shown a great deal of adaptability and commitment over the past few years by taking on the provisions of the additional function order. They have taken on a wide range of skills for urban search and rescue, technical rescue, mass decontamination—they deal with chemical, nuclear and biological incidents—water rescue and line rescue, although rope rescue is probably a more accurate description of what we do.

Our taking on water rescue resulted from the additional function order, which specified that the fire service was to rescue people who were in danger of “serious flooding”. However, it did not specify what it meant by the words “serious” or “flooding”. That issue was raised in a parliamentary debate in which the then Minister for Community Safety, Fergus Ewing, specified that it meant areas of water that would usually be classified as dry land.

That raised an issue in Perth. I do not know whether you know Perth particularly well, but part of its flood defences flood football pitches that are usually classified as dry land, so the responsibility to rescue someone there falls to the fire service. The nearby bank, however, is not an area that is usually classified as dry land, so, in theory, the responsibility of the service ends there. If somebody is trapped in water in what was the river, the additional function provisions do not apply. That is complete and utter madness. We have always advocated that, if people are trained to deal with flooding from moving water, they should be able to use their skills anywhere.

There are two good examples when it comes to water rescue: the Clyde through Glasgow and the Tay through Perth. None of the provisions is statutory, and one of our fears is that, with a shrinking budget, a new board will withdraw into its shell and fulfil only its statutory functions. Water rescue is therefore vulnerable. It is a huge asset to communities, and we should be doing far more of it; we should not withdraw from it. However, it is a fact that a line in the legislation gives difficulty.

In our submission, we advocate that the legislation should not try to gaze into a crystal ball and decide what the service will do in the future; rather, it should include the broad principle that we should “Save Life ... Protect Property” and “Render Humanitarian Services”. The other supporting documents, such as the fire service framework, can go into more detail. To pick up on a point that my colleagues made earlier, that detail should be encapsulated in the integrated risk management planning that the service must do.

Humza Yousaf: Thank you for that detailed answer.

You have touched on shrinking budgets and functions being under threat if they are not included in statute. I assume that firemen and firewomen do their jobs in such a commendable manner that if somebody was in danger at the banks of a river, they would go in and help them, even if that function was not prescribed. I do not assume that any of your functions have been hindered thus far, although they may not be in statute—or perhaps they have been and the question is open. We have had shrinking budgets over the past few years. Do you have examples of that having happened?

John Duffy: Chief Officer Sweeney touched on an incident that related to Strathclyde. I will not go into its details, but the sheriff was the first person who made the link between a mineshaft and a building. Prior to that, the additional function order mentioned things such as urban search and rescue, which would be considered as a result of a structure that had collapsed. All the training was based on that.

I will put the ultimate question back to the committee: somebody needs to tell the fire service what they want it to do, as we are doing things piecemeal at the moment. With shrinking budgets—again, this has been referred to this morning—firefighters were moved out of Fife’s borders in the previous financial year and into other authorities to avoid redundancies. So many people with line rescue capabilities were taken that Fife has effectively lost its line rescue resource.

If we look at things strategically across Scotland, which a single service will be able to do, we can decide how many people need to be trained, so eight services will not all try to be jacks of all trades. A strategic view can be taken across the country, and resources and specialisms that come with training costs can be shared out.

There are examples that you ask about because of the shrinking budget, but ultimately it comes down to having a clear definition of what you want the service to do.

The Convener: We have received that clear message from a previous panel.

Lewis Macdonald: I think that both John Duffy and Sarah Duncan have commented on discussions with those who have been involved in designing the bill and progressing it over the past few months. What indications have you had thus far about the jobs that will be removed with the likely changes? How many firefighters and members of Unison do you expect to be removed to achieve the savings as part of the amalgamation? What indications about that have you received thus far?

Sarah Duncan: Unison has not been given any numbers for jobs at risk. I understand that we had a meeting with people last week to raise some concerns about the bill, particularly about the position of staff who are currently employed by local authorities to provide services to the fire boards. Their position is pretty unclear. They might well carry out some of their duties for the local authorities and some for the fire and police boards. Are they going to be transferred or not?

The Convener: What people did you meet? Is it a secret?

Sarah Duncan: No; there was a meeting with someone from the project team to talk about workstreams and the implications for human resources departments.

Discussions are at an early stage. Obviously, we are keen to hear what numbers are being kept in mind. At the moment, it is just speculation based on the savings that were detailed in the outline business case, which has been roundly criticised. There is a lot of scepticism about the figures that were used in that outline business case, particularly about the provision of £4 million for redundancy when that is compared with the huge sum that has been put aside for redundancy in the police service. Given the current state of the jobs market, there is great scepticism about whether people would be prepared to put themselves up for voluntary severance and give up their jobs.

Lewis Macdonald: I suppose that, with around 1,000 non-firefighter staff, you will be able to estimate what some of those figures might mean for the number of posts. Could you share the numbers with us?

Sarah Duncan: No; I do not think that we have done a hard calculation or a head count of the number that would be affected, because there has been no apportionment between the non-uniformed staff and the uniformed staff. If a trade union says that it thinks that 500 or 600 jobs are at risk, that will inflame our members’ opinions. We do not want to do that because we want to make the integration work. It is not in anyone’s interests for us to whip up fears where they should not exist.

John Duffy: Unlike our colleagues in the police service, we do not hear politicians talking about protecting the number of firefighters in every one of their speeches. We would like to hear that even just once; that would be nice.

The Convener: You were looking straight at me when you said that.

John Duffy: We welcome the fact that the Government has put into its proposals a commitment to protecting the front line but—this has already been said—the outline business case has been roundly turned on by everyone. Some of the numbers that are in it simply do not allow for the protection of the front line and financial savings; it will have to be one or the other.

At the moment, we and the service are doing a great deal of work to try to design the new service. It would probably be better if it worked that way around. We need to design the service and see what comes out from it.

One of the areas that is of particular interest is incident command. Our senior officer members, as well as having their day job, which might be in one of the departments that is now seen as replication or duplication, respond to operational incidents. The incident command structure is vital to the outcome of incidents and, particularly from our perspective, to firefighter safety. We need a certain level of incident command to safely conduct operations that are, by their very nature, dangerous.

Another area that we hear about frequently is our control centres. We represent members in the eight control centres, and we keep being told that that is the wrong number. Again, it might be a better idea to figure out the right number before we start to have that conversation.

The savings to be made through the proposals for control centres are minimal in comparison with the capital outlay that will be needed to make the changes. For example, if the radio system needs to be reprogrammed, that will have a £1 million-plus price tag. Changes to control room staffing have a potential cost implication for the service, and at a time when we are trying to protect money it seems pointless to spend capital money in order to save a considerably smaller amount of revenue money.

All of that fits with the idea that, once we know what the role of the new service will be, it will be easier to determine how many people we need and where we need them.

Lewis Macdonald: That all makes a lot of sense. It makes sense to start with the design of the service and then to work through the consequences for the people who work in it. Is the timetable that has been set adequate to allow that to be done properly and in a way that produces savings without an arbitrary cut in the number of posts that reduces the efficiency of the service?
John Duffy: The response to that question would be, “At what point do you want the savings?” Undoubtedly, there are savings to be made from restructuring. I would argue that the fire service has never stopped changing and modernising. Taking 1 April 2013 as a snapshot, some things will be in place that will make it look and feel like a single service, but a great deal of work will still be going on in the background to move to a single organisation. As I mentioned, we will, no doubt, have people in the wrong place. There is currently no facility within our pension scheme for early retirement, we have an undertaking from the Scottish Government that there will be no compulsory redundancies and there is a very limited pot of money for voluntary redundancies. I am not sure how that can be manoeuvred quickly. If you are looking for a longer-term saving, there are savings to be made from reshaping the service so that there is more capacity at the front end and less capacity at the upper end. The question is when you want the savings to be delivered.

Roderick Campbell: Your written submission makes it clear that you see a scrutiny role for the Scottish Parliament, but you do not say an awful lot about the size of the board, its membership or what input of local experience it should have. Perhaps you can clarify for us your views on the board.

John Duffy: Another of my lines that was stolen by the first panel of witnesses was that the board should be about quality, not quantity. Experience not just of the fire service but of scrutiny is vital, and the board must contain people who know the questions to ask. The board will need some members with fire service experience—they will know where the answers are hidden—but it will also need members with experience of scrutinising accounts and the like. That is the balance to be struck, and we would be resistant to seeing the board as a care home for elderly chief officers, for example. A broad range of experience will be required on the board to ensure proper scrutiny.

One of the difficulties that the service has got itself into currently is that it exists within a closed circle. The current joint boards or unitary authorities appoint a chief officer as their personal adviser and—I mean no disrespect to the officers, the boards or the councillors—once they have received that advice, it is all but impossible for them not to take it because they have employed that person as a professional adviser. They then get the same person to develop a policy, to implement the policy, to run the policy, to measure the policy and to report back on how well the policy has done. Guess what—everything is always rosy in the garden. We have seen that veneer come off in the Highlands and Islands recently, and that situation is far from unique. The current scrutiny arrangements are far from ideal.

We are looking for a process that means that, as well as getting vital professional advice, the board has an opportunity to get other views. As representatives of the uniformed side of the organisation, we think that we have a role to play in terms of that board.

The relationship with the local authorities has been raised this morning. We think that it is right that scrutiny starts at the basics of the service, which is at the fire-station and ward levels. In the proposals, the fire service has a clear route through its structure up to the board, but there is a less clear route for the ward councillor with regard to where they would take issues. Some of that will come out through the pathfinder work, which will consider whether there should be a local board, a council sub-committee, a joint board for the fire and police services or whatever.

It is vital that the fire and rescue board is able to link up with the chief inspector of the advisory unit, representatives from COSLA, the professionals who deliver the service and so on to ensure that the scrutiny is all encompassing.

Roderick Campbell: What do you envisage being in the local plan?

John Duffy: At the moment, each service has an integrated risk management plan. Some of the services create a local plan that is based on an individual station and sets out what that station will do in order to meet the overall plan. We see that happening on a different scale. Instead of there being service plans, there will be a national Scottish plan, and each station will continue to develop its individual work, because that varies from station to station. The work does not necessarily vary from service to service or from one local authority area to another, but two neighbouring stations could have quite different risks. Planning must be based at station level. As stations are grouped in local authority areas, however, it is right that the planning that is done at station level is pulled together so that the councillors can see what the stations in their area are trying to deliver.

There should be a national vision of where we are all going, combined with practical, station-based plans that set out what the stations will deliver and that are clustered together to form a local plan for the local authority.

Sarah Duncan: As well as all the recommendations from the FBU about the need to obtain the widest possible spectrum of advice and professional input, it is important that the board reflects the geographical diversity of Scotland. Unison has concerns that the board is too small to ensure that there is proper representation from all parts of the country. We think that 11 is too few, and I think that we are suggesting that there be up to 20 people on the board, which would still be manageable and would ensure that every area is represented. The majority of people on the board should be democratically accountable. We think that the principle of local democratic accountability should not be lost when you move to a national service. Ensuring that ward councillors have a power of scrutiny in relation to their local station meets that principle, but we think that that approach needs to feed upwards and become a fundamental principle of the composition of the board as well.

The Convener: We need to think about whether we are looking at representation or the scrutiny of a national fire and rescue plan. We have raised that issue with the police board as well. Having so many local members on the board creates difficulties because, for a start, they do not all agree with one another. I do not know how you pick a local member who will represent the thoughts of their council.

Lewis Macdonald: When we discussed the matter with some of those interested in policing accountability, they pointed out that policing services might well be delivered on a regional basis and therefore there might be a mechanism for regional representation on a national board. Could that apply to fire services? If half the members of a national board were to be locally accountable, how would that accountability be achieved?

Sarah Duncan: Currently, when local accountability from local authorities is needed on national bodies, it is done through COSLA. The councillors, through COSLA, have their fights, and then represent the body. COSLA representatives are on the ministerial advisory group, so why create a new mechanism when there is already a system in place?

The Convener: Are all councils members of COSLA?

Sarah Duncan: I think that they all are now.

The Convener: There was a while there when they were not. It comes and goes.

Sarah Duncan: Yes.

John Duffy: We are less concerned about geographical representation than about governance. Ultimately, the Parliament has a role to play—that has been referred to. In my time as a senior office bearer in the Fire Brigades Union, I have been involved in preparing documents for a number of parliamentary debates, and there is a clear interest in the Parliament in what the fire and rescue service does. You are democratically accountable to the people of Scotland, and this is about the ability of the Parliament to scrutinise the legislation, the framework document that will drive the strategic plan, and the strategic plan itself.

It is vital that at some point the board, the chief and others sit here in front of a committee—not necessarily this one, although the Justice Committee would be the best place for it—and tell you directly what they planned to do, what they have done, what they have not achieved, and how they will plug the gap in the next year. That is how we see the democratic basis of the board being considered.

The Convener: Yes, you state that in your written submission.

Graeme Pearson: We have covered many of the items that I wanted to question you on. You have just talked about democratic governance, and on page 5 of your submission you present options for the Parliament's involvement. I do not seek to put words into your mouth, but you mentioned a “veneer” of scrutiny. Are you frightened that the bill replicates such a veneer and hence you want the Parliament involved, or is there another reason for wanting that involvement? I would be grateful to hear from both members of the panel.

John Duffy: You have hit the nail on the head. We do not want to import our current scrutiny levels and systems. Audit Scotland is clearly in vogue, but in its 2007 report it considered what the previous fire boards had done and came up with two key points: the lack of understanding of the service, and the fact that there was an overreliance on the word of the chief officer. To address the lack of understanding, all the boards were given training, by the chief officer, so dealing with one problem has exacerbated the other.

The Convener: Even we can see that there is something ironic about that.

John Duffy: Absolutely. A councillor's understanding of what they are expected to scrutinise the chief on has been derived from information given to them by that chief. That fails straight away.

I know that the convener did not want us to get into the Highlands and Islands situation but, throughout a five-year period, the Fire Brigades Union told the board there that a problem was going to arise. All the stations had been upgraded, but the training department had not, so there was nobody to train the people who were expected to do the job. That was a disaster waiting to happen. It took a lot of effort, influence and pressure, including from some of our MSPs, to get reports published that had been held in secret. They should not have been secret, because the board is a public organisation.

We cannot have that in future. We are absolutely clear that we have no fear of a board that is made up of people who spend their time scrutinising the service, not going to other, seemingly more important, committees—the ones that get you re-elected, such as the education, housing and planning ones. We want proper scrutiny. We have no fear of a single board, but it must be looking over its shoulder and coming to the Parliament to answer questions.

Colin Keir: I am interested in Mr Duffy’s comments in his written submission about firefighting at sea and the cuts in the coastguard service. Will you expand on the possible resource implications? What resources already exist in the fire service, what might you require and what might happen in the longer term if there are further stresses to the coastguard service budget?

John Duffy: In the fire station in Lerwick, there is a room allocated to firefighting at sea, with all the equipment hanging up. However, after 1 April, it will be quite sad because there will be nobody to use it, as there will be no funding. Funding for that came from the Maritime and Coastguard Agency, which ultimately means the Department for Transport in Westminster. That funding has been cut so, in effect, there is now no budget. The element for the fire service was about £140,000—it was not a huge budget.

Once again, we come back to the question of what we want the service to do. Does the Scottish Parliament want the service to deliver that particular service? That is part of the issue about whether we protect the front line or the structures. The reason why we are here discussing the bill is that the Scottish fire conveners’ proposal to have four years of cuts and then to merge the bits that were left was rejected in favour of merging the service to protect the front line. That was the right choice and it was the choice of most of the mainstream parties in the election. We were delighted that the manifestos had an emphasis on protecting the front line.

The service that the member mentions is part of the front line. It is not a bolt-on. The issue is part of the question that was asked earlier about functions. We have the functions of dealing with fires, preventing fires and dealing with road traffic accidents, and then a series of bits that bolt on seemingly at random. We must decide what the role will be and then protect that. A key issue in that is about protecting infrastructure. We already have infrastructure in place. If we let it go, we could end up in a couple of years with something like the Waverley route or tram project, in which we try to put back infrastructure that our forefathers ditched.

The Convener: Sorry, but you mentioned the Waverley route. It is going fine, believe you me.

John Duffy: Yes, but my point is that, if we had not lost the infrastructure in the first place, we would not need to put it back now.

The Convener: I am with you there, absolutely. You are my friend. On you go.

John Duffy: The decisions on the coastguard were made elsewhere, but the Parliament must consider how to replace that service. Can we replace it if we let the infrastructure go? Could the fire and rescue service assist with that and take on the function as part of the wider rescue remit?

Colin Keir: This might sound mildly party political, but if we take forward your recommendations to enhance the sea rescue service, another place may decide that it is a good opportunity to cut completely the coastguard service, as it is known at present. We would end up with a longer-term funding problem, simply because another place deems it to be appropriate to cut the funding completely as we set the service up.

John Duffy: I will try to avoid party politics—

The Convener: Heaven forfend that the Parliament should do that.

John Duffy: We would need to consider the fact that there is a referendum coming up and whether that would change our entire approach to any of those things.

We already have people who are trained and equipped to deliver that service, and they will be hanging up their jackets on 1 April. Does the Parliament want that to happen, or is it prepared to put in some of the funding to maintain that service? That is a straight choice, but it leads us on to a whole other gambit: you must tell us what you want us to do.

The Convener: We will leave it at that.

Jenny Marra: That is perhaps the answer to my question about functionality, but I also want to touch on the command and control elements. Since I joined the Justice Committee, I have learned more about and been very impressed by the gold command structure and how big incidents are dealt with. I also understand that between half and two thirds of non-uniformed staff will go through natural wastage, and about a third of the command and control staff will leave.

Do you both think that there is sufficient provision in the bill to maintain a properly efficient command and control structure at local level? When there is a big incident, the public rightly expect that there will be sufficient expertise in the service. Does the bill provide for that?
You heard me ask about prevention earlier. Does the bill make sufficient provision for the fire prevention elements that your members are so good at?

John Duffy: The short answer is no and no. Some of the figures for command and control are contained in the outline business case; I think that is where the figure of a third of members in control rooms comes from. However, that does not take account of the fact that, in order to do that, you would need to make substantial capital changes to the disposition of control rooms at present.

There is a perception that, because the firelink radio system allows a control operator in any one of the control rooms to speak to any fire engine anywhere in the country, the operator can mobilise engines across the board. That is not the case, and to make changes to allow that to happen as part of the firelink set-up would come with a significant contractual cost.

That said, if the new service decides to move away from the current eight control rooms in their current locations, there are two things that you need to think about: how many people you would need in order to staff the replacement control room, and what you would do with those who are not going to move. The service would not be located in the same place, so you would need to redeploy those people and give them another job. The savings from control rooms that appear in the outline business case are not going to happen.

With regard to prevention, when we initially approached the functions we were considering that, for every intervention function the fire service has, it should have a corresponding preventative function. We could therefore end up with an act that has a great long list of things that the fire service is supposed to do, and then people such as me—who are trained to pick holes in lists—will tell you all the things that you have not listed that we are not going to do.

The Convener: We could always put in the phrase “inter alia”.

John Duffy: Well, you could.

That is why it has been suggested that we do not go down that route and instead have a broad-based function, part of which, however, would be that every intervention would have a corresponding prevention. Our members are really good at water rescue—you know, the jumping-in-the-rivers bit—but it might be worth while spending some time and effort talking to people about not getting into that difficulty in the first place. That applies to a whole range of operational incidents.

Sarah Duncan: We, too, think that command and control cannot be maintained at the current level if support staff are cut by a half to two thirds. As I said, they are as essential to the service's smooth running as the uniformed staff. For example, they maintain the stations and the vehicles, procure supplies and equipment for people and ensure that the staff are paid. You can get rid of half the staff, but it will not mean that half their tasks will disappear with them; they will still need to be done, and that will simply increase the workload and pressure on remaining staff. As we have seen in the national health service and local government, if you cut too far, too fast and too deeply during the transition period when back-office functions are being reorganised, efficiency declines all round. We should be learning lessons from other service redesigns and how services have been integrated and shared in other parts of the public sector to ensure that we do not make the same mistakes when we create the single fire service.

John Finnie: I thank the witnesses for their responses, in particular the FBU for its positive suggestions for the future.

I want to ask about employment relations. Mr Duffy mentioned the Highlands and Islands, and I must put on record that the difficulties experienced in that region are not down to the FBU, which has been and continues to be very constructive in that respect both locally and nationally. I found Chief Officer Sweeney's comments on this issue to be very compelling; indeed, he seemed to be outlining some kind of employment relations nirvana. I hope that when he leaves here he will keep that spirit up and encourage his colleagues to do the same, because what he described is certainly not my understanding of how things always work. If that is the new way, that is good.

In its submission, the FBU mentions the “new and active social partnership approach” that the Scottish Government is encouraging but, in the next paragraph, it says that “the deletion of Chapter 9” of the 2005 act will be bad for its members. Mr Duffy, will you tell us what that is and what the implications will be for your support staff colleagues?

John Duffy: Chapter 9 of the 2005 act sets out the Scottish ministers’ ability to establish a national negotiating body in Scotland. If you had more than one service and you were to bring your terms and conditions negotiations to Scotland, you would need to have something in place to ensure consistency across the country. We are aware of the argument made by the bill's drafters that if there are no multiple services you do not need a negotiating body; one employer will negotiate with the employees. As we represent the uniformed employees, we are obviously interested in that relationship.

We are concerned that if the new employers were to create a new body to negotiate local—by which I mean Scottish—terms on a basis other than the current one, in which the FBU negotiates for the uniformed staff, we might end up with no negotiations at all and industrial relations strife. Our suggestion that, in the case of the fire service, the minister should have oversight of any negotiating mechanism that is put in place to determine Scottish conditions, to ensure that it meets the stated aims in the consultation and transitional framework document of basing future industrial relations “on shared recognition” blah blah blah, is trying to avoid such a situation. We want to ensure that whatever is suggested by the new employer reflects the aspirations of the Scottish Government and will meet with the approval of the minister.

Sarah Duncan: There is a precedent in NHS Scotland whereby the partnership arrangements are in statute. That industrial relations model has been widely praised and has been in very successful operation for 11 years. It seems to Unison that we have an important opportunity, when we are setting up the new organisation, to make absolutely clear the basis on which industrial relations will proceed. Being more prescriptive in the bill would help that. It would build on the partnership working that is already taking place in the service.

John Finnie: Do you both think that the bill should specifically mention agreed facilities for union officials?

Sarah Duncan: Yes.

John Duffy: Yes.

John Finnie: Never ask a question when you do not know the answer.

Let us move on to a couple of other points. Mr Duffy, in relation to the power to enter premises, your written submission talks about how public trust should be reflected in employment rights. Can you explain that further, please?

John Duffy: There is currently a very high level of trust between firefighters and the public. Firefighters carry a warrant card and have a range of powers of entry and, at an operational incident or in support of an operational incident, they can enter a property without a warrant. We do not believe that that level of trust between the public and firefighters is reflected in the current discipline regulations that we go under.

Previously, we had a system that was probably more akin to a court martial but it required a high level of burden of proof. Currently, we have what is basically the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service minimum code of practice, and we do not think that that is sufficient for employees who are put in a position of trust by members of the public. For example, if a firefighter is at a fire incident in somebody’s home and that person says, “I had a Rolex watch sitting there and it has disappeared,” the burden of proof is only the balance of probability. We suggest that that needs to be enhanced. The discipline code that is currently in vogue within the fire service is insufficient and needs to be renegotiated.

John Finnie: My next question is, again, for both of you. There is a suggestion in the FBU submission regarding the final appeal over discipline and grievance. Can you comment on that, please? Is that an issue for Unison as well?

Sarah Duncan: It is less of an issue for us because our members do not find themselves in the kind of situations that John Duffy has described—positions of trust in the homes of members of the public and in businesses. We expect that there would be a final right of appeal for our members to the board, which is their ultimate employer. That is the standard that is applied elsewhere in the public sector.

John Duffy: We currently have a range whereby staff in some services have a right of appeal to their employer and staff in other services do not—in effect, they are dismissed by an officer and their appeal goes to an officer. We think that it is a basic right for someone to have an appeal to their employer, which is why we included that in our submission. We think that the ultimate appeal should go to the board.

John Finnie: My final question is about the ongoing discussions with the fire service about the various workstreams to bring about a single service. Do you both believe that you are sufficiently engaged in that process with management—if I can use that term—or is there room for improvement?

Sarah Duncan: I have only recently taken up these responsibilities and my personal experience is that the engagement is good, although it is at an early stage. As we move towards day one, next April, things will get more tense, but I hope that the good working relationships that the unions have had over several years will be maintained.

John Duffy: It is appropriate to congratulate our senior lead officers within reform on the approach that they have taken as they have engaged consistently with us over the past few months.

The FBU is now actively involved not only in the four workstreams, but in all the work that is being done under those workstreams. That is extremely encouraging and we are very optimistic, which is why we are pushing for that approach to form the basis of industrial relations in the new service.

The Convener: I have a point of clarification. Mr Duffy, you talked about the burden of proof and then you went on to the standard of proof. You gave the example of the theft of a Rolex. You said that the standard of proof was the balance of probability, not beyond reasonable doubt, which is the standard in criminal law. However, the burden of proof is a different issue. Who is the burden of proof on? Is it on the firefighter or the householder? I am not quite sure what point you were making.

John Duffy: It used to be the case that an internal discipline case was, in effect, a court martial. There was a high level of order to the process and it was very clear. For example, someone would be told that they would be charged with a specific breach of conduct and it was very clear. For example, someone would be told that they would be charged with a specific breach of conduct—I think that there were 13 breaches that it was possible to be charged with. Now, under the ACAS code of practice, someone can go into the room thinking that they have been accused of one thing, but it changes halfway through. We are not calling for the bill to be prescriptive, but we are looking for protections to be built in.

The Convener: I just wanted to give you the chance to clarify your point.

I have a final question about operational matters. It sounds parochial, given that I have a Borders constituency, but it relates to the whole of the south of Scotland and the border with England. At the moment, what would happen if there was an incident such as a large fire in Berwick? Would Lothian and Borders Fire Brigade get over there from Hawick or wherever? Will what happens now change if there is a single fire and rescue service?

John Duffy: Interestingly, despite all the discussions that we have had about borders and lines on maps, when someone dials 999, those boundaries just disappear. There is no restriction to prevent crews from crossing between fire authority areas or from going to and from England. There are certain fire stations in the Borders where the fire engine will come out of the doors in Scotland and will take a route through England to get to an incident in Scotland.

The Convener: That is right.

John Duffy: Boundaries make no difference at the moment, and we do not see them making a difference in the future.

The Convener: It will be reassuring for people who might think that there could be a big stramash about the issue to hear that, operationally, you do not think that the situation will change.

I thank the witnesses very much for their evidence.

Graeme Pearson has indicated that he would like us to ask the Scottish Parliament information centre for an additional briefing on the bill. Will you elaborate? We will see what the committee has to say.

Graeme Pearson: I hope that committee members agree that, on the basis of the last two evidence sessions—particularly the evidence that we got last week from the Auditor General for Scotland and the worries over accountability and governance that we heard about today—there might be some value in SPICe producing an options paper on how democratic oversight of governance might be delivered in the future.

The Convener: We are all nodding in agreement. That is fine.

Graeme Pearson: Can I supplement the question that I was going to ask Sir Hugh Orde? Would you allow a letter to be sent to Sir Hugh asking him whether he feels that, in the future, there will still be a need for a strategic command course delivered from Bramshill and whether he sees any value in it being part of the selection criteria in a future Scottish police service? I am just suggesting that we ask for his view.

The Convener: I do not need to write to him to ask that because it is on the record. We can simply point out to him that he can respond, if he wants to, in additional evidence, which anyone can provide at any time.

Graeme Pearson: Thank you.

The Convener: Well done, Graeme. I must admit that you find ways of getting things under my radar.

Graeme Pearson: Without a warrant.

The Convener: Yes.

Is this another supplementary, John?

John Finnie: An elephant never forgets; neither does Graeme Pearson.

One of the benefits of evidence sessions is the opportunity that they provide to cross-examine witnesses. It would be valuable to get Sir Hugh Orde’s view on the requirement, which has long been seen in some quarters as a thorn in the side of the Scottish police service. I wonder whether there is a need to balance that by asking the staff associations in Scotland about it, too.

The Convener: No, I am not going to enter into a discussion about, “Let’s ask this and let’s ask that.”

John Finnie: It is the same question.
The Convener: The evidence is on the record, so if the staff associations want to comment on it, they can. I will not write to them. I am sure that they will look at the record as they consider their evidence. Anyone who wants to comment on any evidence from any witness to this committee can do so through supplementary evidence.

Our next meeting will be on Tuesday 20 March. We will continue to gather evidence on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, and will consider the draft Evidence in Civil Partnership and Divorce Actions (Scotland) Order 2012, which is an affirmative instrument. We will also consider—I know that members are really looking forward to this, so gird your loins—an issues paper, namely part 2 of the Criminal Cases (Punishment and Review) (Scotland) Bill. The meeting will start at 9.45 am, just to keep members on their toes.
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Agenda item 5 is our final evidence-taking session on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill at stage 1 before we hear from the cabinet secretary. I am sure that members are all sorry to hear that.

I welcome to the meeting an array of councillors: Councillor Ian Blake, convener of Dumfries and Galloway police, fire and rescue committee; Councillor George Kay, convener of Fife police, fire and safety committee; Councillor Martin Greig, convener of the Grampian joint police board; Councillor Iain Whyte, convener of Lothian and Borders police board; Councillor Ian Ross, vice-convener of the Northern joint police board; and Councillor Stephen Curran, convener of Strathclyde police authority. I thank the witnesses for their very full written submissions.

We will move straight to questions. If a committee member does not direct a question to a particular witness, anyone who wishes to answer it should indicate as much to me and their microphone light will come on automatically. If anyone else wishes to come in, they should indicate as much; I will make a note and come back to them.

Colin Keir is first up. Perhaps he is wearing his councillor hat.

Colin Keir (Edinburgh Western) (SNP): Yes. I declare that I am a member of the City of Edinburgh Council.

The Convener: I am so sorry, Colin—I should say that Martin’s surname is actually Greig, not Grieg. I was thinking of the composer.

David McLetchie: The culture committee beckons, convener. [Laughter.]

The Convener: Indeed. Now, people, we are all going to settle down—me included.

Colin Keir: We have started off well this morning, convener.

Good morning, gentlemen. Various submissions that we have received have commented on the fact that, at the moment, the chief constable produces a report that is then discussed by the board. As a result, you effectively hold the chief constable to account. How effective is such an arrangement in this day and age?

Councillor Iain Whyte (Lothian and Borders Police Board): I will begin, but I am sure that others will want to chip in. As I understand it, the process that you have described varies slightly in different ways between different boards. In Lothian and Borders, for example, we have beefed up support to the board by ensuring that it can seek independent advice and research when looking at reports. We are also aware of the Scottish policing performance framework, which provides information across the different board areas that we can use for background comparison.

My board has taken steps to look at performance and scrutiny in different ways. We have tried to compare our area with areas in England of a similar size and with similar population demographics, in order to get good comparisons. We do not look at just what the chief constable tells us; we look outwith that and scrutinise appropriately, based on a mixture of things.

Councillor Ian Ross (Northern Joint Police Board): Another gauge is best-value reviews, which have been carried out by Audit Scotland and Her Majesty’s inspector on quite a number of the boards in the past three years. A lot of weight was laid on the challenge to chief constables, the contribution to strategic vision and the way in which board members engaged. Northern joint police board came across well in that process.

Councillor George Kay (Fife Police, Fire and Safety Committee): Yesterday I contributed to our best-value audit—we were the last in line—so I must be fairly consistent with my responses. The best scrutineer—as far as boards are concerned—is the unitary authority.

As I said yesterday, the whole process is not particularly good and not done well. That is mainly because the resources that are available to the chief constable are substantial but the resources that are available to our board are negligible—in fact, they are non-existent. We do not have a budget. We must rely on the chief constable to bring us exactly what we should get, in the way we should get it, so that we can question robustly. The new Scottish police authority must take that on board. In 2008, the Justice Committee pointed out that that should be done. The SPA must have robust criteria to hold the new police service to account. That must be reflected at a local level, throughout the 32 local authorities.

Colin Keir: In the accountability process there are situations where security clearance of particular members of a police board is set at a low level. Previous evidence has suggested that there is very little of the required accountability in police boards, because of the security level. Can I have your comments on that?

Councillor Martin Greig (Grampian Joint Police Board): Grampian Police and Grampian joint police board did very well out of the BV2 audit. The board was commended for robustly and vigorously holding the chief constable to account, while representing the views of the three local authority areas across the north-east. No problems around vetting have come up.

I note that a main impetus for police reform seems to be a move to increase the level of councillor involvement in police scrutiny and decisions. That activity will obviously be on a new scale when more councillors are involved. I emphasise that the effect of holding the chief constable to account has brought good results to the north-east, as we are one of the lowest-funded forces but have one of the best records of performance in fighting crime. We effectively and efficiently make the best use of resources, and it is good that the auditors have commended us for that.

Councillor Ian Blake (Dumfries and Galloway Police, Fire and Rescue Committee): Good morning. Like John Finnie, I declare an interest as a holder of a police pension.

In relation to the first point, we do not solely rely on reports from the chief constable: in specific instances we call for reports, and there is a good level of scrutiny as far as that is concerned.

Security vetting has been increased in recent years. The involvement of Her Majesty’s inspectorate of constabulary for Scotland, especially on counterterrorism matters, has led to an increase in the security vetting of members. Work with the National Policing Improvement Agency has also improved the level for certain members of the authority. I do not see that issue being an insurmountable problem.

The Convener: You mentioned in passing calling for reports. Do you have a specific example?

Councillor Blake: We had a difficulty with the ports unit at Stranraer when the Scottish Government reduced its police staffing levels. The authority recognised that there was an issue and called for specific reports that looked at the matter along with the UK Border Agency.

Councillor Whyte: I will sum up the position. Although people may have some concerns about the fact that boards largely get their reports from the chief constable, I assure you that my board calls for reports. I can think of three or four issues from the past few meetings, including concerns relating to police station front counters and some additional work that was carried out on the potential reforms to combine the Lothian and Borders Police mounted section with the Strathclyde Police mounted section and best-value issues. More important were the reports on issues such as the use of regulation A19 of the Police Pensions Regulations 1987 to retire police officers after 30 years and voluntary redundancy schemes. The board is proactive on a whole host of matters.

A number of our members have been vetted and I attend the force’s security committee from time to time to bring oversight to that. There is not a problem with vetting: it is a matter of getting it in place. The key aspect for me in relation to Mr Keir’s question is that I do not see the situation as being any different from that in any local authority committee where the information comes from local authority officers, or that in a health board or other government institution where the information comes from within the organisation. That information is scrutinised using auditors and external and research help, but the information must initially come from within the organisation.

Councillor Ross: My understanding is that our convener and vice-convener have had additional vetting. I do not know at what level, but the issue was raised with us.

Over the past year or more we have called for reports on call handling, domestic violence, police involvement in diversionary measures, absence management—although that was for one of our working groups—and regulation A19 and its application.

Councillor Kay: I take on board what my colleagues have said, and in Fife we are proactive in bringing forward things that we want to hear about from the chief constable and the police service. Nevertheless, at the end of the day, we have to rely on the chief constable and the police service to give us factually correct information. We cannot start to query that.

I do not think that any of us are vetted at a particular level. I know that Mr Pearson has an in-depth knowledge of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency. I sit on the Scottish Police Services Authority board but my vetting for that board is not sufficient to allow me to comment on the SCDEA—only the chief constables who sit on that board can do that. There is a limitation to what we can do.

Colin Keir: Councillors Whyte and Ross made the point that some people on police boards are vetted. Does the fact that only a limited number of people are vetted to a particular level show the inadequacies of the police board system in relation to full accountability?

Councillor Greig: It is important to bear it in mind that we are democratically elected representatives. We are not professionals; we are there in a lay position to represent the public. We are not, and should not try to be, professionals, because we are there to represent the average citizen on the street.
Grampian Police has responsibility for oil and gas policing and royalty protection on royal Deeside. The area has an international airport. We deal with all kinds of terrorism and with serious organised crime gangs that come from England and abroad. All those issues are high risk, and we deal with them effectively through a positive partnership between the force and the board. It is clear that, in the past eight years, we have achieved very good results with a very low budget. That needs to be borne in mind.

The boards have built up a great deal of expertise and the clerking function has built up the professional aspect. I am not yet clear about how that will transfer to the new local policing committees. It is important for the committee to think about that, too.

Councillor Stephen Curran (Strathclyde Police Authority): Mr Keir has asked an important question. I do not think that "inadequate" is a fair word to use to describe the current situation. There is a balance to be struck in relation to operational needs. Councillor Greig mentioned counterterrorism and serious and organised crime, on which it would be inappropriate for us to know as much as the chief constable and the senior officers know. The balance involves what is publicly accessible, what we can discuss in the police board setting and who is vetted.

Strathclyde police authority has a dedicated staffing function that is distinct from that of the 12 councils in Strathclyde. The authority’s chief executive is vetted to deal with security issues and senior police authority members who chair meetings might be vetted, but we sometimes want to have a public discussion, which means that we cannot have a wider discussion about the most crucial issues of operational need for the police. I understand the point, but vetting is not an insurmountable issue.

Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): I am interested in the panel’s views on the bill’s proposals for national governance. We have heard contrasting views from previous panels about whether the proposed number of members of the Scottish police authority—between seven and 11—is anywhere near adequate. We have also heard different views on whether elected local authority members should be represented on that board. I would be interested to hear a range of views from the panel.

Councillor Whyte: I start by echoing our written submission. We were looking at having a larger board size than seven to 11 members, which is based on our experience. My board—Lothian and Borders police board—has 18 members, which works reasonably well. If that was slimmed down, running committees and so on would become difficult. A board of seven to 11 members would be rather tight; we recommend having more members.

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee has looked at the issue in detail and has suggested to you a larger number—at least 15 or 16 members. A figure of between 15 and 18 is probably reasonable.

It would be really helpful to involve people with local government experience and to have the link back to communities, particularly when the idea is to have local policing committees, which are to represent local views on policing and hold the local commander to account. The problem is that not enough of a link is made in the bill and not enough detail is in the proposals to make clear how the arrangements will work. To safeguard such a link, one basic point that the committee might look at is ensuring that at least some members of the new authority bring local government experience to the table.

The Convener: Do you have a proportion in mind? Would such people form a majority or a minority?

Councillor Whyte: We did not come to a view on that. Other witnesses might have their own views.

10:15

Councillor Kay: The number of members of the board is interesting but not a killer. My own submission is that it should have 13 members. I am prepared to live with 11 as I do not think that that figure represents an insurmountable problem.

We have to get professional input on the board to scrutinise the police service. By professional input I mean professionals from various areas of life, including professionals from local government. I do not mean necessarily paid officials but professionals such as those represented on the panel—people who have experience of local government. Their input is essential. They do not have to be in the majority, because when people go into the boardroom they have to leave their hat behind—whether it is their political hat, their geographical hat or whatever—and become a member of that board. I hope that the professionalism that people display is what is important rather than whether they represent Auchtermuchty or wherever. It is essential that that professionalism is a feature at all levels.

Councillor Curran: The important point is what the police service is for. The main thrust of what the police do in Scotland is community-based local policing, so it is fundamental that people who have a democratic mandate, legitimacy and accountability at local level are on the national it is also important to have people who are not elected but are on the board because of their expertise. However, they may become specialist and may home in on something almost as a hobby-horse. We are compelled to have a wider interest because of our elected mandate. It has been acknowledged in some of the committee’s discussion on the bill that non-members of the authority might take part, so there is almost an open admission that the number of members specified for the authority is too low.

Councillor Blake: On the proposed number of members on the authority being between seven and 11, our own police authority has 11 members, so we work with that system now. Given the geographic spread of Dumfries and Galloway, travelling is difficult at times. Resilience is therefore an issue, as it can be difficult to get enough members to have a meaningful board meeting. Our view as a local authority was that probably anything up to 15 members would be appropriate. Although we as conveners did not come to a decision about whether there should be a majority of conveners on the police authority, my own local authority supports the suggestion that there should be a majority of local authority members.

Councillor Greig: The number of members that is being proposed is much too small. There is a very significant democratic deficit in the new set-up, because policing is a local government function. We rely on community policing to operate according to the principle of policing by consent. That means that decisions on budgets and performance relating to police forces need to be made locally.

Naturally, therefore, we in the north-east have very considerable concerns about losing that democratic oversight of our local police force, because over the years we have fought very hard to stand up for policing in the north-east. In 2004 we won a very good deal from the Scottish Government, which has brought almost £7 million extra to north-east policing, thanks to the very hard work of successive police boards and politicians in the north-east. Recognising that £1.5 million extra that should have come to us went to Lothian and Borders—

Councillor Greig: The point is that we fight for our local areas. The value of the local boards is that we have somebody to bang the drum for policing in our areas. There will be no access to a remote quango of seven to 14 people, so people will no longer be able to influence police resources or police performance issues.

The Convener: I have a feeling that you have undermined the case for having councillors on the SPA—there would be a scrap about whether money should go to the north or to Dumfries and Galloway. I would be batting for Dumfries and Galloway—I used to live in Minnigaff, so I know what Councillor Blake is talking about.

Colin Keir: We just heard a very impassioned speech for the north-east, yet, as was pointed out earlier, for the main board people go in and leave their geographical allegiances at the door. That is part of the problem: how do we square that circle?

The Convener: Yes, that was my point. We will let you mull over that, Councillor Greig.

David McLetchie: I was just going to ask a follow-up, actually.

The Convener: I think Alison was going to pursue it. Can we let her do that, as she opened this up? I will put you on my list, David.

Alison McInnes: I want to pick up on something that was said about the resolution of local plans, the interface between the national board and the proposed local arrangements and how silent the bill is on some of those points. If panel members could elaborate on what they would like to see to improve the situation, that would be helpful.

The Convener: We will come back to that one. David, do you want to go back to the question of representation on the SPA that was opened up?

David McLetchie: I just wanted to ask a question that might be appropriately directed in the first instance to Councillor Whyte, although other members of the panel might have a view. Members will recall that last year there was considerable controversy about forensic services and the proposals to close police labs in different parts of Scotland. I think, Councillor Whyte, that that directly affected Lothian and Borders because of the Howden Hall lab. You were also a member of the SPFA, so in a sense one might say that the sort of conflict of interest highlighted in the previous question might have arisen. That might be the case for some others on the panel, too. Will you describe how you managed to leave your hat at the door and come to a national view that might not necessarily have been favoured by your colleagues on the Lothian and Borders police board?

The Convener: Focus on conflicts on interest, please. Forensic services are a good example.

Councillor Whyte: Two of us—me and Councillor Kay—are members of the board of the SPSA. By virtue of the way in which we are appointed to that board, we are required to work corporately and to take the interests of the SPSA and its efficiency into account rather than anything else that we bring with us. Although we bring knowledge and experience of policing governance from elsewhere, we are required to take the interests of the SPSA into account. When we considered such matters, I was required to consider them in the interests of efficiency across Scotland, but not necessarily in the way that I would have done so with colleagues had we been lobbying the case for having a lab in the city of Edinburgh available for direct use by police officers from Lothian and Borders.

David McLetchie: Will you remind me of the composition of the SPSA and the balance between councillors and non-councillors?

Councillor Whyte: There are two councillors who are conveners—myself and Councillor Kay—two chief constables and five independent board members, including the convener. We are all appointed by the Cabinet Secretary for Justice but four of us are stakeholders of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland and the Scottish police authorities conveners forum.

David McLetchie: Sorry. Councillor Kay, did you want to say anything?

Councillor Kay: I do not think that I ever had any conflict of interest. Fife does not have a forensic lab, nor does it need one.

The Convener: That made it easy for you, then. That does not help you.

Councillor Kay: We have the facilities in Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen and Glasgow at our disposal, depending on where exactly the case happens. I would echo what Iain Whyte said: it is essential that the board of the SPSA—and that of the SPA, as we go forward—takes into account what is best for Scotland, what is best for forensic services in Scotland and, finally, what is best for police services in Scotland, rather than maintaining the geographical entity just because it happens to be in Edinburgh.

The Convener: Councillor Curran, you wanted to come in on this point about conflicts of interest.

Councillor Curran: Councillors deal with conflicts of interest every week in the bodies and boards that they sit on. For example, my police authority board in Strathclyde has 12 councillors on it but, collectively, we are Strathclyde police authority, covering half of Scotland, rather than individual councillors. That is an important point: when you are in that meeting, you have the wider perspective. We could bring that to the national board in a way that independent members with a particular interest or hobby-horse perhaps could not.

The Convener: I will move on to Alison McInnes, who wanted to ask a different question.

Alison McInnes: Just to finish the debate, Councillor Greig has been accused of undermining the case for elected members on the national board—

The Convener: I alluded to that.

Alison McInnes: To be fair to Councillor Greig, he might want to come back on that. I think that he was making the case for how effective the existing police boards have been rather than arguing about the proposed new national board.

The Convener: He has not indicated, but he can chip in if he feels that he must defend his corner.

Councillor Greig: I wanted to come in with a comment on the SPSA that relates to the point that has just been made. A centralised body such as the SPSA or the SPA needs a clear understanding of its policies on crime fighting. We already have in place excellent policies and an excellent business model in the north-east.

The danger with a centralised model such as the SPSA is that it focuses attention on areas of high-volume crime and particular areas that are perceived to involve high-profile crime-fighting issues such as sectarianism and knife crime. Such issues do not concern us hugely in the north-east.

Unless the policies target the various patterns of crime across Scotland, that model will not work. The SPSA has proven that to be the case, because one of its first decisions was to close the forensics laboratory in Aberdeen. It is clear that in the past eight years—with crime falling, detection rates improving and good performance in various other areas in the north-east—the forensics lab has played a vital part in keeping crime down. It is the absence of crime that is the measure of successful crime fighting and policing, not whether all your resources have been pushed towards the intractable problems. That indicates failure rather than success, and you need to look at successful models such as the ones that we have used in the north-east.

The Convener: You have certainly punched for the north-east today, I will tell you that.

Councillor Kay: I take completely the opposite view from Martin Greig. [Laughter.]

The Convener: At last the truth is out.

Councillor Kay: We are all taking political stances of one sort or t’other, but if you asked the professionals about the particular instance that Councillor Greig mentioned, they would say that the north-east of Scotland would not be hit one wee bit if there was not a lab there. The area would still get the same service that it gets from Dundee, day after day, week after week and month after month.

The Convener: I will move on from what seems to be developing into a feud. Alison McInnes has another question.

Alison McInnes: I have another question about the interface between the national board and local arrangements and the local authority committees under the proposals in the bill. The bill does not go into great detail about how any difficulties—for example, between the national policing plan and whatever was in the local plan—would be resolved. Have panel members had a chance to think about that?

Councillor Ross: The important thing is that it is not just about numbers in a room. There is a real focus on the number of people who might be able to participate, which can be important, but the crucial thing is the substance and influence that those people have. There is no clarity on that as yet.

The wider links are important, and there are issues about how any conflict will be resolved. All those areas need further clarity. Some of the pathfinder work that is currently taking place will be significant and there are opportunities too, particularly with regard to how we forge better links with community planning partnerships.

Some partners—particularly the NHS—will willingly come to the table, and there are things that we can get from that. However, some other partners, such as the Scottish Ambulance Service, are somewhat unwilling to come to the table at present, and we need to find ways to resolve that situation. The SPA has the robustness, the size and the professional expertise to be able to engage with the local policing committees or whatever structures come from that model.

The Convener: I will take Councillor Whyte, followed by Councillor Greig and then Councillor Kay. Do you want me to move you apart from each other yet, or have you made it up?

Councillor Whyte: Do I need to sit between them?

The Convener: You can sit in the middle if necessary.

Councillor Whyte: Alison McInnes is right that the bill does not say anything about structures. I was asked the same question at the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. The panel that I was on at that meeting had a lot of policing professionals and some outside people, but I do not think that any of us said that we should have fixed dispute resolution procedures. The problem with those is that we would get into dispute resolution very quickly. However, we do have to have political and other mechanisms to resolve things.

On best practice, in Lothian and Borders we have five constituent authorities, each of which sets out a local policing plan with the local commander. The local council and the community planning partnership come together to do that. So, we already have a model that is quite similar to local policing, but it must fit within the overall Lothian and Borders plan that is developed by the board and the chief constable and through public consultation.

For me, what is lacking is how the new Scottish police authority intends to get the information on which to set a national plan. Aspects of that are local consultation and working with local scrutiny committees and people, and consulting the public. There is also stuff around the professional policing side. At the moment, there is a Scotland-wide policing plan, which is built up from the local level with input from a unit in ACPOS. The Scottish policing plan then goes out for consultation before being agreed. There would have to be something like that and some way of consulting local authorities to ensure that the elements that they required were in a new national plan.

Local authority areas must also continue to be allowed to be different in some ways. There are considerable differences within Lothian and Borders in that regard. For instance, the Borders is a very sparsely populated geographical area, but the city of Edinburgh is rather different, as it is the capital city. Roads policing and traffic accidents are a much higher priority in the Borders and are written into the local policing plan in a way in which they are not in other areas of Lothian and Borders. That kind of local flexibility must remain.

Councillor Greig: The local aspect is an important issue. We currently have three divisions in the north-east and the new set-up would create almost three chief constable areas from the three divisions. I believe that there is a significant risk ahead of us because divisional commanders will be responsible through the command-and-control structure to their chief constable but will also in some way be accountable to their local authorities, so they could be pulled in two directions. That is a real concern, particularly when all the key decisions will be made by the chief constable and the new Scottish police authority.

Each of the three divisions that we currently have receive a relatively equal share of the precept. According to the grant-aided expenditure figures and the number of people in each of the three areas, they each get about the same level per head for policing. The new set-up will have to have some kind of resource tracking system to... ensure that each of the divisions gets a fair share of the funding. There is a danger that there will be a separate specialised unit that will bring police specialists into an area from some centralised resource. Currently, we have them spread across the north-east—geographical distance is an important factor—because by having them present we are able to deal with crime much more quickly and effectively.

Tracking police resources will be crucial in the new set-up and will be difficult; tracking the deployment of resources to tackle crime and improve performance will be extremely difficult, too.

Councillor Kay: Fife’s being a unitary authority means that I sometimes have difficulty understanding the problems that boards have, because Fife does not really have such problems. As the pathfinder group goes forward, I hope that it will model the system that Ian Blake and I have in our unitary authorities and consider how we deal with problems between the chief constable and the chief executive—that is difficult—

The Convener: That was recorded. There was no point in whispering it.

Councillor Kay: I look forward to boards and local authorities looking to the Fife model, as part and parcel of the pathfinder group.

We are considering what will happen when we get to the gigantic problem, which we will face, and who will resolve it, but we should do much more than that; we should put our efforts into avoiding the problems, by introducing deterrents.

The issue that still needs to be addressed in the bill is communications between the SPA and the 26 or 28 local authorities—whatever the number. That is crucial. There must be robust, two-way communication, because the scrutiny groups in local authorities must have the same zing that we expect the SPA to have. In my submission, I suggested a fostering approach, along the lines of what happens in the Metropolitan Police, where a member of the Met board looks after a number of local authorities. Something like that would be important to ensure that communications are robust.

Councillor Blake: I will briefly go back to something that George Kay said—today must be a day for going against George—

Councillor Kay: That happens every day.

Councillor Blake: George Kay said that we are all here to relay our political stances. I am not here to relay any political stance; I am here with a mandate from my board, which is cross party, to put forward its views.

On the question about the potential for conflict between the national board and local committees, an element of devolved local budgeting flexibility might aid the situation, by giving us the opportunity to hold the local police commander to account, tackle local policing issues and work towards meeting our single outcome agreements. Such an approach would allay concerns about conflict.

Councillor Curran: Councillor Blake has made an important point. People in Scotland want to know what the police in their area do. They also want to know how much resource the local police have, but if the money is controlled at national level, where is the scrutiny of the 32 councils’ local policing arrangements?

If local policing arrangements are important, why does the bill say so little about the issue? The current approach means that a council’s policing arrangements could be very different from its neighbouring councils’ arrangements. There is an imbalance in relation to who is setting the priorities at local level and how that is dealt with at national level. If the budget is nationally controlled, it is difficult to get buy-in at local level and true accountability.

The Convener: I have a list of members who want to ask questions; I will take you in order, because people have been waiting a long time [Interruption.] I see that Rod Campbell wants to be in the list. You are too polite; you must be more brusque with me.

Graeme Pearson (South Scotland) (Lab): Let us be brusque, in that case. I want to cover three areas: budgets and staff numbers, national accountability and the democratic deficit, and local arrangements.

We are moving towards change in April next year. It is important for police boards to understand their current resources and budget allocations. Do you want the current approach to be maintained next year, as the single entity progresses, or should there be some form of national allocation on the creation of the single police service? How will that work?

Councillor Curran: The question relates to what the budget is actually spent on. Some 88 per cent goes on officers and staff. We know that savings have to be made in terms of reform this year, never mind next year. There is a different balance in different areas—there are eight different balances across the country. For example, Strathclyde Police has 2,000 staff to 8,000 police officers and Lothian and Borders Police has 1,500 staff to 2,500 officers. That means that, if it is the staff that bear the brunt of the reform through voluntary redundancy, Lothian and Borders Police will take a much bigger hit, pro rata, than other parts of Scotland.
To almost fudge the answer to your question, I would say that we need a bit of both. We need clarity on the bigger national picture and we also need somebody to say what the best balance and the best use of resources would be. We are allowed to make decisions as eight distinct entities, but no one is saying what the national force would have that would enable it to provide the best policing and the best support function with a reduced budget.

Councillor Whyte: This is precisely where the strictures that the Government has placed on police authorities and on the reform programme are causing a problem: the number of police officers has been specified and there are to be no compulsory redundancies. As you heard from Councillor Curran, around 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the forces’ budgets goes on staffing costs, which leaves us very few options. Furthermore, many of us have already made efficiency savings. Over the lifetime of our board, we have made efficiency savings of £20 million on a budget that is now about £170 million, which is a considerable saving. We have already considered all the hard choices. It is difficult to see how we will go about producing the savings, without being given some leeway.

Things are not equitable at the moment—this is where I might disagree with Councillor Greig, although he might have the same issues as me. The grant-aided expenditure release of resources to police authorities has not changed since 2004, which is a considerable time, but populations have changed a lot in that time. Because of that, Lothian and Borders Police is, in effect, underfunded. From day one, the new chief constable will face a problem in setting out the arrangements, and they will probably become worse. The worst thing that could happen is for all 32 local authorities to use their police committees to argue that they need more resource, because that would get us into a zero-sum game of arguing against each other.

Councillor Greig: It will be important to be able to monitor resources in the way that has been done before. People will want to know what is happening to their assets—not just the officers and staff, but the buildings. The police reform programme promises great savings, but those figures have not been related to local impact. It is getting close to the time when people need to know how those savings will affect us in our local police forces.

Grampian Police has made huge efficiency savings. In response to the police board’s call for more police officers, the chief constable created about 45 new police officer posts. That was a local autonomous decision. However, in the future, if we make local efficiencies, that money will go into a central pot and might be deployed elsewhere, which means that we might lose the incentive to make efficiencies as well as the benefits that come from making them.

Councillor Kay: What we do in relation to the budget will depend very much on the progress we will make in the next 10 to 12 months. If, in that period, we make an early appointment of the chief constable and the chair and membership of the SPA, the situation would have a completely different flavour from the one that it would have if we made the appointments at the end of the year. If we make them at the end of the year, the chief constable and the board will be able to consider only what we need from 1 April 2013. However, if the appointments are made earlier, there will be an opportunity to look at the budgets. If the appointments happen later, it might be wise to leave the budget exactly as if it were going to the local authorities, with the same sums of money. In that case, we should not change anything in the budgets—we should do only what is required for 1 April 2013. As I said, the issue depends on exactly when the key positions are filled and operational, and whether that happens in time to make the decisions.

Graeme Pearson: At an earlier meeting, the Auditor General raised the notion of democratic governance at national level. He talked about how the relationships between the minister, the convener, the board and the chief constable will operate. From your experience of the SPSA and how it has been governed in the past few years, are there any lessons that we should bear in mind? Is there a role for Parliament or for any other organisation in calling the new single police force to account?

Councillor Whyte: For me, the big thing that is missing is how local communities will hold the new police service to account. Although we will have local committees, we do not know how much power they will have. At present, the boards set the budget for the chief constable and monitor that on behalf of local communities, and we hold the chief constable to account for their performance. One important thing that we do is dip sample complaints. We also appoint diversity lay advisers and lay custody visitors. There is a host of checks and balances at local level. The service is made to account locally for the ethos of policing in each neighbourhood. I do not understand how we will get those democratic checks and balances in the new system.
The current tripartite system is often criticised because it is not exactly clear where accountability lies. That is true in a sense, but the system also has strengths in that we get things done by agreement. Pressure is put on the chief constable when things are wrong and there is pressure to fix things; the minister and the Government will apply pressure if they think that local authorities are not resolving an issue. The new structure seems to me to be very hierarchical. There is talk of Parliament having a role, but I am not sure where it will fit. If the SPA’s role is to bring governance and accountability, what is the role of Parliament in overseeing that? It does not really fit. The appointments will be made at the behest of the minister, so surely the minister will have the governance role. The question how that will be monitored is perhaps for the Parliament.

The Convener: Part of the role of parliamentary committees is to hold ministers to account in a cross-party way. It is a backstop. I do not suggest that that is the way we will go on this issue, but we do that already, I hope.

Councillor Whyte: Would you stop ministers interfering in operational matters? I do not know. Who would judge that?

The Convener: I do not answer questions here. I just ask them.

Councillor Whyte: I put it as a hypothetical question for the committee to consider.

The Convener: I do not want to interfere with the flow of question and answers, but I am conscious of the time. The witnesses are giving us interesting information, but I ask them and the questioners for shorter questions and answers, because we have a big agenda to get through. I apologise to the members who are at the end of the queue.

Graeme Pearson: I presume that all the local checks and balances that Councillor Whyte rehearsed could be maintained under the new arrangement, overseen by the local committees.

Councillor Whyte: That is possible, but the key thing at present is the power to appoint the chief constable and the power to get rid of them if they do something wrong. There is also the power to set the budget and elements of the budget. Those are the meaningful bits, but they are being taken away from the local level and local authorities.

Councillor Greig: The issue is really that we should find out what we can learn from the SPSA. There is a clear lesson to learn about transparency. I make a heartfelt plea for the SPA to meet in public and to publish its minutes, agendas and all of its business. The current tripartite arrangement is not a very neat-looking solution, but it works very well. What is at risk in the future is policing by consent as a local government function, so transparency will help to give some kind of reassurance and safeguard to communities.

Humza Yousaf (Glasgow) (SNP): On Councillor Greig’s point and regarding local divergence, could I get one word on how many times a year each of the local authorities that are represented here meet their chief constable in open public forums?

Councillor Curran: Every meeting is held in public. Only specific items that perhaps have commercial confidentiality—

Humza Yousaf: How many times a year is that?

Councillor Curran: The board meets roughly every six weeks, and there are open committees. We also try to move around Strathclyde and not meet only in Glasgow, which is obviously the most central point for people. However, it is important to be seen to be out and about and to try to engage more fully with communities, as came through in the best-value reports. That would be difficult for a national authority to do without buy-in from local councils at policing-arrangement level.

Councillor Ross: All Northern joint police board’s meetings are in public, are publicly webcast and are archived, so there is full access to our meetings.

The Convener: Rather than go round everybody individually, can you just confirm that all your meetings with chief constables are in public?

Councillor Greig: Yes.

Councillor Whyte: Yes.

The Convener: How often do the meetings happen? How often do you call the chief constable to account?

Councillor Ross: We probably meet five or six times a year.

Councillor Whyte: The meetings are six times a year in every local authority.

Councillor Greig: I think Grampian joint police board meetings take place between eight and 10 times a year, and we circulate around the three local authorities. We also have, I think, four complaints and four best-value committee meetings. However, those are often augmented and there are many other committees as well.

Councillor Kay: I agree with Martin Greig that it is not just about the eight times a year that we meet formally. The Fife committee has 20-odd meetings in which we appear in public together and answer questions.

Councillor Blake: In Dumfries and Galloway, we have board meetings monthly that alternate between police and fire. In effect, there could be between six and 12 meetings a year.

Humza Yousaf: Thank you for those answers. I understand the point about localities, which we are focusing on at the moment. The quality of the meetings is as important as the quantity, in some respects. The Police Service of Northern Ireland said to us a few weeks ago that it holds about 10 meetings a year—which seems to be about what you guys do—that are open and accountable and to which the public can come. They hold the meetings in different parts of Northern Ireland.

One witness said that you need quality over quantity. I know that there are differences of opinion among the witnesses but—apart from local elected members—who has to be on the SPA board?

The Convener: I thought that we had dealt pretty well with that issue, Humza. There is no consensus about the balance between councillors and experts, but there is consensus that there must be both experts and councillors on the SPA.

Humza Yousaf: I suppose the question is this: who are the experts?

The Convener: Do the witnesses have specific suggestions?

Councillor Kay: On elected members, the English police authorities have a 50:50 split or a 49:51 split, depending on the authority. I was in Vancouver recently, where I went to see the police authority, which is split in the same sort of way. Those authorities appoint people who have experience in finance, human relations, strategy and so on. All the professional expertise that is needed to run a Government or local authority will be reflected in the police boards in some manner, shape or form.

Councillor Whyte: I agree with Councillor Kay’s point about professionals. The only other suggestion that I would throw in for the current reform is that there be someone with change management experience.

Humza Yousaf: You mean “transition” management. [Laughter.]

The Convener: I am being enticed to ask why you have never wanted MSPs on the SPA, but I do not think that I should ask.

Councillor Kay: MSPs are barred.

Councillor Greig: It is about the separation of powers.

The Convener: Indeed.

Humza Yousaf: It is clear from the answers to my question that there is divergence in local approaches. Some meetings are webcast, all are open, some take place six times a year, and some take place 10 times a year. You work with local circumstances, and you no doubt do that very well.

The fact that there is not enough definition in the bill of local accountability measures has been mentioned a lot. Would it be better to leave local boards and local authorities with flexibility than to have set structures that might be too inflexible?

Councillor Curran: That is why the approach in the bill has been taken. The Government wants more councillors to be involved in local accountability, but there is no guarantee that that will happen. That is the risk. In some places, the pathfinders have the same number of councillors. There is a risk that the bill’s saying nothing about that means that it is worth less.

Councillor Ross: It is important that there is not a large and ineffective talking shop; there needs to be something with substance and influence. The real test will be whether it has those—reassurance on that is needed. Clarity in the bill might give such reassurance.

Councillor Greig: The concern is that the SPA and the chief constable will make the key decisions about resources and deployment of officers, so local committees will have a passive-reactive role in scrutinising what has happened rather than a role in driving forward the priorities for local policing in their areas.

The Convener: I cannot see any of you gentlemen being passive and reactive for one moment. You seem to be quite robust.

Councillor Greig: That is our job.

Councillor Whyte: Mr Yousaf is right to ask about local matters. There is the suggestion that local committees should mirror community planning partnerships. Conveners who represent wider areas are asked to visit local community planning partnerships throughout the board areas. I have been around them; they are not democratic, but are full of chief executives of organisations.

Councillor Curran: Absolutely.

Councillor Whyte: There is a big democratic deficit at local level. We do not want to be prescriptive about how local committees are brought together, but I make the plea that they be truly representative and democratic.

Humza Yousaf: Perhaps we have touched on the point that I am about to make; the convener can tell me not to pursue it further. Is the difficulty that we must have either all 32 authorities or none represented? People will gun for their areas. As much as people like to take off their geographical hats, it seems that it is difficult for them to do it, as has been somewhat exemplified.
The Convener: Do not open up that issue again; they have all become friends again. Councillor Kay and Councillor Greig are happy again, so do not stir things up.

Rod Campbell and Lewis Macdonald have been very patient. Jenny Marra and John Finnie may also ask questions, but I want to bring the discussion to an end after that.

Roderick Campbell: Good morning. From your experience, where is the boundary between operational independence and proper scrutiny and accountability? Has that caused you difficulties in practice?

Councillor Curran: The simple answer is that everything costs money and we can ask questions about everything, because we are responsible for the budget and we are the employers. We employ everybody who delivers the service. It is therefore difficult for operational excuses to be put forward if we want to ask questions.

Councillor Kay: I might take a slightly different view from the view that Stephen Curran takes. A question is raised in my submission. We have to define at an early stage what is and is not operational. Regardless of how nice we might think a certain toilet paper is, it is quite feasible that the chief constable might decide that its purchase is an operational matter, so we would no longer have responsibility for it. It is essential that we sit down early and define “operational”. I am sure that there will be a grey area in the middle, but there should be a discussion, because it is important that the SPA or a local board does not get stymied.

Councillor Greig: Operational independence is crucial. I want to flag up a concern about the new reformed structure, which is intended to increase the number of councillors who are involved in decisions about policing. I am concerned that the new committees could politicise policing by creating substantive council committees that are based on the political complexion of a local authority area. Holding your local commander to account could involve questioning operational activities and policing campaigns and, as a council committee, people could take political perspectives on policing matters. That is a real danger that must be considered for the future.

Councillor Whyte: I will use the example of the climate camp at Gogarburn, the public furor around that and the number of police officers who were seen by the press to be standing back and not taking action. It was not for me or the board to tell the chief constable how to police that event, who to arrest or what to do. Afterwards, however, it was for us to ask how much money he had spent, whether his tactics had been successful, how he would do it next time, how we might improve and whether the action had met what the public wanted—that is, did the protesters get to protest without the public being overly disrupted and did everyone remain safe?

Councillor Blake: To follow on from what Martin Greig said, in a unitary authority there is a risk that a political perspective could form as the proportion of members reflects the make-up of the administration, but in the five years for which I have been convener that has never been an issue.

Roderick Campbell: Do I take it, then, that none of you has had a problem with such a distinction in practice?

Councillor Whyte: No.

Councillor Greig: No.

Councillor Curran: The important point is that the chief constable has to be open to accountability. We are quite fortunate in that the chief constable who came to Strathclyde was, to put it bluntly, used to more robust accountability in England in the Metropolitan Police. He is used to being questioned. There could also be tension in that we could stray into areas that might feel like operational matters for the chief constable but on which we might understandably want answers. As long as the chief constable understands that we have a right to ask the question, he has the responsibility to answer.

The Convener: It has been put to us in a different place that police boards and fire boards seem to be overawed by the brass and the scrambled eggs. Can I take it that none of you has ever been overawed? I see Councillor Greig shaking his head.

Councillor Whyte: I like one of the things that I—and, I hope, lots of others—do at every board meeting to be to ask the chief constable a question that they do not know is coming and to which they do not necessarily know how to respond. The relationship is reasonably friendly most of the time, but there will be disagreements and we are quite right to have such disagreements from time to time.

The Convener: Are those disagreements in public?

Councillor Whyte: They are in public. Sometimes the chief constable looks quite grumpy at board meetings.

Councillor Kay: Sometimes I do, as well.

The Convener: I do not make witnesses grumpy, I hope.

Lewis Macdonald (North East Scotland) (Lab): We have heard in previous evidence that some of the practical strategic decisions in policing in the future in a single force will still be taken at what you might call regional level—in other words, in Glasgow and Strathclyde, out in Grampian or in any of the other regions within which the police will operate. What, in your view, is the best way to secure scrutiny and accountability, for example on road policing for a region of Scotland that might go significantly beyond the boundaries of a single council and for which the police decision-making process goes beyond the boundaries of a single council? Is that best done by an association of local committees from the bottom up, or by some form of regional collaboration or devolution from the national police authority?

Councillor Curran: That is where the pathfinders have been very helpful. For example, the three Ayrshire councils are used to being policed in an Ayrshire setting and Argyll and Bute has road traffic as its top priority in the Strathclyde setting. They want the priority that will be given to that at national level to be reflected in the local policing plan. It is really important that the national authority understands how it is responsible for engaging at local level, but it is also really important that local councillors have clarity on what they must do to ensure that the communities that they represent are also involved in the process. The onus for that is not just on the national authority.

The Convener: Does anyone else wish to comment? No? That is good—[Interruption.] Do not feel obliged to comment.

Councillor Whyte: I agree with Councillor Curran.

The Convener: That is fine.

Lewis Macdonald: That was a very clear answer, but I want to pursue one point a little further. If both the national authority and the local community have responsibilities, what is the interface? Argyll and Bute is easy and obvious, in a sense, but when areas such as the three Ayrshires have a common interest, how does democratic accountability work, as opposed to the police command structure?

Councillor Curran: The situation is a bit ad hoc. The other risk is that the police force will be set up in such a way that we have a regional command structure. How will that be accountable? Will it be accountable to the chief constable, who will be accountable to a national authority, or will there be regional buy-in? I am not saying that we should recreate the joint boards that we have just now, but there is certainly room for a more collective approach. The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and individual local authorities could look at how that might best be done. That would be helpful in the next few months.

Councillor Ross: The pathfinders will be significant with regard to how the structure evolves. The crucial thing is how we harmonise the feedback from those groups so that it has a significant influence on the structures that develop as the new service and the new authority come into being on 1 April. There is a timing issue, and we must ensure that everything matches up.

Councillor Whyte: To amplify that, we need people on the new police authority who are prepared to challenge the chief constable on how he is taking into account local need, building local policing plans into the national plan and appropriately resourcing local areas to meet their own priorities.

The Convener: Jenny Marra has been very patient. I will make this the last question.

Jenny Marra: I am looking for evidence on the gender balance in the boards and authorities. Can each of you tell me quickly how many of the elected members on your police boards or authorities and fire boards are women, and how many are men?

The Convener: There are cats among pigeons—they are having to think their way through that one.

Councillor Curran: There is certainly not a gender balance. We also have substitute representatives from the councils, who tend to be slightly older, male and white. Although we have ethnic minority members in our authority, from a gender balance perspective only about a quarter—at best—of Strathclyde’s board members are women.

Jenny Marra: The figure is about 25 per cent in your authority.

Councillor Curran: Yes, and that is not good.

Councillor Ross: I would echo that. The vast majority of the Northern board members are male and are probably even older than me.

Jenny Marra: Can you give numbers?

Councillor Ross: The percentage of women is probably 25 per cent or less. The same applies to the substitutes, so it varies.

Councillor Whyte: About a third of Lothian and Borders board are female.

The Convener: Councillor Grieg? Sorry—it is Councillor Greig; I have reverted again.

Councillor Greig: Grampian’s figure is something similar, but I cannot remember.

The Convener: Councillor Kay?

Jenny Marra: I am sorry, convener—
The Convener: I will come back to the councillors, but let us go round them all first. Councillor Kay?

Councillor Kay: Six out of the 15 members of the Fife board are female. We never set out to make that the case—it depends on who the political parties nominate as their representatives.

Councillor Blake: Dumfries and Galloway's figure is 10 per cent.

Jenny Marra: Councillor Greig said that the board meets eight to 10 times a year, but you cannot remember. Can you be a bit more specific?

Councillor Greig: There are eight to 10 scheduled meetings, but we hold additional meetings when they are required—for example, to go over the single status agreement.

Jenny Marra: I am sorry. My point is that you meet so often, but cannot remember the proportion of female elected representatives on the board.

Councillor Greig: I am not good with maths.

Jenny Marra: Okay.

The Convener: I feel that Councillor Greig has had a bit of a hard time today, for reasons that I do not understand.

Jenny Marra: Okay. I will lay off Councillor Greig.

The Convener: I see that he is smiling. You have a lovely smile, by the way.

Councillor Greig: That is very kind.

David McLetchie: This is a Frank McAveety moment.

Jenny Marra: Given the importance of gender issues in policing and the figures on domestic abuse that Women's Aid released this weekend, is there a place in the bill for a quota that would ensure better representation and better scrutiny of those issues, particularly in policing?

The Convener: That is a serious point.

Councillor Curran: Diversity in its broadest sense is really significant. It is an area that has been flagged up as a weakness in some police boards and in policing generally. It covers a range of issues including sexuality, ethnic minorities and so on. To be accurate, I would say that the women on our board are probably its most active members, and probably the ones of whom I have been most wary in the meetings that I have chaired.

Councillor Kay: I honestly do not see it as being an issue in Fife. We have a fairly robust number of female members on the board. Whether the number could be doubled would be entirely up to the parties. I attend all our inauguration meetings, and I would say—in fact, I gave this information out yesterday—that if we have not reached a 50 per cent split between female and male in the police force, we are very much heading that way.

Much more problematic is the fire service, which is a very different kettle of fish.

The Convener: I will let Councillor Greig have the last word.

Councillor Greig: We take equalities very seriously as a board, and we have fairly recently agreed an equalities policy. At our stewardship committee, I and my colleagues have questioned the chief constable and his representatives about the very low numbers of female police officers and police staff. That is an intractable problem: we will have to wait for a culture change to increase the number of women who are employed in police forces. It is an issue that we have complained about time and again, because the police force needs to reflect accurately the communities that it represents. There is still a long way to go.

The Convener: I am happy to say that there are quite a lot of women conveners in the Parliament—I do not see one from a police board in front of me just now, but there might be one somewhere.

I thank you all for your evidence this morning. I will suspend the meeting for 10 minutes, as the committee has a long day ahead.

11:11

Meeting suspended.

11:21

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome to the meeting our second panel of witnesses, all of whom are from COSLA: Councillor Pat Watters, president; Councillor Barbara Grant, community safety spokesperson; Hayley Wotherspoon, policy manager; and James Fowlie, team development manager. Have I pronounced your name correctly, Mr Fowlie?

James Fowlie (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): Yes.

The Convener: I ask simply because I have been getting my Griegs and Greigs muddled up this morning.

I thank the panel for its written submissions and know that they listened to the previous evidence. Councillor Watters, I believe that you are stepping down in May and that this might be your last appearance before a parliamentary committee.
Councillor Pat Watters (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): I will certainly come back if I am invited. It all depends on how I am treated this morning.

The Convener: I am afraid that no one gets called on that basis. We could be really nasty to you and still call you back before us. However, as you will find, we are a very kindly committee.

Alison McInnes: will ask the first question.

Alison McInnes: As you will have heard this morning, two themes are emerging from the evidence that we have taken: governance, and the interface between local authority responses in local planning and the national police plan. First, on the issue of governance, what is COSLA’s view on the size of and the representation on the national board? When should those appointments be made?

Councillor Barbara Grant (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): Having carried out a considerably long and weary examination of the issue, COSLA has come to the view that a board of either seven or 11 members is not really practical. There would not be enough people to do all the business that needs to be done. Instead, we suggest that the board should have a minimum of 15, the majority of whom should be elected members.

I think that Councillor Curran made the very valid point that elected councillors have wider interests than people who are promoted to the board simply as a result of their expertise in one or other field. They will be channelled into that particular line, while the broad spectrum of interests that councillors have will be a great help to any national board. Of course, councillors would have to consider issues from a national perspective.

The Convener: Do you have anything to add, Councillor Watters?

Councillor Watters: No. That was fine. That is our position.

Alison McInnes: It would be helpful if you could say more about the value of having elected members on the board and explain how they might be chosen.

Councillor Grant: We have suggested that COSLA put forward a list of names, which would be seen by ministers before the people in question went through the national independent selection process. Of course, those people would be from all parts of the country and would all have different interests. Councillors have very wide views on everything. My particular area is policing—indeed, Mr Pearson knows me well from my days on the Strathclyde police board—but the fact is that you do not have to be a member of a board to be interested in what is going on in your local community. After all, it is not the minister who matters; it is the people you represent who matter and COSLA is focusing on what the service will provide for the people we represent.

Lewis Macdonald: I want to pursue with you a governance issue that I pursued with the previous panel. As far as local accountability or engagement with local policing issues is concerned, we are looking at a shift from eight police boards to 32 local authorities. In some respects, that is the appropriate level at which things should be done and decisions made. However, in other areas of policing, certain decisions and strategies go wider than that and cross local authority boundaries. Is there a governance mechanism to ensure that police decisions at a strategic but sub-national level can be made accountable to locally elected members? Could that be done through a combination of local authority police committees or would COSLA have to create some kind of regional focus to maintain a degree of democratic accountability at that tier?

Councillor Watters: It will probably require a mixture of the two approaches. Although a national board will make strategic decisions, there must be a measure of local flexibility. You mentioned accountability; unless there is something that the police are accountable for to local committees, all we will have will be wee talking shops. I am sorry, but I did not come into politics simply to meet once every six weeks and be told things that I could read anyway. As I have said, if the local commander is going to be accountable to the local committee, they must have something to be accountable for.

We welcome the proposal with regard to local commanders. I can speak only for my own area of Strathclyde, but our local commander meets the police authority every Wednesday morning. We sit down and have a coffee and a blether and anyone who wants to see him can come in and have a chat. Of course, there are more formally structured meetings in which the local commander meets the leader of the authority but, as a member of the authority, I can lift the phone any time I want to speak to him. If I want to see him on a Wednesday morning, I know exactly where he is: he is meeting my authority. We already have a mixture of both approaches.

I am not saying by any manner of means that the local committee should take all the decisions. A single force will have a strategic role, but there must be local flexibility and any committee holding the force to account must have some responsibilities to hold it to account for.

Councillor Grant: In this country, policing happens by consent of the public, not the minister.
the extent that, for instance, the two constables on Barra had their own overtime budget.

Resource allocation is always an issue. What resource allocation model would COSLA favour for the new police service? You touched on the tactical tasking. We heard from Assistant Chief Constable Finlay of Northern Ireland that that would be the mechanism that would be used there to resolve any issues about allocations.

Councillor Grant: The difficulty is that we are being told that there will be no local budgets. The budgets will all come from on high.

John Finnie: That happens at the moment. Within Northern Constabulary, the budget comes from on high—from the Northern joint police board—and is devolved down.

Councillor Grant: Yes, but it comes through a different source. When you are sitting at a police board and you know that you have X amount of pounds at your disposal, that is translated by the chief constable into an allocation for all the various jobs that need to be done. However, if the board has a different idea of what is going to be done, it can shift the money around as it suits it.

John Finnie: Is that not an operational matter?

Councillor Grant: Not necessarily. It depends on how the whole plan is worked out.

John Finnie: Could you give an example of where your board has taken a contrary view to the chief constable on redirecting resources away from a plan that he or she proposes?

Councillor Grant: No. You would really need to ask Stephen Curran, who is the convener of the board.

We have budget meetings so that, when resources are going to be brought forward, the budgeting can be looked at in detail before we get to that point, and we will say what we feel is the direction in which we want to be travelling.

John Finnie: To what level do you think that resources should be devolved?

Councillor Grant: I will defer to my colleague, who is more into the money.

The Convener: Generally or specifically?

Councillor Watters: Specifically, in this instance.

We have a preference for the budgets to be devolved down to the local committee level and the commander level, so that there is some accountability to the local authority and the local committee for policing within the area.

John Finnie: Would you expect the commander to devolve money below that?
Councillor Watters: Not particularly, unless that was the way in which it was done. I would see the budget as being devolved down to the local commander, so that there is accountability to the area committee.

John Finnie: Within the structure, is a decision that is taken in the police service about how to allocate resources—for overtime, for example—not an operational matter for the chief constable, the chief superintendent, the chief inspector or the shift sergeant, rather than a local commander?

Councillor Watters: I disagree. Having budgets at the commander level and not the central level is not an operational matter but a financial governance matter that relates to how the service is operated. That is not about how policing decisions are devolved or what operational priorities are set in the police area.

John Finnie: How many budget holders would be in the model that you propose?

Councillor Watters: It would involve the divisional commanders.

John Finnie: How many of them?

Councillor Watters: How many are you proposing? If there was one in Ayrshire, there would be one in Ayrshire.

John Finnie: With the greatest respect, I am asking how many budget holders COSLA proposes.

Councillor Watters: That would involve the divisional commanders as the structure is made up.

Lewis Macdonald: I will pick up the answers to my first question from Councillor Grant and Councillor Watters. A gap between the local and national levels is recognised. Is there a risk that we will end up with polarisation between ministers saying that everything should be done centrally and the other argument, which is that everything should be done at local council level? Will you address that gap in how you relate local priorities to national priorities and local budgetary decisions to national budgetary decisions?

Councillor Grant: The problem is that we do not have enough information. There is a gap between what will happen locally and what will happen on the national board. We have had no information about whether a regional structure will be in place. We do not know any of that business and we might not know any of it until a chief constable is selected. The chief constable might make the decision or the national board might make it. We do not know about that at the moment.

The Convener: All such questions will be put to the cabinet secretary when he gives evidence next week. I am sure that his staff are listening with great interest to what is being said.

David McLetchie: Good morning, everyone. I will follow up the discussion about budgets and accountability. I can speak only from direct experience of the City of Edinburgh Council and Lothian and Borders police board. The council provided additional funding to the board to employ additional officers who focused primarily on community policing initiatives. We can leave aside for a moment whether that is interference in an operational matter. The fact is that additional funding was provided; that might have been replicated in other local authority areas. Is the proposed funding and budgetary structure likely to sound the death knell for such additionality? A council will have no obvious incentive to put in additional funds for such a dedicated purpose.

Councillor Watters: Something between 600 and 800 additional police are on the street because authorities up and down the country have prioritised that in their communities, for whatever reason. What will happen to them after the transfer to a single force would certainly interest those authorities. We could be in danger of the officers being transferred under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations, which would mean that the local authority budget was transferred. Before that happened, I think that local authorities would take steps to ensure that the responsibility for funding those posts was not theirs but that of the single police force.

Councillor Grant: The 600 to 800 police are part of the big number of 17,234 police, which seems to be a fixed number. If local authorities cannot fund those extra posts, how will we get the 17,234? For example, my authority puts money towards campus cops, which have been a great boon—everybody says that they are great and asks why we do not mainstream that approach. If the local authorities, which are strapped for money, cannot provide money for, say, campus cops, that will be taken out. How will those 600 to 800 police officers be funded? Will they no longer be in the force, or is the number of 17,234 sacrosanct? If it is, and local authorities do not pay for the extra posts, who will pay for them?

David McLetchie: That is a good question that I would like to get to the bottom of. Councillor Watters referred to TUPE. If I understand your answers, the 600 to 800 additional officers will have their employment transferred to the SPA—the new police service of Scotland. There cannot be any other outcome. I therefore presume that the money that is presently paid for those 600 or 800 officers will have to go with them, or the budget will not work out. One assumes that, whether one likes it or not, the local authority budget that presently pays for the employment of those 600 to 800 officers will have to be sliced off and added to the national police budget so that the national police force can continue to employ them. Is that correct?

Councillor Watters: You presume that, in our preparations in the run-up to our budgets for next year, we will leave that money in our budgets.

David McLetchie: That is correct, but you make the presumption that your overall level of grant will be sustained. If that issue and impasse cannot be resolved—

Councillor Watters: With respect, our agreement with the Government is that we transfer to the police the money that we receive for police. The additional 600 to 800 officers are the result of a priority being set in the local government budget to meet needs in our communities. That is not part of the money—the 49 per cent of the funding—that we get for police.

David McLetchie: I understand that the money for those officers is additional. My point is that your additional contribution is largely funded from a general grant that comes to local authorities from the Government. You say that I make certain assumptions about what you might pay out of your discretionary pot, if you like—which is funded in part by revenue support grant. Equally, if the additionality issue is not resolved, the Scottish Government might say that it has to continue to pay those additional officers when they are employed nationally and, whether we like it or not, it will have to take the money from the local government pot from which they are being paid at the moment and put it in another one. Am I missing something? That seems to me to be logical. I am not saying that that is desirable; I simply put it to you that it is likely.

The Convener: Councillor Grant does not seem to agree.

Councillor Grant: No, I do not agree, because that would mean that, with anything that local government decides to put money into from its general grant—to fund a dog catcher, for example—the Government can say that it will just take the money away. If that happened, the whole thing would become preposterous. We are talking about money from the general grant that councils have decided to spend on X, rather than on Y. That money has nothing to do with the police budget or anything like that.

David McLetchie: I agree that it has nothing to do with the police budget. My point is that the money has to come from somewhere to employ the people who will be officers in the police service of Scotland.

Councillor Watters: Yes.

David McLetchie: As that money presently comes out of a local government pot, if we are to continue to employ those officers, it must instead come out of a national pot. Therefore, it seems to me self-evident that one pot will be reduced to boost the other. I am not saying that that is desirable as a matter of principle; I am simply saying that it seems logical.

Councillor Watters: With respect, Mr McLetchie, there are two things. First, that money is given by agreement at present, on the basis of an understanding between the local authority and the chief constable. If we were to continue down that road, there would have to be discussion between the chief constable for Scotland and the local authorities about priorities, what we were paying for and what the police delivered for that money. If that were not the case, our priorities might change. We budget on a three-yearly basis but review our budgets annually and, if we decide to change our budgets, that is our responsibility.

David McLetchie: Indeed, and if the Government decided that it was not going to fund 80 per cent of your expenditure any more, that would be its responsibility.

Councillor Watters: That is true.

David McLetchie: That is my point.

Councillor Watters: It would also take legislation to do that.

David McLetchie: Could I—

The Convener: David, are you pursuing the same point or is it something separate?

David McLetchie: This gets us to whether some mechanism for local budgets needs to be included in the bill. As I understand it, that is one of the points that are made in the COSLA submission. We can have additionality only if we have a local budget against which to baseline it in the first instance.

I have a more general question on the proposition that there be local budgets. In his written evidence to us, Professor Gallagher suggested that, if there were a localised element to the budget, there should be local mechanisms for money to be taken out of the police pot and put into a budget for youth work, for example, if that was felt to be a more desirable way of reducing crime levels in a community. That would involve movement between a police pot and a council pot.

Councillor Grant: The money that the police gather when they catch criminals and, for example, find a case full of money in the boot of a car could go to the local authority, which could decide what it wanted to spend it on. At the moment, such money goes to the Government, which decides what it wants to spend it on. There are all sorts of things wafting around that need to be thought about.

Councillor Watters: Community safety in any community in Scotland is the responsibility of more than just the police. David McLetchie is right that there might be other ways of adding to it and driving it forward.

It is not simply about the number of police that we have on the street; other elements have to be addressed. At present, the police are involved in discussions about how we enact community safety through community planning partnerships. In any new system, they need to be fully involved in that system so that we can discuss how our communities move forward jointly to provide community safety.

The Convener: Surely your current police budgets are used for preventative spend anyway. The police do not only catch crooks or find pots of money in the boots of cars—wherever that happens—but do a lot of other stuff. Surely that is already part of the police budget.

Councillor Watters: There are good examples of how that is done. I am saying that it is not just about that budget; other parts of local authority budgets go towards community safety.

The Convener: I understand that, but some of the police budget—if we take just that little capsule—is already spent doing those other things. It is not as if it was tightly defined as simply policemen walking about the streets capturing people and taking them back to the police station. It already does all those other things and, on top of that, as I understand from your evidence, there is flexibility from other budgets because, if you make interventions in housing, you do not have housing issues, antisocial behaviour, health issues and other ancillary problems. Is that correct?

Councillor Watters: Yes.

Councillor Grant: The business of community planning partnerships is to bring together the police, the fire service and other bodies in a way that enhances all their operations. That is happening all the time and more and more. We want to ensure that it continues to happen and continues at an even higher level, because that is what makes life better for our communities. To take fire for example, there are new alarm systems in which the fire alarm is connected into the community pendant alarm. Everything is gathered together to make the whole service better.

The Convener: I understand. In my constituency and the neighbouring one, because the local authorities are coterminous with the NHS, the police and so on, there is good partnership working to make the money go further and be more effective. I just wanted to clarify the issue about pots.

Graeme Pearson: Councillor Watters’s comments about not wanting local talking shops and about the need for people to have a budget for which they are responsible chimed with my question to conveners on the previous panel, when I asked them who should be responsible for the financial picture for their local areas during the changeover to the new force and as things go forward.

I have struggled with the issue to do with the 17,234 officers, which David McLetchie mentioned. Under the current arrangements, it seems to have been difficult to maintain support staff and management numbers, and there seems to be a disconnect between the notion of employing additional police officers and its knock-on effect, which is the loss of support staff. Is that a shortcoming in the current levels of accountability, or is it something that we will always have to bear? I read a report last week that said that we have 1,000 fewer support staff in the current set-up.

Councillor Grant: The savings that have been made have been achieved through redundancies in support staff, which have happened only where the support staff were not required. In future, if the amount of money must be saved that has been suggested, and if the police and fire services have a new responsibility to pay VAT of £30 million, that money must be found from somewhere.

The civil servants tell me that the calculation has already been made and the £30 million is included. However, the money has to come from somewhere, and the obvious answer is that support staff will have to go. The Government has a policy of no compulsory redundancies, so if people do not decide to take voluntary redundancy they will transfer, and the new police authority will have to manage the situation. If the authority is to make savings of the order that is being talked about, something like 2,000 support staff will have to go.

If those support staff go because the money must be saved, the cops will have to take up the slack. We really do not want to pay police, who should be out there doing the business on the street, to sit behind a desk and pick up a phone. That does not seem sensible at all.

I do not know whether I have answered your question.

Graeme Pearson: I could ask a lot more, but let us leave the issue there.

We have touched on one devilish issue, as has been said. There are only 12 months to go before the single force comes into operation. Are there other devilish issues that the witnesses want to bring to the committee’s attention—issues on which we are not focusing? There were subtle differences in the views on the way forward of the conveners from whom we heard earlier. What issues does COSLA think that we should be paying attention to?

Councillor Watters: I am not sure that there are issues that you have not considered. Consideration must be given to appointing the chief constable as soon as possible, to give him an opportunity to think about how he will take things forward. The process could operate in a number of ways. The current police conveners could work jointly with the cabinet secretary to consider how to do it. The situation is not ideal, but we do not have long and there is a big job ahead of us.

We must be aware of other issues. To transfer from eight bodies to one body the number of staff that we will transfer, all with the same conditions of service that they have now, will cause us an on-going problem. We must start to tackle that problem now, so that we are prepared in taking it forward. We have to be aware of some big issues that could come back and bite us.

This might not be the right time to say it, but we are 100 per cent behind ensuring—along with the Government, the Parliament and other partners—that we have the best police and fire services that we can possibly have in Scotland. We do not want to put anything down as being problematic, but a big job lies ahead of us.

Graeme Pearson: Do you envisage that the buildings will transfer over to the ownership of the new single authority, or will there have to be a capital allocation to local authorities to reimburse them for the loss of those facilities?

Councillor Watters: We are in active discussions with the cabinet secretary about that.

Councillor Grant: A huge number of issues around assets and liabilities have not been tackled. Some buildings that the police and fire services operate from are joint buildings. Over the past few years we have gone out of our way to ensure that police, fire, health and housing services are all together under one roof. Does that roof belong to the council, to the NHS or to the police? All that mess will have to be unknotted, as it were. That will take a bit of time—it will not happen in a hurry.

The sooner that we can get a chief fire officer and a chief constable in place, the better for the services. Kevin Smith can only do so much under the transitional arrangements. It will then be up to whoever becomes the chief constable. He or she may have a particular way of going about the business that has not been thought through or considered. You cannot do these things overnight. We suggested a different way of picking somebody, because we felt that it was an important matter.

Councillor Watters: Another issue that jumps to mind is how we interact. Staff in both the police and fire services would like still to be part of their national bodies, but that will become difficult when there is a single police authority and a single fire service authority in Scotland that report directly to the Government, because the Government would be the employers of those forces. Therefore, they will not have any right to representation, or additional representation, on either the Police Negotiating Board or the National Joint Council for Local Authority Fire and Rescue Services.

Alison McInnes: Councillor Watters touched on the transitional arrangements and the Cabinet Secretary for Justice’s determination to have the single service up and running on 1 April 2013. The last time that there was a major reorganisation of local government there was a full shadow year. Is there any merit in exploring that option?

Councillor Grant: There is plenty of merit in that suggestion, but it is not what we are being engineered to do. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice is fairly determined that from 1 April next year there will be a single service.

My priority is to ensure that the service is right. It does a good job now and we want it to continue to do a good job. We do not want it to fall at the first hurdle. It must continue to be good and become better. There is no point in changing something for the sake of changing it; it must be changed to make it better. When it comes to day one, we do not want to have something that appears to be falling down. The transition should be seamless. It will be quite a tricky thing to do and there is a very short timescale in which to do it, but that is what the efforts are all about.

Roderick Campbell: I touched on the boundaries between operational and non-operational matters with the previous panel, and I got the impression that that distinction was not something that would give them any problems. In your submission, you refer to the fact that “operational” is not defined. I suggest that defining operational matters might cause additional problems and that, in reality, a lack of definition has advantages.

Councillor Grant: There are advantages because, if you are not too prescriptive, you have a bit of leeway. However, by the same token, sometimes the situation can be too open. There have to be certain parameters. At the moment, the chief constable in my area is responsible for almost half the population of Scotland. If I want to speak to him, all that I have to do is lift the phone. I do not know that I will be able to do that when there is one force and one chief constable for the whole of Scotland.

I am sure that a lot of parameters will be engineered into the business. I do not know how the chief constable will deal with the work that happens below his level. At the moment, we do not have a clue how we are going to get from a chief constable down to the local commander. There is a big gap in the middle and we have no idea how all that is going to work. It is difficult to see how the system will be prescriptive; on the other hand, it is difficult to see how it will not be prescriptive.

I am sorry if that sounds a bit vague, but we do not have sufficient information and I do not see how we will get sufficient information until we have a chief constable in place.

The Convener: How many divisional commanders are in the Strathclyde area, which, as you say, contains half Scotland’s population?

Councillor Grant: I do not know. Maybe Mr Pearson has a better idea.

The Convener: I am not allowed to ask him, but he might just tell me.

My point is that Strathclyde contains half our population and is a very diverse area. People at the local level must deal with the chief constable. To some extent, does that not provide us with an operational model for what might happen when we have a single police force?

Councillor Grant: Stephen House is our chief constable, and there are various commanders. For example, in my area, G division, which covers the Pollock/Govan area, plus the East Renfrewshire Council area, has one commander; all the Ayrshires are under one commander; and A division has one commander. I am not sure how many there are altogether, but the system works well, and I am sure that it would not be a bad thing to build on that model. At the moment, however, we have no idea how it is going to pan out.

The Convener: I am just trying to say that we are not reinventing the wheel, as there is already a system that works in a large part of Scotland. While that situation is not exactly the same, it means that we are not starting from nothing.

Councillor Grant: I hope that we are not reinventing the wheel, but the problem is that we do not know what is going to happen. It will be for the future chief constable and the national board to decide what is going to happen.

I think that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice will say to the national board that this is the way he sees things going and that it is up to us to make it work. He says that he will not have direct contact with the chief constable, but he does not need to—he can just say to the board that he wants it to tell the chief constable to do X, Y and Z, and, in my understanding, it will have to follow his instructions.

Strathclyde Police does a good job in a wide, dispersed area. I hope that that good practice can be followed.

The Convener: I will bring this session to a close at this point.

Although I might be premature in doing so—he may be back with us, by invitation only—I wish Councillor Watters a happy future, whatever it might hold; I am sure that he is not retiring.
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

10:00

The Convener: Item 2 is our final evidence session on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the meeting the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Kenny MacAskill, who is accompanied by four Scottish Government officials. Liz Sadler is head of the policy and legislation unit; Nick Bland is head of the police reform unit; Lorna Gibbs is head of the fire and rescue reform unit; and Kevin Gibson is from the legal directorate.

I invite the cabinet secretary to make a short opening statement if he wishes to do so before I invite questions from members.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill): Thank you for inviting me to speak to the committee about the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. I will make some general comments before I take questions.

Both the police service and the fire and rescue service have done excellent work in recent years to contribute to making Scotland’s communities safer and stronger, but the Scottish Government believes that, in the face of unprecedented cuts from Westminster, it is necessary fundamentally to restructure the services to protect and improve the service that they give local communities. Single services are the best way to achieve that aim. Sir Hugh Orde acknowledged that a couple of weeks ago in front of the committee in noting the deficiencies in England and Wales of relying on enhanced collaboration to create a service that is fit to deal with the demands of the 21st century.

Over the past couple of years, we have worked closely with the services, staff associations, trade unions and other stakeholders to shape the proposals for single services. The Minister for Community Safety and Legal Affairs, Roseanna Cunningham, her predecessor, Fergus Ewing, and I have undertaken visits and meetings in communities across Scotland, from the northern isles to the Scottish Borders. We have met senior officers, the men and women on the front line, support staff and the people and communities who rely on the services.

My officials have maintained regular dialogue with all key stakeholders, particularly in the services and local government. We have drawn on best practice by hosting an international policing summit, and I have visited the Police Service of Northern Ireland, which, as members have heard, is a successful single service. I welcome the positive way in which stakeholders have engaged with us on reform and their commitment to ensuring that it is successful. Many have reiterated that commitment in their evidence to the committee.

This is a critical time for our work on police and fire and rescue reform, and the next few months will be vital to the success of the programme to develop single services, both in progressing the bill and in continuing the vital work on implementation. As the bill progresses, I am keen that we keep listening. With the services, unions, representative organisations, the Scottish Government and Scottish Parliament working together, I am confident that we will deliver a robust, effective and high-quality piece of legislation that meets the expectations of Scotland’s communities.

The bill sets out, as never before in legislation, a detailed framework for the new services, and it will modernise the governance of the Scottish police and fire and rescue services. For the first time, the bill clearly defines the respective roles and responsibilities of the key players: the Scottish ministers, the Scottish police authority, the Scottish fire and rescue board and the chief officers of both services. In particular, it defines and clarifies the operational responsibilities of the chief constable more than ever before by making it clear that only the chief constable has direction and control of the police service and that only the Lord Advocate or the appropriate prosecutor can direct the chief constable in relation to the investigation of crime. It also makes it absolutely clear that the chief constable is accountable to the Scottish police authority, not to the Scottish ministers, and, for the first time, it provides opportunities for the Scottish Parliament to scrutinise policing and fire and rescue services on a regular and systematic basis.

The strategic police plan, the annual police plan, the SPA’s annual report and accounts and the SFRS’s strategic plan, annual report and accounts will all be laid before the Parliament. The national governance structures will also ensure an enhanced focus on local delivery of policing and fire and rescue services. I believe that the single services will strengthen the links between police and fire and rescue services and the communities that they serve by enabling individual local councils, not regional joint boards, to take on a new role at a national level and to shape services in the local area. They will do that through a range of detailed measures, for example by requiring the chief constable and chief officer to designate a local police commander and senior local fire officer for each council area.

Crucially, the bill clearly links the national and the local by providing that local authorities will be consulted on strategic priorities and strategic plans, by placing duties on the chief constable and the SFRS tied to local service delivery and by ensuring that local plans reflect national strategic plans where appropriate, all while retaining the flexibility for local authorities to develop their own models of engagement and formulate local plans reflecting local priorities and circumstances.

The bill will also provide greater integration with community planning by placing specific duties on the local senior officers. These new local and scrutiny arrangements are already being trialled by 16 formal pathfinders and I expect more local authorities to be involved in the pathfinder network following the local government elections in May.

Having given this briefest of overviews of an enormously detailed piece of legislation, I am happy to respond to any detailed questions.

The Convener: I shall take Rod Campbell’s question first. As we have a long agenda today, it would be very useful if members could ask short, sharp questions.

Roderick Campbell (North East Fife) (SNP): Good morning, cabinet secretary. Some individuals have suggested that there would be merit in delaying the timetable for reform. What is your view on that? In particular, what is your view on the merits of the early appointment of the chief officers?

Kenny MacAskill: There are two issues there. On the bill, I think it is appropriate that we have a start date, and we have specified 1 April 2013. As with anything, one has to set a date. We are clearly on course and on target and I do not see any merit in delay. If something untoward were to happen, we have fallback procedures, but at present it is important that we stick to that date. We have always made it quite clear that although some things will change and although that is the start date for a single service, many other things will take some time, and we will allow those to be operated out by the chief constable and the Scottish police authority. The start date should remain April 2013, and we are on course to achieve that.

We are obviously taking steps to try to ensure that we get the chief constable in, whoever he or she might be, at an optimum time. I am aware of the concerns that you have heard in evidence, to which I am prepared to listen and on which I will reflect. It is fundamental that we avoid any ministerial appointment but I am happy to give consideration to what is felt not only by the bodies that have given evidence but by you.

Roderick Campbell: On the question of how much parliamentary scrutiny there should be of the new set-up, we heard from the Auditor General for Scotland in particular, as well as from representatives of the Fire Brigades union, that they thought that there was a need for an increased role for the Parliament. What is your view on that?

Kenny MacAskill: I think that I agree. A variety of suggestions have been made, including by Graeme Pearson. We take the view that it is not for the Government to decide how the Parliament should carry out its scrutiny role, but we accept that the Parliament has a particular role to play. We think that there is good merit in such matters being considered, but fundamentally it is for the Parliament to work that out. We have made provision for representations to be made and for the documents that would be laid before the Justice Committee. That is the Government's direction of travel. As I say, we accept the merits of the argument but think that it is for the Parliament to work out the detail.

Graeme Pearson (South Scotland) (Lab): You talk about parliamentary oversight of the governance of the police service, in particular, but also of the fire service. From your experience and knowledge of discussions on such matters, do you have any notion of how that would work out in practice?

Kenny MacAskill: Our experience and knowledge were gained from our international conference—although it would be fair to say that some of the international comparators do not have the same level of parliamentary scrutiny—and from visiting Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland has particular issues relating to the divide, but it was felt that there was merit in the approach that has been adopted there. In discussions, especially with Chief Constable Smith and other officers, it was felt that the involvement of the Justice Committee would be beneficial because of the breadth of its work, which covers all aspects of justice. Policing does not exist in isolation—it interacts with health, social work, prisons and so on—and those who serve on the Justice Committee are more likely to have a broader understanding of wider justice issues.

As a Government, we do not wish to be too specific. We think that it is for the Parliament to work out what the best method would be. I have seen what Mr Pearson has suggested, and I recognise the merits of parliamentary scrutiny. Given the significance of the body in question, that will be essential. How that is best dealt with and whether it is best done by the Justice Committee or by some other means is an issue that we think is for the committee, the Presiding Officer and the wider Parliament to reflect on. We think that what we have built in provides the opportunity for that, but it is for the Parliament to build on it.

Graeme Pearson: You sound as if you would welcome amendments on the matter.

Kenny MacAskill: It would be fair to say that we are happy to look at the issue. We do not think that it is for the Government to decide how the Parliament constructs itself. We have taken the view that there are aspects of what happens down south with the Metropolitan Police in London that we may not want to replicate, and that we would be better to have the breadth that exists elsewhere. However, we are happy to listen to what the committee and others have to say. We are open to discussing the matter, because we accept the principle that Mr Pearson and others have put forward that, with single services—both police and fire—it is important that there should be parliamentary involvement and scrutiny, and that it might be best for the Parliament to decide on the shape of that scrutiny. We accept the logic and the merit of that position, and we are open to discussion.

Graeme Pearson: I think that you would also accept that the move towards a single service involves a fundamental change in the relationship between Government, the police and the public, which is why it is so important that we ensure that proper democratic oversight and governance are delivered from the outset.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. We accept that, which is why we are happy to enter into discussion.

Lewis Macdonald (North East Scotland) (Lab): I would like to ask you about some of the fundamentals of the reform proposals. You will be familiar with the evidence that the committee has heard and the submissions that it has received. I will refer to three of those submissions.

The position of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities is that there are alternatives to a non-departmental public body model, one of which could be a single shared local government service. Likewise, Unison said:

"A national police force could still be a local government body and this would provide a better governance model than that proposed in this Bill."

Professor Jim Gallagher, a former head of the Justice Department, said:

"There is no reason in principle why a single force could not be part of local government."

How much consideration have you given to the proposition that a single force could be achieved by the police service remaining within local government rather than by its forming part of national Government? What were your reasons for your judgment not to pursue that option?

Kenny MacAskill: We have been considering the matter for several years. When we went into the election, some parties had formed the view that we should have a single service. It would be fair to say that my party said that the status quo was not tenable, but that a single service model and a regional model—which would have been much more local authority based—were both possible. After further consideration, we have come down in favour of the single service model, which is also supported by some of, if not all, the parties that are represented on the committee. We felt that the best way to proceed was the way in which we have been proceeding.

The Scottish police authority and the Scottish fire and rescue service will be distinct legal entities and will be classified as other significant public bodies. We want to ensure that they have the necessary skills and democratic accountability, some of which will come from local authorities. That is why we will ensure that we build in local authority representation.

The Government’s only caveat is that we believe that those who represent local government—some of whom are outstanding—should be able to meet the criteria and quality tests that the Public Appointments Commissioner for Scotland would have for any other member of that board. I am sure that that is a matter that will be appreciated, given the size and significance of the board. Equally, there are other people who can bring an array of other skills and talents that are relevant to the running of a public body.

We think that the method that we have arrived at strikes the correct balance between allowing some democratic oversight and scrutiny and ensuring that we have the appropriate skills and resources to run what is a major public body with a significant number of staff members and a significant public budget.

Lewis Macdonald: Do you accept the point that has been made by COSLA, Unison and others that the fact that there will be a single force does not require it to be a national force—in other words, the single force could operate in a local government context, with a combined board, as it were? Do you further accept that that model has advantages over the model that you have brought forward?

Kenny MacAskill: Those suggestions have come in at a late stage. We have formulated a method that ties in a significant public body and which strikes a balance between democratic scrutiny and the requisite skills and talents that we feel are necessary to assist the chief constable and the chief fire officer in their jobs.

I have to say that some of the other models that have been suggested are not fully fleshed out. Although we have given consideration to the suggestion that you mention, it still lacks clarity.

Lewis Macdonald: One advantage of such a scheme would be in relation to VAT. In a recent letter to Unison that I have seen, a Treasury minister was clear that the Scottish Government was aware from the outset of what the limitations were on VAT exemption in the event of the creation of a national body that is no longer, in any respect, part of the local government sector. That is a difference from the position south of the border, where the Police Reform and Social Responsibility Act 2011 included a provision on VAT exemption to favour the new commissioners of police.

Can you indicate how far that aspect was considered when you decided that you would not pursue a local government option for the creation of a single force and a single fire service?

Kenny MacAskill: First of all, the VAT situation applies in relation to the Scottish Police Services Authority. That method was set up by a Government of which you were a member, not me. We have been and still are involved in negotiations with the Treasury. We do not feel that the door is closed. Negotiations are on-going between it and my colleagues in the finance department.

It would be fair to say that we very much regret the Treasury’s current position, given issues of the sort that you heard about in evidence from Her Majesty’s inspector of constabulary for Scotland and the assistant chief constable in Northern Ireland. It is a matter of regret that we are still involved in negotiations when the Police Service of Northern Ireland and, ironically, the security services of the United Kingdom are not in this position.

The door is not closed. Regardless of that letter, we seek to negotiate and, as I said, negotiations are on-going between the finance department and the Treasury.

We think that the single service strengthens the link between the police service and the fire and rescue service and the communities that they serve. The system that we will put in place—a pyramid structure, built from the bottom up—creates better accountability in places such as Orkney where, currently, two councillors go once a month to the chief constable’s office in Inverness. That will be replaced with a situation in which every councillor in Orkney sits in the council offices once a month and hears from the local commander, who has come to see them. Similarly, in the Scottish Borders, Councillor Parker and his colleagues have also realised that, rather than having to send delegations to the headquarters of Lothian and Borders Police in Fettes Avenue, they will be able to ensure local accountability through meetings with the local commander.
Having considered the matter, we believe that the arrangement that we propose enhances local accountability. We take on board the fact that it will be a national service. That goes back to the points that were made, correctly, by Graeme Pearson. That is why, as well as building in local accountability at the base of the pyramid structure, we have to ensure that, at the top of the pyramid, there is accountability and scrutiny by the Parliament of Scotland.

Lewis Macdonald: In the structure that you have created, is there a role for local government on the national boards of the new services?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes. We have already said that, if the board has 11 members, four of them should be local authority representatives. I have discussed the matter with COSLA and we are genuinely open to discussions about the make-up of the board. That said, given that it will probably be the biggest and most important board in Scotland—and will, indeed, be bigger than the health boards with regard to budget and, in many cases, staff—it is important to ensure that those who serve on it have the skills and talent to assist the chief constable and the authority that will hold the chief constable to account and to deal with certain matters. We think that our approach will secure the best possible array of talent from local authorities and provide democratic accountability and representation on the board; equally, it will ensure that those who serve on the board have the ability to be on the board.

Lewis Macdonald: I have a final, short question, convener.

The Convener: Please make it very short. There is a big queue behind you.

Lewis Macdonald: Indeed.

Section 26(2) provides for the authority to make arrangements with “a third party” in relation to police staff. What is the purpose of that provision?

Liz Sadler (Scottish Government): That provision replicates the provision in the Police Act 1967, which allows the police authority to employ on a contract basis as well as directly.

Lewis Macdonald: Does it reflect any intention or expectation of taking a different approach to such matters?

Liz Sadler: Not at all.

Humza Yousaf (Glasgow) (SNP): Following on from Lewis Macdonald’s question about the make-up of the board, I want to ask about the size of the board itself. Although the majority of witnesses have said that the issue is one of quality rather than quantity, reservations have been expressed about the proposal that the board have seven to 11 members. Might there be any scope or leeway to increase that number?

Kenny MacAskill: I welcome all comments and advice on the issue. We plumped for a board of 11 on the basis of the Auditor General’s comments about the boards of the top FTSE companies. One would need the wisdom of Solomon to stipulate that the board should have nine, 10, 11, 12 or 13 members, and we are happy to take advice on the matter.

Nevertheless, we are certain that the issue should be quality, not quantity. Frankly, we also think that a huge board would be unworkable. For good reason, there is an optimum size of committee in the Scottish Parliament; after all, if you cannot squeeze everyone around the table, you have a problem. As I have said, we are happy to take on board members’ advice and comments on the issue. I repeat that it is all about quality, not quantity, but we need sufficient membership not only to reflect the fact that this is a national service but to take account of gender, ethnicity and Scotland’s geographical differences.

Humza Yousaf: How do you intend to reflect those factors in the board membership? Are you suggesting a quota of some sort?

Kenny MacAskill: Not at all. However, if whoever is in charge of selecting and clearing ministerial appointments does not balance the numbers, they will leave themselves open to appropriate criticism. It is a pivotal issue that must be examined.

Humza Yousaf: If it is recommended that the board be slightly increased, will you welcome an increase in the representation of locally elected people?

Kenny MacAskill: I am not persuaded that the majority of the board should be local authority members but logic would dictate that, if the board were to be increased beyond the proposed figure, the proposed local authority representation of four members would also be increased. I am happy to take on board the committee’s advice and thoughts, and I assure members that I am not being dogmatic or drawing a line in the sand. As I have said, we based the proposal of an 11-member board on the Auditor General’s comments; many successful companies have fewer board members, although some have more. Much of this comes down to having the flexibility to address issues.

Humza Yousaf: I have another question on the fire and rescue service, convener, but do you want me to ask that later?

The Convener: Alison McInnes has a question on the size of the board. After she asks it, I will let you back in.
Alison McInnes (North East Scotland) (LD): Given the size of the board, will the members be full time or part time? Have you considered a salary yet for those roles?

Kenny MacAskill: The board members will not be full time. Obviously, there will be a full-time chief executive, but we do not expect the chair or the board members to be full time. Their roles will involve more than simply a couple of hours every month or so. It will be one of the most prestigious boards on which to serve and it will be one of the most important in our country. However, we expect that the board members will be part time to allow those who have a variety of other roles to give their commitment to the board.

Alison McInnes: And the salary?

Kenny MacAskill: We have not given any consideration to that, but we will look at how it ties in.

Nick Bland (Scottish Government): We are looking at a salary that would fit within the banding for that size of public body. It is a band 1 body, to be technical about it, so we are looking at probably £300 per day for members and £450 per day for the chair.

The Convener: If you want to apply, Ms McInnes, you know how much the salary is now.

Humza Yousaf: It is not a bad rate at all.

The Convener: You are probably barred from the board, being a member of the committee—it is an either/or.

Humza Yousaf: I have a brief point on the fire and rescue service. There must clearly be a balance between being far too prescriptive and being far too vague about the service's functions. The Fire Brigades Union in particular believes that the new service has an opportunity to broaden its functions and be more inclusive in its work. Is there merit in what the FBU suggests? I thought that it made a good case at the committee.

Kenny MacAskill: We think that we have got the correct balance. Even in my lifetime, the fire and rescue service has gone from being about fire to being much more about rescue. A fire officer is more likely to cut you out of a vehicle than to pull you out of a burning house. The Government recognises that, whether we are talking about dealing with floods or other situations, the nature of the fire and rescue service has changed. That is why we have sought to ensure that we do not restrict its range of functions. There is a danger that if it goes too far in that regard, the service will become too specific. We think that we have the appropriate balance, but we are happy to discuss that. Lorna Gibbs might wish to comment further.

Lorna Gibbs (Scottish Government): The service’s functions were last reviewed by the Parliament in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. We have not been persuaded that anything has changed significantly enough in the intervening period to change what is in the legislation. That said, in addition to the legislation there is the fire and rescue framework, which we are consulting on at the moment. That document is much more flexible and easier to change, so our preference would be to have more detail on the Government’s priorities in the framework, which is a document that comes before Parliament. That would be less rigid than putting something in the bill.

Humza Yousaf: The FBU feels that the 2005 act does not quite cover enough. The FBU gave good examples about flooding on plains and other areas, and I thought that it made a very good case. However, you are reiterating that the detail perhaps should not be in the bill but in the framework.

Lorna Gibbs: We think that the detail is more for the framework.

Humza Yousaf: Okay.

Kenny MacAskill: We can give an absolute assurance that we recognise that the nature of the job is evolving because of the nature of what we do as a society. For example, 50 years ago there would have been no anticipation of the kind of chemical transportation that we do now. We think that it is important to have the flexibility to allow those who serve in the FRS to do what they think is required. We think that flexibility and related matters are covered by the bill. We do not want to box ourselves in with regard to what the FRS does by putting in a particular line in a particular statute. We believe that we have the right balance, but we are happy to reflect on that.

Jenny Marra (North East Scotland) (Lab): We have heard evidence that police officers are filling civilian staff roles at the moment. Given that police officers are paid significantly more than civilian staff, is that an efficient use of resources?

Kenny MacAskill: That is not my understanding, nor is it the understanding of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland. Police officers are employed in a variety of roles and are not all front-line officers. Indeed, I was late in arriving at the Parliament today because I was with community police officers at Castleview primary school’s citizenship day as they tied in with those who look after the park. The Scottish Government will not go in the direction that the Winsor review pursued in dividing the police family. Police officers have to do back-office jobs, just as they have to do jobs that are not always what you might view as front-line jobs but which are nonetheless important. We do not accept the suggestion that police officers are doing jobs that are routinely dealt with by civilian staff.

Jenny Marra: That is interesting, as we have heard in evidence that that is happening in many police forces throughout Scotland. The Government introduced 1,000 additional police officers while 2,000 backroom staff were being made redundant. Given the fact that we have heard evidence that police officers are doing civilian jobs, have you not just replaced civilian staff with higher-salaried staff called police officers? Is it not disingenuous, at best, to call those 1,000 extra officers police officers, and could that not be misleading to the public?

Kenny MacAskill: No. Our position is that the additional officers serve in a variety of ways. We have sought to put them into communities, and there are other officers who do the jobs in the back office. I am aware from my constituency involvement that there is an issue about redundancies among police custody support officers at the St Leonard’s police station in Edinburgh. When I challenged the chief constable about that I was told that, although that was the case, a police constable is more flexible than someone who does nothing when nobody is in the police cell, which is frequently the case between 10 o’clock and 5 o’clock. I was told that a police constable can be redeployed and that there is, therefore, a significant difference in salary. That is a matter for the chief constable, both now and in the future, and I will not interfere in it.

I do not recognise the scenario that you have painted. Indeed, the evidence that I hear from the police officers whom I meet is that officers carry out a variety of tasks, not all of which are front line, but they are all essential to keeping our communities safe. I welcome the contribution of support staff in carrying out a variety of tasks, but we do not see a scenario in which police officers take over civilian roles except in the scenario that I have described concerning the police custody support officers in Lothian and Borders Police.

Jenny Marra: In these tight financial times, I am sure that you more than anyone appreciate that an appropriate balance must be struck between civilian staff performing a task on a lower salary and the scenario that you just painted, in which Lothian and Borders Police are being a bit flexible and the chief constable is putting police constables into roles that were previously carried out by civilian staff. Are you going to give chief constables a clear indication of how they should balance civilian staff and police officers, given the financial constraints?

Kenny MacAskill: The decision that was taken by the chief constable of Lothian and Borders Police was perfectly sensible given the cost constraints on his force. It is much better that, when there is nobody to guard or watch at the St Leonard’s police station, a police officer goes out and does something to make our communities safer. I do not wish to be disparaging about police custody support officers, but they could not do that. They are employed as police custody support officers and, when there is nobody in custody, there is nothing for them to do. Although the decision that has been taken by the chief constable is regrettable for the constituents whom I met, it is perfectly understandable in the circumstances, as it maximises the use of a police officer.

Jenny Marra: I have one last question, convener.

The Convener: Before you ask it, Graeme Pearson has a supplementary question on the same issue.

Graeme Pearson: There is a real problem here, cabinet secretary. Last week, you acknowledged that about 1,000 support staff jobs had gone in the past 18 months. It would be challenging to imagine that all those 1,000 people could be missing from the service with nobody fulfilling their functions. Many of them must have been engaged in essential work and, if they are no longer there, police officers will necessarily have to do that work.

In the current environment, given the concentration on the fact that there are 17,234 officers in the service, it would be understandable if administrators used their budgets to maintain that number and made savings in some other part of the service. That does not mean that efficiency is being delivered. I am not suggesting that any of those 17,234 officers are not essential—the public want more police officers on the streets—but is any effort being made to see whether sufficient budget is available to chief constables to fully support staff posts? I am thinking of forensic accountants, analysts, people involved in warrants and so forth.

Kenny MacAskill: Those are fundamentally matters for the budget and, if people oppose the budget that the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth has allocated to the justice department and onwards to the police, that is a matter for them.

Given the significant financial cuts, the police have received well the fact that their budget has been preserved to an extent. You are right that there has been a reduction in support staff, but that is an operational matter for the chief constable. As I said to Ms Marra, I reflect on such matters when a constituent comes to me with concerns about them but, equally, I leave them to the chief constable.

We would certainly be concerned if significant essential roles were being lost but, so far, my understanding from discussions with the police is that they are coping with the situation, which is still resulting in a 35-year low in recorded crime. We think that that is related in no small measure to the fact that we have 1,000 additional officers. The Government remains committed to that.

The Convener: I will allow two more questions on support staff, not because I do not think that the issue is important, but because we are discussing the bill and I want to get back to it. I know it has consequences for staffing. We will take a question each from Humza Yousaf and Lewis Macdonald, and then we will move back to Jenny Marra on staffing.

Humza Yousaf: Kevin Smith from the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland said that, in all his experience, he had never seen police officers directly fill the function of support staff. Calum Steele also rebuffed that suggestion. The cabinet secretary says that staffing decisions should remain in the ambit of the chief constable’s power over operational matters. How can he assure us that that power will not be compromised by the bill’s references to ministerial direction?

Kenny MacAskill: The power of ministerial direction does not allow me to interfere with operational matters, because it refers to the Scottish police authority. It is for the chief constable, who will be accountable to the board, to decide how resources will be balanced between police constables and support staff.

I am aware of the concerns of the committee and others, but we have built into the bill clear requirements to ensure that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, whoever he or she is, cannot interfere with operational decisions by the chief constable, whoever he or she is.

Lewis Macdonald: We have discussed the current position. There are proposals, contingent on the bill, for substantial savings over 15 years. Once you have dealt with duplication at chief officer level, will any savings not inevitably fall on police officers and support staff? If there is a VAT liability, will that not increase further the number of police staff posts that will be lost and require constables to, as you say, spend time in the custody suite rather than out on the street?

Kenny MacAskill: No, it will not do that because the outline business case was predicated on there being no VAT exemption. We still negotiate hopefully with the Treasury on that and continue to argue that there is a manifest injustice, as the PSNI and security services are exempted.

To deal with the fundamental point, savings have to be made. That is why we are moving towards a single service. If we do not, we will face the scenario that is playing out south of the border, where Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary anticipates that 16,000 officers will be lost. That will also impact upon others. Indeed, through the Winsor review, there is also an attack upon the terms and conditions of those who serve.

The Scottish Government has made it clear that it believes that keeping up police numbers is not negotiable and provides a safer community. Equally, it is unacceptable that I should go to police officers, who do a difficult and sometimes dangerous job—often putting their lives on the line—and tell them that we will lower their starting salaries, vary their terms and conditions and seek to divide them between front-line and community police. We are not prepared to countenance that, so I accept that there must be savings. Many of them will come from stopping duplication, and not simply the duplication that is involved in having eight chief constables plus all the ancillary staff that go with them.

In everything that Deputy Chief Constable Richardson examined, there has been a clear obligation to improve matters. I remember his comments on the waste of resources. For example, we have motorcycle deployment in every area, but with more flexibility we could probably achieve the same with fewer resources.

Will there be a reduction in support staff? The answer is probably yes. No matter whether we have eight boards or one, however, it will still be necessary to type in data, so a catastrophic loss could not be accepted as credible. Data input and analysis will still be necessary, but there is duplication out there and there will have to be some reduction to reflect that. If the number of chief constables goes from eight to one, their back offices, which are not insignificant, will go from eight to one, so there will be a reduction there. However, in taking that approach, we will avoid the scenario that is being played out south of the border, which is a reduction in police numbers—we regard our numbers as non-negotiable—and an attack on the terms and conditions of officers who serve, which we view as reprehensible.

The Convener: Thank you. We will move on. Jenny Marra has a second question, then we will have questions from David McLetchie, Alison McInnes, Graeme Pearson and John Finnie.

Jenny Marra: I will follow up on the cabinet secretary’s comments on the situation that is being played out south of the border. The bill provides that staff may be "provided to the Authority under arrangements between the Authority and a third party."

Can you assure us that all staff will be directly employed by the new police service and that there will be no back-door privatisation of our police service, with an impact on terms and conditions for staff?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes. Those will be matters for the police authority as the employer, but there will be no back-door privatisation.

Jenny Marra: Okay, so the provision about “arrangements between the Authority and a third party” for staff employment is to come out of the bill, is it?

Kenny MacAskill: I will ask Liz Sadler to comment, but I recall that her evidence was that such a provision has been in place since 1967. I was alive then, unlike Ms Marra, and my memory is that there was a Labour Government at the time. Perhaps Liz Sadler can enlighten us.

Liz Sadler: There always needs to be some flexibility for particular short-term projects. For example, there could be a research project or other work that needs to be done on a short-term basis, so there is a requirement to enable the police authority to employ staff on such contracts. However, there is no intention that that is to be the norm for the employment of staff.

Kenny MacAskill: There are scenarios in which things cannot be dealt with in-house. We see that in relation to the technical wizardry that is now available. It is often necessary to put the information technology stuff out to IT people. It is one thing to train up a police officer, but it is quite another if one is starting from scratch. We have seen difficulties in the police with personal digital assistants and various other matters.

My experience is that, as is the case here in the Parliament, it is sometimes necessary to give tasks to the people who are the experts, and that might mean giving them to a third party—without privatising the jobs, as I said. In such cases, what we are doing is getting the experts to do the work.

Jenny Marra: You are saying that some of the IT services will be outsourced.

Kenny MacAskill: No, I am not saying that at all. I have given you a scenario and explained that, as some things are complicated, it is better to have the flexibility to hire in the best possible advice. We can do that in a whole array of areas—not just in IT, but in accounts, finance or procurement. There are areas in which we need to take advice from the best possible people to do the work.

I give you an absolute assurance that the privatisation scenario that seems to be being looked at south of the border is not being—and never will be—considered by this Administration.

Jenny Marra: Thank you, cabinet secretary.

The Convener: There are murmurings about IT, but I am sure that both Graeme Pearson and John Finnie were techie wizards when they were in the police service.

David McLetchie:—at last, this is your moment. I hope it has been worth the wait. Let us see.

David McLetchie (Lothian) (Con): I hope so, too. Good afternoon. Sorry—I mean good morning, everyone. It is not that late. I am losing track.

Humza Yousaf: That was not a good start.

David McLetchie: It was not.

Cabinet secretary, I want to ask you about the further submission that we received from COSLA following our discussion with Councillor Watters last week on the additional police officers who are employed by our forces as a result of the supplementary funding that a number of councils make available. In that evidence, Councillor Watters estimated that some 600 to 800 police officers are employed by our eight forces as a result of the additional subventions.

He went on to say that one should not necessarily assume that that funding would be in place in the coming financial year, 2012-13, because some councils might fear that they would be expected to continue to fund what is a discretionary payment by them on an on-going basis, so that all the officers who are transferred to the national force continue to be paid. Can you explain how the Government intends to ensure that funding will remain in place for the officers who are currently employed as a result of the additional funding contributions?

Kenny MacAskill: As Councillor Watters said, there is no suggestion that the funding is about to be pulled. As you say, the funding is put in by local authorities because they see a particular need. They have discussed the issue with the police and that is how we see the arrangements continuing. It would be for the local authority to discuss the issue with the police and for councillors to account to their own electorate if the officers were removed.

The Government is clear that we provide funding to the police for 17,234 officers. If local authorities wish to remove from particular areas additional officers who they currently pay for, that is a matter for which they are accountable to their own electorate. It is not for us to backfill; it is for us to provide the chief constable with the requisite number.
David McLetchie: Indeed, but there was a suggestion that the additional officers might be pulled. That is apparent in COSLA’s additional submission, which states that Councillor Watters “questioned whether councils would continue to fund these posts in 2012/13, given that the additional funding being provided would likely transfer with the posts out of Local Government and into the new single service budget to subsidise the commitment to 1000 extra police officers in the new single service.”

Councillor Watters’s suggestion is that that funding might be pulled in the run-up to the creation of the new service, which would clearly create a difficulty with the continued employment of officers, who would transfer to the new service under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations arrangements.

Kenny MacAskill: It would make no difference to the employment of the officers but it would make a difference to their deployment, because it would clearly be for the local commander and the chief constable to decide where the officers are deployed. The specific reason that they are currently deployed where they are is that the local authority has thought it essential to have them there. The chief constable has clearly thought that they are not necessarily essential, but they are willing to have them put there.

We believe that we will maintain police numbers. If the local authority wishes to retain the visible deployment in a particular area and the situation is perhaps not seen in the same way as it was before those police were deployed there, they will have to enter into discussions on the matter with the police, because we are not in charge of operational directions. I do not see why local authorities would seek to withdraw officers from areas where they thought there was a clear need to put them in.

David McLetchie: Indeed, but does that mean that the present establishment number will be maintained, irrespective of whether the councils that currently give the additional funding continue to do so? Is that what you are saying?

Kenny MacAskill: We have made it clear that we will maintain the figure of 17,234. We believe that that is essential. It is clearly for the chief constable to deploy officers and it will be for the chief constable and local commander to negotiate with local authorities.

David McLetchie: That sounds to me to be a positive incentive for the councils not to continue the funding into next year, because the officers will be employed come what may.

It has been suggested that, if councils are to continue to provide additional funding to the new national force, which I would like to think that they will—and I am sure that you would, too—it will be difficult to demonstrate the additionality of the deployment that you have described. Without some kind of local budget base, when a council puts additional money into a particular area—usually to do with some kind of community safety scheme—how will it know that its contribution is additional and is not just filling a gap that has resulted from a deployment elsewhere?

Kenny MacAskill: Nick Bland might want to comment.

Nick Bland: We would expect the arrangements that are currently in place to continue in the new single service.

Currently, where local councils choose to pay for additional police officers from their own funding, there is some form of service-level agreement with the force regarding the deployment and use of the officers. They are identified as being funded by the local authority, and are deployed in a specific way in agreement with that authority. There is no suggestion that that arrangement would not continue in a single service.

David McLetchie: Yes, but how do you know that that money is additional to the funding for the force in a particular area? At present you know, because the budget is based on the police board of which the council is part. Unless there is a budget with some kind of localised base, how do you know that the extra money is extra, and that it is not just filling a gap that has arisen as a result of deployment elsewhere? How can you be confident that that is the case?

Nick Bland: One of the benefits of a single service is that, in any local area, the local commander can draw on that wider service and bring in specialist expertise when and where it is needed. A local authority area not only has a dedicated set of officers, but can draw on wider resources, specialist expertise, assets and equipment when such things are required.

Kenny MacAskill: In my discussions with COSLA, it was at pains—understandably—to ensure that local authorities would know what the baseline was on 1 April 2013. We will have that in place, so that we know where each authority is and what is specifically funded.

The real reason that I do not see the emergence of a doomsday scenario—to which Pat Watters alluded only as a possibility—is that the local authorities have agreed on the basis that a single service will add to community safety. In Broomhouse, for example, as in other areas of Edinburgh, I would have thought that if the council sought to withdraw, the only alternative would be to put in community wardens, and there would be an argument over the cost of deployment.
We expect the local authorities to work through those matters with the local commander, as we work through the pathfinders, to see where they can get additional benefits that will apply to their communities. We will provide them with the core resource for April 2013. As Nick Bland pointed out, they will get the additional benefits of being part of a single national service, in which resources for particular events that we hope do not occur will be available.

David McLetchie: Let us hope that the councils see it that way.

Alison McInnes: Cabinet secretary, you said that you believed that the bill would improve links with local authorities and communities. Many of us—not least COSLA—disagree with that.

Some—in fact, quite a lot—of the evidence that we have taken in the past month or so has related to the national-local relationship and how we define it. The bill potentially sets up a conflict between the local policing plan and the strategic plan, but it is silent on how to resolve that conflict. Many people have said that the lines of responsibility and accountability are not clear enough in the bill. Have you had time to reflect on that, and do you intend to introduce some clarity at stage 2?

Kenny MacAskill: I think that matters are clear. We are trying to build a pyramid structure with a firm base. We will reflect on what comes out of the pathfinders; there are 16 of those already, and more local authorities wish to come on board.

We will have the benefits of a local plan and the chief constable will ultimately be in charge of directing it. As with a variety of other things in Scottish life at present, such issues will be worked out through discussion.

Alison McInnes: That goes to the heart of the matter. You say that the chief constable will determine how resources will be deployed, so we might have more dialogue at local level, but there will be less accountability and less ability to direct those resources. COSLA has called from the most senior level for a right of response and for the bill to be amended to include a definition of the relationship between the chief constable and local authorities. Will you consider that?

Kenny MacAskill: I am happy to consider that. I do not necessarily think that the inclusion of such a definition is necessary, but I will not prejudge the issue. We will see what emerges from the pathfinders. Areas such as Orkney and the Scottish Borders are working closely with their local commanders and they see the benefits in that. We are seeking not only vertical but horizontal benefits. Part of the issue is how we will engage with the other services that are necessary to keep our communities safe. We are using the pathfinders to see how things work out. It is not only about the vertical police-silo level, but about how we mix the police in with other agencies to ensure that we get the best possible system.

Alison McInnes: That is why chief constables are best placed to be part of the local authority family. It is about horizontal integration.

That takes us on to community planning partnerships, which are key. We have heard evidence that, given the scale of the reorganisation, there will inevitably be a period of inward reflection when the police service is sorting itself out and it will not be so easy for it to be involved in the community planning partnerships. According to evidence that we have received, Northern Ireland looks fondly on our community planning partnerships and says that it is way behind us. It would be useful if you could define in the legislation the role of the community planning partnerships. As I understand it, the local commander has responsibility for responding to community planning partnerships at the moment. There would be real benefit in giving the chief constable that responsibility.

Kenny MacAskill: At the end of the day, we want to see what works. That is why we are doing the pathfinders. Not everything is dealt with at local authority level. That is why health boards are structured in a variety of ways; in my experience, we in Parliament have changed the number of health boards in Scotland. We must ensure that we get the best possible system of integration.

We recognise the benefits of community planning partnerships, and we think that the proposals add something. Instead of joint police boards sitting separately—apart from in the two parts of Scotland where there are unitary boards—we are putting them into the local government family, which they will enhance. We need to ensure that not just the services that rest within local authorities but services such as health co-operate in that. We are proceeding on the pathfinders to see what works. There might need to be some flexibility between various communities, which is why we are setting it in the legislation that it will be dealt with at local authority level and we have said that we will not interfere with local authorities if they wish to consider sharing.

Alison McInnes: You have said that there is quite a lot that we still need to sort out, yet you are determined to have all of this in place by 1 April next year. Is it time to draw breath?

Kenny MacAskill: No. We see the pathfinders as a way of ensuring that we have a seamless transition at 1 April 2013. We have always said that various matters will be for the chief constable and police authority to work out. It is accepted that... it will ultimately be good to have a single payroll and to reduce replication of functions times eight and, in some instances, times nine. It will be for the chief constable and the SPA to work out where those functions should be located, and whether they should follow a unitary or a regional model. We have to ensure that the currently outstanding provision by the police service and fire and rescue service continues to be outstanding as the clock strikes midnight and we head into 1 April 2013. Thereafter, it will be for the chief constable, working with others, to work out what happens.

Roderick Campbell: You talked about the pathfinder projects. Is there a case for the bill being more prescriptive in relation to local arrangements for scrutiny and engagement?

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to consider that. We think that we may have a basis for doing that: it will to some extent depend on the outcome of the pathfinders. We will feed back into that. We have to recognise that things change and flow. Although we are ensuring that the set-up is built around the possibility of 32 local authorities acting individually, I have made it clear to local authorities that if they think that it is better to share with a neighbouring authority, I will not say that they cannot. If they think that that will add to democratic scrutiny and accountability and ensure that we get a better service, I am comfortable with that. We need a legislative base that not only provides for the separation of powers and the building blocks of the pyramid structure, but gives an element of flexibility. If, for example, Stirling and Clackmannan wish to share a police and fire committee, they can do so.

Nick Bland: Part of the purpose of the pathfinders, which will run through the coming year, is to inform the development of national guidance on operation of the scrutiny and accountability arrangements. Instead of putting any prescriptions in the bill, we will take what we learn from the pathfinder process and put it into guidance outwith primary legislation.

The Convener: Can I clarify the timetable in that respect? Will the outcome of the pathfinders not be known until the bill has concluded its passage?

Nick Bland: The pathfinders are separate to the bill.

The Convener: I know that, but there have been a lot of comments about knowing this or that when the outcome of the pathfinders is known. Will you know that outcome after the bill has been passed?

Nick Bland: Yes. Local authorities that have come forward to be pathfinders and are working with the services in their local areas will over the coming year develop their arrangements. We will take what we learn from those arrangements to inform the development of national guidance, which will be in place for 1 April 2013.

The Convener: You are talking about guidance, and not primary legislation.

Nick Bland: Yes.

Kenny MacAskill: As I have said, the legislation is meant not only to set out the necessary basics but to give flexibility to allow for other matters.

Lewis Macdonald: In your response to Alison McInnes, you acknowledged that the operational delivery of services might happen on a unitary or regional basis. If the structure is a regional one, how do you envisage democratic accountability working with regard to regional decisions on roads policing and other such matters?

Kenny MacAskill: That is for the police authority to work out; after all, it will hold the chief constable to account. Equally, I have no doubt that the local commander will be made aware by the police authority of any dissatisfaction at local level. However, it is up to the chief constable and those who work for him to deal with such operational issues. It might be best to deal with certain matters more flexibly.

Graeme Pearson: We need to put some flesh on how this is going to work, because it is a major concern for many of us around the table. Will the local commander be able to lay out to and share with the local committee a picture of the financial resources, the personnel and the other forms of support that will be at his or her disposal? Is that part of your plan?

Kenny MacAskill: Many local commanders are already allocated budgets. No matter whether we are talking about the police or anyone else, no organisation can work on an entirely centralised budget, and that will be the case when we move to a single service. The size of the budget will be a matter for the local commander to work out in conjunction with the chief constable, but I expect the local commander to discuss it and to interact with others on it. I presume that they will also seek added value from other agencies, which brings us back to the role of the CPP.

Graeme Pearson: What if, after that pen-picture of locally available services is shared with the board, there is disagreement in that forum? You have indicated that a divisional commander could raise with the chief constable any unhappiness at local level, but how will the political and democratic elements work themselves out in the national board? Will there be a channel for making representations or for debating and resolving issues?

Kenny MacAskill: Any such issues will have to be dealt with by those who are involved at the time. It will depend on the nature of the problem. The authority can make representations to the commander, who can, in turn, make representations to the chief constable. Equally, it will be possible for the local authority board to make representations to the police authority. It is not up to me to work out how the police authority deals with such matters; we need to leave them to the police authority and the local authority police committee. They will have the opportunity to do so. I have no doubt that they will, that the situation will evolve and that things will work out.

Graeme Pearson: It is important that there be a channel to resolve issues. David McLetchie mentioned the possibility that a local authority might invest resources but be unhappy about whether it was getting value for money and about whether the resources were being used elsewhere. Will there be a democratic way to resolve such matters between the local committee and the national board?

Kenny MacAskill: I have no doubt that the local authority would go to the national board.

Graeme Pearson: Let us move on to national oversight—the governance that we spoke about earlier. Would you also welcome the fact that any parliamentary involvement would be proactive, in that rather than responding to reports, there would be a regular meeting of a group within the Parliament to review national strategy and how business was being done on the national board?

Kenny MacAskill: That would be best left for Parliament to work out.

Graeme Pearson: I am asking for your opinion.

Kenny MacAskill: My opinion is that we should get the balance right between avoiding having an authority like that in metropolitan London, which sits regularly and looks over the shoulder of the police authority and the chief constable, and ensuring that we have an authority that deals with matters that are correctly the remit of Parliament when there is significant concern, and which is equally able to ensure that it is satisfied with how things are going.

I welcome parliamentary involvement, although I caveat that with the thought that the Justice Committee is best placed to deal with such subjects because of its breadth of knowledge. By its nature, that would mean something more than the chief constable’s appearing before you once a year and reporting to you when matters of concern arise. I have no doubt that the committee would seek to investigate and to drill down and be available if there were issues of concern, such as a dispute between a local authority area and the national board.

Graeme Pearson: You would accept that the philosophy—certainly in Scotland—is that we have policing by consent and that that consent can be offered only knowingly. Although it is a great gift to have people such as you in the justice department, one looks to the future when others might not be so well-meaning. There needs to be some form of governance in such circumstances.

The Convener: I am missing this flirtation. I had drifted away; I see you smiling at each other.

Graeme Pearson: There is time to come to it.

Cabinet secretary, you must welcome the fact that the Parliament would proactively engage in such matters.

Kenny MacAskill: We do not want to specify what the Parliament must do. There is obviously this committee as well as the remit of the office of the Presiding Officer. As a Government, we think that the Parliament has a clear role. The authority will have a role in holding people to account and in ensuring that matters are dealt with as best they can be. There is a clear role in examining some of the more political aspects, if we can put it that way, of ensuring that we get policing by consent. That is why when issues such as Taser use have been brought to me, I have said that they are operational matters that are best dealt with by the authority or, ultimately, considered by the Parliament.

The Convener: I am just dwelling on the word “gift”. That does not mean that your amendments will go through on the nod, Graeme, although we will see.

Graeme Pearson: I know that.

Colin Keir (Edinburgh Western) (SNP): Good morning, cabinet secretary. What are your views on the effectiveness of any new local board that might spring up in the coming months in comparison with the current boards? How effective will the new boards be? A number of comments have been made about the accountability of the chief constable, who provides reports to the board, which then holds him to account, and the relative security clearance of certain members. How do you perceive the local aspect of the police boards being continued and how effective could they be?

Kenny MacAskill: First, as I said earlier, it will be enhanced. There is a dynamic change. Even in the unitary authorities, people will be going to the council as opposed to the office of the chief constable. It is a little like the fact that I have come here to give evidence today—if you were coming up to my office in St Andrew’s house, that would be vastly different. That would change the dynamic and it is important to consider that.

Secondly, as I said, in places such as Orkney, rather than two councillors, every councillor will be involved. Even in the Borders, rather than two or three councillors going up to Fettes Avenue—I cannot remember how many—if not a full council, then certainly a full council committee will be in charge of scrutiny.

We are conscious that there will be change, and we are looking to work with the current police board conveners, their clerks and COSLA to ensure that, after the local authority elections—when, doubtless, many current police and fire board conveners will be returned, but others might not be—we provide resources and support so that, in going towards the unitary authority, people who have already been quite immersed in police matters will move in when the local authority board is set up, as opposed to a person waking up on 1 April and discovering that they are the police convener in Orkney. It is a matter of working with the local authorities and the current police boards to ensure a seamless transition. I think that that will happen and that accountability will be enhanced.

John Finnie (Highlands and Islands) (SNP): Good morning, cabinet secretary. I want to ask about two apparent gaps in the bill, and part of the bill on which people have mixed views. The gaps relate to what might be referred to as mutual aid. We heard about the cross-border arrangements for the fire and rescue service from the Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland. It seems that a pragmatic approach is taken that is not necessarily supported by a legislative framework. That was perceived as one gap. The other gap is the bill’s silence on mutual aid arrangements with the British Transport Police. To balance that, there are differing views on the police investigations and review commissioner. You may be familiar with the line of questioning on who would have primacy. It seems that a pragmatic approach is taken that is not necessarily supported by a legislative framework. That was perceived as one gap. The other gap is the bill’s silence on mutual aid arrangements with the British Transport Police. To balance that, there are differing views on the police investigations and review commissioner. You may be familiar with the line of questioning on who would have primacy. It is important that there is public confidence in the arrangement.

Will you comment on those three issues, please?

The Convener: The police investigations and review commissioner is a separate issue from the other two.

John Finnie: There are two deficiencies, and there seem to be widely ranging views on the police investigations and review commissioner.

The Convener: That is fine. I am just separating the questions.

Kenny MacAskill: You are right. There are issues to do with cross-border mutual aid and how we would interact with the British Transport Police, the Civil Nuclear Constabulary and Ministry of Defence police. Obviously, we want to ensure that that assistance continues. Officers require to be assisted, and we welcome the assistance that we receive from the BTP. In my experience, even Northern Constabulary quite often used to welcome assistance by the Civil Nuclear Constabulary.

We are working with UK departments on that, and amendments will have to be tabled down south. Suffice to say, we know what has to be done, and all parties want to ensure that officers, irrespective of their cap badge, continue to provide mutual support. We expect to be able to work that out, although I cannot give members precise details on that at the moment. The issue will have to be dealt with south of the border and, I presume, by a legislative consent motion here.

John Finnie: I also asked about the cross-border fire arrangements and the police investigations and review commissioner.

Lorna Gibbs: I will pick up the fire point. The approach is similar to that which is being taken with the police. We are discussing matters with colleagues down south to clarify the position and put beyond any doubt the fact that the new service will be able to have mutual arrangements with colleagues south of the border. Again, that will need to be done through the Scotland Act 1998. We are pursuing that matter positively with officials in the UK Government.

John Finnie: Will that pick up on any concerns about pension arrangements that the FBU perhaps has?

Lorna Gibbs: I need to double-check the point about pension arrangements. We can do that and get back to you.

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to do that.

We are aware of comments that have been made about the police investigations and review commissioner. Obviously, it is about getting the balance right and ensuring that we maintain public confidence and meet our human rights obligations. We are willing to look at how we can best deal with matters; some will best be dealt with through regulations—section 67 of the bill specifies that—and we are happy to look at any further change to the bill if it is necessary to ensure that, while we maintain public confidence, we do not perhaps provide for a role that would be prospective rather than reactive.

The Convener: I thank the cabinet secretary for taking questions. I suspend the meeting to allow the witnesses to leave.
Introduction

1. Amnesty International is a global movement of more than 3 million supporters, members and activists in more than 150 countries and territories who campaign to end grave abuses of human rights. Our vision is for every person to enjoy all the rights enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international human rights standards.

2. Amnesty International welcomes the opportunity to submit written evidence for the Justice Committee's consideration of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill 2012. Our response will focus on proposals for a single Scottish police force.

3. The Scottish Government's proposals to create a single Scottish police force raise a number of issues relating to human rights which we have raised in earlier consultations. Reform is an opportunity to improve transparency and accountability in policing and ensure that the Scottish police force adheres to the highest international human rights standards.

Policing and Human Rights

4. Scottish policing has a long and proud history of policing by consent and taking a community-centred approach. Any change in the organisation and structures of a new Scottish police force should retain this approach, imbedded within a human rights framework.

5. The nature and extent of police powers make them the front line of defence in protecting our human rights on a daily basis, whether protecting the right to life and freedom from harm, defending the right to property, or prohibiting discrimination.

6. In upholding the Scottish Government's duty to protect the human rights of people in Scotland, police have legitimate powers to take action which might limit the rights of others, most notably in depriving people of their liberty and in the state-sanctioned use of force. However, any actions which affect the rights of individuals must be in accordance with the law, strictly necessary and a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that “Everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.”

7. Scottish police forces are also bound by the Human Rights Act to respect the European Convention on Human Rights including, the prohibition on torture, inhuman and degrading treatment, the right to liberty and security, the right to a fair trial and the right to family and private life.
8. This unique position must come with a commensurate level of scrutiny and accountability with clearly defined international standards being adhered to.

9. The UN Standards of Policing Code of Conduct (1979)\(^1\) states that ‘every law enforcement agency should be representative of, and responsive and accountable to, the community as a whole’, establishing a clear and fundamental standard of the nature of human-rights based policing, and the relationship police should have with the communities they serve and the political system within which they function.

10. The Independent Review of Scottish Policing (2009)\(^2\) identified gaps in the current accountability mechanisms of Scottish policing at local, regional, and national levels and the new Scottish police force in the future must ensure that these concerns are fully addressed and that clear constructs are in place to allow transparent scrutiny of police policy and robust engagement with communities and stakeholders to ensure accountability in decision making processes.

Policing, Accountability and Human Rights

11. Amnesty International welcomes the Scottish Government’s proposals in the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill to provide more clarity, transparency and accountability. We welcome proposals for clearly defined roles for Scottish Ministers, a Scottish Police Authority, the Chief Constable of the Scottish police service, local councils and designated Local Commanders for each Local Authority area. We welcome the proposal to ‘provide the Scottish Parliament with more opportunities to consider and scrutinise the Scottish Police Authority and service.’ We also welcome the proposal to ensure independent custody visiting in Scotland is fully OPCAT compliant.

12. However, this reform of policing provides an opportunity to create the most robust structures for transparency and accountability of any police force in the world, learning from international examples.

13. As a result of recommendations made by the Patten Commission on Policing in Northern Ireland in 1999, the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) now has some of the most robust human rights based policies and structures of any police force in the world.\(^3\) Emphasising that human rights are central to the fundamental purpose of policing, the report, A New Beginning for Policing in Northern Ireland, recommended measures including the appointment of an independent human rights advisor to the force, training for all new and existing officers in human rights, and the introduction of mechanisms to promote transparency and democratic accountability within the local community.\(^4\)

14. In our response to the Scottish Government’s consultation on a single police force, Amnesty International urged the Scottish Government to adopt a similar approach. We are disappointed that our recommendations on this and on other areas to bolster human rights in the single police force proposals at consultation stage did not make it on to the Bill. We hope that the Justice Committee will consider the importance of human rights in 21st century policing in Scotland in the Bill. We believe that the following issues should be included in the new police structure in Scotland to ensure accountability for human rights performance.

- A Modern Purpose for Policing
  Given the importance of a Scottish police force to upholding human rights, the new purpose should include a reference to protecting fundamental human rights which can be introduced in section 32 of the Bill.

- The Oath
  Amnesty International also believes the duty of police constables to protect human rights should be reflected in the new oath. For example, the Northern Irish oath is:
  “I hereby do solemnly and sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of constable, and that in so doing I will act with fairness, integrity, diligence and impartiality, uphold fundamental human rights and accord equal respect to all individuals and to their traditions and beliefs.”

- Code of Ethics
  The Scottish Police Service Code of Ethical Practice already lists integrity, transparency, accountability, responsibility and impartiality as principles which all members of the Scottish Police Service observe and support. Although it is clear that these principles go some way to support human rights objectives, human rights should be explicit within this Code of Ethical Practice, to ensure their centrality to the Scottish Police Service.

  A positive example of this is the Police Service of Northern Ireland Code of Ethics (2008), which states that “public confidence in the Police Service is closely related to the attitude and behaviour of officers towards members of the public, in particular their respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of individuals as enshrined in the European Convention of Human Rights”.

- Training
  Training for both new recruits and experienced personnel should contain clear reference to human rights standards.

- Personnel Appraisals
  Awareness of human rights should be set down as an important element in appraisals of personnel.

• Independent Advisor
  An independent Human Rights Advisor should be appointed to monitor compliance with the Human Rights Act (1998) and publish these findings on an annual basis. The Northern Ireland Policing Board examines the following factors in their report on compliance with the Human Rights Act and could be taken as a positive model for a Scottish compliance report.

1. “Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) Programme of Action
2. Adequacy and effectiveness of PSNI human rights training
3. Compliance of PSNI policies with the Human Rights Act 1998
5. Adherence by PSNI officers to the Code of Ethics
6. Complaints, discipline and civil actions raising human rights issues
7. Public order
8. The Use of Force
9. Covert Policing
10. Victims’ Rights
11. The treatment of suspects
12. Human rights awareness among PSNI officers”

• Human Rights Committee
  A permanent Human Rights and Professional Standards Committee should be established, with responsibility for reviewing complaints and disciplinary matters and monitoring the use of force on an on-going basis.

Justice Committee

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland

1. Introduction

1.1 ACPOS is firmly committed to delivering the Scottish Government’s three objectives of reform:

- Sustaining and improving local policing in a time of financial constraint
- Improving the availability of specialist operational support throughout Scotland
- Improved arrangements for local engagement

1.2 Whilst recognising the present record levels of performance and significant contribution the current structures of policing have made to the safety and well being of the people of Scotland over the last 37 years, we are also committed to delivering an effective and comprehensive reform programme which maintains such levels of performance, within a constrained public sector budget.

1.3 There are, however, a number of challenges and constraints in meeting reform objectives whilst continuing to deliver record levels of performance within the financial settlement. Parliament and the Committees will want to be fully sighted on that wider context and the detail of the challenges, which we outline below and in the attached appendices.

1.4 In this context, this summary and the attached appendices articulate, to the Justice Committee, our specific concerns around the significant issues on governance and accountability, operational independence, local policing and resourcing (already presented to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee) and the financial challenges and Outline Business Case (already presented to the Finance Committee). In terms of issues not previously raised, this summary report outlines our concerns on complaints and the Police Investigations & Review Commissioner, and our opinion and considerations on the proposals for future forensic services.

2. Threat to the Operational Independence of the Chief Constable

2.1 We believe certain provisions within the Bill threaten the operational independence of the Chief Constable and, thereby, policing.

2.2 The ACPOS response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament provides further detail on this issue and is attached at Appendix A.
3. Strengthening Local Planning and the Role of the Local Authority

3.1 We recognise the need to strengthen the role of local authorities in the local planning arrangements. Presently, the Bill lacks clarity on how local arrangements and formalised reporting mechanisms should link in with the statutory requirements of accountability and scrutiny under the new Scottish Police Authority.

3.2 The ACPOS response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament provides further detail on this issue and is attached at Appendix A.

4. Resource Allocation & Local Resourcing of Police Services

4.1 Work is underway to develop a robust resource allocation model for the new service and ACPOS understands the importance of local policing resources to local communities. This will be a highly contentious issue and our response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament provides further detail on this issue and is attached at Appendix A.

5. Outline Business Case – The Challenge of Delivering Savings

5.1 The Scottish Government has used the financial case detailed in their Outline Business Case (OBC) to set the future police budget. We have a number of concerns relating to the Outline Business Case, which present challenges if we are to meet the financial savings within the timescales set.

5.2 Our response to the Finance Committee of the Scottish Parliament provides further detail on these issues and is attached at Appendix B.

6. Forensic Services

6.1 ACPOS has concerns that separation of all aspects of forensic services from the future police service is flawed and will not serve the best interests of either the public or the new single service.

6.2 We do acknowledge the Scottish Government's preference for a forensic service model where all functions sit independently from the chief constable, and whilst our view differs somewhat, this will in no way undermine our commitment to support its implementation alongside the creation of the new single police service.

6.3 We acknowledge that colleagues from the Forensic Services of SPSA advocate the "independent" model, effectively a continuation of the structure that has been in place since 2007. We respect that view and hope that a mature debate on the merits of both options provides the basis for informed decision making on a critical aspect of reform.

6.4 The specific issues we would like to raise are as follows: -
1. Investigation of crime & scene examination

- It is our opinion that the proposed arrangements for forensic services – and specifically the separation of the crime scene examination function from the chief constable – require to be re-examined. We believe the proposals, as they stand, are counter intuitive to the primary objectives of police reform to streamline and modernise services to secure best value and deliver an efficient and effective service.

- Reference to forensic services requires a clear distinction between 'forensic analysis' and 'scene examination' (or laboratory vs. crime scene). We are not advocating that forensic analysis falls under the police service; that should be the preserve of scientists and respective experts (i.e. fingerprint examiners). Our argument is based on the premise that examination of a scene is intrinsically linked to the investigative process, responsibility for which falls under the direction of the police in accordance with the senior investigator's (SIO) policy and decision making. Investigative work, in this context, is the preserve of the police.

- The considerations of the investigating officer require to be taken holistically, and any aspect of this process where the SIO's policy and decision-making, direction or requirements are not followed can undermine their role and the case. The separation and independence of scene examiners introduces such risk to this process. This is a point not missed on the Scottish Government who is keen to ensure the interaction between scene examiner and police officer are fully explored during the transition work.

- There are other examples within UK policing where scene of crime examination falls under the control of the police through specialist crime directorates, and separate from the 'laboratory process'.

- The collection of physical evidence is not the sole preserve of specialist crime scene examiners; police officers regularly collect 'scientific samples', an example being the use of early evidence kits in the investigation of serious sexual offences. The public can also act as the first link in the evidential chain, presenting into the investigative process physical evidence that results in laboratory analysis.

- Our argument is based on our acknowledgment of the broad range of skills, knowledge and experience of scene examiners, which they apply in support of the police response to any number of diverse incidents beyond that considered routine (i.e. fatalities, road accidents, CBRN and terrorist incidents). On such basis we are keen to ensure that any critical need for fast-time response to incidents proceeds without any need for negotiation with an independent body.
2. Governance, accountability

- On its inception in 2007, SPSA assumed responsibility for the provision of forensic services previously under the control of chief constables. This arrangement is referred to as 'crime scene to court' approach, and within the UK context is unique to Scotland. There was a conscious decision at that time to bring crime scene work and analysis together to ensure that there was consistency in practice and standards across the forensic regime. However, this was at the expense of separating out the scene examination from the primary investigative process, where in our opinion, it is better aligned.

- This separation of 'scene examination' from 'police investigation' creates the issue of having two governance structures within the same business area, and therefore operating under two separate budgets where the practical requirements of one 'agency' could be in conflict with the financial sensitivities of the other (and vice-versa). We would be keen to avoid any such conflict of interest.

- Under current arrangements the Director of Forensic Services reports to the Chief Executive of the SPSA, and is accountable to the SPSA Board. Current membership of the Board includes representation from two chief constables\(^1\), and whilst these appointments preserve a link with the police service in terms of current governance, there remains a critical separation between forensic services and policing at operational level where its impact on service delivery is at its most vulnerable.

3. Public Confidence / Independent Scrutiny

- There is a body of opinion, within the Scottish Government, that in order to maintain public confidence in forensic science, police investigations, and the criminal justice system, it is recognised as good practice to maintain a 'sterile corridor' between scientific investigation and police investigation. We believe the case for separating out all aspects of forensic services from the police governance structure is weak, and have yet to see evidence to suggest otherwise.

- The Scottish Government has quoted the 2009 report into Forensic Science by the United States National Academy of Sciences (NAS) who recommended ‘the creation of an independent science-based federal agency with strong ties to state and local forensic entities, but not in any way committed to an existing system or part of a law enforcement agency’.

- The US has approximately 18,500 separate police forces (and numerous other law enforcement agencies), some of which have an establishment of just a handful of officers and many of whom carry out their own forensic evidence gathering - the circumstances and forensic integrity of which can often be less-than-ideal. To compare the needs of such a disparate national structure that clearly requires some measure of cohesion, with one that will consist of a single entity embracing equity of service provision and quality, is perhaps not the most appropriate, nor relevant, comparison.

- The need for reliability and impartiality of evidence is a basic tenet of all police investigations. If, as implied, having forensic services under the chief constable places these principles at risk then there is a vulnerability that exists in almost every aspect of police work; by applying the same rationale, all evidence-gathering and processing facets of police investigations should be subject to independent governance. In reality we don’t understand how this would be practical, and raises the question, ‘where is the line drawn?’

- The police have a statutory duty to investigate offences and bring offenders to justice. Responsibility rests with the police to ensure that actions taken during the course of any investigation satisfy the demands of prosecutors, and can ultimately stand scrutiny of a court of law. This includes the work undertaken by scene examiners operating as part of the investigative team in support of any given police operation. It is our opinion that the argument that their contribution needs to be perceived to be independent from policing activity is not true.

- In relation to independent scrutiny, England & Wales follow the Codes of Practice produced by the Forensic Services Regulator (FSR), The PSNI voluntarily embrace the FSR’s Codes of Practice, despite there being no obligation to do so. Adopting such a course of regulation – either voluntarily or on a statutory footing may be something worth exploring for Scotland if this is considered such an issue.

- The integrity of forensic process can be enhanced through a standardisation of forensic gateway processes across Scotland, to serve as a key administrative function to support processes and the clear evidential trail from the initial evidence capture, lab examination, results, and retention of evidence.

7. Complaints and Investigations

7.1 ACPOS support the concept of an independent investigative body. The legislation, as proposed within the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, will create this independent body through the transformation of the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland (PCCS) to the Police Investigation and Review Commissioner (PIRC).

7.2 It is crucial public confidence in the police remains high but also that they have confidence in how we investigate complaints and the recourse available when they have concerns about investigations. The establishment of the PIRC has our unqualified support in this regard, and it is essential it has an effective capability on Day 1 to provide appropriate services.

7.3 The Bill provides a high level narrative on how the PIRC will be established and what its investigatory powers will be, but there remains a degree of ambiguity in the policy and provisions of the Bill. It is this detail that will set the parameters of jurisdiction for the PIRC, and crucially set the tone of the relationship between the Commissioner, COPFS and the police service.

7.4 By way of example, clarity is required in relation to the term “public interest”, as this could be drawn too widely and create confusion and tension. Equally, it is unclear where specialist knowledge and skills will be sourced from, if this will be required from police resources and, if so, who will be responsible for cost. A further issue relates to oversight of the PIRC; who will have responsibility for investigating complaints against its investigations/staff and where will governance and accountability for same rest?

7.5 To assist Committee members, a number of these issues are reproduced at Appendix C, however, this is not a comprehensive list, as the detail required will not all be resolved within the Bill.

7.6 On the face of it, the legislation appears to provide a comprehensive and flexible framework for the exercise of power by the PIRC; however, discussion is required as to whether these powers are clearly understood by all interested parties or whether additional detailed definitions are required.

7.7 It is clear that there will be an early requirement for drafting and acceptance of detailed protocols and multi layered MOU’s between COPFS, the PIRC and the Police Service of Scotland in order to provide a clear understanding of the roles and responsibilities of all three organisations.

7.8 Notwithstanding, ACPOS is concerned that such information sharing and exchange arrangements may not be sufficiently mature or defined on Day 1, which could lead to a significant adverse impact on public and staff confidence in the new arrangements.

7.9 Answers to some of these questions and observations are likely to emerge from ongoing discussions and debates undertaken in various forums. ACPOS is fully committed to working closely with the Scottish Government to ensure the services offered on Day 1, and beyond, fully meet public expectations.

8. Conclusion

8.1 The introduction of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill undoubtedly signifies a momentous change to policing in Scotland.

8.2 We fully acknowledge that reform on the scale proposed inevitably brings considerable challenges, not least the practicalities and logistical considerations of combining eight individual forces and two policing agencies into one single organisation. ACPOS welcomes the unique opportunities this presents and looks forward to actively engaging with communities, partners and stakeholders as we reshape and modernise policing into a service that is more efficient, effective and responsive to the needs of all citizens and communities in Scotland.

Written evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

1. Introduction

1.1 We believe that we are reforming police from a position of strength, with record levels of performance2, and our aspiration is that reform presents an opportunity to continue to develop and enhance policing across Scotland. In doing so, we recognise the challenges and anxieties that such a significant process of change presents, which we discuss in this paper. We feel this is best tackled by open and honest articulation of the issues to ensure any problems are recognised and mitigated now. Close scrutiny of the proposed arrangements in that open and transparent manner will be key to ensuring the governance arrangements assist in the design and development of a new policing model that meets the needs of all communities across Scotland, the individual citizen, police service, and politicians.

1.2 It is the intention of the service that policing under the new single force structure will remain locally focussed with strong community relationships and partnerships with local authorities. As such, we firmly believe that reform will not fundamentally change the policing that the vast majority of the public see day-to-day, but it will change how the service is organised.

1.3 Despite the record levels of police performance under the existing arrangements, the recent debate on reform has raised a question mark over the quality of that local scrutiny from various quarters. Likewise, it is recognised that national governance arrangements are ad hoc and in need of modernisation.

1.4 We recognise that appropriate governance and accountability is a fundamental aspect of policing reform. In terms of formal structure, police accountability in Scotland is currently based on a constitutional settlement known as the tripartite structure. This tripartite structure was established to try and resolve historical tensions between national and local influences, and clarify the relative powers of local authorities, national government and chief constables in framing and implementation of policing policy, all whilst recognising that police officers are responsible to the law and that operational policing decisions must therefore be insulated from political interference.

1.5 The proposals will redefine the current tri-partite arrangements and our goal is that this should not undermine the importance and quality of local policing nor threaten the operational independence of policing by introducing an unwelcome imbalance through greater national control of the service. Governance and accountability play a crucial role in ensuring that our policing is ‘by consent’, and any change to these arrangements need to be critically examined.

1.6 Changes to local governance and accountability are unavoidable, particularly in view of the creation of the Scottish Police Authority (SPA) and the dissolution of the current Police Authorities and Joint Police Boards. The new arrangements proposed in the Bill, in our view, describe arrangements for the relationship and engagement that the police have with communities and their elected representatives rather than a clear role of governance that currently exists locally. This amounts to a momentous and historic change to the policing in Scotland, and has focussed the mind to define the new structure, and importantly, the "new relationship" between the police service and Local Authorities. While the Local Government and Regeneration Committee is principally interested in local arrangements, our professional view is that local and national arrangements need to be considered together.

2. Operational independence of the chief constable / police service

2.1 We believe that provisions within the Bill threaten the operational independence of the chief constable, and therefore policing.

2.2 A key component of the current arrangements is that the chief constables exercise their operational responsibilities free of undue political interference, while subject to appropriate accountability and scrutiny. We are keen to ensure that the Bill provides the necessary safeguards to satisfactorily address and eliminate the inherent concerns that a 'single' chief constable could be subject to political influence and pressure. These concerns are real. They were raised by respondents to the Scottish Government consultation process and indeed the Cabinet Secretary for Justice himself recognised these concerns during the reform debate.

2.3 Specifically, we would raise the following issues:

1. Ministerial Direction

- Whilst the Bill sets out a separation between Scottish Ministers and the chief constable, the provisions provide that the SPA must comply with any 'direction' given by Scottish Ministers. There is a clear risk that for the Authority to meet such compliance, undue pressure and influence could be asserted on the chief constable, ultimately challenging the impartiality and independence of the role to meet a political demand.

- We have asked Scottish Government for practical examples and instances of ministerial direction of other national bodies, in an attempt to allay our concerns. It is our position that past experience of ministerial direction is not indicative of the new relationship with the future policing organisation, failing to take proper cognisance of the unique status of policing.

- Scottish Government’s position is that ministerial directions are used rarely and come as a consequence of the SPA being a national body and that policing can be no different from other Government departments.

- Our view is that policing is different. It has coercive powers and in a democratic society it not only must be separate from Government, it must be seen to be separate. We believe that the power of ministerial direction of the SPA, if it is to remain, needs to be more fully articulated and described, and appropriate caveats placed thereon, to ensure that it cannot result in an unintended consequence of ministerial direction of the chief constable.

- Sections 5(2) refers to “(a) a specific operation being or to be carried out by the Police Service”, and “(b) the way in which the Police Service is carrying out (or is to carry out) a specific operation”. We believe that this is too narrow in its definition and should be broadened to “any operational matter being carried out by the Police Service”.

2. Power to call on Chief Constable to retire in the interests of efficiency and effectiveness

- While this has its origins in the 1967 Act, the Bill as presented removes any protection from an arbitrary use of this power. The context of the 1967 Act was a significantly greater number of chief constables. We are now moving into a new era of a single service and the arrangements for removal of the single chief constable need to reflect that. We believe that the bill should articulate a more detailed formal process; procedures to be followed, definition of efficiency or effectiveness, and appellate process. The new arrangements should maintain the general principle but there should be a much more robust and documented process to provide clarity for all and to protect the single chief constable from arbitrary use of the power.

3. Scottish Police Authority

We have concerns regarding the specific provisions set out in the Bill for the new SPA:

- The SPA will have a limited number of members. We believe that for the SPA to be effective, in terms of holding the chief constable to account and discharging its wider responsibilities will require not simply high calibre multi-skilled people but in a sufficiency of numbers. We do not believe that the proposal for 7-11 members will be sufficient for this purpose. We believe that 15 would be a more appropriate number to provide capacity and resilience. To effectively discharge its role, the SPA will require a range of sub groups and we are concerned that co-opted members bring another element of lack of accountability.

- The Bill places no responsibility on the SPA to engage formally with local authorities. There should be a formalised connection and relationship between both tiers to ensure ‘local’ influences ‘national’ and vice-versa.

- The SPA has unclear and limited accountability to the citizen due to the small number of members who are appointed, not elected, and there must be some form of compulsion on the SPA to engage with the local committees and consult directly with the citizen.
• There should be a number of locally elected members on the SPA. They should not be in a majority and they should be appointed on the same terms as other members, through the public appointments process, for their personal skills and experience and not simply on the basis of being an elected member. Their contribution on ‘local’ issues will be as important to the SPA as the other corporate disciplines brought by independent members.

• The financial arrangements of the new organisation, as a consequence of its national status, place significant restrictions on the chief constable. Hitherto able to develop financial reserves to assist in good financial and risk management, the new arrangements, and in particular the restrictions on holding reserves, will encourage a ‘spend it or lose’ mind-set. Moreover, we are concerned that where the chief constable requires additional resources, in the absence of being able to accrue reserves from allocated resources, (s)he will be required to approach Scottish Government (presumably through the SPA). This provides Scottish Government with unnecessary leverage on what may be an operational decision for the chief constable.

• We question the proposals in the Bill, whereby the SPA is responsible for development of the strategic plan for the Police Service of Scotland. Whilst we recognise that the SPA will have its own organisational priorities within its own strategic plan we believe the strategic plan of the Police Service of Scotland (as distinct from the SPSA) should be the responsibility of the professional and independent chief constable but would be subject to approval from the SPA.

3. Local Planning and the role of the Local Authority

3.1 We recognise a need to strengthen the role of local authorities in the local planning arrangements to satisfy requirements around local accountability through the community partnership processes.

3.2 Chapter 7 of the Bill sets out the provisions for local policing arrangements, and is prescriptive in the alignment of local policing with the 32 Local Authorities and the requirement for the local police commander to involve the Local authority in the setting of priorities and objectives, and preparation of a local police plan.

3.3 There is, however, a lack of clarity on how local arrangements and formalised reporting mechanisms should link in with the statutory requirements of accountability and scrutiny under the new Scottish Police Authority. As articulated previously, there needs to be connectivity between ‘local’ and ‘national’. National plans must reflect the importance of local delivery. Equally, local plans need to ensure appropriate prioritisation of national objectives. However, there must be clarity of accountability in terms of these two constituent parts of the governance structure.

3.4 Without such clarity, the proposals as they stand risk placing the new service under obligation to serve two 'masters'; one on a statutory footing with governance and fiscal responsibility but little local accountability, and the other with influence in determining local policing plans and outcomes but no statutory authority or fiscal responsibility to support delivery.

3.5 In some respects, the planned pilots and pathfinder projects that will test the new arrangements are key to determining future policy and practice in local policing arrangements. Moreover, the police service has a well refined and mature methodology, through the Strategic Policing Assessment and the Tasking & Co-ordinating Process for developing policing plans and effecting delivery of them, balancing local and national and through our active participation in the pilots/pathfinders, we believe that we have a positive contribution to make.

3.6 We fully support the practical benefits of the proposed alignment of local policing with the 32 Local Authority areas. Indeed this largely reflects current arrangements throughout Scotland. The chief constable will have a duty to ensure adequate arrangements for local policing and the SPA will hold him/her to account for that but there can be no ambiguity about the role of the chief constable, who must remain responsible for local policing and to whom local commanders are accountable. The question is one of balance. Just as it would be inappropriate for an over emphasis on national policing, an inflexibility at the local level that fetters the chief constable from his/her wider responsibilities would be equally inappropriate.

3.7 ACPOS advocates current community planning arrangements as a key consideration in determining how policing can be delivered locally within partnership arrangements, through:

- Professionalising and realigning existing community planning partnerships to bring corporacy to the 32 local area structure in support of local policing
- Linking the local policing plans into the community planning process and SOA’s through a local strategic assessment
- Consolidation and enhancement of partnership working to support the principles of policing

3.8 Linking policing plans into the community planning process, and feeding into SOAs, would provide a structure conducive to requirements of both local and national accountability, and a correlation between local and national priorities.

3.9 We recognise the significant contribution that has been made to local policing in recent years through the formalised community planning processes, partnership and collaborative working. Furthermore we acknowledge the progress made by the police service in Scotland though a clear focus and effort on community engagement, and improved accessibility and willingness to respond directly to local problems.

3.10 This effort has resulted in increased levels of trust, confidence and public satisfaction in policing, and the processes that support it, and this must be preserved under the new arrangements. A continuation and standardisation of these arrangements is key to the future success of local policing delivery within the new structure.

Local Police Plans and Priorities

3.11 The inclusion of all stakeholders is crucial to this process; delivery of the local police plan cannot be seen to be the sole preserve of a newly defined 'police - Local Authority' relationship.

3.12 We believe the terms of the localised delivery around this requirement must be reflective of the need for flexibility in its application, and integral to the wider local community planning processes. This approach will encourage the citizen and all key stakeholders to contribute meaningfully to local policing planning process. This is in accordance with a model that conforms to the policing principles and purpose of policing to improve the safety and well-being of communities.

3.13 The Bill is clear on the statutory responsibility on the local commander to prepare and submit a local police plan to the relevant local authority for approval. This places emphasis on the local commander to consult with and seek ratification from only one partner (the respective local authority) on local policing. We believe this should be modified to reflect wider local policing arrangements; it would be more accurate to ask the local commander, with community planning partners, to produce a local strategic assessment which will assist and inform the local police plan.

3.14 Ownership and responsibility for the local police plan remains with the police, and the plan is still prepared and subject to approval by the Local Authority, per the provisions of the Bill. However, the local strategic assessment upon which the plan is based, in broader terms, will be developed by the police through wider consultation with partners. This takes full cognisance of the importance of a partnership approach in the participation and responsiveness to the delivery of policing. Local policing, in particular, is not delivered in isolation and aspects of local policing will be delivered with and by local partners.

3.15 As a consequence of this approach the local strategic assessment highlights the priorities for local policing more broadly, and ensures delivery of these priorities - and therefore the local police plan, at least in part - is integral to community planning and the local SOA. This approach will contribute to the wider effort to focus on preventative effort through partnership working, where there is a need to link police reform to the work currently ongoing under the Scottish Government Review of Community Planning and Single Outcome Agreements.

3.16 There is almost a bit of the unknown here and how this will work in practice. All of these processes, and the detail around it – setting priorities, the approval of the plan, community planning partnership delivery - needs to be fully exposed and subjected to rigorous scrutiny and testing through the local Pathfinder pilots.

3.17 In addition to this, ACPOS is resolute in its assertion that local policing arrangements (governance and scrutiny) must take full cognisance of the wider statutory requirements and responsibilities on the chief constable around continuous improvement in the carrying out of police functions in terms of Best Value, and scrutiny through the Scottish Policing Performance Framework (SPPF) in terms of national performance and outcomes (and notwithstanding the important external inspection and scrutiny arrangements by HMICS).

4. Implications for local resourcing of police services

4.1 Work is currently underway as part of the mandated Police Reform programme to develop a blueprint for the new Police Service of Scotland. In full recognition of the importance of local policing, ACPOS have appointed a dedicated team to apply the appropriate focus and effort to this significant aspect of police reform. This work is further underpinned by effort from across a number of executive-led workstreams within the reform programme, with full cognisance of interdependencies.

4.2 Whilst a final resource allocation model has not yet been determined - and is subject to the outcomes of these wider processes of remodelling - ACPOS fully acknowledges the importance that the commitment of local policing resource does not suffer to the detriment of police reform. A number of objectives and determining factors, critical to the successful outcome of this remodelling process are being followed, and this is fundamental in preserving that balance of local resource within the context of the new single service.

4.3 However, within the revised resourcing framework there will be the inevitable movement and displacement of some officer numbers and police staff from existing resource allocation within the geography of the 8-force model, SCDEA and SPSA. This is a fundamental objective of the reform of the police service, and will eventually remove some duplication of support services, and create more equal access to specialist support and national capacity where and when they are needed. ACPOS does not anticipate this will have a detrimental effect on local policing; indeed the contrary position should apply in that communities will benefit from the availability of increased cadre of specialist resource when required.

4.4 Local policing resource needs to reflect variance in our communities across the country. We would caution against a potential risk of bias from outcomes being too narrow and focussed on, for instance, crime levels and solvency; outcomes must be reflective of the broader well-being of all our communities, and not a charter for something that would result in resources being dragged in to the busier urban areas at the expense of localised need or lack of regard for geography or spread of population, or other variables.

4.5 The 17,234 police officer numbers should ensure that we maintain correct levels of policing in local communities. Key to maintaining this is a reduction of costs in other areas, the risks to which are outlined in our paper to the Finance Committee.
Appendix B

Written evidence to the Finance Committee of the Scottish Parliament on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

1. Commitment

1.1 ACPOS is firmly committed to delivering Scottish Government’s three objectives of reform:

- Sustaining and improving local policing in a time of financial constraint
- Improving the availability of specialist operational support throughout Scotland
- Improved arrangements for local engagement

1.2 Whilst recognising the current record levels of performance and significant contribution that the current structures of policing has made to the safety and well being of the people of Scotland over the last 37 years, we are committed to delivering effective reform to position the service to continue that within a constrained public sector budget.

1.3 Our structured Programme Management arrangements, therefore, are designed to ensure that reform objectives are met, while identifying the true costs and savings of reform. We recognise any reform in the public sector carries the associated risk of failing to deliver objectives and benefits, with costs being greater and savings less than anticipated. We seek to avoid that.

1.4 Our commitment extends not just to the delivery of reform, but business as usual, including future threats within current financial constraints. Savings of £88m by 2014/15 have been set, increasing to £106m in the following spending review in 2015/16. In view of the nature and extent of public sector finance constraints, these savings of 8%, increasing to 10% over the next 3 - 4 years, are not unreasonable and our collective professional view as the senior leaders of the service is that, as a financial saving alone, this would be achievable.

1.5 There are, however, some challenges and constraints in meeting reform objectives while continuing to deliver our record levels of performance within the financial settlement. Parliament and the Committees will want to be fully sighted on that wider context and the detail of the challenges, which we outline below.

2. The Outline Business Case

2.1 There are issues relating directly to the Scottish Government’s Police Reform Programme Outline Business Case, which in our view presents a number of challenges to meet the financial savings within the timescales set while conforming to the government’s commitments on key issues.

2.2 The first point is that the Financial Memorandum and the budget has been set on the basis of an Outline Business Case (OBC), not a fully developed Business Case. Within the OBC, there are some high level projections and assumptions that have not been subject to a process of due diligence that would more accurately assess delivery, costs and savings. The OBC was the means by which Scottish Government planned to assess the three options for reform against each other and make its decision, following which, and in line with established practice, a full business case was to be developed, providing a more accurate and a more comprehensive projection of costs, savings, business benefits and so on.

2.3 It now falls, rightly, to the police service to shape our future, from which will flow substantial business cases that will more accurately predict costs, savings, timelines and deliverables. If the OBC’s projections have been overly optimistic, then there is a clear risk that costs may have been under-estimated and savings over-estimated. That said, if the OBC has been pessimistic the converse may apply.

2.4 The Scottish Government’s position is that the OBC is not a blueprint for the service and if savings cannot be accrued in particular areas of policing, as predicted within the OBC, they will be accrued in ‘others’. While we acknowledge this principle and will look to every area of policing to deliver the overall savings required to meet the budget, there is no guarantee that those ‘other’ areas have potential for savings.

2.5 All of that said, this does not diminish the ACPOS’ commitment and drive to deliver reform within the budget set. It merely highlights a significant risk that needs to be recognised, managed and mitigated. All of this is closely aligned to our second substantial issue, which is that, as a consequence of Scottish Government commitments, there have been significant limitations placed on the service in terms of where it can find savings within the entire budget. These are detailed below.

3. Constraints and Assumptions

3.1 There are a number of constraints and assumptions, based on commitments made by the Scottish Government. These are:

- Police Officer numbers will be maintained at 17234
- There will be no introduction of the Winsor Review Recommendations on police/police staff terms and conditions
- There will be no compulsory redundancies
- Police and police staff will transfer to the new service on their existing terms and conditions
- The service will develop a dispersed (rather than a centralised) model of service delivery to minimise the impact of job cuts on any specific region of Scotland

3.2 Each of these is laudable, and represents a significant contribution to policing but, when taken together, the consequence is that they restrict the opportunities for making the savings set within the budget. This can be seen more clearly when the budget profile for policing is examined.
3.3 The Financial Memorandum has set out, within the overall £88m of savings, three main heads of savings:

1. Police staff reduction costs of £50.3m
2. Non staff costs of £30.7m
3. Police Officer delayering of £5.4m

3.4 Whilst an initial element of savings is due FY2012/13, the substantial part kicks in during FY2013/14 and FY2014/15. The delivery of these savings is dependent on the new service starting on the earliest possible date of 1 April 2013, therefore any deferral beyond this date will add delay and cause slippage.

3.5 There are four specific issues worthy of highlighting from this:

- Police officer numbers being protected effectively closes off almost 75% of the spend to making financial savings
- Maintaining police officer and police staff terms and conditions on transfer to the new organisation will limit the opportunities for significant savings on staff costs in the first few years, particularly since any negotiated settlement will take time and is likely to include some degree of incremental protection
- With savings of over £30m already set within the non staff budget of £130m, the scope for significant further savings is limited when much of that budget is unavoidable (fuel, utilities, rates, etc)
- Achieving the scale of savings from police staff costs is dependent on significant numbers of police staff leaving the organisation on a voluntary basis.

This is more fully articulated in the following section.

4 This figure also includes other non-specified costs of £1.6m
4. The Scale of Police Staff Job Cuts

4.1 A key component of reform is to sustain and enhance community based operational policing by reducing duplication. It is an unavoidable consequence that to achieve the scale of savings there will be a significant reduction in police staff jobs. The scale of police staff cuts is recognised by Scottish Government, not simply in terms of the savings it has set within the budget but in the investment of £80m to fund voluntary redundancies.

4.2 Based on these figures, this equates to a reduction in circa 2000fte leaving the organisation by April 2015, in the following (cumulative) phasing:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Reduction</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2012/13</td>
<td>240</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013/14</td>
<td>906</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2014/15</td>
<td>1864</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2015/16</td>
<td>2054</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

4.3 The above figure of 2054 will increase to circa 2400 if projected savings of £10 million in police staff terms and conditions is not achieved.

4.4 This equates to approximately 33% of all police staff posts and has to be achieved by Voluntary Redundancy. Police forces and the SPSA have already reduced police staff levels by c1000fte in the last 2 - 3 years, much of it by voluntary redundancy. There is, therefore, a diminishing pool of people likely to be attracted to voluntary severance, particularly when there is a clear statement that there will be no compulsory redundancy.

4.5 Our professional assessment based on that recent experience has shown that it is highly unlikely that voluntary redundancy schemes will attract such numbers, particularly within the current economic climate and a less than buoyant jobs market. By way of example, a Voluntary Redundancy Scheme within Strathclyde Police over the last eighteen months released only c200 members of staff and this was on more favourable terms than is assumed within the Financial Memorandum. The Scheme attracted c500 notes of interest, many of whom were in areas of business that were not in scope for change (station assistants, custody, control rooms).

4.6 The scale and phasing of police staff voluntary redundancies, if it can be achieved, carries a risk that police officers will be drawn into non police roles. Our drive is to avoid this at all costs as we believe that it is not efficient, effective or the best way to design the new service. It does not represent Best Value. Police staff make a significant contribution to the overall policing effort and our professional view is that we require an appropriate workforce mix between police officers and police staff. Any notion that police staff simply perform a “back office” function is not an accurate description of the professional role they play.
5. Cost

5.1 ACPOS recognises the commitment of the Scottish Government to invest in Police Reform in order to achieve recurring savings of £106 million by 2016/17. It is widely recognised that reform of this magnitude cannot be achieved without significant investment. ACPOS also welcomes the inclusion of optimism bias within the Financial Memorandum to provide a measure of protection against the costs being greater and the savings less than predicted within the OBC, however, our professional view is that there will be a lag before the benefits of the investment in reform are accrued.

5.2 It should be noted, however, the savings of £88m relating to police reform are not the only savings the police service is required to make. The flat cash settlement is a cut in real terms, because of inflationary considerations and pay awards during the spending review, therefore additional focus over and above the £88m will be required in order to meet the savings necessary to stay within the budget settlement.

5.3 Having just received some detail from Scottish Government on the status of the new organisation, further work is ongoing to better understand the implications. There are other financial management issues associated with the service having to work within ‘Scottish Government Rules’ rather than ‘Local Authority Rules’ which are only now being fully understood, e.g. reduced procurement costs could result in increased administrative costs, an inability to hold reserves, and a significant VAT liability.

6. Value Added Tax – additional financial commitment

6.1 The new Police Service of Scotland, as a consequence of its status as a national organisation, which is a significant departure from how police forces and police authorities are currently constituted, will attract an annual liability of VAT of £22m. We recognise that the Scottish Government is in liaison with HMRC to consider an exemption from the requirement to pay VAT.

6.2 That said, we raised similar concerns on the VAT liability of the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) when it was formed in 2007 and there has been no relaxation on the HMRC position.

6.3 Our planning assumption, therefore, is the new Police Service of Scotland, will have a recurring VAT liability of £22m per annum, which is the equivalent of 800 police staff jobs or 630 police officer posts, on top of what has already been assumed. Over the period covered by the Financial Memorandum this amounts to a liability of £280m.

7. Reserves

7.1 There is ongoing debate between Scottish Government and COSLA regarding the disposal of reserves currently held by Police Authorities on behalf of the existing forces. As we understand matters, Scottish Government and COSLA have agreed that these funds will be recovered from Police Authorities and returned to Scottish Government and COSLA on the 51/49% split. Scottish Government’s preference is for this to occur at the end of the current financial year, while COSLA’s position is that the reserves should be retained within the current structure of policing and returned only with the commencement of the new service.

7.2 The ACPOS view is that this money was allocated to police for policing purposes, was managed accordingly, and should be retained within the policing, providing the new service with a contingency to fund aspects of reform.

8. Conclusion

8.1 All of that said, our absolute commitment is to achieve the objectives of reform within the budget set by Scottish Government. In doing so, the challenges need to be clearly recognised, articulated and managed given the parliamentary and public interest in such a significant reform of an important public service.
Appendix C

COMPLAINTS AND INVESTIGATIONS

Section 14 – Senior Officers: retirement for efficiency or effectiveness
Very little detail in this Section in comparison with the requirements set out under the Police (Efficiency) (Scotland) Regulations 1996 (requirement for progressively staged application of the regulation). It would be reasonable to expect that such provision reflected these existing regulations as a minimum. The process as laid out within the Bill in this respect is insufficiently defined at this time.

We have other pressing concerns around Section 14 that relate directly to the significant issue, already raised, in terms of operational independence of the chief constable (detailed in ‘Appendix A’ in the accompanying papers). The Bill provides for Ministerial Direction of the SPA, but not the chief constable. However, it is our opinion that the provisions of Section 14 risk placing such undue pressure on the chief constable to comply with requests or instructions from/through the SPA, as a consequence of the unregulated power of the SPA to “require a chief constable to retire from office…”, without any apparent appellant process. We feel this requires to be explored from both contexts.

Section 22 – Failure to perform duty
Section 23 – Failure to return equipment
The specific criminalisation of these issues appears to be disproportionate to the acts. There is already legal provision, both criminal and civil, for dealing with any unauthorised retention of property. The Conduct Regulations appear to satisfactorily provide for issues under the proposed Section 22.

Section 24 – Liability for unlawful conduct
It is unclear what is to be considered as “unlawful conduct” in this context, as it could be construed to include misconduct in addition to criminal acts and it is likely that this legislation would conflict with current legislation where vicarious liability is provided for (Health and Safety etc). Would this “unlawful” conduct require to be confirmed within a criminal court prior to being considered under this section, or is it to be based on balance of probabilities standards of evidence? The consideration of compensation to affected parties is more appropriately considered within the existing civil legislation and it is unclear what the requirement was to have such a provision within this Bill.

Section 50(1)(e) – Appointments, Promotions etc – Regulations to make provisions for "restriction on the private life or business interests of Constables or Police Cadets”.
The Police Service has competently addressed such issues for some time by way of the provision of clearly articulated Ethical Standards and associated Force policies. Any deviation from these standards and policies are effectively addressed through existing or new conduct regulations or, in extreme cases, the criminal law. It is unclear what specific restrictions of officer’s private lives is intended to be proscribed here and whether this can be suitably articulated and catered for within such regulations, given the extent and diversity of the private lives of Officers and their families in this modern age. This appears may be an unnecessary proposal and contrary to contemporary thinking in terms of developing employment and human rights legislation.

Section 53 – Disciplinary procedures: conduct and performance
In terms of the references to performance, it seems Section 53 may not have taken cognisance of the Police (Efficiency) (Scotland) Regulations 1996, which we suggest competently addresses issues of efficiency and performance for officers up to Chief Superintendent rank.

Section 53(2)(d) provides for regulations made under Section 49, conferring functions on the PIRC in relation to investigations as to whether a constable has been engaged in misconduct or whether a constable's performance has been unsatisfactory. Whilst there may be occasions when the Commissioner may require to consider the conduct of an officer, particularly where there is an inference of serious misconduct, it is unclear what circumstances would cause performance issues of a police officer to be considered by the Commissioner. This proposal appears to conflict with the current Efficiency Regulations.

If the Commissioner does acquire such responsibility and powers it raises the question as to the efficacy of the information sharing and exchange mechanisms between the Commissioner and the Police Service of Scotland that will be essential to effectively meet these requirements.

It is clear there will be an early requirement for the drafting and acceptance of detailed Protocols and/or MOU’s between the PIRC and the Police Service of Scotland (PSoS). These will be crucial in order to provide a clear articulation of the roles and responsibilities of both organisations when it comes to such misconduct and performance matters under consideration.

Chapter 9 – Police Appeals Tribunals
The proposed provisions in Chapter 9 appear to be more than “….re-ordered and updated to provide appropriate independence” as stated in the Bill explanatory note. The Bill introduces Section 60 which provides strong powers for a Tribunal to obtain information including making it a criminal offence to fail to “answer any question” in addition to the statutory requirement to attend a Tribunal and provide information when requested and the associated criminal offences in failing to do so. This appears more of a substantial development that indicated within the explanatory note and might be subject to challenge, in terms of witnesses self incriminating if required by law to answer any question, as the section may be interpreted.

Chapter 10 – Complaints and Investigations
This is a critical element in the Bill. It is questionable (particularly in the early stages) whether the PIRC will or can be resourced in the time available to be self sufficient in respect of investigative capacity. This will likely require an approach to the PSoS Chief Constable for specialist resources to progress certain aspects of their investigations. This could lead to conflicts of interest and present particular issues, such as fatal road traffic collisions involving police officers and deaths in custody, where the potential for consideration of offences under the Corporate Manslaughter legislation are possible. It is questionable whether resources from the corporate body under investigation can competently undertake such investigations or even actively participate in them?

There may be a requirement to consider the concept of the “Independent Oversight of an Investigation” in order to address this issue. This is already a practice undertaken by the IPCC in England and Wales and might be considered further. Again, as highlighted previously, there will be a fundamental requirement for the early development and agreement of detailed Information Sharing and Exchange protocols and MOUs between the PIRC and the PSoS (and potentially COPFS).

It would seem sensible to consider such arrangements already in place between similar organisations and we would suggest the Independent Police Complaints Commissioner (ACPO Forces), Garda Siochana (Garda Siochana Ombudsman Commission - GSOC) and the PSNI (Police Ombudsman Northern Ireland - PONI) arrangements as potentially a source of good practice to be considered.

Section 63(1)(d) - Investigation of “other matters” which may be in the “Public Interest” to do so Whilst the volume of such cases may be low (GSOC have conducted 6 such investigations since 2007) it will be critical to clearly define the Public Interest Test which can be a difficult concept to clearly define. The PIT in terms of the Freedom of Information legislation does offer a relatively well defined explanation of the public interest test but it is business area specific and may not readily meet the requirements of this Bill. The parameters of what constitutes “other matters” also need to be properly and fully defined.

Section 63(1)(e) introduces the function of the Commissioner, “to perform any functions imposed on the Commissioner by regulations made under Section 49 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 (asp00) in relation to procedures for dealing with constables whose standard of behaviour or performance is unsatisfactory”.

This is a significant development and may present a potential conflict of responsibility between the Commissioner and the Deputy Chief Constable, assuming the DCC will retain similar responsibilities for the staff of the PSoS as at present. If there are issues around a constable’s “behaviour” then this would most likely fall into the realm of conduct as prescribed in Police Conduct Regulations. If the matter is one of “performance”, this is likely to remain within both Force policies for performance management and also by way of the Efficiency Regulations. As noted earlier, under the provisions of Section 53, it is unclear what locus an independent Commissioner should have in this respect, given these matters currently effectively managed in line with existing Regulations, other than to remit such considerations back to the Chief Constable if they arise from any investigation conducted by the PIRC. We believe this issue needs further consideration and/or clarification.

It is also unclear how the process of undertaking appeals against conduct matters will function effectively and who will be responsible, particularly if the PIRC is to become involved in the investigation of conduct issues. There could be duplication of effort if matters are remitted back to the PSoS from the PIRC and information is not effectively shared between the bodies. Additionally, there is a real risk of the loss of confidence in the process by both the public and staff if this process is not properly articulated. This could become confusing for the public who may find themselves dealing with two separate organisations for the same issue.

Complaints against the Commissioner / PIRC staff
The Bill is silent in this respect and is reflective of the position of Police Ombudsman in Northern Ireland. However, it seems reasonable, and reflective of the relationship currently between PCCS and the Scottish Police Service, that the PIRC should be subject to the external scrutiny of the Public Services Ombudsman for Scotland, as are other similar public bodies; this body has the skills, experience and resource to do so. Otherwise, there is a risk that public confidence in the new arrangements would be adversely affected if there is no recourse to independent scrutiny for complaints, particularly those initially and directly investigated by the PIRC.

Composition of the Commission
Finally, there is a fundamental issue in the composition of the Commission, particularly in terms of the number of Commissioners. The premise of the establishment of a Commission is one of independence from both the police service and from Government. The Commissioner is a Government appointee and could be seen to be liable to undue influence, not just from a Government perspective but also the wide and diverse lobby, single issue and pressure groups. The model adopted by the Irish Garda Siochana Ombudsman Commission was to establish a three person collegiate body, which was predicated on the desire for the Commission to discharge its functions in a deliberative manner allowing for both overall consensus and majority vote thereby introducing an appropriate level of protection from such undue influence; this approach provided a robust level of resilience for the Commission. The diverse backgrounds of the three Commissioners also offered the benefit of wide life experience and the prospect of a balanced level of determination. Given the similarities between the countries it seems appropriate this model should at least be considered as an option.
Early appointment of the Chief Constable

Thank you very much for allowing me to contribute to what I thought was, from our perspective, a very productive session of the Justice Committee on 28 February 2012. I hope it was helpful to you and your Committee. On reflection, there is one particular area upon which I should have placed greater emphasis at Justice Committee, and that is the early appointment of the Chief Constable. I did raise it briefly at the Finance Committee but it is such an important issue that I thought that I should raise it with you in some more detail.

Until now our position has always been that an early appointment is necessary but we recognised, and were sympathetic to, the position held within Scottish Government that the due process was by necessity a lengthy one as a consequence of the parliamentary process and the Public Appointments process, which had to precede the selection and appointment of the Chief Constable.

At this stage we are advised by Scottish Government colleagues that the appointment of the Chief Constable, following the appointment of the first Chair of the new Scottish Police Authority under the Public Appointments process, is likely to occur in December 2012. That would be followed by the selection and appointment of the full Executive Team at Deputy Chief Constable, Assistant Chief Constable and Director level. As you know, agreement has already been reached that 1 April 2013 is the optimum start date for the new service, to provide the fullest opportunity to deliver reform and the savings required in the police budget. This would leave the Chief Constable with a maximum of three months, and the wider Executive Team a small number of weeks, to prepare for the ‘go live’ date. My professional view is that this is too late.

As you know, I am leading on Police Reform which perhaps puts me in a particularly unique position to understand why the reform programme would benefit from the early appointment of a Chief Constable. That said, I also have the unanimous support and endorsement of all other Chief Constables, the Chief Executive of the Scottish Police Services Authority and the Director General of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency in writing to you to provide our collective position on the early appointment of the Chief Constable.

In summary therefore, I would raise the following points in support of that position.

- As currently scheduled, there is insufficient time between December 2012 and 1 April 2013 for the new Chief Constable to be fully prepared to take control of a new organisation and be ready for Day 1.
• These time constraints become even more acute in respect of the appointment of wider Executive Team at Deputy Chief Constable, Assistant Chief Constable and Director level, leaving them only a number of weeks at best to prepare themselves and the organisation for ‘go live’.

• An earlier appointment would allow the Chief Constable and his/her Executive Team to articulate their early vision for policing for the future and to determine the ethos and style of policing which will be key to delivering the type of policing that is sympathetic to the goals of reform.

• This would also ensure that the new Chief Constable and the Executive Team are fully engaged in the reform process and able to take early decisions, or provide early guidance on key issues such as the design of the new service. While progress has already been made, and further progress will be made, under the current arrangements, the new Chief Constable would have the mandate and legitimacy for taking decisions now that will influence the service from now and into the future. Indeed, there may be a risk that decisions may be delayed in the absence of the new Chief Constable.

We do recognise that this proposal for an early appointment is not without risks or difficulties. In particular, we recognise that in the ideal world, the process for appointment of the Chief Constable should include the first Chair/Convenor of the new Scottish Police Authority. We are not operating, however, in an ideal world and it is this very appointment under the Public Appointments process that elongates the identification of the new Chief Constable to December 2012. It is worth highlighting that the existing process throws up many examples of new Conveners or Chairs of Police Authorities who inherit an existing Chief Constable, without compromise to an effective and enduring professional relationship.

Any early appointment must still be based on an open and transparent process and we recognise that there would be a need for a specifically designed process. It is not for the service to determine how that may look but we would be willing to contribute ideas if requested.

The timelines for introducing reform are tight as are the timescales for securing the savings already set within the budget. In our professional view, there is a clear and compelling case that the early appointment of the Chief Constable and the wider Executive Team should be brought forward to ensure that we meet the 1 April 2013 deadline as effectively as possible.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Association of Principal Fire Officers Scotland

1. Scottish Fire and Rescue Board

APFOS has no particular comment to make about the number of members forming the new Board, however the Association supports the principle of members being appointed on the basis of relevant skills and expertise.

APFOS is of the opinion that members of the Board have a key role to play in supporting the delivery of high quality front line services whilst aligning to the principles of Best Value. It is imperative that members are competent to assess risk and allocate resources within a difficult economic climate, and then properly scrutinise performance.

2. Functions of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

APFOS is disappointed to note that the Bill does not propose to change the functions of the fire and rescue service. The Association considers that it is timely to introduce new functions which better reflect the contribution that the fire and rescue service already makes to a much wider community safety agenda.

Although there is some risk associated with the inclusion of new statutory duties in that they need to be sufficiently resourced, the function described as ‘Promoting fire safety’ does not adequately reflect the broader prevention function on which services are presently engaged. Members of the Association remain convinced that the key role that services play in a wide range of preventative and educational work is not appropriately recognised and would recommend that the function needs to expand beyond its singular fire focus.

The Association is of the opinion that ‘Responding to road traffic accidents’ should be matched by a proactive prevention and education function. Similarly, services have made a significant contribution to the work of Paddy Tomkins and more latterly to the ‘Water Rescue Stakeholders Group’. The duty to respond to flooding does not adequately reflect the expectations of Scotland’s communities and any new modern purpose should capture the much broader water rescue role.

APFOS remains convinced that the Bill should better reflect the broad engagement with partners on initiatives which contribute towards improving the safety and wellbeing of communities.

3. Inspectors of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

APFOS supports the principles of scrutiny and audit and is of the opinion that future scrutiny and audit arrangements must be independent, capable of assessing the performance of the operational function and consistent with the recommendations of the Crerar review.
The requirement for the Inspectorate to work closely with the Auditor General is welcome. Audit Scotland is recognised as being an independent audit body and, with support of peer assessors, has been successful in carrying out performance reviews following ‘modernisation’ and as part of the Best Value regime.

APFOS recognises that the Chief Inspector, Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors of the fire and rescue service will be non-Ministerial office bearers and that the Chief Inspector and Inspectors will be holders of the Royal Warrant, however some concern remains over the degree of independence and the potential for a conflict between the Inspectorate and Advisory roles.

APFOS would also wish to ensure that any audit and scrutiny role takes account of the requirements of the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) and draws on its expertise in relation to post-accident investigations.

4. Delivery of fire and rescue services

The principle of stronger engagement with local councillors is supported however it is difficult to see how the proposal to involve far more local councillors in shaping priorities, challenging and scrutinising performance can operate in practice. The Pathfinders provide a welcome opportunity to test these principles however they clearly need to take account of the changing operating landscape.

There also appears to be a conflict in terms of accountability of Local Senior Officers (LSOs) to each local authority within a structure which is centrally directed. Delegating authority to the LSO is welcome, but their ability to deliver against local priorities and expectations within a centrally developed policy and budgetary arrangement will create a difficult and constant tension. APFOS would therefore heed caution as to imposing statutory duties on the LSOs.

One of the main policy objectives of the Bill is to protect and improve local services despite financial cuts, and this is supported, however APFOS is unclear as to how the cost savings outlined within the OBC, particularly those related to prevention, protection and response, support that proposal.

It is also proposed to provide a more equitable access across Scotland to specialist support and expertise and, although this is laudable, APFOS would be keen to learn how that can be achieved in reality. Fire and rescue services already have well developed arrangements to support one another in delivering specialist capabilities, based on risk, and there has been no evidence to suggest that this will be improved upon or delivered any more effectively.

5. Financial and workforce matters

The financial forecasts and requirement to make substantial savings were the principle drivers which initiated the reform of Scotland’s Police Forces and Fire and Rescue Services. On that basis, APFOS has been critical of the fact that the financial analysis was omitted from the initial Outline Business Case and, even now, is based on a number of questionable assumptions.
With over 80% of the current cost of fire and rescue services being attributed to staffing, it is only reasonable to assume that the realisation of the projected savings will emanate from a significant reduction in staffing levels.

As a staff association, APFOS is particularly interested in the impact of reform proposals on its members. As a staff group, Principal Officers, are particularly vulnerable and the uncertainty on how reform impacts on them individually and collectively remains a concern. Unfortunately, even at this stage, no proposed staffing structure has been made available against which the financial assumptions can be tested.

The Association welcomes the Government’s commitment to no compulsory redundancies and the policy that on transfer no individual will suffer any detriment. APFOS also welcomes the commitment for staff to retain their existing mobility arrangements on transfer recognising that placing a requirement for officers to work in other areas of Scotland could place an undue hardship on them. The Association however, is of the opinion that those promises are in contradiction to the projected savings contained within the OBC unless the expectation is that the new authority will be required to deliver those savings through the implementation of sweeping changes, immediately following its establishment. Although any such changes will need to be negotiated, no comfort is provided to the Association or its members, that the Government’s commitments will be carried forward beyond the date of transfer to the new authority.

APFOS is particularly concerned with the assumptions and commentary in relation to voluntary redundancy payments set out in the Financial Memorandum. A figure of £4m has been attributed to the fire and rescue service on the basis that reduction in uniform staff could be managed through staff turnover and retirement and therefore no redundancy costs will be incurred. The Association is of the opinion that this assumption is flawed and is wholly inconsistent with the £80m set aside for the Police.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents

1. Introduction

1.1 The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents (ASPS) support the policy objectives described in the Policy Memorandum (PM). We recognise the reality of the challenging economic environment in which we are currently placed has led to a need to reduce the cost of policing whilst ensuring improved outcomes for communities. We also believe that this process should be allied to wider public sector reform. That said, the change programme must be considered against a backdrop of current police performance which has provided the lowest recorded crime figures for thirty five years allied to improved detection rates which has led Scottish Government to describe policing in Scotland as “excellent”.

1.2 ASPS is a long established body that represents constables holding the ranks of Superintendent and Chief Superintendent in Scotland. Our immediate concern with regard to the contents of the Bill is the failure at Section 11 (6), and elsewhere, to specify ASPS as the statutory consultee in respect of these ranks. This is a designation which we have repeatedly requested throughout the consultation phase with a view to establishing for our Association a similar statutory basis to that which has been afforded to the Scottish Police Federation. A satisfactory explanation for this continued omission has yet to be provided to us.

1.3 In relation to the other provisions of the Bill, we offer the following comments for consideration in our capacity as the senior operational leaders of the service in Scotland and in respect of our role as a staff association, tasked with protecting the interests of our members in terms of welfare, efficiency and conditions of service.

2. Operational independence of the Chief Constable

2.1 At a national level, ASPS believe that further safeguards are required in order to protect the operational independence\(^1\) of the Chief Constable. Section 5 of the Bill instructs the authority to comply with any direction given by ministers, with certain restrictions given in respect of specific operations. In our opinion, these safeguards are insufficient and must be extended to ensure that all police operations are protected from the potential for inappropriate political interference.

2.2 Moreover, Section 14 of the Bill provides the Authority with an option to require a senior officer to retire from office. When allied to the provisions of section 5, it is not inconceivable to imagine a Chief Constable being required to retire on political grounds. This is a situation that must be avoided and further protection should be afforded to senior officers within the legislation not only for their personal protection but in the wider public interest. In any event, we should wish to be informed with regard to the appeal process that would apply in such circumstances.

2.3 At a local authority level, ASPS support measures which strengthen the connection between services and communities. We recognise the need to be responsive to the needs of communities and ensure that local government can influence local policing whilst protecting the service from the potential for inappropriate political interference from either local or central government - in the wider public interest.

2.4 Clearly, local governance arrangements will be required in order to ensure openness, transparency and fairness in the setting and agreeing of local plans. That said, the Bill does not specify how this is to be achieved and to whom local commanders will report. In any event, we would be opposed to an element of local government control being introduced to policing and would wish to ensure that responsibility of the Chief Constable as the individual with operational autonomy over the deployment of policing resources is thoroughly underlined. Formal reporting and accountability from Local Commanders for operational performance must be to the Chief Constable alone.

2.5 The PM does state, however, that “it will be for the local authorities to determine the most appropriate local mechanism for exercising their role…and formalising their relationship with the local commander…to help shape and deliver local outcomes.” This infers considerable latitude for local authorities to place demands upon the local commander and appears to erode the authority of the Chief Constable.

2.6 It is our view that the operational responsibility of constables and the local police commander to act in pursuance of Section 19 (function and jurisdiction), 20 (general duties) and 32 (policing principles) of the Bill, in the context or local policing, must be explicitly stated and understood. This will avoid a situation in which local policing might become inappropriately influenced by any individual or organisation and the impartial execution of the office of constable or public confidence in that impartiality is eroded as a consequence.

2.7 Furthermore, Section 46 (3) (a) instructs local commanders to produce ‘reports’ for the local authority as ‘reasonably required’. Without further clarification, this section of the Bill may result in police resources being diverted from their primary policing tasks in order to collate information and prepare such reports.

2.8 We would also welcome the provision of greater detail in respect of the “joint development of a local plan”, as outlined in Section 48, and the potential for disagreement between contributing parties. Clarity over the extent to which the Local Authority is to “approve” the local policing plan is necessary in order to ensure that police officers are not hindered from following the direction and control of the Chief Constable and can impartially execute their statutory duties at a local level. We believe that “agreement” rather than “approve” represents a more appropriate description of the relationship between local commanders, local authorities and the Chief Constable.
2.9 Public Sector reform offers an opportunity to legislate for improved collaboration between other agencies and police and we hope to see such a legal duty in other public sector reform legislation.

3. Frontline policing and the provision of forensic services

3.1 We agree that there is considerable scope for reducing the duplication of support services in Scotland by the creation of a single Police Service. That said, we are keen to see police officers performing roles that require the office of constable whilst being provided with support from professionally qualified individuals in those roles that do not require the post holder to utilise police powers. This will provide a balanced workforce. Indeed, in this respect, we believe that there are opportunities and cost savings available in wider private or public sector involvement in support of police operational delivery.

3.2 Notwithstanding, some clarity is required in respect of the widespread use of the term "frontline" when discussing policing. We have long held the opinion that the term ‘frontline’ is primarily used by external parties to describe visible uniformed police operations and ‘crime fighting’. In reality, the use of this term in such circumstances betrays a lack of knowledge and understanding of policing. In our opinion, ‘frontline’ service delivery includes a number of other functions such as surveillance, intelligence, custody handling, case preparation, counter terrorism and offender management which are sometimes referred to as ‘middle’ or ‘back’ office functions. Errors in any of these areas can have a serious detrimental impact on crime figures, public confidence and community safety and thus their importance should not be downgraded or overlooked.

3.3 We also believe that change to local operational service delivery should be kept to a minimum in order to reduce the potential for adverse impact on performance or a reduction in outcomes for communities. Where changes are proposed, evidence for the change, cost savings to be achieved and the potential for improved outcomes should be clearly articulated. When policing in Scotland is recognised as “excellent” we would not encourage wholesale change.

3.4 We would encourage a focus on the removal of duplication and cost reduction in the directly non-operational areas and in the provision of enabling services, such as, ICT where there is an annual spend of circa £60 million.

3.5 One area of concern to our members, however, is the proposals in respect of forensic services as outlined in Chapter 3 of the Bill. We believe that further thought should be given to the proposed arrangements being applied with any distinction being drawn between the forensic analysis of evidence and responsibility for the gathering of that evidence.

3.6 In our opinion, responsibility for operational direction and control of staff at crime scenes should be a matter for the police alone. This will ensure appropriate levels of service at crime scenes under the control and direction of senior investigating officers, whose role it is to oversee all elements of evidence gathering, whilst public confidence in the impartiality of the analysis of evidence and submission of reports in the criminal justice process is maintained. We do not wish to see savings that are realised from reform being invested in the creation of large public bodies with their own management structures and support functions.

4. Complaints and investigations

4.1 We acknowledge the decision to introduce the post of Police Investigation and Review Commissioner (PIRC). We are concerned, however, that there is insufficient time available to implement this change prior to the establishment of the Police Service of Scotland.

4.2 Indeed, whilst we support the establishment of a PIRC, we should wish to be provided with greater clarity in respect of the investigation protocols, particularly as they apply to 'investigations of other matters in the public interest' as outlined at section 63 (d). In our opinion, this section, as worded, may enable a PIRC to embark on an investigation of their choosing in their subjective interpretation of public interest.

4.3 Similarly, in our opinion, the provisions of Section 70 as they relate to complaints about the PIRC do not provide an acceptable level of scrutiny in that the post holder in effect oversees the procedure to be adopted in respect of any complaint about their own department. In our view the role of the Public Service Complaints Ombudsman must be clearly stipulated within this section.

4.4 We note the development of the role of the PIRC and that it will require significant investment to fulfil the expanded role described in the Bill. We hope the PIRC will operate in a proportionate, accountable and transparent manner and be conscious of not disrupting ongoing operations.

5. Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland

5.1 Similarly, we believe that the role of Her Majesty’s Inspector of Constabulary in Scotland (HMICS) requires greater clarity. In our opinion, the individual holding this post must not only be independent of both the police service and the government but clearly seen to be so. This will require an alteration to current practice and the identification of new office premises out with St Andrew’s House.

5.2 The HMICS must provide an alternative voice to that of the Chief Constable in matters of policing policy and practice and oversee the decisions and scrutiny provided by the Police Authority. Most importantly, the HMICS must be able to ensure that there is no misuse of the ministerial power to direct the authority.

5.3 In addition, HMICS must establish inspection protocols that ensure a consistent approach across Scotland in terms of policy implementation and best value. This should ensure a consistency of approach to local authority relations.

6. Terms and conditions of service

6.1 ASPS should wish to express serious concern about certain provisions which appear to enable the removal or addition of ranks below Assistant Chief Constable and achieve officer savings by “adopting a standard span of control ratio” as part of the reform programme. Moreover, the Bill also appears to introduce the power to demote constables in rank other than for misconduct, discipline or individual inefficiency (for which we believe there is sufficient legislation available at present) and to make new regulations for constables to “hold and vacate office”.

6.2 When these provisions are combined with the duty on Best Value on both the Chief Constable and the Scottish Police Authority, financial and political expediency may result in the introduction of regulations which might require constables to exit the police service at any point in time by virtue of the open ended nature of Section 49 of the Bill.

6.3 Such an action would introduce severe uncertainty to the service, reduce the attractiveness of serving as a constable and leave individuals exposed to financial and political pressures which may adversely impact on the way in which they impartially execute their duty. Whilst police constables are currently neither subject to employment law nor subject to the prospect of redundancy, they do operate in a uniquely difficult environment. They face significant personal hazards, restrictions on their personal life and severe penalties for failure to perform their duty. The PM indicates that the policy intention of the Bill is to make “prosecution easier”. In this respect, ASPS would seek to identify the gap in current provisions that this change in penalty is seeking to close.

6.4 Indeed, it is our view that Sections 11, 12 and 49 of the Bill create unnecessary uncertainty and signals an intent that has not thus far been reflected in conversations with the Cabinet Secretary for Justice. This is unhelpful and may serve demotivate a committed and highly performing workforce.

6.5 At this time, it is difficult to assess the impact that police reform will have on our members but it is likely that the roles that we adopt will broaden and deepen as responsibilities increase and our numbers decrease as part of “management delayering”. We believe though that command resilience must be maintained in order to protect our communities and the welfare of our members. We do not believe in “a one size fits all” approach to span of command. We believe that re-structuring can be achieved through appropriate succession planning and the exercise of professional judgement and restraint by the Chief Constable.

6.6 We hold the office of constable. We execute a duty and uphold the law fairly, impartially and without favour. Therefore no individual may direct a police constable to act other than in accordance with the terms of the law. Moreover, we accept limitations and restrictions on our personal life to ensure our impartiality and in exchange are compensated by specific terms and conditions. We regard Sections 11, 12 and 49 as representing a serious undermining of the safeguards of the office of constable and not in our members or the wider public interest.

7. Other issues

7.1 ASPS wish to underline our concern at the proposed dissolution of the Police Advisory Board for Scotland without any alternative body having been identified to undertake the role and responsibilities that presently sit within that structure.
Consequently, we believe that further consideration of this role is required before Section 94 is implemented.

7.2 We also wish to highlight the contents of Section 20 of the Bill which outlines the general duties of Constables. We deeply regret the decision to remove the symbolic wording of the 1967 Act ‘guard, patrol and watch’ and would seek that phrase re-instated. It is our belief that these functions remain as relevant today as they were in 1967 and provide every constable in Scotland with a basis for performing their duty.

7.3 Furthermore, the penalty in respect of a constable who neglects or violates their duty contained within section 22 (3) is, in our opinion, wholly disproportionate. Indeed, we would argue that sufficient powers are provided at common law and would therefore question the need for this statutory provision.

7.4 Finally, we have always connected police reform with a wider public sector reform programme. The emphasis on prevention - a key pillar of public sector reform - is perhaps not as evident in the Bill as we might expect, receiving only two explicit references. We should also wish to have the provisions of the Christie and McClelland reports considered as key pillars of reform as progress is made.

CHAPTER 10: POLICE INVESTIGATION AND REVIEW COMMISSIONER

Introduction

This additional submission arises from our concerns over the detail of Chapter 10 of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill SP8 (as introduced) and the timing of its implementation in relation to capability and capacity of the new Police Investigation and Review Commissioner (PIRC).

Independent Investigation and Review

ASPS fully understand and support the public interest requirement for an independent body to be able to investigate and review police conduct. Effective action by the PIRC is essential to maintain confidence in policing as well as in the new Independent Investigation and Review Service.

Capability, Capacity and Timing

While the most serious of incidents that the PIRC will be involved in are very rare in Scotland, the PIRC will need to have full capability and capacity to fulfil its statutory function from the same date that the Police Service of Scotland (PSOS) becomes operational. In order to meet this statutory duty the PIRC is likely to require sufficient appropriately qualified, skilled and experienced resources. Some of the particularly sensitive and specialised capability that may be required to conduct investigations into the most serious cases is currently only available within law enforcement organisations across the UK.

Recent events involving the Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC) and the Metropolitan Police in the case of Mark Duggan indicate that when dealing with the most serious of complaints, issues do arise. We are keen that the detail of how PSOS and PIRC interact, are established and understood in time for both organisations becoming operational. This requires guidance and protocols to be agreed, produced, staff trained and arrangements implemented. We are concerned that unless the PSOS Chief Constable and the Chief Officer Team are in place as early as possible, the detail will not be agreed and suitable arrangements will not be in place in time. We would urge the Justice Committee to satisfy itself that not only is the Chief Constable and the Chief Officer Team in place as early as possible but that the PIRC is also in place and operationally effective for Day1.

Primacy – Lord Advocate and PIRC

Some clarity may be required in the Bill as to primacy in relation to authorising the instigation of investigation into “serious incidents involving the police”. The wording of the Bill could be clearer to confirm that the PIRC may only conduct such investigations when directed to do so under Section 33A (1), (b). The current structure of the Bill is such that it is unclear if such investigations can only be carried out when directed by the “appropriate prosecutor under the 2006 Act under Section 33A (1), (b) (I) (person serving may have committed a serious offence) or (II) (death of person serving with the police) or if the PIRC can unilaterally decide to investigate “serious incidents involving the police”, under Section 41B of the 2006 Act.

These “serious incidents” under Section 41B, may include circumstances that might be a matter for consideration by the Procurator Fiscal in the first instance as there may well be a need to consider and eliminate that a “person serving with the police may have committed a serious offence” under Section 33A (1), (b) (II) (death of person serving with the police).

Section 41B appears to cover situations whereby a person may have died following contact with police. This may include circumstances that might amount to a person serving with the police who may have committed a serious criminal offence and as such the “appropriate prosecutor” may wish to direct the PIRC in such circumstances.

Defining Public Interest and Decisions to Initiate Public Interest Investigations

Section 63 of the Bill amends the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice Act 2006 Section 33, by inserting Section 33A regarding the general functions of the Commissioner. Section 33A, (d) empowers the PIRC to investigate “other matters” relating to the Authority or the Police Service where the Commissioner considers that it would be in the public interest to do so.

Section 66 of the Bill (Investigations of other matters in the public interest) empowers the Commissioner to investigate “any relevant matter”. The term “any relevant police matter” can be interpreted very widely and there is a risk that it may be so interpreted by the PIRC. We are concerned that the wording of this section empowers the PIRC to conduct investigations without limit. Consequently significant time, resource and cost is likely to be devoted to investigations arising as a result of a wide interpretation of “public interest”. This may have an unintended consequence for effective and efficient operational policing both in terms of disruption to operations, the effort required and in changing police culture to be increasingly risk averse.

The probability of the police service becoming increasingly risk averse is very real when considering the implications for individuals at Sections 11 (add, remove, demote rank), 12 (hold and vacate office), 14 (senior officer retirement for efficiency and effectiveness) 23 (4) (a) (5 years imprisonment for failure to perform duty) and 49 (introduction of any regulation).

When taken as a whole the working environment proposed under the Bill for police officers is being radically changed. With the potential of a wide interpretation of “public interest” by PIRC this will place an additional factor on police decision-making and may impact adversely through greater risk aversion in working practices.

We do understand the need for public interest investigations but would encourage the Justice Committee to question whether it is appropriate to invest such significant power to commence such investigations in one person. We would encourage the exploration of alternative models to ensure that democratic and ECHR compliant principles are included when determining public interest investigations.

We would also encourage the Justice Committee to satisfy itself that the PIRC will be sufficiently open, transparent, proportionate and accountable in its operations and as such progressed through the legislative processes of the Bill.

We do note the constraints on investigations available to the Scottish Ministers by Regulations they might make in relation to section 33A, (1), (c) or (d) under Section 67 of the Bill by inserting Section 41 D in the 2006 Act, which enables intervention by the Scottish Ministers. While we hope that the circumstances that would require Scottish Ministers to make such Regulations to intervene in these matters would be rare, we believe that the probability of such a requirement for Ministerial intervention could be reduced, by considering alternative arrangements for making decisions on “public interest” investigations by perhaps a “Public Interest Investigation Panel” or other such arrangements.

Costs

Given the extensive function of the PIRC, we would also suggest the Justice Committee may wish to examine closely the financial assumptions made for establishing the PIRC. The 2011/12 budget for the Police Complaints Commissioner Scotland was £930K and the cost of the new arrangements is estimated at £2m to £4m. As these costs are currently being incurred by police forces in Scotland, it is assumed that introducing the PIRC will be cost neutral, with transition costs of circa £80 to £122K and £50K to £76.5K. While we lack access to the detailed costings associated with current investigations, for the scope of investigations that the PIRC will be undertaking in the future, intuitively, the estimates do seem somewhat low.

Complaints Against the PIRC

As police officers we fully understand that our role in society will frequently place us in conflict with individuals and groups as we execute our duty. It is quite right that complaints can be made, investigations undertaken and reviewed. However, we feel that the vague nature of Section 70 of the Bill does a disservice to those people that are required to uphold and enforce the law and who, by their action or inaction can be subject of complaint, investigation and face severe sanctions.

We need clarity on how complaints against the PIRC can be addressed not only in relation to complaints by a member of the public but as a point of fairness where a serving member of PSOS has legitimate concerns regarding the conduct of the PIRC or a member of the PIRC staff. While the Police Appeals Tribunal may consider appeals against the findings of the PIRC, there does not appear to be any complaint process available to a person subject of a complaint investigation by the PIRC. In our view the role of the Public Service Complaints Ombudsman must be clearly stipulated within this section.

2 Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, Explanatory Notes, Pages 17-18

Intrusive Surveillance

We note the provision under Schedule 6, Part 1 to enable the PIRC to authorise and conduct intrusive surveillance operations under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000. The Police Service uses this power carefully and has checks and balances in place to ensure it is proportionate and minimises collateral intrusion. Given our concerns over capability, capacity and timing we would encourage the Justice Committee to satisfy itself that appropriate safeguards are in place for the PIRC from April 2013 and that it has access to appropriately trained and qualified resources to implement and handle intrusive surveillance.

Workplace Accountability and Criminal Accountability

We would encourage the Justice Committee to consider the Bill and the provisions relating to the PIRC in a broad policing context. We are of the view that there is a risk of the PIRC taking too strong an interest in workplace accountability. We understand the need for the PIRC to address issues where the public have expressed a concern at police action and are dissatisfied with the outcome of complaint investigations; however a balance needs to be struck to enable the police service to function effectively and maintain internal discipline on a daily basis.

The role of the Deputy Chief Constable in relation to efficiency and misconduct is appropriate to deal with matters that do not amount to serious criminality or serious misconduct requiring external involvement.

Policing is complex at the best of times. When dealing with members of the public who are non-compliant, under the influence of drink or drugs, mentally ill or having experienced a sudden bereavement or are in crisis, it can be particularly difficult. As a Service we expect and demand high standards of conduct. At the same time it is recognised that officers face a range of challenging incidents, some of which can have a major affect on their health and welfare. For these reasons Forces provide training, support and occupational welfare arrangements.

As police officers we exercise our professional judgment constantly. We do this by applying our training, knowledge, experience and our values. We also exercise discretion. This can mean that sometimes we take action and sometimes we do not. This can be a cause for complaints against police particularly when individuals misconstrue the reasons for an officer’s action or inaction. Policing accountability has to take a range of factors into consideration as is shown in this example and for this reason, we are disappointed and somewhat confused at the penalty of 5 years imprisonment for “failure to perform duty” introduced at Section 22, (4), (a). Indeed this seems extremely harsh treatment for an officer subject to misconduct proceedings. The Policy Memorandum indicates that the policy intention is to make prosecutions easier. We are very disappointed at the inference that the Scottish Government is of the view that there is a need to make prosecution of police constables easier and would ask for clarification of the problem that this legislative change is trying to address.

The Bill appears to seek to erode the status of the office of constable whilst at the same time increasing the penalty for “violating” the office of constable by increasing from summary proceeding levels under the 1967 Act, to 5 years imprisonment in this Bill. We struggle to understand the validity for seeking this extreme change.

We are particularly concerned that the independence of police constables to act impartially, without fear or favour in the discharge of their office, will be compromised by this Section of the Bill

In Conclusion

ASPS does not dispute the requirement for a PIRC however we do have concerns that:

- the reach of the PIRC may be too far;
- it may result in increasingly risk averse policing and increased costs; and
- it may ultimately be unable to function effectively within the set timescales unless the Chief Constable and the senior management team as well as the PIRC and their staff are in place with key protocols agreed and implemented by April 2013.

We have real concerns about “public interest investigations” and their affect on operational policing and feel strongly that with the introduction of these measures there is potential for instilling a risk-averse culture in the PSOS.

Finally, we are concerned about the fairness of the proposed method of dealing with complaints against the PIRC. There must be included within its terms of reference and Policy Memorandum a clearly defined procedure to address this shortfall in the current Bill including a role for the Public Service Complaints Ombudsman.

Chief Superintendent David O’ Connor
President, Association of Scottish Police Superintendents
14 March 2012
Introduction

1. The creation of a single police service in Scotland will be one of the most significant changes in the Scottish public sector since devolution. In my submission I concentrate on the proposed arrangements for governance and accountability. In my opinion, the Scottish Parliament should have a much greater role in providing democratic oversight of the new national force than is currently proposed. It is also important to ensure there are proper arrangements for governance and control during the transition process.

Governance and accountability

2. Two principles have underpinned how policing works in Scotland. The first is the tripartite model of governance, where responsibility for policing is shared between the chief constable, Scottish Ministers and locally elected councillors. Secondly, there is the principle of policing by consent. In other words the police must have the support of the public to work effectively.

3. Public trust in policing, as in any other public service, is hard won over a long period. From my work as Auditor General it has become clear to me that effective democratic accountability, good governance and independent audit and inspection are necessary for building confidence in public services and ensuring they are delivered efficiently and effectively.

4. The police service has a unique role in maintaining and upholding the law and ensuring public safety, and has the power to remove an individual’s liberty. It is therefore of vital importance to ensure there are effective arrangements for the democratic oversight of the police service in Scotland.

5. The creation of a single Scottish police service as a central government body will change the democratic tripartite framework under which policing has traditionally operated. In my view it is therefore essential that the legislation establishes a formal mechanism to give the Scottish Parliament, as the democratic forum covering the whole of Scotland, a major role in ensuring there is open, participative and transparent oversight of policing in Scotland.

6. With the creation of a national police service, we cannot risk losing the long-established important connection between the police and the people of Scotland whom they serve and protect. It is of the first importance that there is open public debate on, for example, the strategic police plan and the performance of the Scottish Police Authority, HMICS and the new Police Investigations and Review Commissioner. The operational independence of the chief constable must be preserved and protected, but the police service must also be open to democratic scrutiny.
The Scottish Parliament is designed to operate in a way which promotes and enhances the democratic process. Parliamentary debates and committee meetings are open to the public; they are televised and official reports of the proceedings are produced. Everything is on record. This is why the legislation must, in my view, be amended to set in statute a clearly defined role for Parliament in the oversight of the new national police service.

It is for the Scottish Parliament to determine the most appropriate mechanism to achieve this oversight. There are various possibilities which I would invite the Committee to consider.

- A new mandatory committee of the Scottish Parliament could be established with a clearly defined responsibility for the oversight of policing matters in Scotland. Mandatory committees, such as the Public Audit Committee or the Standards procedures and Public Appointments Committee, operate under rules agreed by Parliament (Standing Orders). They must not be concerned with policy but have a clear role which, in the case of the Public Audit Committee, involves holding the Scottish Government to account;

- Additional responsibilities could be given to the current Justice Committee of the Parliament. However the Justice Committee has a key role in the consideration of policy matters relating to the whole justice sector and the scrutiny of proposed legislation. Experience has shown that this committee has a heavy workload; indeed, in the first Parliament there were two justice committees;

- A parliamentary commission for policing in Scotland might be created. There are some parallels here with the Scottish Commission for Public Audit, which was put in place by Parliament to safeguard the independence of the audit function. The Commission has proved to be an effective accountability arrangement which preserves the independence of the office of the Auditor General while ensuring public scrutiny of the efficiency and effectiveness of Audit Scotland.

Proposed arrangements for the SPA board

I support the proposal in the Bill that all members of the SPA board will be appointed through the public appointments process. It is very important to recognise the distinction between a board which has a governance function with responsibility for scrutinising performance and holding management to account and a board which is representative and operates in an advisory capacity. The board of SPA will have to ensure the highest standards of governance and management in relation to policing in Scotland, and must be structured in such a way that enables it to fulfil this function effectively.

My report to Parliament in October 2010 on the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) found that the composition of SPSA board (which was structured to reflect the local governance arrangements for policing) created tensions in the competing roles and duties of some of its members.¹

11. The policy memorandum recognises the importance of board members having the skills and expertise relevant to the functions of the authority. Members of the SPA must have the appropriate skills and experience to enable them to fulfil their role effectively in relation to all areas of policing, including specialist and sensitive operational areas. My report of October 2010 to Parliament on the role of boards found that the successful operation of a board depends on the skills and expertise the members and on how well they work together.\(^2\)

12. SPA board members will also require access to independent expert advice on policing and related matters. For example, the Northern Ireland Policing Board directly employs about 50 staff to ensure there is effective oversight of the Northern Ireland Police Service. The Police Service of Scotland will be the second biggest police force in the UK and it should have the resources and expertise available to enable it to fulfil its role.

Role of the Accountable Officer

13. Accountable officers are an essential part of the governance structure of all central government bodies. They are appointed by the Permanent Secretary and are personally answerable to Ministers and to the Scottish Parliament for both the propriety and regularity of an organisation’s finances and for the economical, efficient and effective use of the resources placed at their disposal. Their roles and responsibilities are laid out in the Scottish Public Finance Manual.

14. In my view, the structures proposed in the Bill will require two Accountable Officers for the SPA, one to be accountable for the expenditure under the control of the chief constable, and one for the expenditure under the direct control of the SPA (the forensics service and the SPA executive and support). Given the need to preserve the operational independence of the chief constable, it would not be appropriate for the Permanent Secretary as the most senior civil servant in the Scottish Government to appoint the chief constable as the Accountable Officer for the Police Service of Scotland (PSS). I would suggest that the legislation should clearly specify that the chief constable will be the Accountable Officer for the Police Service of Scotland.

Matters relating to democratic scrutiny

15. It is extremely important to ensure both national and local democratic scrutiny of policing in Scotland. My suggestion that there could be a new mandatory committee or a parliamentary commission on Scottish policing could provide a national dimension for democratic scrutiny, since the committee or commission would consist of MSPs. Parliament might wish to consider whether the committee or the commission might put in place arrangements for a dialogue with local councillors in order to reflect the important local dimension of policing. With a mandatory committee or a parliamentary commission, it would be easier to ensure (a) effective governance of policing by the SPA and (b) democratic scrutiny by representatives of civil society at both national and local levels.

\(^{2}\) Role of boards, Audit Scotland, September 2010
16. A vital element of local accountability will also be achieved by the provisions in the Bill for local policing plans to be considered by local authorities. In addition, the SPA board could establish its own mechanisms for engaging with local communities and elected councillors. A further support for local accountability will be provided by the Auditor General and HMICS who will be reviewing together whether the SPA is achieving Best Value, an essential element of which is effective community engagement.

17. I welcome the responsibilities to be given to the Auditor General in relation to auditing the economy, efficiency and effectiveness and reviewing Best Value in both the SPA and the PSS. I also welcome the proposed creation of a Police Investigations and Review Commissioner with independent powers to investigate relevant police matters in the public interest.

18. The Committee may wish to explore whether HMICS should be established as a corporate body, which would give the chief inspector the ability to employ staff to undertake inspection activities. Whatever arrangements are put in place for staffing the inspectorate, they must be designed to ensure public trust and confidence in the independence and impartiality of HMICS.

Supporting the process of change

19. While not directly relevant to the proposed legislation, I would like to conclude my evidence with reference to how the transition from the existing arrangements to a single police force should be managed.

20. It is essential that the Government, together with existing police forces and boards, ensures that (a) there are clear governance arrangements for decisions relating to the formation of the new service, with proper audit trails in place, and (b) there is minimum disruption to existing services during the transition phase.

21. My report on the Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) found that SPSA’s early development was hampered by a lack of clarity on how it was to deliver its long term benefits. This was compounded by poor information about the services transferred, the resource requirements to deliver those services and leadership problems. Appendix 2 of that report lists some questions that the Scottish Government and public bodies should consider when planning shared services initiatives. Many of these questions are relevant to the formation of the SPA and Police Service of Scotland and I recommend that consideration is given to them.

22. The on-going oversight role of existing joint boards and committees will be important during the transition phase. These bodies must ensure that there is proper governance and control in relation to decisions on how resources are used over the following months. The Accounts Commission is recognising this in their findings on the on-going programme of Best Value audits on police currently being undertaken by Audit Scotland and HMICS.

23. It will be important to appoint the SPA convener, some members of the SPSA, and the chief constable as soon as possible after passage of the legislation, to provide clear leadership in planning for the new system and through the transition process. The Government has announced that, subject to Parliamentary approval of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, the new police and fire services are expected to be established on April 1, 2013. This is a very tight timetable for such a significant change.

24. It will be essential that on the appointed day when the legislation takes effect, all the new bodies operate as one policing system in Scotland. This will require a clear strategic plan of action and a culture of openness, cooperation and mutual understanding.

Fire reform

25. The Bill also includes proposed legislation to create a single fire service for Scotland (SFRS). In my view, this is, relatively speaking, a more straightforward process. The remit of the service has already been clearly defined through the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. The move to a single service can therefore be compared to the creation of other NDPBs.

26. I would, however, emphasise that the points I have made above in relation to the process of transition are equally valid for fire reform. In addition, I endorse the proposals in the Bill for the board of the SFRS to be appointed through the public appointments process and welcome the responsibilities given to the Auditor General in relation to auditing the economy, efficiency and effectiveness and reviewing Best Value in the new service.

Robert W Black
Auditor General for Scotland
February 2012
Thank you for your invitation to provide additional evidence to the Justice Committee following my evidence session on 6th March. My main purpose in writing is to inform the Committee about some of the early messages which are likely to be in Audit Scotland’s forthcoming report arising from the performance audit of mergers in Scotland’s public sector. These may be relevant and useful to your consideration of police and fire reform.

I shall also take the opportunity to provide further information in response to the question from Mr Roderick Campbell.

Early emerging findings from the Audit Scotland performance audit on mergers

The report on public sector mergers was timed to help inform future mergers, and is therefore due to be published in June. However, given that the findings might assist the Committee’s consideration of police and fire reform, I am taking the unusual step of informing you of some of the emerging messages. The audit work has only recently been completed, so I would emphasise we are still finalising the content.

The audit team has identified that the most significant factor in creating a successful merger is good early leadership. When leadership teams were in place from early in the process and remained stable, the mergers worked well. The absence of such a team could mean that difficult decisions were deferred and that the vision and strategic objectives for the new organisation were not well developed.

The Scottish Government often establishes ‘programme boards’ to manage the process, and these tend to focus on ensuring that mergers happen on time, and that stakeholders are involved. However, this can mean that the important work of creating the vision for the new organisation and designing its structure, strategic objectives and early priorities for action receive less attention. This work has not always been done early enough to benefit the new organisation and ensure its full operational effectiveness from day one.

Given the strength of the evidence supporting this emerging finding, and the importance of ensuring the new Police Service of Scotland and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service are given the best possible start, I would like to suggest that the Committee might give further consideration as to how the early appointments of the first post-holders might be achieved. I wonder whether, for example, the Committee could suggest that the Bill be amended to include a clause providing for the first appointments of the conveners of the Scottish Police Authority, and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service, the chief constable and the senior fire officer to be made by Parliament, with the possible involvement of the Crown Office in the case of the police appointments, and with the agreement of the Cabinet Secretary for Justice.
SPA Board

I was asked by Mr Campbell to give some examples of how the SPA board could establish its own mechanisms for engaging with local communities. I stressed in my answer the importance of members of the SPA board getting a good understanding of the real and proper concerns of local communities in relation to policing. Local circumstances of individual council areas vary enormously, and the SPA board as well as the local commanders need to be aware of the differing local priorities. However, local communities also need to be aware of national priorities and the resources available both nationally and locally, hence the importance of a dialogue between the SPA and local communities.

How the SPA chooses to do this will, of course, be for the board to decide. However, there are a number of ways board members could promote and encourage such a dialogue. For example, board meetings could be held in different parts of the country, board members could have skills or expertise in a specific aspect of policing (for example, antisocial behaviour) and engage with councils where this is a local priority, or board members could attend local meetings where police performance was being considered. The chief constable will also of course be in constant dialogue with the local commanders and can inform the board members of relevant issues that may arise at a local level.

However the SPA board chooses to engage with local communities, I remain of the view that the board should be one of governance rather than representation, with board members having appropriate skills and expertise to effectively hold the chief constable to account for the performance of the Police Service of Scotland. I have given examples to the Committee of the tensions that could be created if any other membership structure was selected.

Parliamentary scrutiny

Finally, I would like to mention again the view which I offered in both my original submission and in the evidence session that the Scottish Parliament should be seen as having the central role in ensuring there is a mechanism for open, transparent and democratic scrutiny of the new Scottish Police Authority and Police Service of Scotland. I recognise that the Justice Committee has a heavy workload, and indeed I mentioned the pressures of that workload in my written submission. I would suggest that this adds weight to my thought that the Bill might include a specific mechanism for ensuring Parliamentary scrutiny of the SPA and the Police Service of Scotland.

I would be happy to provide further information if this would be of assistance to the Committee.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from David Baldwin

I wholeheartedly accept the need to rationalise our Policy and Fire Services and feel that the Scottish Government's proposals are a step in the right direction. I do, however, feel that it is imperative that local input and control is retained and that the current power of local Police Boards etc. and their overseeing function is not diluted any way. I am no expert on legislation or the inner workings of the police or fire services, but I would hope that those who are will take local accountability seriously and that its needs are fully reflected in the bill which eventually receives royal assent.

On a separate matter, I would very much hope that both the Parliament and Government amend the bill so that the names of The Scottish Policy authority, the Police Service of Scotland and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service are included in English and Gaelic, as is the case for Creative Scotland. It is vital that new, nationwide bodies such as these embrace the Gaelic Language Act and the increasing place that Gaelic has in wider Scottish Society. I would expect branding for both of these new bodies to afford equal weight to Gaelic and English, including vehicle branding.

I also wholeheartedly support the location of the new service HQs outwith Edinburgh or Glasgow. It is important that all of Scotland benefits from the jobs and status that HQs bring. Tulliallan may be a good choice for the new police force, however a city like Inverness would be an excellent choice for the fire service HQ and would demonstrate the Government’s commitment to spreading the benefits for public jobs and services throughout Scotland.

I trust that my points will be taken into consideration.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Black and Ethnic Minority Infrastructure in Scotland

Background to BEMIS

BEMIS is the national Ethnic Minorities led umbrella body supporting the development of the Ethnic Minorities Voluntary Sector in Scotland. BEMIS was established in 2002 to promote the interest of minority ethnic voluntary organisations, develop capacity and support inclusion and integration of ethnic minorities’ communities. It is a member-led and managed organisation with an elected board of directors.

The major aims and objectives of BEMIS are to represent and support the development of the ethnic minority voluntary sector across Scotland, and to support the diverse communities and individuals that this sector represents, especially those who are under-represented and disadvantaged. BEMIS aims to address inequalities by empowering communities, working towards an inclusive society by establishing structures, which recognise diversity and empowers ethnic minorities, and ensuring that they are fully recognised and supported as a valued part of the Scottish multicultural civic society.

This submission reflects the position and views of BEMIS as has been provided to the Scottish Government in response to this legislative proposal.

BEMIS welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the consultation on the future shape of our Police, Fire & Rescue Services and has formulated this response in relation to the Equality Impact Statement contained as part of the Scottish Government consultation document and in particular question 27.

BEMIS welcomes the efforts the Government has made in relation to carrying out an EQIA on this legislative proposal.

However it is disappointing that only a partial EQIA has been carried out on such a major change to the way these services are delivered. We would welcome a commitment from the Government that it will undertake a full EQIA review of the Act which emerges from the consultation and subsequent Parliamentary scrutiny within twelve months of it having received Royal Assent. Bemis also believes that it is critical that such a review be carried out in the context of the Equality ACT 2010 and the general and specific public duties contained within the Act.

BEMIS believes that such a major structural change will almost inevitably have an impact on the relationship that Scotland’s cultural and ethnic minorities have with the Police, Fire & Rescue Services. Local community links that have been forged through no small effort by both sides may well see changes in personnel, contacts and procedures. This in turn could lead to deterioration in community relations as other priorities take over during the structural change that must follow implementation of the proposed Act.

BEMIS is concerned that one of the areas to which less attention may be given during any transition period is the issue of both ongoing staff training and, not withstanding the fact that these are substantially operational matters, we believe that it is incumbent upon us to raise these matters during the consultation process. In particular we seek responses and assurances from the Scottish Parliament in relation to the following:

What kind of training will be provided to Family Liaison Officers in relation to intercultural matters? Isolating cultures in the training might be a dry and often risky way of going about it – and, of course, it is virtually impossible to ‘cover’ all different groups and culture throughout the training.

How much updating of intercultural communication training which enables officers to learn about the ways in which to relate to other cultures, to engage in communication beyond language and to also look at approach, behavior, will take place.

What detailed training in the Equality Act and the public duties (specifically what is direct and indirect unlawful discrimination in the Equalities and human rights acts) will be provided to FLOs and all other police officers. ACPOS officers acknowledged that equalities training was poor in regards to the current laws, but that scenarios training did occur routinely.

How will the issue of contracting and provision of interpreters be addressed. What safeguards will be put in place to ensure the professionalism and qualifications in this field. Translation and Interpreting has to go along with cultural awareness, ethical behavior and training in matters of health, victimology, etc.

Will the FLO handbook be rewritten to reflect changing patterns of culture and ethnicity in Scotland as part of any re-structuring of the services. The current handbook was written partly in response to the McPherson (Stephen Lawrence) and Jandoo (Surjit Singh Chhokar) inquiry recommendations.¹

¹ Lawrence identified the need to improve the poor levels of communication of relevant information between families and police investigators
Jandoo identified the need to improve the poor levels of communication of relevant information between the COPFS and police
McPherson found that police investigators rode roughshod over the family, often ignored their wishes and failed to inform them of progress – including arrest of suspects
There was no dedicated officer exclusively or primarily responsible for communicating with the family
There was a lack of continuity in who was telling information and what was told to family
There was no formalised FLO training and FLO’s were usually involved actively in the investigation in contradiction to their role
Is it intended, following restructuring, that a definitive programme at Tulliallan Academy of training for officers will be established.

Will such a unified training programme recognize the need for cultural and social sensitivity in the matters of equalities, language barriers, burial and information.

We would also recommend that knowledge of the equalities laws are written into the training manual and form part of the training for all officers.

Written submission from British Transport Police and British Transport Police Authority

This is a formal response by the British Transport Police ("the BTP") and the British Transport Police Authority ("BTPA") to the Justice Committee of the Scottish Parliament ("the Committee") call for evidence in relation to the Police & Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill 2012 ("the Bill").

The fundamental purpose of the Bill is to amalgamate the existing eight Scottish police forces into one force to be known as the Police Service of Scotland ("PSS").

BTP and BTPA have a number of concerns in relation to certain aspects of the Bill which may impact on their ability to discharge their duties and wider functions in Scotland. Those concerns are noted below.

In this response, references to a provision of or effect of the Bill are (save as expressly stated) to the terms of the Bill as introduced to the Scottish Parliament and as if the Bill were enacted in those terms.

History of BTP and BTPA

BTP is a national police force in Great Britain. That fact and the specialist nature of its policing activities, being focused upon railways and railway facilities and certain tram schemes make BTP a unique and specialist police force.

General provision was first made in 1858 for the appointment of constables to police the construction of canals and railways. Therefore, railway policing has been distinct from general policing arrangements throughout Great Britain for over 150 years.

The current legal basis for BTP’s existence is Section 20 of the Railways & Transport Safety Act 2003 ("the 2003 Act") which came into force on 1 July 2004. The 2003 Act at Section 31 gives BTP jurisdiction on the railway and purposes connected to, occurring on or in relation to a railway in Great Britain.

BTPA was established under Section 18 of the 2003 Act and is, by virtue of Section 20 of the 2003 Act, under a statutory obligation to secure the maintenance of an efficient and effective police force (a) to be known as the British Transport Police Force, and (b) to police the railways. The Authority is also under a statutory duty to defray the expenses of BTP.

Scotland Act

BTP understands that as rail transport safety is a reserved matter by virtue of Section E (II) of Schedule 5 to the Scotland Act 1998 ("the 1998 Act"), it may be that a Section 104 Order under the 1998 Act may be required.
An Act of the Scottish Parliament may require consequential provision to be made to the law relating to reserved matters or the law elsewhere in the UK. The legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament to make such consequential provision is extremely limited. Section 104 of the 1998 Act enables Her Majesty or a Minister of the Crown by subordinate legislation to make provision which is considered necessary or expedient in consequence of any provision made by or under an Act of the Scottish Parliament or by subordinate legislation.

BTP and BTPA concerns

Issue 1: Temporary Service and New Oath

The Bill will, by virtue of Section 10, introduce a new oath which all PSS officers will be required to take before a Sheriff or Justice of the Peace. The Bill states that any officer (which would include an officer of the BTP) engaged in “temporary service” with the PSS must take the new oath. Section 15 of the Bill which makes provision for “temporary service” with the PSS, does not define “temporary service” nor is such defined elsewhere in the Bill.

BTP and BTPA are not clear on the implications this would have for their officers, for example officers of BTP Public Order Units based in England who may be called upon at short notice to render assistance to PSS officers. This is currently a regular occurrence with the Scottish forces. BTP are thus concerned about the lack of clarity regarding “temporary service” and how this will impact on their operations.

BTP and BTPA request that the Committee seeks clarification from the Scottish Government as to the intended meaning of “temporary service” and that the Bill is amended so that it is clear in exactly what circumstances a BTP constable will be considered to be engaged in “temporary service” with the PSS and required to take the new oath.

This issue is linked closely to issue 2 outlined below in relation to mutual aid and collaboration arrangements.

Section 24(4) of the 2003 Act currently refers to constables of the BTP in Scotland taking the oath provided for in Section 16 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 (“the 1967 Act”). Similarly, Section 25(4) of the 2003 Act refers to Special Constables of BTP taking the oath referred to in Section 16 of the 1967 Act. Section 16 of the 1967 Act will be repealed by the Bill.

BTP and BTPA would welcome clarification as to whether or not all BTP constables in Scotland (and not just officers engaged in “temporary service”) will be required to take the new oath in the Bill. The wording of the oath is different to the wording of the oath currently taken by BTP officers and thus may have implications for BTP officers engaged in “temporary service”.

It seems to BTP and BTPA that an amendment of the 2003 Act will be necessary to give effect to the Bill’s provision in relation to oaths to be taken by BTP constables/special constables.
Issue 2: Lack of Provisions re Mutual Aid and Collaboration

The Bill will repeal the existing mutual aid and collaboration provisions in the 1967 Act and (assuming a Section 104 Order is made) the 2003 Act.

The Bill does not cover how mutual aid and collaboration between BTP and PSS are to be provided for in the future. Otherwise it appears that a means of it establishing rules/regulations on mutual aid and collaboration between the PSS and BTP will be repealed. Accordingly, BTP and BTPA wish a formal undertaking from the Scottish Ministers that there will be provision for such, whether by way of a formal amendment to the Bill supplemented by a Section 104 Order or otherwise.

It appears to BTP and BTPA that the drafting of the Bill, being focussed on the amalgamation of Scottish forces, has overlooked the possibility of mutual aid being provided by or to BTP in the future. BTP and BTPA would suggest that existing mutual aid and collaboration provisions be retained subject to substitution of PSS for reference to existing Scottish police forces rather than repealed.

Issue 3: Consequences of amendment to the definition of constable

The Bill will change the definition of “constable” contained in the 1967 Act and in the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”) from “a constable of a police force” to “a constable of the Police Service of Scotland”.

BTP note that in terms of Section 31 of the 2003 Act a constable of BTP, where he has jurisdiction, has all the powers and privileges of a constable. In light of the terms of the Bill, provision will in future fall to be interpreted in Scotland as reference to the powers and privileges of a PSS constable.

The duties of a constable of the PSS are being re-stated in the Bill. As far as BTP and BTPA have been able to determine the duties are largely a restatement of the duties set out in the 1967 Act.

BTP and BTPA wish clarification as to whether the restating of duties will impact on the duties and privileges of a BTP constable and also as to whether or not there will be a definition of “privileges of a constable”. BTP and BTPA are uncertain as to exactly what it is intended a “privilege” includes.

Issue 4: Timing

In so far as a Section 104 Order may be required to amend the 2003 Act in consequences of the enactment of the Bill, BTPA and BTP wish to highlight that the new Act and consequential order should come into force at the same time.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, the CIPFA Directors of Finance Section and the Scottish Local Authorities Chief Internal Auditors Group

CIPFA, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, is the professional body for people in public finance. CIPFA shows the way in public finance globally, standing up for sound public financial management and good governance around the world as the leading commentator on managing and accounting for public money.

CIPFA Local Government Directors of Finance Section is the professional forum which comprises the Section 95 Officers under the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 of all 32 local authorities in Scotland. The Section provides opinions on matters concerning the management and operation of Scottish local government finance and also serves as a learning forum for the exchange of experience and information on these issues.

SLACIAG (Scottish Local Authorities Chief Internal Auditors Group) is the professional networking group for Local Authority Heads of Audit. The purpose of the group is to develop and improve the practice of Internal Audit in Scottish local authorities, police, fire and public transport bodies. It achieves this by meeting to discuss issues of common concern, commissioning work to develop ideas, sharing good practice, working in partnership with other professions/governing bodies and promoting SLACIAG as the representative body for internal audit in public authorities.

1. Introduction

1.1 This submission specifically addresses some of the key financial management foundations which are essential if good corporate governance is to be in place for both the police and fire national boards.

1.2 The Scottish Government expect that savings of £130M each year will be achieved by the proposed reform of both police and fire. The relatively short period of consultation has not allowed us to conduct a detailed examination of the financial benefits claimed within the business cases for reform. Our approach has been to focus upon the risks associated with reform of this scale and we have recommended appropriate measures.

1.3 However, we recognise that the achievement of that level of savings of that magnitude, along with achievement of the wider operational benefits from reform will be of significant public interest. There is a clear role for both the Scottish Parliament

1 Statement by K. MacAskill MSP, Minister for Justice 8th September 2011 and the Auditor General to both validate and to track the realisation of both financial and non-financial benefits claimed by the proposed reform.

1.4 "Financial management is an essential element of good corporate governance and forms part of the firm foundations of an organisation, underpinning service quality and improvement and is the basis of accountability to stakeholders for the stewardship and use of resources."

1.5 We share that view and reform in itself will present a series of risks to the financial management of the outgoing boards as well as to the incoming new bodies. Central to risk mitigation will be the maintenance of a sound control environment. Although, there is no prescribed timetable the 3 distinct risk periods in a hypothetical timescale could be:

- the period prior to reform – 2011/12,
- the ‘shadow’ period – 2012/13; and
- the post-reform/’go-live’ period – 2013/14.

1.6 We have identified actions which should be taken to mitigate the risks. A shadow board can begin to take responsibility for determining the nature and extent of the significant risks that it is willing to take to achieve its strategic objectives. The boards can develop sound risk management and internal controls systems. And clearly, the newly formed boards will take responsibility for the “go-live” risks.

1.7 In the absence however of any shadow period and shadow board, consideration needs to be given to how these risks are managed. Central to the mitigation of risk is the assurance work undertaken by the internal audit function and the need for independent assurance on risk mitigation to those charged with governance.

1.8 The Chief Financial Officer and the work undertaken by the finance function is at the heart of the achievement of world class financial management and we also comment on the role of the Chief financial Officer. We have used some of the recognised themes of world class financial management to structure our categorisation of risks:

- Financial planning;
- Financial monitoring and forecasting; and
- Financial Reporting.
- Financial governance and leadership

1.9 The consultation paper does not provide detail on a transition timetable or on ‘shadow’ period arrangements. A shadow period of operation would allow the new authorities to operate in parallel with the existing bodies while new governance arrangements are embedded and while resources are transferred and acquired.

1.10 Prior to local government reorganisation in 1996, there was a shadow period of one year. There is however evidence that even with a one year shadow period, smooth transition proved to be challenging for local authorities\(^4\).

1.11 We recommend that a shadow period commensurate with the scale of the change should be introduced. The shadow period will be a critical period for the incoming boards with opportunity to design and develop:

- A detailed plan of implementation with clear deadlines and milestones;
- The control environment both nationally and locally;
- Clarity on the extent to which financial management will be devolved;
- Development of internal financial rules both nationally and locally; and
- Appointment of a head of internal audit.

1.12 Finally, we observe that the funding and financial management of police and fire bodies have been inextricably linked to local government finance. It is essential that the scale of the task that will be required to extract police and fire from the current arrangements is not underestimated.

1.13 Throughout the remainder of this submission it will be assumed that there will in fact be an appropriate shadow period and that a detailed plan of implementation will be developed. We further recommend that a clear and prescribed timetable is set to enable the appropriate governance and financial management arrangements to be set out

1.14 We begin our response with some commentary on the broader dimensions of corporate governance

2 CORPORATE GOVERNANCE

Impact Upon Accountability

2.1 We have tested the proposed governance arrangements and have recognised that there are characteristics from two recognised models of governance:

- the policy governance model\(^5\); and
- the constituency/representative model.

2.2 The creation of national boards is consistent with the Carver/Policy Model. The clarity in terms of roles and responsibilities and accountability offered by this model is confused by the proposal within the consultation to create structures within local government for police and fire. The consultation paper indicates a level of discretion on the role of local authorities including whether a specific local authority committee should be formed or whether joint arrangements should be made with other local authorities.

---

\(^4\) Overview Report on 1996/97 and 1997/98 Audits of Local Authorities

\(^5\) Dr John Carver, Policy Governance Model
2.3 Our concern with the proposal is that it will result in ‘abdicating’ behaviour rather than ‘accountable’ behaviour. For example, in the case of police, with a local commander, a local committee as well as the national police authority it could be difficult to recognise where accountability actually lies. The result could be that there is local tension with the national police board for adverse outcomes as a result of resourcing decisions taken by the national police board.

2.4 The proposal could also result in significant duplication. For example, the consultation paper anticipates that the national board and the local structures will be concerned with examining local performance.

Board Membership

2.5 The composition of a recently introduced public body resulted in adverse comment by Audit Scotland and provides useful lessons for the proposed reforms, in particular the proposed membership of each board⁶.

2.6 Given the likely NDPB status of the two new boards we assume that the requirements for a designated accountable officer will be met by the Chief Constable and the Chief Fire Officer. The clear lesson learnt from this recent example is that the accountable officer should be a member of the board and we recommend that the proposed arrangements ensure board membership for the accountable officer.

2.7 We support the use of the Public appointments process to recruit non-executive members to the board but we acknowledge that this would be inappropriate for securing representative members.

2.8 Whilst diversity in board membership is important, this must be balanced against experience and expertise required at the early stages of both the police and fire boards. The capability and capacity of the board must be strong from the outset. The board will be required to make critical decisions which will determine its success. Critical experience and skills in this first round of board member appointment and nomination must be risk and change management. The audit committee will be vital in the early stages and therefore it will be essential to appoint board members with audit committee experience.

2.9 The role of the chair(s) of the boards and their relationships with accountable officers are both critical. We recommend the early appointment of the chair. Appointment of chairs with the required skills and experience of merger and reform will be essential. Membership of boards should include individuals who have been selected because they can display expert credentials and have experience of providing effective independent oversight and scrutiny of services.

The Roles of Management and Governance

2.10 A clear risk in any new governance arrangement is a blurring of the functions of management with the functions of governance. With specific regard to police

⁶ The Scottish Police Services Authority, Audit Scotland (2010)
reform, we note that the forensic service will report to, and be directly accountable to, the police authority and not to the Chief Constable. In practice, this will require the police authority board to take on managerial oversight.

2.11 Audit Scotland also commented on the governance SPSA and its relationship with SCDEA which was effectively independent of the Chief Executive\(^7\). We recommend that the adverse governance comments made by Audit Scotland are addressed and that they are not replicated within the new arrangements.

3. FINANCIAL PLANNING

Prior to Reform

Capital Financial Plans

3.1 Risk: Prior to the start of the new bodies, the existing bodies are likely to be required to continue to operate through up to two financial years. Investment decisions will be taken by these bodies but, will in turn be different from the bodies which will ultimately be responsible for the long term revenue repayment of that investment. The risk is that capital investment is undertaken which results in assets which do not fit with the requirements of the successor board(s). In the current context, this is particularly important given that subsequent revenue consequences will fall to be met by the shadow and successor body.

3.2 Control: One means to alleviate this risk is to require critical review of immediate capital expenditure with any major forward capital investment (other than immediate business critical purchases) deferred until the successor board(s) can have an input into the transaction.

3.3 Risk: The failure to properly manage the transfer of assets is a risk. An essential part of ongoing asset management is the maintenance of comprehensive asset records, usually in the form of an asset register. The recent experience of a new public body\(^8\) evidences the weaknesses in information held on assets used to deliver services.

3.4 Control: Each body will have to ensure that its asset records are capable of transfer (to the shadow body) at a predetermined and coordinated date. We recommend that a clear timetable for finalisation of assets for transfer is agreed.

Revenue Financial Plans

3.5 Risk: The resource allocation for police and fire is currently embedded within the local government finance settlement. The risk is that extraction of police and fire from the local government finance settlement could be protracted. This could be particularly challenging for Fife and Dumfries and Galloway forces where the arrangements are effectively integrated within each local authority.

---

\(^7\) SPSA Audit Scotland Report (2010)

\(^8\) SPSA Report by Audit Scotland (2010)
3.6 Control: There is a need for an early and close working arrangement between the local government directors of finance, COSLA, ACPOS and CFOA to ensure an early focus on the implications.

3.7 Risk: The significant task that is faced in the practical dismantling of the current financial arrangements is brought further into focus when the likely budget timetable and the approach to budgeting are considered. There is a risk that, because of the potentially tight timescale, the first budget of the new boards could merely be an aggregation of historic budget approaches based on historic plans and are not keyed in to the objectives of the new board.

3.8 Control: We recommend that there is a realistic lead-in time and clear timetable for initial budget preparation by the new boards and that consideration is to adopting an outcome approach to budget development

VAT

3.9 Risk: The Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) was introduced in 2007, it was later established that the body was not in fact registered as a VAT exempt body\(^9\). It is understood that this was an oversight of legislative drafting and that there was subsequent financial and administrative consequences to the Scottish Government, the SPSA and to HMRC.

3.10 Examination of the outline business cases indicate that the impact of VAT is being considered and with an estimated annual transfer value of £26M this is a significant matter for early resolution.\(^{10}\)

3.11 Control: We recommend that, prior to commencement of the shadow period, the appropriate direction and confirmation from HMRC is finalised to enable the new police and fire authorities to properly account for VAT and that VAT status is properly reflected in legislation governing the reforms. We would further recommend that the specific asset transfer issue\(^{11}\) which recently faced a new public body are addressed in discussions with HMRC

Balance Transfer

3.12 The successor boards will need to have a clear view of all available resources. The balance sheets will ordinarily recognise the balances which, under normal circumstances, would be carried forward into the next financial year.

3.13 These balances will have been funded from local taxation. While the base premise of the consultation paper is that all assets (and liabilities) will transfer to the successor board(s) both local authorities and the Scottish government, will require to establish the legal basis to enable balance transfer to new bodies or whether balances have legally to be returned to constituent authorities.

3.14 Risk: There is evidence from previous reorganisation that negotiations on closing balances continued after successor authorities had been formed\footnote{Overview Report on the 1996/97 Audits of Local Authorities para 7.1} with consequences for financial planning.

3.15 Control: We recommend that the necessary deliberations on balance transfer takes place at the earliest possible stage.

3.16 Risk: Outgoing bodies could seek to wind down balances in order to utilise funds with a risk that value for money is not obtained from short-term spending decisions which, in turn would have a direct impact upon the decision-making by the successor boards.

3.17 Control: In the meantime, existing Boards should have a clear strategy and policy position regarding the application of reserves as part of sound financial management and good corporate governance.

Shared Resources

3.18 It is likely that currently, between boards and local authorities there will be some evidence of shared staff resources. An early decision will be required for staff on whether their duties are to be transferred directly to the successor boards. Where contract termination is required an early decision will require to be made on whether any liability falls to be funded by the local authority (if it is the employer).

3.19 Risk: The police and fire forces which are financially administered within both Fife and Dumfries and Galloway Councils will present similar but separate issues for staffing and balance transfer. It is likely that these forces will have some element of shared services and/or shared resources. Practically, some local authorities will host historic loans fund debt.

3.20 Control: Early liaison will be required between the councils and the existing constabularies and fire services. Fundamental to this is ensuring that there is a consistency of approach in how all bodies are treated in the disaggregation process.

The Shadow Period

Revenue and Capital Financial Plans

3.21 Risk: The level of capital investment going forward can only become apparent when the new business objectives have been set out by the new board(s) to enable achievement of the policing plan. This will have to be supported by a comprehensive asset assessment as part of the new asset management strategy. This means that at an early stage the Board(s) will have to consider and approve the proposed level of investment. Similarly, for revenue expenditure plans, the boards will have to be in a position to approve the first year’s revenue budget prior to the commencement of 2013/14. To enable all of this, the forward financial plans, both capital and revenue will have to have been developed in order that the board can approve it formally prior to commencement of financial year 2013/14. The risk is that within a constrained shadow period, the budgets are merely an aggregation of the previous financial plans of the outgoing bodies and are not in a finalised position to allow board approval.

3.22 Control: This can be avoided by early appointment of an executive lead with responsibility for the development of revenue and capital financial plans accompanied by an asset management strategy.

The Post-Reform Period

The Continuing Cost of Police and Fire to Local Authorities

3.23 The requirement (or opportunity) for local authorities to consider whether there should be a police and/or fire committee (or to introduce other arrangements) means that some costs of uniformed services will continue to be borne by local authorities. Those costs will be in the form of staffing and other central costs required to govern committees. The present costs of administrative delivery will be met in part by the general revenue grant received from the Scottish Government. This is a funding source which will be ultimately withdrawn. This means that, after reform and in practice, costs will continue to be borne by local authorities without any associated funding. The risk is that, local authorities could elect not to maintain committees without an appropriate funding stream to meet the expectation within the consultation paper.

3.24 Control: Possible mitigating action could be the continued payment of an appropriate portion of general revenue grant to local authorities.

Capital Investment

3.25 Capital expenditure by the current boards and forces is undertaken under the Local Government (Scotland) Act 2003. That Act together with accompanying regulation, requires the application of the Prudential Code for Capital Finance in Local Authorities. Separate legislation provides the legal power to borrow. Although not specified, it is anticipated that the new Scottish Police Authority will no longer be a body defined by S.106 of the Local Government Scotland Act 1973 and will become either an agency or a non-departmental public body. Consequently, the Prudential Code will not apply and the police and fire services in Scotland will have lost access to borrowing to support capital investment.

3.26 Risk: The risk is that in the absence of the right to borrow to fund capital investment, there will be insufficient capital resources available to finance the new board’s capital plans.

13 The Local Government (Scotland) Act 1975
3.27 Control: A robust asset management strategy should be developed which prioritises investment and sets out the forward costs of maintenance and includes a developed long term plan for disposal.

4. FINANCIAL MONITORING AND FORECASTING

The Shadow Period

4.1 Risk: Presently each board will have its own system of budgetary control in place which budget holders will be familiar with. For example, budget holders will receive budgetary control statements, will be required to review expenditure and will have access to business support personnel who help them to understand the control statements. The risk is that budgetary control fails during the transition period.

4.2 Control: the shadow period will be essential in finalising the design of the system of budgetary control (based on the desired level of devolved financial management) and it will be vital that the chief financial officer can communicate to all budget holders their responsibilities as well as what budget holders can expect from the finance function.

4.3 The system of budgetary control will therefore have to be embedded at an early stage to enable the successor boards to function effectively and to enable close monitoring of the use of resources. Any system will have to be carefully designed to support the board and any devolved system should adhere to the following core principles:

- the provision of high quality accurate information on a timely basis;
- coverage of appropriate financial and non-financial indicators; and
- use of integrated systems to both record and produce information.

The Post Reform Period/Go Live

4.4 Risk: We have already noted in this submission that the Scottish Government expect that savings of £130M each year will be achieved by reform of both police and fire. The successor boards are expected to deliver a high level of savings. Realisation of these savings will of course be a key success factor. A significant risk they face is not only the failure to achieve the savings anticipated within the outline business case but that without independent verification of the robustness of the business cases that unrealistic savings will be budgeted for.

4.5 Control: It is essential that the savings projections made in the outline business cases are robust and independent verification of the business cases along with Parliamentary committee challenge is recommended. It is also essential that a clear and transparent financial plan which itemises where savings are to be made is set out. This should be supported by management and governance attention which regularly focuses upon the realisation of savings.

5. FINANCIAL REPORTING

Prior to Reform

Annual Financial Statements

5.1 At present, each police and fire force prepare and publish financial statements as required by the Local Government Scotland Act 1973 and as further directed by specific regulation. As a consequence of the statutory framework, each force adheres to the CIPFA/LASAAC Code of Practice on Local Authority Accounting. (the Code).

5.2 The financial statements are prepared against a timetable which requires that the statements are finalised and submitted to the Accounts Commission by 30th June each year. This is followed by a period of statutory audit which is concluded by 30th September each year (although this is not a statutorily driven date).

5.3 Risk: Depending upon the date of transition and the implementation timetable, the final financial statements will be undertaken and signed by the chief Financial Officer after each force has in fact been abolished and preparation will be undertaken by staff of the successor board(s). As evidenced during local government reorganisation in 1996, there could be significant delay with the production of the annual financial statements and an increased risk of qualification to the financial statements.\(^\text{15}\).

5.4 Control: Each body will have to plan appropriately to ensure that there is smooth transition and handover of final financial statements along with clear accounting policies and all supporting working papers are properly scheduled for transfer to the successor board(s). As part of the existing accounting standard setter organisation for these bodies, we would be prepared to assist with development of a detailed year-end schedule with clear trigger points to ensure that financial statements are completed on time.

Audit

5.5 Risk: The audit of the financial statements is largely undertaken in the period following 30th June. Depending on the implementation timetable this will result in audit after each body has in fact been abolished. The practical risk is that staff will not be available to address issues that arise as a result of audit.

5.6 Control: Each body will have to plan to ensure that there is a continuity in responsibility and accountability with specific staff designated for this purpose.

5.7 Risk: The preparation and audit of the financial statements will be undertaken by officer and auditors with no clear governance framework of accountability.

\(^{15}\) Accounts Commission for Scotland, Overview Report on the 1996/97 Audits of Local Authorities, Section 5.
5.8 Control: There is a clear role for the outgoing audit committees to be retained to allow them to exercise governance responsibility for the financial statements of the outgoing bodies.

The Shadow Period

Annual Financial Statements

5.9 Although not specified within the consultation, the successor board(s) is likely to be a ‘sponsored body’ and therefore subsequently governed by the requirements of the Scottish Public Finance Manual rather than the requirements of the local authority accounting code.\textsuperscript{16} The timetable for preparation and laying of accounts and accountability arrangements will be different to that under the present local authority framework.

5.10 Risk: Inadequate consideration is given to the implications of migrating to the Scottish Public Finance Manual and the requirements of the FREM with possible risk of non-compliance and subsequent qualification to the initial financial statements (2013/14) of the new boards.

5.11 Control: During the shadow year, work needs to be undertaken which examines the differences between the financial reporting requirements of the SPFM and the local authority code in order that policies and in turn practices can be adapted to ensure compliance and that these are in place.

The Post Reform Period/Go Live

Timetable of Accountability

5.12 As indicated above, the present date for preparation of the annual financial statements is 30\textsuperscript{th} June. The SPFM requires sponsored bodies to prepare annual financial statements by 30\textsuperscript{th} September.\textsuperscript{17} Clearly this means that an immediate effect of the proposed modernised governance and accountability arrangements will be to ‘design in’ delay to publication of the annual financial statements.

5.13 The spirit of the consultation paper is that of modernisation and simplification. It is an unfortunate by-product that annual financial statements will be produced three months later than under the present arrangements.

5.14 We recommend that consideration is given to maintaining the present timetable for production of the annual financial statements.

6. FINANCIAL GOVERNANCE

The Period Prior to Reform

Control Environment

6.1 Risk: There is a risk that the existing bodies commit the new boards to levels of expenditure which would otherwise not have been committed or is unsustainable.

6.2 Control: A delegated authority structure is required supported by strategic procurement controls in order to that there is clarity on who has ‘authority’ to commit expenditure. It would also be advisable to have focused procurement delegation with clarity on procurement practices to be followed. There is a key role for internal audit to continue to provide independent assurance on the control environment. ¹⁸

The Shadow Period

Organisational Culture with a strong focus on Financial Accountability

6.3 Risk: In the development of a new single organisation, the necessary focus on maintaining operational delivery could result in a low profile for financial accountability.

6.4 Control: A scheme of delegation which clearly sets out financial accountability from board level will have to be developed. Central to this will be the extent financial accountability to be devolved to area commanders and to senior officers or to staff below that level. The arrangements must enable the creation of a culture where individual and collective responsibility for stewardship and use of resources are given a high priority.

Financial Skills

6.5 Risk: A high degree of financial literacy is required from board members, managers and all those through the organisation with a role in or an interest in finance. There is a risk that the basic financial literacy outwith the finance department is not part of the competencies for service delivery.

6.6 Control: A structured assessment is required of the competencies required for board members and management and which, somewhat crucially identifies where gaps need to be filled. ¹⁹

The Post Reform Period/Go Live

The System of Financial Management

6.7 Risk: The design and implementation of a strong system of financial management will be necessary. The system should foster a culture which enables continuing challenge on financial matters at board as well as at operational level. A failure to design that system appropriately could mean that the necessary financial foundations are not in place.

6.8 Control: Assessment of what requires to be considered for the design of the new system of financial management should be undertaken in a structured environment20.

7. FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT GENERAL COMMENTS

Financial Timetable

7.1 The reform necessitates some significant alterations to the financial management cycle which existing bodies adhere to. Whilst a significant element of the cycle is routine, the scale of the task of implementation should not be underestimated. We would highlight the following observations

- the system of financial planning is currently aligned to the local government budget setting timeline with funding announcements in November/December each year setting the basis for the forward year’s budget. The successor boards will now have to be aligned to the Scottish Government financial planning timescale;
- a range of financial returns are currently made by boards to the Scottish Government at prescribed periods throughout the financial year. Alignment to the financial returns that are required from agencies/NDPB’s will have to be made;
- the present date for preparation of the annual financial statements is 30th June each year. The SPFM requires sponsored bodies to prepare annual financial statements by 30th September each year21. An immediate effect of the proposed modernised and governance and accountability arrangements will be to ‘design in’ delay to publication of the annual financial statements.

20 CIPFA Financial Management Model
21 Scottish Public Finance Manual, Scottish Government, para 29
CFOAS has agreed to focus its written evidence on the following areas:

- Composition and skills set of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Board
- Functions of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service
- HMI – roles and accountabilities
- National and Local structures – roles and accountabilities
- Financial Assumptions
- Employment Issues

Composition and skills set of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board

1. The Bill provides that members of the Board will be appointed by Ministers on the basis of relevant skills and expertise. The correct blend of skills and expertise is critical in establishing the organisation's strategic direction and empowering it to properly scrutinise risk and take decisions on resource allocation within tight budgetary constraints. The role of the Board is to ensure the effective delivery of Fire and Rescue Services across Scotland and the Policy Memorandum makes clear that such members are not attending meetings as representatives but to act in the best interests of the Service. CFOAS agrees with this assertion. The Existing Joint Board structure has met with some criticism in the past however, the very challenges that Joint Boards have had to deal with will continue in the context of a pan Scottish Board. As the Audit Scotland Review of the “Role of Boards” concluded – it is important that Boards demonstrate collective responsibility and ownership of decisions. “Collective responsibility is essential and will be increasingly tested as boards have to make challenging decisions about how best to implement Government priorities, how to reduce costs and what services need to change or stop being delivered”

2. The specific skills that members will need to bring include the ability to properly scrutinise Service performance, clearly ensure the management of risk within the Fire and Rescue service context, demonstrate sound financial management, lead the development of a national strategic plan for the service and hold the Chief Officer to account for its delivery. These skills can be found from across stakeholder interests including local government, business and commerce, education and research, fire and rescue sector.

Functions of the Scottish Fire and Rescue service

3. The functions of the Scottish Fire and Rescue service remain as set out in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. It is understood that additional functions e.g. CBRN response and response to serious flooding will be transferred by means of secondary legislation and a new Fire and Rescue Framework will place these statutory functions within the context of prevention, community engagement and partnership working. It is unfortunate that primacy has not been given to the prevention agenda and that the opportunity has not been taken in the context of the primary legislation to provide a meaningful context within the areas of protection and prevention for all Fire and Rescue activity. It has been acknowledged through Community Fire Safety work and research including the study examining fire deaths and injuries in Scotland “Scotland Together” that the only demonstrative way to drive down fire death and injury and to reduce demand on already heavily burdened public services is through the adoption of a holistic, structured and joined up approach with partner agencies to focus on prevention activity and target “at risk” groups. Expanding on this theme, the now well developed role of the service in the context of road safety with the service leading the way on a number of initiatives (particularly aimed at young drivers) across the Country is not reflected in the Bill. The opportunity to clarify the role of the service in co-ordinating water rescue activity across Scotland has also been missed.

4. CFOAS has also consistently raised a number of issues that affect the legality of our Services’ cross border operational activity in England. We have been advised that these matters would be clarified in the Bill, however, the opportunity to do so does not appear to have been taken.

HMI role and accountabilities

5. The Bill establishes the role of Chief Inspector and Inspectors of the Fire and Rescue service as non-Ministerial office holders within the Scottish Administration. The Inspectorate may independently initiate inquiries as well as inspect on direction by Scottish Ministers. This clearly presents a potential conflict of interest in relation to determining inspections that remain risk based, proportionate and complimentary. Primacy will clearly rest with a Ministerial request for any one off inspection that may not be seen in the context of broader audit and inspection criteria or indeed will pull resource away from planned work programmes. Depending on the direction given by Ministers, this could also potentially place undue political pressure on Inspectors in terms of timescale and conclusions.

National and local structures – roles and accountabilities

6. In addition to establishing the single national service governed by the Scottish Fire and Rescue Board, the Bill seeks to establish a formal statutory relationship between the service and each of the 32 local authorities. The Bill provides for a local senior officer to be designated for each local authority area and he/ she will be the first point of contact for the local authority and other partners locally and the lead officer for the services in community planning. The relationship will be built around the development of a local plan setting out the shared priorities and outcomes to which fire and rescue services are to be directed.

7. After approval of the national strategic plan, the SFRS must prepare and submit a plan for approval to the local authority for the area to which the plan relates.

8. In the context of the development of a 3 year national strategic plan prepared on the basis of a national integrated risk management plan and developed in the context of a national budget set for the SFRS, it is entirely possible that conflict could arise if any given local authority does not feel that the local plan is sufficient for its purposes in terms of resource allocation, engagement in local initiatives or indeed the role of the local senior officer.

9. There is a broad duty on the SFRS to ensure adequate local service provision but national and local views on the extent and detailed application of that provision could differ. The Bill states that the SFRS must submit a plan prepared for approval to the local authority and if approved the SFRS must publish it. As it stands, the Bill offers no recourse for any dispute arising between the national service and the local authority, which could seriously hamper the ability of the service to engage effectively at a local level. We need to be clear on whether the service is a national service delivered locally or 32 local services delivered within the context of a national framework. It cannot be both.

10. This point is also critical in terms of the role of the Local Senior Officer (LSO). In order for the LSO to work effectively, it must be clear that the development of local plans stem from agreed local priorities sitting within the context of the national strategic plan and that the LSO’s accountability for delivery is to the Chief Officer. The LSO is carrying out delegated functions on behalf of the SFRS and although the relationship with the local authority is crucial in terms of the joint development of the local plan, reporting lines and accountabilities must be clear.

11. Local scrutiny and engagement arrangements are currently being piloted to test a range of mechanisms e.g. blue light committees through which elected members may play a direct and formal role in shaping local priorities and scrutinising performance however we need to guard against drawing the FRS away from the multi-agency approach which has been proven to work. In terms of Community Planning and Engagement there is a need to remove duplication, build capacity and integrate services; this is best achieved through CPP arrangements. It seems that a number of reform strands now exist and there must be a connection between reform of Police and Fire and Rescue Services and the refresh of the SOA, CPP and SCG arrangements. If this were to provide a more robust legal duty and partners were bound by joint plans and performance as a result, then the need for separate police and fire committees would be obsolete.

12. The development of local plans influenced by the National Fire Strategy but driven by local priorities would seem an appropriate process for guiding and setting local arrangements. The SOA would allow this and could also present a means to challenge performance and measure outcomes. However, as referenced in paragraphs 6 and 7 there needs to be a clear understanding of the parameters within which local plans are developed and agreed.

Financial Assumptions

13. The Financial Memorandum attached to the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill highlights that ongoing net savings of £25.1m per annum could be achieved by the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service following a period of transition during which time one-off set up costs of £27.475m and one-off savings of £15m could arise.
14. It should be noted that these ongoing savings are net of increased costs resulting from expenditure such as VAT (£4m), Publicity (£0.33m), Remuneration of the Board (£0.242m) and Pay harmonisation (£1m). The most significant areas where savings have been identified are Corporate Services (£8.03m) and Response (£13.5m).

15. In presenting evidence to the Finance Committee, CFOAS has highlighted concerns in relation to the level of costs and savings to be achieved and the time frame for delivery, albeit that we agree that the removal of duplication will result in a level of efficiencies being generated over time. In particular, CFOAS has questioned the assumptions that significant reductions in the number of senior uniformed officers across all areas of service delivery can be achieved whilst at the same time ensuring that effective Incident Command management systems can be delivered. In relation to reductions in support staff and Control Room staff, CFOAS would question the assumption that these can be achieved through natural turnover rather than significant numbers of staff being made redundant, albeit on a voluntary basis. Costs for redundancy have been assumed to be £4m within the Financial Memorandum whilst the equivalent figure for Police is some £80m and we therefore contend that this is significantly under estimated.

16. CFOAS would wish to highlight that since the Business Case has been prepared, expenditure levels within the Service have already reduced by some £10m and therefore some of the savings highlighted are now being delivered across Scotland. The Business Case was prepared from a baseline set in 2010/11 and these savings need to be credited to the service as part of the Government’s financial projections for reform.

17. Finally, the legal status of the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service results in the potential loss of VAT recovery, which CFOAS estimates to be £10m per annum and not £4m as, outlined. Additionally, the new Service is not permitted to hold Reserves, something which is recognised as sound financial management practice. These detrimental impacts on the Service when compared to current practices are matters which we would ask Scottish Government to consider when reviewing the proposed legislation and legal standing of the new single Service.

Employment Issues

18. The Policy Memorandum attached to the Bill reflects that there are no plans to change national negotiating arrangements during transition to a single service. Whilst the memorandum also explains that future arrangements will be a matter for the new Fire and Rescue Service we assume it is intended that current arrangements will continue. It should be noted however that COSLA may continue to represent Employer interests in the negotiating framework until 31 March 2013 but as the Service will cease to be a local government service on 1 April 2013 (if that is indeed the date on which the new legal entity is established) there could potentially be a void thereafter until any new negotiating structure is established. CFOAS is urging Scottish Government to hold talks with the Employers Secretariat in London and COSLA to ensure a smooth transition.
19. The absence of any shadow arrangements and definitive commencement date for the new service as a legal entity (as existed during local government reorganisation) does mean that many transfer issues cannot be planned definitively prior to vesting date and must therefore be for the new service to resolve. Although there is a commitment that all staff will transfer and terms and conditions will be protected at the point of transfer, the lack of proper shadow arrangements will undoubtedly have an effect on employee morale and hampers the ability of current employers to provide meaningful information to staff on their future. CFOAS has urged Scottish Government to bring forward some aspects of the Bill in relation to the appointment of the CFO to at least allow for a degree of critical decision making in advance of 1 April.

Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland
2 March 2012
CFOAS welcomes the opportunity to provide further clarity around functions, and associated costs, that the Association believes requires further consideration in drafting a renewed purpose and vision for a modern 21st Century Fire and Rescue Service in Scotland which, in turn, provides a proper statutory basis to these critical functions within the Police and Fire (Reform) Bill:

1. Marine Incident Response

   1.1 Marine Incident Response references teams trained to be transported offshore to ships at sea that are on fire should a request be made from a vessel to the coastguard for fire teams. There is, currently, no statutory duty on any Fire and Rescue Services to undertake these operations.

   1.2 Until recently (Autumn last year) there were 15 Maritime Incident Response Group teams provided by Fire and Rescue Services around the coast line of the United Kingdom. In Scotland these were Lothian & Borders, Strathclyde, Highlands & Islands and Grampian. Last Autumn, Lothian & Borders took the decision to stand down the Maritime Incident Response Group teams as a result of funding that was provided for the MIRG team and response being withdrawn by the Maritime Coastguard Agency. In reality, funding associated with the cost of providing equipment and training has never been fully provided but all funding has now ceased as a result of Coastguard Agency cuts from UK central government.

2. Rope Rescue

   2.1 Although there is no statutory requirement for Fire and Rescue Services to carry out rope rescue activities within the Act or draft Bill, the outcomes of local Integrated Risk Management Plans has, in some services, highlighted that a community risk exists. On this basis some Services have funded, trained and provided rope rescue teams. It may be worth noting that just because the IRMP has highlighted a community risk this, in itself, does not confer a statutory requirement to provide a rope rescue response. The Scottish Government has recognised the rope rescue response provided by some Fire and Rescue Services, and have financially supported a project within Lothian and Borders to build a rope rescue facility for training for open structures rescues, such as scaffold and tower cranes etc, that can be used both locally and nationally to help train rope rescue operators. This is under construction now and is due to complete in late summer 2012. Work is in hand with the Scottish Fire Services College to include rope rescue training in Scotland within their syllabus.

   2.2 The provision, equipment and maintenance of rope rescue teams within FRS is carried out by individual FRSSs from within their budget settlements, with no associated central funding.
2.3 The draft Bill provides an opportunity to define rope rescue as a statutory function of FRS, to make necessary funding provision and work to provide a pan Scotland response. Alternatively, Ministers may wish to take the opportunity to clarify which alternative Services or agencies should hold that statutory responsibility.

2.4 Of interest is a recent Sheriff’s determination following a Fatal Accident Inquiry where he determined that entering mine shafts is the responsibility of FRS for rescue purposes. However, without the requisite rope rescue equipment and training it is highly probable that it will not be possible for Firefighters to be lowered into shafts etc unless they are trained appropriately.

3. Inland Water Rescue

3.1 Inland Water Rescue is not a statutory function of FRS within the current act or draft Bill.

3.2 Responding to flooding is a statutory duty of the FRS which is generally cited as standing water although many commentators on hydrodynamics would argue that even flood water is moving and presents the same or similar dangers and risks. Whilst flood response is generally considered within the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) documents, and is taught on flood response courses as wading no higher than generally knee-depth in standing water, this in no way provides the appropriate level of response to inland water rescue such as rescue from rivers, lochs or extensive flooding of areas as seen in recent events across the UK.

3.3 In relation to overall costs, within some Services all of these activities are considered to be outwith the scope of the defined role of a firefighter as set out within their role maps and, on that basis, an additional responsibility/ availability allowance is paid to all participating firefighters.

3.4 An approximate estimate of overall costs for these rescue activities across Scotland would be:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Activity</th>
<th>Cost</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Inland water rescue/ co-ordination of assets</td>
<td>£1.5m</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rope or Line Rescue</td>
<td>£300/400k</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maritime rescue</td>
<td>£300k</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>£2-£3 million</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

4. Community Safety Engagement

4.1 Commencement of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 introduced a requirement for the Scottish Fire and Rescue Services (SFRS) to promote fire safety and to make appropriate arrangements for the provision of information, publicity and encouragement in respect of the steps to be taken to prevent fires and death or injury by fire.
4.2 Additionally, the SFRS are required to give advice, on request, about how to prevent fires and restrict their spread in buildings and other property. Also, Services must give advice in relation to the means of escape from buildings and other property in the event of fire.

4.3 The SFRS approach to Community Safety Engagement (CSE) is predicated on partnerships; this position has been developing since the introduction of Community Planning in 2003 and was confirmed in the Scottish Government’s report ‘Scotland Together’, published in 2009. (Scotland Together is available at: http://www.strathclydefire.org/news--campaigns/features/july-2010/scotland-together.aspx)

4.4 CSE is a central aspect of SFRS service delivery; a position that is reflected within Integrated Risk Management Plans.

4.5 The SFRS are involved in a range of public safety engagement initiatives including Home Fire Safety Visits, fire and rescue education programmes for children and young people, road safety projects and the provision of information in relation to water safety.

4.6 A blended approach is employed with local fire crews delivering the bulk of mainstream Services, including Home Fire Safety Visits and some youth engagement programmes. When dealing with the public, complex cases such as those involving dementia or addictions are managed using bespoke teams of specially trained staff.

4.7 Working closely with Community Planning Partners there is an emphasis on targeting at-risk individuals and families through the development of referral pathways with public and third sector colleagues. Also, the Tasking and Coordinating process is used to identify trends and inform the deployment of resources in an integrated and focused manner.

4.8 In reality, our expanded CSE activity has taken the Service beyond the parameters of fire safety to engaging with young people on the cusp of offending, contributing to broader community wellbeing initiatives, such as road safety, and working with a range of vulnerable and at risk groups to improve their overall life circumstances.

4.9 CSE funding is provided from core budgets, augmented by external funding; in the main, external funds are received from Community Planning Partnerships. Again, an approximate estimate of costs for CSE for the current year is: £4.9M made up of £3.9M from core budgets and £1M from external funding

5. Cross Border Working

5.1 This matter has been raised, specifically, with Lothian and Borders Fire and Rescue Service by SG officials and relates to the legality of Scottish Fire and Rescue Services crossing the border to operate in England. The issues apply equally to Dumfries and Galloway and any other Service in Scotland involved in UK mutual aid arrangements.
5.2 The exact nature of the illegality has not been shared with the FRSs concerned, which we understand is normal protocol in relation to the provision of legal advice. We understand from correspondence that the opportunity to resolve the matter was to be taken in the drafting of the Bill; however, we are advised that it is a technical matter which needs to be resolved by the UK and Scottish Governments. While the matter remains outstanding, the Committee can be assured that mutual aid arrangements do operate satisfactorily – it is the legality of these arrangements which is in question.

6. Summary

6.1 As outlined in the oral evidence given to the Justice Committee, the current range of rescue services provided across Scotland lack consistency as a number of functions are not appropriately defined within current legislation. The opportunity to bring clarity to these functions should be taken and in doing so, the financial impact of around £2m-£3m should be considered against the overall budget of £388m i.e. it represents a value of less than 1% of spending.

Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland
21 March 2012
Introduction

1. I currently perform two roles within Scottish Government. My primary function is as an adviser to Ministers where, as a consequence of my fire and rescue service background, I am able to advise Ministers and officials on fire and rescue service matters. I provided advice to Ministers throughout the development of the Bill and the work leading up to that.

2. My secondary role is as Chief Inspector of Fire and Rescue Authorities – where I act independently of Ministers (but am subject to their direction in certain circumstances).

Response

3. My position is that reform of the Scottish fire and rescue services is both appropriate, and necessary, if the quality of the Service is to be protected during what is, for the modern fire and rescue service, an unprecedented period of financial pressure. I also believe that reform offers the Scottish Government and fire and rescue service managers the opportunity to build on the best that the Service has to offer, and design a high quality, locally engaged organisation which will benefit the people of Scotland. I am certain that Service managers are willing and able to rise to that challenge.

4. The Committee will note that the Bill proposes what might effectively be described as a reinvigoration of the Inspectorate function. I have begun the process of exploring the practical implications of that and am engaging, or planning to engage, with stakeholders on the future shape and operation of the Inspectorate.

5. I anticipate that a new Inspectorate will be built on:

   1. A principle that scrutiny will be proportionate and risk-based;
   2. A complementary relationship with the Auditor General and Audit Scotland;
   3. A partnership between the Service, the Scottish Ministers and the Inspectorate; and
   4. An ongoing requirement to provide professional advice to Ministers.

6. I would be happy to take questions from the Committee on the thinking behind these matters.

7. Beyond that, I would be happy to respond to the Committee, to the best of my ability, on any matter relating to its consideration of the Bill.
Justice Committee
Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities

Introduction

1. COSLA, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, is the representative voice of Scottish Local Government. We welcome the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Justice Committee on the Police and Fire (Reform) Scotland Bill. Evidence has also been provided to the Local Government and Regeneration, and Finance, Committees, and this evidence should be read alongside that provided for them.

2. COSLA’s position has been informed by the work of a cross-party Task Group, our Community Safety, and Community Well-being and Safety Executive Groups, and agreed by COSLA Leaders.

3. COSLA would welcome the opportunity to provide the Committee with oral evidence or any further written evidence that it would find helpful to inform its conclusions.

4. For ease of reference, the following submission broadly follows the structure of the Bill.

Overall Position

5. COSLA is fully committed to working with the Scottish Parliament, the Scottish Government and other stakeholders to ensure that the best possible police and fire services are developed and implemented for our local communities. COSLA Leaders have previously agreed policy positions specifically in relation to Police and Fire Reform as well as wider Public Sector Reform. These positions were clearly reflected in the COSLA submissions to both Scottish Government consultation exercises on police and fire reform, and were reflected to Scottish Government Ministers and civil servants as the Bill was being developed.

6. The theme of our response is the need to continue the principle of policing by consent, while retaining meaningful local democratic accountability in future arrangements, but also agreeing that there must be strong national accountability. The reform of police and fire must not be seen as distinct from broader reform of public services and the ongoing development and enhancement of community planning and single outcome agreements.
7. As a practical suggestion, COSLA suggests that the Bill is revised at Stage 2 so that there is consistency on the face of the Bill in terms of how the SPA and SFRS are to be formed, their membership, etc.

National Board

8. At national board level, there must be structures to maintain the operational independence of the Police and Fire Services from Ministers, as well as foster a meaningful and sustainable relationship between local committees and the national boards.

9. Strong Local Government representation on each of the national boards is of fundamental importance to COSLA to ensure there are the diverse skills, experience and expertise required to perform their roles effectively, represent the geographical diversity of Scotland and to meaningfully link the national to the local and vice versa.

10. For both police and fire, COSLA wants to see a Board of larger than 11, of at least 15 members, with a set, majority of elected members. Of these we would argue that at least eight be serving elected members, appointed by COSLA, but having received the appropriate security clearance. This reflects the history of both police and fire, which have always been locally democratically run since their establishment. Even with a single police or fire service, the vast majority of crime, and any particular fire, will take place in a local community – local and national are inextricably linked. A larger Board with a majority of elected members would retain that strong link to local accountability while also allowing the geographical diversity of Scotland to be reflected.

11. COSLA recognises the hesitation that Ministers and Scottish Government officials have here. But given the seniority and experience of those likely to be nominated, plus the security checking and fact that once appointed they will be obliged to act in the Board’s best interests, COSLA believes that there is nothing to be concerned about here.

12. We have concerns that if the SPA and SFRS are as busy in time terms as suggested to us by civil servants, then eleven is not a large number should there be a couple of illnesses and couple of board members with other unavoidable appointments, and problems with a quorum could arise.

13. Also, more members of the Board would allow a bigger pool from which to select the core of necessary sub-committees. In the Bill there is the possibility of co-opting members to sub-committees, but if as suggested they have no vote even though functions may have been delegated to those sub-committees, then there has to be a question as to why potential volunteers would want to be involved. Or, if we assume that those co-opted are brought in for their specialist expertise, it would seem counter-intuitive then to give them no real input into decision-making.
14. Further, we believe that strong local elected member representation on the national Boards, albeit of course acting in the interests of the Board on which they would be sitting, would send a real message of the partnership that will be required between national and local accountability to ensure the best possible service for all our communities.

15. There is no detail as to how the new Boards will conduct their business but we would assume as a minimum, as with existing Police and Fire Boards, that they will meet in public.

Borrowing, Reserves and VAT

16. We support the fact that the SPA and SFRS will be able to borrow money (albeit only with Ministerial approval), and note that, unlike now, they will not be able to hold reserves. We are disappointed at the financial implications of these single services both being subject to VAT. We understand that Scottish Government officials are in discussion with HMRC in relation to a dispensation and are confident that this will be achieved, but as yet we have seen no evidence of this. Indeed, as many others have said, SPSA has never fully resolved this problem. This is a sizeable sum annually being transferred from one arm of Government to another and we urge the Parliament to seek resolution of this matter. Failure to do so will require the Government to find the money – likely over £20m - and thus have a knock on effect either on the police or other public sector budgets.

17. COSLA’s position is that, rather than forming a NDPB which is subject to VAT and has various financial limitations on it, there are other alternatives, one of which, for example, could be a single shared Local Government service, which would have allowed more financial flexibility such as the holding of reserves and exemption from VAT.

Ministerial Direction

18. Finally on the opening Chapters for Police and Fire, COSLA seeks to clarify the wording of 5(1) and 5(2), which appears to be contradictory in that the former says the SPA “must comply with any direction……by Ministers”, whereas the latter suggests that a direction “may not be given” on operational matters. Each is a statement in its own right and it is difficult to determine which might actually take precedence. We note that this is a new duty and that ACPOS, among others, has questioned the need for it.

19. Further, assuming there is to be a duty and there is an exception for “operational” matters, there is no definition of what that might constitute.

Police Service

20. Para 13 seems to suggest the possibility of performance related pay or bonuses, which is surprising given the current economic climate and apparent public opinion.
21. In terms of the Chief Constable’s accountability and where that lies, and local police planning, we have covered that below in our section on local arrangements and accountability.

22. COSLA welcomes the policing principles. In terms of Ministers setting strategic priorities relating to the “policing of Scotland”, we support that but we seek clarification on how that might avoid relating to operational matters. Similarly, the SPA must prepare a strategic police plan, and we question how we avoid that relating to operational matters.

23. At 33(3)(b) COSLA, as the representative voice of Local Government would seek replacement of the wording to say “the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, and”. 33(3)(c) then covers, among others, any relevant local government professional bodies.

24. We welcome the involvement of local authorities in preparing the strategic police plan.

Best Value and Community Planning

25. COSLA has an agreed position that the Duty of Best Value and Community Planning should be extended to all in the public sector. The Bill provides for the new bodies to secure Best Value. Given COSLA’s stated position and an indication from the Minister for Local Government that he intends reviewing community planning arrangements, we will want to ensure that the Bill reflects a duty to participate meaningfully in community planning at a local level and achieves what is intended. The pathfinders’ exercise may provide some early indications of how this relationship might work in practice.

26. Ideally we would have preferred if it was formally the Chief Constable to whom the duty to participate in community planning applied locally, rather than the Local Commander, particularly as earlier in the Bill it is clear that s/he can delegate powers to other officers. The Local Commander is accountable to the Chief Constable and so the formal duty should lie there.

27. For Fire, we would like far more explicit reference to the duty for the Chief Fire Officer, or if we accept the Bill as it stands for Police, the Local Senior Officer, to participate in community planning. We believe that this is essential to maintain the excellent community safety outcomes recently achieved across Scotland through joint working.

Local Arrangements

28. The future local arrangements, including the development of local plans and associated budgets for Police and Fire and Rescue, is of fundamental importance to COSLA both in terms of the rights and duties of councils and in how these services link to wider community planning arrangements and single outcome agreements. The role and powers of the new local arrangements must be clearly defined to ensure that they have real impact, and can deliver effective and sustainable local accountability.
Setting Local Priorities

29. We welcome the appointment of a Local Commander/Senior Fire Officer for each council area and the clarification in Scottish Government civil servants’ evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee that the rank of the Local Commander will be worked out between the individual council and the relevant service. Further, we welcome the clarity of the Bill that a Local Commander must involve the local authority in the setting of priorities. Particularly, we are delighted to see the Government’s acknowledgement in the Bill that councils will have the right to approve a local police plan, and we would assume that this includes all local activity.

30. It is unclear from the Bill, however, what arbitration process exists in the very unlikely event that local negotiations do not suffice and agreement cannot be reached.

Local Budgets

31. For COSLA, true local accountability requires a local budget being set and forming part of the arrangement. We believe decision making and financial responsibility cannot be separated. If local accountability and subsidiarity are really to be enhanced, budgets must be aligned to where the decisions are being taken. Each local plan should be costed and resourced so that progress can be reported on. It would form a basis on which additional local expenditure by councils could be set against. An alternative would be to establish a scheme of delegation to the Local Chief Officers so that they have powers to hold budgets, direct these and officers under their command, and enter into agreement with the local committees. Either would achieve the same end, although the latter would be preferable if the Christie Commission recommendation on “Forging a new concordat between the Scottish Government and Local Government to develop joined-up services, backed by funding arrangements requiring integrated provision” is to be acted on.

32. COSLA would like to see changes to the Bill to achieve this alignment of plans and resources. For example, councils already directly fund an additional 600 – 800 police officers (who are part of the current force of over 17,234 officers), and we need to be sure in future that the resources we are allocating to Community Safety are in fact still delivering the desired additionality. A budget would make this process transparent.

Local Committees

33. In terms of “local committee” arrangements COSLA accepts and supports the need for reasonable local flexibility, and we support strongly the work ongoing across Scotland with pathfinders. However, the feedback from that will not be available until later in the year, particularly given the Local Government Elections will create a break period of possibly a couple of months. By that time, it will be too late to amend the Bill. We believe that there would be an advantage for the legislation to more clearly frame the role of the local committee arrangements and particularly to identify how a local committee would have their concerns heard by members of the National Board.
34. By reducing the degree of variation in their form and remit it may make it easier for the Chief Fire Officer/Chief Constable to manage relations with individual local authorities and to ensure a consistent level of scrutiny across the country. There must be the ability to scrutinise all local activities and this must complement national scrutiny.

35. COSLA members have been asked about the additional burdens of establishing these. Initial estimates suggest that there would be a requirement of something in the order of £3-4m to have administrative roles in place with some policy and analytical capacity. The policy and analytical capacity is likely to be a significant factor to assist elected members to improve the level of scrutiny carried out locally on what exists already.

Local Accountability

36. Further, Council Leaders are keen to maximise their role in holding chief officers to account. When last discussed, Leaders made clear the need for legislation to define the relationship between the Chief Constable/Chief Fire Officer and local authorities to ensure any agreement is workable, including the right to receive a response, in a similar way as is currently available with existing Chief Constables. We are arguing that a number of key issues on which a local committee would have the right to receive a response should be defined, eg resource allocation.

37. Without these guarantees set out in statute, potentially the local committee could simply become information sharing meetings dependent on the data that the Local Commander is prepared to provide. And key local issues are unlikely to be given any thorough consideration by national boards (even if they were to have Local Government representation). We cannot end up with structures that end up facing the same types of criticism on accountability that we have recently seen from Audit Scotland on Boards.

Appointment of Chief Constable/Chief Fire Officer

38. Acknowledging the benefits of having both services up and running on 1 April 2013, COSLA has suggested an alternative means by which initial appointments might be made, speeding up the process, particularly for the Chief Constable, and allowing management teams to be in place well before the proposed start date.

39. Ideally, we would have liked to see the full recruitment process, interview panel and appointment made independently, by the national boards. However the commitment to the start date does not seem to allow for this. Even allowing for the recruitment of the Chair to sit on the interview panel limits the time the Chief Constable will have to recruit his command team and shape his/her service to 3 or 4 months at best. Further, this will be an attractive, comparatively well paid post and is likely to attract a range of candidates from outwith Scotland who, if successful, might require a notice period after appointment before they could take up the job.

40. COSLA suggests ideally that a means be found to fast track at least the appointment of the Chair, but if at all possible other Board members also, to allow an earlier appointment of chief officers to take place than December 2012/January 2013.

41. Alternatively, there may be a workable proposal based around the current eight Conveners, or a group of senior elected members from COSLA, and the HMIC making up a pool from which an interview panel would be drawn. This would provide three key advantages:
   (i) speed up the process, giving the Chief Constable as much time as possible to shape the new service;
   (ii) retain the separation from Ministers; and
   (iii) bring the required breadth of skills and experience and democratic accountability, desired in the Bill for membership of the SPA and required to appoint a Chief Constable.

42. There seems no reason why amendments could not be brought forward at Stage 2 of the Bill to allow such an appointments process or similar for the first Chief Constable. After this, it would revert to the process detailed in the Bill for future appointments.

43. The alternative in the Bill is an appointment made essentially by civil servants and/or local government officials or similar, together with a newly appointed Chair.

44. According to a presentation to the Scottish Policing Board, adverts for the Chief Constable will be issued on 7 May 2012. Current Police Regulation requires a minimum 3 week advertisement period for senior officer posts. But this could be extended, albeit in our view not necessary given that most of those interested in the post will already be looking out for it, to five weeks. This would allow for the consideration of applications and short-listing to take place in late June and interviews to take place in late July 2012. Depending on the amount of notice required the Chief Constable would be in post between early August and October 2012. Compared to the current proposed method of recruitment this option could provide the new Chief Constable with potentially an additional 5 months in post. This would still mean the interview process itself taking place after parliamentary consideration was complete.

45. COSLA would support a parallel process for the appointment of the new Chief Fire Officer.

46. As said above, our preferred option is for the fast-tracking of the public appointments process to get the SPA and SFRS in place. But, if our alternative option is supported, COSLA officers would be happy to work with Scottish Government officials to develop the thinking around this option further, including any Bill amendments that were required.

Independent Custody Visiting

47. Sections 90 and 91 introduce the purpose and arrangements for Independent Custody Visiting. While fully supportive of this becoming a statutory obligation in Scotland, there is no detail available as to how a small, centralised Authority will undertake the practical recruitment, training, management and co-ordination of Custody Visiting as currently exists across Scotland. The earlier consultation indicated a willingness to build upon ‘existing skills and experience’ and further information is currently awaited as to how this will be facilitated in practice in the future and what the financial implications might be, particularly for local authorities should its implementation be delayed.

Matter Not Covered By Bill

Riotous Assembly

48. Under the 1824 Act police authorities have the responsibility to compensate the public and businesses for damage caused by riot. While this has not been a common problem in the recent past, the disturbances of 2011 and the need for councils to secure insurance cover for high profile events mean that this is a continuing and real burden for some authorities. As the current policing role is transferring to the new national service so should the liability for policing riotous assemblies.

49. COSLA has approached the Scottish Government over this to resolve the matter, particularly as councils have no practical or theoretical ways of actively mitigating the risk.

50. COSLA would like to see this matter addressed in this piece of primary legislation, or a formal agreement being reached with the Scottish Government that this is included among all of the liabilities that will transfer from local authorities to the SPA.

Lay Diversity Advisers

51. Lothian and Borders Police Board (and potentially others) has a Lay Diversity Advisers Scheme. The Advisers are volunteers and are independent of the Force but work closely with officers to provide advice on equalities matters and scrutinise a variety of diverse police activities. The breadth of skills used by lay advisers have informed and helped to shape police policies and procedures, as well as continuing to contribute to the scrutiny of hate crimes. They have a developing role in critical incidents. It is not clear how such a scheme might continue in a national structure. The new Authority should consider the benefits of the scheme in a national context. If it is felt that such a scheme might be of value in all or some parts of Scotland, the Authority should consider how the advisers should be appointed so as to make clear that they are independent of the Force. Having councils run the appointment process would confirm that independence. These appointment functions would have resource implications for the councils involved.

Conclusion

52. COSLA supports a Bill that protects and improves local services, keeps our communities safer with more equitable access to specialist support and national capacity when and where it is needed across Scotland. We want to see the connection strengthened between services and the communities they serve, enabling closer integration with community planning partners and delivering greater local democratic scrutiny and engagement, and achieving better outcomes for communities. We acknowledge that the Bill is intended to achieve this and it is on that basis that we make the above comments and suggestions as to how the Bill might be further improved.

COSLA Submission to Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Background

COSLA has been invited to provide a submission to the Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Bill reforming Police and Fire and Rescue Services in Scotland. This submission concentrates on the proposed local policing and fire arrangements.

This submission is based on the policy memorandum and the broad intention of the Bill rather than the detailed provisions. COSLA’s position has been informed by the work of a cross-party Task Group, our Community Safety, and Community Well-being and Safety Executive Groups, and by COSLA Leaders.

The COSLA position repeats some of the concerns expressed in response to the earlier consultations. While we concentrate on the outstanding matters, the previous ones (while wholly or partly resolved) are briefly repeated to provide the overall thrust of Local Government’s position. There are also a number of points that so far remain unresolved. COSLA staff continue to be in active dialogue with Scottish Government officials and hope that further progress can be made prior to stage two. In the response, the term ‘Board’ ‘Local Chief Officer’ and similar, apply equally to both the proposed Fire or Police arrangements, unless specifically indicated otherwise.

National Board Arrangements

Role of local elected members

For COSLA, councillor representation on the National Boards is fundamental to ensure there are the diverse skills, experience and expertise required for the two national boards to perform their roles effectively. As long as the new local arrangements retain responsibility for ensuring the delivery of local police and fire outcomes, it is a prerequisite that there should be strong representation from local authorities through membership of locally elected members on the two national boards. It is difficult for members to feel anything else would be as meaningful in directly linking national and local accountability given the desired outcome of continuing, and improving, local fire and police services in the context of local community safety. Councillors, through community planning have a strong background in strategic planning across a range of public services.

Strong representation at the national level would help maintain a meaningful and influential Local Government interest in the top levels of the new structures. This would help ensure the success of the local governance and accountability arrangements. It would also maintain relations between the local committees and the national Board and between local elected members and the Chief Constable and Chief Fire Officer.
From press coverage there appears to be an assumption that the maximum number to be appointed as serving councillors would be 4 – although there is no indication as to whether this might be added to the face of the Bill. COSLA believes that we should directly nominate the local authority members to the board in a way that explicitly recognises the cross party and geographical nature of local government’s representative voice (whatever the number of places being made available) without going through the OCPAS process, but still with relevant security clearance being undertaken.

COSLA recognises the hesitation that the Minister and Scottish Government officials have here. But given the seniority and experience of those likely to be nominated, plus the security checking and fact that once appointed they will be obliged to act in the Board’s best interests, COSLA believes that there is nothing to be concerned about here.

\textit{COSLA continues to want to see either the majority or all of the Boards being elected local government members. If this doesn’t gain support from the Committee, COSLA would want to nominate directly, or at least commend applications, to a set number of places on the Board.}

We support that the Boards will be able to borrow money (albeit only with Ministerial approval), and note that, unlike now, they will not be able to hold reserves. We are also disappointed at the financial implications of these single services both being subject to VAT. We understand that Scottish Government officials are in discussion with HMRC in relation to a dispensation and are confident that this will be achieved, but as yet we have seen no evidence of this. This is a sizeable sum annually being transferred from one arm of Government to another and we urge the Parliament to seek resolution of this matter. Failure to do so will require the Government to find the money – likely over £20m - and thus have a knock on effect either on the police or other public sector budgets.

COSLA’s position was that, rather than forming a NDPB which is subject to VAT and has various financial limitations on it, there were other alternatives, one of which could have been a single shared Local Government service, which would have allowed more financial flexibility.

\textbf{Size of Board}

The magnitude of other tasks and roles currently undertaken by current police authorities to ensure effective, necessary day to day 'business' has been highlighted, as a reason for having the right numbers and skills available to the board. Examples, though not exhaustive, were: Police Appeals Tribunals; monitoring of ill-health retirements and injury awards; police staff appeals; approval of legal expenses for police officers in certain instances; Best Value, Audit and other specific oversight groups for budgetary control etc; Equality Schemes and other such duties; Climate Change duties as a public body plus monitoring arrangements of the force; what are the actual monitoring arrangements now going to be for national policing functions; Authority training; and, the monitoring of Health and Safety responsibilities specifically assigned to police authorities.
The proposal is that the two boards would have between 7 to 11 members. The Bill doesn’t state what the sub-committee arrangements will be to meet the responsibilities highlighted above. Given the small number of members, it has been suggested that a series of sub-committees be established with non-voting co-opted members to advise. However the small board numbers will also make it difficult to ensure a reasonable balance of geographical spread, gender, skills and expertise, and that the effectiveness of the arbitrarily small board could be easily compromised with three or four people being unable to attend.

Our members have said that a better size would be in the order of 15 with at least 8 being councillors, appointed by COSLA. This would allow a larger quorum to be set to reduce the chances of what could be a very small number of people making significant decisions over Scottish policing. This is closer to the number that could be appointed to the reformed National Library (14), and would help re-enforce the traditional tripartite approach to policing in Scotland, and assure the public that the boards and services were able to exercise their independence and accountability with a separation from Ministers.

The Chief Constable and Chief Fire Officer

As the Committee know it is proposed that there be different service specific approaches. To emphasise the independence of the Chief Constable from influence of Ministers, the Bill will require the Scottish Police Authority Chairperson be involved in appointing the first Chief Constable and the SPA more generally thereafter. The Chief Constable will need then to be approved by Ministers. However, given the lesser political sensitivity over the appointment of Chief Fire Officer, the intention is for Ministers to appoint him or her directly.

There is considerable pressure with the April 2013 provisional start date for the two new services to make progress to recruitment as quickly as possible, so that both Chief Officers can start recruiting their senior teams, and develop their initial strategic proposals to the SFRS and SPA. COSLA’s members are very concerned that the tight timeframes involved, combined with the proposed appointment processes will undermine accountability at a time when increased accountability is given as a reason for reform. Members were keen that shadow arrangements were in place quickly following the Bill’s enactment.

COSLA suggests ideally that a means be found to fast track at least the appointment of the Chairman, but if at all possible other Board members also, to allow an earlier appointment of chief officers to take place than December 2012/January 2013. As an alternative suggestion, there may be a workable proposal based around using experienced current Board members in the selection of the chief officers. In recent discussion COSLA’s Community Safety Spokesperson has suggested to the Scottish Government that the appointment process could be brought forward if the existing Board Chairs of both Police and Fire & Rescue Services were used as a pool from which to interview applicants once the Bill has gained assent allowing the new Chief Officers to be in place possibly by early September.
Strategic Priorities and Plan, consultation, laying before Parliament etc

The Police Priorities will be set by the Cabinet Secretary after consultation with interested parties, including COSLA and member authorities. For the SFRS it seems likely that the minister will set the priorities and objectives directly. With both services the Strategic Plans will be set by the Board / Authority after consultation with local authorities and COSLA (amongst others). The 3 year plans, once approved by ministers, will be laid before Parliament who will be able to take a view on these and annual reports, questioning both the Board / Authority and their employees as necessary.

COSLA has welcomed some of the clarity achieved here since the initial proposals were put forward. The next significant issue will be the timeframe over which the first draft local plans will be prepared and by who, and the extent to which they tie in with community planning arrangements.

Local Arrangements

Local Committees

During the consultation process COSLA made clear its position that Councils should be in the driving seat over the monitoring of the local plan and overviewing its delivery. COSLA was concerned about the status of its members councils in the process of drafting the plan. The ambiguity in the consultation document over whether Councils were simply being consulted or something more has been removed. Members welcome this being firmed up with such plans requiring to have the approval of the council.

Separately, in earlier responses, COSLA argued for a formal arrangement which places in statute a right of local authorities to hold to account local chief officers and their right to receive a response, in a similar way as currently available with the existing Chief Constables and Chief Fire Officers. Members are content that this now appears to be adequately covered in the wording of the Bill.

By reducing the degree of variation in their form and remit it may make it easier for the Scottish Chief Fire Officer/Chief Constable to manage relations with individual local authorities and to ensure a consistent level of scrutiny across the country.

COSLA’s members would like to see as much detail as practical on the form the local ‘committee’ should take being on the face of the Bill, in part to provide a safeguard for local accountability to prevent it being reduced or removed through secondary legislation by a future government.

Local Senior Officers

The Chief Constable and the SFRS will be required to have adequate arrangements in each local authority area, with a local commander/senior fire officer being designated for each local authority area, although the local lead officer may have responsibility for more than one area. They will be responsible for involving the local authority in determining the priorities and objectives for the services in the area.
The local Chief Officer will have the duties of participating in community planning of the current Chief Constables/Chief Fire Officers placed on them. They will also have the responsibility of preparing and submitting the local plan for agreement with the local authority. In both cases the local senior officers will be subject to the direction and control of the Chief Constable or the SFRS as appropriate in the carrying out of their duties.

COSLA had been concerned that there was insufficient detail over where local elected members could go to if they had concerns about the delivery of the local services. This has largely been sorted out with clearer drafting in the Bill.

Local plans

The local plans, to be revised at least every three years, are to set out the main priorities and objectives for the local area, state what the arrangements for the delivery of these will be, identify the measurable outcomes, and be tied in with other relevant outcomes from the community planning partnership. The format for the plans will be specified by the SFRS/SPA and these will require the plans to address the issues raised in the relevant national strategic plans. Modification to the plans will be subject to the agreement of the local authority.

COSLA has previously stated that we believe decision making and financial responsibility cannot be separated. If local accountability and subsidiarity are really to be enhanced, budgets must be aligned to where the decisions are being taken. Each local plan should be costed and resourced so that progress can be reported on. It would form a basis on which additional local expenditure could be set against. An alternative would be to establish a scheme of delegation to the local chief officers so that they have powers to hold budgets, direct these and officers under their command, and enter into agreement with the local committees. Either would achieve the same end, although the latter would be preferable if the Christie Commission recommendation on “Forging a new concordat between the Scottish Government and Local Government to develop joined-up services, backed by funding arrangements requiring integrated provision” is to be acted on.

COSLA would like to see changes to the Bill to achieve this alignment of plans and resources. For example, councils already directly fund an additional 600 – 800 police officers (who are part of the current force of over 17,234 officers), and we need to be sure in future that the resources we are allocating to Community Safety are in fact still delivering the desired additionality. A budget would make this process transparent.

Regional arrangements

At present there is little information about what the regional arrangements will be between local authority members and national board members or between the local chief officers and the Chief Fire Officer/Chief Constable. The Government maintains a position that much of this will be at the discretion of the new board/authority or the chief officers to arrive at.
While deferring operational decisions over territorial arrangements within the two services may seem reasonable, ideas will need to be developed to manage regionalised work such as Strategic Co-ordination Groups, Community Justice Authorities and Regional Transport Planning.

COSLA also raised the issue of how relatively junior local officers would hold their own against their more senior graded ‘peers’. This is something that may be resolved if the Government officials’ view that smaller population areas could be grouped together under more senior commanders/local senior fire officers is acted on.

Similarly it may be useful to arrive at some early idea for arrangements with members of the SFRS or the SPA acting as liaison members with given authorities/areas, to ensure a smooth flow on information and knowledge about regional matters.

It has been suggested that liaison responsibilities could be placed on members of the relevant boards to ensure that the awareness of local concerns is maintained at a local committee/board level, rather than solely being managed through the command structure.

The Committee is asked to satisfy itself that such an approach will be actively considered in the new arrangements.

Other matters

Resourcing local authority arrangements

As one of the intentions of the Bill is “to strengthen the connection between services and communities, by creating a new formal relationship with each of the 32 local authorities, involving many more local councillors and better integrating with community planning partnerships' the Local authority Fire and Police committees have a serious workload. They will be expected to: formally comment upon the Local Plan; monitor, scrutinise performance and offer improvements; seek reports, answers and explanations regarding the local plan and raise issues with the Chief Constable, Authority and the SFRS as necessary.

COSLA members have been asked about the additional burdens of establishing these. Initial estimates suggest that there would be a requirement of something in the order of £3-4m to have simple administrative roles in place with some policy and analytical capacity. This is an area in need of attention given earlier concerns raised by Audit Scotland and the Scottish Parliament reports regarding instances of apparently 'flawed' police authority scrutiny, and lack of professional officer support.

COSLA are not clear where informed independent professional advice on policing and fire will come from to inform the local committees. This still needs to be dealt with. Amongst the options on the police side are the establishment of a national resource providing support locally or by gaining access to the resources of the SPA - with its Chief Executive having a duty to meet reasonable requests for support. There will be obvious additional on-costs in providing informed local arrangements.
The Committee is asked to satisfy itself that these matters are addressed either on the face of the Bill or managed through agreement with the Scottish Government.

Riotous Assembly

Under the 1824 Act police authorities have responsibility to compensate the public and businesses for damage caused by riot. While this has not been a common problem in the recent past, the disturbances of 2011 and the need for councils to secure insurance cover for high profile events mean that this is a continuing and real burden for some authorities. As the current policing role is transferring to the new national service so should the liability for policing riotous assemblies.

COSLA has approached the Scottish Government over this to resolve the matter, particularly as councils they have no practical or theoretical ways of actively mitigating the risk.

COSLA would like to see this matter addressed in this piece of primary legislation, or a formal agreement being reached with the Scottish Government that the new Police Authority would cover all the liabilities that remain with Scottish councils.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill – Financial Memorandum
COSLA Submission to the Finance Committee

Background

COSLA welcomes the opportunity to provide a submission to the Finance Committee on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. The Committee should note that our submission focuses on the high level financial implications as a result of moving to a single Police and Fire service, rather than concentrating on the detailed questions as outlined by the Committee.

The Committee should also be aware that COSLA is also submitting evidence as part of the scrutiny of the Police and Fire Reform Bill to the Scottish Parliament’s Justice and Local Government and Regeneration Committee. These submissions provide the Parliamentary Committees with more detail around COSLA’s position on some of the wider areas associated with the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill, however we would be more than happy to share these submissions with the Finance Committee should members consider this helpful.

Financing Principles

COSLA would wish to ensure that in moving to a single Police and Fire Authority that there are essentially two overarching principles that are applied:

i. The first of these is to ensure that there is as smooth a transition process in transferring to a single Police and Fire authority as possible, and this involves appropriate engagement with all key stakeholders to work through this process.

ii. The second is to ensure that the single Police and Fire Authorities remain properly resourced to ensure that they can deliver the necessary services to support the safety and wellbeing of communities in Scotland.

Transition to a Single Police and Fire Service

As highlighted above, COSLA would wish to ensure that there is as smooth a transition process in transferring to single Police and Fire authorities as possible, and this involves appropriate engagement with all key stakeholders to work through this process. COSLA acknowledges that various groups have or are in the process of being set up by the Scottish Government to work through many of the issues which have been highlighted within this submission, and we will work with the Scottish Government to ensure that there is appropriate stakeholder representation and consideration of the issues which are necessary to ensure that the transition to a single Police and Fire service is delivered in as smooth a way as possible.

COSLA is currently in discussions with the Scottish Government and respective stakeholders through a wide range of working groups which have or are in the process of being set up to consider the issues associated with moving to a single Police and Fire service. Particularly, throughout these discussions, COSLA would wish to ensure that there is appropriate consideration around:

i. The actual funding which will be required to deliver the single Police and Fire service and ensuring that this is at an appropriate level in order to provide the services required to support the local communities. This will include discussions around the current funding which is provided as part of the Local Government Finance settlement, both revenue and capital.

ii. The assets and liabilities that are currently held and used by the existing Police and Fire Boards and consideration around what will transfer as part of the new arrangements.

iii. Wider workforce issues associated with the creation of a new single Police and Fire service including transfer of staff and any wider pension’s implications. Given the risk around Police and Fire pensions is currently transferred and met by the Scottish Government, COSLA would wish reassurances that the current arrangements will remain when moving to a single Police and Fire service.

iv. Clear accountability for control of costs and delivery of savings during transition to the new National arrangements. Given the April 2013 provisional start date and the likely timescale for appointments to SFRS, SPA and Chief Officer posts, it will be extremely challenging to establish clear accountability for financial management for the financial year 2013-14.

Properly Resourced Single Police and Fire Authority

The Financial Memorandum which is being presented to Parliament includes a range of costs and anticipated savings arising from the move to the single Police and Fire service. Many of these costs have previously been included as part of the Outline Business Case for moving to a single Police and Fire Service. COSLA welcomes the Committee’s scrutiny of the costs to ensure that these are based on robust evidence and that any anticipated savings are realistic and can be realised particularly within the timescales identified.

In general terms, COSLA believes that the estimated costs and savings set out in the Financial Memorandum are not supported by robust evidence. For example, there are particular concerns regarding the reasonableness and accuracy of the following key estimates:

- The Fire and Rescue Outline Business Case includes estimated savings of £8m pa through “risk assessing and applying consistent crewing practice which could involve some redistribution. This includes reviewing risk-based thresholds for crewing appliances.” The timing and level of savings assumed in this area is not supported by evidence. This is likely to be a highly sensitive political matter and delivery of this saving should be considered as high risk both in terms of achievement of estimated savings and maintenance of service outcomes.
• Voluntary Redundancy (VR) costs for Police Staff are estimated at £81m over 5 years including £73m over the 3 years from 2013-14. This estimate implies a voluntary reduction in Police Staff numbers of around 2,000 FTE (30%) over a three-year period. No robust evidence is available to support this estimate and the timing and level of costs does not seem plausible. In addition the estimated VR costs for Police (£81m) are 20 times greater than the estimate of £4m which is included for VR within the Fire & Rescue Service – a ratio of around 5:1 for Police costs relative to Fire and Rescue costs would be expected given relative staffing and budget levels.

Financial Implications arising from the proposed model of Governance

COSLA has previously expressed wider concerns around the proposed NDPB model of governance and the impact on overall national and local accountability; however there are also a number of financial implications in moving to this model which we would wish to highlight to the Committee, and these are outlined in more detail within the paragraphs below.

Members of the Committee will be aware that under the current structures for Police and Fire, the forces are able (under section 33 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994) to recover VAT costs incurred. The Financial Memorandum which has been presented to Parliament recognises that the proposed service delivery model will mean that forces will no longer be able to recover VAT and as such there will be an additional cost to both Police and Fire services, and ultimately from overall public finances. We do have concerns around the need for this additional cost to be incurred, particularly given the scale of the financial impact on the available public finances. We recognise that the Scottish Government is in discussions with HM Treasury and HMRC to ascertain whether there can be any exemptions to this and this is welcomed. Nevertheless there remain some concerns from professional associations around the estimated additional costs which would be incurred, with indications suggesting that this could be significantly more than the current estimated costs. Given the significance of this additional recurring cost, we urge the Committee to seek resolution of this matter. The Committee is asked to scrutinise the robustness of the current estimated costs, the potential service implications of this additional expenditure, and the likelihood that HM Treasury and HMRC will grant exemptions to the SPS and the SFRS.

In addition to the VAT implications, the proposed governance structure will not allow the new single Police and Fire Services to be able to hold reserves. The holding of reserves is regarded as good financial management practice as they provide a contingency to cushion against the impact of unexpected events or emergencies. Given the nature of the services which Police and Fire deliver, expenditure within an emergency service can often be volatile, and reserves are often utilised to smooth the impact of such events including; above budgeted pay awards or inflationary pressures, protracted emergency or major incidents or other exceptional circumstances. Given this flexibility would no longer exist; the Committee may wish to seek reassurance from the Scottish Government how it intends to deal with any such fluctuations or major incidents from within their overall resources.
Resourcing Local Authority Arrangements

In addition, the Committee will be aware that one of the intentions of the Bill is ‘to strengthen the connection between services and communities, by creating a new formal relationship with each of the 32 local authorities, involving many more local councillors and better integrating with community planning partnerships’. There still remains uncertainty around the wider establishment and arrangements of these Committees, however given there is likely to still remain a role for local authority Fire and Police Committees, there needs to be consideration around the financial cost to local authorities in delivering this local arrangements, particularly given the funding to deliver the single Police and Fire service will be removed from the Local Government settlement.

The Financial Memorandum provides some initial estimates in the order of £3-4m which has been provided by COSLA around the anticipated cost to local authorities in establishing and administering these Committees. This may be an area which the Committee may wish to consider in more detail to ensure that there is an appropriate level of remuneration provided to Councils to meet these on-going costs required to deliver the appropriate local scrutiny, particularly given earlier concerns which have been raised by Audit Scotland and indeed previous Scottish Parliamentary reports regarding appropriate scrutiny.

In addition, there still remains uncertainty as to where any informed independent professional advice on policing and fire will come from to inform the local committees. There are a number of options which are currently being considered including examples for police to establish a national resource providing support locally or by gaining access to the resources of the SPA. Clearly there may be additional on-costs in providing informed local arrangements which has not been separately identified within the Financial Memorandum, and again this may be an area which the Committee may wish to explore in more detail in order to tease out any anticipated cost.

Conclusion

COSLA has highlighted a number of areas which they hope that the Committee will consider as part of its scrutiny process of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. We are however more than happy to provide the Committee with any further clarification around any of these issues which are outlined within this submission.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Supplementary written submission from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities

Having reflected on the evidence, Cllr Grant asked that I clarify a couple of points that she and Cllr Watters raised. She felt that there was the possibility they could have been misinterpreted by the Committee.

You will recall that Cllr Watters spoke on the 600-800 additional police officer posts funded by local authorities for various reasons. TUPE was mentioned during that discussion. Cllr Grant wanted it to be clear that these posts are held within the existing forces’ establishment – ie while councils pay for them from funds additional to the grant to the relevant police force, councils are not the employer. TUPE would undoubtedly apply to these postholders the same as any other police force employee on 31 March 2013. However, Cllr Watters’ point was that the Government’s current assumption was that all 600-800 would actually still be in post on that date. He questioned whether councils would continue to fund these posts in 2012/13, given that the additional funding being provided would likely transfer with the posts out of Local Government and into the new single service budget to subsidise the commitment to 1000 extra police officers in the new single service. The reason for the additional funding will vary in each case but primarily it will be for specific local community safety benefit, or for preventative work. Even had the existing regional structure continued, such funding of posts should not be assumed to be a commitment by a council for ever. And the simplest way for a council to avoid losing the funding on 31 March 2013 is not to be funding a post at that time. Cllr Watters was not suggesting that this would necessarily happen, just that the fact that this additional funding would automatically transfer with the service was another assumption that the Government seemed to be making.

Further Cllr Watters had concerns that, in future, councils might be less likely to fund ‘additional’ posts in their local area, unless they were absolutely sure that this was not actually substituting for previously existing posts in their area that the Chief Constable had chosen to move elsewhere in the country. The only way that COSLA can see to avoid this is to have local budgets, approved alongside the local plan.

One final point that Cllr Grant thought had not been clear enough in our evidence was around the local and regional accountability of the police force in future. Everyone accepts that this works well at the moment and the police are committed to community planning. That works because the police is a Local Government service and, ultimately, it is local elected members who are accountable to the electorate for it – every local authority being a police authority. However in future, while a commander (or for us, the Chief Constable) will have a duty to participate in community planning, there will be no accountability locally. Elected members will not have the same relationship with the police at any level, as they are no longer their employers. While this may not mean much difference in the short term, our concern is that in the longer term as personalities change the culture will be to prioritise reporting and responding upward and centrally to those that run the service, rather than outward to councils and communities across the country. That is why we feel that there must remain some genuine local accountability into the future. Local “committees” must provide the opportunity for more than just the reporting of statistics.

One final point which was not raised with us by the Committee, but was asked of Conveners. COSLA is keen that the new SPA and SFRS and their sub-committees meet transparently in public, on the same basis as boards and council committees do now. Accordingly they must be sited somewhere that is easily accessible and should consider regular meetings around the country, council chambers being an obvious possibility.

I hope this is helpful to you in clarifying the points that Cllrs Grant and Watters were making.

Introduction

The Council’s response to the Justice Committee is based on its submissions to the Scottish Government’s consultations on police and fire reform and public service reform (Christie Commission). The Council has also provided written evidence to the Finance Committee on the Financial Memorandum accompanying the Bill.

A measured and comprehensive approach must be taken to ensure that police and fire and rescue services (and other public services) are fit for purpose for the long term.

However, it is essential that arrangements are in place by 1 April 2013 to deal with key issues such as complaints and conduct.

The Council supports the undernoted Principles of Public Service Reform:

- reform should be framed in terms of the improvement of outcomes
- reform should look at the whole of the public sector not just one element
- reform should be based on robust evidence and a business case that generates community benefit - and this implies local integration rather than central aggregation
- reform should not focus on structures and boundaries to the exclusion of other issues relating to finance, policy, systems and governance
- local democracy and accountability should be at the heart of the reform process and should be enhanced by reform rather than diminished

1. General

1.1 New statutory principles for policing

These are welcomed and a similar statutory purpose for the fire and rescue service to be included in a new Fire and Rescue Framework under the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 is also welcomed.

1.2 Accountability

The Chief Constable and Chief Officer should be accountable not only to the Scottish Police Authority (SPA) and Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Board (SFRSB), but also to Councils. It is recognised that the detailed arrangements for performance against local plans, budgets and staffing levels are yet to be defined.
1.3 Budgets

Budget details require urgent clarification as the relatively short time available does not allow for confidence and rigour in the projections for financial savings.

2. SPA and SFRSB

2.1 National Boards - size and composition

Councillors must be the foundation of the SPA and the SFRSB. The Authority/Board should have at least 15 members - including 8 Councillors nominated by COSLA - based on expertise, experience and skills and ensuring a geographic spread.

2.2 Strategic Plans

The statutory duties on Scottish Ministers to consult local authority representative bodies before determining strategic police priorities and for the SPA and SFRSB to consult local authorities on their strategic plans are welcomed.

2.3 Status of the new SPA and SFRS

The status of the new services requires urgent consideration to avoid an undesirable position of inability to borrow money (without Ministerial approval); hold reserves; avoid VAT liability; and address the perception of policing and fire and rescue being part of political government.

3. Community Planning

3.1 There should be a statutory duty on the Chief Constable and the Chief Officer - in addition to the Local Commander and Local Senior Officer - to participate in local community planning activity. The statutory duty to include community planning information in the police and fire and rescue local plans is welcomed. The outcome of the national review of Community Planning and Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs) might further inform future community planning arrangements.

3.2 Police and fire and rescue services make a significant contribution to community safety and public protection through involvement at strategic, thematic and local levels and there should be no detriment in local arrangements as a result of reform.

3.3 All inter-agency/multi-agency partnerships will need to be re-examined as the new policing and fire and rescue structures and policies are put in place, including Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) - and local representation is key. This requires sufficient capacity and capability across police and fire and rescue services at local level for the arrangements to be effective.
3.4 There must be regular and meaningful communication and engagement across partners and communities as the single services are developed and put in place.

4. Local Arrangements

4.1 There should be Local Government Elected Member representation in the selection process for the appointment of Local Commanders and Local Senior Officers.

4.2 We welcome the statutory duty on the Local Commander and Local Senior Officer to prepare local plans - for approval by the local authority - that meet the needs of the local area. Local plans should include budget arrangements. In the highly unlikely event that a local authority cannot agree a plan then there must be clear mechanisms to address this.

4.3 Each Local Commander and Local Senior Officer must be provided with a suitable level of budget and decision making autonomy to allow genuine flexibility to engage with the CPP and associated SOA. This should be included in the Bill. The arrangements for local service delivery must contribute to the commitments in SOAs.

4.4 Local accountability is crucial (necessitating an agreed local budget) together with clarity of responsibility and roles.

4.5 Existing local high quality and responsive service delivery and problem solving must continue. If there is any detriment to current service provision, Councils may find themselves having to consider funding additional services e.g. extra police or adding to their own services e.g. to tackle antisocial behaviour.

4.6 Local decision making about police and fire and rescue services should be evidence-based.

4.7 Local employment opportunities must be considered, particularly in rural areas where police and fire and rescue personnel have a key contribution to local fiscal and social economies, and this must be taken into account when decisions are made about the future numbers and location of posts and services.

4.8 A statutory basis for Councils in relation to local committee arrangements for police and fire and rescue services would be helpful, perhaps in the form of a framework setting out the role of committees but avoiding being prescriptive given that best practice and guidance might come from the Pathfinder projects.

4.9 The clarity provided in the Bill for the transfer of staff and property is welcomed. However, it is imperative that the TUPE transfer of police support staff is comprehensive, will not result in any liabilities on employer Councils and will demonstrate the value we place on these staff, their skills and contribution. Further clarity is also required about the detail of assets and liabilities to be transferred.
Introduction

The Equality and Human Rights Commission (the Commission) was established in statute in the Equality Act 2006 and came into being on 1 October 2007. The Commission champions equality and human rights for all, working to eliminate discrimination, reduce inequality, protect human rights and make sure that everyone has a fair chance to participate in society. We promote equality across the seven ‘protected’ grounds – age, disability, gender, race, religion and belief, sexual orientation and gender reassignment.

The Commission welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Bill at Stage 1, in relation to Equality law and regulation in Scotland, and embedding equality and human rights and equality principles into the structures and ways of working of the new national services.

Equality Obligations on Public Authorities in Scotland

Our interest in the reform of the Police and Fire Service stems our role as the Regulator for the Equality Act and Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED). The PSED requires public authorities, in the exercise of its functions, to pay ‘due regard’ to the need to:

- Eliminate discrimination, harassment, victimisation, or other unlawful conduct;
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a relevant protected characteristic and those who do not; and
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

The new duty applies across the ‘protected characteristics’ of age; disability; gender; gender reassignment; pregnancy and maternity; race; religion and belief and sexual orientation. The protected characteristic of marriage and civil partnership is covered by the elimination of discrimination requirement only.

The general duty encourages the mainstreaming of equality into authorities’ core business so it is not a marginal activity but a key component of what authorities do.

In addition, Scottish Ministers have the power to introduce ‘specific duties’ which set out the particular steps that authorities in Scotland should take to help meet the general duty. The Scottish Government will shortly lay regulation in Parliament outlining what these duties will contain, but we anticipate that, among other provisions, there will be an emphasis on setting outcomes, equality impact assessment of strategic and budgetary decisions, and the involvement and engagement of protected groups.

Given that the new police and fire service will be required to meet the PSED it will be important for the equality challenges that these are considered from the outset. Many police forces have made considerable progress in developing good practice in, for example, addressing hate crime or domestic violence, and are members of effective local partnerships which deliver responsive and multi-disciplinary services to victims. It is very important that local successes, best practice and learning is not lost.

There is clearly an opportunity to embed good equality practice from the outset of the new Services and it will be important to address some of the long term challenges that have been problematic for the Police and Fire Service in the past. For example:

- How will the national police and fire services’ workforces better reflect the communities they serve?
- How can equality monitoring of staff and service users be established and used effectively to improve representation and service delivery? We support comments made by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) in its written evidence on the Bill in the regard.

Embedding learning and human rights and equality principles

The Commission has positive relations with current Scottish police forces and fire services, engaging through, for example the community planning partnership structures across Scotland. We also meet regularly with leadership organisations such as ACPOS. This is particularly important in working together to embed recommendations from EHRC enforcement work, for example from our two recent inquiries into disability-related harassment, and human trafficking. Both these inquiries make findings and recommendations in relation to issues such as information sharing, inter-agency working, data gathering and analysis, and consistency in approach to the needs of victims and service users across the country.

Moving to national structures for police and fire services does of course present opportunities for driving strategic change and ensuring consistency of approach. But

1 There are a number of issues. The national board will be a very important part of the new structure. The one thing that has been missing from the discussion so far and is missing from the bill is the part that the citizen plays in it. There is no reference to the connectivity between the national authority and the citizen, nor is there any direct reflection in the bill of the relationship with the citizen and the local authority. To ensure that the process is democratic, there must be some form of compulsion on the police authority to have a consultation process with the citizen so that it is informed by what the people of Scotland think….There absolutely must be a link between the local and the national; the bill is currently silent on that and must clearly define the link. It must also set out the requirement for consultation with citizens, to ensure that citizens’ voices are heard. Evidence to the Justice Committee, 28 February 2012, http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/29847.aspx it also presents challenges, for example, in relation to how national structures will engage with local strategic or delivery networks and partnerships, either current (Community Planning Partnerships, Community Safety Partnerships, adult and child protection committees) or planned (for example Health and Social Care Partnerships).

Conclusion

The Commission has no argument in principle with the introduction of national police and fore and rescue services in Scotland, but shares concerns with a number of other organisations as to how changes on structure can be managed so as to preserve existing expertise, good practice, local networks and links to the public.

Equality and Human Rights Commission
6 March 2012
Introduction

The Fire Brigades Union (FBU) welcomes the introduction of the Police and Fire Reform Bill as an opportunity to further define the establishment of the new single Scottish Fire & Rescue Service (SFRS), but also to improve on the provisions of the existing Fire (Scotland) Act 2005.

The fire service changed from being a UK wide National Fire Service during the years of World War II to a local authority service with the introduction of the Fire Services Act 1947. This legislation served well for almost 60 years. It was replaced, along with many of its supporting bodies and advisory structures with the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005. The latter legislation crucially changed fire brigades into fire and rescue services, which did recognise the role of firefighters in dealing with road traffic accidents (RTAs). What the Act did not anticipate was that the public understanding of the definition of “rescue” would mean a much wider and altogether more onerous role for the service.

FBU members the length and breadth of our country are now involved in a wide range of specialist rescue roles, with capabilities in a number of disciplines, from water rescue to mass decontamination. Our members have taken on this expanded role with professionalism and determination. We believe there are further opportunities for both the enhanced deployment of specialist rescue skills and the co-ordination of these capabilities, but this will rely on the legislative foundation being set in such a way as to allow for the service to adapt to meet public expectation. We do recognise that with a shrinking financial settlement this will prove to be a challenge but believe the structural changes to a single service will allow for development of Scotland wide strategic specialist skills, however our fear remains that a new Board may retreat back to providing just those functions that are statutory.

We are of the view that the fire and rescue service sits fully within and is integral to the community safety family. We believe that even in this time of financial constraint the role of the service in making our communities safer can be enhanced. The existing Fire and Rescue Services (FRS) have for many years led the way in developing fire prevention. There remains considerable work to be done in this area but by fully integrating prevention with the response capability the service can further reduce the cost, both social and economic of the impact of fire. By utilising such expertise we believe that the service has a role to play in the wider community safety environment and we call for a parallel approach that provides for a preventative aspect, complimentary to each intervention role the service develops. For example, as the ability to deliver water rescue increases so should the ability to provide water safety advice.
During the Independent Review of Open Water and Flood Rescue in Scotland\(^1\) ordered by the Minister for Community Safety and conducted by Mr Paddy Tomkins, a recommendation was made that the fire services should hold a register of water rescue assets. We view this as a model that can be developed for a wider range of rescue and community safety assets and that the new legislation should establish the new Scottish FRS (SFRS) as the Primary Rescue Service.

The fire service has a range of industrial relations practices that reflect the individual circumstances within the current 8 FRS. The FBU are keen to ensure that the development of the new single SFRS provides an opportunity for a more inclusive, collaborative approach to such matters. A great deal of effort has already taken place and the development of relationships between Scottish Government officials, current employers, senior managers and the FBU that has allowed progress on transitional arrangements. This also gives reason for optimism that such an approach might be carried forward into the new service.

The FBU are keen that the new SFRS is not blighted by poor industrial relations but does recognise that much of the current progress relies on relationships that are currently in place. We are of the view that these positive developments are vulnerable and should be protected wherever possible by the determination of Government attitude and policy. We therefore believe that the positive tone adopted by Scottish Government in the consultation document should form the basis of future procedures with the service and that this will be best secured by direct reference within the new Act.

Another major item in relation to the new service and the Bill is scrutiny and governance. We have long held the view that the current arrangements are sub-optimal and that a significant benefit of the new service will be an opportunity to improve the governance arrangements of the service. The foremost item will be the ability for the new SFRS board to access opinion other than that of the Chief Fire Officer (CFO). This does not mean that the CFO is wrong, but it does give an opportunity for other views and options to be considered.

It should also be recognised that the Board are governing the service on behalf of the people of Scotland and should therefore ultimately be answerable to the people of Scotland. We hold the opinion that the best way to do that is through the democratically elected representatives of the people, that being the members of the Scottish Parliament. We would welcome the robust scrutiny and oversight that parliamentarians would bring to the process and which brings together the national outcomes, established by Parliament, the SFRS Framework, approved by Parliament and the budget that is set by Parliament.

The FBU remains committed to the creation of a world-class fire and rescue service in Scotland and our officials are available should further information be required.

Specific Areas of Consideration

Functions of the SFRS

\(^1\) http://www.floodrescueuk.com/0091079.pdf
Chapter 2 currently details the Functions – Fire safety, fire fighting, road traffic accidents.

Whilst this seems clear it does not reflect the current range of services provided, nor does it indicate the public perception in relation to the capabilities of the service.

This should be broadened out to reflect the wider role and range of operations?

There is currently an opportunity to merge the Additional Functions Order\(^2\) into the revised Fire (Scotland) Act

Should make reference to additional functions, wider scope being deliverable in terms of funding for equipment, personnel and training.

The service must publicly declare its capabilities and limitations based on Integrated Risk Management Planning (IRMP).

References to “other eventualities” should be removed and incorporated through IRMP

We have firefighting and safety but not RTA safety. The function should balance the need for prevention with the delivery of intervention.

The current legislation is a cluttered landscape with specific function, general or catch-all clauses and additional functions orders. These do not reflect the fact that the public in Scotland now have an expectation of the service, thanks to the renaming of the service in the 2005 Act to include “rescue”. This results in a belief that the service can actually provide a rescue service. Something it has not fully come to terms with, nor in fact does it have the legislative basis on which to carry out some of these functions.

We believe that the legislation should place the underpinning ethos of the service as the basis from which all else is derived. We suggest;

1. Save Life
2. Protect Property
3. Render Humanitarian Services

The revised Act should make clear direction that the activities of the service should be derived from the Framework document and based on the Integrated Risk Management Plan. This would allow for the service to develop a range of services that could provide local solutions to local needs, supported by a national capability to react across the country.

- There should be a wider community safety role.
- We should promote safety in relation to each other element of the services scope of operations. Water, Road Traffic Collisions for example?
- Powers to co-ordinate other agencies in emergency events should be added in line with Tomkins recommendations re water rescue.
- General powers as the primary rescue service.
- A direct reference to the services obligations under the Civil Contingencies Act 2004 and the Civil Contingencies (Scotland) Act 2005 should be included.
- The requirements under these Acts should be included in any IRMP.

Other considerations should include:

- Firefighting at sea. This has seen its funding recently withdrawn by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency\(^3\). The Scottish Government should consider the provision of a maritime safety provision within the Act.
- The relationship with Climate Change legislation and obligations under that legislation should be incorporated into the Act.
- Both in terms of the service corporate responsibilities and in terms of prevention and response including their obligations to minimise environmental damage etc.

Employment

- Establish the principle of a partnership approach

In the consultation on reform in February 2011 at paragraph 4.30 Organisational Structure, the Government described the following as one of the key principals and desired benefits: A new and active social partnership approach should sit at the heart of future industrial relations, based on shared recognition of common interests and common ownership of the resolution of problems.

Whilst the FBU applaud the efforts of the Government and its Civil Servants so far to promote this approach, as far as the FBU can determine there is nothing in the Bill to ensure such an approach to industrial relations shall prevail. In fact, with the deletion of Chapter 9, paragraph 49 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005, a safety net, as the FBU saw it, that indicated that Ministers could order the provision of a body ‘for the purposes of negotiation the conditions of service of employees . . . . ’ will be lost.

By reinstating this provision the FBU believes a clear signal shall be sent to both the Board and the Chief of the new Service that they should be endeavouring to promote the industrial relations platform described in the consultation.

- There should be primary reference to employee representation through the partnership approach at all levels within the service.
- Agreed procedures for interaction – including the availability of recognised trade union officials with agreed facility time to undertake these duties.
- Negotiating arrangements – We strongly believe that any negotiating arrangements for the new board should be approved by Scottish Ministers.
- Negotiations to extend to pensions, replacing the current arrangements under the 1947 Act – section 26 (6) Any order under this section shall be made with the approval of the [Minister for the Civil Service], and after consultation with the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council.
- Given the powers currently outlined in the Act empowering firefighters to enter premises etc, there is an enhanced level of public trust required
- The status of firefighters employment rights should reflect this.
- Improved discipline code, above current ACAS Code of Practise to take account of this employment status with similarities to the Police.
- Section 25 of the 2005 Act should be revised to; o take account of the wider role of the firefighter

o protect the status of the firefighter by issuing of a warrant

- Final appeal over discipline and grievance to the employer and not a delegated power to management.
- Improved, agreed grievance procedure

Scrutiny

The basis of scrutiny is the ability to bring both internal and external information to bear on a subject and to ensure through robust challenge that the best options are being selected. This is singularly the weakest point of the current FRS arrangements and the FBU welcomes proposals to strengthen the oversight of the service and its provisions. Over and above the selection of the new board of the SFRS we view it as crucial that they have access to external expert opinion, advice and resources and that they in turn are held to account on behalf of the people of Scotland.

- We believe there is a need for a high level of scrutiny in order to maintain public confidence in the service
- We believe the Scottish Parliament must take a role in this process
- We suggest the Justice Committee is best placed to act in this way.
- We suggest that on a regular basis the activities of the service are called before the Justice Committee for scrutiny, including oral evidence from;
  - The Chief Officer
  - The Chair of SFRS
  - The Chief Inspector of Fire & Rescue Service
  - Representatives of the workforce
  - Such other witnesses as determined by the Committee.

Strategic Plan

- We believe the strategic plan should indicate how the SFRS will contribute to the Scottish Government National Outcomes, by carrying out its functions.
- All SFRS activity should be developed in order to maximise the impact on the National Outcomes.
- We consider it essential that the strategic planning of the SFRS be scrutinised at the highest level.
- We suggest that the Justice Committee should scrutinise that plan and should report its finings to Scottish Ministers.
- We suggest an amendment to section 41, after (4) to read,
  - (a)“SFRS must submit the strategic plan prepared under subsection (1) to the Scottish Parliament Justice Committee for scrutiny.”
  - (b) The Justice Committee shall make a report on its findings and submit that report to the Scottish Minister for consideration.

The strategic plan is a vital element of the SFRS. It must be based on the principles of Integrated Risk Management Planning (IRMP) but must avoid the fundamental flaw in the way that IRMP is currently utilised. That is the ability for the process to run in reverse. By this we mean that IRMP should measure the risk and establish the FRS response that mitigates that risk. Clearly the overall budget will determine how much of the risk can be mitigated but it does not in itself remove the underlying risk. It must also – as its founding principle – ensure firefighter safety by the provision of sufficient personnel, equipment, training and supervision, to ensure a successful outcome of SFRS activities. IRMP has been a much-misused tool and it is important therefore that strategic planning on the new SFRS uses a process that all parties believe to be fair, resilient and transparent.

It is our view that the Scotland wide IRMP should establish the deployment of resources across the country and that local plans should determine how best to utilise the allocated resources in order to have the maximum impact on community safety within each area. This process should be the subject of external scrutiny.

The strategic plan, through IRMP should establish how the FRS will deliver its service, in line with the Framework and our legislative function. It must do so in such a way as to meet the aspirations set in the National Outcomes. This should form the basis for the funding of the SFRS in order that the service, the SFRS Board, Parliament and the people of Scotland are content that the service is suitably resourced to deliver on its commitments.

General Points on the Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

- Membership – section 2
  - We believe that at least one member of the board should be appointed with a particular portfolio including the representation of the employees of the service, as afforded to the workforce employed by Scottish Water and firefighters in Northern Ireland.

- The Chief Officer – section 8
  - This section could include reference to the Chief Officer holding the principles of partnership

- SFRS’s employees – section 9 (3)
  - The Bill states that SFRS “may pay or make arrangements for the payment of pensions, ...” This should allow the SFRS to negotiate arrangements for pensions without the external interference of UK Govt.

- Procedure - section 11
  - We believe that this section should specify the minimum number of time the Board of the SFRS should meet in a year, and should ensure that these meetings are accessible by the public.

- SFRS’s general powers – section 12 (2) (e)
  - The FBU are concerned that this power could be utilised in the future to privatise all or part of the service.

- Delegation of functions – section 13 (3)
  - The Bill highlights the fact that whilst SFRS has the ability to delegate its functions it does maintain the responsibility for those delegated functions. Our concern stems from experience of similar powers within previous Fire Authorities. This situation can lead to a lack of scrutiny as the person reporting on the success of delegated powers is the person to whom they have been delegated. We suggest a specific report to Scottish Ministers and/or Justice Committee on the impact of this section.
• Grants – section 15
  o The basis for funding the service is not clearly defined. Historically this was based on the ability of services to comply with national standards of fire cover. More recently this link has been broken and the result has been cuts to frontline provision and an increase in support functions. The Bill should clarify the basis on which the level of funding for the service will be determined.
• Provision of centres for education and training o Amend from current “may” to “will”
• Charging – section 16 of 2005 Act
  o Allows for charging for incidents at sea – “only in respect of action taken by the authority at sea (or, if the authority's area extends to the low water mark, action taken at sea outwith its area.” There is a proposal to amend this in terms of SFRS. Consideration needs to be given to;
    ▪ The low water mark was relevant to the boundary of local authority responsibility. Is this the same for Scottish Government?
    ▪ This also related to the person injury insurance cover of employees. A major obstacle to FBU members support for these activities.
    ▪ The ability of the SFRS to deliver this service at all, if the firefighting at sea capability is lost due to MCA funding cuts.
• Assistance – section 35 of the 2005 Act
  o In line with the Tomkins recommendation relating to water rescue, a duty should be placed on the SFRS to maintain a register of all third party rescue assets.
  o The SFRS should be identifies at the primary rescue service and should co-ordinate the deployment of third party assets to an incident.
  o A duty should be placed on the SFRS to ensure interoperability between third party providers and other agencies.
• Delegation – section 36 of the 2005 Act
  o (2a) SFRS entering into arrangements to delegate firefighting. This should be clarified to ensure that specialist firefighters such as airport fire services are covered by assistance arrangements and this is not open to privatisation of the service.
• Assaulting or impeding – Section 38 and 39 of the 2005 Act
  o Relationship with Emergency Workers Act (EWA) requires clarification ▪ Currently penalties are different between the two Acts
    ▪ Should this be reduced to a reference to the EWA?
• Best Value – section 39B (3)(b) o Consultation. After “such other persons as they think appropriate”, add, including trade unions.
• Adherence – section 41(1) of the 2005 Act
  o Suggested amendment to read, “In carrying out their functions, relevant authorities will adhere to the document prepared under section 40(1).”
• Inspectors of the SFRS 43A (1) (b) o Consideration must be given to where inspectors are recruited from, and where they will go having completed their role.
Self-inspection by the service raises concerns over the veracity of reporting, when individuals who as part of the service and who must seek promotion from within that service, conduct this.

- Inquiries by inspectors 43B
  - (1) Suggest removal of “may inquire” and replace with “will inquire”
  - (3)(b) Whilst the requirement to undertake consideration of best value arrangements, it may be that inspectors recruited from the service may not have the required knowledge to undertake this aspect of an inquiry.

- Payments in respect of advisory bodies – section 83 of the 2005 Act
  - Should be removed.

Summary

1. The revised Act should clarify the statutory functions by reference to the overarching ethos of the service;
   a. Save Life
   b. Protect Property
   c. Render Humanitarian Services

2. The Act should direct the Framework to be more detailed in defining the duties, responsibilities and how the above functions are conducted, by reference to IRMP.

3. Industrial relations should be based on a partnership approach.

4. Negotiating arrangements should be approved by the Scottish Ministers and should include all the pensions schemes of employees.

5. We believe the Scottish Parliament must take an active role in both the scrutiny and in setting the direction of the service. We suggest this is done principally on the basis of;
   a. Scrutiny of SFRS strategic plans
   b. Annual scrutiny of service by Justice Committee
   c. Influence/direction on the Framework process

6. The basis, formula or other method, for determining the funding of the service should be established.

John Duffy
Scottish Secretary
2 March 2012
This memorandum is submitted to the Justice Committee to assist their scrutiny of the police provisions of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill.

Background

This evidence is based, in part, on long experience of working with the Scottish Police Service. In various roles I have worked with Scottish Forces since 1977. I was for four years Head of the Scottish Justice Department, and am also a non-executive member of the management team of Lothian and Borders Police.

Overall Approach

I have been one of those who have expressed concern about having only a single police force in Scotland. It is clear however that a majority in the Scottish Parliament support it, and so I regard that decision as in effect now taken. This memorandum therefore accepts that there is to be one force and concentrates on how the Bill might be improved.

The Governance of Scottish Policing

The governance of policing is unusually important, because of the nature of the powers which the police have and the discretion which they exercise when using them. The police wield the domestic coercive power of the State over citizens. This must be held to account (as it is in various ways), and be subject to democratic scrutiny and influence, but care must be taken that this coercive power cannot be directed for political purposes.

In Britain this has been secured in a number of ways. The police are answerable to the courts, and operate under the supervision and in some matters the direction of the public prosecution authorities. Police constables are officers of the law, and have powers and discretion legally vested in them; they hold an office, rather than an employment. Britain also has a tradition that policing is a local service, enforcing the law of the land, and not a national agency enforcing the will of government.

When policing developed in Britain in the nineteenth century, it was consciously and deliberately contrasted with the models of policing on mainland Europe – notably France. British policing was to be decentralised, a servant of the law and not a tool of central state power. Of course it is possible to exaggerate this difference, which is as much presentational as real – police forces discharge very similar functions in most countries, and their forms share many characteristics as a result. British central government has always taken an interest in policing, and that has increased markedly in recent decades.
Nevertheless Scottish policing does rest on a tripartite model, in which power and responsibility are distributed between central and local government and Chief Constables. The Bill will abolish that. Are we about to lose something valuable without realising it?

It is very easy to see the problems of the tripartite system. Power is distributed, and it is not therefore easy to see who is in charge. Change is difficult to push through: too many people can exercise a veto. There may be a perception that Chief Constables are allowed to do whatever they want, with little accountability. Police Boards – comprising members from up to a dozen local councils – have not always been strong supervisors of forces.

But these problems are precisely the signs that power is indeed effectively distributed. The relative weakness of police boards is a problem, but it is one that is capable of being rectified – and recent audit work has shown that measurable progress is being made in doing so. Abolishing the tripartite system may well give greater clarity and make it easier to push through change; and may subject a Chief Constable to greater control. The converse is a big risk - concentration of power. This memorandum therefore goes on to consider amendments which might be made to the Bill to mitigate this risk.

The role of local government

At the moment local authorities are all police authorities and policing is a local government function, in relation to which Scottish Ministers have certain statutory powers. The SCDEA is the only national policing body in Scotland. Local councils also have lead statutory responsibility in relation to community planning, in which police forces are required to participate. Under the Bill policing will no longer be a local government function, but councils will still lead community planning.

Clauses 45 - 48 of the Bill give councils some replacement powers. The Police Service must have a local commander for each council area; that officer must participate in community planning and must additionally submit a local policing plan to the council. If they do not like the plan the council have the power to ensure it is not published. These are obviously much weaker powers than councils have at present over policing, and it is very hard to see them as greater local accountability. A number of options exist to strengthen that relationship:

- There is no reason in principle why a single force could not be part of local government. Rather than a quango appointed by Ministers, the SPA could be a local government body, consistent of elected councilors, perhaps with appointed members added. There would need to be rules about how the councillors were chosen, perhaps by a form of indirect election. Police finance would remain within the local government finance system, with 50% grant as now, and Ministers could have powers of appointment etc similar to those they have now. If the objective of the Bill is indeed to cut costs by reducing the overhead of 8 forces, this approach could meet it as well as what is proposed.

- Financial responsibility is an important aspect of control over a body. Under the Bill this will be centralised with Scottish Ministers. I understand that it is the policy of Ministers that local councils will be able to supplement local police budgets from their own resources, so as for example to ensure that additional officers are deployed in their area. They will not however be able to take the view that community planning objectives would be better met if, say, fewer police officers were deployed and more youth workers, and transfer resources accordingly. The Bill could alternatively be amended to give councils to power to transfer resources into or out of policing in their local area in accordance with the community plan, with consequent changes to the local policing plan. There is absolutely no technical reason why this would be impossible.

- At present, the duty to participate in community planning falls on Chief Constables. Under the Bill this will devolve to local commanders. This is in practice where it will be discharged for the most part, but it is anomalous that although the Chief Constable is under a duty to provide local policing, no community planning duty falls on him or her or the SPA. Other statutory bodies do have such legal obligations under the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003.

Safeguarding Independence

All bodies connected with the investigation, prosecution and conviction and sentencing of criminals require, and have by law, appropriate independence. Courts and judges are wholly independent of the executive. This is required to meet Convention Rights. Courts are now administered by a Board chaired by the Lord President. Judges cannot be dismissed by Ministers. Indeed the first successful ECHR challenge of the actions of Scottish Ministers concerned the illegality of appointing of sheriffs on a temporary basis. Prosecution decisions by the Lord Advocate must under the Scotland Act be taken “independently of any other person”.

The operational independence of Chief Constables has until now been secured by the governance framework: legal powers are vested in them, and the local authority which employs them has no power to direct them; Ministers have no power to direct the local authority, nor the Chief Constable. The Bill attempts to create a framework of legal powers in this respect:

- The Chief Constable is “responsible” for the policing of Scotland
- He or she must “account to” a new quango, the Scottish Police Authority (SPA), for it
- This new quango must “maintain” the service
- There is a framework of plans to be approved, no doubt alongside budgets
- Scottish Ministers have a power to direct the SPA but not about a specific police operation or how to carry it out.

This is a valiant attempt to codify a difficult area. It does however need to be seen in the context of wider powers and relationships:

- The power of the purse is very considerable, and Ministers are not afraid to exercise it. At present Scottish Ministers have no legal power to determine the number of police officers in Scotland but have in effect required forces to employ a set number by micromanagement of police grant. (The issue is not whether have a set number of officers is a good policy or a muddleheaded one; nor whether it was in election manifestos or not; but that the present legislative framework does not allocate to Ministers a specific power to determine it.)

- The power to appoint and dismiss is critical. The SPA is to appoint the Chief Constable, but only with Ministers’ agreement. The Bill also contains new powers for the Authority to require an officer to retire. In a rare example of draftsman’s humour, the clause is entitled “Senior officers: retirement for efficiency or effectiveness”. This form of dismissal from office need not be because the senior officer is inefficient or ineffective, but rather because the SPA think the senior officer’s removal would be in the interests of efficiency etc. There appears to be no reason why it could not be exercised in the event of a disagreement between the Board and the Chief Constable about how operational responsibilities should be exercised. This power can be exercised in relation to the Chief Constable with the agreement of Ministers.

- Scottish Ministers seek a power in the Bill to give specific or general directions to the SPA. Such powers exist in relation to many quangos, but not generally in relation to police authorities. The directions do not apply directly to the Chief Constable. There are no constraints on what purposes the directions may be issued for but could apply to classes of police operation, to numbers of staff or of officers, to the deployment of staff, or indeed to requiring senior officers to be dismissed from office.

This is a very wide set of Ministerial powers, and will give Scottish Ministers much more control over policing than they presently have. Increasing the powers of Ministers over public bodies, bringing such bodies closer into the centre or removing discretion from them, has been a characteristic of Scottish public life since devolution. It need not be assumed that this is always and automatically a bad thing.

A number of reasons have been advanced to justify it, of which the best is a desire to ensure that public services are ‘joined up’ in the pursuit of national outcomes. But the most pressing for Ministers (of all parties) is that they feel that they will be held accountable for what happens anyway, even if they have no control over the decision of an arms length body. There are both general and specific dangers in such an approach. The general danger is that if Ministers are in there micromanaging, they are not standing back and exercising a strategic, supervisory oversight of delivery. [The most successful of the public sector reforms of the 1990’s was to define such an arms length relationship for the delivery of public services, giving Ministers and managers the responsibility for doing what each of them does best.]

There are however specific dangers in relation to policing. I am sure that present Ministers want to have these powers so that they can make the police service run better: that is a proper ambition, but such a wide suite of powers might also be misused. Such misuse may be unlikely, but it would happen, if at all, only insidiously and gradually. It might be better to draw some rather firmer boundaries around Ministers’ powers to affect operational policing to be as sure as possible that does not happen.

In order to safeguard the independence of the Chief Constable from political interference, the following amendments should be considered:

- Appointment: Ministers have had for many years the power to approve the appointment of Chief Constables by police authorities. This was against the background of many forces (including when there were many more than 8) and safeguarded against the risk of perverse or inappropriate local decisions. It was normally exercised however by the central government approving the shortlist from which the local police board made the choice. This emphasised that the police authority made the choice. This practice should be made statutory in relation to the Scottish Police Service and followed, so that it is quite clear that Ministers are not appointing “their man” to police Scotland.

- Dismissal or removal from office: The powers for the SPA and Ministers to require the Chief Constable to retire are far too broadly drawn and are capable of misuse. It is not clear that they are needed at all. The Chief Constable’s operational independence can be better secured by giving him or her security in appointment unless he or she is himself inefficient or ineffective. Such a decision should require the agreement of Parliament as well as Ministers, as in the case of a judge. They should also be redrafted to make clear that the “efficiency and effectiveness” do not relate to particular operational decisions or classes of decisions so that they cannot be used to influence operational decisions.

- Powers of direction: it is not clear why powers of specific and general direction over the SPA are needed at all. They are just ‘belt and braces’. They can be removed with no loss, and some gain to the status and standing of the SPA. If they are to remain then they must be given a defined purpose in the statute. It is obviously right that such powers, if they exist, should not extend to a specific police operation. But nor should they apply to classes of operation: policing protests against government policy would, for example, be a class of operation. It should also be made clear that they do not extend to directing the SPA to recruit or retire or dismiss individual staff members or constables. (Given the width of these powers, it is surely an otiose piece of micromanagement to take an additional specific power – see Schedule 1, Part 1, Para 13 – to determine where the Chief Constable’s Office is to be located.)

- Operational Independence: it has hitherto been possible to allow this to be defined negatively – given that there are no powers to direct Chief Constables, and given the deliberate separation of powers in police governance, this has proved adequate. Now however that a new and more centralised governance is to be imposed, there is a good case for making the independence of the Chief Constable explicit. There is an excellent precedent for this. When the Scottish Parliament was created, the Lord Advocate became accountable to it, but his independence was explicitly safeguarded in statute. This has worked well in practice and could work equally well for the Chief Constable. Clause 17 could be amended to require that the Chief Constable should discharge his responsibility for policing Scotland (17(1)), or his power to direct constables (17(2)), “independently of any other person” (subject to 17(3)).

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary

For ease of reference this document is structured as follows;

1. Introduction and main considerations.
2. Key issue – The legislative changes have to provide an effective enabling framework.
3. Key issue - The process of implementation has to be built upon an empirically strong foundation and provide a clear, achievable route-map for change, between the current structures and the new service.
4. Police reform and HMICS.
5. Concluding comment.

Appendix A - detail supporting concerns around the current financial data and reasons why the Outline Business Case has attracted criticism.

Appendix B – a list of miscellaneous issues.

1. Introduction

1.1 Following the Cabinet Secretary for Justice’s announcement on 8\textsuperscript{th} September 2011, preparations in earnest began on the reform of policing in Scotland. HMICS recognise that this is the context within which our role of monitoring, improving and providing advice about policing, needs to take place.

1.2 We consider that police reform offers opportunities to:
   - simplify policing across Scotland
   - create the best affordable service
   - improve governance and accountability

1.3 For these to happen, two factors are important:

   1) The legislative changes have to provide an effective enabling framework; and

   2) The process of implementation has to be built upon an empirically strong foundation and provide a clear, achievable route-map for change, between the current structures and the new service.

1.4 Expectations for the timeframe and outcomes from police reform have to recognise wider experience of major public sector change programmes. Further, it is only as detailed implementation plans emerge, that the likely timeframe over which costs will be incurred and savings made, will become more certain.
1.5 Our submission to the Justice Committee provides commentary in the context of these key issues.

1.6 From the outset however, we would emphasise that policing in Scotland starts in a good place. As we have reported, there is much to be proud of and to have confidence in. Major changes to a country’s policing arrangements are, for good reason, an infrequent occurrence. In Scotland it will be important to ensure that not just the destination of change, but particularly the pace of getting there, balance affordability with the continuing provision of effective policing.

2. The legislative changes have to provide an effective enabling framework

2.1 The system of governance and accountability is central to the delivery of an effective police service that has the confidence of the public. Clarity enables rather than constrains good decision making.

2.2 In this regard, HMICS wishes to highlight the following areas:

2.3 Appropriate separation of powers - the powers of direction and influence from Scottish Ministers to the Scottish Police Authority (SPA) and then to the Chief Constable are key. These need to be considered, both individually and collectively, before reasoning whether the Bill achieves the correct balance between accountability and independence.

2.4 We understand that the ministerial power of direction has been placed within the Bill as this is standard practice across public bodies. Policing is not simply another public body. We absolutely recognise the need for policing to work within the law and the democratic will of Parliament however this not the same as being subject to ministerial direction, even if that direction is being channelled through the SPA.

2.5 As a practical example, under Section 5 as currently drafted, can Ministers give a direction as to the policy or approach that the Authority is to take in relation to public demonstrations or industrial disputes and their policing? Such issues resonate strongly within communities and indeed within policing.

2.6 Although the Bill currently requires Ministers to publish such a direction (Sec 5 (3) a) and lay a copy of it before Parliament (Sec 5 (3) b), by definition this is after the direction is given.

2.7 HMICS consider that a Ministerial direction to the Scottish Police Authority is likely to be of such significance that it warrants placing before Parliament for scrutiny before it is issued to the Scottish Police Authority.

2.8 Operational responsibility – linked to the above, the more clarity there is about what the chief constable is solely responsible for, the less scope there is for ambiguity and perceived or actual intrusion into these areas, in turn leading to more confidence around the scrutiny and governance of all other aspects of their work.
2.9 We consider that further clarity is still needed around the new chief constable’s operational responsibility relative to the roles of local and national governance arrangements, including those of Scottish Ministers.

2.10 For instance under section 17(4)(a)(ii) and section 5 highlighted above, does ‘due regard’ allow the chief constable not to follow a recommendation or guidance from the police authority in relation to the approach to the policing of demonstrations as in that example, or perhaps the policing approach to proceeds of crime legislation, or the response to anti social behaviour?

2.11 Or, if the chief constable decided that it was necessary to equip all police patrol cars with tasers, would the Authority and/or Ministers be able to prevent this or would the application of ‘due regard’ mentioned above, still leave the chief constable the latitude to proceed?

2.12 There are previous stated cases in relation to chief constables’ operational responsibility\(^1\) and there is the opportunity in the Bill to ensure that the new legislation takes full cognisance of them.

2.13 Strategic Planning – We think it is important that Ministers, prior to setting out their policing priorities, should specifically take due regard of the police service’s assessment of risk and need across communities in Scotland. Further, where there is a failure by Scottish Ministers to agree the strategic policing plan, we think this is sufficiently important within the context of a single national force, to seek resolution in Parliament.

2.14 Local governance and accountability – We think the Bill should be clearer about the involvement and roles of local elected members, officers and other relevant parties. We note that the local policing plan has to be ‘approved’ by the local governance structure and that it can make recommendations in relation to the local policing plan. We are not sure what the process is where these matters are not agreed.

2.15 National Governance and accountability – One of the key changes in the Bill is the proposed establishment of the SPA. The SPA has significant oversight responsibilities not just in constitutional terms, but in the governance of a large and complex organisation.

2.16 The appointment and regulatory framework for members to fulfil this role should be consistent with Nolan principles\(^2\) and the combined code of conduct for company directors\(^3\). It will also be of vital importance that members of the Authority and the chief executive have the requisite capability and capacity.

\(^1\)The ruling by Lord Denning in 1968 in the case of R v Metropolitan Police Commissioner ex parte Blackburn, centering on the responsibility of the chief constable for the detection of crime and protection of public peace, concluded that the chief constable was ‘not the servant of anyone, save the law itself’. And in the case of R v the chief constable of Sussex ex parte International Traders’ Ferry Ltd (ITF), 1998, the argument was made that ‘it is for the chief constable to decide on the disposition of his Force’ and that ‘no court can or should give him direction on that matter’.

2.17 Forensic services - The Bill provides for a separate body falling under the aegis of the SPA, but outside of the direction and control of the chief constable. Whilst this is similar to the status quo, the creation of a single service provides the opportunity to consider whether this is the best arrangement.

2.18 There are well rehearsed arguments for keeping forensic databases and the analysis of forensic samples separate from the police. The arguments are less clear however in relation to the day-to-day operations of attending and examining crime scenes.

2.19 It should be recognised that whilst some forensic evidence is gathered by forensic services staff (scenes of crime officers), police officers and other professionals (such as police appointed medical practitioners) add forensic evidence into the legal process for many cases. Whilst it is important to recognise the role of the Crown and the independence this brings in directing investigations, including the gathering of forensic evidence, it is important then to recognise the need for the service to be dynamic in responding to emerging crime trends and to be able to control and direct resources including scenes of crime officers.

2.20 In addition, the use of forensic intelligence is a growing component of successful policing.

2.21 The police service would wish to ensure that an enhanced forensic response was able to be directed accordingly without negotiating through a service level agreement or extended management arrangements with another agency.

2.22 It is important that the new legislation enables the chief constable to have clear operational direction over forensic crime scene examination. Operational direction by a third party (i.e. a separate forensic service) precludes this. In addition this appears to commensurately reduce the chief constable’s accountability in relation to the prevention and detection of crime. The corollary of this being that this element of accountability for delivering a policing outcome is pushed back to the SPA and by extension closer to Ministers. This could create unhealthy tension and conflict.

3. The process of implementation has to be built upon an empirically strong foundation and provide a clear, achievable route-map for change, between the current structures and the new service.

3.1 There needs to be an acknowledgement that, irrespective of the process thus far, a realistic and achievable programme of change is now required.

3.2 Experience from some other large public sector change programmes, including the formation of the Scottish Police Services Authority, suggests that expectations of delivered benefits can at times exceed that which the underpinning data and context might support. In other words the history of major public sector change programmes has not always been hugely positive and expectations must be managed accordingly. In this regard we consider that some flexibility around time, costs and savings will be required.

3.3 This programme of change has already been set however within the context of the time and funding profile established by the Comprehensive Spending Review budget settlement for policing.

3.4 Accordingly we would highlight that we have yet to see a clear plan for this programme of change that matches the scale of the task of police reform against the time and financial constraints set out in the Comprehensive Spending Review. We do, however, have some confidence that this work is being advanced and that the risks of delays are recognised.

3.5 In the current absence of this plan it is incumbent upon us to highlight risks of police reform including those to:

- service delivery
- public confidence
- staff confidence

3.6 Implementation is perhaps an unusual matter to raise in a Parliamentary scrutiny procedure, However we consider that it is important that we separate out the issues of how a single police service could offer a more effective way of delivering policing in Scotland, from the secondary question of whether the scale and pace of financial savings attributed to the new structure, can be relied upon from the calculations presented within the financial memorandum and supporting documentation.

3.7 If Parliament considers that part of its rationale for deciding to change the policing arrangements in Scotland include financial reasons, and there is some suggestion that this may be the case\(^5\), then the soundness of the figures that it has been provided with becomes key.

3.8 Whilst the financial data provided may have represented the best available figures at the point that they were collected, this has not been and has not historically required to have been, an area of strength for policing. Further, the strength of these data was further impacted by the sophistication of the accompanying modelling of future service options and related savings, carried out some time ago.

3.9 Together these factors have had a compounding impact on the strength of the data within the Financial Memorandum.

3.10 We also think the rationale for change could have been better articulated had Treasury Green book guidance in relation to providing a ‘do minimum’ or status quo option\textsuperscript{6} been followed and had the early research used in the Outline Business Case been developed and then used to complete a full business case.

\(^5\)Finance Committee, 22 February 2012, agenda item 2, Annex A, SPICe, page 9

3.11 Importantly, we would reiterate at this point that police reform provides opportunities to:

- simplify policing across Scotland
- create the best affordable service
- improve governance and accountability

3.12 However, in light of the issues we raise at paragraphs 3.1-3.10 above, HMICS considers that Parliament might wish to either:

   see a more developed set of financial savings and costs of change figures, based upon a clear model of how the new service will look post-reform; or be assured that there is work underway within the reform programme structure that is likely to create and deliver an agreed plan that balances the time and cost constraints, whilst appropriately mitigating any risks to performance and confidence in policing.

3.13 In the absence of the above, we would advise that Parliament may wish to view with an element of caution, the current projections for costs and savings attributed to police reform, whilst recognising the ongoing work and commitment of the service to deliver the necessary changes within the financial and time challenges.

3.14 At appendix A to this submission we have provided further detail supporting our concerns around the current financial data and outlining some of the potential reasons that the Outline Business Case has attracted some criticism.

4. Police reform and HMICS

4.1 Finally it would be unusual, if not remiss in these circumstances were we not to comment upon the impact of the Bill on HMICS.

4.2 Many of the features of the Bill and much of the discussion about police reform centre on concerns around the relationship between central government, a single police authority, a single chief constable and a single police force.

4.3 This structure is one of the material differences brought about by police reform and will disturb the current relationships between local and national government and policing. In relation to scrutiny, part of the balancing changes are to the handling of complaints with the changes from the current Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland to a Police Investigation and Review Commissioner, which in its new guise will continue to be a Non Departmental Public Body.

\footnote{\textsuperscript{6}The ‘do minimum’ option should always be carried forward in the shortlist, to act as a check against more interventionist action” - http://www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/d/green_book_complete.pdf, page 5, para. 2.8.}
Auditor General, again fully independent from government, will have statutory powers to review Best Value in both the SPA and the Police Service of Scotland. This is an extension from the current situation where the Accounts Commission only reviews Best Value in relation to police authorities.

4.4 HMICS supports this strengthening of independent scrutiny and consistent with these changes considers that now is equally the time for it to emphasise its independence from government and importantly the external appearance of this independence.

4.5 Whilst we envisage continuing to deliver independent professional advice to Scottish Ministers and the new police service, we see a key role in our provision of independent professional advice to the emerging SPA.

4.6 There will be much for the SPA to grasp in its early months and years to enable it to provide governance and support to match the scale, complexity and importance of organisation represented by the new police service of Scotland.

4.7 We envisage that the Authority will particularly need advice that is clearly independent of the various positions and viewpoints on policing and police reform. Such advice will be crucial to their successful navigation between national and local interests.

4.8 We also note the concerns raised in submissions to Finance Committee from COSLA and the Scottish Police Authorities Conveners Forum in relation to the requirement for independent advice and support to local arrangements. We have built the provision of such advice and support into our outline plans for HMICS.

4.9 We consider that these and other factors emphasise the need for HMICS to be able to operate from a position of increased independence and to be seen to be doing so. Key to this will be the ability to directly employ staff. Accordingly we consider that a change in organisational status to that of being a body corporate is important. We think that this change should be clearly reflected in the Bill.

4.10 Continuing with the Bill’s provisions, although it is very clear about the powers of ministerial direction towards HMICS, it is less clear that HMICS will retain its full powers of self-directed inquiry into any matter relevant to policing in Scotland. We consider it important to have both of these provisions set ‘side-by-side’ in the legislation. Again this is a key element of balance within the new structure.

4.11 Equally the Bill does not preserve the current arrangements whereby the HMI provides advice to the appointment process for chief constables, deputy chief constables and assistant chief constables. We consider that both public and service confidence would be increased were a fully independent HMI to continue to provide advice on these appointments.

4.12 The Bill in a number of sections, lists those parties that should be consulted in relation to establishing or changing arrangements or preparing plans (e.g. sections 11(6), 33(3), 34(3), 39(3), 55(2a) and 67(3)). We can think of no matter relating to policing in Scotland where HMICS should not be a statutory consultee and accordingly we seek our specific inclusion in all such lists.

4.13 Finally and consistent with the above, we consider that the responsibility for the independent strategic assessment of police performance should be assigned to HMICS. We are currently leading work to define high level performance indicators that will assist the public and governance structures to understand how the police are performing both locally and nationally. Under the new policing arrangements, we think that there will be increased confidence in this information if it is provided by a fully independent police inspectorate. We therefore seek to have this position established within the Bill.

5. Conclusion

5.1 HMICS will continue to focus upon working with all stakeholders to ensure that changes to policing in Scotland build upon its sound foundation.

5.2 At Appendix B to this document and for completeness, we have listed a number of individual matters which although not related to the primary issues raised above, may be of wider interest to the committee.

5.3 HMICS would welcome the opportunity to discuss police reform with the Justice Committee.

Appendix A

As indicated at paragraph 3.14 the following text outlines potential reasons why the OBC and related work has attracted some criticism.

The purpose of and benefits to be derived from police reform have evolved over time rather than being consistent from the outset

The fact that different reform criteria have been used within the

- Sustainable Policing phase two report
- The two consultation exercises (and even within their forewords)
- The Outline Business Case

leads to concerns from some that criteria were evolving to support the chosen decision rather than to inform it.

7 Sustainable Policing Project - Phase 2 Report: Options for Reform, March 2011
8 A Consultation on the Future of Policing in Scotland, February 2011
9 Police Reform Programme - Outline Business Case, Scottish Government, September 2011
For example in early documentation one of the three reform factors was:

‘delivering efficiencies while protecting frontline services as far as possible’.

By the time the policy objective for the Bill had been written, the above had changed to:

To protect and improve local services despite financial cuts by stopping duplication of support services eight times over and not cutting frontline services.

In effect ‘delivering efficiencies’ is now contained within the single action of moving to one force. In doing so, the text implies that the simplification of support services alone will protect and improve local policing.

The Outline Business Case

Treasury guidance provides that an Outline Business Base should include a ‘do minimum’ or status quo option. The status quo was rejected early in the reform debate but this was following financial modelling based on a hypothetical budget forecast significantly more pessimistic than proved to be necessary.

The Target Operating Model upon which the Outline Business Case is heavily predicated, was produced at some speed and was considered by the service to be illustrative rather than predictive.

The financial element of the business case had its foundations built upon the service’s first usage of ‘police objective analysis’ as a costing model. There was and remains an inevitable margin of error in the early use of such a costing model.

The Outline Business Case describes its calculations as being based upon applying ‘well tested levers’, ‘process changes’ and similar methods. When tested, we have not yet seen the level of underpinning detail that would demonstrate what these mean. For example we would like to have seen what ‘process changes’ have been included that subsequently allow costs to be reduced.

The Outline Business Case uses (as it is required to do) optimism bias but we are not always clear as to the rationale for the level at which it is being applied. For instance in relation to ICT changes, Treasury guidance is for a 200% weighting. The weighting applied in the business case is 100% which in light of the residual police ICT infrastructure and the recent pace of change, seems to underestimate the difficulties.

10"The ‘do minimum’ option should always be carried forward in the shortlist, to act as a check against more interventionist action” - http://www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/d/green_book_complete.pdf, page 5, para. 2.8.

11"24% budget reductions are anticipated over the period and projections have been made - £230m in savings requires to be realised” – Scottish Policing Board 09/10, paper 5, para. 2.4.

12Outline Business Case, page 50, para. 5.21
Finally, police reform rightly has to take place within the context of political commitments towards the public sector, in this case the maintenance of 17,234 police officers and avoiding the use of compulsory redundancies. We are yet to see a plan that manages these constraints whilst delivering the requisite savings within the required timescale.

Outline Business Case and apparent link with Comprehensive Spending Review

Flowing from the issues raised above, there are concerns about how the potential savings contained within the Outline Business Case, may have influenced budget settlements provided by the Comprehensive Spending Review.

The Outline Business Case indicates that an annual saving of £153m per annum may be possible. By year three of the Comprehensive Spending Review, the police service is predicted to be making annual savings of £88m en route to a recurring annual saving of £106m in 2016/17.

When the estimated VAT liability (£22m) and the non-cashable officer savings (£23m) are added to the £106m quoted above, we have in effect a reduced annual budget for policing of £151m. In effect therefore both the CSR and the anticipated recurring annual savings for policing, have cemented a series of figures that were suggested as only potentially achievable in earlier work.

Further, there appear to be differences between the reform budget figures in the Financial Memorandum and those provided to the Scottish Policing Board e.g. taking 2012-13 as an example, table 2.1 anticipates net savings of £9.11m in 2012-13, whilst table 2.2 quotes a net cost in 2012-13 of £3.23m, after allowing for optimism bias.

However, the analysis of the Police Central Government Budget provided to the Scottish Policing Board on 12 October 2012 includes £12m in 2012-13, described as the “net costs of police reform”.

Financial arrangements for the new service

Accepting that the new service will have greater critical mass and hence resilience in terms of finances, there are concerns that the projected inability to create and carry forward reserves will provide some difficulties. In particular the timeframes for managing cost reduction through voluntary redundancies, can require a level of flexibility not easily provided by the above constraint.

HMICS consider that, on balance, in light of the potential uncertainties surrounding costs and savings, that for the first three years post-reform, that the service should retain the facility to create and carry forward reserves. This matter could then be reviewed at the end of this period.

I am writing to you for two purposes:

1) Following your request that panel members should write if they felt that there further were matters that they wished to draw to the committee’s attention and

2) To specifically deal more completely with Mr Finnie’s question (at col 1094 of the Committee’s report) on the Bill’s proposals about the Police Appeals Tribunal.

Early appointment of the Chief Constable and Executive Team

Firstly, can I deal with an emerging priority for police reform and one which I believe is so critical to the reform agenda, that failure to address it now is likely to present a significant barrier to progress in the interim period and, indeed, to delivery of the stated aims in the mid and longer-term within the context of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

A variety of views have been expressed on the most appropriate timescales for appointing the Chief Constable and Executive Team to date. However, as a consequence of the pressing nature of reform and the risks associated with a delay in appointment of those key posts, the emerging position is one of universal agreement from within the service (and from a number of other key stakeholders) that appointment of the Chief Constable should be progressed at the earliest possible opportunity.

The current position is based largely around the perceived need for the first Chair of the new Scottish Police Authority to be appointed as a precursor to appointment of the Chief Constable. The supporting logic is twofold: firstly, it safeguards against a ‘Ministerial’ appointment and the conflict that is, rightly, perceived to bring; secondly, that this approach will provide a close and early working relationship between the Chair and the Chief.

Whilst laudable, the time delay inherent in this approach presents far more serious risks than has been articulated to date.

- the current approach will preclude appointment of the Chief Constable until the last months of this year, with subsequent appointment of the Executive Team being realised only weeks before the ‘go-live’ date;

- whilst the reform team are keen to commit to decisions, there is an understandable hesitance around significant matters which they believe the ‘new’ Chief Constable should determine – that will slow (and is slowing) down progress;
• as a consequence of the above, it is highly unlikely that there will be a unanimously agreed and definitive implementation plan in place prior to appointment of the Chief Constable. With the subsequent delay in appointing the Executive team, there is unlikely to be sufficient time for those strategic leads to make the necessary decisions and adjustments to ensure cohesive functionality from 1st April 2013, far less adherence to the broader aims of reform;

• there is a significant, real and growing appetite within the service (and, importantly, across the staff associations) to secure clarity of leadership at an early juncture.

I believe that collectively these factors present a compelling argument for the earliest possible appointment of the Chief Constable and subsequently the Executive Team.

Returning then to the arguments for the proposed senior appointments process,

Firstly there is an inevitable level of ‘inheritance’ that comes with police reform and in the context of this issue, it is more usual for Conveners and Chairs to fall ‘heir’ to ‘sitting’ Chief Constables than it is for them to appoint them (the forthcoming local government elections and consequential changes to police boards and authorities alone provide evidence of this).

Secondly, I do recognise the need to ensure a fair, transparent and open process of appointment and one which provides a level of protection from the potential accusations of Ministerial intervention and the enduring consequences that this may bring. In those terms, I would strongly advocate that work to determine a bespoke process which provides the necessary safeguards, but within a timescale that meets the needs of reform, is commenced as soon as possible. Indeed, I see no reason why an independent panel, supported by HMICS in an advisory capacity, could not make such an appointment and in my professional opinion the risks of delay now far outweigh the avoidable risks arising from an early appointment.

The strength of feeling on this matter is gaining such momentum, that I understand a number of parties intend to raise it with the Committee. In considering those submissions, I would strongly encourage the Justice Committee to express their position on the matter in a clear statement to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, in the hope that an early and incisive response can be provided.

Turning then to the matter raised by Mr Finnie:

Police Appeals Tribunal (PAT)

Section 57 et seq of the Bill detail the changes to the PAT including the proposal to appoint three members who are either solicitors or members of the Faculty of Advocates. I mentioned in the course of my response to Mr Finnie (col 1095) that I had commissioned some work to assess how misconduct cases overall were being handled and where there were might be avoidable delays or potential wider improvements.
That work is not yet complete but I can say that in general, moves to increase further the quasi-judicial nature of misconduct cases, have the potential to increase delays to the detriment of respondent officers, the police service, public confidence and of course public expenditure.

There is evidence and intuitive rationale, that the early and appropriate dealing with misconduct cases is greatly increased if from the outset or as soon as is possible, objective and pragmatic discussions take place involving all parties as to the seriousness of the matter and likely outcome should the allegation be found proven. In too many cases, the absence of such calibration causes unnecessary delays and escalation to a process involving levels of legal representation inconsistent with the likely or eventual outcome.

In this regard and I hope I am now turning to the core of Mr Finnie’s question, the removal of tribunal members who have direct experience of the context of policing and the replacement of them with solicitors, is likely to be perceived by some as a further increase in the quasi-legal backdrop for misconduct cases at a time when practice elsewhere is indicating that a de-escalation is likely to be more effective for all parties.

Consistent with the above and as I raised in Appendix B of my earlier written submission, the provisions at Sections 22 and 23 of the Bill whereby officers commit for example, a criminal offence of being absent from duty, again seems wholly inconsistent with a culture of resolving issues at the lowest appropriate level.

From experience, examples of such incidences are inevitably underpinned by difficult personal circumstances reducing even further, if this were possible, the likelihood of the Crown seeking or gaining a criminal conviction for such an offence.

Perhaps the Justice Committee with its broader view of the criminal justice system has similar views on this matter.

Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC)

You may recall that there was some detailed questioning in relation to this key provision within the Bill. Whilst clearly the report of the committee proceedings of the 6th March represents a subset of all the written evidence that you will have received, on reviewing the text I consider it important to emphasise a few points:

1) Mr Finnie’s question leading into this subject (col 1069) highlighted in the responses it drew, the importance of not only a deep and fundamental understanding of how to deal concurrently with criminal, complaints and serious misconduct issues, but that there is an absolute requirement to have that appreciation and experience in those charged with setting up the new body that will deal with such issues.

2) Although (at col 1070) I am quite sure that Mr Todd did not mean that ‘what the bill proposes (is) to rename the current Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland’ nevertheless he may have unintentionally perpetuated a misconception held in some quarters that this is what is proposed, ie simply a renaming of the current body. The scale and nature of these changes are such that whilst legislatively it may be convenient to draft the Bill in terms that indicate a simple flow from one structure to the next, the constitutional and criminal investigatory changes are as fundamental as any, if indeed not most, of the Bill’s other provisions.

3) Finally and perhaps implicit in the above, I would support Professor McNeill’s call for early appointments of the new commissioner and director of investigations. Although in his response to Mr Pearson’s question on sufficiency of time (col 1072) Professor McNeill considered six months lead-in was ‘doable’, it may be that this issue of key early appointments is so crucial, that it is again a matter that the Justice Committee may wish to consider raising with the Cabinet Secretary directly.

Parliamentary scrutiny

Finally I wish to reinforce a few of the points raised in the exchanges about the role of Parliament and the Scottish Police Authority in holding the new service to account. I mentioned that I had published a report on this issue and for ease I have added a hyperlink to it here should you or your committee members wish to access it. http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/Doc/925/0117807.pdf

Mr Black eloquently differentiated between democratic accountability and proper governance as the Scottish Police Authority (SPA) needs to provide. Our joint work has identified the difficulties some current police board and authority members have in separating their local elected responsibilities from their governance responsibilities as members of a board or an authority. This provides an unconvincing rationale to select local members for the SPA with its increased scale of responsibility. There is also the issue of capability and capacity for this strategic role which represents a material change from the majority of current arrangements.

Put simply there is no reason why the proposed 7-11 members of the SPA cannot be recruited with the skills and experience to oversee the service. As detailed on the 6th March 2012, the new service and authority have to demonstrate how they are assessing and providing services appropriate to local and national need. Future joint work between Audit Scotland and HMICS will systematically report on this issue.

Accordingly Parliament is the entirely appropriate and logical institution within which to lodge democratic oversight. I understand fully Convener, your concerns about the capacity of your committee to take on this role. If you accept the principle however, there are options being suggested by Audit Scotland and no doubt others which merit serious consideration.

On that note I shall end this supplementary letter pausing only to offer that if in any way I can be of further assistance to you and your committee, I should be happy to do so.

Andrew Laing
HM Inspector of Constabulary
13 March 2012
The Highland and Islands Fire Board welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Justice Committee on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. The Board is keen to contribute to the legislation to ensure the new arrangements for single services work effectively from their inception. The Board seeks continuity in the performance of police and fire and rescue services in the Highlands and Islands. The constituent authorities of the Highland and Islands Fire Board intend to be pathfinders to aid the transition to the new single services.

1. Part 2, Section 99 and Schedule 1A, 2005 Act, Paragraph 2: The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

Schedule 1A provides that the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS) will have between 7 and 11 members, all to be appointed by Scottish Ministers, with appointments held for no more than 4 years. The Highland and Islands Fire Board (HIFB) is concerned that this size of membership is too small to allow adequate regional or local input to Scottish fire and rescue arrangements. The HIFB seeks the size of the Board to increase to 15 members. It also seeks reassurance in the Bill that membership of the Service makes provision for Scottish rural, island and urban community safety interests. The HIFB sees the inclusion of local elected members beneficial in this respect, and seeks that they comprise at least 8 of 15 members on the SFRS. This would bring a breadth of experience and knowledge of fire and rescue across Scotland. The HIFB supports the appointment of Service members through the Public Appointments process.

The use of sub committees may be useful, but if the maximum number of Board members remains at 11, this would be too small for proper consideration of rural, island and urban issues at sub-committee level.

2. Part 2, Section 99 (Schedule 1A, 2005 Act, Paragraph 8): The Chief Officer

The HIFB notes that the first Chief Fire Officer is to be appointed by the Scottish Ministers and thereafter by the SFRS. The HIFB recognises the advantages of early recruitment of the Chief Fire Officer, to enable transitional arrangements to be put in place earlier; however, the HIFB would have welcomed the involvement of the SFRS from the outset. If appointments to the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service cannot be fast-tracked, the HIFB requests that local governance have a role in the crucial first appointment process and suggests that this be drawn from among the new chairs of joint boards, to enable recruitment by September 2012.

The nature of the relationship between the Chief Fire Officer and local elected members or the new local committees is not clear. The HIFB seeks assurance that this matter will be considered in the Bill process.
3. Part 2, Section 99 (Schedule 1A, 2005 Act, Paragraph 9): SFRS Employees; and Amendments relating to Part 2

It may be helpful in remote rural and island communities for there to be an ‘emergency first responder’ capability, where skills found in the separate emergency services (police, fire and rescue and ambulance) could be developed across staff with these roles and deployed more quickly to deal with emergencies arising.

The Bill does not make reference to any statutory bar on employment within the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. However, there appears to be no amendment among the Amendments relating to Part 2 of the Bill (Schedule 6, Part 2) to the prohibition in Section 51 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 on employment of police. The HIFB is unsure why this prohibition needs to remain and presses for it to be repealed.

By making provision for paid and voluntary employment in more than one emergency service, some recruitment difficulties in remote rural and island authorities may be overcome.

4. Part 2, Section 99 (Schedule 1A, 2005 Act, Paragraph 12): SFRS General Powers

The HIFB notes the provision for the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to provide and maintain various assets to carry out its functions. It seeks the inclusion in this section of a reference to sharing public assets with other public bodies where that would enable best value for the public purse. This could be detailed further in guidance, with reference for example made to shared buildings, shared vehicles or shared maintenance of them, shared land or partnership arrangements for land disposal for best community benefit, shared ICT provision and shared procurement where appropriate.

5. Part 2, Section 99 (Schedule 1A, 2005 Act, Paragraph 16): Accounts

Although the Financial Memorandum for the Bill is being considered by the Finance Committee, the HIFB is concerned that the proposed delivery model means that the new single forces will not be able to recover Value Added Tax (VAT). This will incur additional cost to the public purse and reduce resources for the new services. The HIFB acknowledges that the Scottish Government is in discussion with HM Treasury and the HMRC seeking exemptions, but the HIFB seeks assurance that this will be resolved before the legislation is passed.

6. Part 2, Sections 100-108: Functions of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

The HIFB notes the list of functions to be the responsibility of the SFRS. The HIFB seeks assurance that the legislation and/or accompanying guidance will ensure that:

- the future delivery of the service in the Highlands and Islands will equate to that in other areas of Scotland or for Scotland as a whole; and
- appropriate local governance arrangements are made for the area, which includes mainland and island communities; community representation in these areas should have no less weight than community representation in other areas of Scotland.

The HIFB seeks clarity on the nature of the relationship between the members of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and the members of the local committees and with other regional bodies such as the Regional Transport Partnerships.

7. Part 2, Section 111: Best Value

The HIFB welcomes the duty of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to make arrangements to secure Best Value. It may be worth noting that arrangements for auditing Best Value may change, as the approach to external scrutiny of community planning partners and partnerships in the achievement of outcomes is currently under review. This may be dealt with in the future in accompanying guidance to the legislation (under reference in new section 39B, 2005 Act).

8. Part 2, Section 112: Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Strategic Plan

The HIFB recommends that, in preparing the strategic plan, the Scottish Police Authority is named as a mandatory consultee.

9. Part 2, Section 113 (new Section 41D, 2005 Act): Provision of Local Services

The HIFB welcomes the provisions in section 41D of the 2005 Act requiring SFRS to ensure that adequate arrangements are in place for each local authority area and to involve each local authority in determining the priorities and objectives for its area.

10. Part 2, Section 113 (new Section 41E, 2005 Act): Local Fire and Rescue Plans

The HIFB notes the provisions in the Bill for the SFRS to prepare and submit a local fire and rescue plan to the relevant local authority for approval. However, it is not clear what the process would be if approval were not given. Some positive process of resolving any lack of agreement would be required.

To reduce the risk of such a situation arising, HIFB is of the view that it would be helpful if, in addition to requiring the SFRS to involve the local authority in determining the priorities and objectives for the area, the Bill were to specify that the local fire and rescue plan be developed jointly with the local authority and be subject to public consultation. The HIFB believes that the successful achievement of public protection and community safety outcomes requires partnership or integrated working with other relevant partners, rather than the development of a plan by one organisation for consultation with others.

The HIFB notes that the Bill requires the SFRS to “consult such persons as the SFRS thinks fit”. The HIFB would prefer to see clear acknowledgement in the Bill that successful outcomes mean the involvement of other partners, notably the local police commander, the Health Board, Scottish Ambulance Service locally and the third sector. Having a joint public protection and community safety plan could be achieved within a framework of national outcomes, national fire and rescue priorities and the fit with local outcomes and local resources. All of this can be supported by the development of the Single Outcome Agreement, especially in relation to partnership performance. This joint approach would enable local solutions to be developed for integrated and preventative services, two of the Government’s four pillars of public service reform.

11. Part 2, Section 113 (new Section 41E, 2005 Act): Local Fire and Rescue Plan

The HIFB recommends that the local police commander is at least included as a mandatory consultee for the local fire and rescue plan. In keeping with the written evidence provided at paragraph 10 above, the HIFB seeks provisions in the Bill for the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan involving not only fire and rescue, police and local authorities, but also the local ambulance service and NHS Boards.

12. Part 2, Section 113 (new Section 41J, 2005 Act): Local Senior Officers

The HIFB welcomes the provision at section 41J that a Local Senior Officer must be designated for each local authority area. It does not however specify the rank for that officer. If this is to vary across local authorities, there is a concern that, in smaller local authorities (e.g. island authorities), a less senior officer will be appointed. This is of concern because he/she would have a lower level of authority within the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service, potentially limiting his/her capacity to influence the national strategic plan and the resources required for the local fire and rescue plan. The HIFB seeks provision in the Bill or accompanying guidance that, if seniority is to vary, the position of local senior officer is in itself afforded a particular status that, when considering matters affecting local service in the Highlands and Islands and the resources for it, would not be superseded by higher seniority in other local areas.

Under sub paragraph (4) the Bill provides that a local senior officer could cover more than one local authority area. This is more likely to be the case where the local authority has a relatively small population or covers a relatively small geography. With the population factor more likely to apply in the Highlands and Islands, the HIFB is concerned that it may not be as well served as other areas with a dedicated local senior officer. This is of even more concern if the officer’s seniority is likely to be lower than in other areas. Assurance is sought in the provisions of the Bill, or in the accompanying guidance, that service delivery, performance and resources will be fairly distributed, with no reduction for the local Service areas currently served by Highlands and Islands Fire and Rescue Service.

13. Part 2, Section 113 (new Section 41K, 2005 Act): Monitoring by local authority

The Bill provides for monitoring of the local fire and rescue plan by the local authority and has a similar provision for local policing (Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 46(2)). It would be more effective, if separate plans are to be produced, for them to be monitored together or simultaneously, given the connections and dependencies across both emergency services.
However, if the Bill is amended to enable the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan for each local authority area, then each contributing partner would need to be accountable for its performance against the plan. This can be facilitated locally through joint scrutiny arrangements (the pathfinder committees), and it can be reported nationally through the arrangements for the Single Outcome Agreement.

14. Part 2, Section 116: Directions

The HIFB would be keen to see reference made to a general or specific direction from Scottish Ministers on the maintenance or re-location of fire and rescue services to ensure either:

- minimising the loss of front-line or back office services currently based in the Highlands and Islands; or
- for new central services to be moved to the Highlands and Islands to support local economies and rural communities.

This can be enabled by ICT or supported by further shared services arrangements.

15. Part 2, Section 117 (new Sections 43A-43F, 2005 Act): Her Majesty’s Inspectors of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

It is not clear how the Bill makes provision for reducing external scrutiny and making it risk based and proportionate, as required following the Crerar Review. In addition, it does not take into account the current review of external scrutiny of community planning partnerships. The HIFB emphasises this point given the provisions in the Bill for a separate Chief Inspector of Constabulary in Scotland (Sections 71 & 74).

16. Part 2, Section 118 and Schedule 5: Transfer of staff, property etc.

The HIFB will consider the potential impact of a staff transfer scheme for staff who are to be treated as fire and rescue employees but are employees of the local authorities involved in the HIFB. It would be helpful to have further guidance available on this matter in advance of the appointed day.

This is important because the Highland Council provides services to the Joint Board in terms, for example, of clerking, administration, finance and procurement services. The Council therefore needs to understand the implications, if any, for staff involved.

Other issues of concern:

A. Accountability, Scrutiny and Governance

The Bill provides limited assurance on local accountability, scrutiny and governance for local fire and rescue delivery. While arrangements for proper local scrutiny of fire and rescue delivery and for community engagement are to be trialled through pathfinders, these will not be evaluated until after the Bill is enacted, so the Bill should at least make reference to the principle and value of local scrutiny of fire and rescue delivery in its area or explicitly state the role of local committees in scrutiny of performance.

Provision should be made for the additional costs associated with setting up new committees in local authorities. The HIFB seeks assurance that these costs are netted against the transfer of grant from local to central government.

In addition it would be helpful if the accompanying guidance could refer to:
- the support for joint strategic assessment with the local authority to understand needs and priorities for fire and rescue delivery
- the performance standards and performance framework to be used for reporting on how fire and rescue functions are being carried out

This would support one of the Government’s four pillars of public service reform: strengthening the performance culture of public bodies.

B. Community Planning and Joint Working

The HIFB is concerned that the Bill does not make clear the alignment of arrangements for local fire and rescue delivery with community planning arrangements. Community planning should reduce the need for separate plans for local policing and fire and rescue services and instead support the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan for each area, as agreed with other partners, especially local authorities, local health boards and the Scottish Ambulance Service locally. The HIFB accepts that some CPPs may be more able to proceed with this joint planning than others, but it seeks provision in the Bill for those partnerships to proceed in this way if they are ready to do so.

Community planning is also the process for agreeing joint operational working and tasking. More explicit reference to building on current community planning arrangements at the planning and operational levels would support the integration and prevention agendas better, as well as finding potential efficiencies in service planning.

The HIFB notes that there is no explicit requirement made in the Bill for the Local Senior Officer for the Fire and Rescue Service to participate in community planning. The HIFB seeks the same duty to apply for that officer as for the local police commander. In addition, there are four further provisions or assurances requested by the HIFB:

i. The HIFB seeks greater clarity either in the Bill or in its accompanying guidance on the extent of local joint working expected of the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. This is required because the HIFB fears that current effective joint working in key community safety areas will be undermined if current fire and rescue input is reduced. Joint working is effective if those taking part have authority to task resources decisively, quickly and within the local area. Delegated authority for local senior officers in deploying their local resources needs to be assured for effective fire and rescue participation in community planning.
ii. The HIFB seeks clarity on how protocols for joint working can be maintained and improved in the change to a Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.

iii. The HIFB seeks provision to be made for the continuation of joint working to support fire and rescue service performance (including the sharing of resources across partnerships). The three island authorities (Orkney, Shetland and Western isles) are working with the Scottish Government to develop a model for integrated service provision in island communities which could see much closer integration of services within the public sector in each island group.

iv. The HIFB seeks to extend the provisions for the duty to apply also to the Scottish Ambulance Service, given the need to align its resources with other emergency services and local partnership arrangements.

The HIFB is aware of the current detailed review of community planning and any implications arising from that for the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service will need to be reflected in the Bill or in accompanying guidance.

Highland and Islands Fire Board
6 March 2012
The Highland Council welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Justice Committee on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. The Council is keen to contribute to the legislation to ensure that new arrangements for the forces work effectively from their inception. The Council wishes to see continuity and enhancement in the performance of police and fire and rescue services operating in the Highlands. The Council is also to be a pathfinder authority to aid the transition to the new single services.

1. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 1 and Schedule 1 The Scottish Police Authority

Schedule 1 provides that the Scottish Police Authority (SPA) will have between 7 and 11 members, all to be appointed by Scottish Ministers with appointments held for no more than 4 years. Highland Council is concerned that this membership does not allow adequate regional or local input to Scottish policing arrangements. This is particularly the case where the Bill does not make sufficient provision for local accountability for, or scrutiny of, local policing other than consultation and reporting.

The Council seeks the size of the SPA to increase to 15 members. It also seeks reassurance in the Bill that membership of the SPA makes provision for Scottish rural, island and urban community safety interests. The Council sees the inclusion of local elected members beneficial in this respect, and seeks that they comprise at least 8 of 15 members on the SPA. This would bring a breadth of experience and knowledge of policing across Scotland. The Council supports the appointment of the SPA members through the Public Appointments process.

The use of sub committees may be useful but if the maximum number of SPA members remains at 11, the Council views this as too small for proper consideration of rural, island and urban issues at sub-committee level.

2. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 2 Functions of the Scottish Police Authority

Highland Council welcomes the inclusion of maintaining the Police Service, promoting and supporting continuous improvement in the policing of Scotland and the accountability of the chief constable and the need for proportionate, accountable and transparent governance in the main functions of the Scottish Police Authority. However the Council seeks assurance that these functions will have regard to the current standard of policing in the Northern Constabulary area. Specifically it seeks assurance that the legislation and/or accompanying guidance will ensure:

- the maintenance of the police service in the Highlands;
- that continuous improvement will be based on current performance in the Highlands and not based on a levelling of performance where that might be lower for other areas of Scotland or for Scotland as a whole; and
- that appropriate local governance arrangements are made for the area which includes mainland and island communities. Community representation in these areas should have no less weight than community representation in other areas of Scotland.

Highland Council expects that there will be no reduction in service performance in the Highlands as a result of police reform.

3. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 3 Maintenance of the Police

Highland Council notes the provision for the Scottish Police Authority to provide and maintain various assets to carry out its functions. It seeks the inclusion in this Section of a reference to sharing public assets with other public bodies where that would enable best value for the public purse. This could be detailed further in guidance, with reference for example made to shared buildings, shared vehicles or shared maintenance of them, shared land or partnership arrangements for land disposal for best community benefit, shared ICT provision and shared procurement where appropriate.

4. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 5 Directions

Highland Council is keen to see reference made to a general or specific direction from Scottish Ministers on the maintenance or re-location of police services to ensure either:
- no loss of front-line or back office services currently based in the Highlands or
- for new central services to be moved to the Highlands to support local economies and rural communities.

This can be enabled by ICT or supported by further shared services arrangements. For example there are shared arrangements with Highland Council Service Points for customers in some rural communities at the moment and with Highland Council for out of hours calls.

Inverness has proven to be a suitable location for the headquarters of another national public body and there is no reason to assume it could not provide a suitable regional base for functions associated with the Police Service for Scotland.

5. Part 1, Chapter 2, Section 9 Special Constables

Highland Council welcomes the provision in the Bill to continue with the appointment of special constables. It seeks assurance that the appointment of special constables by the Chief Constable will continue to supplement and not replace the appointment of regular constables in the Highlands. The Council has two reasons for responding in this way:
- a. The Council is concerned that the new Authority or Chief Constable may have a perception that serious crime is less of an issue in the Highlands than elsewhere in Scotland (this is not evidenced);
- b. The move to a Police Service of Scotland, without careful human resource management, may lead to a drain of talent from the Highlands causing recruitment difficulties for regular constables in the future.
6. Part 1, Chapter 2, Section 15 (Constables: service outwith the Police Service of Scotland) and Part 2, Section 99 sub section 9 and Amendments relating to Part 2.

Highland Council seeks assurance (through a provision in the Bill or in accompanying guidance) that when consent is given for constables to be engaged in service outwith the Police Service (paid or voluntary) that this does not exclude engagement in another emergency service (paid or voluntary). This assurance is sought because it may be helpful in remote rural and island communities for there to be an ‘emergency first responder’ capability, where skills found in the separate emergency services (police, fire and rescue and ambulance) could be developed across staff with these roles and deployed more quickly to deal with emergencies arising.

Part 2, Section 99 of the Bill does not make reference to a statutory bar on employment within the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. This existed in the Section 51 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005, but there appears to be no amendment to the prohibition on employment of police in the Amendments relating to Part 2 of the Bill (page 110). The Council is unsure why this prohibition needs to remain and presses for it to be repealed.

By making provision for paid and voluntary employment in more than one emergency service, some recruitment difficulties in remote rural and island authorities may be overcome.

7. Part 1, Chapter 4, Section 33 Strategic Police Priorities

Highland Council welcomes the provision (at subsection 3) that before determining the strategic priorities for the Scottish Police Authority, Scottish Ministers must consult with ‘such persons as appear to them to be representative of local authorities’. This may be interpreted as consultation with a national body such as Cosla; however with arrangements to be trialled through local pathfinders for the engagement and scrutiny of local police plans, there may be merit in specifying in the Bill the need for Ministers to consult with locally elected representatives involved in the scrutiny of their local police plans, especially if the strategic police priorities are to be informed (at least in part) by community safety issues and priorities in communities. This approach may also reduce the time required to consult local authorities on the Strategic Police Plan (as set out in subsection 4).

8. Part 1, Chapter 5, Sections 38 and 39 Best Value

Highland Council welcomes the duty of the Scottish Police Authority to make arrangements to secure Best Value and for these to be aligned to the duty placed on local authorities. It may be worth noting that arrangements for auditing Best Value (in police and local authorities) may change as the approach to external scrutiny of community planning partners and partnerships in the achievement of outcomes is currently under review. This may be dealt with in the future in accompanying guidance to the legislation (referred to in section 39).
9. Part 1, Chapter 6, Section 41, Annual Accounts

Although the Financial Memorandum for the Bill is being considered by the Finance Committee, the Council is concerned that the proposed delivery model means that the new single forces will not be able to recover Value Added Tax (VAT). This will incur additional cost to the public purse and reduce resources for the new services. The Council acknowledges that the Scottish Government is in discussion with HM Treasury and the HMRC seeking exemptions, but the Council seeks assurance that this will be resolved before the legislation is passed.

10. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 45 Local Policing

In subsection 1 reference is made to adequate arrangements being in place for each local authority area. Highland Council would like to see cross reference with the policing principles (Section 32) and the local implementation of the Police Authority functions (especially Section 2 sub section 1 (a) maintenance of the police service and (b) continuous improvement.

Highland Council welcomes the provision at sub section (2) that a local commander must be designated for each local authority area. It does not however specify the rank for the local commander. If this is to vary across local authorities, there is a concern that in rural or smaller local authorities a lower ranking officer will be appointed. This is of concern because in an organisation with a hierarchical structure, they would have a lower level of authority within the Scottish Police Service potentially limiting their capacity to influence the national policing plan and the resources required for the local police plan. The Council seeks provision in the Bill or accompanying guidance that if the rank of a local commander is to vary, that the position of local commander is afforded a particular status which would not be superseded by higher rank in other command areas on matters affecting local command in Highland and the resources for it.

Under sub section (3) the Bill provides that a local commander could cover more than one local authority area. This is more likely to be the case where the local authority has a relatively small population or covers a relatively small geography. With this more likely to affect the Highlands and Islands, Highland Council is concerned that it may not be as well served as other areas with a dedicated local commander. This is of even more concern if the rank of the local commander may be lower than in other areas. Assurance is sought in the provisions of the Bill or in the accompanying guidance, that service delivery, performance and resources will be fairly distributed with no reduction for the Council currently served by Northern Constabulary.

11. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 46 Local Authority role in policing

Highland Council welcomes the provisions in the Bill for the mandatory involvement of the local authority in setting priorities and objectives for policing in the area, in providing feedback on policing in the area and improvements to it and in receiving reports on police functions and complaints made. The Council seeks to strengthen these provisions or include a further provision that the local commander must at least have regard to the views of local authorities in their involvement in local priority setting and objectives and in their feedback on performance.

This section of the Bill provides little assurance on local accountability and governance for local policing. While arrangements for proper local scrutiny of policing and for community engagement are to be trialled through pathfinders, the Bill should make reference to the principle and value of local scrutiny of policing in its area.

In addition it would be helpful if the accompanying guidance could refer to:

- the support for joint strategic assessment with the local authority to understand needs and priorities for policing and
- the performance standards and performance framework to be used for reporting on how police functions are being carried out. This would support one of the Government’s four pillars of public service reform; strengthening the performance culture of public bodies.

The Council is concerned that the Bill does not make clear the alignment of arrangements for local policing with community planning arrangements. Community planning should reduce the need for separate plans for local policing and fire and rescue services and instead support the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan for each area as agreed with other partners especially local authorities, local health boards and the Scottish Ambulance Service locally. The Council accepts that some CPPs may be more able to proceed with this joint planning than others, but it seeks provision in the Bill for those partnerships to proceed in this way if they are ready to do so.

Community planning is also the process for agreeing joint operational working and tasking. More explicit reference to building on current community planning arrangements at the planning and operational levels would support the integration and prevention agendas better as well as finding potential efficiencies in service planning. This point relates to the provisions in the Bill relating to community planning and the local policing plan below.

Provision should be made for the additional costs associated with setting up new committees in local authorities. The Council seeks assurance that these costs are netted against the transfer of grant from local to central government.

12. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 47 Duty to Participate in Community Planning

Highland Council welcomes the inclusion of the local commander to participate in community planning. The Council seeks the same duty to apply to the Local Senior Officer for the Fire and Rescue Service. There are four further provisions or assurances requested by the Council:

a. The Council seeks greater clarity either in the Bill or in its accompanying guidance on the extent of local joint working expected of the new Scottish Police Service. This is required because the Council fears that current effective joint working in key public protection and community safety areas (child and adult protection, dealing with violent offenders, violence against women, tackling alcohol and drug misuse, anti-social behaviour, youth re-offending and road safety) will be undermined if current policing input is reduced in any way. Joint working is effective if those taking part have authority to task resources decisively, quickly and within the local command. Delegated authority for local commanders in deploying their local resources needs to be assured for effective police participation in community planning.

b. The Council seeks clarity on how protocols for joint working can be maintained and improved in the change to a Scottish Police Service.

c. The Council seeks to extend the provisions for the duty to apply also to the Scottish Ambulance Service, given the need to align its resources with other emergency services and local partnership arrangements.

d. The Council is aware of the current detailed review of community planning and any implications arising from that for the Scottish Police Service will need to be reflected in the Bill or in accompanying guidance.

13. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 48 Local Police Plans

The Council welcomes the provisions in the Bill for the local commander to prepare and submit a local police plan to the relevant local authority for approval, but sees these provisions as limiting. This is because:

1. It is not clear what the process would be if approval is not given. Some positive process of resolving any lack of agreement would be required.

2. It is less likely to support the approach to achieving public protection and community safety outcomes. Outcomes require partnership or integrated working with other relevant partners, not the development of a separate plan by one organisation for consultation with others. It would be more helpful instead to at least allow for the local police plan to be developed jointly with the local authority and for it to be subject to public consultation. Even better would be the acknowledgement in the Bill that outcomes mean the involvement of other partners, notably the local fire and rescue service, the Health Board, Scottish Ambulance Service locally and the third sector. Having a joint public protection and community safety plan could be achieved within a framework of national outcomes, national policing priorities and the fit with local outcomes and local resources. All of this can be supported by the development of the Single Outcome Agreement, especially in relation to partnership performance. This joint approach would enable local solutions to be developed for integrated and preventative services, two of the Governments four pillars of public service reform.

Subsection 5 refers to a review of the local police plan at least every 3 years, but this is not well aligned to the requirement for an annual police plan (Section 35). The Bill or accompanying guidance should enable an annual review of the local plan.
14. Part 1, Chapter 10, Section 62 and 63, The Police Investigations and Review Commissioner

The Council seeks further information on the implications in the Bill on the change proposed for the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland to become the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner. In addition the Council seeks provision in the Bill for there to be an opportunity for the local scrutiny of local complaints handling.

15. Part 1, Chapter 11, Sections 71 and 74 Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland

It is not clear how the Bill makes provision for reducing external scrutiny and making it risk based and proportionate as required following the Crerar Review. In addition it does not take into account the current review of external scrutiny of community planning partnerships. The Council emphasises this point given the provisions in the Bill for a separate Chief Inspector of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (Section 117).

16. Part 1, Chapter 17, Section 95 and Schedule 4 Transfer of constables, staff, property etc

Highland Council will consider the potential impact of a staff transfer scheme for staff who are to be treated as police employees but are employees of the local authorities involved in the NJPB. It would be helpful to have further guidance available on this matter in advance of the appointed day.

This is important because Highland Council provides services to the Joint Northern Police Board in terms of clerking and administration, policy development and finance services. Similarly Highland Council has shared services for procurement, out of hours call handling and some co-located customer services within some remote and rural communities. The Council therefore needs to understand the implications, if any, for staff involved.

17. Part 2, Fire Reform, The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service, Section 99 Schedule 1A

Schedule 1A provides that the SFRS will have between 7 and 11 members, all to be appointed by Scottish Ministers with appointments held for no more than 4 years. Highland Council is concerned that this membership does not allow adequate regional or local input to Scottish Fire and Rescue Service arrangements. Highland Council requests that further consideration is given to make provision for Scottish rural, island and urban community safety interests to be included. One way of achieving this would be to include the appointment of local elected members, and to increase the size of the SFRS Board.

Unlike the provisions in part 1 of the Bill relating to Special Constables, Part 2 does not appear to make reference to the role of retained or volunteer staff and their entitlements as part of the SFRS. This is of concern in the Highlands where there is some reliance on these arrangements. The Bill should make reference to these roles, but in keeping with the evidence at paragraph 5 above, their use should complement the role of SFRS’s full time and paid employees.

18. Part 2, Section 111, sub section 39A Best Value

Highland Council welcomes the same duty on SFRS to secure Best Value, as it applies to local authorities. It seeks inclusion of a reference to shared services with other public bodies, including local authorities and the Scottish Police Service where that will support best value.

19. Part 2, Chapter 8A, Section 112, sub section 41A Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Strategic Plan

Highland Council recommends that in preparing the strategic plan the Scottish Police Authority is named along with local authorities as a mandatory consultee.

20. Part 2, Chapter 8A, Section 113 Local Fire and Rescue Plan

Highland Council recommends that at least the local police commander is included as a mandatory consultee for the local fire and rescue plan.

However, as stated at paragraph 12 above, to achieve public protection and community safety outcomes, provisions should be made in the Bill for the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan involving not only fire, police and local authorities, but also the ambulance service locally and NHS. This would support the Single Outcome Agreement better and develop community planning arrangements further.

This integrated community safety approach would enable the provision in the Bill (41E, (2) (d)) for the local plan to refer to outcomes and how they can be measured. Specifying and achieving outcomes normally requires a partnership or integrated approach to service planning and delivery.

No specific reference to the SFRS having a duty to participate in community planning appears to be made in Part 2 of the Bill. It would be helpful to clarify whether this is a standing provision in the 2005 Act or if it has been omitted purposefully as a duty in this Bill.

21. Part 2, Chapter 8A, Section 113 (41K) Monitoring by local authority

With the monitoring of the local police plan by the local authority also a provision of the Bill, with the similar provision for the local fire and rescue plan, it would be more effective if separate plans are to be produced for them to be monitored together or simultaneously given the connections and dependencies across both emergency services.

However, if the Bill is amended to enable the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan for each local authority area, then each contributing partner would need to be accountable for its performance against the plan. This can be facilitated locally through joint scrutiny arrangements (which could be trialled through local pathfinders) and it can be reported nationally through the arrangements for the single Outcome Agreement.

Provision should be made for the additional costs associated with setting up new committees in local authorities. The Council seeks assurance that these costs are netted against the transfer of grant from local to central government.

22. Part 2, Chapter 8B, Section 116 (42A) Directions by Scottish Ministers

In keeping with the response at paragraph 4 above, Highland Council is keen to see reference made to a general or specific direction from Scottish Ministers on the maintenance or re-location of fire and rescue services to ensure either:

- no loss of front-line or back office services currently based in the Highlands or
- for new central services to be moved to the Highlands to support local economies and rural communities.

This can be enabled by ICT or supported by further shared services arrangements.

23. Schedule 5 (introduced by section 118) Transfer of staff, property etc

Highland Council will consider the potential impact of a staff transfer scheme for staff who may be treated as SFRS employees but are employees of Highland Council. It would be helpful to have further guidance available on this matter in advance of the appointed day.

Highland Council
6 March 2012
Integrity4Scotland which campaigns for the highest ethical standards, transparency and public accountability within Scottish public service bodies is pleased to make the following submissions on the general principles of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill.

These submissions relate to 1) the people’s ownership of policing, 2) the requirement for transparency in the proposed single police force’s operation and 3) the need for the public to be able to hold the proposed single police force to account.

1) The people’s ownership of policing:

1) (i) We have concerns that the Bill does not clearly acknowledge the people’s ownership of policing in Scotland and that adequate provision is not included within the Bill for the people’s direct involvement in and control of the police services to their communities and county.

1) (ii) Our view is that a crucial function of policing is the promotion of a sense of security in the public. We feel that as well as a recognition of the people’s ownership of policing that particular function requires to be explicit in the proposed new “Constable’s Oath”.

1) (iii) There is also the democratic imperative that a police force is under the control of the people rather than the state. While the Bill sets out in differing degrees of detail the roles and powers which the Scottish Government and members of local authorities will have in respect of policing, little is made clear in respect of the role the Scottish Parliament will play and nothing at all on the people’s direct control over policing. Viewing the Bill from democratic perspective we see this as a fatal omission.

1) (iv) It is generally accepted that the people themselves are capable of being a great asset to policing. Within our Scottish population we have a wealth of untapped talent some of whom could render excellent service to the nation through direct involvement in smart, open, inclusive and socially responsible policing. We would therefore wish to see the Bill re-drafted to recognise the existence of that talent and include possibilities for much greater public involvement at every level of policing in Scotland.

1) (v) Policing in order truly to be policing for the people must be conducive to social cohesion. It is a universally accepted fact that for a police force to operate to its maximum effectiveness it must have the acceptance and support of the people it serves. A stronger sense of ownership of policing we believe would correspondingly enhance the people’s sense of responsibility towards policing and thereby their willingness to contribute beneficially to policing operations, social coherence and ultimately quality of life in Scotland.

1) (vi) With the creation of a single police force covering all of Scotland we will introduce a new and powerful element into the interactive life of our nation. This new force will itself require policing if it is to render best service to the people of Scotland and we would submit that in the interest of our democratic society policing of the police must be done primarily by the people rather than the state. We would wish that requirement to be explicit in any eventual legislation.

2) Transparency of policing:

2) (i) In an open society policing can never be secret. For the maintenance of public confidence in any public service that service must not only operate but be seen to operate in the public interest. In particular, a police force with a monopoly on policing powers in Scotland, we submit, would have to conform to the highest demands of transparency and be subject to correspondingly high levels of scrutiny.

2) (ii) We do not consider that such proposed measures as the laying before the Scottish Parliament of annual reports and “accountable persons” attending interviews at parliamentary committee level represent adequate opportunity for parliamentary scrutiny of policing.

2) (iii) Given that Scottish Ministers must of necessity delegate much of their duties to aids and civil servants we are concerned that much of Ministers’ duties in respect of police scrutiny will be carried out less democratically than will be healthy for our society.

2) (iv) While we recognise that formal links between local authorities and the police will always be necessary we are concerned that the Bill proposes that oversight of policing at a local level should be the sole preserve of local authority members. Our fear is that the Bill assumes a public confidence in the ability of local authority members to competently represent them in local policing matters, including scrutiny, while in many cases such a confidence simply does not exist.

2) (v) We would wish to see incorporated into any legislation which may be passed explicate provision for public representation in a Scottish Police Authority and local police liaison committees and also provision for a new appropriately empowered national policing oversight body composed entirely of members of the public. By “public representation” and “members of the public” we mean here resident of Scotland who can demonstrate to the public’s satisfaction that they have no connection to the political, legal or police “establishments” which would constitute a conflict of interest.

3) Public accountability of policing:

3) (i) Any police service clearly has to be accountable for its actions and ultimately the ways in which the police are held to account have to be satisfactory to the public.
3) (ii) We have given our police extraordinary powers including the power to breach what we consider some of our most cherished natural rights and we must have corresponding powers to scrutinise their use of those powers and to hold them accountable for any suspected misuse.

3) (iii) Ideally a police service should on all occasions be accountable directly to the public for its actions. However, while we accept that such an arrangement may be excessive and impracticable we contend that it should be the ideal towards which we strive.

3) (iv) We are therefore concerned over the total lack of provision within the Bill for direct public involvement in the processes for holding the police to account.

3) (v) Noting the Bill’s intentions for the investigation and answering of complaints against the police we recognise the considerable problems associated with (a) one police officer handling a complaint against another police officer and (b) the enhanced role proposed for the much criticised Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland.

3) (vi) We fear that the provisions in the Bill to scrutinise the police and to hold them to account fall far short of anything which would be likely to persuade the public that the protection of their rights is its paramount concern.

3) (vii) As in scrutiny of policing, we consider that the public will only be satisfied over the impartiality of a process which holds the police to account if they can see that it has the direct public involvement and independence of a kind which they accept.

3) (viii) This we believe will also necessarily entail the kind of public representation which we described in point 2) (v).

4) Summary:

4) (i) Our central message to the Justice Committee, the Scottish Government and the Scottish Parliament is that in the fair, open and inclusive Scotland which we all wish to see policing must above all be policing for the people.

4) (ii) We believe that this means that future policing in Scotland should be transparent, publicly accountable and reflect its ownership and control by the people of this country.

4) (iii) The decision the Scottish Government has taken to reform the police forces in Scotland into one national force while offering the opportunity to save public funds carries with it the risks which creating any large powerful organisation entails.

4) (iv) However, the present considerations also offer us the opportunity to tailor our police service to the future needs of the Scottish people.

4) (v) We believe that in order to minimise risk to appropriate democratic control over policing and to maximise the opportunity for progressive change in policing the people must have opportunities to have real, hands-on involvement in every aspect and at every level of policing.

4) (vi) The introduction of the present Bill gives us a seldom available opportunity to consider how we wish to shape future policing in Scotland and indeed life in Scotland. However, for the reasons given above we consider that the Bill now under consideration falls far short of an acceptable blueprint for the future provision of police services to this country.

Criminal Justice Supply Chain links into Security Cartel

Because of successive government reforms, G4S are now in the position where they are moving towards cartel control of every stage of the criminal justice system across England Wales which has been reformed to be the new highly profitable criminal justice supply chain.

On 29th December 2011, Lincolnshire Police handed control of all police “services” to G4S for 10 years awarding them a £200m contract (immediately indicating a further 15 year extension is already on the cards).

www.publicservice.co.uk/news_story.asp?id=18943

This contract gives G4S control of their police cells and police control rooms (with only 2 police officers supervising) but also the crime management bureau, ticket office, collisions units, criminal justice units, firearms licencing, hiring and firing of police officers, and police computers as well as fleets of police cars, police procurement and police finances.

Then on the 2nd March 2012 it was reported in the Guardian

“West Midlands and Surrey have invited bids from G4S and other major security companies on behalf of all forces across England and Wales to take over the delivery of a wide range of services previously carried out by the police.”

http://www.guardian.co.uk/2012/mar/02/police-privatisation-security-firms-crime

The contract is the largest on police privatisation so far, with a potential value of £1.5bn over seven years, rising to a possible £3.5bn depending on how many other English and Welsh constabularies get involved.

The breathtaking list of policing activities up for grabs includes investigating crimes, detaining suspects, developing cases, responding to and investigating incidents, supporting victims and witnesses, managing high-risk individuals, patrolling neighbourhoods, managing intelligence, managing engagement with the public, as well as more traditional back-office functions, such as managing forensics, providing legal services, managing the vehicle fleet, finance and human resources.”

This English/Welsh contract, in effect, reduces our police officers to serve the only purpose of being arresting officers on behalf of G4S and other private security companies - effectively reducing every police officer to being nothing more, and having no place in policing other than to be glorified G4S Bounty Hunters.

In Scotland the SNP government have just introduced a bill to create a single Scottish police force to save money.

Is it the intention of the SNP government and Scottish police leaders to make the financial savings by privatising the entire Single Scottish police force?

It has already been reported John Shaw, the managing director of G4S has already held “exploratory” talks with leaders of two Scottish police forces.

While in February 2011 the SNP Justice Secretary, Kenny MacAskill shared a platform with John Shaw (managing director at G4S) at the Policing Scotland summit.

http://www.scotsman.com/news/scottish_police_in_talks_to_sell_off_cells_1_1501273

Since then G4S has been awarded a 7 year, contract to transport every prisoner in Scotland for the next seven years.

http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-scotland-12739411
As more and more police “services” are being fast-tracked for outsourcing the combination of contracts awarded piecemeal, with no Monopolies Commission oversight, this is resulting in G4S grabbing contracts and policing power across the country.

Combine all these contracts with the Ministry of Justice awarding G4S a £300 million contract, starting on the 1st February 2012, to provide “services” to over 340 court, tribunal and administering buildings across the Midlands, Wales and the North of England.

G4S already have a 25 year contract, awarded in 2004 transferring the court facilities and employees from the court service to G4S for the entire Manchester Magistrates Court building which houses 18 courtrooms, a coroners court and 48 custody cells is managed by G4S, where they provide security and I.T. and mailroom functions alongside many other “services”!

G4S are even involved in training magistrates for their “customer journey” for the Bedfordshire, Essex and Hertfordshire courts Board (with 1,600 judicial office holders, judges and magistrates) covering the lives of 3.5 million people!

G4S are not only involved in policing, prisoner transport courts and magistrates training but have now extended their tentacles to take control of more and more forensics when they were awarded a contract for 5 police forces in England in South East of England for Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire and Bedfordshire constabularies.

So G4S now have the power, through contracts, to police us, to control and examine forensic evidence, detain us and take us to courts they manage with some magistrates sitting in judgement who have received training from G4S.

But our G4S journey along the new criminal justice supply chain does not end there!

If you are found guilty of a crime and a tagging order is imposed, G4S once again take control with their dominance in control of Tagging and Control Orders (a “market” with new contracts currently up for grabs, worth over £1 billion as control orders have exploded from the initial 3,500 in the first year to 70,000 per year and growing).

http://www.guardian.co.uk/society/2011/sep/30/electronic-tags-offenders

Despite G4S already controlling four prisons in England, the government handed G4S even greater power with the awarding of two 15 year contracts for £750 million to run HMP Birmingham (the first publicly run prison to be transferred to the private sector as well as the new prison, Feathersone 2, which is currently under construction).

http://www.g4s.com/en/Media%20Centre/News/2011/03/31/HMP%20Birmingham%20and%20Featherstone%202/

On Thursday 1st March the Guardian reported G4S new, more sinister methods, to increase their power and control within the criminal justice system when a prison governor had to throw out G4S “probation” staff from three prisons in South Yorkshire after discovering that the local probation trust had formed an alliance with the private security company G4S to take over the running of his jails.

http://www.guardian.co.uk/society/2012/mar/01/prison-governor-locks-out-probation-staff

G4S links with this probation “trust” demonstrate not only are G4S hoping to grab control of 3 more prisons, they also hope to take control of prisoners’ probation using the government’s planned “reform” of probation and community sentencing services.

http://www.guardian.co.uk/society/2011/jul/12/probation-services-put-out-tender

G4S are preparing their way now, having appointing David Griffiths as their new Director of Probation and Community Services on 8 December 2011

“David joins G4S with more than 25 years’ experience within the criminal justice system and in probation services, most recently as Deputy Director (justice policy) at the Ministry of Justice.”

http://www.g4s.uk.com/EN-GB/Media%20Centre/News/2011/12/08/New%20Director%20of%20Probation%20and%20Community%20Services/

And just to complete their control of the newly created “criminal justice supply chain” G4S have also been awarded three contracts for the government’s new welfare to work programme.

http://www.g4swelfaretowork.com/in-your-region/south-west/default.php with Nick Clegg ensuring “they” will be meeting prisoners at the gates of the prisons on their release.

Still, at least the lawyers are independent of G4S – or are they?

The “reform” of British Legal Services (otherwise known as the Tesco Law) has opened up British Legal Services to ownership to those out with the legal system. In theory, this means G4S could buy a 49% stake in every legal practice in Britain (and we would never know).

Already at least one firm of Barristers quotes proudly on their website “. . . has been instructed in a variety of criminal cases, both for the prosecution and defence, regularly appearing in the Magistrates and Crown Court. As well as being regularly instructed by defence solicitors, . . . has undertaken cases for the probation service, G4S and the CPS in the Crown Court. . . . has appeared in several sentence hearings. . . . has regularly instructed to appear in Magistrates trials both for the CPS, G4S and Defendants and is looking to develop her Crown Court practice.”

http://www.dorestreet.co.uk/barristers/kayleigh-long-~82/which only demonstrates the new power G4S wields when they have barristers quoting they are serving G4S needs alongside the Crown Prosecution service and the Crown Court in Britain’s criminal justice system.

Even our politicians are not independent of G4S, as, after giving up his MP role in 2010, New Labour’s Cabinet Minister John Reid joined the board of G4S Regional Management Services http://www.parliament.uk/biographies/john-reid/25200 [Link no longer operates]

Combined with his appointment to the House of Lords John Reid is in a position to vote for greater public sector reforms (without being elected) which may just further benefit G4S (and John Reid’s) interests and profits, especially when this member of the House of Lords’ interest in G4S Regional Management Services had to be declared when he wrote an article for the Guardian on new security strategies being required for the MOD on cybercrime.

http://www.guardian.co.uk/commentisfree/2011/jun/03/defence-counter-cyberterrorism-threat

And what about the independence of our judiciary – would we know if they had shares in the G4S criminal justice supply chain?

Giving any one company so much power across our entire criminal justice system – to the extent it has been converted into a criminal justice supply chain which may be controlled by a cartel is criminal in itself.

But G4S contracts do not end there.
G4S are still gaining contracts for asylum seeking housing and borders despite a Guardian report in January 2012 indicating “A Commons home affairs select committee inquiry into the treatment of people being deported also found evidence of a racist culture among private security escort staff and a "too cosy relationship" between UKBA and its private contractors.

The MPs' inquiry followed the death of Jimmy Mubenga while he was being deported from Heathrow to Angola in 2010. Three G4S security guards escorting him were arrested and are still under police investigation.

Keith Vaz, the chairman of the Commons home affairs committee, said serious questions remained over the use of contractors in removals and deportations since Reliance took over from G4S following the death of Mubenga!"

http://www.guardian.co.uk/uk/2012/jan/26/deportation-techniques-mps-warn

The G4S 2012 Olympics contracts got a massive boost when David Cameron kindly doubled the security budget from £271 million to £553 million by adjusting the number of security guards required) as well as doubling the security budget of the opening and closing ceremonies from £40 million to over £80 million.

http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-16030785

And the government's love affair with G4S even extends beyond policing and security to the classification of the disabled within our welfare system. G4S, in conjunction with the Department Of Work and Pensions advertising on the British Deaf Association website for volunteers to come forward for their “Personal Independence Payment Testing” stating “It will involve a single, one hour, face-to-face appointment with a healthcare professional from G4S Medical Services, working on behalf of DWP”.

One Guardian blogger wrote of the G4S/DWP trial assessment scheme “Will I still get Personal Independence Payments if G4S can't talk to me? Liz Ball is a deafblind wheelchair user but when G4S invited her to take part in a trial interview they failed to arrange an interpreter”.

But let’s not forget the G4S jewel in the crown – GCHQ - believe it or not they even have contracts there

“Ex-Prime Minister, Tony Blair states: "Secret intelligence gives the Government a vital edge in tackling some of the most difficult problems we face....intelligence forewarns us of threats to our national security; helps the Government promote international stability; provides support and protection to our forces; contributes to our economic health and strengthens our efforts against terrorism and serious crime.”
With this in mind, it is essential for a government organisation such as GCHQ to be kept highly secure at all times. An integrated security solution from G4S Technology offers the reliability, security and professionalism necessitated by a project such as this, and other integrated security projects throughout the UK.

And don’t discount Theresa May’s decision to split border control in two. Is this to pave the way for contracts to be awarded to “G4S Homeland Security” where their website states “At G4S we understand the bigger picture”?

When criminal justice services were in public control they were all kept completely independent to ensure vital freedoms and justice for the people of Britain.

It is amazing how quickly separate reforms have combined to transfer too much power into the hands of too few people.

And with government ministers leaving parliament to go straight on to the boards of the companies after they have “reformed” our laws and our criminal justice system, this surely demonstrates why all public services (and especially our criminal justice system) should be reverted back to complete public control.

We cannot put a price on justice and freedom (even if politicians can put a price on contracts and future board membership ensuring crime does pay for themselves and G4S).

G4S brag on their website “At G4S we understand the bigger picture” - sadly our politicians do not – because even the KGB will read this and weep.

There is surely a case for all police privatisation and criminal justice reforms to be put on hold and a public sector cartel commission be formed and investigation undertaken to ensure criminal justice is not controlled by private sector cartels across the whole of the UK.

If this is not put on hold the following scenario is what English and Welsh (and possibly Scottish) residents will face.

Could this be the future experience of victims under our criminal justice system which is being privatised faster than any reform before. (Hypothetical scenario below)

I cannot explain my distress when my house was burgled. As I waited for the police I was shaking from head to toe. The doorbell rang, they were here at last!

To my surprise it was not the police at the door but instead a burly man with a skinhead wearing a private security guard’s uniform. Was he here to sell me an alarm system – how sick is that – how did he find out so fast I might want to consider a home security system after today’s events?

He proceeded to walk straight in to my home. What the hell was he doing? Flashing a badge he mumbled something about him being the scenes of crime “officer”.

I was gobsmacked! Since when was a private security guard in charge of a crime scene?

I immediately called the local police station to speak to a police officer – but I was told the police could no longer take my call and a representative of G4S would call me back!

Was I dreaming?

When I called my husband at work, he wouldn’t believe me, said I must have misunderstood. By this time I was confused and frightened and the return call from G4S just made it worse.

A brusque woman explained G4S now controlled all police services in my area, including crime scenes and after they had gathered the evidence they would send all evidence away for examination – to G4S forensics.

She also informed me if the suspects were caught G4S police transport would take them to the G4S controlled court to be placed in front of the magistrates who had just completed their G4S training in “customer experience” and not to worry, should the suspects be found guilty they will be tagged by G4S or transferred to a G4S prison, depending on the sentence.

This G4S representative then went on to say rest assured G4S Probation Services would take control of offenders when their probation began and put them on one of their G4S controlled work programmes.

I was also informed she would be happy to supply a list of legal practices in which G4S had a financial interest (apparently thanks to “reform” legislation introduced last year) and a brochure detailing G4S security products for my home which I may wish to consider (with a discount on offer if I provided my crime reference number).

As I looked around my devastated home the crime did not seem so bad when compared to the sense of danger this conversation and the G4S security guard’s presence in my home had created.
Could this really be happening?

Evidence pertaining to Non Amendment Section 51 of the Fire Scotland Act

1. My evidence has been generated from my personal investigatory activities through consultation with various Police and Fire and Rescue Services in England, Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland, Fire Officers Association, Communities and Local Government, the National Policing Improvement Agency and my involvement with a petition I had lodged with the Scottish Parliament Petitions Committee (Petition Ref No 1254), and also my own personal circumstances, where I served as a Special Constable with Lothian and Borders Police from April 2007 to November 2008, whilst also employed as a Full time Fire Officer with Lothian and Borders Fire and Rescue Service.

Section 51 of the Fire Scotland Act is a continuation from a Section of legislation which was contained within the Fire Services Act 1947. (Section 32)

Section 51 states “A relevant authority, may not employ a Constable for the purpose of carrying out any of the functions as conferred on the authority by virtue of this Act”

2. In 2004 when the Fire and Rescue Services Act (England & Wales) was enacted, Section 37 of this Act stated: “No member of a police force may be employed by a fire and rescue authority for the purpose of discharging any of the authority’s functions under this act.” Special Constables are not deemed to be members of the ‘Police Force’ and are not covered by the definition in Section 101 of the Police Act 1996. However Special Constables in England and Wales are deemed to be warranted and attested officers, as such they possess full policing powers, including the power of arrest, which can be exercised in any police force in England and Wales. Guidance provided in Fire and Rescue Service Circular 62/2009 ‘Employment of members of Police Forces by Fire and Rescue Authorities’, clearly defines the situation in England and Wales which is: “Provided there is local agreement between the Chief Fire Officer and the Chief Constable of the Police Force, a Special Constable can be permitted to serve as a Retained or Wholetime Duty System Firefighter.” This clearly defines the situation from the Fire Service Legislative perspective, the following defines the situation from the Police Legislation: Firefighters Employed as Special Constables, “There is no restriction in the Police Act 1996 which prohibits Firefighters from becoming Special Constables. Firefighters employed on either the Retained or Wholetime Duty Systems who seek to also work as Special Constables are eligible to do so, provided there is local agreement between the Chief Fire Officer and the Chief Constable.”

3. I made direct contact with the National Policing Improvement Agency and the department of Communities and Local Government, to ascertain if there had been any reported cases, of a “conflict of interest” existing between an individual who was either a Retained or Wholetime firefighter who was also a Special Constable, in the seven years of this legislations existence, the response from both Westminster Government and the NPIA was: "There had been no reported cases of a conflict of interest existing between the two roles, of anyone who was a Firefighter and also a Special Constable"

So this is very strong evidence which states that the hypothetical reasoning behind the Scottish Government continuing to retain Section 51, being that of "A conflict of interest could exist between the role of Firefighter and Police Officer," bears no relevance and accuracy, in modern times, as the existence of the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 proves this unequivocally.

4. During the Justice 2 Committee Official Report process, September 2004 – January 2005, (Fire Scotland Bill), there was much debate in relation to whether Section 47 of the Fire Scotland Bill “Prohibition on employment of Police”, should be retained, there was a large difference of opinions, the majority being in favour of the exclusion/amendment of this section, to allow Special Constables to be eligible to also serve as Firefighters particularly in remote rural areas, this was stated by CFOAS, as they wished that Special Constables were differentiated from full time Police Officers in the legislation. Those in favour of an amendment were: Lothian and Borders Fire Board, Highlands and Islands Fire Board, Fire Officers Association, Chief Fire Officers Association (Scotland), Retained Firefighters Union.

5. Throughout the period of my petition (Ref 1254), views were sought from the following organisational groups on the inclusion of Section 51 of the Fire Scotland Act, and whether they would wish it to be amended/removed, the following were in favour of an amendment:
Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland
Fire Officers Association
Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland
Police Federation

Those wishing for Section 51 to be retained were:
Current Scottish Government
Fire Brigades Union (Scotland)

The reasons given by the Government and the FBU for the retention of Sect 51 were that a “Conflict of interest could exist between the roles of Constable and Firefighter. Fergus Ewing also stated that there are no differences between Special and Regular Constables in the context of Police powers, both take the same oath to the same office, and the powers and responsibilities associated with their roles are the same. I shall refer to previous evidence in relation to the situation in England and Wales, Special Constables in England and Wales hold exactly the same Police powers as Regular officers, Special Constables are fully warranted and attested and hold full Policing powers.

6. A point which was raised by myself during the process of my petition was:” Why does a similar restriction not exist, in the Fire Scotland Act, which prevents other members of the emergency services, being eligible to be appointed by a Fire Authority, as if a conflict of interest could apply between the Police and the Fire Service, then this could also be true for other services."
7. So to clarify matters, in Scotland Special Constables hold the same Police powers as that of Regular Constables, as do their counterparts in England and Wales, but in Scotland Special Constables are not differentiated from Regular Constables under (Sect 51), in being prevented from also serving as a Firefighter, because according to the Government a conflict of interest could exist, as their Police powers are the same. But in England and Wales Special Constables are differentiated under the Fire and Rescue Services Act from Regular Constables, therefore they are eligible to be appointed as a Firefighter under agreement between the Chief Constable and the Chief Fire Officer. There have been no reported cases of a conflict of interest, even though Special Constables and Regular Constables in England and Wales hold the same Police powers, as do Special Constables and Regular Constables in Scotland.

8. During the 18 month period where I served as a Special Constable and also at the same time, as a Full time Firefighter, on not one occasion, did a conflict of interest situation occur, because I held Police powers, and also operated as a Firefighter. I must stress that during this 18 month period I attended incidents as a Firefighter, there were occasions where criminality was involved, but due to the fact that I was on duty as a Firefighter and not as a Special Constable, I acted in my Firefighter role only, and because I had a greater understanding and awareness of the manner in which the Justice system functions, I ensured the preservation of evidence, and acted as a more effective professional witness.

Serving as a Special Constable and also having the training of a Firefighter served as a huge advantage whilst attending incidents as a Special Constable, especially for example, at Road Traffic Collisions, where hazardous materials were involved and at incidents where casualties required treatment prior to the arrival of the Ambulance Service, as Firefighters are trained to a significantly higher level in casualty care, to that of the Police, and also attending incidents involving Water Rescue, as I could inform Police Officers of the systems of work/procedures/protocols which the Fire Service utilise, so that the inter-agency incident could operate more effectively.

The restriction of preventing Special Constables from being eligible to be appointed as a Firefighter exists solely from the Fire Scotland Act, as Chief Constables have complete discretion, in appointing individuals who have employment or business interests' outwith the Police Service. (Regulation 5 Police Special Constables Scotland Regulations 2008)

9. In relation to the responses from the online consultation on Police and Fire Reform, (Question 23) the following were in clear favour of an amendment to Section 51 of the Act, providing realistic and credible reasons:

Aberdeenshire Community Planning Partnership
Aberdeenshire Council
Association of Principal Fire Officers
Chief Fire Officers Association Scotland
Central Fire and Rescue Service and Highlands and Islands Fire Board commented that the existing arrangements were justified, however there may be occasions within remote rural areas that justify a Constable becoming a Firefighter.

East Ayrshire Council, East Renfrewshire Council and Falkirk Council commented that, this was a matter, for the Police and Fire Services to determine.

10. To summarise, concerns have been expressed by Organisations, who can clearly appreciate and fully understand, the advantages an amendment of Section 51 of the Fire Scotland Act 2005, would bring to the communities of Scotland, mainly communities who reside within the remote rural areas of our country, where suitable publically spirited individuals who could quite effectively serve their community as a Special Constable and a Firefighter either Wholetime or Retained, but currently are unscrupulously prevented from doing so, from a section of legislation which was created in 1947, but has been included in modern legislation for a hypothetical reason which, by the very nature of the evidence which I have collated, I have proven to be totally unethical and disproven.

To retain this section of legislation unamended which is 65 years old into our modern Scottish society for a reason, which refers to a hypothetical scenario, which has never occurred during seven years of the existence of the equivalent English and Welsh Legislation, will only result in communities of Scotland being deprived of an enhancement of the services which the Scottish Police and Fire Services, can provide to making Scotland’s Communities a Safer place to live and work.

11. Therefore I respectfully implore, the Scottish Parliament to take cognizance of the evidence which I have presented, and consider an amendment to Section 51 of the Fire Scotland Act 2005 (as amended) to differentiate between Special Police Constables and Regular Police Constables, to effectively bring Section 51 in line with Section 37 of the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 (England and Wales). This in effect would retain the prohibition of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service from employing a Full time Police Constable, but would allow a Special Constable to be eligible to be appointed as a Firefighter either Wholetime or Retained, through agreement from the Chief Constable and Chief Fire Officer.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Northern Joint Police Board

The Northern Joint Police Board welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence to Justice Committee on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. The Board is keen to contribute to the legislation to ensure the new arrangements for single forces work effectively from their inception. The Board seeks continuity in the performance of police and fire and rescue services in the Northern area. The constituent authorities of the Northern Joint Police Board intend to be pathfinders to aid the transition to the new single services.

1. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 1 and Schedule 1 The Scottish Police Authority

Schedule 1 provides that the Scottish Police Authority will have between 7 and 11 members, all to be appointed by Scottish Ministers with appointments held for no more than 4 years. The Northern Joint Police Board (NJPB) is concerned that this size of membership is too small to allow adequate regional or local input to Scottish policing arrangements. The NJPB seeks the size of the Board to increase to 15 members. It also seeks reassurance in the Bill that membership of the Authority makes provision for Scottish rural, island and urban community safety interests. The NJPB sees the inclusion of local elected members beneficial in this respect, and seeks that they comprise at least 8 of 15 members on the Scottish Police Authority. This would bring a breadth of experience and knowledge of policing across Scotland. The NJPB supports the appointment of Authority members through the Public Appointments process.

The use of sub committees may be useful but if the maximum number of Board members remains at 11, this would be too small for proper consideration of rural, island and urban issues at sub-committee level.

2. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 2 Functions of the Scottish Police Authority

The NJPB welcomes the inclusion of maintaining the Police Service, promoting and supporting continuous improvement in the policing of Scotland and the accountability of the chief constable and the need for proportionate, accountable and transparent governance in the main functions of the Scottish Police Authority. However the NJPB seeks assurance that these functions will have regard to the current standard of policing in the Northern Constabulary area. Specifically it seeks assurance that the legislation and/or accompanying guidance will ensure:

- the maintenance of the police service in the northern area (Highlands and Islands);
- that continuous improvement will be based on current performance in the northern area and not based on a levelling of performance where that might be lower for other areas of Scotland or for Scotland as a whole; and
- that appropriate local governance arrangements are made for the area which includes mainland and island communities. Community representation in these areas should have no less weight than community representation in other areas of Scotland.
The NJPB expects that there will be no reduction in service performance in the Highlands and Islands as a result of police reform.

The NJPB seeks clarity on the nature of the relationship between the members of the Scottish Police Authority and the members of the local committees and with other regional bodies such as the Community Justice Authorities and Regional Transport Partnerships.

3. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 3 Maintenance of the Police

The NJPB notes the provision for the Scottish Police Authority to provide and maintain various assets to carry out its functions. It seeks the inclusion in this Section of a reference to sharing public assets with other public bodies where that would enable best value for the public purse. This could be detailed further in guidance, with reference for example made to shared buildings, shared vehicles or shared maintenance of them, shared land or partnership arrangements for land disposal for best community benefit, shared ICT provision and shared procurement where appropriate.

4. Part 1, Chapter 1, Section 5 Directions

The NJPB would be keen to see reference made to a general or specific direction from Scottish Ministers on the maintenance or re-location of police services to ensure either:

- Minimising the loss of front-line or back office services currently based in the Northern area or
- for new central services to be moved to the Highlands and Islands to support local economies and rural communities.

This can be enabled by ICT or supported by further shared services arrangements. For example there are shared arrangements with Highland Council Service Points for customers in some rural communities at the moment and with Highland Council for out of hours calls. There are arrangements too with Orkney Islands Council, with the Stromness Pierhead Regeneration Project, where a new Stromness library, Council Customer Services and Police contact will share a building.

5. Part 1, Chapter 2, Section 7, Senior Officers

The NJPB requests that the appointment of the chair and other members are fast tracked so that Chief Officers can be appointed before December 2012. Appointing the Chief Constable sooner will enable transitional arrangements to be put in place earlier. If appointment to the Scottish Police Authority cannot be fast-tracked, the NJPB suggests that the new chairs of joint boards are brought together to select the chief officers for police and fire to enable recruitment September 2012.

The nature of the relationship between the Chief Constable and local elected members or the new local committees is not clear. The NJPB seeks assurance that this matter will be considered in the Bill process.
6. Part 1, Chapter 2, Section 9 Special Constables

The NJPB welcomes the provision in the Bill to continue with the appointment of special constables. It seeks assurance that the appointment of special constables by the Chief Constable will continue to supplement and not replace the appointment of regular constables in the Highlands and Islands. The NJPB has two reasons for responding in this way:

a. The NJPB is concerned that the new Authority or Chief Constable may have a perception that serious crime is less of an issue in the Highlands and Islands than elsewhere in Scotland (this is not evidenced);
b. The move to a Police Service of Scotland, without careful human resource management, may lead to a drain of talent from the Highlands and Islands causing recruitment difficulties for regular constables in the future.

7. Part 1, Chapter 2, Section 15 (Constables: service outwith the Police Service of Scotland) and Part 2, Section 99 sub section 9 and Amendments relating to Part 2.

The NJPB seeks assurance (through a provision in the Bill or in accompanying guidance) that when consent is given for constables to be engaged in service outwith the Police Service (paid or voluntary) that this does not exclude engagement in another emergency service (paid or voluntary). This assurance is sought because it may be helpful in remote rural and island communities for there to be an ‘emergency first responder’ capability, where skills found in the separate emergency services (police, fire and rescue and ambulance) could be developed across staff with these roles and deployed more quickly to deal with emergencies arising.

Part 2, Section 99 of the Bill does not make reference to a statutory bar on employment within the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service. This existed in the Section 51 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005, but there appears to be no amendment to the prohibition on employment of police in the Amendments relating to Part 2 of the Bill (page 110). The NJPB is unsure why this prohibition needs to remain and presses for it to be repealed.

By making provision for paid and voluntary employment in more than one emergency service, some recruitment difficulties in remote rural and island authorities may be overcome.

8. Part 1, Chapter 4, Section 33 Strategic Police Priorities

The NJPB welcomes the provision (at sub section 3) that before determining the strategic priorities for the Scottish Police Authority, Scottish Ministers must consult with ‘such persons as appear to them to be representative of local authorities’. This may be interpreted as consultation with a national body such as Cosla; however with arrangements to be trialled through local pathfinders for the engagement and scrutiny of local police plans, there may be merit in specifying in the Bill the need for Ministers to consult with locally elected representatives involved in the scrutiny of their local police plans, especially if the strategic police priorities are to be informed (at least in part) by community safety issues and priorities in communities. This approach may also reduce the time required to consult local authorities on the Strategic Police Plan (as set out in subsection 4).
9. Part 1, Chapter 5, Sections 38 and 39 Best Value

The NJPB welcomes the duty of the Scottish Police Authority to make arrangements to secure Best Value and for these to be aligned to the duty placed on local authorities. It may be worth noting that arrangements for auditing Best Value (in police and local authorities) may change as the approach to external scrutiny of community planning partners and partnerships in the achievement of outcomes is currently under review. This may be dealt with in the future in accompanying guidance to the legislation (referred to in section 39).

10. Part 1, Chapter 6, Section 41, Annual Accounts

Although the Financial Memorandum for the Bill is being considered by the Finance Committee, the NJPB is concerned that the proposed delivery model means that the new single forces will not be able to recover Value Added Tax (VAT). This will incur additional cost to the public purse and reduce resources for the new services. The NJPB acknowledges that the Scottish Government is in discussion with HM Treasury and the HMRC seeking exemptions, but the NJPB seeks assurance that this will be resolved before the legislation is passed.

11. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 45 Local Policing

In subsection 1 reference is made to adequate arrangements being in place for each local authority area. The NJPB would like to see cross reference with the policing principles (Section 32) and the local implementation of the Police Authority functions (especially Section 2 sub section 1 (a) maintenance of the police service and (b) continuous improvement).

The NJPB welcomes the provision at sub section (2) that a local commander must be designated for each local authority area. It does not however specify the rank for the local commander. If this is to vary across local authorities, there is a concern that in smaller local authorities (e.g. island authorities) a lower ranking officer will be appointed. This is of concern because in an organisation with a hierarchical structure, they would have a lower level of authority within the Scottish Police Service potentially limiting their capacity to influence the national policing plan and the resources required for the local police plan. The NJPB seeks provision in the Bill or accompanying guidance that if the rank of a local commander is to vary, that the position of local commander is afforded a particular status which would not be superseded by rank in other local command areas on matters affecting local command in the Highlands and Islands and the resources for it.

Under sub section (3) the Bill provides that a local commander could cover more than one local authority area. This is more likely to be the case where the local authority has a relatively small population or covers a relatively small geography. With this more likely to affect the Highlands and Islands, the NJPB is concerned that it may not be as well served as other areas with a dedicated local commander. This is of even more concern if the rank of the local commander is likely to be lower than in other areas. Assurance is sought in the provisions of the Bill or in the accompanying guidance, that service delivery, performance and resources will be fairly distributed with no reduction for the local authority areas currently served by Northern Constabulary.

12. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 46 Local Authority role in policing

The NJPB welcomes the provisions in the Bill for the mandatory involvement of the local authority in setting priorities and objectives for policing in the area, in providing feedback on policing in the area and improvements to it and in receiving reports on police functions and complaints made. As a minimum the NJPB seeks to strengthen these provisions or include a further provision that the local commander must have regard to the views of local authorities in their involvement in local priority setting and objectives and in their feedback on performance.

This section of the Bill provides little assurance on local accountability, scrutiny and governance for local policing. While arrangements for proper local scrutiny of policing and for community engagement are to be trialled through pathfinders, these will not be evaluated until after the Bill is enacted, so the Bill should at least make reference to the principle and value of local scrutiny of policing in its area or explicitly state the role of local committees in scrutiny of performance.

Provision should be made for the additional costs associated with setting up new committees in local authorities. The NJPB seeks assurance that these costs are netted against the transfer of grant from local to central government.

In addition it would be helpful if the accompanying guidance could refer to:

- the support for joint strategic assessment with the local authority to understand needs and priorities for policing and
- the performance standards and performance framework to be used for reporting on how police functions are being carried out. This would support one of the Government’s four pillars of public service reform; strengthening the performance culture of public bodies.

The NJPB is concerned that the Bill does not make clear the alignment of arrangements for local policing with community planning arrangements. Community planning should reduce the need for separate plans for local policing and fire and rescue services and instead support the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan for each area as agreed with other partners especially local authorities, local health boards and the Scottish Ambulance Service locally. The NJPB accepts that some CPPs may be more able to proceed with this joint planning than others, but it seeks provision in the Bill for those partnerships to proceed in this way if they are ready to do so.

Community planning is also the process for agreeing joint operational working and tasking. More explicit reference to building on current community planning arrangements at the planning and operational levels would support the integration and prevention agendas better as well as finding potential efficiencies in service planning. This point relates to the provisions in the Bill relating to community planning and the local policing plan below.
13. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 47 Duty to Participate in Community Planning

The NJPB welcomes the inclusion of the local commander to participate in community planning; although it notes there is no explicit requirement made in the Bill for the Local Senior Officer for the Fire and Rescue Service to participate in community planning. The NJPB seeks the same duty to apply for the Local Senior Officer. In addition there are four further provisions or assurances requested by the NJPB:

a. The NJPB seeks greater clarity either in the Bill or in its accompanying guidance on the extent of local joint working expected of the new Scottish Police Service. This is required because the NJPB fears that current effective joint working in key community safety areas (child and adult protection, dealing with violent offenders, violence against women, tackling alcohol and drug misuse, re-offending, anti-social behaviour and road safety) will be undermined if current policing input is reduced in any way. Joint working is effective if those taking part have authority to task resources decisively, quickly and within the local command. Delegated authority for local commanders in deploying their local resources needs to be assured for effective police participation in community planning.

b. The NJPB seeks clarity on how protocols for joint working can be maintained and improved in the change to a Scottish Police Service.

c. The NJPB seeks provision made for the continuation of joint working to support police service performance (including the sharing of resources across partnerships). The three island authorities (Orkney, Shetland and Western isles) are working with the Scottish Government to develop a model for integrated service provision in island communities which could see much closer integration of services within the public sector in each island group.

d. The NJPB seeks to extend the provisions for the duty to apply also to the Scottish Ambulance Service, given the need to align its resources with other emergency services and local partnership arrangements.

e. The NJPB is aware of the current detailed review of community planning and any implications arising from that for the Scottish Police Service will need to be reflected in the Bill or in accompanying guidance.

14. Part 1, Chapter 7, Section 48 Local Police Plans

The NJPB welcomes the provisions in the Bill for the local commander to prepare and submit a local police plan to the relevant local authority for approval, but sees these provisions as limiting. This is because:

1. It is not clear what the process would be if approval is not given. Some positive process of resolving any lack of agreement would be required.

2. It is less likely to support the approach to achieving public protection and community safety outcomes. Outcomes require partnership or integrated working with other relevant partners, not the development of a separate plan by one organisation for consultation with others. It would be more helpful instead to at least allow for the local police plan to be developed jointly with the local authority and for it to be subject to public consultation. Even better would be the acknowledgement in the Bill that outcomes mean the involvement of other partners, notably the local fire and rescue service, the Health Board, Scottish Ambulance Service locally and the third sector. Having a joint public protection and community safety plan could be achieved within a framework of national outcomes, national policing priorities and the fit with local outcomes and local resources. All of this can be supported by the development of the Single Outcome Agreement, especially in relation to partnership performance. This joint approach would enable local solutions to be developed for integrated and preventative services, two of the Governments four pillars of public service reform.

Subsection 5 refers to a review of the local police plan at least every 3 years, but this is not well aligned to the requirement for an annual police plan (Section 35). The Bill or accompanying guidance should enable an annual review of the local police plan.

15. Part 1, Chapter 10, Section 62 and 63, The Police Investigations and Review Commissioner

The NJPB seeks further information on the implications in the Bill on the change proposed for the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland to become the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner. In addition the NJPB seeks provision in the Bill for there to be an opportunity for the local scrutiny of local complaints handling.

16. Part 1, Chapter 11, Sections 71 and 74 Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Constabulary in Scotland

It is not clear how the Bill makes provision for reducing external scrutiny and making it risk based and proportionate as required following the Crerar Review. In addition it does not take into account the current review of external scrutiny of community planning partnerships. The NJPB emphasises this point given the provisions in the Bill for a separate Chief Inspector of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (Section 117).

17. Part 1, Chapter 17, Section 95 and Schedule 4 Transfer of constables, staff, property etc

The NJPB will consider the potential impact of a staff transfer scheme for staff who are to be treated as police employees but are employees of the local authorities involved in the NJPB. It would be helpful to have further guidance available on this matter in advance of the appointed day.

This is important because Highland Council provides services to the Joint Board in terms of clerking and administration, policy development and finance services. Similarly Highland Council has shared services for procurement, out of hours call handling and some co-located customer services within some remote and rural communities. The Council therefore needs to understand the implications, if any, for staff involved.

18. Part 2, Chapter 8A, Section 112 Scottish Fire and Rescue Service Strategic Plan

The NJPB recommends that in preparing the strategic plan the Scottish Police Authority is named as a mandatory consultee.

19. Part 2, Chapter 8A, Section 113 Local Fire and Rescue Plan

The NJPB recommends that the local police commander is at least included as a mandatory consultee for the local fire and rescue plan. In keeping with the written evidence provided at paragraphs 12 and 14 above, the NJPB seeks provisions in the Bill for the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan involving not only police, fire and local authorities, but also the local ambulance service and NHS Boards.

20. Part 2, Chapter 8A, Section 113 (41K) Monitoring by local authority

With the monitoring of the local police plan by the local authority also a provision of the Bill, with the similar provision for the local fire and rescue plan, it would be more effective if separate plans are to be produced for them to be monitored together or simultaneously given the connections and dependencies across both emergency services.

However, if the Bill is amended to enable the production of a joint public protection and community safety plan for each local authority area, then each contributing partner would need to be accountable for its performance against the plan. This can be facilitated locally through joint scrutiny arrangements (the pathfinder committees) and it can be reported nationally through the arrangements for the Single Outcome Agreement.

Northern Joint Police Board
28 February 2012
Written submission from the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland

1. The Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland ("the PCCS") welcomes this opportunity to provide written evidence to the Justice Committee on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill. The evidence is restricted mainly to Chapter 10 of the Bill which contains proposals for additional, investigative functions to be given to the PCCS (to be re-named the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner ("PIRC")).

2. In general, the PCCS views the terms of Chapter 10 positively and as going some way to satisfying the requirements of articles 2 and 3 of the European Convention of Human Rights ("ECHR") now that a single police force is to be established. There are, however, a number of aspects which are unclear, and questions as to how the proposed arrangements might work in practice.

PIRC investigations into serious incidents involving the police

3. Section 63 envisages PIRC investigating "serious incidents involving the police". These are defined as including incidents in which there is an indication that the police may have caused or contributed to the death or serious injury of an individual; cases in which a person in police custody has sustained serious injury; and cases in which the police have used a firearm.

4. The Bill does not, however, contain any provision as to how such investigations will be triggered. Unlike those cases in which there is an indication of criminality, investigations into "serious incidents involving the police" are not dependent upon a direction from the prosecutor. The Bill appears to envisage the Chief Constable notifying PIRC of such incidents as there is reference in section 67 to the possibility of regulations requiring the Chief Constable or Scottish Police Authority ("the Authority") to refer particular cases to PIRC. The prompt referral of such cases will be of critical importance to the exercise of PIRC’s functions and the integrity of its investigations. The PCCS therefore considers that the notification arrangements ought to be specified in the Bill, rather than within regulations which may (or may not) be made.

5. All other police oversight bodies in the UK and Ireland operate on the basis of mandatory referrals by the police of cases involving death or serious injury (see e.g. section 102(1) of the Garda Siochana Act 2005 (Ireland); and section 14C of the Police Reform Act 2002 (England and Wales)). In the absence of a similar provision, it is unclear how PIRC might be alerted to a serious incident of the kind it is expected to investigate. At best, the police service will decide voluntarily to refer incidents to PIRC which itself might give rise to uncertainty and inconsistency. At worst, the police service may decide to investigate the matter itself, thereby undermining the very purpose of this part of the Bill, namely to ensure an independent investigation of such incidents.
6. The PCCS also considers that the distinction between investigations of “serious incidents involving the police” and those commenced only on the direction of the prosecutor may in practice become blurred, or disappear altogether. For example, while investigating an incident in which a suspect in police custody has suffered serious injury, PIRC may obtain evidence of a police assault. In such a case, it appears that PIRC would require to cease its investigation, alert the prosecutor and then await a direction as to whether to proceed. If issues such as this are to be resolved quickly and without confusion as to which body is to investigate the incident, there will require to be clear lines of communication between PIRC and the prosecutor. A comprehensive protocol between PIRC and the Crown Office will also be required.

The obligation upon PIRC to publish reports of investigations

7. Section 68 provides that PIRC must prepare and publish reports of its investigations into serious incidents involving the police, as well as those it undertakes in the public interest. In general, the publication of reports will serve to enhance public confidence in the way such incidents are dealt with. However, cases investigated under this part of the Bill will involve serious issues, and alleged victims, their relatives etc will rightly expect PIRC’s findings to be capable of effecting change where appropriate. As it stands, the Bill makes no provision as to how this might be done and by whom. For example, is it envisaged that PIRC will merely detail its findings, or will it be expected to make directions to the police service with a view to avoiding a similar incident occurring in future? If the latter, PIRC will require to be empowered to make such directions and the police service subject to a corresponding duty to implement these.

8. The PCCS is also concerned that the obligation upon PIRC to publish reports of its findings is not subject to any exception. There may, for example, be circumstances in which the publication of a report will not be in the public interest. This could be the case where publication, even in anonymised form, might result in harm to an individual, or prejudice legal proceedings. Section 68 allows PIRC to identify individuals in reports where this is considered to be in the public interest. The PCCS considers that a similar provision should be inserted to permit PIRC not to publish at all, publish only partially, or delay publication where this is considered necessary in the public interest.

Duties in respect of PIRC investigations

9. Section 67 provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, make provision requiring the Chief Constable, the Authority or other persons to assist and co-operate with PIRC when carrying out an investigation. It is unclear whether such regulations will in fact be made and, if so, whether this will be done prior to PIRC becoming operational. Again, the PCCS considers that such provisions are critical to the effective performance of PIRC’s functions and the integrity of its investigations. In the PCCS’s view, they should therefore feature in the Bill itself.

10. As the commencement of a PIRC investigation will be dependent upon prior notification by the prosecutor and/or police, its investigators are unlikely ever to be first at the scene. PIRC will require to attend incidents as quickly as possible, but the time taken to do so will obviously increase in the event that the incident occurs in a remote area or a location some distance away from the central belt. In light of this, the PCCS considers it essential that the Bill contains a provision obliging the police service to preserve the scene of an incident, and any evidence, pending the arrival of PIRC investigators. In the PCCS’s view, the Bill must also contain a provision requiring the Chief Constable to co-operate with PIRC in its investigations and to comply with any reasonable direction given by PIRC in this connection. Obligations of this kind will be essential if PIRC is to secure the assistance of the police during the course of an investigation, where this is necessary. Although such obligations could be imposed by statutory instrument, again it is unclear whether regulations will in fact be made and, if so, whether the intention is to do so before PIRC becomes fully operational.

11. A notable feature of Chapter 10 is that there are few obligations imposed upon PIRC, the Chief Constable or the Crown. For example, under the current provisions the decision to direct an investigation by PIRC in serious criminal cases and deaths in custody is a matter entirely for the discretion of the prosecutor. Likewise, as noted above there is no obligation upon the Chief Constable to refer serious incidents to PIRC, and no obligation upon PIRC to carry out investigations into such incidents.

12. Although section 67 provides that regulations may be passed about the circumstances in which PIRC “must, must not or need not carry out an investigation”, again the PCCS considers this issue to be too important to be left in a state of uncertainty. The case law of the European Court of Human Rights under articles 2 and 3 is at times inconsistent as to precisely what an independent and effective investigation comprises, and in what circumstances such an investigation is required. However, there appears to be sufficient clarity to allow the Bill to prescribe the types of cases which require to be referred to PIRC. In any event, there is nothing to prevent the legislation going beyond the minimum standards set by the ECHR. The extent of investigation actually required is a matter which can be determined by PIRC, subject to any instructions given by the prosecutor.

13. A lack of clarity regarding those cases which must be referred to PIRC may give rise to uncertainty and inconsistency. It may also increase the scope for legal challenges by alleged victims based on a failure to adhere to the positive obligations under articles 2 and 3. The IPCC in England and Wales frequently faces such challenges in connection with decisions not to conduct independent investigations into serious incidents.

The provision of forensic services to PIRC

14. Section 31 of the Bill provides that the Authority must provide forensic services to the police service, the Lord Advocate and procurators fiscal, and may provide such services to other persons as it sees fit. Section 84(5) permits the Authority to charge for services it provides to public bodies and office-holders, but provides that no such charges will be made for forensic services it provides to the Lord Advocate or procurators fiscal.

15. Presumably PIRC would not be charged for any forensic services provided by the Authority in respect of an investigation undertaken on the direction of the prosecutor; however, the PCCS considers that this should be made explicit in the legislation. More importantly, there is nothing in the Bill to prevent PIRC incurring significant costs for forensic services in respect of those investigations which are not directed by a prosecutor (i.e. section 41B investigations and those carried out in the public interest).

16. In light of these concerns, the PCCS considers that section 31 requires to be amended to make clear that, as well as the police service and the Crown, the Authority must also provide PIRC with forensic services. The PCCS also considers that an amendment to section 84(7)(a) is necessary, making clear that the Authority may not charge for the provision of such services to PIRC.

Local policing

17. Section 46 of the Bill provides that the local authority may monitor and provide feedback to the local commander, in particular regarding its views on any matter in relation to the policing of its area. The local authority may also make recommendations for improving the policing of the area. As the local commander is specifically tasked with providing the local authority with statistical information on complaints made about the police in relation to the area, the PCCS considers that this places a duty on the local authority to hold the local commander to account in this respect. The PCCS would welcome this. The Bill is, however, silent as to how local authorities should implement their arrangements for the scrutiny of local policing. In the PCCS’s view, it is important that scrutiny is exercised consistently and takes account of guidance from PIRC in respect of complaints about the police. While the Authority and the Chief Constable will be obliged under statute to have regard to PIRC guidance, there is a deficit in terms of the local authorities when they come to exercise that scrutiny.

Co-operation, Exchange of Information etc

18. Section 82 of the Bill obliges Audit Scotland, PIRC and HMICS to co-operate and co-ordinate activity with each other with a view to improving the carrying out of their respective functions. The PCCS supports this provision entirely, but it is important to emphasise that the duty to secure efficient and effective complaints handling currently lies with PCCS. Based on the current proposals, the same function will in the future be exercised by PIRC. This arrangement ensures that the oversight landscape does not become cluttered or confused and also that the arrangements for handling complaints by policing bodies is subject to independent scrutiny. The PCCS has to date undertaken a number of intelligence-led audits of complaints handling arrangements within various policing bodies, the results of which it has shared widely.

PCCS
28 February 2012
At the close of my evidence to the Justice Committee on 6 March, the Convenor advised that any further points the panel wished to raise should be communicated to you in writing. I have summarised below a number of issues I had intended to raise during my oral evidence.

1. I mentioned briefly in my oral evidence the need for PIRC to be given protection from defamation proceedings. Over the course of the last two years, the PCCS has been subject to the threat of such proceedings on a number of occasions in respect of case reports published on our website. Unlike many other complaints oversight bodies (e.g. the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman) the PCCS has no privilege in respect of such actions. I therefore seek an amendment to the Bill providing PIRC with absolute privilege, or at the very least, qualified privilege to protect it from defamation proceedings.

2. Section 69 of the Bill allows PIRC to petition the Court of Session where it is believed that a person is obstructing an investigation. I seek an extension of that provision so that it covers the current functions of the PCCS. In other words, where PIRC believes that a person is obstructing its review of a relevant complaint, it may petition the Court of Session in exactly the same manner as it would where a person is believed to be obstructing an investigation.

3. Section 68 of the Bill requires PIRC to publish the findings of certain types of investigation. I mentioned in my written evidence that this required to be subject to a public interest exception. However, I also believe there is a strong case for extending the obligation to publish to the reports which the PCCS currently produces. Since 2007, the PCCS has published reports of complaint handling reviews on its website. This is done in order to promote transparency and is instrumental in holding the police service to account. However, there are concerns that, in the absence of a statutory obligation to publish these reports, their publication, even in anonymised form, breaches the Data Protection Act 1998. In order to remove any doubt over the legitimacy of the publication of these reports, I seek a statutory obligation to do so, subject to a public interest test.

4. I also believe there is a strong case for imposing some form of time limit for cases to be investigated by PIRC. The establishment of PIRC will in all likelihood lead to an increase in expectation on the part of many of those who believe that their cases were not properly investigated under the previous regime. If PIRC is to avoid being inundated with requests to investigate incidents which occurred many years ago, there must be some time limit imposed for investigations. The terms of such a time limit would require to be carefully worded in order not to exclude those cases where there is justified concern over previous investigations.
5. With regard to the question posed by John Finnie MSP towards the end of the session, I believe that the proposals for amending the constitution of the Police Appeals Tribunal are sensible.

I very much welcomed the opportunity to address the Justice Committee directly. I hope these additional issues can also be considered by the Committee.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Reform Scotland

Thank you for inviting Reform Scotland to submit evidence to the Justice Committee’s inquiry into the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill.

Although we do believe that there needs to be a strengthening of specialist police functions and welcome the proposals to bring these services together, Reform Scotland is against the proposal to create a single Scottish police force.

However, we recognise that the political climate is such that the new force will be created so we have focused our evidence on how to ensure the new single force is not a centralised one. Reform Scotland’s main concern with the bill, as proposed, is the proposal to take a largely local service and turn it into a centralised national one, something for which we do not feel the Scottish government has demonstrated the need, and which represents a reduction of accountability and transparency, not the increase which is required.

As a result, our submission mainly addresses the appointment of members to the proposed Scottish Police Authority, the financing of the police and the role of local authorities within policing.

Scottish Police Authority

One of the key drivers of Reform Scotland’s approach to policing in Scotland is the need to improve local accountability. We would agree with the Scottish government that the current system of joint boards, representing a redundant layer of government in Scotland, means very few people have an idea as to who represents them in the policing chain of command. It is, therefore, essential that any changes to the structure improve local accountability.

However, we would disagree with proposals for the Scottish government to appoint members of the Scottish Police Authority, in effect creating a policing quango, which blurs transparency and accountability and leaves the public unsure who is responsible. Instead, Reform Scotland believes that the Scottish Police Authority should be made up of representatives of each of Scotland’s local authorities, with each council having a right to place a representative of their choosing on the board. Due to the national elements of policing, we would be happy for representatives from the Scottish government, whether minister or senior civil servant, to also sit on the board.

We appreciate that this means a rather large police authority. However, this is due to the number of local authorities in Scotland. As the policy memorandum states “most policing and fire and rescues services are delivered locally” and we therefore believe that it is essential that this is reflected in the make-up of the Scottish Police Authority.
Reform Scotland does not believe that the need to remove councillors from this role in the policing hierarchy has been justified.

Finance
Reform Scotland disagrees with the funding proposals which would see the police being funded directly by the Scottish government. We believe that it is essential that local authorities continue to contribute toward the cost of policing, just as we believe that they must be involved in the new Scottish Police Authority. As the old adage goes, “He who pays the piper calls the tune”, and if local authorities have no control over the purse strings then it will be difficult for councils to adopt differing policies towards policing, or even have a meaningful input into policy direction.

Whilst there is some scope to allow local authorities to increase funding to the police, there also needs to be the ability for them to decrease funding if they believe funding can be better utilised elsewhere, especially if that funding is in areas such as youth services or social work which may be able to prevent crime in the first place.

Role of local government
Historically, policing has been a local service in Scotland, reflecting different priorities around the country. Different types of crimes are more or less prevalent in the different police forces around Scotland, resulting in different police forces needing to focus on the different problems affecting their local area.

Such differences were reflected in the 2010/11 recorded crime in Scotland statistics. For example, Grampian had the worst record for crimes of indecency per 10,000 population but one of the lowest rates for fire-raising, vandalism etc; Strathclyde had the highest rates for non-sexual crimes of violence, but one of the lowest for motor vehicle offences; Central had the second highest level of fire-raising, vandalism etc but a lower than average level of crimes of dishonesty; and Dumfries & Galloway had the highest level of motor vehicle offences but the lowest level of violent crime.

Local priorities can still be taken into account within the structure of a single police force; however, it is not clear how this need for diversity and flexibility could be accommodated within the structure currently proposed. Although division commanders would appear to have some level of accountability to local authorities, they are ultimately answerable to their chief constable. If there is a conflict between some of the policing policies being pushed then ultimately the local needs end up coming second – unless that chief constable is, in turn, answerable to a Scottish Police Authority made up of representatives of local authorities.

For example, what flexibility is there to allow Edinburgh, should it wish, to adopt a prostitution tolerance zone again, while allowing another area to adopt a different practice? It is important that enough freedom is given to division commanders to try out different policing methods. This also enables innovative and new policing practices to be tried out. As with all public services, increasing diversity can raise standards for all. Imposing a one-size-fits-all structure from the centre will stifle that innovation.
Reform Scotland believes that the Scottish government has not provided sufficient justification for taking a service which has historically been delivered at a local level and running it from the centre. We believe that the changes we have proposed to the funding of the police as well as the makeup of the Scottish Police Authority help protect the vital role local authorities play in policing whilst achieving the Scottish government’s stated aim of creating a single Scottish police force.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from RSPB Scotland

1 RSPB Scotland maintains a small team of Investigations staff whose primary responsibility is to assist the relevant statutory agencies, not least the police service, in the effective investigation of wildlife related crime. This team is based at our Edinburgh headquarters and covers the whole of Scotland. It has considerable experience in working alongside all the current Scottish police forces.

2 The main thrust of the proposed legislation and most of the issues addressed lie beyond the RSPB’s remit. However we have noted a concern expressed in other submissions which we share and which is relevant to our area of work.

3 Forensic investigation of wildlife crime scenes has grown more common and more sophisticated in recent years, to the extent that the Scottish Government sponsored Partnership Against Wildlife Crime Scotland has facilitated training for police officers in the gathering and handling of wildlife-related forensic evidence.

In their own written submission, the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS), express concern

http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_JusticeCommittee/Inquiries/PFR9_ACPOS.pdf

Section 6) about the complete separation of forensic services from the police service.

Those concerns are expressed in detail by ACPOS and do not require reiteration here. Our interest in this lies in the risk to effective crime scene management that may be posed by the Bill’s proposals in particular where – as is frequently the case with wildlife crime – the crime scene is remote and relatively inaccessible. In these circumstances we observe that it is already challenging for the police service to allocate and manage resources for investigation of the crime(s) in question. Over and above the general concerns expressed by ACPOS on this issue, which we echo, we are concerned that the complete separation of crime scene evidence into two different classes, each managed by a different agency, risks dysfunction for the whole investigation. This is especially so since it may not be apparent at the outset into which class a particular piece of evidence falls.

It is not apparent to us why the public might not have confidence in evidence gathered by a properly trained and equipped constable. It should be clear that we are not suggesting that the scientific examination and analysis of forensic evidence should be done by anyone except a properly qualified person housed within a non-police agency.

We note that the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents, in their own submission, also express concern about this matter
Beyond the very specific matter of the gathering of forensic evidence, we hope that reorganisation of the Scottish police services does not undermine the good progress made by both police and by Scottish administrations in improving the effectiveness of wildlife crime detection and prosecution. Specifically we hope that an adequate body of specialist wildlife officers will be available in Scotland under the new arrangements to enforce this area of law that the Scottish Parliament have repeatedly declared to be of national importance.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association

1. Introduction

1.1 The Scottish Chief Police Officers Staff Association (SCPOSA) was formed as a separate entity to the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) in order to represent the views of Scottish Chief Police Officers and senior Police Staff in respect of terms and conditions of service. As such, the views of the Association do not necessarily reflect the views of ACPOS, which is the professional voice of the service.

1.2 In view of the foregoing the evidence presented hereunder will relate only to those provisions of the Bill which are seen to relate directly to the terms and conditions of both current and future Chief Officers who either transfer to the Police Service of Scotland or are appointed to Chief Officer rank in the future.

2. Background

2.1 The terms and conditions of Chief Police Officers in Scotland have evolved over a considerable period through the Police Negotiating Board (PNB) and indeed more recently in direct negotiation with the Scottish Government. This has resulted in Chief Officers in Scotland having largely similar terms and conditions to their colleagues in the remainder of the United Kingdom although Police Authorities in England and Wales have deviated significantly from the recognised national arrangements to attract or retain Chief Officers.

2.2 In respect of Chief Police Officers, whilst conditions of service are broadly similar, a range of salaries exist in respect of Chief Constables and Deputy Chief Constables dependent on the size of the Force concerned, additionally, these ranks are the subject of Fixed Term Appointments which normally extend for a period of five years.

2.3 Assistant Chief Constables, no matter the size of Force or portfolio, are rewarded on a fixed scale of six points. These officers are not the subject of Fixed Term Appointments.

2.4 The definition of who is identified as a Senior Police Staff member varies throughout Scotland, as does the salary scale paid within each Force. In the main, these members of staff occupy senior positions in relation to finance, human resources, legal and corporate services.

2.5 In the current structure of policing in Scotland there are eight Chief Constables, nine Deputy Chief Constables and 13 Assistant Chief Constables, of whom eight currently hold the rank on a Temporary basis.
3. General Implications of the Bill

3.1 It is evident that on the implementation of the reform agenda the number of Chief Officers in Scotland will be significantly reduced with a resultant loss of experience and resilience in command roles throughout the country.

3.2 The implementation of the Bill will also lead to a loss of career path and predictability for all officers in the service who may have aspired to the assumption of command roles. Indeed in current form it provides a high degree of uncertainty to many serving senior officers as to their ability to complete their career or reach full pensionable service. It is therefore hoped that individual circumstances will be considered in order to retain experience and skills within the new organisation.

3.3 Whilst the Bill provides for the transfer of all existing Chief Police Officer ranks in Scotland to the Police Service of Scotland there will, by the nature of the amalgamations which will take place, be a significant reduction in the number of posts which are available in Scotland both in respect of police officers and Senior Police Staff. This will lead to a surplus of both senior officers and senior police staff in the early stages of the new service.

4. Specific Provisions of the Bill

The following are seen as the provisions of the Bill, which have a direct impact on the members of SCPOSA:

5. Section 11

5.1 Within the terms of this Section of the Bill the ranks, which will form the Police Service of Scotland are defined and mirror those currently in existence. Allowance is made in Section 11(5) for the addition or removal of any rank below that of Assistant Chief Constable.

5.2 The formation of the Police Service of Scotland will create the second largest police organisation in the United Kingdom with officer strength of 17,234 and a substantial police staff workforce. The closest comparators in the United Kingdom are West Midlands Police with c8581 officers and the Metropolitan Police Service with c33,298 officers.

5.3 Whilst the rank structure of West Midlands Police reflects the rank structure of the current Scottish Police Service the Metropolitan Police Service has an extended Chief Officer rank structure of Commissioner, Deputy Commissioner, Assistant Commissioner, Deputy Assistant Commissioner and Commander to allow for the management of a very substantial organisation.

5.4 It is accepted that the structure of the Police Service of Scotland has still to emerge but it is the view of SCPOSA that Section 11(5) should be amended to allow for the addition or removal of any rank in the service, including those of Chief Officers. In seeking this amendment the Association believe that it would allow for a larger degree of flexibility to manage what will be very substantial areas of responsibility in a national organisation. Whilst the insertion of an additional Chief Officer rank is not proposed at this time it is felt that the option to do so should be allowed to the new Authority in order to effectively manage the organisation and indeed cope with what are likely to be substantial areas of responsibility for Chief Officers.

6. Section 14

6.1 The terms of this Section cause considerable concern to members of SCPOSA in relation to the security of their employment. As currently drafted the Section allows the Scottish Police Authority to:

> "call on a senior officer to retire from office in the interests of efficiency or effectiveness."

This extreme measure in respect of members is balanced only by the suggestion that a senior officer must be informed of the reason for such a decision being made and be given the "opportunity to make representations" to the Authority who "must consider any representations made".

6.2 As described previously in this paper the number of senior officers in the Police Service of Scotland is likely to reduce substantially from the numbers currently in post and it is therefore felt that this provision could be utilised to dispense with the services of senior officers merely on the grounds of undefined issues of efficiency or effectiveness. The unchecked use of these powers would have huge financial and career impacts on the most senior officers in the country who are charged with leading the new service and yet appear to have no route of either process or independent evaluation of an opinion regarding their performance.

6.3 Whilst a similar provision existed within the terms of the Police (Scotland) Act, 1967 it has never, to knowledge, been used and indeed legal opinion currently to hand indicates that any attempt to use such a wide and unchecked power would be challengeable by Judicial Review.

6.4 The position of senior officers who could be required to resign in the interests of efficiency or effectiveness is markedly different from that of senior employees in the private sector, or indeed elsewhere in the public sector. Most senior employees will have a fixed notice period, often of 12 months or more. They may also be entitled to bonuses during that period. While it is certainly the case that senior employees can be dismissed at short notice elsewhere in the public and private sector, in normal circumstances, such a dismissal will only be in circumstances where their entitlements under their contracts of service are also met. To put it in more common parlance, their contracts are paid up.

6.5 In the circumstances of senior officers, it would appear that what is being envisaged is requiring senior officers to resign with immediate effect with no compensation at all. While, as indicated, such a course of action could lend itself to a judicial review, nonetheless, the officer is left in a situation where he or she has no further entitlement to receive pay, in circumstances where any procedure, which has been followed could be perfunctory to say the least. Given that officers may be on fixed term contracts, which still have several years to run, and the officer may not have accrued sufficient service to allow him or her full access to their pension, one can see that the officer concerned could be significantly disadvantaged. Following such a course of action could also impact upon the reputation of the officer concerned and therefore affect his or her future employment prospects.

6.5 It is of note that provisions in respect of the efficiency of more junior officers require a very detailed process to be applied to secure improvement and consider evidence in order to ensure fairness.

6.6 The current process for dealing with what is considered as misconduct which could potentially lead to the dismissal of a senior officer is balanced to the point that consideration of the evidence available is undertaken, following investigation by a Chief Constable, by the Police Authority, an independent solicitor and ultimately a panel chaired by a person nominated by the Lord President of the Court of Session. This is in stark contrast to the proposals made by Section 14.

6.7 SCPOS A fully accepts the need for a system to deal with underperformance by senior officers but feels strongly that appropriate safeguards require to be in place to protect officers from what amounts to summary dismissal.

7. Section 49

7.1 Whilst the Bill provides that the terms and conditions of officers will be preserved on transfer to the Police Service of Scotland, Section 49 provides the power to Scottish Ministers to make Regulations relating to the conditions of service of constables.

7.2 It is fully accepted that such a provision is required to develop conditions appropriate to the new service SCPOS A has concerns regarding the uncertainty which exists at present as it is apparent that the majority of terms and conditions of Chief Officers within the new service are unknown.

8. Schedule 4 Paragraph 4

8.1 This provision allows for the transfer of Chief Constables, Deputy Chief Constables and Assistant Chief Constables to the Police Service of Scotland and to retain their current contractual status and terms.

8.2 Whilst the preservation of current terms of members is welcomed, the consequence of this will be that there will be a surplus of senior officers on commencement of the service. In addition, there will be a number of members who, in the previous structure of the service, had a reasonable expectation of extension of Fixed Term Appointments to allow them to reach full pensionable service. This will result in serious financial and career penalties for members.

8.3 SCPOS A seeks assurance of the renewal of Fixed Term Appointments to allow the achievement of full pensionable service for members so affected and seeks consideration, as highlighted at Paragraph 6.4 above, of the buy out of the contracts of those members who do not secure substantive roles within the Police Service of Scotland but have Fixed Term Appointments which will allow them to reach full pensionable service. The implementation of such a provision would allow the new service to rationalise senior ranks and make the recurring savings which reform seeks.

9. Schedule 4 Paragraph 9

9.1 This provision indicates that officers transferring into the Police Service of Scotland will not require to move home. Senior officers are excluded from this protection by Paragraph 4(a) of the Schedule.

9.2 Whilst SCPOSA recognises the need for flexibility within the new service it equally believes that members should not suffer detriment as a result of their position and would therefore seek a degree of protection for members in respect of the location of their workplace or appropriate compensation should they agree to move to a new location.

10. Conclusion

10.1 SCPOSA fully accepts the progress of the reform agenda and the savings which are sought to protect policing in communities. The Association seeks a fair settlement for officers who have led the outstanding performance delivered by the current Forces in Scotland whilst facilitating the transition to the Police Service of Scotland.

The Scottish Countryside Alliance (SCA) champions the countryside, country sports and the rural way of life. Essentially the SCA exists to promote and protect and campaign for and on behalf of rural communities.

The SCA welcomes the chance to submit written evidence to the Scottish Parliament Justice Committee inquiry regarding the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill.

PART 1. POLICE

1. The main point that the SCA would wish to bring forward to the Justice Committee regarding the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill – ‘the Bill’ - is the fact that we wish to ensure that the proposed new single Scottish Police Force and Single Scottish Fire Service are set-up to serve the needs of all Scotland – both urban and rural.

2. In the Scottish Government consultation regarding the Bill, a new proposed ‘purpose of policing’ is set out as follows:

   PURPOSE OF POLICING: The purpose of policing is to improve the safety and well-being of individuals, families and communities in Scotland.

The SCA believes that the proposed ‘purpose of policing’ might be strengthened by emphasising that the new single Scottish police service will serve families and communities across all of Scotland. We believe that a subtle change in the suggested wording of the purpose would help, the SCA suggestion is:

   The purpose of policing is to improve the safety and well-being of individuals’ families and communities throughout the whole of Scotland.

The SCA believes that our suggested wording for the ‘purpose of policing’ will help to remind police officers that their duties are not only in crime-hotspots. We believe that the suggested SCA wording will also help to assure Scotland’s remote rural communities that the new Scottish police service exists to improve their safety and well-being as much as it exists for inner-city families and communities.

3. Representative organisations such as the SCA and rural people themselves have built up working relationships with the police on both a local and national scale. The Partnership for Action Against Wildlife Crime (PAW Scotland) and neighbourhood watch initiatives are just two examples.

The SCA believes that for policing to be effective, community involvement and partnership working initiatives are important. We would hope that a new single Scottish police service would seek to keep these working relationships at local and national levels.

4. The SCA believes that rural areas of Scotland may sometimes differ from urban areas in their specific policing requirements. The SCA believes that the Scottish Police Authority should be composed of individuals with both urban and rural skill, experience and expertise if it is to perform its roles effectively.

5. The SCA believe that a key role and responsibility of the proposed Local Police Commanders, in developing and delivering Local Policing Plans, will be to take account of issues particular to their areas. Local policing priorities in rural areas may vary from those in urban areas and this variation must be recognised in Local Policing Plans.

PART 2. FIRE SERVICE

6. The Scottish Countryside Alliance (SCA) believes that the proposed ‘Purpose and Functions of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service’ might be strengthened by emphasising that the new single Scottish Fire and Rescue service will serve families and communities across all of Scotland. We believe that a subtle change in the suggested wording of the purpose would help, the SCA suggestion is:

   To improve the safety and wellbeing of people across all of Scotland.

The SCA believes that our suggested wording (above) will help to remind fire service personnel that their duties are not only in urban centres. We believe that the suggested SCA wording will also help to assure Scotland’s remote rural communities that the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Service exists to improve their safety and well-being as much as it exists for inner-city families and communities.

7. The SCA believes that rural areas of Scotland may sometimes differ from urban areas in their specific fire and rescue requirements. The SCA believes that the Board of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service should be composed of individuals with both urban and rural skill, experience and expertise if it is to perform its roles effectively.

The SCA believe that a key role and responsibility of the Local Senior Officers, in developing and delivering Local Plans, will be to take account of issues particular to their areas. Local fire and rescue priorities in rural areas may vary from those in urban areas and this variation must be recognised in Local Plans.

Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency

1. Introduction and Overview

1.1 Policing in Scotland is now undergoing the most significant period of change in a generation. The Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA) is committed to fully engaging in the police reform process, whilst at the same time, through innovation and creativity, continuing to fulfil our statutory obligations in preventing and detecting serious organised crime.

1.2 We welcome sight of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (‘the Bill’), and the opportunity to provide the Scottish Parliament Justice Committee with our views.

1.3 The SCDEA represent an integral part of the extremely successful ‘brand’ that is Scottish policing. Our position from the outset of the debate and consultation on future policing structures in Scotland has been to support the creation of a single fully integrated and interoperable Police Service of Scotland. We have previously highlighted the primary benefits of the creation of a single service being:

- Better ability to meet the current and projected financial challenges
- Improved response to crimes which cross police force boundaries
- Improved local and national governance arrangements
- Opportunities to reduce duplication and streamline partnership working

1.4 These benefits are consistent with the Scottish Government’s three core policy objectives of the Bill, being:

- To protect and improve local policing in a time of financial constraint;
- To improve national capacity and access to specialist policing support throughout Scotland; and
- To strengthen arrangements for local engagement

1.5 The landscape in which policing in Scotland is delivered in the 21st century is very different to the one that existed in 1975, when the last major reform of the service took place. The additional complexities facing modern policing are heavily influenced by the following:

- Financial challenges;
- The changing nature of threat, risk and harm to our communities;
- The expectations of our communities;
- The costs associated with the investigation of serious crime;
- The requirement for multi-agency collaboration; and
- The speed of technological change
1.6 The greatest opportunity for policing in Scotland that the Bill presents is that which enables the service to develop from its position of strength founded on long-standing principles of accountability and cooperation to one which recognises and builds on these same principles, but in the very different context and landscape which the service now operates.

1.7 The opportunities to enhance the delivery of policing services are real and they are significant. That said there are challenges in meeting reform objectives. We have set out below some views on where these key challenges lie in the context of the Bill.

2. The Scottish Police Authority

2.1 During the consultation process we highlighted that national accountability needs to:

- Ensure that the service as a whole in Scotland is focused on the needs of Scotland’s communities as a whole;
- Recognise the role of the service in protecting Scotland from national threats and criminal activity that originates from outwith Scotland’s geographical boundaries;
- Better hold the service to account in relation to the discharge of its functions, particularly in relation to the deployment of resources on a Scotland wide basis; and
- Provide greater scrutiny over the discharge of some of the service’s most sensitive covert techniques

2.2 We strongly maintain the view that for the Scottish Police Authority (SPA) to properly ‘hold the chief constable to account for the policing of Scotland’ the limitation on membership (as laid out in Schedule 12(1) of the Bill) to ‘no more than 11 members’ seriously questions its future ability to deliver the range of skills, experience and expertise to address the full range of modern policing powers and functions. It is our understanding that there was general agreement amongst respondents on this issue during the previous consultation on police and fire reform.

2.3 Whilst we fully acknowledge the differences in the policing landscape of Northern Ireland and do not advocate a similar role and influence that nationally elected members of the Northern Ireland Assembly have on the Northern Ireland Policing Board (NIPB), it is notable to highlight that the NIPB constitutes 19 members. Also, the NIPB currently functions with six sub-committees. Given the future size and scope of the Police Service of Scotland it is likely that the SPA will require to operate with a similar number of sub-committees. It is questionable how the SPA with a maximum of 11 members would be able to properly oversee and fulfil these sub-committee responsibilities.

2.4 An associated issue on the future membership of the SPA and its ability to effectively scrutinise the policing response to national threats, relates to the vetting status of its members. Schedule 1 of the Bill deals with various matters relating to membership, disqualification, tenure etc of SPA members. The Bill and associated documents though are silent on the issue of vetting status of SPA members.
2.5 It is clear and accepted that the service’s role in preventing and responding to national threats, particularly those related to serious organised crime and counter terrorism will necessitate inclusion in the Strategic Police Plan. The policing response to these threats will continue to involve the application of sensitive covert techniques. It is essential, therefore, that the composition of the Authority includes individuals who possess the skills and expertise and are appropriately vetted to hold the chief constable (or delegated senior officer) to account for the full range of policing responses from local to national threats.

3. Strategic Police Priorities

3.1 Section 33(3) outlines the persons and bodies that Scottish ministers must consult in determining strategic police priorities. It seems somewhat remiss that the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland is not specifically listed as a person who would be consulted. As a comparison, the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006 (‘the 2006 Act’) provides for the Director General to be consulted in determining the strategic priorities of the Agency.

4. Strategic Police Plan

4.1 Section 34(5) outlines that the Authority must use its best endeavours to secure their (Scottish Ministers) approval of the plan. This is interesting phraseology to use within the Bill and begs the question of what provisions would be in place to deal with the resolution of any dispute or disagreement. (The issue of conflict resolution also applies in relation to arrangements for approval of Local Policing Plans as outlined at Section 48 of the Bill).

4.2 Section 34(1) outlines that the Strategic Police Plan will be prepared by the Authority. Whilst the plan will have distinct priorities relating to policing and those which relate more specifically to the SPA, it is our view that responsibility for development of the Strategic Police Plan of the Police Service of Scotland should sit with the chief constable, subject to the approval of the SPA. We take a similar view in respect of the preparation of annual police plans, as laid out in Section 35. As a comparison it is of note that the 2006 Act specifically places responsibility with the Director General for the preparation of the Agency annual plan, subject to the approval of the Authority (SPSA). This represents more than ‘involvement’ by the chief constable as articulated in section 36.

5. National and Local Connections

5.1 It is our view that improvements need to be made in respect of both national and local accountability and governance arrangements, as neither remain wholly appropriate for the challenges of 21st century policing. The police reform programme presents clear opportunities to enhance these arrangements.

5.2 The Bill presently does not address this crucial aspect of connectivity between national and local issues. As currently drafted the Bill provides no clear obligation or responsibility on the SPA to establish a formal process of engagement or consultation with local authorities. This is an important matter that we are of the view requires to be addressed, potentially through legislation, to ensure proper dialogue and discussion on the allocation of finite police resources to meet both national and local demands. It may be the case that one of the sub-committees of the SPA could have responsibility for oversight in relation to national / local connectivity.

6. The Role of Police Staff

6.1 In the face of financial challenges an integral aspect of the police reform programme is the delivery of savings by reducing duplication. Given the significant savings that are to be achieved, this will inevitably reduce police staff posts. It is important to highlight, however, the crucial role that police staff play in the effective delivery of policing services. The important roles carried out by police staff cannot simply be categorised as ‘back-office’ functions. This is particularly relevant in relation to the covert and technical policing arena, where many of the police staff employed in this area perform crucial specialist ‘operational’ roles which could not be readily carried out by police officers. To ensure the most efficient and effective delivery of policing, it is essential that the Police Service of Scotland contains an appropriate balance of police officers and police staff.

7. Investigation of Complaints

7.1 Our position has been that a dedicated and independent police complaints body within Scotland, with an appropriate investigative capability, will provide the most suitable arrangement for the oversight and investigation of complaints within the Police Service of Scotland. We fully support the renaming and enhancement of the Police Complaints Commissioner for Scotland to establish the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner (PIRC).

7.2 Notwithstanding the above, the current Bill provisions require some further clarification, particularly the finer detail in respect of roles and responsibilities, which will influence the relationship between the PIRC, COPFS and the police. A clearer definition of the term ‘public interest’ and how this will set the parameters for PIRC investigations will also provide useful direction to the PIRC in fulfilling its statutory functions.

7.3 From a resourcing perspective and given the likely timescales for its establishment, will there be an expectation that considerable police resources, with relevant knowledge and expertise will be available to staff the PIRC, at least on an interim basis? If this is the case there are issues around formal cost recovery mechanisms and more importantly public reassurance around the independence of the PIRC that will require to be addressed. It is clear that the development of the PIRC needs to take place alongside and at the same pace as the development of the SPA and the Police Service of Scotland. All three bodies are interdependent and their establishment will be crucial to the maintenance of public confidence in the investigation of complaints.

7.4 One further point we would raise relates to the investigation of complaints against the Commissioner and PIRC staff. Section 70 within the Bill outlines that the ‘Commissioner must maintain suitable arrangements for the handling of any complaint’. In order to ensure public confidence in the new role and responsibilities of the PIRC, it should be subject to external scrutiny. The Public Services Ombudsman for Scotland would seem an appropriate body to fulfil this scrutiny role.

8. Forensic Services

8.1 Whilst the SCDEA has not previously commented on the proposed separation of forensic services functions, we support the view that certain elements of ‘forensic services’ are intrinsically linked to police investigations and therefore require to be under the control of the chief constable. Specifically, this linkage relates to crime scene examination functions. Scene examination is an integral aspect of the investigative process with the knowledge and experience of scene examiners utilised across all aspects of operational policing. Fundamentally, decisions on crime scene examination are operational policing matters and in many circumstances are time critical to the direction and success of a police investigation, therefore the SCDEA supports the ACPOS position on this issue.

9. Conclusion

9.1 The introduction of the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill provides detail on critical aspects of the police reform process in Scotland.

9.2 We have endeavoured to highlight in this submission some key provisions within the Bill which we believe require further examination.

9.3 The SCDEA recognises the challenges reform presents, not least in terms of the extent of the work involved to combine the existing eight police forces, SPSA and the SCDEA into an integrated single service. As we have indicated, the reform programme presents significant opportunities to modernise and enhance policing and enable the Police Service of Scotland to respond to and protect our communities from ever changing threats.

9.4 The SCDEA will continue to engage in the reform programme and will found on our unique position and experience, as the only ‘operational’ organisation within policing with a Scotland wide responsibility, to develop thinking on the opportunities it presents to shape the future of policing in Scotland.

SCDEA
22 February 2012
Conveners have focussed their evidence on the following areas:

- Proposed structures of local democracy and accountability
- Implications for the local resourcing of fire and rescue services as a result of the establishment of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.
- The relationship between local authorities and the new Scottish Fire and Rescue Board
- Issues relating to the transfer of fire and rescue service staff

Proposed structures of local democracy and accountability

1. In addition to establishing the single national service governed by the Scottish Fire and Rescue Board, the Bill seeks to establish a formal statutory relationship between the service and each of the 32 local authorities. The aim of increasing local accountability and engagement with elected members at local level is welcomed however, there are practical considerations that need to be carefully worked through.

2. There is a broad duty on the SFRS to ensure adequate local Fire and Rescue service provision but national and local views on the extent and detailed application of that provision could differ. The Bill states that the SFRS must submit a plan prepared for approval to the local authority and if approved the SFRS must publish it. As it stands, the Bill offers no recourse for any dispute arising between the national service and the local authority, which could seriously hamper the ability of the service to engage effectively at a local level. We need to be clear on whether the service is a national service delivered locally or 32 local services delivered within the context of a national framework. It cannot be both.

3. Local scrutiny and engagement arrangements are currently being piloted to test a range of mechanisms e.g. blue light committees through which elected members may play a direct and formal role in shaping local priorities and scrutinising performance however we need to guard against drawing the FRS away from the multi-agency approach which has been proven to work. In terms of Community Planning and Engagement, there is a need to remove duplication, build capacity and integrate services.

4. The Scottish Government is committed to strengthening community planning arrangements and that is also reflected in the Bill. Care needs to be taken if the current review of the SOA and CPP arrangements provide a more robust legal duty and partners are bound by joint plans and performance as a result. The need to separate out police and fire through their own stand alone committees should at least be examined to avoid police and fire working towards strategic objectives that sit outwith CPP priorities, duplication of activity and an unsustainable resource commitment for local authorities in the support of “blue light” committees as well as renewing a commitment to CPP and SOA arrangements.
Implications for the local resourcing of fire and rescue services because of the establishment of the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

5. The reality of being able to shape priorities locally and engage more effectively with the service at local authority level is obviously influenced by the extent to which budget decisions are driven nationally or locally. In the context of a single national service, it must be assumed that the budget is held centrally and allocated based on the priorities established within the national strategic plan.

6. It is not clear what level of delegated budgetary control is envisaged and whether delegated responsibility will be provided to the local senior officer for the management of a local budget. It is not clear what recourse the local authority has should that allocation not be considered sufficient for its needs or indeed does not match the priorities for the area as determined through the single outcome agreement or the local service plan which must be approved by the local authority.

The relationship between the local authorities and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Services Board

7. It is not clear from the Bill provision what arrangements will be in place to formalise the relationship between local authorities and the national Board or how local committees can formally raise matters of concern. As referenced previously, In the context of the development of a 3 year national strategic plan prepared on the basis of a national integrated risk management plan and developed in the context of a national budget set for the SFRS, it is entirely possible that conflict could arise if any given local authority does not feel that the local plan is sufficient for its purposes in terms of resource allocation, engagement in local initiatives or indeed the role of the local senior officer.

8. There is a broad duty on the SFRS to ensure adequate local service provision but national and local views on the extent and detailed application of that provision could differ.

Issues relating to the transfer of fire and rescue service staff

9. It is welcome that the SG commits to all staff directly employed by the 8 services and relevant staff employed by the unitary authorities transferring on the day of establishment of the new service with a commitment to retaining their terms and conditions on transfer. Ministers have publicly made a commitment to no compulsory redundancies, which is a welcome commitment for our staff. However, the assumptions around costs and savings as set out in the Financial Memorandum are challenged by a range of stakeholders and the real financial impact of this commitment is not considered to have been accurately reflected.

10. There will be a number of local variations to national conditions (all groups) and these will be “protected” under the Transfer commitment and carry forward. Where national frameworks exist each of the existing 8 will have negotiated locally on content and there may be wording differences as a minimum and probably policy differences. It is of real benefit to obviously seek to harmonise critical policies at Day 1 but there will be many other areas of variation e.g. shift systems, additional... allowances, public holidays and so on where negotiation may take some time to achieve a satisfactory position. This could impact on costs and the timescales associated with achieving a standardised employment framework for the new SFRS.

Scottish Fire Conveners Forum
2 March 2012
The Scottish Human Rights Commission (the Commission) welcomes the opportunity to submit comments to the Justice Committee on the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Bill (the Bill).

As stated in previous submissions, the Commission believes that the development of a single police force and oversight structures in Scotland is a unique opportunity to embed human rights into the new police structure to better ensure that the police comply with their obligations under section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998. The Commission agrees with the overall purpose of the Bill which is to create a modern, statutory framework for policing in Scotland with appropriate accountability arrangements.

In this submission the Commission will focus on the scrutiny and oversight arrangements proposed in the Bill, in particular the overarching ethical framework, the mechanisms for police complaints and investigations and the oversight role of the new Police Authority. In line with our general duty, the Commission will highlight examples of best practice and provide recommendations for strengthening the framework of police accountability in Scotland.

2. Relevant human rights principles

There are a range of international Conventions and Codes which recognise that the primary purpose of policing includes the protection of human rights, for example:

- Article 2 of the United Nations Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement

1 Letter to Cabinet Secretary for Justice on the Single Police Service for Scotland, 31 October 2011.
2 Section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998, requires all public authorities – including the police – to act in a way which is compatible with the individual rights and freedoms contained in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).
3 The Commission acknowledges the contributions from Jane Gordon (former Human Rights Advisor for the Northern Ireland Policing Board) in informing this submission.
Officials\textsuperscript{4} states that in the performance of their duty, law enforcement officials shall respect and protect human dignity and maintain and uphold the human rights of all persons.

- The European Code of Police Ethics 2001 states that the main purposes of the police in a democratic society governed by the rule of law includes the requirement to protect and respect the individual’s fundamental rights and freedoms as enshrined, in particular, in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).\textsuperscript{5}

- The Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA) requires all public authorities – including the police – to act in a way which is compatible with the individual rights and freedoms contained in the ECHR.\textsuperscript{6} Article 2 and 3 of the ECHR are particularly relevant in this context.

In relation to police accountability mechanisms, there are also a number of international instruments that recognise the importance of current monitoring and measurement based on human rights indicators against which police policies are assessed. The Commission would like to mention two:

1. The European Code of Police Ethics, which requires accountability mechanisms, based on communication and mutual understanding between the public and the police, to be promoted.\textsuperscript{7}

2. The 2011 Laxenburg Declaration, which reiterates the need to ensure transparency, accessibility, accountability, legitimacy, impartiality and integrity in all systems created for police oversight and specifically promotes respect for the rule of law and human rights through and within all police oversight activities. It also calls for strong civil society participation in police oversight.\textsuperscript{8}

In other jurisdictions the benefits of introducing human rights into every day policing have been highlighted. For example, the former Northern Ireland Police Ombudsman, Dame Nuala O’Loan, reported that adopting a human rights based approach to policing in Northern Ireland made a significant difference, observing that ‘[w]hen human rights are factored into everyday policing, things change’:

People are now coming forward to help police in a way that has not happened in the past. Complaints of abuse of force, intimidation and harassment by police officers fell over seven years from 52% to 36% of complaints... People and police officers are safer, and suffer less injury. Part of this can be attributed to wider political events; however much of the improvement is clearly the result of the introduction of human rights-compliant policing in a context of real leadership and of strong accountability mechanisms.9

3. The Bill

3.1. Human rights reference

The Commission believes that a good starting point for new legislation creating a Police Service of Scotland, a Police Authority and oversight mechanisms is to ensure that human rights are explicitly articulated in the legislation. Regrettably, there are no references to human rights in the Bill despite the distinct human rights obligations for the police under the HRA. Moreover, the Scotland Act 1998 makes clear that any decisions by both the Scottish Government and the Scottish Parliament in relation to policing must be in compliance with Convention rights.

The Commission notes that Section 32 of the Bill includes a statement of policing principles to which the Scottish Ministers, the Police Authority and the Chief Constable must have regard when setting the strategic direction for the Police Service. The policing principles define the core statutory purpose of policing and are designed to embed a model of policing based on partnership between the police and local communities. These principles offer an opportunity to define the fundamental values and principles of the Scottish Police Service.

Recommendation 1: A commitment to upholding human rights should be explicitly included in the policing principles of the Scottish Police Service.

3.2. Overarching ethical framework

Ethical standards are the cornerstone of good governance. The Commission is concerned that the Bill makes no provision for a code of ethics for the Scottish Police Service to inform and guide the conduct of police officers. The Commission is aware that the current Scottish Police Code of Ethical Practice refers to human rights and human dignity,11 and therefore considers that a common ethical framework for the police service in Scotland should have statutory basis. The Police (Northern Ireland) Act 200012, which exemplifies best practice in this area, requires the Northern Ireland Policing Board (the Policing Board)13 to issue - following consultation- a code of ethics for the Police Service for Northern Ireland (PSNI) laying down standards of conduct and practice for police officers and making officers aware of the rights and obligations arising out of the ECHR.14 Police officers must be guided by the Code of Ethics for the Police Service for Northern Ireland.

10 The Police principles, Sec 37, will inform the strategic policing objectives and the delivery of the policing purpose and plan.
12 Section 52 of the Act.

14 This follows a recommendation by the Patten Report that a new Code of Ethics, integrating the European Convention on Human Rights into police practice, replaces the existing, largely procedural code: Paten Report, para.4.8.
Ethics in carrying out their duties. The Police Ombudsman also uses the Code of Ethics to classify complaints made against the police.

It is important that the Police Service, the Police Authority and the Police Investigation and Review Commissioner share a common ethical base and that this is evident in every aspect of policing. A code of ethics provides a common ethical framework and is a valuable tool in to ensure that the police service complies with its obligations under the HRA.

Recommendation 2: The Bill should include a provision requiring the Scottish Police Authority to issue a code of ethics for the Police Service laying down standards of conduct and practice for police officers based on human rights principles and ECHR obligations.

3.3. Police oath

The Bill includes an updated declaration for constables upon appointment. The declaration affirms certain core principles and values which will guide them in the conduct of their duty. However, the new police oath makes no reference to human rights. In Northern Ireland, the PSNI attestation includes explicit references to “fundamental human rights and according equal respect to all individuals and their traditions and beliefs…according to law.”

Recommendation 3: The new police oath should contain an explicit commitment to upholding and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms.

3.4 Police Authority

The Bill proposes to establish a body corporate to be known as the Scottish Police Authority, whose functions are listed in Section 2 of the Bill. Section 2(3) states that:

“The Authority must try to carry out its functions in a way which is proportionate, accountable and transparent and which is consistent with any principle of good governance which appears to it to constitute best practice.” (emphasis added)

The Commission believes that the reference to ‘try’ should be deleted from this provision as the Police Authority, a public authority, is required to act in compliance with ECHR rights.

15 Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, s.32(4). The PSNI Code of Ethics has been fully integrated into the work of PSNI Professional Standards, incorporated within the new annual appraisal process and referenced in PSNI training materials. Further, all misconduct charges are worded to reflect the Code of Ethics and all outcomes of misconduct hearings are reported with reference to the specific article of the Code which was breached.

16 See, for example, Northern Ireland Policing Board, Human Rights Annual Report 2008, pp.78-79.

17 Canada is in the process of adopting a Values and Ethics Code for the Public Sector. Once the Code is in force all federal public sector employees, including members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, will be required to adhere to the Code as a term and condition of employment.

18 Bill, s.10(1) “I do solemnly, sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of constable with fairness, integrity, diligence and impartiality, according to law.”

19 Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000. s.38
Section 33 of the Bill provides that the Scottish Ministers may determine the strategic police priorities for the Police Authority—relating to the policing of Scotland or the carrying out of the Police Authority’s functions—, having regard to the policing principles. Additionally, Section 5(1) of the Bill provides that the Police Authority must comply with any specific or general direction given by the Scottish Ministers. As a result, Scottish Ministers have a comprehensive power to direct the Police Authority. The Explanatory Notes to the Bill state that this is ‘a normal feature of public bodies created by the Scottish Ministers and is used very rarely’.

It is the Commission’s view that the Scottish Ministers should only retain the power to set principles and broad overall objectives for policing and the Policing Authority should have the independence and power to set its own strategic policing priorities. The power given to Scottish Ministers in the Bill may pose a significant challenge to the independence of the Police Authority and the integrity of the police accountability framework.

Recommendation 4: The Police Authority should have the independence to set its own strategic policing priorities.

Sections 17, 34, 35 and 40 of the Bill enumerate the oversight powers of the Police Authority. While the Bill strengthens the oversight role of the Police Authority in relation to the current arrangements, the powers are not comprehensive to secure full efficiency and effectiveness.

In Northern Ireland, the Policing Board has an explicit obligation to monitor the performance of the PSNI in complying with the HRA. The Policing Board’s reports assess information from internal documents, external reports, operational observations, informed testimony, and commissioned surveys covering every aspect of policing where human rights are involved. The reports make recommendations about matters that require attention and track the implementation of recommendations made in previous annual reports. In consequence, the statutory oversight duties of the Northern Ireland Policing Board are more extensive than those proposed for the Scottish Police Authority.

It is important to note that the Northern Ireland Policing Board’s human rights monitoring process has been defined as ‘a model for the evaluation of the human rights performance of a police service’. Subsequently, the statutory duty to monitor the performance of the police in complying with the HRA was extended to all police authorities in England and Wales.

20 Explanatory Notes, para.88.
21 Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, s. 3(3)(b)(ii). In December 2003, the Policing Board published a human rights monitoring framework and The Board has published human rights annual reports assessing the compliance with the Human Rights Act since 2005.
Recommendation 5: The Bill should include a provision requiring the Scottish Police Authority to monitor the performance of the Police Service in complying with the HRA.

In addition, the Northern Ireland Policing Board has a power to require the Chief Constable to report on any policing matter relating to the performance of his functions or those of the police service and the related power to order an inquiry into any matter upon which it has received a report if it considers the matter, or any related matter in the report, is grave or there are exceptional circumstances. The power is circumscribed by the ability of the Chief Constable to refer to the Secretary of State the Board’s request for a report or proposal for an inquiry on the grounds that the request or proposal concerns national security, sensitive personal matters, ongoing court cases, or matters which would prejudice the prevention or detection of crime. In these cases, the Secretary of State is required to make a determination, within 30 days, whether the Chief Constable should provide a report to the Board or whether the Board should conduct the inquiry.

The Commission suggests that consideration should be given to proposing the inclusion of additional powers for the Police Authority to require the Chief Constable to report on any policing matter relating to the performance of his functions or those of the police service and to order an inquiry into any matter upon which it has received a report if it considers the matter, or any related matter in the report, is grave or there are exceptional circumstances.

3.5 Independent Complaints and Investigation Mechanism

The Commission has previously expressed that there are a number of principles that an effective accountability framework must consider. The key principles include: independence, transparency, competence, promptness, public scrutiny and victim participation. This means that an effective accountability framework includes both internal accountability mechanisms, such as codes of conduct and professional standards as well as external accountability mechanisms, such as an independent police authority, an independent police complaints body and measures to facilitate public scrutiny. All of these mechanisms offer an important protection against impunity and ensure public confidence.

The Commission welcomes the establishment of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner as a new independent investigation mechanism. The Commission considers that it is important in order to satisfy the procedural obligation under Articles 2 and Article 3 of the ECHR that the independence of the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner is strongly guarded and the Commissioner is given adequate investigatory powers of disclosure of all relevant documents and other materials and the attendance of individuals as witnesses.\textsuperscript{30}

In Northern Ireland, the Police Ombudsman has an additional power to make reports to the Chief Constable and the Policing Board on matters concerning police practices and policies which the Ombudsman identifies from investigations.\textsuperscript{31} This power has been used to positive effect by the Ombudsman, providing the opportunity to conduct more general reviews to remedy systemic or repeated failings.\textsuperscript{32} The Commission notes that this would be a useful additional tool for the Police Investigations and Review Commissioner.

Recommendation 6: The Police Investigations and Review Commissioner should be given adequate investigatory powers of disclosure and attendance of witnesses.

3.6 Independent Custody Visiting

The Commission is a member of the UK’s National Preventative Mechanism (NPM) designated in accordance with the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OPCAT). The Commission welcomes Chapter 16 of the Bill and in particular the specific reference to OPCAT in section 90 and the objective of establishing a system of regular visits undertaken by independent international and national bodies to places where people are deprived of their liberty in order to prevent torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.\textsuperscript{33}

The placing of independent custody visiting in Scotland on a statutory footing in Section 91 is in line with OPCAT and best practice guidance, it also brings Scotland into line with the rest of the UK. This change would allow for independent custody visitors to be designated as part of the NPM.

The Commission welcomes the provisions in section 92 relating to the Subcommittee on the Prevention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. These provisions mirror those in OPCAT and are clear that the only time an objection may be made to a visit is in the very limited circumstances where there are urgent or compelling grounds of public safety, natural disaster or serious order that may prevent the visit.

The Commission is concerned, however, that at section 91(4) there is a much wider discretion given to refusing access to a detainee by independent custody visitors. Rather than setting out the grounds on the face of the legislation it will be for Scottish Ministers to determine the grounds upon which visits can be refused through issuing
