Bill (As Passed) (SP Bill 41B)
Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and “As Passed”);
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
• Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;
• Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;
• Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;
• Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.scottish.parliament.uk).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

Annexes B-E of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee’s Stage 1 Report (the oral and written evidence received by the Committee and reports to it by other committees) were originally published on the web only. This material, along with relevant additional material, is included in full in this volume as part of the Annexes to the Stage 1 Report.

The Scottish Government made a written response to the report of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee at Stage 1, in addition to the Government’s general response to the Stage 1 Report of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the response at its meeting on 1 April 2014. Relevant material from that meeting, including the Scottish Government’s response, is included in this volume.

Housing (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about housing, including provision about the abolition of the right to buy, social housing, the law affecting private housing, the regulation of letting agents and the licensing of sites for mobile homes.

PART 1

RIGHT TO BUY

1 Abolition of the right to buy

   (1) Sections 61 to 81, 84 and 84A of the 1987 Act (right to buy provisions) are repealed.

   (2) Section 52 of the 2001 Act (reports on right to buy) is repealed.

   (3) Sections 145 to 147 of the 2010 Act (duties to collect information in relation to right to buy) are repealed.

2 Amendment of right to buy provisions

   In the 1987 Act—

   (a) in section 61ZA(1) (limitation on the right to purchase: new tenants), after “occupation” insert “as a tenant”, and

   (b) in section 61F (limitation on the right to purchase: new supply social housing), repeal the words “created before the relevant day” in each place where they occur.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Allocation of social housing

3 Reasonable preference in allocation of social housing

   In section 20 of the 1987 Act (persons to have priority on housing list and allocation of housing), for subsection (1) substitute—
“(1) A social landlord must, in relation to all houses held by it for housing purposes, secure that in the selection of its tenants a reasonable preference is given to the persons mentioned in subsection (1ZA).

(1ZA) The persons are—

(a) persons who—

(i) subject to subsection (1A), are homeless persons and persons threatened with homelessness (within the meaning of Part 2), and

(ii) have unmet housing needs,

(b) persons who—

(i) are living under unsatisfactory housing conditions, and

(ii) have unmet housing needs, and

(c) tenants of houses held by the social landlord which the social landlord considers to be under-occupied.

(1ZB) For the purposes of subsection (1ZA), persons have unmet housing needs where the social landlord considers the persons to have housing needs which are not capable of being met by housing options which are available.”.

4 Rules on priority of allocation of housing: consultation

(1) After section 20 of the 1987 Act (persons to have priority on housing list and allocation of housing), insert—

“20A Rules on priority of allocation of housing: consultation

(1) Before making or altering its rules governing the priority of allocation of houses, a social landlord must—

(a) consult the persons mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) prepare and publish a report on the consultation.

(2) The persons are—

(a) applicants on its housing list (within the meaning of section 19),

(b) tenants of the landlord,

(c) bodies for the time being registered in the register of tenant organisations maintained by the landlord under section 53(3) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 (asp 10), and

(d) such other persons as the landlord thinks fit.

(3) A social landlord may publish a consultation report mentioned in subsection (1)(b) in such manner as it thinks fit (and may in particular publish a joint report with any other social landlord).”.

(2) In section 21 of the 1987 Act, after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) In making or altering its rules governing the priority of allocation of houses, a social landlord must have regard to—

(a) any local housing strategy (within the meaning of section 89(1)(b) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001) for its area, and

(b) any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers.
(3B) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe persons of a description or type who a social landlord must include in its rules governing the priority of allocation of houses.

(3C) Regulations under subsection (3B) are subject to the affirmative procedure.”.

(3) The title of section 21 of the 1987 Act becomes “Rules relating to the housing list and to transfer of tenants”.

5 Factors which may be considered in allocation: age

In section 20 of the 1987 Act (persons to have priority on housing list and allocation of housing)—

(a) subsection (2)(a)(vi) is repealed, and

(b) for subsection (2B) substitute—

“(2B) Where a social landlord takes into account the age of an applicant aged 16 years or over in the allocation of housing falling within subsection (1), the social landlord must nevertheless treat the applicant as protected from unlawful discrimination on the grounds of the protected characteristic of age (within the meaning of Part 2 of the Equality Act 2010 (c.15)).”.

6 Factors which may be considered in allocation: ownership of property

(1) In section 20 of the 1987 Act (persons to have priority on housing list and allocation of housing), for subsection (2)(a)(viii) substitute—

“(viii) where any of the circumstances in subsection (2C) apply to that person, the ownership of, or value of, heritable property owned by—

(A) the applicant,

(B) a person who normally resides with the applicant, or

(C) a person who it is proposed will reside with the applicant.”.

(2) After subsection (2B) insert—

“(2C) The circumstances are that—

(a) in the case of a property which has not been let, the owner cannot secure entry to that property,

(b) it is probable that occupation of the property will lead to abuse (within the meaning of the Protection from Abuse (Scotland) Act 2001 (asp 14) from some other person residing in that property,

(c) it is probable that occupation of it will lead to abuse (within the meaning of that Act) from some other person who previously resided with that person, whether in that property or elsewhere,

(d) occupation of the property may endanger the health of the occupants and there are no reasonable steps which can be taken by the applicant to prevent that danger.”.
Determination of minimum period for application to remain in force

(1) In section 20 of the 1987 Act (persons to have priority on housing list and allocation of housing)—

(a) in subsection (2)(a)(iii), at the beginning insert “except to the extent permitted by section 20B,”, and

(b) in subsection (2)(b)(i), at the beginning insert “except to the extent permitted by section 20B,”.

(2) After section 20A of the 1987 Act (inserted by section 4(1)), insert—

Determination of minimum period for application to remain in force

(1) A social landlord may impose a requirement that an application must have remained in force for a minimum period before the applicant is eligible for the allocation of housing falling within section 20(1) if, before making that application, any of the circumstances mentioned—

(a) in subsection (5) applied in relation to the applicant, or

(b) in paragraphs (a) to (g) of subsection (5) applied in relation to a person who it is proposed will reside with the applicant.

(2) But a social landlord may not impose a requirement under subsection (1) if the landlord—

(a) in relation to the same application has previously relied on the same circumstance as it applied to an applicant or a person who it is proposed will reside with the applicant to impose a requirement under subsection (1), or

(b) is a local authority and has a duty to the applicant under section 31(2) (duty to secure accommodation where applicant is homeless).

(3) In considering whether to impose a requirement under subsection (1), a social landlord must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers on—

(a) the maximum period preceding the application which should be considered in relation to any circumstances mentioned in subsection (5),

(b) the maximum period for an application to have remained in force which should be imposed in relation to any circumstances mentioned in subsection (5).

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe—

(a) the maximum period preceding the application which a social landlord may consider in relation to any circumstances mentioned in subsection (5),

(b) the maximum period for an application to have remained in force which a social landlord may impose in relation to any circumstances mentioned in subsection (5), and such regulations may make different provision for different cases.

(5) The circumstances are—

(a) the person has—
(i) acted in an antisocial manner in relation to another person residing in, visiting or otherwise engaged in lawful activity in the locality of a house occupied by the person,

(ii) pursued a course of conduct amounting to harassment of such other person, or a course of conduct which is otherwise antisocial conduct in relation to such other person, or

(iii) acted in an antisocial manner, or pursued a course of conduct which is antisocial conduct, in relation to an employee of the social landlord in the course of making the application,

(b) the person has been, or has resided with a person who has been, convicted of—

(i) using a house or allowing it to be used for immoral or illegal purposes, or

(ii) an offence punishable by imprisonment which was committed in, or in the locality of, a house occupied by the person,

(c) an order for recovery of possession has been made against the person in proceedings under—

(i) the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 (S.I. 1983/1118),

(ii) the Housing Act 1985 (c.68),

(iii) this Act,

(iv) the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 (c.43),

(v) the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 (asp 10),

(d) the person’s tenancy has been terminated by the landlord under section 18(2) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 (repossession where abandoned tenancy),

(e) the person’s interest in a tenancy has been terminated by the landlord under section 20(3) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 (abandonment by joint tenant),

(f) in relation to a house where the person was a tenant, a court has ordered recovery of possession on the ground set out in paragraph 3 or 4 of schedule 2 to the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001,

(g) there is or was any outstanding liability (for payment of rent or otherwise) in relation to a house which—

(i) is attributable to the person’s tenancy of the house, and

(ii) either—

(A) section 20(2A) would not be satisfied in respect of that debt, or

(B) in the case of a debt which is no longer outstanding, section 20(2A) would not have been satisfied at any time while that debt remained outstanding,

(h) the person knowingly or recklessly made a false statement in any application for housing held by a social landlord,
(i) the person has refused one or more offers of housing falling within section 20(1) and the landlord considers the refusal of that number of offers to be unreasonable.

(6) In subsection (5)—

“antisocial”, in relation to an action or course of conduct, means causing or likely to cause alarm, distress, nuisance or annoyance,

“conduct” includes speech, and a course of conduct must involve conduct on at least two occasions, and “harassment” is to be construed in accordance with section 8 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (c.40).

(7) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify subsections (5) and (6).

(8) An applicant may by summary application appeal to the sheriff against any decision of a social landlord under subsection (1).

(9) Regulations under subsection (4) and under subsection (7) are subject to the affirmative procedure.”.

Short Scottish secure tenancy

8 Creation of short Scottish secure tenancy: antisocial behaviour

(1) In section 34 of the 2001 Act (short Scottish secure tenancies), after subsection (8) insert—

“(9) A landlord must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers before creating a tenancy which is a short Scottish secure tenancy by virtue of section 35 or paragraph 1, 2 or 2A of schedule 6.”.

(2) In section 35 of the 2001 Act (conversion to a short Scottish secure tenancy)—

(a) for subsection (2) substitute—

“(2) The landlord may serve a notice under subsection (3) only where—

(a) the tenant (or any one of joint tenants) or a person residing or lodging with, or a subtenant of, the tenant is subject to an antisocial behaviour order under—

(i) section 234AA of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46), or

(ii) section 4 of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 8), or

(b) the tenant (or any one of joint tenants), a person residing or lodging with, or a subtenant of, the tenant, or a person visiting the house has, within the period of 3 years preceding the date of service of the notice—

(i) acted in an antisocial manner in relation to another person residing in, visiting or otherwise engaged in lawful activity in the locality of a house occupied by the person, or

(ii) pursued a course of conduct amounting to harassment of such other person, or a course of conduct which is otherwise antisocial conduct in relation to such other person.”,
(b) after subsection (6), insert—

“(7) In this section—

“antisocial”, in relation to an action or course of conduct, means causing or likely to cause alarm, distress, nuisance or annoyance,

“conduct” includes speech, and a course of conduct must involve conduct on at least two occasions, and “harassment” is to be construed in accordance with section 8 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (c.40).”.

(3) In section 37(1) of the 2001 Act (conversion to Scottish secure tenancy), in paragraph
(a) for “or 2” substitute “, 2 or 2A”.

(4) In schedule 6 to the 2001 Act (grounds for granting short Scottish secure tenancy)—
(a) after paragraph 2 insert—

“Other antisocial behaviour

2A (1) A person mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) has, within the period of 3 years preceding the date of service of the notice—

(a) acted in an antisocial manner in relation to another person residing in, visiting or otherwise engaged in lawful activity in the locality of a house occupied by the prospective tenant or by a person who it is proposed will reside with the prospective tenant, or

(b) pursued a course of conduct amounting to harassment of such other person, or a course of conduct which is otherwise antisocial conduct in relation to such other person.

(2) The persons are—

(a) the prospective tenant,

(b) any one of prospective joint tenants,

(c) a person visiting a house occupied by the prospective tenant or by a person who it is proposed will reside with the prospective tenant, and

(d) a person who it is proposed will reside with the prospective tenant.

(3) In sub-paragraph (1)—

“antisocial”, in relation to an action or course of conduct, means causing or likely to cause alarm, distress, nuisance or annoyance,

“conduct” includes speech, and a course of conduct must involve conduct on at least two occasions, and

“harassment” is to be construed in accordance with section 8 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (c.40).”, and

(b) for paragraph 6 substitute—

“Accommodation for person in receipt of housing support

6 The house is to be let expressly on a temporary basis to a person—

(a) to whom no other paragraph of this schedule applies, and

(b) who is in receipt of a housing support service.”.
(5) In section 31(5) of the 1987 Act (permanent accommodation where duty to secure accommodation for persons found to be homeless), in paragraph (c) for “or 2” substitute “, 2 or 2A”.

9 Grant of short Scottish secure tenancy: homeowners

In schedule 6 to the 2001 Act (grounds for granting short Scottish secure tenancy), after paragraph 7 insert—

“Temporary letting where other property owned

7A(1) The house is to be let expressly on a temporary basis to a person pending the making of arrangements in relation to a property mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) which will allow the person’s housing needs to be met.

(2) The property is heritable property owned by the person or a person who it is proposed will reside with that person.”.

10 Short Scottish secure tenancy: term

(1) In section 34 of the 2001 Act (short Scottish secure tenancies), after subsection (6) insert—

“(6A) A tenancy which is a short Scottish secure tenancy by virtue of section 35 or paragraph 1, 2 or 2A of schedule 6 has a term of 12 months from the day on which the tenancy is granted.”.

(2) In section 35 of the 2001 Act (conversion to short Scottish secure tenancy), after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) A short Scottish secure tenancy created by virtue of this section has a term of 12 months from the day on which the landlord serves a notice under subsection (3).”.

(3) In section 37 of the 2001 Act (conversion to Scottish secure tenancy), after subsection (4) insert—

“(5) Subsection (6) applies to a tenancy which—

(a) became a short Scottish secure tenancy by virtue of section 35, or

(b) becomes a Scottish secure tenancy by virtue of this section.

(6) The term of the tenancy is the term which applied immediately before the tenancy became a short Scottish secure tenancy.”.

11 Short Scottish secure tenancy: extension of term

(1) After section 35 of the 2001 Act, insert—

“35A Extension of term of short Scottish secure tenancy

(1) The landlord under a tenancy which is a short Scottish secure tenancy by virtue of section 35 or paragraph 1, 2 or 2A of schedule 6 may extend the term of that tenancy by 6 months from the day which would otherwise be the day of expiry of the tenancy.

(2) Such an extension may not be made unless—

(a) the tenant is in receipt of housing support services, and...
(b) the landlord has, on or before the day which is 2 months before the day which would otherwise be the day of expiry of the tenancy, served on the tenant a notice informing the tenant of—

(i) the extension, and

(ii) the reasons for the extension.

(3) A landlord may not give a notice if the landlord has previously given a notice under subsection (2) in relation to that short Scottish secure tenancy.”.

(2) In section 37 of the 2001 Act (conversion to Scottish secure tenancy)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) the words “, in the period of 12 months following the creation of the tenancy,” are repealed,

(ii) after “36(2)” insert “before the expiry of the relevant period”, and

(iii) for “that” substitute “the relevant”,

(b) after subsection (1), insert—

“(1A) In this section, the “relevant period” is—

(a) the period of 12 months following the creation of the tenancy, or

(b) if an extension notice has been served under section 35A, the period of 18 months following the creation of the tenancy.”.

(c) in subsection (2)—

(i) for “period of 12 months following the creation of the tenancy” substitute “relevant period”, and

(ii) for “that period of 12 months”, in both places where it occurs, substitute “the relevant period”.

12 Short Scottish secure tenancy: recovery of possession

In section 36 of the 2001 Act (recovery of possession)—

(a) in subsection (2), after paragraph (a) insert—

“(aa) in the case of a short Scottish secure tenancy created by virtue of section 35 or paragraph 1, 2 or 2A of schedule 6, the landlord considers that any obligation of the tenancy has been broken,”,

(b) in subsection (3), after paragraph (a) insert—

“(aa) state the reason why the landlord is seeking recovery of possession (including, in a case where subsection (2)(aa) applies, the obligations which the landlord considers to have been broken),”,

(c) after subsection (4), insert—

“(4A) A tenant may, before the end of the period of 14 days beginning with the day of service of a notice under subsection (2), apply to the landlord for a review of a decision to seek recovery of possession of the house which is the subject of the tenancy.

(4B) If an application for a review under subsection (4A) is made, the landlord must, before the day specified in the notice by virtue of subsection (3)(b)—
(a) confirm its decision to seek recovery of possession or withdraw its notice under subsection (2),
(b) notify the tenant of its decision on the review, and
(c) where its decision on the review is to confirm the decision to seek recovery of possession, notify the tenant of the reasons.

(4C) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision about the procedure to be followed in connection with a review following an application under subsection (4A)."

(d) in subsection (7), after “16” insert “, but subject to the modification mentioned in subsection (8)”, and
(e) after subsection (7), insert—

“(8) In relation to the recovery of possession of the house which is the subject of a short Scottish secure tenancy, section 14(4) is to be read as if for paragraph (b) there were substituted—

“(b) a date, not earlier than 4 weeks from the date of service of the notice on or after which the landlord may raise proceedings for recovery of possession,”.

Scottish secure tenancy

13 Assignation, sublet and joint tenancy of Scottish secure tenancy

(1) In section 11 of the 2001 Act (Scottish secure tenancy)—

(a) in subsection (6), the words “, or is intended to be,” are repealed, and
(b) after subsection (6) insert

“(6A) An application under subsection (5) may be made only where the house in question has been the only or principal home of the person falling within subsection (6) throughout the period of 12 months ending with the date of the application.

(6B) For the purposes of subsection (6A) a period may be considered in relation to a person only if that person notified the landlord at any time before the period that the house in question was that person’s only or principal home.”.

(2) In section 32 of the 2001 Act (assignation, subletting, etc.)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) the word “and” immediately preceding paragraph (b) is repealed,
(ii) in paragraph (b), after “been” insert “the tenant’s and”,
(iii) in paragraph (b), for “6” substitute “12”, and
(iv) after paragraph (b), insert “ and

“(c) in the case of a sublet, only where the house has been the tenant’s only or principal home throughout the period of 12 months ending with the date of the application for the landlord’s consent to the sublet under paragraph 9 of schedule 5.”,

(b) after subsection (1), insert—
“(1B) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b) or (c) a period may be considered in relation to a person only if that person notified the landlord at any time before the period that the house in question was that person’s only or principal home.”, and

5 (c) in subsection (3)—

(i) the word “or” immediately preceding paragraph (e) is repealed, and

(ii) after paragraph (e), insert—

“(f) in the case of consent to an assignation by a local authority or a registered social landlord, if the proposed assignee is not a person to whom that local authority or registered social landlord would give a reasonable preference when selecting tenants under section 20(1) of the 1987 Act, or

(g) in the case of consent to an assignation, if the assignation would in the opinion of the landlord, result in the house being under-occupied.”.

14 Succession to Scottish secure tenancy

In schedule 3 to the 2001 Act (succession to Scottish secure tenancy: qualified persons)—

(a) in paragraph 2(2), for “6” insert “12”,

(b) in paragraph 3, for “at the time of” substitute “throughout the period of 12 months ending with”,

(c) in paragraph 4(b), for “at the time of” substitute “throughout the period of 12 months ending with”, and

(d) after paragraph 4, insert—

“Only or principal home

4A For the purposes of paragraph 2, 3 or 4 a period may be considered in relation to a person only if that person notified the landlord at any time before the period that the house in question was that person’s only or principal home.”.

15 Grounds for eviction: antisocial behaviour

In section 16 of the 2001 Act (powers of court in possession proceedings)—

(a) in subsection (2), after paragraph (a) insert—

“(aa) whether or not paragraph (a) applies, that—

(i) the landlord has a ground for recovery of possession set out in paragraph 2 of that schedule and so specified, and

(ii) the landlord served the notice under section 14(2) before the day which is 12 months after—

(A) the day on which the person was convicted of the offence forming the ground for recovery of possession, or

(B) where that conviction was appealed, the day on which the appeal is dismissed or abandoned,”, and

(b) after subsection (3), insert—
“(3A) Subsection (2) does not affect any other rights that the tenant may have by virtue of any other enactment or rule of law.”.

16 Recovery of possession of properties designed for special needs

In schedule 2 to the 2001 Act (grounds for recovery of possession of house)—

(a) in paragraph 11(a), the words “longer a” are repealed, and

(b) in paragraph 12(a), the words “longer a” are repealed.

PART 3

PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING

Transfer of sheriff’s jurisdiction to First-tier Tribunal

17 Regulated and assured tenancies etc.

(1) The functions and jurisdiction of the sheriff in relation to actions arising from the following tenancies and occupancy agreements are transferred to the First-tier Tribunal—

(a) a regulated tenancy (within the meaning of section 8 of the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 (c.58)),

(b) a Part VII contract (within the meaning of section 63 of that Act),

(c) an assured tenancy (within the meaning of section 12 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 (c.43)).

(2) But that does not include any function or jurisdiction relating to the prosecution of, or the imposition of a penalty for, a criminal offence.

(3) Part 1 of schedule 1 makes minor and consequential amendments.

18 Repairing standard

(1) The 2006 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 18—

(a) in subsection (1), for “sheriff” substitute “First-tier Tribunal”,

(b) in subsection (2)(b), for “sheriff” substitute “Tribunal”.

(3) The title of section 18 becomes “Contracting out with consent of First-tier Tribunal”.

(4) In section 57—

(a) in subsection (2), for “sheriff” substitute “relevant authority”,

(b) after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) In subsection (2), the relevant authority is—

(a) where the requirement or thing which the person is authorised or entitled to do relates to the repairing standard, the First-tier Tribunal,

(b) in any other case, the sheriff.”.

(5) Part 2 of schedule 1 makes minor and consequential amendments.
19 Right to adapt rented houses

(1) After section 66 of the 2006 Act insert—

"66A Appeals in relation to section 52"

(1) A tenant aggrieved by a decision by a landlord—

(a) to impose any condition on a consent to carry out work in pursuance of section 52(2), or

(b) to refuse to consent to the carrying out of any such work, may appeal to the First-tier Tribunal within 6 months of being notified of that decision.

(2) The First-tier Tribunal may, on cause shown, hear an appeal after the deadline set by subsection (1).

(3) The First-tier Tribunal must, unless the Tribunal considers the condition or, as the case may be, refusal appealed against to be reasonable, determine an appeal under subsection (1) by quashing the decision and directing the landlord to withdraw the condition (or to vary it in such manner as the Tribunal may specify) or, as the case may be, to consent to the application (with or without such conditions as the Tribunal may specify).

(4) In determining whether a condition or refusal appealed against under subsection (1) is reasonable, the First-tier Tribunal must, where the appeal relates to an application made for the purposes of section 52(2)(a), have regard to any code of practice issued by the Commission for Equality and Human Rights which relates to section 52 or 53.

(5) The First-tier Tribunal’s determination on an appeal under subsection (1) is final.”.

(2) Part 3 of schedule 1 makes minor and consequential amendments.

20 Landlord registration

(1) The 2004 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 92(2), for “sheriff” substitute “First-tier Tribunal”.

(3) In section 97—

(a) in subsection (1), for “sheriff” substitute “First-tier Tribunal”,

(b) in subsection (2), for “sheriff” substitute “First-tier Tribunal”.

(4) Part 4 of schedule 1 makes minor and consequential amendments.

21 Houses in multiple occupation

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) provide that the First-tier Tribunal may make an order of the kind mentioned in section 153(2) of the 2006 Act instead of the sheriff,

(b) provide that the following may be made to the First-tier Tribunal instead of the sheriff—
(i) appeals against decisions of local authorities to which section 158 of that Act applies,

(ii) applications to extend the period mentioned in paragraph 9(1) of schedule 4 to that Act,

(iii) applications for a warrant for the ejection of the occupant from land or premises where the occupant has not complied with a requirement under paragraph 2 of schedule 5 to that Act in relation to the land or premises.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may—

(a) disaply the following provisions of the 2006 Act—

(i) section 153(2),

(ii) section 159(1),

(iii) paragraph 9(2) of schedule 4,

(iv) paragraph 3(1) of schedule 5,

(b) make such other consequential modifications to the 2006 Act and any other enactment as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

Landlord registration: time limit for determining application

22 Landlord registration: time limit for determining application

(1) After section 85A of the 2004 Act, insert—

“85B Time limit for determining application

(1) This section applies where a relevant person makes an application to a local authority in accordance with section 83.

(2) The local authority must determine the application under section 84 within 12 months of receiving the application.

(3) The period mentioned in subsection (2) may be extended by the First-tier Tribunal, on application by the local authority, by such period as the Tribunal thinks fit.

(4) The First-tier Tribunal may not extend a period unless the local authority applies for the extension before the period expires.

(5) The relevant person is entitled to be a party to any proceedings on such an application.

(6) The decision of the First-tier Tribunal on such an application is final.

(7) If the local authority does not determine the application within the period required by this section—

(a) the authority is to be treated as having entered, on the day by which the authority was required to determine the application, the relevant person in the register maintained by the authority under section 82(1), and

(b) unless otherwise removed from the register in accordance with this Part, that person is to be treated as being removed from the register on the expiry of the period of 12 months beginning with that day.

(8) Where subsection (7) applies the authority must—
(a) enter the name of the relevant person in the register maintained by the authority under section 82(1), and
(b) state in the register a registration number in relation to that person (which is to be treated as having been given under section 84(5A)).

(9) Subject to the modifications in subsection (10), the relevant person is for all purposes to be treated as having been registered by virtue of section 84(2)(a).

(10) The modifications are—
(a) in the case of an application to which section 84(3)(a) and (b) applies, the relevant person is to be treated as having been registered by virtue of section 84(3), and
(b) in the case of an application to which section 84(4)(a) and (b) applies, the relevant person is to be treated as having been registered by virtue of section 84(4),
(c) section 84(6) does not apply, and
(d) section 89(2)(b), (3)(b) and (3A)(b) are to be read as if for the words “no longer applies” there were inserted “does not apply”.

(2) In section 86(1)(a) of the 2004 Act (entry in the register), after “section 84(2)” insert “or section 85B(8)(a)”.

Enforcement of repairing standard

23 Third party application in respect of the repairing standard

(1) In section 22 of the 2006 Act (tenant application to private rented housing panel)—
(a) after subsection (1), insert—
“(1A) A person mentioned in subsection (1B) may apply to the private rented housing panel for determination of whether a landlord has failed to comply with the duty imposed by section 14(1)(b) (a person who makes such an application being referred to as a "third party applicant").

(1B) The persons are—
(a) a local authority,
(b) a person specified by order made by the Scottish Ministers.”,

(b) in subsection (2), for “(1) must set out the tenant’s” substitute “(1) or (1A) must set out the tenant’s, or as the case may be, the third party applicant’s”,

(c) in subsection (3), for “such application may be made unless the tenant” substitute “application under this section may be made unless the person making the application”,

(d) in subsection (4), for “such application” substitute “application under this section”, and

(e) after subsection (4), insert—
“(4A) The tenant of the house concerned is entitled to be a party in the determination of any application made under subsection (1A).”.

(a) the landlord is to be a party to the proceedings,

(b) the tenant is entitled to be a party to the proceedings.”.

PART 4

LETTING AGENTS

Inclusion in the register

26 Register of letting agents

(1) The Scottish Ministers must establish and maintain a register of letting agents (the “register”).

(2) The register must contain an entry for each person entered in the register setting out—

(a) the name and address of the person entered in the register, and

(b) such information relating to that person as the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must make the information contained in the register publicly available by such means as they consider appropriate.

27 Application for registration

(1) A person may apply to the Scottish Ministers—

(a) to be entered in the register, or

(b) to renew that person’s existing entry in the register.

(2) The application must—

(a) state the name and address of the applicant,

(b) state whether the applicant is—

(i) trading as a sole trader,

(ii) a partnership,
(iii) a company, or
(iv) a body with some other legal status,

(c) in the case where the applicant is a company registered under the Companies Act 2006 (c.46), state the company’s registered number,

(d) in the case where the applicant is not a natural person, state the name and address of the individual who holds the most senior position within the management structure of the relevant partnership, company or body,

(e) state the name and address of any other person who—

(i) owns 25% or more of an applicant which is not a natural person, or

(ii) otherwise is (or is to be) directly concerned with the control or governance of the applicant’s letting agency work (whether or not the applicant is a natural person), and

(f) include such other information as the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe.

3 The application must be accompanied by a fee of such amount (if any) as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

28 Offence of providing false information in an application

(1) It is an offence for a person, in an application under section 27, to—

(a) provide information which the person knows is false in a material particular, or

(b) knowingly fail to specify information required by section 27(2).

(2) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

29 Decision on application

(1) The Scottish Ministers must determine an application under section 27 in accordance with this section.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must enter the applicant in the register or renew an existing entry if they are satisfied that—

(a) the applicant is a fit and proper person to carry out letting agency work, and

(b) any other person who is required to be identified in an application by virtue of section 27 is a fit and proper person in relation to letting agency work.

(3) An applicant who is entered in the register, or whose entry is renewed, is to be known as a “registered letting agent”.

(4) The Scottish Ministers must refuse to enter the applicant in the register or to renew an existing entry if they are not satisfied in accordance with subsection (2).

(5) Before refusing to enter the applicant in the register or to renew an existing entry, the Scottish Ministers must give to the applicant a notice stating that—

(a) they are considering refusing the application and their reasons for doing so, and

(b) the applicant has the right to make written representations to the Scottish Ministers before the date which is specified in the notice (such date to be at least 28 days after the date on which the notice is given).
(6) In making their decision under this section the Scottish Ministers must consider the application and any representations made in accordance with subsection (5)(b).

(7) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after making their decision under this section, notify the applicant of—

(a) their decision,

(b) in the case of a decision to enter the applicant in the register, the date of entry in the register,

(c) in the case of a decision to renew an existing entry, the date of renewal, and

(d) in the case of a refusal to enter the applicant in the register or to renew an existing entry, the date of that refusal.

(8) If the Scottish Ministers refuse to renew an existing entry they must remove the registered letting agent from the register on the date of final refusal.

(9) For the purposes of subsection (8) the date of final refusal is the date on which—

(a) the period mentioned in section 36(2) expires without an appeal being made,

(b) where such an appeal is made, the appeal is finally determined or abandoned.

30 Fit and proper person considerations

(1) In deciding under this Part if a person is a fit and proper person, the Scottish Ministers must have regard to all of the circumstances of the case, including any material falling within subsections (2) and (3).

(2) Material falls within this subsection if it shows that the person has—

(a) been convicted of an offence—

(i) involving fraud or other dishonesty,

(ii) involving violence,

(iii) involving drugs,

(iv) involving firearms,

(v) which is a sexual offence within the meaning of section 210A(10) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46),

(b) practised unlawful discrimination on the grounds of any of the protected characteristics in Part 2 of the Equality Act 2010 (c.15),

(c) contravened any provision of—

(i) the law relating to housing,

(ii) landlord and tenant law,

(iii) the law relating to debt.

(3) Material falls within this subsection if it shows the extent to which any person mentioned in subsection (1) has—

(a) complied with any Letting Agent Code of Practice made under section 41,

(b) complied with any Letting Code issued under section 92A of the 2004 Act,

(c) failed to comply with a duty applying to that person in accordance with section 32 to use a letting agent registration number,
(d) contravened any provision of any letting agent enforcement order issued under section 43,

(e) failed to pay any costs for which the person is liable under this Part arising from an application to the First-tier Tribunal under section 43.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify this section by adding to, removing or varying any material in subsections (2) and (3).

31 Fit and proper person: criminal record certificate

(1) The Scottish Ministers may, in deciding under this Part if a person is a fit and proper person, require the person in respect of whom the decision is being made to provide the Scottish Ministers with a criminal record certificate (within the meaning of section 113A of the Police Act 1997 (c.50)).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may require a criminal record certificate to be provided under subsection (1) only if they have reasonable grounds to suspect that the information provided under this Part in relation to material falling within section 30(2) is, or has become, inaccurate.

(3) Where, in the case of an application for entry in the register, the Scottish Ministers have required a criminal record certificate to be provided under subsection (1), a person may not be entered in the register until the certificate has been received by the Scottish Ministers.

Duties of registered letting agents

32 Letting agent registration number

(1) The Scottish Ministers must allocate a number to each registered letting agent (the “letting agent registration number”).

(2) A registered letting agent must take all reasonable steps to ensure that the agent’s letting agent registration number is included in—

(a) any document sent to a landlord, tenant, prospective landlord or prospective tenant in the course of the agent’s letting agency work,

(b) any property advertisement or communication in relation to the agent’s letting agency work, and

(c) any other document or communication of a type specified by the Scottish Ministers by order.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

(a) “advertisement” includes any form of advertising whether to the public generally, to any section of the public or individually to selected persons, and

(b) “communication” includes electronic communications sent or placed on a web page on a website operated by or on behalf of the registered letting agent.

33 Duty to inform: change of circumstances

(1) This section applies if, in consequence of a change in circumstances, any information provided by a registered letting agent to the Scottish Ministers by virtue of section 27 or, as the case may be, this section, becomes inaccurate.
The registered letting agent must notify the Scottish Ministers in writing, as soon as practicable after the inaccuracy arises, of the change that has occurred.

The notice must be accompanied by a fee of such amount (if any) as the Scottish Ministers may determine.

It is an offence for a person to fail to comply with subsection (2) without reasonable excuse.

A person who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

Removal from the register

Duration of registration

(1) The Scottish Ministers must remove a registered letting agent from the register if, on the expiry of the registration period, the registered letting agent has not made an application in accordance with section 27.

(2) The registration period is—

(a) in the case of a letting agent whose registration has not previously been renewed, the period of 3 years beginning with the date on which the entry was made,

(b) in any other case, the period of 3 years beginning the day after the end of the previous registration period.

Revocation of registration

(1) The Scottish Ministers may remove a registered letting agent from the register if they are satisfied that—

(a) the person is no longer a fit and proper person to carry out letting agency work, or

(b) any other person who is required to be identified in an application by virtue of section 27 is no longer a fit and proper person in relation to letting agency work.

(2) Before removing a registered letting agent from the register under this section the Scottish Ministers must give to the agent a notice stating that—

(a) they are considering removing the agent from the register and their reasons for doing so, and

(b) the applicant has the right to make written representations to the Scottish Ministers before the date which is specified in the notice (such date to be at least 28 days after the date on which the notice is given).

(3) In making their decision under this section the Scottish Ministers must consider any representations made in accordance with subsection (2)(b).

(4) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after making a decision to remove a registered letting agent from the register, notify the agent of—

(a) their decision,

(b) the date of removal from the register.
Appeals

(1) A person may appeal to the First-tier Tribunal against a decision by the Scottish Ministers—
   (a) under section 29 to refuse to enter that person in the register or to renew that person’s existing entry in the register,
   (b) under section 35 to remove that person from the register.

(2) An appeal must be made before the end of the period of 21 days beginning with the date of notification of the decision.

(3) In determining an appeal the Tribunal may make an order requiring the Scottish Ministers to enter the person in the register.

Consequences of refusal or removal

(1) Where the Scottish Ministers refuse to enter a person in the register or to renew a person’s existing entry in the register under section 29, they must, after the date of final refusal, note that fact in the register.

(2) Where the Scottish Ministers remove a person from the register under section 35 they must, after the date of final refusal, note that fact in the register.

(3) For the purposes of this section the date of final refusal is the later of the date on which—
   (a) the period mentioned in section 36(2) expires without an appeal being made,
   (b) where such an appeal has been made, the appeal is finally determined or abandoned.

(4) Where a fact is noted by virtue of subsection (1) or (2) it must—
   (a) remain on the register for the period of 12 months beginning with the date on which the Scottish Ministers are required to note it in the register, and
   (b) be removed from the register at the end of that period.

(5) But where a person in respect of whom the Scottish Ministers note a fact by virtue of subsection (1) or (2) is subsequently entered in the register before the end of the period mentioned in subsection (4)(a), the Scottish Ministers must remove the fact from the register.

No payment for letting agency work where refusal or removal

(1) This section applies where the Scottish Ministers—
   (a) refuse to enter a person in the register or to renew the person’s existing entry in the register under section 29,
   (b) remove a person from the register under section 34,
   (c) remove a person from the register under section 35.

(2) After the relevant date—
   (a) no costs incurred by the person in respect of letting agency work are recoverable,
Part 4—Letting agents

(b) no charge imposed by the person which relates to letting agency work in a period after the relevant date is recoverable.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must, as soon as practicable after the relevant date, publish in such manner as they think fit a notice of—

(a) the refusal or removal mentioned in subsection (1),
(b) the relevant date, and
(c) the effect of subsection (2).

(4) For the purposes of this section, the relevant date—

(a) in the case of a refusal or removal mentioned in subsection (1)(a) or (c), is the later of the date on which—

(i) the period mentioned in section 36(2) expires without an appeal being made,

(ii) where such an appeal has been made, the appeal is finally determined or abandoned, and

(b) in the case of a removal mentioned in subsection (1)(b), is the day after the day on which the person is removed from the register under section 34.

Offences where no registration

39 Offence of operating as a letting agent without registration

(1) It is an offence for a person who is not a registered letting agent to carry out letting agency work, unless subsection (2) applies to that person.

(2) This subsection applies to a person from the day on which the person is removed from the register under section 35 until—

(a) where the period mentioned in section 36(2) expires without an appeal being made, the expiry of that period,

(b) where such an appeal is made, the day on which it is finally determined or abandoned.

(3) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under subsection (1) to show that the person had a reasonable excuse for acting in the way charged.

(4) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months, to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, or to both.

40 Offence of using a registration number where no registration

(1) It is an offence for a person who is not entered in the register, without reasonable excuse, to use a number purporting to be a letting agent registration number in any document or communication.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to a person who is removed from the register under section 35 until—

(a) where the period mentioned in section 36(2) expires without an appeal being made, the expiry of that period,
(b) where such an appeal is made, the day on which it is finally determined or abandoned.

(3) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

Code of practice

41 Letting Agent Code of Practice

(1) The Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, set out a code of practice which makes provision about the standards of practice of persons who carry out letting agency work.

(2) The code of practice is to be known as the Letting Agent Code of Practice.

(3) Before making regulations under subsection (1), the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate on a draft of the code of practice.

42 Prohibition on contracting out

(1) The terms of any agreement of a kind mentioned in subsection (2) are of no effect in so far as they purport to—

   (a) exclude or limit any duty a letting agent has under the Letting Agent Code of Practice, or

   (b) impose any penalty, disability or obligation in the event of a person enforcing compliance by the letting agent with such a duty.

(2) The agreements are—

   (a) an agreement between a landlord and a letting agent,

   (b) an agreement between a tenant and a letting agent,

   (c) an agreement (including a lease) between a landlord and a tenant.

Letting agent enforcement orders

43 Applications to First-tier Tribunal to enforce code of practice

(1) A tenant or landlord may apply to the First-tier Tribunal for a determination that a relevant letting agent has failed to comply with the Letting Agent Code of Practice.

(2) A relevant letting agent is—

   (a) in relation to an application by a tenant, a letting agent appointed by the landlord to carry out letting agency work in relation to the house occupied (or to be occupied) by the tenant,

   (b) in relation to an application by a landlord, a letting agent appointed by the landlord.

(3) An application under subsection (1) must set out the applicant’s reasons for considering that the letting agent has failed to comply with the code of practice.

(4) No application may be made unless the applicant has notified the letting agent of the breach of the code of practice in question.

(5) The Tribunal may reject an application if it is not satisfied that the letting agent has been given a reasonable time in which to rectify the breach.
Subject to subsection (5), the Tribunal must decide on an application under subsection (1) whether the letting agent has complied with the code of practice.

Where the Tribunal decides that the letting agent has failed to comply, it must by order (a “letting agent enforcement order”) require the letting agent to take such steps as the Tribunal considers necessary to rectify the failure.

A letting agent enforcement order—

(a) must specify the period within which each step must be taken,

(b) may provide that the letting agent must pay to the applicant such compensation as the Tribunal considers appropriate for any loss suffered by the applicant as a result of the failure to comply.

References in this section to—

(a) a tenant include—

(i) a person who has entered into an agreement to let a house, and

(ii) a former tenant,

(b) a landlord include a former landlord.

Variation and revocation of enforcement orders

The First-tier Tribunal may, at any time—

(a) vary a letting agent enforcement order, or

(b) where it considers that the steps required by the order are no longer necessary, revoke it.

References in this Part (including this section) to a letting agent enforcement order are to be treated as references to the order as so varied.

Failure to comply with enforcement order

The First-tier Tribunal may, after the period within which a letting agent enforcement order requires steps to be taken, review whether the letting agent has complied with the order.

If the Tribunal decides that the letting agent has failed to comply with the letting agent enforcement order it must notify the Scottish Ministers of that failure.

But the Tribunal may not make such a decision if it is satisfied that the letting agent has a reasonable excuse for failing to comply.

A letting agent who, without reasonable excuse, fails to comply with a letting agent enforcement order commits an offence.

A letting agent cannot be guilty of an offence under subsection (1) unless the First-tier Tribunal has decided that the letting agent has failed to comply with the order (but such a decision does not establish a presumption that the letting agent has committed an offence under subsection (1)).

A letting agent who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.
General

47 Transfer of jurisdiction of actions involving letting agents

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations provide that the functions and jurisdiction of the sheriff in relation to the actions between the following persons relating to the carrying out of letting agency work are transferred to the First-tier Tribunal—

(a) a tenant and a relevant letting agent,
(b) a landlord and a relevant letting agent.

(2) A relevant letting agent is—

(a) in relation to a tenant, a letting agent appointed by the landlord to carry out letting agency work in relation to the house occupied (or to be occupied) by the tenant,
(b) in relation to a landlord, a letting agent appointed by the landlord.

(3) References in this section to—

(a) a tenant include—
(i) a person who has entered into an agreement to let a house, and
(ii) a former tenant,
(b) a landlord include a former landlord.

48 Offences by bodies corporate etc.

(1) Where—

(a) an offence under this Part has been committed by a body corporate or a Scottish partnership or other unincorporated association, and
(b) it is proved that the offence was committed with the consent or connivance of, or was attributable to any neglect on the part of—

(i) a relevant individual, or
(ii) an individual purporting to act in the capacity of a relevant individual, the individual (as well as the body corporate, partnership or, as the case may be, other unincorporated association) commits the offence and is liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

(2) In subsection (1), “relevant individual” means—

(a) in relation to a body corporate—
(i) a director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body,
(ii) where the affairs of the body are managed by its members, the members,
(b) in relation to a Scottish partnership, a partner,
(c) in relation to an unincorporated association other than a Scottish partnership, a person who is concerned in the management or control of the association.

49 Delegation of functions relating to the register

(1) The Scottish Ministers may, to such extent and subject to such conditions as they think appropriate, delegate any of their functions under this Part (other than a function relating to the making of an order or regulations) to such person as they may determine.
(2) A delegation under subsection (1) may be varied or revoked at any time.

50 Landlord registration where agent is a registered letting agent

(1) In section 84(4) of the 2004 Act (registration), for paragraph (d) substitute—

(d) either—

(i) the person is a registered letting agent, or

(ii) in the case of a person who is not a registered letting agent, the person is a fit and proper person to act for the landlord such as is mentioned in subsection (3)(c) in relation to the lease or, as the case may be, arrangement.”.

(2) In section 88 of the 2004 Act (registered person: appointment of agent)—

(a) in subsection (2B)—

(i) the word “or” at the end of paragraph (a) is repealed, and

(ii) after subsection (b), insert “, or

(c) the person appointed is a registered letting agent.”,

(b) for subsection (4), substitute—

“(4) The condition is that either—

(a) the person is a registered letting agent, or

(b) in the case of a person who is not a registered letting agent, the person is a fit and proper person to act for the registered person in relation to a lease or occupancy arrangement such as is mentioned in subsection (1)(b).”,

(3) In section 89 of the 2004 Act (removal from the register)—

(a) in subsection (3)(b) for “(d)” substitute “(d)(ii)”,

(b) after subsection (3), insert—

“(3A) Where—

(a) a person is registered by the local authority by virtue of section 84(4), and

(b) paragraph (d)(i) of that section no longer applies, the authority may remove the person from the register.”.

(4) In section 90(1) of the 2004 Act (notification of removal from register: registered person), after “89(1)” insert “, (3A)”.

(5) In section 91(1) of the 2004 Act (notification of removal from register: other persons), after “89(1)” insert “, (3A)”.

(6) In section 92(1)(b) of the 2004 Act (appeal), after “89(1)” insert “, (3A)”.

(7) In section 92ZA(1)(a)(ii) of the 2004 Act (duty to note refusals and removals), after “89(1)” insert “, (3A)”.

(8) In section 92A(1)(b) of the 2004 Act (the Letting Code), after “person” where it first occurs insert “(other than a registered letting agent)”.
(9) In section 101 of the 2004 Act (interpretation of Part 8), after the definition of “registered” insert—

“‘registered letting agent’ has the meaning given by section 29(3) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2014 (asp 00),”.

51 Meaning of letting agency work

(1) For the purposes of this Part, “letting agency work” means things done by a person in the course of that person’s business in response to relevant instructions which are—

(a) carried out with a view to a landlord who is a relevant person entering into, or seeking to enter into a lease or occupancy arrangement by virtue of which an unconnected person may use the landlord’s house as a dwelling, or

(b) for the purpose of repairing, maintaining, improving, insuring or otherwise managing a house which is, or is to be, subject to a lease or arrangement mentioned in paragraph (a).

(2) In subsection (1)—

(a) “relevant instructions” are instructions received from a person in relation to the house which is, or is to be, subject to a lease or arrangement mentioned in subsection (1)(a), and

(b) “house”, “landlord”, “occupancy arrangement”, “unconnected person”, “relevant person” and “use as a dwelling” are to be construed in accordance with section 101 of the 2004 Act.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify the meaning of “letting agency work” for the time being in this section.

52 Interpretation of Part 4

In this Part—

“letting agent registration number” has the meaning given by section 32(1),

“letting agent” means a person who carries out letting agency work,

“letting agent enforcement order” has the meaning given by section 43(7),

“register” has the meaning given by section 26(1),

“registered letting agent” has the meaning given by section 29(3).

PART 5

MOBILE HOME SITES WITH PERMANENT RESIDENTS

General application

53 Licensing of sites for permanent residents

(1) In section 32(1) of the 1960 Act (application of Part 1 to Scotland), after paragraph (l) insert—

“(m) the modifications in Part 1A.”.

(2) After section 32 of the 1960 Act, insert—
“PART 1A

 LICENSING OF RELEVANT PERMANENT SITES IN SCOTLAND

 General application

32A Licences under Part 1A

(1) Subject to the modifications mentioned in subsection (2), Part 1 applies in relation to—

(a) a relevant permanent site as it applies to a caravan site within the meaning of section 1(4),

(b) a relevant permanent site application as it applies in relation to an application for a site licence under Part 1, and

(c) a site licence issued or renewed under this Part (a “Part 1A site licence”) as it applies to a site licence within the meaning of section 1(1).

(2) The modifications are—

(a) the offence in section 1 does not apply to the holder of a Part 1A site licence in relation to that person’s use of the relevant permanent site which is the subject of the licence,

(b) sections 3 and 6 do not apply in relation to a relevant permanent site application,

(c) sections 4 and 9 do not apply in relation to a Part 1A site licence, and

(d) the further modifications in this Part.”.

54 Relevant permanent site application

After section 32A of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 53(2)), insert—

32B Relevant permanent site application

(1) A relevant permanent site application may be made by the occupier of land to the local authority in whose area the land is situated.

(2) A relevant permanent site application must—

(a) be in writing and in such format as is determined by the local authority,

(b) specify the land in respect of which the application is made,

(c) include information specified in regulations made under section 32N, and

(d) include any information relevant to the material falling within section 32O(2) in relation to—

(i) the applicant,

(ii) any person to be appointed by the applicant to manage the site, and

(iii) any other person whom the local authority is required to be satisfied is a fit and proper person in accordance with section 32D(1)(b) or (2)(b).
(3) An applicant must, either at the time of making the application or subsequently, give to the local authority such other information as the authority may reasonably require.

32C Fee for relevant permanent site application

(1) A relevant permanent site application must be accompanied by a fee of such amount (if any) as the relevant local authority may fix.

(2) An authority may fix different fees for different applications or types of application.

(3) A fee fixed by an authority must not exceed an amount which it considers represents the reasonable costs of an authority in deciding a relevant permanent site application.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations subject to the negative procedure make provision about the charging of fees under subsection (1).

(5) Regulations made under subsection (4) may in particular—

\begin{itemize}
  \item provide for the fee not to exceed such amount as may be prescribed by the regulations, \item specify matters to be taken into account by an authority when fixing a fee.
\end{itemize}

55 Issue, renewal, transfer and transmission of a Part 1A site licence

After section 32C of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 54), insert—

“32D Issue and renewal of a Part 1A site licence

(1) A local authority may issue a Part 1A site licence if—

\begin{itemize}
  \item the applicant is, when the Part 1A site licence is issued, entitled to the benefit of planning permission for the use of the land as a relevant permanent site otherwise than by a development order, and \item the authority is satisfied—
    \begin{itemize}
      \item that the applicant is a fit and proper person to hold a site licence,
      \item in the case where an applicant is not a natural person, that the individual who holds the most senior position within the management structure of the relevant partnership, company or body is a fit and proper person in relation to a site licence,
      \item that any person to be appointed by the applicant to manage the site is a fit and proper person to do so, and \item in the case where a person to be appointed by the applicant to manage the site is not a natural person, that any individual who is to be directly concerned with the management of the site on behalf of that manager is a fit and proper person to do so.
    \end{itemize}
\end{itemize}

(2) A local authority must renew a Part 1A site licence if—

\begin{itemize}
  \item the applicant is, when the Part 1A site licence is renewed, entitled to the benefit of planning permission for the use of the land as a relevant permanent site otherwise than by a development order, and
(b) the authority is satisfied—

(i) that the applicant is a fit and proper person to hold a site licence,

(ii) in the case where an applicant is not a natural person, that the individual who holds the most senior position within the management structure of the relevant partnership, company or body is a fit and proper person in relation to a site licence,

(iii) that any person appointed, or to be appointed, by the applicant to manage the site is a fit and proper person to do so, and

(iv) in the case where a person appointed, or to be appointed, by the applicant to manage the site is not a natural person, that any individual who is, or is to be, directly concerned with the management of the site on behalf of that manager is a fit and proper person to do so.

(3) The local authority must not issue a Part 1A site licence to a person whom the local authority knows has held a site licence which has been revoked under this Act less than 3 years before that time.

(4) Before refusing to issue or renew a Part 1A site licence, the authority must give to the applicant a notice stating that—

(a) it is considering refusing the application and its reasons for doing so, and

(b) the applicant has the right to make written representations to the authority before the date which is specified in the notice (such date to be at least 28 days after the date on which the notice is given).

(5) In making its decision under this section the local authority must consider the application and any representations made in accordance with subsection (4)(b).

32E Application to transfer a Part 1A site licence

(1) This section applies where, under section 10(1), the holder of a Part 1A site licence seeks the consent of the local authority for the transfer of the licence to a person who is to become the occupier of the relevant permanent site (in this section the “transferee”).

(2) The local authority may refuse consent to the transfer on the ground that the authority is not satisfied—

(a) that the transferee is a fit and proper person to hold a site licence,

(b) in the case where the transferee is not a natural person, that the individual who holds the most senior position within the management structure of the relevant partnership, company or body is a fit and proper person in relation to a site licence,

(c) that any person to be appointed by the transferee to manage the site is a fit and proper person to do so, and

(d) in the case where a person to be appointed by the transferee to manage the site is not a natural person, that any individual who is to be directly concerned with the management of the site on behalf of that manager is a fit and proper person to do so.
32F Time limit for determining application

(1) This section applies where a person—

(a) makes a relevant permanent site application to a local authority in accordance with section 32B, or

(b) makes an application for consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E.

(2) The local authority must determine the application under section 32D or, as the case may be, sections 10 and 32E within 12 months of receiving the application.

(3) The period mentioned in subsection (2) may be extended by the sheriff, on summary application by the local authority, by such period as the sheriff thinks fit.

(4) The sheriff may not extend a period unless the local authority applies for the extension before the period expires.

(5) The applicant is entitled to be a party to any proceedings on such summary application.

(6) The sheriff’s decision on such summary application is final.

(7) If the local authority does not determine a relevant permanent site application within the period required by this section—

(a) the authority is to be treated as having issued a Part 1A site licence, on the day by which the authority was required to determine the application, and

(b) the relevant person is for all purposes to be treated as having been issued a Part 1A site licence by the local authority under section 32D.

(8) If the local authority does not determine an application for consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E within the period required by this section, the authority is to be treated as having given its consent to the transfer on the day on which the application was made.

32G Local authority power to transfer licence where no application

(1) This section applies where—

(a) the holder of a Part 1A site licence does not seek the consent of the local authority for the transfer of the licence under section 10(1), and

(b) it appears to the authority that the licence holder is no longer the occupier of the relevant permanent site.

(2) The local authority may transfer the licence to a person whom the authority considers to be the occupier of the relevant permanent site (in this section the “transferee”).
(3) Before deciding to transfer the licence under subsection (2), the authority must give to the licence holder and the transferee a notice stating that—

(a) it is considering transferring the licence to the transferee under this section and its reasons for doing so, and

(b) the licence holder and the transferee each have the right to make written representations to the authority before the date which is specified in the notice (such date to be at least 28 days after the date on which the notice is given).

(4) In making its decision under this section the local authority must consider any representations made in accordance with subsection (3)(b).

(5) The licence holder and the transferee must give to the local authority such information as the authority may reasonably require in order to make a decision under this section.

(6) It is an offence for a person to knowingly or recklessly provide information which is false or misleading in a material respect to a local authority in purported compliance with a request under subsection (5).

(7) A person who commits an offence under subsection (6) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

32H Transfer of Part 1A site licences on death: relevant permanent sites

Where a Part 1A site licence is transferred to a person in accordance with section 10(4), that person must give to the local authority such information as the authority may reasonably require in order to make a determination under section 32L.

32I Notification of decision on Part 1A site licence

(1) A local authority must, as soon as practicable after making a decision mentioned in subsection (2), notify the persons mentioned in subsection (3) of—

(a) the making of the decision, and

(b) the right to appeal under section 32M.

(2) The decisions are—

(a) the determination of a relevant permanent site application,

(b) the determination of an application for consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E,

(c) the decision to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32G.

(3) The persons are—

(a) in the case of a determination of a relevant permanent site application, the applicant,

(b) in the case of a determination of an application for consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E, the applicant and the transferee,
(c) in the case of a decision of the local authority to transfer a licence under section 32G, the previous holder of the Part 1A site licence and the transferee.”.

56 Duration of a Part 1A site licence

After section 32I of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 55), insert—

“32J Duration of a Part 1A site licence

(1) A Part 1A site licence—

(a) comes into operation at the time specified in or determined under the licence, and

(b) unless terminated by its revocation, continues in force until—

(i) the licence holder is not entitled to the benefit of planning permission for the use of the land as a caravan site, or any planning permission for the use of the relevant permanent site as a caravan site expires, or

(ii) if earlier, the day which is 3 years after the day on which the licence comes into operation.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may, by order subject to the affirmative procedure, amend subsection (1)(b)(ii) so as to substitute for the figure for the time being specified there a different figure.”.

57 Duty to inform local authority where change

After section 32J of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 56), insert—

“32K Duty to inform local authority where change

(1) The holder of a Part 1A site licence must notify the local authority which issued the licence—

(a) of the appointment of any new person to manage the site, and

(b) if, in consequence of a change of circumstances, any information provided by the licence holder to the local authority by virtue of this Part becomes inaccurate.

(2) The notification must be made—

(a) in the case of an appointment mentioned in subsection (1)(a), no later than the day on which the appointment takes effect, and

(b) in any other case, as soon as practicable after the inaccuracy arises.

(3) The licence holder must, either at the time of notifying the local authority or subsequently, give to the authority such other information in relation to the appointment as the authority may reasonably require.”.

58 Revocation of a Part 1A site licence: fit and proper person

After section 32K of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 57), insert—

(1) A local authority which issued a Part 1A site licence may revoke the licence if the authority is satisfied—

(a) that the licence holder is not, or is no longer, a fit and proper person to hold a site licence,

(b) in the case where the licence holder is not a natural person, that the individual who holds the most senior position within the management structure of the relevant partnership, company or body is not, or is no longer, a fit and proper person in relation to a site licence,

(c) that any person appointed by the licence holder to manage the site is not, or is no longer, a fit and proper person to do so, or

(d) in the case where a person appointed by the licence holder to manage the site is not a natural person, that any individual who is directly concerned with the management of the site on behalf of that manager is not, or is no longer, a fit and proper person to do so.

(2) Where a local authority proposes to revoke a Part 1A site licence under this section, the authority must serve on the licence holder a notice stating that—

(a) it is considering revoking the licence under this section and its reasons for doing so, and

(b) the licence holder has the right to make written representations to the authority before the date which is specified in the notice (such date to be at least 28 days after the date on which the notice is given).

(3) In making its decision under this section the local authority must consider any representations made in accordance with subsection (2)(b).

(4) Where a local authority revokes a licence under this section, the authority must serve on the person who held the licence a notice which—

(a) states that the authority has revoked the licence and its reasons for doing so,

(b) explains the right of appeal conferred by section 32M.”.

After section 32L of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 58), insert—

“32M Appeals relating to a Part 1A site licence

(1) A person mentioned in subsection (2) may by summary application appeal to the sheriff against—

(a) the refusal by the local authority to issue or renew a Part 1A site licence following a relevant permanent site application,

(b) the determination by the local authority of an application for consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E,

(c) the decision by the local authority to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32G,

(d) the decision by the local authority to revoke a Part 1A site licence under section 32L.

(2) The persons are—
(a) in the case of a determination of a relevant permanent site application, the applicant,
(b) in the case of a determination of an application for consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E—
   (i) the applicant,
   (ii) the transferee,
(c) in the case of a decision by the local authority to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32G—
   (i) the previous holder of the Part 1A site licence,
   (ii) the transferee,
(d) in the case of a decision of the local authority to revoke a Part 1A site licence under section 32L, the person who held the licence.”.

60  Power to make provision in relation to procedure

After section 32M of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 59), insert—

“32N  Power to make provision in relation to procedure

(1) The Scottish Ministers may, by regulations subject to the negative procedure, make provision in relation to—

(a) the procedure to be followed for a relevant permanent site application,
(b) the procedure to be followed for the seeking of consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E,
(c) the procedure to be followed for the transfer of a licence mentioned in section 32H,
(d) appeals under section 32M.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may in particular make provision for or in connection with—

(a) the procedure to be followed by the person making an application for—
   (i) a new Part 1A site licence,
   (ii) the renewal of an existing Part 1A site licence which is due to expire,
   (iii) consent to transfer a Part 1A site licence,
(b) the procedure to be followed by a person following the transfer of a licence,
(c) the information to be provided in relation to an application mentioned in paragraph (a) or a transfer mentioned in section 32H,
(d) the procedure to be followed in determining an application mentioned in paragraph (a) or in considering a transfer mentioned in section 32H,
(e) the procedure to be followed after an application mentioned in paragraph (a) is determined or a transfer mentioned in section 32H is considered, and
(f) the circumstances in which a notification under section 32I must include the reasons for making the decision,

(g) the time limits applying in relation to—
   (i) an application,
   (ii) a transfer,
   (iii) the determination or consideration by the authority, and
   (iv) appeals,

(h) the procedure to be followed by the person making an appeal,

(i) the determination and consequences of an appeal.”.

Fit and proper persons

61 Fit and proper person considerations

After section 32N of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 60), insert—

32O Fit and proper person considerations

(1) In deciding under this Part if a person is a fit and proper person, the local authority must have regard to all of the circumstances of the case, including any material falling within subsections (2) to (5).

(2) Material falls within this subsection if it shows that the person has—

   (a) been convicted of an offence—
      (i) involving fraud or other dishonesty,
      (ii) involving violence,
      (iii) involving drugs,
      (iv) involving firearms,
      (v) which is a sexual offence within the meaning of section 210A(10) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46),

   (b) practised unlawful discrimination on the grounds of any of the protected characteristics in Part 2 of the Equality Act 2010 (c.15),

   (c) contravened any provision of—
      (i) the law relating to caravans,
      (ii) the law relating to housing,
      (iii) landlord and tenant law,

   (d) engaged in antisocial behaviour within the meaning of section 143 of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 8),

   (e) breached the conditions of a site licence issued under Part 1 or Part 1A of this Act.

(3) Material falls within this subsection if it relates to the failure by a person to provide information which that person is required to give to the local authority in accordance with this Part.
(4) Material falls within this subsection if it relates to a complaint made by a person of which the local authority is aware about antisocial behaviour within the meaning of section 143 of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 8) on the relevant permanent site.

(5) Material falls within this subsection if it is material of which the local authority is aware as a result of any other function carried out by the authority and it appears to the authority to be relevant to the question of whether the person is a fit and proper person.

(6) The Scottish Ministers may, by order subject to the affirmative procedure, modify this section by adding to, removing or varying any material in subsections (2) to (5).”.

62 Fit and proper person: criminal conviction certificate

After section 32O of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 61), insert—

“32P Fit and proper person: criminal conviction certificate

(1) A local authority may, in deciding under this Part if a person is a fit and proper person, require the person in respect of whom the decision is being made to provide the local authority with a criminal conviction certificate (within the meaning of section 112 of the Police Act 1997 (c.50)).

(2) A local authority may require a criminal conviction certificate to be provided under subsection (1) only if it has reasonable grounds to suspect that the information provided under this Part in relation to material falling within section 32O(2) is, or has become, inaccurate.”.

Offences relating to relevant permanent sites

63 Offences relating to relevant permanent sites

After section 32P of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 62), insert—

“32Q Offences relating to relevant permanent sites

False or misleading information provided to an authority

(1) It is an offence for a person to knowingly or recklessly provide information which is false or misleading in a material respect to a local authority in purported compliance with—

(a) a requirement under section 32B,
(b) a requirement under section 32E(3),
(c) a requirement under section 32H,
(d) a requirement under section 32K.

(2) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

32R Relevant permanent sites: use without a licence

(1) It is an offence for the occupier of land to cause or permit that land to be used as a relevant permanent site unless—
(a) the occupier is the holder of a Part 1A site licence in relation to the site, or
(b) subsection (2) or (3) applies to that person.

(2) This subsection applies to a person from the day on which the person makes a relevant permanent site application to a local authority in accordance with section 32B until—

(a) that application is determined under section 32D,
(b) in the case of a refusal by the authority to issue or renew a Part 1A site licence under that section, the day on which the period during which the applicant may make an appeal under section 32M(1)(a) expires without an appeal being made, or
(c) where such an appeal is made, the day on which it is finally determined or abandoned.

(3) This subsection applies to a person from the day on which the person’s Part 1A site licence is revoked under section 32L until—

(a) the day on which the period during which the person can make an appeal under section 32M(1)(d) expires without an appeal being made, or
(b) where such an appeal is made, the day on which it is finally determined or abandoned.

(4) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50,000.

32S Relevant permanent sites: breach of licence conditions

(1) It is an offence for the holder of a Part 1A site licence to fail to comply with any condition of a Part 1A site licence issued in relation to the site.

(2) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £10,000.

32T Power to vary maximum fine

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order substitute a new amount for the amount in—

(a) section 32R(4),
(b) section 32S(2),
(c) section 32V(3).

(2) An order under subsection (1) is subject to the affirmative procedure.”.

Local authority enforcement at relevant permanent sites

35 64 Improvement notices

After section 32T of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 63), insert—
32U  Breach of licence condition: improvement notice

(1) If it appears to a local authority which issued a Part 1A site licence that the licence holder is failing or has failed to comply with a condition of the Part 1A site licence, the authority may serve an improvement notice on the licence holder.

(2) An improvement notice is a notice which—
   (a) sets out the condition in question and details of the failure to comply with it,
   (b) requires the licence holder to take such steps as the local authority considers appropriate and as are specified in the notice in order to ensure that that condition is complied with,
   (c) specifies the period within which those steps must be taken,
   (d) explains the right of appeal conferred by subsection (3).

(3) The holder of a Part 1A site licence who has been served with an improvement notice may by summary application appeal to the sheriff against—
   (a) the issue of that notice,
   (b) the terms of that notice.

(4) A local authority may—
   (a) suspend an improvement notice,
   (b) revoke an improvement notice,
   (c) vary an improvement notice by extending the period specified in the notice under subsection (2)(c).

(5) The power to suspend, revoke or vary an improvement notice is exercisable by the local authority—
   (a) on an application made by the licence holder, or
   (b) on the authority's own initiative.

(6) Where a local authority suspends, revokes or varies an improvement notice, the authority must notify the licence holder to whom the notice relates of the decision as soon as is reasonably practicable.

32V  Improvement notice: offence

(1) It an offence for a licence holder who has been served with an improvement notice to fail to take the steps specified in the notice within the period so specified, unless subsection (2) applies to that person.

(2) This subsection applies to a person from the day on which the person is served with an improvement notice until—
   (a) the day on which the period during which the person may make an appeal under section 32U(3) expires without an appeal being made, or
   (b) where such an appeal is made, the day on which it is finally determined or abandoned.
(3) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £10,000.

(4) In proceedings against a licence holder for an offence under subsection (1), it is a defence that the licence holder had a reasonable excuse for failing to take the steps referred to in subsection (1) within the period referred to in that subsection.

32W Local authority power to carry out steps in an improvement notice

(1) This section applies where—

(a) an improvement notice has been served in relation to a relevant permanent site, and

(b) the licence holder fails to take the steps specified in the notice within the period so specified.

(2) The local authority which issued the improvement notice may—

(a) take any steps required by the improvement notice to be taken by the occupier, but which have not been so taken, and

(b) take such further action as the authority considers appropriate for ensuring that the condition specified in the improvement notice is complied with.

(3) Where a local authority proposes to take action under subsection (2), the authority must serve on the occupier of the relevant permanent site a notice which—

(a) identifies the land and the improvement notice to which it relates,

(b) states that the authority intends to enter onto the land,

(c) describes the action the authority intends to take on the land,

(d) if the person whom the authority proposes to authorise to take the action on its behalf is not an officer of the authority, states the name of that person, and

(e) sets out the dates and times on which it is intended that the action will be taken (in particular, when the authority intends to start taking the action and when it expects the action to be completed).

(4) The notice must be served sufficiently in advance of when the local authority intends to enter onto the land as to give the occupier of the relevant permanent site reasonable notice of the intended entry.”.

65 Penalty notices

After section 32W of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 64), insert—

“32X Penalty notice where no licence or breach of licence

(1) A local authority may serve a penalty notice on the occupier of a relevant permanent site if it appears to the local authority that the occupier—

(a) has caused or permitted the relevant permanent site to be used as a caravan site without being the holder of a Part 1A site licence in relation to the site, or has been served with an improvement notice and has failed to take the steps specified in the notice within the period so specified.

(2) A penalty notice is a notice which—

(a) sets out the condition in question and details of the failure to comply with it,

(b) explains the effect of subsection (3),

(c) specifies the period within which the penalty applies,

(d) explains the right of appeal conferred by subsection (6).

(3) Where a penalty notice is served under this section—

(a) no amount which a person is required to pay to the occupier of the relevant permanent site in respect of—

(i) the right to station a caravan on the site,

(ii) rent for the occupation of a caravan on the site,

(iii) the use of the common areas of the site and their maintenance, or

(iv) the use of gas, electricity, water and sewerage or other services on the site, is payable for the period specified in the notice under subsection (2)(c), and

(b) no commission on sale payable in accordance with paragraph 8 of Part 1 of Schedule 1 to the Mobile Homes Act 1983 (c.34) is payable to the occupier of the relevant permanent site in respect of a caravan on the site for the period specified in the notice under subsection (2)(c).

(4) The local authority must, as soon as practicable after serving a notice under this section and in such manner as it thinks fit, notify the occupiers of caravans on the site of the existence of the notice.

(5) The ways in which a notification under subsection (4) may be carried out include by fixing a notice in a prominent place at or near the main entrance to the relevant permanent site.

(6) The occupier of a relevant permanent site in respect of which a local authority has served a penalty notice may, within the period of 28 days beginning with the day on which the notice was served, by summary application appeal to the sheriff against the decision.”.

66 Appointment of interim manager

After section 32X of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 65), insert—

“32Y Power to appoint interim manager

(1) A local authority which has issued a Part 1A site licence may apply to the sheriff for an order appointing an interim manager of the site.

(2) An order may be granted by the sheriff if—

(a) the authority has refused to renew a Part 1A site licence under section 32D,

(b) the authority has revoked a Part 1A site licence under section 32L, or
(e) the sheriff is satisfied that—
   (i) the licence holder is failing or has failed, either seriously or repeatedly, to comply with a condition of the Part 1A site licence, (ii) the site is not being managed by a person who is a fit and proper person to manage the site, or
   (iii) there is no one managing the site.

(3) The appointment of an interim manager is to be on terms (including as to remuneration and expenses) specified in, or determined in accordance with, the appointment.

(4) The interim manager has—
   (a) any power specified in the appointment, and
   (b) any other power in relation to the management of the site required by the interim manager for the purposes specified in the appointment (including the power to enter into agreements and take other action on behalf of the occupier of the site).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations subject to the negative procedure make further provision about the appointment of an interim manager.

(6) Regulations under subsection (5) may, in particular, make provision in relation to—
    (a) the procedure to be followed in making an application,
    (b) the powers of an interim manager,
    (c) property which vests in the interim manager on the interim manager’s appointment,
    (d) the qualifications that must be held by any person appointed as interim manager,
    (e) the actions that must be carried out by an interim manager during and after the manager’s appointment,
    (f) the payment and recovery of the remuneration and expenses of the interim manager,
    (g) the assistance to be provided to the interim manager by the licence holder and other persons,
    (h) powers of entry to the relevant permanent site,
    (i) criminal offences which are to apply to failures to comply with the regulations,
    (j) the procedure for and consequences of the termination of the interim manager’s appointment.”.

67 Emergency action

After section 32Y of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 66), insert—

“32Z Power to take emergency action

(1) A local authority which has issued a Part 1A site licence may take emergency action in relation to the site concerned if it appears to the authority that—
Part 5—Mobile home sites with permanent residents

(a) the licence holder is failing or has failed to comply with a condition for the time being attached to the Part 1A site licence, and

(b) as a result of that failure there is an imminent risk of serious harm to the health or safety of any person who is or may be on the land.

(2) A local authority in whose area land is being used as a relevant permanent site may take emergency action in relation to the land concerned if it appears to the authority that—

(a) the occupier is causing or permitting that land to be used as a relevant permanent site,

(b) the occupier does not hold a Part 1A site licence in relation to the land, and

(c) there is an imminent risk of serious harm to the health or safety of any person who is or may be on the land.

(3) The emergency action a local authority may take is such action as appears to the authority to be necessary to remove the imminent risk of serious harm mentioned in subsection (1)(b) or, as the case may be, subsection (2)(c).

(4) Where a local authority proposes to take emergency action, the authority must serve on the licence holder or, as the case may be, the occupier of the relevant permanent site an emergency action notice.

(5) An emergency action notice is a notice which—

(a) identifies the land to which it relates,

(b) states that the authority intends to enter onto the land,

(c) describes the emergency action the authority intends to take on the land,

(d) if the person whom the authority proposes to authorise to take the action on its behalf is not an officer of the authority, states the name of that person, and

(e) specifies the powers under this section and section 26 as the powers under which the authority intends to enter onto the land.

(6) An emergency action notice may state that, if entry onto the land were to be refused, the authority would propose to apply for a warrant under section 26(2).

(7) The local authority must serve on the licence holder or, as the case may be, the occupier of the relevant permanent site an emergency action report within the period of 7 days beginning with the date when the authority starts taking the emergency action.

(8) An emergency action report is a notice which—

(a) describes the imminent risk of serious harm to the health or safety of persons who are or may be on the land,

(b) describes the emergency action which has been, and any emergency action which is to be, taken by the authority on the land,

(c) sets out when the authority started taking the emergency action and when the authority expects it to be completed,
(d) if the person whom the authority has authorised to take the action on its behalf is not an officer of the authority, states the name of that person, and

(e) explains the right of appeal conferred by subsection (10).

(9) The ways in which an emergency action notice and an emergency action report may be served include by fixing it in a prominent place at or near the main entrance to the relevant permanent site.

(10) A licence holder or, as the case may be, an occupier of land in respect of which a local authority has taken or is taking emergency action may by summary application appeal to the sheriff against the taking of the action by the authority.

(11) The grounds on which the appeal may be brought are—

(a) that there was no imminent risk of serious harm as mentioned in subsection (1)(b) or, as the case may be, subsection (2)(c) (or, where the action is still being taken, that there is no such risk),

(b) that the action the authority has taken was not necessary to remove the imminent risk of serious harm mentioned in subsection (1)(b) or, as the case may be, subsection (2)(c) (or, where the action is still being taken, that it is not necessary to remove the risk).”.

68 Powers of entry

After section 32Z of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 67), insert—

“32Z1 Powers of entry in relation to relevant permanent site

(1) Section 26 (as modified by section 32) applies in relation to a relevant permanent site—

(a) as if after every reference to “this Part” there were inserted “or Part 1A”,

(b) as if after paragraph (a) of subsection (1) there were inserted—

“(aa) for the purpose of inspecting a relevant permanent site,”, and

(c) subject to the further modifications in this section.

(2) If, under an improvement notice or an emergency action notice, a local authority authorises a person other than an officer of the authority to take the action on its behalf, the reference in section 26(1) to an authorised officer of the local authority is to be read as including that person.

(3) In its application to an improvement notice, the requirement in section 26(1) to give 24 hours’ notice of the intended entry applies only in relation to the day on which the local authority intends to start taking the action on the relevant permanent site.

(4) In its application to an emergency action notice, section 26(1) has effect as if—

(a) the words “at all reasonable hours” were omitted, and

(b) the words from “Provided that” to the end were omitted.”.
69 Recovery of inspection and enforcement expenses

After section 32Z1 of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 68), insert—

"32Z2 Expenses of issuing notices

(1) This section applies where a local authority has served—

(a) an improvement notice,

(b) a penalty notice,

(c) an emergency action notice, or

(d) an emergency action report.

(2) The local authority may recover from the licence holder or, as the case may be, the occupier of the relevant permanent site—

(a) expenses incurred by the authority in deciding whether to serve the notice or report,

(b) expenses incurred by the authority in preparing and serving the notice or report, and

(c) interest, at such reasonable rate as the authority may determine, in respect of the period beginning on a date specified by the authority until the whole amount is paid.

(3) The expenses referred to in subsection (2) include in particular the costs of obtaining expert advice (including legal advice).

32Z3 Expenses of taking action under improvement notice or emergency action notice

(1) A local authority which has taken action in accordance with an improvement notice or an emergency action notice may recover from the licence holder or, as the case may be, the occupier of the relevant permanent site—

(a) expenses incurred by the authority in deciding whether to take the action,

(b) expenses incurred by the authority in taking the action, and

(c) interest, at such reasonable rate as the authority may determine, in respect of the period beginning on a date specified by the authority until the whole amount is paid.

(2) The expenses referred to in subsection (1) include in particular the costs of obtaining expert advice (including legal advice).

32Z4 Expenses of local authority in relation to Part 1A licences

The local authority which issued a Part 1A site licence may require the licence holder to pay the amount of any expenses incurred by the authority in relation to—

(a) inspecting a relevant permanent site for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is, or has been, any contravention of the provisions of this Act,

(b) assessing or investigating compliance by the licence holder with the provisions of this Act following an inspection."
Miscellaneous

Part 1A of the 1960 Act: miscellaneous provision

After section 32Z4 of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 69), insert—

“Miscellaneous

32Z5 Interpretation of Part 1A

(1) In this Part—

“emergency action notice” has the meaning given by section 32Z(5),

“emergency action report” has the meaning given by section 32Z(8),

“excepted permission” means a permission (by virtue of planning permission or a site licence under Part 1) to station a caravan on the land for human habitation all year round, if the caravan is, or is to be, authorised to be occupied by—

(a) the occupier,

(b) a person employed by the occupier but who does not occupy the caravan under an agreement to which section 1(1) of the Mobile Homes Act 1983 (c.34) applies,

“improvement notice” has the meaning given by section 32U(2),

“licence holder” means the person holding the Part 1A site licence,

“penalty notice” has the meaning given by section 32X(2),

“planning permission” means planning permission under Part 3 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1997 (c.8),

“relevant permanent site” means land in respect of which a site licence is required under Part 1, other than land for which the relevant planning permission or the site licence—

(a) is expressed to be granted for holiday use only,

(b) is otherwise so expressed or subject to conditions that there are times of the year when no caravan may be stationed on the land for human habitation, or

(c) would meet the conditions in paragraph (a) or (b) if any excepted permission is disregarded,

“relevant permanent site application” means, irrespective of the conditions in the relevant planning permission, an application for the issue or renewal of a Part 1A site licence authorising the use of land as a caravan site, other than an application for a licence—

(a) to be expressed to be granted for holiday use only,

(b) to be otherwise so expressed or subject to conditions that there will be times of the year when no caravan may be stationed on the land for human habitation, or
(c) which would meet the conditions in paragraph (a) or (b) if any part of the application for excepted permission were disregarded.

(2) Any reference in this Part to the sheriff is to the sheriff having jurisdiction in the place where the relevant permanent site is situated.

(3) Otherwise, words and expressions (as modified by section 32) have the same meaning in this Part as in Part 1.

32Z6 Agreements to which Mobile Homes Act 1983 applies

(1) A decision of a local authority mentioned in subsection (2) has no effect on an agreement to which the Mobile Homes Act 1983 (c.34) applies.

(2) The decisions are—

(a) a refusal to issue or renew a Part 1A site licence under section 32D,

(b) a revocation of a Part 1A site licence under section 32L.”.

71 Transitional provision for existing site licences

(1) This section applies to a site licence issued under the 1960 Act which—

(a) was issued before the day on which section 56 comes into force in respect of land which is a relevant permanent site,

(b) is in force on that day.

(2) The site licence continues in force until the earliest of—

(a) the end of the period of 2 years beginning with the day on which section 56 comes into force,

(b) the day on which the licence is revoked under, or expires in accordance with, the provisions of the 1960 Act, or

(c) the day on which a Part 1A site licence is issued in relation to the site.

(3) During the period for which a site licence continues in force under this section, the provisions of Part 1A of the 1960 Act do not apply to the site licence or in respect of the land which is a relevant permanent site.

(4) In this section, “Part 1A site licence” and “relevant permanent site” have the same meanings as in section 32Z5 of the 1960 Act (as inserted by section 70).

PART 6

PRIVATE HOUSING CONDITIONS

72 Tenement management scheme

(1) In the Tenements (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 11)—

(a) in section 4(14) (defined terms), after “section” insert “and section 4A”,

(b) after section 4, insert—

“4A Power of local authority to pay share of scheme costs

(1) The local authority for the area in which a tenement is situated may pay a sum representing an owner’s share of scheme costs if that owner—
(a) is unable or unwilling to do so, or
(b) cannot, by reasonable inquiry, be identified or found.

(2) But a local authority may not pay a sum representing an owner’s share of scheme costs which are attributable to a scheme decision mentioned in rule 3.1(e) of the Tenement Management Scheme.

(3) For the purposes of this section an owner’s share of any scheme costs is to be determined in accordance with—
(a) the Tenement Management Scheme as it applies to the owner’s tenement, or
(b) where a tenement burden provides that the entire liability for those scheme costs (in so far as liability for those costs is not to be met by someone other than an owner) is to be met by one or more of the owners, that burden.

(4) Before making a payment under this section, the local authority must notify the owner who has failed to pay a share of any scheme costs.

(5) The local authority may recover from the owner who failed to pay a share of any scheme costs any—
(a) payments made under this section, and
(b) administrative expenses incurred by it in connection with the making of the payment.

(6) This section is without prejudice to any entitlement to recover sums in accordance with section 11 or 12.”,

CONTENTS

As required under Rule 9.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, the following documents are published to accompany the Housing (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013:

- Explanatory Notes;
- a Financial Memorandum;
- a Scottish Government Statement on legislative competence; and
- the Presiding Officer’s Statement on legislative competence.

A Policy Memorandum is printed separately as SP Bill 41–PM.
EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

1. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament.

2. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

3. In these notes:
   - “the 1960 Act” means the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 (c.62)
   - “the 1974 Act” means the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 (c.38)
   - “the 1983 Act” means the Mobile Homes Act 1983 (c.34)
   - “the 1984 Act” means the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 (c.58)
   - “the Defects Act” means the Housing Defects Act 1984 (c.50)
   - “the 1987 Act” means the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 (c.26)
   - “the 1988 Act” means the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 (c.43)
   - “the 1995 Act” means the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46)
   - “the 2001 Act” means the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 (asp 10)
   - “the 2004 Act” means the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 8)
   - “the Tenements Act” means the Tenements (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 11)
   - “the 2006 Act” means the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 (asp 1)
   - “the 2010 Act” means the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 (asp 17)
   - “the 2011 Act” means the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 (asp 8)
   - “the Tribunals Bill” means the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, introduced on 9th May 2013.

THE BILL

4. The purpose of the Housing (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) is to provide additional protection for tenants in the private rented sector and permanent residents of mobile home sites; to support improvements in housing quality in the private rented and privately-owned sectors; to make better use of the existing stock of social rented homes; and to provide more efficient access to justice for landlords and tenants in the private rented sector.
5. A more detailed explanation of the Bill’s purpose can be found in the Policy Memorandum, which also explains the thinking and policy intentions that underpin it.

THE STRUCTURE AND A SUMMARY OF THE BILL

6. The Bill is in eight Parts.
   - Part 1 contains provisions which will abolish the right to buy.
   - Part 2 makes provision in relation to social housing allocations; the extension of the term of the short Scottish secure tenancy; the right to assign or sublet a tenancy, to establish a joint tenancy and to succeed to a secure tenancy.
   - Part 3 transfers jurisdiction for civil cases relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff court to the First-tier Tribunal; makes provisions which deem a landlord as being registered on the landlord register where an application has not been determined by a local authority within 12 months; and provides third party reporting rights to the private rented housing panel for enforcement of the landlords’ repairing standard.
   - Part 4 makes provision for the registration of letting agents (including a fit and proper person test); creates an offence of operating as a letting agent without being registered; sets out the process for handling disputes between letting agents and landlords or tenants; and allows the Scottish Ministers to provide for a letting agent code of practice by regulations.
   - Part 5 makes provision for the licencing of relevant permanent sites in Scotland; (including a fit and proper person test); for offences relating to permanent sites and for local authority enforcement of statutory requirements, including powers of entry and recovery of expenses in relation to enforcement action.
   - Part 6 amends local authority powers to enforce repairs and maintenance in private homes.
   - Part 7 makes a number of miscellaneous amendments: granting the Scottish Ministers powers to exempt certain schemes, such as shared equity schemes, from the right to redeem a heritable security after 20 years in relation to private dwellings; amends the Scottish Housing Regulator’s powers to transfer assets following inquiries; and repeals provisions in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 that designate pre-cast reinforced concrete houses as defective.
   - Part 8 sets out various supplementary and final provisions.

PART ONE – RIGHT TO BUY

7. This Part repeals existing provisions on right to buy in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 (the “1987 Act”), so that right to buy is abolished for all tenants who have a Scottish secure tenancy with a relevant social landlord. Consequently, no tenant of social housing in Scotland will have the right to buy from the date of the coming into force of section 1. It also repeals provisions in the 1987 Act, the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 (“the 2001 Act”) and the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”), which are no longer required following the abolition of right to buy. In addition, it makes two amendments to the 1987 Act to ensure that changes to that Act made by the 2010 Act operate as intended until right to buy ends.

8. Section 1(1) repeals sections 61 to 81, 84 and 84A of the 1987 Act (the right to buy and associated provisions). These sections of the 1987 Act concern secure tenants’ right to buy; the procedure to follow when an application to purchase is made; circumstances in which houses provided for special purposes or liable for demolition are exempt from the right to buy; reference to the Lands Tribunal in cases of dispute; recoverability of discount; the rent to loan scheme; the powers of the Scottish Ministers in relation to right to buy; and the preservation of a tenant’s right to buy where a relevant landlord disposes of the home to a private sector landlord.

9. Section 1(2) repeals section 52 of the 2001 Act. Section 52 obliges the Scottish Ministers to report within four years of the provision coming into force on the extent to which tenants had exercised their right to buy and the effect of this on housing stock, the needs of people for, the demand for and availability of housing accommodation.

10. Section 1(3) repeals sections 145 to 147 of the 2010 Act. These sections require the Scottish Ministers to collect and publish information about right to buy sales in relation to each local authority and registered social landlord and about the number of tenants with the right to buy their house in relation to each local authority.

11. Section 2(a) amends section 61ZA(1) of the 1987 Act. Section 61ZA, inserted by section 141 of the 2010 Act, extends the range of circumstances under which the right to buy cannot be exercised to include new tenants to the social housing sector. This was intended to ensure that tenants taking up a Scottish secure tenancy for the first time (following commencement of section 141) and those returning to the social rented sector after a break would not have the right to buy the property they rent from a social landlord. This amendment to section 61ZA(1) is intended to ensure that occupation other than as a tenant before that date does not exempt a person from the new tenant provisions.

12. Section 2(b) amends section 61F of the 1987 Act. Section 61F, inserted by section 143 of the 2010 Act, extends the range of circumstances set out in sections 61A to 61E of the 1987 Act under which the right to buy cannot be exercised, to include new supply social housing (therefore exempting it from the right to buy, with some exceptions where a tenant with a Scottish secure tenancy moves to new supply social housing in circumstances outwith their control). This amendment is intended to ensure that tenants in this position have their right to buy protected, irrespective of when their tenancy was created.

13. Section 85(4) provides that the Scottish Ministers cannot appoint a date on which the right to buy will end which is less than three years from the date the Bill receives Royal Assent (in other words the Scottish Ministers cannot commence section 1(1) before the end of a three-year period from the date of Royal Assent).
PART TWO – SOCIAL HOUSING

14. Part 2 amends the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 ("the 1987 Act") and the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 ("the 2001 Act"). The changes relate to social landlords’ powers to allocate social housing and grant Scottish secure tenancies and short Scottish secure tenancies.

Allocation of social housing

Reasonable preference in allocation of social housing

15. Section 3 amends section 20 of the 1987 Act to replace the existing categories of persons to whom social landlords must give reasonable preference when allocating social housing. It states that reasonable preference in allocations must be given to persons who are homeless or threatened with homelessness and persons who are living under unsatisfactory housing conditions, in each case where that person’s housing needs are not capable of being met by other housing options which are available.

Rules on priority of allocation of housing: consultation

16. Section 4 inserts new section 20A into the 1987 Act. New section 20A requires social landlords to consult those mentioned in subsection 20A(2) and prepare and publish a report on the consultation, before determining the priority of allocation of houses held by it for housing purposes. When making or amending the allocation policy, subsection (2) amends section 21 of the 1987 Act to require social landlords to take account of any local housing strategy and any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers. Subsection (2) also enables the Scottish Ministers to make regulations subject to the affirmative procedure, which prescribe the type or description of persons whom social landlords must include in their rules governing the priority of allocation of houses. This is intended as a safeguard to ensure that categories of persons are not routinely omitted from an individual landlord’s allocation policies.

17. Section 5 amends section 20 of the 1987 Act to allow social landlords to take account of the age of the applicant in the allocation of housing. New subsection (2B) provides that social landlords must nevertheless treat the applicant as protected against age discrimination in terms of Part 2 of the Equality Act 2010.

18. Section 6 amends section 20 of the 1987 Act to ensure that social landlords take no account of the ownership of or value of heritable property owned by the applicant or by a person who lives with or who it is proposed will live with the applicant, in the limited circumstances set out in new subsection (2C). These circumstances include, for example, where a property has not been let and the owner cannot secure entry to that property or where it is probable that occupation of the property will lead to abuse from some other person residing in that property.

19. Section 7 amends section 20 and inserts new section 20B in the 1987 Act to allow social landlords to impose a minimum period before the applicant is eligible for the allocation of housing, if certain circumstances apply. A minimum period requirement cannot be placed on homeless applicants to whom the local authority has a duty to provide settled accommodation (new subsection (2)(b)). A social landlord may determine that an applicant is ineligible for the allocation of social housing if any of the circumstances in new section 20B(5) apply in relation to the applicant. Some of the circumstances also apply in relation to a person who it is proposed will reside with the applicant. The circumstances include antisocial behaviour, harassment, using a house for immoral or illegal purposes or offences punishable by imprisonment that were committed in the vicinity of the house. It provides the Scottish Ministers with the power by regulations to prescribe the maximum period preceding the application that a social landlord may consider any of the circumstances in section 20B(5). Subsection (4) also provides the Scottish Ministers with the power by regulations to prescribe a maximum period for an application to have remained in force before an applicant is eligible for housing to be allocated when a landlord imposes such a period under any of those circumstances. Subsection (8) provides applicants with a right to appeal to the sheriff against a landlord’s decision to make them ineligible for a period for the allocation of housing.

20. Section 8(2) substitutes a new subsection (2) in section 35 of the 2001 Act. New section 35(2) extends the circumstances in which a landlord may serve a notice on a tenant under subsection (3) (a notice stating that the Scottish secure tenancy becomes a short Scottish secure tenancy). The circumstances include where a tenant or person associated with the tenant has, within the period of three years preceding the date of service of the notice, acted in an antisocial manner, pursued a course of conduct amounting to harassment or a course of conduct which is otherwise antisocial in relation to another person residing in, visiting or otherwise engaged in lawful activity in the locality. New section 35(3) makes a consequential amendment to section 37(1) (conversion to a Scottish secure tenancy) of the 2001 Act.

21. New section 35(4) inserts new paragraph 2A in schedule 6 to the 2001 Act to provide that the conduct referred to in new section 34(2)(b) if carried out by the persons referred to in new paragraph 2A(2), within the period of three years preceding the date of service of the notice, is a new ground for granting applicants a short Scottish secure tenancy. It also amends paragraph 6 of schedule 6 to the 2001 Act so that the ground for granting a short Scottish secure tenancy related to accommodation for a person in receipt of housing support only applies when no other paragraph in that schedule applies and where the person is in receipt of a housing support service. New section 34(5) makes another consequential amendment to section 31(5) of the 1987 Act to include new paragraph 2A as accommodation considered to be permanent accommodation under the duties of local authorities to persons found to be homeless.

22. Section 9 creates a new ground for granting a short Scottish secure tenancy, for homeowners, where the house is to be let expressly on a temporary basis to a person who owns heritable property, or where a person who it is proposed will reside with them owns heritable property. This is to allow them to make arrangements in respect of the heritable property they own, including sale or installation of adaptations, that will allow the person’s housing needs to be met.

23. Section 10 (1) amends section 34 of the 2001 Act to give short Scottish secure tenancies granted on the grounds of antisocial behaviour or a previous eviction order a term of 12 months. Subsection (2) amends section 35 of the 2001 Act to provide that a short Scottish secure tenancy created by virtue of that section also has a term of 12 months. Subsection (3) inserts new subsection (5) and (6) into section 37 of the 2001 Act (conversion to Scottish secure tenancy) to provide that after this period, the short Scottish secure tenancy will automatically convert to a Scottish secure tenancy (unless the social landlord has taken steps to extend the short Scottish secure tenancy by a further six months or to seek repossession of the tenancy) on the term which applied before the tenancy became a short Scottish secure tenancy.

24. Section 11 inserts new section 35A in the 2001 Act to provide that the term of a short Scottish secure tenancy granted on antisocial behaviour or previous eviction grounds may be extended by a further period of six months from the date which would otherwise be the expiry day of that tenancy. Tenants must have been given two months’ notice of the extension (including the reasons for the extension) and must be being given housing support services. An extension may be required because the tenant requires support for a further period in order for the tenant to be able to sustain a Scottish secure tenancy. Subsection (2) makes consequential amendments to section 37 of the 2001 Act.

25. Section 12 amends section 36 of the 2001 Act. Section 12(a) inserts a new subparagraph (aa) in section 36(2) to provide that proceedings for recovery of possession may not be raised, in the case of short Scottish secure tenancies created by virtue of section 35 or paragraph 1, 2 or 2A of schedule 6 (those granted on antisocial behaviour or previous eviction grounds), unless the landlord considers that any obligation of the tenancy has been broken. Section 12(b) inserts a new subparagraph (aa) into section 36(3) to require landlords of such tenancies to give tenants reasons why they are seeking recovery of possession of the tenancy (including, if new subsection (2)(aa) applies, the obligations the landlord considers have been broken). This section also gives tenants a right to request that their landlord review the decision to seek recovery of possession before the case goes to court (new subsection (4A)). New subsection (4C) gives the Scottish Ministers the power by regulations to make provisions about the procedure to be followed in such reviews. Section 12(e) inserts a new subsection (8) into section 36 of the 2001 Act to allow the procedure for recovery of possession (with respect to the serving of the notice for recovery of possession) under Scottish secure tenancies to also be used with short Scottish secure tenancies so long as the tenant has been given four weeks’ notice prior to the landlord raising proceedings for recovery of possession.

26. Section 13(1) amends section 11 of the 2001 Act to introduce a 12-month qualifying period, where a person has used the house in question as the person’s only or principal home, before a person can apply to be added to a tenancy as a joint tenant. Subsection (2)(a) amends section 32 of the 2001 Act to replace a six-month qualifying period with a 12-month qualifying period before a tenant can apply to assign the tenancy to another person. The proposed assignee will also have to have lived at the property and used it as their only or principal home for 12 months before they may be assigned the property. It also introduces a 12-month qualifying period before a tenant can apply to sublet the tenancy to another person. In all cases where a qualifying period applies, the individual must have notified the landlord that they are living in the property as their only or principal home before the 12-month period begins (new subsection (1B) as inserted into section 32 by 13(2)(b)). Section 13(c) inserts new subparagraphs (f) and (g) into section 32(3) to provide new grounds for reasonable refusal of consent.
27. Section 14 amends schedule 3 to the 2001 Act for the purpose of succession to a Scottish secure tenancy. This schedule makes provision as to who are qualified persons to whom a Scottish secure tenancy passes by operation of law on the death of a tenant. Currently paragraph 2(2) of schedule 3 provides that a person living with a tenant as husband and wife or in a relationship of this character, except that they are of the same sex, is a qualified person if the house has been their only or principal home for a period of 6 months preceding the tenant’s death. Section 14(a) replaces this six month qualifying period with a 12-month qualifying period.

28. Paragraph 3 of schedule 3 is amended to provide that a member of the tenant’s family aged at least 16 years is a qualifying person for the purposes of succession to a Scottish secure tenancy, provided the house was their only or principal home throughout the 12 months ending in the tenant’s death. This is a change to the existing requirement that such a family member is a qualifying person where the house was their only or principal home at the time of the tenant’s death.

29. Paragraph 4(b) of schedule 3 is amended to provide that a carer providing, or who has provided, care for the tenant or a member of the tenant’s family where the house was the carer’s only or principal home throughout the period of 12 months ending with the tenant’s death is a qualifying person. This is a change to the existing requirement that such a carer is a qualifying person where the house was the carer’s only or principal home at the time of the tenant’s death and the carer had given up a previous only or principal home.

30. In all cases where a qualifying period applies in section 14, the individual must have notified the landlord that they are living in the property as their only or principal home before the 12-month period begins (new paragraph 4A).

31. Section 15 inserts paragraph (aa) in section 16(2) of the 2001 Act to remove a requirement that the court considers whether it is reasonable to make an order for eviction, in cases where another court has already convicted a tenant of using the house for immoral or illegal purposes or of an offence punishable by imprisonment, committed in, or in the locality of, the house. The landlord will have to have such grounds for seeking recovery of possession of the property and have, within 12 months of the tenant’s conviction or appeal, served a notice on the tenant that the landlord intends to seek recovery of possession of the property. The tenant retains a right to challenge the court action.

32. Section 16 amends schedule 2 to the 2001 Act to allow landlords to seek recovery of possession of adapted property where it has been allocated to persons who do not need adaptations. Landlords have an existing duty under section 16(2)(b) of the 2001 Act to rehouse any such persons in suitable alternative accommodation.

PART THREE – PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING

33. Part 3 makes provision in relation to the transfer of responsibility for hearing civil cases relating to the private rented sector from the Scottish courts to the Scottish Tribunals.
Transfer of sheriff's jurisdiction to First-tier Tribunal

34. Sections 17 to 21 and schedule 1 to the Bill make provision to transfer the types of civil private rented sector housing court actions specified in these provisions from the jurisdiction of the sheriff court to the jurisdiction of the First-tier Tribunal ("FTT"). These actions include repossession cases and various non-repossession related cases. The FTT is due to be established under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill ("the Tribunals Bill") which was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 9th May 2013. Provisions and powers provided in the Tribunals Bill will allow for operational detail such as the establishment of tribunal rules and appointment of members to the FTT. The Explanatory Notes in relation to this part of the Bill should, therefore, be read in conjunction with the Tribunals Bill.

35. Section 17 provides for the functions and jurisdiction of the sheriff court in relation to civil actions arising from regulated tenancies within the meaning of section 8 of the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 ("the 1984 Act"), Part VII contracts within the meaning of section 63 of the 1984 Act and assured tenancies within the meaning of section 12 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 ("the 1988 Act"), to be transferred to the FTT. This includes matters of eviction.

36. Part 1 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments to this effect.

37. Section 18(2) amends section 18 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 ("the 2006 Act") to provide that applications from a landlord or tenant for an order to exclude or modify the application of sections 14, 15 and 17 of the 2006 Act to the tenancy (with regards to the landlord’s duty to repair and maintain, and the prohibition on contracting out of the landlord’s duty to repair and maintain) are transferred from the jurisdiction of the sheriff court to the jurisdiction of the FTT.

38. Section 18(4) amends section 57 of the 2006 Act to provide that where the section applies, the FTT, as opposed to the sheriff, may order a person who prevents or obstructs another person from doing anything which that person is required, authorised or entitled to do under Part 1 of the 2006 Act, to permit that person to do all things which they are required, authorised or entitled to do.

39. Part 2 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments to this effect.

40. Section 19 inserts new section 66A into the 2006 Act. New section 66A provides the ability for tenants to appeal a landlord’s refusal of, or imposition of conditions on, consent to adapt a rented house for a disabled person or for energy efficiency. The effect of the insertion of this section is to transfer jurisdiction to the FTT.

41. Part 3 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments.

42. Section 20 provides for the jurisdiction to decide civil matters relating to landlord registration arising from the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 ("the 2004 Act")
(appeals against local authority decisions regarding landlord registration) to be transferred from the sheriff court to the FTT.

43. Part 4 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments.

44. Section 21(1)(a) provides a power for the Scottish Ministers, by regulations, to transfer jurisdiction to decide cases under section 153(2) of the 2006 Act (where a person has obstructed another person from completing an action in relation to breaches of houses in multiple occupation (“HMO”) licences or local authority amenity notices) from the sheriff to the FTT.

45. Section 21(1)(b) provides that the Scottish Ministers may also, by regulations, transfer appeals against decisions of local authorities to which section 158 of the 2006 Act applies (against decisions relating to HMOs) and applications to extend the period mentioned in paragraph 9(1) of schedule 4 to that Act and warrants for ejection under paragraph 2 of schedule 5 to that Act in relation to premises or land, from the sheriff to the FTT.

46. Section 21(2) provides that regulations under subsection (1) may also:
   - disapply section 153(2) of the 2006 Act (regarding orders in cases where a person has obstructed another person under sections 145(2), 146(2), 151 or schedule 5 of that Act) which would become appropriate if all powers to make orders in these cases have been transferred to the FTT,
   - disapply section 159(1) and paragraph 9(2) of schedule 4 to the 2006 Act (which allow any decision of a local authority in relation to HMOs to be appealed by summary application to the sheriff and the sheriff to extend the period in which a local authority must decide whether to grant or refuse an HMO licence application),
   - disapply paragraph 3(1) of schedule 5 to the 2006 Act (which relates to warrants for ejection where a person has not complied with a requirement to evacuate to allow work to be carried out), and
   - make other consequential amendments to the 2006 Act and any other enactment as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

Landlord registration

47. Part 3 of the Bill also amends the 2004 Act by including provisions for the introduction of a time limit of 12 months for the determination of landlord registration applications.

48. Section 22 inserts a new section 85B into the 2004 Act and requires that local authorities determine applications for registration (as required by section 84 of the 2004 Act) made by relevant persons under section 83 of the 2004 Act, within 12 months of receipt of the application.

49. New section 85B(3) allows a local authority to apply to the FTT for an extension to this 12 month period. The period may be extended by such a period as the FTT thinks is appropriate, but may not be extended unless the application is made before the 12 month period expires.
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

(subsection (4)). The person making the application for registration is entitled to be party to any application for an extension to the 12 month period (subsection (5)). The decision of the FTT on the application will be final (subsection (6)).

50. New section 85B(7) provides that in the event of a local authority failure to determine the landlord application within the 12 month period, authorisation is deemed to have been granted automatically by the local authority. The authority is to be treated as having entered the relevant person in the register maintained by it under section 82(1) of the 2004 Act on the day by which the authority was required to determine the application. Unless the relevant person is otherwise removed from the register in accordance with Part 8 of the 2004 Act, that person is to be treated as being removed from the register on the expiry of the period of 12 months from that date (subsection (7)(b)).

51. Where new section 85B(7) applies (where the local authority has not determined an application within 12 months of its receipt), details of the relevant person’s name and registration number must be entered in the register maintained by the authority under section 82(1) of the 2004 Act (subsection 8). Subsection (9) provides that (subject to the modifications specified in subsection (10)) the relevant person is treated for all purposes as having been registered by virtue of section 84(2)(a) of the 2004 Act (in other words, as if the authority has made a positive determination of the application). The requirement for an authority to remove the entry from the register three years from the day on which the entry is made in the register in terms of section 84(6) of the 2004 Act does not apply to deemed granted applications (in other words to those applications entered by virtue of a local authority having not determined it within 12 months of the date of receipt of the application) (subsection (10)(c)).

52. The modifications specified in subsection (10) are that in the case where an applicant does not specify the name of a person who acts for the landlord in respect of a property specified in the application under section 83(1)(c), the applicant is to be treated as being registered by virtue of section 84(3). Where an applicant specifies at least one house, and the name and address of someone acting in respect of a property specified in the application under section 83(1)(c), the applicant is to be treated as being registered by virtue of section 84(4).

53. Section 22(2) amends section 86(1)(a) of the 2004 Act so that a person entered into the register by virtue of a deemed granted application is notified of that fact as soon as practicable after the entry has been made.

Enforcement of repairing standard

54. Part 3 of the Bill also makes provision to expand access to the private rented housing panel by enabling third party applications by local authorities to enforce the repairing standard.

55. Section 23(1)(a) amends section 22 of the 2006 Act by inserting subsections (1A) and (1B), to enable a third party to apply to the private rented housing panel for a determination of whether a landlord has failed to comply with the repairing standard which is provided for in section 13 of the 2006 Act (section 14(1)(b) of the 2006 Act provides that the landlord in a tenancy must ensure that the house meets the repairing standard at all times during the tenancy).
New section 22(1B) defines such a third party applicant as a local authority, or a person specified by order by the Scottish Ministers.

56. Section 23(1)(b) amends section 22(2) of the 2006 Act to require that an application made by a third party must set out the third party applicant’s reasons for considering that the repairing standard is not met.

57. Section 23(1)(c) amends section 22(3) of the 2006 Act to provide that an application in respect of the repairing standard cannot be made unless the person making the application has informed the landlord that work needs to be carried out for the purpose of complying with the repairing standard. Section 23(1)(d) amends section 22(4) to provide that applications made under this amended section (both by tenants and by third party applicants) cannot be made if the landlord is a local authority landlord, a registered social landlord, Scottish Water or Scottish Homes.

58. New section 22(4A) as inserted by section 23(1)(e) of the Bill makes provision that the tenant of the house concerned is entitled to be a party to the determination of any application by a third party to the private rented housing panel.

59. Section 23(3) amends section 22A(1) of the 2006 Act to provide that on receipt of an application by a tenant or third party applicant (other than a local authority third party applicant), the private rented housing panel must provide the information specified in section 22A(2) to the local authority for the area in which the house is situated for the purpose of the local authority maintaining the register under section 82(1) of the 2004 Act (landlord register).

60. Section 23(4) of the Bill amends section 23 of the 2006 Act so that the processes whereby the president of the private rented housing panel decides whether to refer an application to a private rented housing committee or to reject it will also apply to applications made by a third party. Notification of rejected third party applications must be given to the third party applicant and the tenant, setting out the reasons for rejection and the procedures for appealing against it (new subsection (4A) as inserted into section 23 of the 2006 Act).

61. Section 23(5) amends section 24 of the 2006 Act so that the private rented housing committee must make a determination of applications made by a tenant or a third party as to whether the landlord has failed to comply with the repairing standard (in other words the landlord’s duty under section 14(1)(b)).

62. Section 23(6) amends section 181(2) of the 2006 Act so that rights of entry for a member of a private rented housing committee are extended to cover any house which is the subject of a third party application in respect of the repairing standard.

Procedure for third party applications

63. Section 24 amends schedule 2 to the 2006 Act so that the procedures to be adopted by a private rented housing committee in determining an application to the private rented housing panel in relation to a landlord’s failure to comply with the repairing standard (in terms of section 14(1)(b) of the 2006 Act), take account of applications made by a third party. In the case of a third party application, the third party must be notified and given the opportunity to make written or oral representations. Any changes made at the request of a third party applicant to the date by which evidence must be provided must be notified to the third party, the tenant and landlords.

64. The procedures followed by a committee in making other inquiries must include consideration of any written or oral representations, and any report about the state of the property concerned, by third party applicants (in terms of section 24(2) which amends paragraph 2 of schedule 2 to the 2006 Act).

65. The committee may cite any person to give evidence or information, including a third party applicant (in terms of section 24(3) which amends paragraph 3 of schedule 2 to the 2006 Act). No allowances or expenses are payable to the landlords, tenant, tenant or landlord representatives of third party applicants (in terms of section 24(4) which amends paragraph 5 of schedule 2 to the 2006 Act).

66. Section 24(5) also amends the procedures for recording and notification of decisions in paragraph 6 of schedule 2 to the 2006 Act, to include third party applications. Once a private rented housing committee reaches its decision it must send notification to the landlord, tenant, and any person acting for the tenant in relation to the application and the local authority, unless that authority is the third party applicant.

67. Section 24(6) amends paragraph 7(1) of schedule 2 to the 2006 Act to provide that a third party applicant may withdraw the application under new section 22A(1A) of the 2006 Act. Paragraph 7(2), however, provides that, despite the withdrawal the committee may continue to consider the case and make a repairing standard enforcement order if appropriate.

Appeals in relation to third party applications

68. Section 25(1) amends section 64 of the 2006 Act to give a third party applicant aggrieved by a decision by a private rented housing committee mentioned in subsection (4) (a) to (f) of section 64, the right to appeal such a decision to the sheriff within 21 days of notification of the decision (new subsection (4A)).

69. Section 65(2) of the 2006 Act is amended by section 25(2) to provide that the sheriff may determine appeals by third party applicants by confirming the decision, remitting the decision to the president or the private rented housing committee as the case may be for reconsideration or quashing the decision made.

70. New section 66(3A) (as inserted by section 25(3)) makes provision for the third party applicant to be a party to proceedings, and for the tenant to be entitled to be party to the proceedings, where a landlord appeals a decision relating to a third party application to the sheriff under section 64(4) of the 2006 Act.
71. Under new section 66(3B) (also as inserted by section 25(3)), where a tenant appeals a decision of a committee in respect of a third party application to the sheriff under section 64(4) of the 2006 Act, the landlord and third party applicant are to be parties to the proceedings.

72. Under new section 66(3C) (also as inserted by section 25(3)), where a third party applicant appeals to the sheriff under new section 64(4A) against a decision of the committee in relation to that application, the landlord is to be party to the proceedings and the tenant is entitled to be a party.

PART FOUR – LETTING AGENTS

73. Part 4 of the Bill makes provision to further regulate the letting agent industry in Scotland. The purpose of this part of the Bill is to help improve letting agent levels of service and professionalism, by strengthening the regulation of the industry.

74. This involves the creation of a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, with an associated ‘fit and proper person test’; and the creation of a statutory code of practice to which all letting agents must adhere. The Bill also enables the First-tier Tribunal (―FTT‖) (which is to be established under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill) to make a range of enforcement orders to provide redress for tenants and landlords in cases where a letting agent fails to comply with that code of practice.

Inclusion in the register

75. Section 26 requires the Scottish Ministers to create and maintain a national register, containing an entry for each letting agent. This will include the name and address of each person entered in the register, and any other information relating to that person the Scottish Ministers may specify in regulations. The register will be available to the public.

76. Section 27 provides that a letting agent may apply to be entered on the register, sets out the information that must be supplied as part of such an application, and makes provision for an application fee to be charged and gives the Scottish Ministers a power to determine this fee. The section should be read alongside section 39 which makes it an offence to operate as a letting agent without being entered on the register.

77. Subsection (2)(a) to (f) of section 27 sets out the information that an application must contain. These provide for what information is required depending on whether an applicant is a sole trader, a partnership, a company or a body with some other legal status. Where the applicant is not a natural person, subsection (2)(d) and (e) require certain details also to be supplied in relation to individual persons within the organisation who hold a senior or controlling position. When determining (under section 29) whether the applicant is a fit and proper person to be a registered letting agent, the Scottish Ministers may take into account information relating to these named individuals. Subsection (2)(a) to (f) should be read alongside section 28, which makes it an offence to knowingly supply false information or fail to supply the required information.
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

78. Section 28 makes it an offence to knowingly supply false information or to fail to provide the required information in an application under section 27.

79. Section 29 provides that the Scottish Ministers must determine an application which is made under section 27 and sets out aspects of the process they must follow. If they determine that the applicant is a fit and proper person to carry out letting agency work, subsection (2) provides that they must enter the applicant on the register. If the Scottish Ministers determine that the applicant is not a fit and proper person then subsection (4) provides that they must refuse to enter the applicant in the register. These provisions should be read alongside section 30 which sets out the matters that must be considered in determining if a person is a fit and proper person to carry out letting agency work. Subsection (5) provides that where the Scottish Ministers are considering refusal of an application, they must give notice of this to the applicant, including providing reasons, and allow the applicant to make representations.

80. Section 30 sets out the material that the Scottish Ministers must take into account when deciding if a person is fit and proper to be entered on the register, which includes the Scottish Ministers having regard to all of the circumstances of the case. Subsection (2) relates to particular criminal convictions and contraventions of the law that must be considered. Subsection (3) lists matters to be considered that are related to compliance with the letting agent code of practice and any associated enforcement orders. Subsection (4) provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to modify the list of convictions and contraventions at subsections (2) and (3) by order subject to the affirmative procedure.

81. Section 31 allows the Scottish Ministers to request that a person supplies a criminal record certificate if the Scottish Ministers have reason to doubt the accuracy of information relating to section 30(2). This request can be made at the time of application to the register, or at any time after a person has been entered on the register. If the request is made at the time of application, then the person cannot be entered on the register until the certificate is received by the Scottish Ministers.

Duties of registered letting agents

82. Section 32 requires the Scottish Ministers to allocate a number to each registered letting agent. Registered letting agents must take all reasonable steps to ensure that the number is included in documents sent to landlords or tenants (prospective or current), advertisements and communications, and any other material that the Scottish Ministers may specify by order. Subsection (3) defines “advertisement” and “communication”.

83. Section 33 places a duty on the registered letting agent to notify the Scottish Ministers in writing, as soon as practicable, if any of the information supplied in the application has become inaccurate due to a change in circumstances. Subsection (3) requires that any notification must be accompanied by such fee as the Scottish Ministers may determine by regulations, and subsection (3) provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to set that fee. Subsection (4) makes it an offence to fail to comply with this duty to inform.
Removal from the register

84. Section 34 provides that, unless a new application is made under section 27, the Scottish Ministers must remove a registered letting agent from the register after three years from the date of registration.

85. Section 35 provides that the Scottish Ministers may remove a registered letting agent from the register without waiting for the expiry of the three-year registration period if they no longer consider the agent to be a fit and proper person to carry out letting agency work. Subsections (2) to (4) set out aspects of the process that the Scottish Ministers must follow before removing the person, including giving notice to the agent informing the agent of the right to make representations to the Scottish Ministers.

Appeals

86. Section 36 provides for appeals to the FTT against decisions of the Scottish Ministers in relation to refusal of a registration application or removal from the register. Subsection (2) sets out the time period (21 days) for an appeal to be made following notification of the decision.

Consequences of refusal or removal

87. Section 37 provides that where a person has been refused registration, or had the registration revoked, the Scottish Ministers must publicise this fact by noting it in the register. The note must remain on the register for a period of 12 months, unless the person is subsequently entered on the register within that time, in which case the note must be removed (subsections (4) and (5)).

88. Section 38 relates to situations where a person has been removed from the register or has been refused entry to the register. It provides that such a person cannot recover any costs relating to carrying out letting agency work after having been refused entry to the register or removed from the register, and after the relevant appeal period has expired. Subsection (3) also requires the Scottish Ministers to publish as soon as practicable after the relevant date, in such manner as they think fit, a notice of the agent’s refusal or removal and of the fact that no costs are recoverable from the date of refusal or removal.

Offences where no registration

89. Section 39 makes it an offence to carry out letting agency work unless registered. Subsection (2) provides that a person is not committing an offence during the period of 21 days following the date of notification of refusal or removal from the register and during the period of the appeal process up until the appeal is decided or abandoned.

90. Section 40 makes it an offence to use a number purporting to be a letting agent registration number without being a registered letting agent. Subsection (2) again provides that the offence will only be committed following 21 days of notification of refusal or removal from the register or following any appeal having been decided or abandoned.
Code of practice

91. Section 41 provides for the establishment of a letting agent code of practice. It gives a power to the Scottish Ministers, by regulations subject to the negative procedure, to create a code which sets out the standards of practice which are required of persons who carry out letting agency work (which is defined at section 51). Before finalising the code, the Scottish Ministers must carry out consultation on a draft of it.

92. Section 42 provides that where the terms of an agreement between the letting agent and either a landlord or tenant purport to exclude or limit any duty of the letting agent under the code or impose any penalty, disability or obligation in the event of a person enforcing compliance by the agent, the terms will have no effect.

Letting agent enforcement orders

93. Section 43 provides that the route of redress where alleged breaches of the code of practice will be determined will be the FTT. Subsection (1) provides that a tenant or landlord may apply to the FTT for such a determination regarding a relevant letting agent. A “relevant” letting agent is defined at subsection (2). The purpose of this section is to make it clear the circumstances in which a tenant or landlord can raise a case with the FTT.

94. Subsection (3) provides that a landlord or tenant applying to have a case heard at the FTT under subsection (1) must specify why they believe the code has been breached by the letting agent. Subsection (4) provides that, before applying to the FTT, a tenant or landlord must tell the letting agent about the alleged breach of the code and subsection (5) provides that the FTT may reject the application if the letting agent has not been allowed a reasonable opportunity to rectify the matter.

95. Subsection (6) provides that the FTT must decide regarding an application made under subsection (1) whether a letting agent has complied with the code of practice. Subsections (7) and (8) relate to a letting agent enforcement order which must be issued if the letting agent has failed to comply with the code, and set out what the order may consist of.

96. Section 44 provides that the FTT may vary or revoke an enforcement order made under section 43.

97. Section 45 provides steps that may be taken by the FTT to establish if a letting agent enforcement order has been complied with. Subsection (2) provides that the FTT must notify the Scottish Ministers if it determines there has been a failure to comply. This allows the Scottish Ministers to take the matter into account for registration considerations under section 30.

98. Section 46 makes it an offence to fail to comply with a letting agent enforcement order.
General

99. Section 47 provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to transfer, by regulations subject to the negative procedure, other, existing types of cases relating to letting agents which are currently within the jurisdiction of the sheriff court to the FTT.

100. Section 48 sets out, where offences are committed by bodies corporate, who within that body is considered to have committed the offence and be liable to be proceeded against.

101. Section 49 allows the Scottish Ministers to delegate their functions under Part 4 to another person or body (other than the powers to make orders or regulations).

102. Section 50 makes some consequential modifications to the 2004 Act relating to landlord registration.

103. Sections 51 and 52 provide definitions of various terms used within this Part.

PART FIVE – MOBILE HOME SITES WITH PERMANENT RESIDENTS

104. Part 5 makes provision for the licensing system for mobile home sites with permanent residents.

General application

105. The provisions in this part of the Bill amend the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 ("the 1960 Act"). The 1960 Act requires occupiers of land (referred to in these Notes as “site owners”) to hold a licence before they allow their land to be used as a caravan site. Currently the same licensing regime applies to sites used for holiday caravans, and sites with permanent residents. The Bill changes the licensing regime for most sites with permanent residents. These sites are defined as “relevant permanent sites” in new section 32Z5, which is inserted into the 1960 Act by section 70 of the Bill. New section 32Z5 is an interpretation section for new Part 1A.

106. New Part 1A deals with the licensing of relevant permanent sites in Scotland. Sites that have a licence that only allows mobile homes on them to be used for holidays are not affected by new Part 1A of the 1960 Act. Part 1 of the 1960 Act will continue to apply to such holiday sites. The definition of “excepted permission” (also in new section 32Z5) means that holiday sites that have an employee of the site owner living on them year round (for example to manage the site), are not covered by new Part 1A of the 1960 Act.

107. Section 53 of the Bill amends section 32 of the 1960 Act by inserting a new paragraph (m) into section 32(1). Section 32 changes the operation and wording of Part 1 of the 1960 Act as it applies to Scotland. For example it replaces references to English courts and legal terms with references to the relevant equivalents under Scots law. All the provisions in Part 1 of the 1960 Act need to be read alongside section 32 when considering how the Act applies to
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

Scotland. The effect of the new paragraph (m) is that, when applying the 1960 Act to a relevant permanent site in Scotland, it is also necessary to read the provisions of Part 1A.

Part 1A site licence

108. Section 54 of the Bill inserts new sections 32B and 32C into the 1960 Act. New section 32B has the effect of replacing the existing system for licensing mobile home sites with permanent residents in Scotland (in terms of Part 1 of the 1960 Act) with the new system set out in new Part 1A (in terms of new section 32A(1)). New section 32B(1) provides that a relevant permanent site application may be made by the site owner of the relevant permanent site to the local authority in whose area the site is situated, and new section 32B(2) sets out what such a site licence application must include. For example, it must be in such format as is determined by the local authority, and specify the land in respect of which the application is made. Section 32B(3) requires an applicant to provide such information to the local authority as it reasonably requires.

109. New section 32C provides that the relevant local authority may charge a fee for a site licence application. A local authority may also fix different fees for different applications (subsection (2)). Such a fee cannot exceed the amount a local authority considers represents the reasonable costs of deciding on an application (subsection (3)). Subsection (4) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision about the charging of fees for site licence applications. This could include setting out the factors a local authority could take into account when fixing the fee for a site licence, and providing for the fee not to exceed a maximum fee level prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in the regulations.

110. Section 55 inserts new section 32D into the 1960 Act which provides for the issue and renewal of a site licence for a relevant permanent site. New section 32D(1) provides that a local authority may issue a site licence:

- where the applicant has the relevant planning permission (for the use of the land as a caravan site otherwise than by a development order), and
- if the authority is satisfied that the applicant is a fit and proper person or where the applicant is not a natural person, the individual holding the most senior position within the management structure of the relevant partnership, company or body is a fit and proper person, and
- if the authority if satisfied that any person appointed by the applicant to manage the site is a fit and proper person, and in the case where a person to be appointed by the applicant to manage the site is not a natural person, that any individual who is to be directly concerned with the management of the site is also a fit and proper person.

110. Section 32D(2) provides that a local authority must renew a licence if:

- the applicant has the relevant planning permission (for the use of the land as a caravan site otherwise than by a development order), and
- if the authority is satisfied that the applicant is a fit and proper person or where the applicant is not a natural person, the individual holding the most senior position... within the management structure of the relevant partnership, company or body is a fit and proper person, and

- if the authority is satisfied that any person appointed by the applicant to manage the site is a fit and proper person, and in the case where a person to be appointed by the applicant to manage the site is not a natural person, that any individual who is to be directly concerned with the management of the site is also a fit and proper person.

111. New section 32D(3) provides that the local authority must not at any time issue a site licence to a person whom the local authority knows had held a site licence which has been revoked under the 1960 Act less than three years before that time.

112. New section 32D(4) provides that before refusing to issue a site licence, the authority must give the applicant a notice stating that it is considering refusal and its reasoning for this, and informing the applicant of the right to make written representations to the authority before the date specified in the notice. New section 32D(5) requires the local authority to consider the application and any representations made in making its decision.

113. Section 55 also inserts new section 32E into the 1960 Act. Section 32E sets out procedures for the transfer of a site licence (other than on the death of a site licence holder) to a person who is to become the site owner of the relevant permanent site. This would occur, for example, where a site was sold to a new owner. Procedures similar to those that apply for a new site licence application apply in this situation, such as the need for the new site licence holder (and any person appointed to manage the site) to be a fit and proper person to hold a site licence (subsection (2)). Subsection (3) also provides that the applicant and transferee must provide the local authority with such information as the authority reasonably requires in order to establish whether the person is a fit and proper person.

114. Section 55 also inserts new section 32F into the 1960 Act. New section 32F provides for time limits in relation to an application for a site licence and consent to transfer a licence mentioned in section 32E. Under the provision, if a local authority does not determine a site licence application within 12 months of receiving it (unless that period is extended by a sheriff) then the applicant is to be treated as having been granted a site licence by the authority under new section 32F (subsection (7)). The period may be extended by the sheriff by such period as the sheriff thinks fit (subsection (3)), the sheriff may not extend the period unless the authority applies for the extension before the period expires (subsection (4)), the applicant is entitled to be party to any proceedings to extend the period of determination (subsection (5)), and the sheriff’s decision on such summary application is final (subsection (6)). If a local authority does not determine an application for consent to transfer a licence within 12 months of receiving the application, then the applicant is to be treated as having been granted consent on the day the application was made (subsection (8)).

115. Section 55 also inserts new section 32G into the 1960 Act. This provision gives the local authority the power to transfer a site licence to the person it considers to be the site owner of the relevant permanent site (subsection (2)), where a holder of a site licence does not seek consent of the authority for the transfer under section 10(1) of the 1960 Act and where it appears to the authority that the holder of the licence is no longer the site owner. The section introduces an offence of knowingly or recklessly providing false or misleading information to a local authority in relation to a local authority decision to transfer a licence. A person who commits such an offence is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale (subsection (7)). In 2013 this was a maximum of £1,000.

116. New section 32H as inserted into the 1960 Act by section 55, provides that where a relevant permanent site licence is transferred to a person in accordance with section 10(4) of the 1960 Act, that person must give the authority such information as the authority may reasonably require in order to make a determination under new section 32L, in relation to a decision to revoke a site licence on the basis that someone is not a fit and proper person.

117. New section 32I is inserted into the 1960 Act by section 55. It requires a local authority after:

- determinations of relevant permanent site applications,
- determinations of an application for consent to transfer a licence mentioned in new section 32E,
- a decision to transfer a licence mentioned in new section 32G, to notify respectively the applicant, the applicant and the transferee, and the previous holder of the site licence and transferee, of the decision, the reasons for it, and the right to appeal under new section 32M. It must do so as soon as practicable after making the decision (subsection (1)).

118. Section 56 inserts new section 32J into the 1960 Act and provides that a site licence issued or renewed for a “relevant permanent site” will be for a duration of three years (unless terminated by its revocation, or unless the holder is no longer entitled to planning permission for use of the land as a caravan site, or any planning permission for the use of the site as a caravan site expires). New section 32J(2) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to alter the duration of site licences, by order subject to the affirmative procedure.

119. Section 57 inserts new section 32K into the 1960 Act. This requires a site licence holder to tell a local authority when the holder has appointed someone to manage the site. New section 32K also requires a site licence holder to notify a local authority of a change of circumstances that means that information provided by the licence holder has become inaccurate.

120. Section 58 inserts new section 32L into the 1960 Act. This gives a local authority the power to revoke a site licence if the local authority is satisfied that the licence holder is no longer a fit and proper person, or that the person appointed to manage a site is no longer a fit and proper person. This provision can also apply if the applicant, and/or the organisation carrying out management of the site, is a body such as a company or partnership rather than an individual.

121. Section 32L(2) sets out the procedures a local authority must follow when revoking a licence (such as the requirement to notify the site owner of the proposed revocation and of the right of the site owner to make written representations). Subsection (4) requires a local authority to serve notice of the revocation on the owner of the relevant permanent site, identifying the site... licence to which it relates, the reason(s) for revoking the licence, and explaining the right of appeal.

122. Section 59 inserts new section 32M into the 1960 Act. Under this section the person involved (the applicant, the applicant and transferee, the previous holder of the licence and the transferee, depending on the determination) can appeal to the sheriff against a local authority’s decision on a site licence application, or on the transfer of a licence (whether on death of a site licence holder or not).

123. Section 60 inserts new section 32N into the 1960 Act. This section gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make regulations in relation to the procedure and timings to be followed in relation to:

- a relevant permanent site licence application,
- the seeking of consent to transfer of a site licence mentioned in new sections 32E and 32H,
- appeals relating to a site licence under new section 32M.

Fit and proper persons

124. Section 61 inserts new section 32O into the 1960 Act. The section sets out the factors a local authority must consider when applying the fit and proper person test, for example to potential site licence holders, or existing site licence holders seeking to renew a licence. This section provides that the relevant material that can be taken into account includes:

- whether the person has been convicted of offences involving fraud or other dishonesty, violence, drugs, firearms, and sexual offences within the meaning of section 210A(10) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995,
- evidence an applicant has practised unlawful discrimination,
- whether the person has contravened the law relating to caravans, housing, and landlords and tenants,
- whether the person has engaged in antisocial behaviour,
- whether the person has breached the conditions of the site licence,
- other relevant material a local authority is aware of from its licensing duties.

125. Subsection (6) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to adjust the list of relevant material, by order subject to the affirmative procedure.

126. Section 62 inserts new section 32P into the 1960 Act. This gives a local authority the power, if it is carrying out the fit and proper person test, to require the relevant person to provide a criminal conviction certificate. A local authority can only do so if it has reasonable grounds to suspect that the information an applicant has provided in relation to the fit and proper person test is, or has become, inaccurate.
Offences relating to relevant permanent sites

127. Section 63 inserts new sections 32Q, 32R, 32S and 32T into the 1960 Act. New section 32Q makes it an offence for someone to knowingly or recklessly provide information that is materially false or misleading to a local authority, in respect of an application for, or transfer of, a site licence. The maximum fine, if convicted of doing so, is level 3 on the standard scale (in 2013 this was a maximum of £1,000). Section 32R makes it an offence for someone to cause or permit land to be used as a relevant permanent site without a licence. The maximum fine, if convicted for doing so, is £50,000. New section 32S makes it an offence for the site owner of a relevant permanent site to fail to comply with any licence conditions. The maximum fine, if convicted of breaching a licence condition, is £10,000. Section 32T gives the Scottish Ministers the power to vary the maximum fine for breaching a licence condition or operating a site without a licence. The process for doing this would be by order subject to the affirmative procedure. This is so that the maximum fine levels can be changed in the future, for example to reflect changes in inflation, without the need for a Bill but still requiring Parliamentary approval.

Local authority enforcement at relevant permanent sites

128. Section 64 inserts new sections 32U, 32V and 32W into the 1960 Act. These sections all relate to improvement notices. New section 32U sets out:

- the situation in which a local authority may issue an improvement notice,
- what must be part of such a notice (such as what needs to be improved, and by what date),
- the procedure for any appeal to the sheriff relating to an improvement notice, and
- the powers a local authority has to suspend, revoke, or vary an improvement notice.

129. New section 32V makes it an offence for a site owner who has been served with an improvement notice to fail to comply with the terms of the notice. If someone is convicted of doing so the maximum fine is £10,000.

130. New section 32W gives a local authority the power, if the site owner fails to take the steps specified in the improvement notice within the period specified, to take the action required on a site to meet the conditions set out in the improvement notice. Subsection (2) requires the local authority to give the site owner notice, and specific details, of the work the local authority will be carrying out (or the authority will be requiring someone else to do on its behalf and to give that person’s name), and the dates and times on which this intended action will be taken.

131. Section 65 inserts new section 32X into the 1960 Act. This gives a local authority the power to issue a penalty notice on the site owner, and provides for the situations in which the authority can do so (where there is no licence or a breach of licence conditions). A penalty notice has the effect of suspending pitch fee payments (within the meaning of paragraph 32 of Part 1 of Schedule 1 to the Mobile Homes Act 1983 (the “1983 Act”)) from residents to the site owner, for a specific period of time. It also suspends the commission a mobile home resident can be required to pay the site owner on sale of a mobile home (under paragraph 1 of Part 1 of 132. Section 66 inserts new section 32Y into the 1960 Act. This provision relates to the appointment of an interim manager to manage a mobile home site. Section 32Y(1) gives a local authority the power to apply to a sheriff to appoint an interim manager for a site. Subsection (5) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make regulations relating to the appointment of an interim manager. These regulations may, in particular, cover the powers of an interim manager, the qualifications the manager must hold, and the actions the interim manager must carry out.

133. Section 67 inserts section 32Z into the 1960 Act. This gives a local authority the power to take emergency action where it appears to a local authority that:

- the site licence holder is failing, or has failed, to comply with a site licence condition; and as a result of that there is an imminent risk to the health and safety of anyone who is, or may be, on the land, or
- a person is causing or permitting land to be used as a relevant permanent site without a site licence, and there is an imminent risk to the health and safety of anyone who is, or may be, on the land.

134. In the circumstances above the local authority would be able to carry out work to remove the imminent risk of serious harm. The section requires an authority to provide notice to the site owner in an emergency action notice before carrying out emergency action (subsection (4)), and to provide the site owner with an emergency action report after it has begun undertaking emergency action (subsection (7)). It also provides for appeals against an authority taking emergency action.

135. Under section 26 of the 1960 Act any authorised officer of a local authority has a right of entry to a mobile home site, subject to provisions about the purpose of such entry and the hours in which it takes place. Section 68 inserts new section 32Z1 into the 1960 Act. This extends the applicability of the provisions in section 26, so that they cover situations relating to the use of the new enforcement powers a local authority has under this Bill in relation to relevant permanent sites. In relation to an emergency action notice it also has the effect that a site owner is not required to have 24 hours’ notice that someone will be carrying out such works, and that entry to the site does not have to be at a reasonable hour. This is to cover situations where such entry must be carried out urgently, for example to address something that is immediately dangerous on a site.

136. Section 69 inserts new sections 32Z2, 32Z3 and 32Z4 into the 1960 Act. Section 32Z2 gives a local authority the power to recover expenses from a site owner where the local authority has served an improvement notice, penalty notice, or emergency action notice on, or provided at emergency action report to, a site owner. Section 32Z3 allows a local authority to recover from the site owner the expenses of taking action under an improvement notice or emergency action notice.
137. Section 32Z4 gives a local authority the power to recover costs for inspections, and other work to investigate or assess compliance with licence conditions.

Miscellaneous

138. Section 70 inserts section 32Z5 into the 1960 Act. This sets out the definitions of terms that are introduced into the 1960 Act through the Bill.

139. Section 70 also inserts section 32Z6 into the 1960 Act. The effect is that a decision by a local authority to refuse to issue or renew a licence, or to revoke a licence, has no effect on an agreement a site resident has with the site owner, if that agreement is one to which the 1983 Act applies. This means that the rights of residents to remain on the site under the 1983 Act will not be affected by a decision to revoke, or to refuse to issue or renew, a site licence.

140. Section 71 sets out transitional provisions for existing site licences. Under this section an existing site licence would continue in force for two years from the day the relevant section of the Bill comes into force, unless it is revoked or replaced by a new licence issued by the local authority.

PART SIX – PRIVATE HOUSING CONDITIONS

141. Part 6 amends local authority powers to enforce repairs and maintenance in private homes.

Tenement management scheme

142. Section 72(1)(b) inserts a new section 4A in the Tenements (Scotland) Act 2004 ("the Tenements Act"). This allows local authorities to pay a missing share when the majority of owners in a tenement block have agreed to carry out work to repair or maintain their property, and one or more of the owners has not paid their share of the cost of the work (where the owner is unable or unwilling to do so, or where the owners cannot be identified or found). New section 4A(5) allows the local authority to recover the costs of the missing share and any associated administrative expenses from the owner on whose behalf it was paid. Before exercising this power, the local authority must notify the owner who has not paid a share that it intends to make the payment itself (new section 4A(4)).

143. Section 72(1)(d) amends rule 5 of the Tenement Management Scheme in schedule 1 to the Tenements Act, so that the other owners are not liable for the costs of another owner which are met by a share paid by a local authority.

144. Section 72(2) amends section 172 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 ("the 2006 Act") so that local authorities can use repayment charges to recover the costs of paying missing shares from the owner on whose behalf the missing share was paid.
Work notices

145. Section 73 amends section 30(1) of the 2006 Act, which provides powers for local authorities to issue work notices to require owners to carry out work on substandard houses. The amendment inserts an additional ground on which the local authority may issue a work notice, which is where the work is needed to improve the safety or security of any house (whether or not situated in a housing renewal area).

Maintenance orders and plans

146. Section 74 amends section 42(2) of the 2006 Act, which provides powers for local authorities to issue maintenance orders to require owners to prepare a maintenance plan for securing the maintenance of the house to a reasonable standard. The amendment inserts an additional ground on which the local authority may issue a maintenance order, which is where a work notice has been served and no certificate has been issued to confirm that the work required to be carried out by the work notice has been completed.

147. Section 75(3) repeals the provisions in section 61 of 2006 Act which require local authorities to register in the appropriate land register maintenance plans approved or devised under section 46 of the 2006 Act, or varied under section 47, and notices of revocation of a maintenance plan under section 47. Section 75(1) amends section 24(1) of the Building (Scotland) Act 2003 to require local authorities to include a record of decisions to approve, devise, vary or revoke maintenance plans in the building standards register.

148. Section 75(2) amends section 47 of the 2006 Act, which allows local authorities to vary or revoke maintenance plans. The amendment allows local authorities to revoke a maintenance plan where the local authority is satisfied that a property factor has been appointed to manage or maintain the premises to which the plan relates. “Property factor” is defined in section 2 of the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011.

Non-residential premises: repayment charges

149. Section 76 amends sections 172 and 173 of the 2006 which allow local authorities to recover costs in connection with enforcement of repairs and maintenance to living accommodation by creating a repayment charge which is recoverable in thirty equal annual instalments. A repayment charge is a charge against property and has priority over all future burdens and most existing burdens on the property. The amendment widens the scope of sections 172 and 173 to include any non-residential parts of buildings that contain living accommodation.

PART SEVEN – MISCELLANEOUS

Right to redeem heritable security after 20 years: power to exempt

150. Part 7 of the Bill contains a provision, section 77(1) which amends the “20-year security rule” – section 11 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 (“the 1974 Act”).
151. Section 11 of the 1974 Act permits debtors to redeem a standard security over property used as, or as part of, a private dwelling house once 20 years from the date of creation of the security has elapsed, regardless of the fact that the security is for a longer contractual term. Social landlords, their connected bodies and rural housing bodies are able to renounce their right to redeem a standard security after 20 years.

152. The amendment in section 77(1) which inserts subsection (3D) into section 11 of the 1974 Act provides that the right to redeem a standard security, as permitted by section 11, will not be allowed in certain circumstances to be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by order subject to the negative procedure.

153. Section 77(1) also inserts subsection (3E) into section 11, which provides that an order under subsection (3D) may disapply the right to redeem a standard security subject to certain conditions or restrictions. Such an order may restrict the disapplication of the right to redeem to specified descriptions of debt, to specified creditors or creditors of specified descriptions, to specified heritable securities or heritable securities of specified descriptions. It may prescribe circumstances in which the disapplication of the right to redeem is to apply or cease to apply. For example, an order under new section 11(3D) could exclude debtors who grant a standard security in favour of the Scottish Ministers as part of a Scottish Government shared equity scheme or equity release scheme from being able to exercise the right to redeem their security after 20 years.

Delegation of certain functions

154. Section 78(1) amends section 21 of the 2006 Act by introducing a new power for the president of the private rented housing panel to delegate functions under section 23 of the 2006 Act (to refer applications to the private rented housing panel or reject applications), to the vice-president of the panel or to another member of the panel as the president sees fit (new section 21(8A) of the 2006 Act). This is in addition to the existing powers enabling the transfer of the president’s functions during times of absence or incapacity as provided for in section 21(8) of the 2006 Act. The provision is intended to increase flexibility to manage the multiple work strands undertaken by the panel. New section 21(8B) provides that such a delegation does not affect the president’s responsibility for the carrying out of delegated functions or ability to carry out the delegated functions.

155. Section 78(2) inserts new subsections (8) and (9) into section 16 of the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 to provide that the functions of the president of the homeowner housing panel under section 18 (to refer applications to the homeowner housing panel for a determination as to whether a property factor has failed to carry out the factor’s duties or to comply with the property factor code of conduct or to reject applications) may be delegated to the vice-president of the panel or to such other member of the panel as the president sees fit. New subsection (9) provides that such a delegation does not affect the president’s responsibility for the carrying out of delegated functions, or ability to carry out delegated functions.

156. Section 79 makes two amendments to section 67 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”).

157. Paragraph (a) introduces a new subsection (4A) to section 67 of the 2010 Act. This has the effect of creating a narrow exception to the duty on the Scottish Housing Regulator (the Regulator), at section 67(4), always to consult and have regard to the views of tenants and secured creditors that hold securities over houses of a registered social landlord (RSL) before it directs a transfer of the RSL’s assets. The exception would apply in circumstances where the Regulator considered that all of the conditions specified at (a) to (d) of the new subsection were satisfied. These relate to the RSL being in financial jeopardy and vulnerable to steps being taken towards its insolvency, winding up etc. Where the direction to transfer assets would reduce the risk of such steps being taken, if made without the delay that consultation with the RSL’s tenants and secured creditors would cause, the Regulator could direct the transfer of a RSL’s assets without such consultation. In all other circumstances, the duty to consult tenants and secured creditors that section 67(4) imposes on the Regulator would remain.

158. Paragraph (b) repeals the duty on the Regulator, at section 67(6)(a), when it is directing the transfer of some of the assets of a RSL, always to obtain an independent valuation of the assets to be transferred and to direct the transfer at a price that it considers the assets would fetch on the open market.

Repeal of defective designation provisions

159. Section 80 of the Bill provides for the repeal of Part 14 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 (“the 1987 Act”) together with Schedules 20 and 21 of that Act. This removes the provisions of the 1987 Act which deal with the designation as defective of prescribed types of dwelling, the power to provide assistance to owners of such dwellings and the giving of notice to persons seeking to acquire a dwelling that is defective. These provisions are dependent on the Scottish Ministers or local authorities designating classes of buildings as defective, which was last done by the Scottish Ministers in 1984 and appears never to have been done by any local authority. The power to designate is, therefore, being repealed.

160. These provisions were originally set out in the Housing Defects Act 1984 and the provisions affecting Scotland were replaced by Part 14 of the 1987 Act. The designation of dwelling types was made by the Housing Defects (Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Dwellings) (Scotland) Designations 1984. The period during which applications for assistance could be submitted in respect of these dwelling types has expired, making Part 14 obsolete.

PART EIGHT – SUPPLEMENTARY AND FINAL PROVISIONS

Interpretation

161. Section 81 provides the definition of various terms used in the Bill.
Subordinate legislation

162. Section 82 provides that any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order or regulations includes a power to make different provision for different purposes or different areas, and incidental, supplemental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision. Subsection (2) lists orders where affirmative procedure is required. Subsection (3) provides that all other orders and regulations are subject to negative procedure. Subsection (4) provides that any commencement order is not subject to either procedure.

Ancillary provision

163. Section 83 gives the Scottish Ministers a free-standing power by order to make such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional or transitory provision or savings as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes or in connection with any provision made by or under the Bill.

Minor and consequential amendments

164. Section 84 introduces schedule 2, which amends and repeals enactments as required in consequence of this Bill.

Commencement

165. Section 85 allows the Scottish Ministers by order to set different dates to commence different provisions of the Bill (such an order may include transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient). It also specifies that section 1(1) (abolition of right to buy) may not come into force until a period of at least three years has passed, starting from the day of Royal Assent and that section 77 comes into force at the end of the period of two months beginning with the day of Royal Assent.

Short title

166. Section 86 gives the short title of the Bill.

SCHEDULE 1 – TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION TO FIRST-TIER TRIBUNAL

Part 1 – Regulated tenancies, Part VII contracts and assured tenancies

167. Part 1 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments to the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 (“the 1984 Act”) and the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 (“the 1988 Act”) to transfer the jurisdiction for specific civil matters relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff to the First-tier Tribunal (FTT) and to enable the FTT to use the same powers and procedures as the court currently has at its disposal to make determinations for the types of actions outlined below.
Rent (Scotland) Act 1984

168. Paragraph 2 amends section 7(2) of the 1984 Act. Section 7(1) of the 1984 Act makes provision for how the rateable value of dwelling houses should be ascertained and section 7(2) provides the sheriff with powers to determine the proper apportionment of value of a dwelling house, where any question in relation to this arises.

169. Paragraphs 3 and 31 amend section 11 and Schedule 2 of the 1984 Act. Section 11 provides for the grounds for possession of certain dwelling houses repossessions cases and schedule 2 specifies the circumstances in which orders for possession can be made. These include non-payment of rent or antisocial behaviour.

170. Paragraph 4 amends section 12 of the 1984 Act. Section 12 provides extended discretion to sist or suspend proceedings to allow the sheriff to manage proceedings for repossession. For example, this could be to allow a party to fulfil or complete an action or to pay arrears.

171. Consequential to the transfer of repossession cases to the FTT in paragraph 3, paragraph 5 amends section 19 of the 1984 Act. Section 19 regards the rights of subtenants in circumstances where an order for possession of a dwelling house has been made.

172. Paragraph 6 amends section 21 of the 1984 Act. Section 21 regards circumstances where it appears to a sheriff court, after having given a landlord an order for possession of a dwelling house let on a protected tenancy or subject to a statutory tenancy, that the order was maintained by misrepresentation or concealment of material facts, and provides that the court has the power to order compensation be paid to the former tenants for loss or damage sustained.

173. Paragraph 7 amends section 23(1) of the 1984 Act. Section 23 regards tenancies which are not regulated tenancies or Part VII contracts and provides that the enforcement of repossession eviction for these tenancies is unlawful other than through proceedings before the sheriff.

174. Paragraph 8 amends section 24 of the 1984 Act. Section 24 makes special provision with regard to proceedings for repossession where the tenant is a person employed in agriculture (as defined in section 17 of the Agricultural Wages (Scotland) Act 1949).

175. Paragraph 9 repeals the definition of court from section 25 of the 1984 Act as this is no longer required as relevant proceedings are transferred to the FTT.

176. Consequentially to the transfer of jurisdiction for repossession in paragraphs 7 and 8, paragraph 10 amends section 26 of the 1984 Act. Section 26 provides that proceedings for repossession under Part III of that Act are binding on the Crown.

177. Paragraph 11 repeals section 27 of the 1984 Act which set out the procedure for applications to the sheriff under Part III.
178. Paragraph 12 amends section 31(2) of the 1984 Act. Section 31(2) regards rents under regulated tenancies and provides powers to adjust recoverable rent to cover services and furniture.

179. Paragraph 13 amends section 32(4) and (5) of the 1984 Act. Section 32(4) and (5) regard notices of increase to rent under regulated tenancies and provides powers to amend errors.

180. Paragraph 14 amends section 35(12) of the 1984 Act. Section 35(12) provides for the sufficiency of evidence in relation to rent agreements. The effect of the amendment is to ensure that this applies to proceedings before the Scottish Tribunals.

181. Paragraph 15 amends section 39 of the 1984 Act. Section 39 provides powers to order rectification of rent books after determination of recoverable rent. The effect of the amendment is to provide that the FTT can order the rectification of rent books in applicable cases.

182. Paragraph 16 amends section 43B(4) of the 1984 Act. Section 43B(4) regards changes of rent registration service providers and provides for the continuation of proceedings. The effect of the amendment is to provide that tribunal proceedings can continue following changes of responsibility.

183. Paragraph 17 amends section 45(3) of the 1984 Act. Section 45(3) provides for the sufficiency of evidence in relation to rent registers similar to section 35(12) of the 1984 Act. The effect of the amendment is to ensure that this applies to proceedings before the Scottish Tribunals.

184. Paragraph 18 amends section 60(3) of the 1984 Act. Section 60(3) provides powers to determine questions about rent limits for housing association and housing corporation tenancies.

185. Paragraph 19 amends section 64(6)(b) of the 1984 Act. Section 64(6)(b) regards the rateable value of dwelling houses for the purpose of determining whether Part VII of the 1984 Act applies. It provides powers to determine apportionment of rateable value where parties fail to agree.

186. Paragraphs 20 and 21 amend sections 75 and 76 of the 1984 Act. Sections 75 and 76 provide power to reduce the period of notice to quit or postpone the date of possession in relation to contracts described in Part VII of the 1984 Act.

188. Paragraph 23 amends section 97(8) and (9) of the 1984 Act. Section 97(8) and (9) provides powers to terminate or modify rights for tenants who share accommodation.
189. Paragraph 24 inserts new subsection (A1) into section 102 of the 1984 Act, and repeals subsection (2) and amends subsection (3) of that section. Section 102 provides power to determine any question with regard to the application of the 1984 Act. The effect of the amendment is to make clear that the FTT shall have jurisdiction over civil matters arising from this act with the exception of matters arising under Part IX which will remain within the jurisdiction of the sheriff.

190. Paragraph 25 amends section 103 of the 1984 Act. Section 103 regards the procedure by which certain actions are to be raised in the sheriff court.

191. Paragraph 26 amends section 104 of the 1984 Act. Section 104 regards the Court of Session’s power to make certain rules of procedure. The effect of the amendment is to retain this power for criminal proceedings under Part IX of the 1984 Act and not to apply it for tribunal procedures.

192. Paragraph 27 amends section 115(1) of the 1984 Act to include a definition of the FTT.

193. Paragraph 28 amends paragraphs 3 and 7 of Schedule 1 to the 1984 Act. Schedule 1 regards succession rights of protected tenants following the death of protected tenants and provides powers to determine matters where parties fail to agree.

194. Paragraphs 29 and 30 amend paragraphs 3 and 6 of Schedule 1A and paragraph 3 of Schedule 1B to the 1984 Act. Schedules 1A and 1B regard succession rights for tenants and should be read in conjunction with Section 3A of the 1984 Act.

Housing (Scotland) Act 1988

195. Paragraph 33 amends section 16(2) of the 1988 Act. Section 16(2) regards the power to end assured tenancies.

196. Paragraph 34 amends section 17(8) of the 1988 Act. Section 17(8) regards proceedings to fix terms for statutory assured tenancies.

197. Paragraphs 35 and 48 amend section 18 and Schedule 5 of the 1988 Act. Section 18 and Schedule 5 regard repossessions cases for assured and short assured tenancies and specifies the circumstances in which orders for possession can be made.

198. Paragraph 36 amends section 19 of the 1988 Act. Section 19 requires that proceedings must not be entertained unless a notice of proceedings has been served in the prescribed format.

199. Paragraph 37 amends section 20 of the 1988 Act. Section 20 regards discretion to sist or adjourn proceedings for possession to allow the sheriff to manage proceedings for repossession. This could be to allow parties to complete a specific action or to repay arrears.
200. Paragraph 38 amends section 21(3) of the 1988 Act. Section 21(3) regards special powers in relation to shared accommodation.

201. Paragraph 39 amends section 22(1) and (2) of the 1988 Act. Section 22(1) and (2) regards powers to order payment of removal expenses.

203. Paragraph 41 amends section 28(1) of the 1988 Act. Section 28(1) regards the effect of the termination of assured tenancies on sub-tenancies.

204. Paragraph 42 amends section 29 of the 1988 Act. Section 29 regards the effect of the termination of assured tenancies on sub-tenancies.

205. Paragraph 43 amends section 30(2) of the 1988 Act. Section 30(2) regards failure to provide a tenancy agreement for an assured tenancy and provides power to draw up an agreement if one does not already exist.

206. Paragraph 44 amends section 33(1) and (4) of the 1988 Act. Section 33(1) and (4) regards the recovery of possession of short assured tenancies under certain circumstances.

207. Paragraph 45 inserts new subsection (4A) into section 36 of the 1988 Act, and amends section 36(6)(b) and (6B). Section 36(6)(b) and (6B) provides power to award damages for unlawful eviction.

208. Paragraph 46 amends section 42(1)(c) of the 1988 Act. Section 42 regards restrictions on assured tenancies.

209. Paragraph 47 amends section 55(1) of the 1988 Act to include a definition of the FTT.

SCHEDULE 1 - PART 2 - REPAIRING STANDARD

210. Part 2 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments to the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 (“the 2006 Act”) to transfer the jurisdiction for specific civil matters relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff to the First-tier Tribunal (FTT) and to enable the FTT to use the same powers and procedures as the court currently has at its disposal to make determinations for the types of actions outlined below.

Housing (Scotland) Act 2006

211. Paragraph 50 amends section 24(7) of the 2006 Act. Section 24(7) regards repairing standard orders when an order has been made regarding contracting out of the repairing standard.
212. Paragraph 51 amends section 194 of the 2006 Act to include a definition of the FTT.

SCHEDULE 1 – PART 3 – RIGHT TO ADAPT RENTED HOUSES

213. Part 3 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments to the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 (“the 2006 Act”) to transfer the jurisdiction for specific civil matters relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff to the First-tier Tribunal (FTT) and to enable the FTT to use the same powers and procedures as the court currently has at its disposal to make determinations for the types of actions outlined below.

214. Paragraph 53 amends section 64 of the 2006 Act. Section 64 relates to appeals from decisions by local authorities and the private rented housing panel in relation to the repairing standard.

215. Paragraph 54 repeals section 65(3) and (4) of the 2006 Act. Section 65 relates to the determination of an appeal under section 64.

216. Paragraph 55 repeals section 67 of the 2006 Act. Section 67 provides the Scottish Ministers with the power to transfer jurisdiction for appeals under section 52 of that Act (regarding the right to adapt rented houses) from the sheriff to the private rented housing panel.

SCHEDULE 1 - PART 4 – LANDLORD REGISTRATION

217. Part 4 of schedule 1 makes consequential amendments to the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (“the 2004 Act”) to transfer the jurisdiction for specific civil matters relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff to the First-tier Tribunal (FTT) and to enable the FTT to use the same powers and procedures as the court currently has at its disposal to make determinations for the types of actions outlined below.

Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004

218. Paragraph 57 repeals section 92(4) and amends section 92(5) and (6) of the 2004 Act which regard the procedure for making appeals to the sheriff against decisions of local authorities about landlord registration.

219. Paragraph 58 amends section 92ZA of the 2004 Act. Section 92ZA regards the duty on local authorities to note refusals and removals for the register of landlords.

220. Paragraph 59 amends section 97(6) and (7) of the 2004 Act. Section 97(6) and (7) regards appeals against local authority decisions regarding landlord registration.

221. Paragraph 60 amends section 101(1) of the 2004 Act to include a definition of the FTT.
SCHEDULE 2 – MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

222. Schedule 2 provides for minor and consequential amendments and is introduced by section 84.

223. The amendments in paragraphs 12 and 13 reflect a change in the status of the Scottish Housing Regulator, which is now a non-ministerial office holder in the Scottish Administration. These changes do not alter the position of the Regulator being subject to the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002 and the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002.

224. The amendment in paragraph 17(4) removes the requirement for a registered social landlord to consult its tenants before it grants a standard security over existing houses in order to raise finance. The effect of the amendment is to recreate the position that had previously applied under section 68 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 by requiring registered social landlords to consult their tenants only where they are proposing a disposal of land that requires the consent of the Scottish Housing Regulator (other than disposals to which the special procedure in Part 10 of the 2010 Act applies – disposals and restructuring which result in a change of landlord, or disposals by way of security of loan).
INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (‘the Bill’) introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament.

OVERVIEW

2. The Bill will safeguard tenants, help to improve housing quality and secure better outcomes for communities. The Bill’s intentions are to provide the legislative basis for implementing Scottish Government policy priorities and achieving strategic housing objectives. The Government’s vision is that all people in Scotland live in high-quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs. The Memorandum summarises the cost and savings implications of the Bill and should be read in conjunction with the Bill’s Policy Memorandum, which sets out more fully the reasoning behind the Bill.

3. The analysis and estimates contained in this Memorandum draw on a variety of sources including:
   - consultation responses to the policy proposals,
   - draft Business Regulatory Impact Assessments (BRIA),
   - discussions with partners and stakeholders for whom there may be financial implications, or who may be affected as a result of the Bill, including local authorities, RSLs, individual organisations, businesses and the third sector.

CONTENTS

4. This Financial Memorandum sets out the costs and savings associated with the following parts to the Bill where potential costs and/or savings have been identified:
   - Part 1 abolishes the right to buy.
   - Part 2 amends the definition of reasonable preference in allocation of social housing in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 (“the 1987 Act”); sets out the factors that may be considered in the allocation of houses; makes provision for the use of short Scottish secure tenancies where there has been a history of antisocial behaviour and for temporary lets to homeowners; and introduces qualifying periods before tenants can exercise rights to assign, sub-let or request a joint tenancy.
• Part 3 transfers jurisdiction for civil cases relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff court to the First-tier Tribunal; introduces a time limit for determining applications for landlord registration and allows local authorities to apply to the private rented housing panel (PRHP) for enforcement of the repairing standard, setting out the procedure for such applications and the right of appeal. It is also the Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 which will allow for local authorities to apply for additional enforcement powers through an enhanced enforcement area.

• Part 4 provides for a registration system and a code of practice for letting agents, and redress for tenants and landlords.

• Part 5 amends the site licensing requirements for mobile home sites with permanent residents.

• Part 6 amends the discretionary powers of local authorities to require owners to carry out work to repair and maintain private homes.

• Part 7 makes a number of miscellaneous amendments in respect of the right to redeem a security after 20 years in certain circumstances; provides for the president of the PRHP to delegate certain functions; amends the Scottish Housing Regulator’s (SHR) powers to transfer assets following inquiries; and repeals defective designation provisions in the 1987 Act.

5. The Bill does not give rise to any substantial costs for the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies and individuals. The most significant individual net cost per annum identified is the loss of income incurred by the Scottish Government as a result of local authority and registered social landlord (RSL) right to buy (RTB) sales ending. As a guide, this income stream stood at £2,300,000 for 2012/13. However, this figure has steadily decreased as RTB sales have reduced. The net costs that the Scottish Government expects to arise from the other provisions in this Bill are expected to be less than £1,000,000 respectively and to amount to between £1,000,000 - £3,000,000 per annum for the Scottish Administration. One-off costs associated with the provisions in the Bill are estimated to amount to between £270,000 and £400,000 for the Scottish Administration.

6. The largest cost on local authorities is related to the provisions for short Scottish secure tenancies where there has been a history of antisocial behaviour. This is estimated to amount to around £760,000 per annum across all local authorities. Similar costs for RSLs are estimated to amount to £940,000 per annum. However, significant savings are expected as a result of reduction in legal costs outsourced and incurred by RSLs in respect of evictions and appeals. This is estimated to amount to savings of approximately £1,680,000 per annum.

7. Table 1 provides an index of the Bill items, cross referencing them with their respective section number(s), detailing where they can be found in the Financial Memorandum and the expected commencement date. Table 2 provides a summary of the additional costs and savings expected as a result of the Bill provisions being introduced.

PART 1 - RIGHT TO BUY

INTRODUCTION

8. This section of the Financial Memorandum sets out the expected costs and savings of the provisions in the Bill (at sections 1-2) on the reform to the right to buy (RTB), which will end RTB entitlements for all tenants of social housing in Scotland. The intention of this reform is to create a fairer, less complex system that safeguards social housing for future generations while balancing the rights of tenants against the needs of social landlords and the wider benefits to society as a whole. It considers the financial implications for the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses.

9. The Bill includes provisions to end all RTB entitlements in Scotland. A proposal to move all tenants with preserved RTB entitlements onto modernised terms was also consulted on but not pursued. This option was not widely supported by stakeholders. It was considered that it would not remove the complexities of the current system and would not offer as great a wider benefit to the community.

10. This section of the Memorandum sets out the financial impacts which will arise as a consequence of ending all RTB entitlements and the timescales over which these impacts are expected to arise.
RTB sales trends and assumptions

11. This section presents a summary of historic RTB sales trends and an explanation of how these trends have been used to inform future estimates of RTB sales and financial impacts. RTB sales numbers are driven by individual decisions by tenants with RTB entitlements to purchase their properties. Purchase decisions are affected by factors such as the value of the property, the personal financial circumstances of the tenant and wider housing market and credit availability conditions.

12. RTB sales have varied greatly over the last 30 years, with sales peaking in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Since then there has been a considerable decline in RTB sales, apart from a slight rise in the early 2000s resulting from a surge in sales associated with the introduction of the modernised RTB in the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 ("the 2001 Act"). RTB sales have fallen mainly because most tenants who are able to purchase have already done so, resulting in the sale of most of the more desirable properties. The significantly less generous discount conditions under modernised RTB compared to preserved RTB can be seen to have further depressed sales as they offer less of an incentive to buy. The number of tenants with preserved RTB reduces over time as, in most cases, when tenants with preserved RTB entitlements move house, they move onto modernised entitlements. Apart from the reduced incentive, there are circumstances in which tenants cannot exercise modernised RTB (in pressured areas; in Registered social landlords (RSLs) that are subject to the ten-year suspension; and where they occupy a new-supply house (one built or acquired after 28 June 2008)).

13. Since 2007, RTB sales have been declining further as a result of the housing market downturn associated with the credit crunch. This has created additional uncertainty when trying to estimate future RTB sales numbers. Lower house prices may encourage some tenants to buy their property, whereas others may either be unwilling to take on the risk of a mortgage or simply unable to access the necessary credit. In order to make the analysis as simple but as informative as possible under these uncertain conditions, the assumption has been made that the rate of sales of social housing will stay constant each year and three variations in this sales rate have been examined reflecting different housing market scenarios. The sales rate is defined as the number of sales as a percentage of all stock. The rates presented below provide a reasonably realistic range of potential RTB sales numbers under different economic conditions:

- high sales rate – this approximately reflects the latest five-year average rate of sales (0.60% of all properties sold each year).
- medium sales rate – this approximately reflects the latest three-year average rate of sales over the latest available year (0.32% of all properties sold each year).
- low sales rate - this approximately reflects what the Scottish Government understands to be the latest year sales rate (0.26% of all properties sold each year).

14. The impact of ending RTB was compared to the base case which reflects the number of RTB sales that the Scottish Government would expect to occur under current RTB legislation. Under the base case, excluding contractual RTB sales by RSLs and voluntary sales, it is estimated that there will be between 12,500 and 15,500 sales over 10 years (based on sales rate in 2011/12). This assumes the level of social stock remains unchanged over the period, which is feasible as any new build would not be eligible for sale.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

15. Ending RTB will have a minimal impact on central government expenditure. The Scottish Government receives income from local authority and RSL RTB sales, which is channelled into the Affordable Housing Supply Programme (AHSP). This contribution has diminished annually as RTB sales numbers have decreased and was estimated to be £2.3 million for 2012/13. The chief impact will be on social landlords’ capital receipts and rental income, as described in the following sections.

Costs on Local Authorities

16. This section presents a summary of local authorities’ views on the long term financial impact of ending RTB (which were sought as part of the consultation process) and estimates the financial impacts on local authority landlords of ending RTB.

17. Local authorities are one of two types of social landlord that provide housing for rent at less than market rates, mainly, but not exclusively, for those on low incomes. 26 local authorities provide social housing in their respective areas (six others having divested themselves of their housing stock to RSLs that were created to acquire and manage it). The other type of social landlord is a RSL. The impacts of RTB reforms upon RSLs are presented in the next section.

Local authority housing finance

18. Local authorities generate financial resources from rental income, non-rental income (e.g. service charges) and capital receipts. Local authorities can use these financial resources to support investment directly or indirectly through borrowing. The investment might take place in the existing housing stock, to build new housing, for housing-related environmental enhancements that relate specifically to the Housing Revenue Account (HRA) stock and benefit tenants directly or to repay outstanding debt.

19. RTB sales have in the past provided the major source of capital receipts for local authorities, although this is no longer the case. Selling a house leads to a number of quite complicated, opposite, short- and long-term financial effects. Firstly, the landlord is no longer liable for future investment in the house although in practice the landlord often ends up paying for some common repairs where owners cannot or will not pay. The sale should also, either immediately or over time, result in a reduction in the landlord’s total management and maintenance costs, but this depends on the landlord’s ability to make changes to its business to realise the potential saving. If the capital receipt from the sale is used to extinguish any outstanding debt on the property (all local authorities have debt associated with the stock to a lesser of greater degree), then there will also be no future payments required to service the debt by the remaining council tenants. However, if some or none of the debt is repaid by the receipt then the remaining tenants will be liable for the remaining debt servicing payments which could run for a further 10, 20, 30 or more years. On the other hand, the future rental income from the house (typically £3,000 per annum per property) will be lost to the local authority as the tenant will no longer be required to pay rent.

Local authorities’ views on financial impacts

20. Of the 25 local authorities who commented on the financial impact in their consultation response, only five thought the financial impact could or would be negative and only one did not support reform. None of even these authorities said that reform would be unmanageable. Most local authorities stated that the income lost as a result of losing RTB receipts would be minimal or not significant, and would be offset positively by rental income over the longer term, and outweighed by the positive benefits of reforming the RTB more generally. This position was prominent where local authorities had seen a significant reduction in the RTB sales over recent years and expected further reductions in future.

21. In the past, there may have been some concern that local authorities, and also RSLs that had acquired stock through Large Scale Voluntary Transfer (LSVT), may be more dependent on RTB sales, but this concern did not manifest itself strongly in the consultation responses. Given that the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 ended RTB for new tenants and new-supply houses, and extended the provisions for pressured area designations, and given the small number of RTB sales, landlords have already become accustomed to reduced income from RTB sales.

22. Whilst it was noted from the consultation responses that borrowing and rent setting were the main options available to landlords, responses showed that measures such as reviewing existing business plans and investment programmes could help landlords deal with any capital shortfalls.

23. Because of the above, and the fact that the proposed reform is intended to commence in 2017, there should be little or no impact on availability of resources to meet the 2015 Scottish Housing Quality Standard target.

24. Landlords themselves are best placed to be able to take a view on the financial impacts of the proposed reforms based on their individual circumstances. The Scottish Government’s estimates, however, support the views of landlords that ending RTB will not greatly affect social landlords’ capacity to invest in their stock and that uncertainty associated with current economic conditions is likely to have much more effect.

Flexibility available to local authorities

25. Local authority landlords will continue to be able to dispose of houses on a voluntary basis - sometimes known as a "contractual" RTB. These general consent powers are set out in section 14 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 (“the 1987 Act”). These powers are intended to be used for sales to sitting tenants or for disposing of stock that is difficult to let.
26. The sale should be at the best consideration that can reasonably be obtained. At one time Scottish Ministers had powers under section 74 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 as amended by section 11 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 to consent to a sale at less than best consideration, but any such sale is now entirely a matter for the local authority.

27. A local authority can also, with Ministers’ consent, dispose of properties to individuals or RSLs (for example) under section 12(7) of the 1987 Act, which is often followed by a demolition of the houses. Alternatively, it can transfer them to the General Fund under section 203(2) of 1987 Act, where again they may be demolished or used for purposes other than general letting e.g. social work.

Estimating the financial impacts of RTB reforms on local authorities

28. Although there will be a reduction in local authorities’ immediate income from RTB receipts as a result of the reform, and three local authorities felt that there may be a short-term increase in borrowing, this should be at least offset and probably more than offset by the long-term benefit of continued rental income (net of associated operating costs) from the stock not sold as a result of the reforms. Crucially, the benefit resulting from the retained net rental surplus would continue to be received over the remaining lifetime of the properties. If sales continue at current levels, the Scottish Government estimates that up to 15,500 units could be retained over a 10-year period. However, this figure is difficult to predict and could increase if the general economic situation improved and mortgage funding became easier to obtain.

29. The main effect of ending RTB over the short term would be a fall in income from selling homes. However, over the longer term, there would be continuing rental income from properties that might otherwise have been sold. In some cases, this could give more rental surplus to borrow against for new housing or improving the existing stock than the money received from sales. Ending the right to buy may also reduce local authorities’ overall costs by helping them to better manage their stock.

30. Since rents in the social sector are below market levels, whether the rental surplus is worth more or less than the capital receipt will depend on how large the RTB discount is, how much below the market level the rents are and the level of the management and maintenance costs. The modelling indicates that, under the preserved right to buy, with its generous discounts, local authorities are likely to be in a better financial position if houses remain part of their stock rather than being sold. In contrast, under the less generous discounts of the modernised right to buy, the sales income may realistically be more than the net rental surplus, and there may be no financial advantage for landlords in keeping the property. Putting these two conclusions together, by ending RTB, since most sales take place under the preserved right to buy, the overall financial effect is likely to be at least neutral, and may be positive.

31. There will be other advantages to retaining stock that transcend the sales receipt against rental stream model. Local authorities will have improved ability to manage their assets, as there will be a more predictable revenue stream. This may give them greater confidence to borrow over the long term.

32. The retained net rental surplus generated by not selling a property could be used in a number of ways to finance capital expenditure that would otherwise have been financed by a combination of RTB receipts and borrowing. Firstly, in any given year the surplus could be applied directly to funding capital works in that same year as indeed it can now. Many local authorities do fund significant amounts of capital expenditure from current revenue (CFCR). Secondly, the surplus could contribute to reserves available for use in subsequent years to fund capital expenditure. Finally, if there was a need to fund capital expenditure up front, local authorities, through their prudential borrowing capacity, could use the future net rental surplus (assuming they are generating such a surplus as not all currently do) over the lifetime of the property to pay for any borrowing needed to fund such investment.

33. In these ways it is possible for local authorities to convert revenue streams into capital investment, and thus the retained net rental surplus can be used to compensate for any shortfall in capital funding due to lower RTB receipts. This will only occur sustainably, however, if there is a net rental surplus in the first place i.e. rents are sufficiently high to cover costs or alternatively costs sufficiently low to lie below rental income.

34. Income derived from RTB sales receipts represents a decreasing relative share of local authorities’ funding for capital expenditure. In 2007/08 the capital returns submitted by local authorities to the Scottish Government indicated that capital receipts from RTB sales were equivalent to 46% of total HRA capital expenditure. By 2011/12, capital receipts from RTB sales were equivalent to only 7% of total HRA capital expenditure.

35. Year on year, ending RTB should gradually promote greater long-term financial sustainability within the sector by rebalancing local authorities’ business models away from volatile capital income derived from the sale of assets under RTB and increasing their reliance on more stable revenue income from rents.

36. Social landlords are best placed to assess the impact of reforms on their finances due to their detailed knowledge of their individual circumstances, including which stock would be eligible for RTB. However, the Scottish Government has done some modelling based on national data for local authorities, to give an indication of the impact of RTB reforms on the local authority sector as whole.

37. If a local authority retains a house, it will receive a rental stream from that house. However, it will also have to incur costs associated with the house, such as supervision and management, repairs and maintenance, and capital expenditure relating to major repairs to the house. The rental surplus from retaining the house is calculated as the value of the rents less the associated costs over the remaining lifetime of the property. These figures are expressed in present value terms, which involves discounting a future stream of costs and benefits in order to calculate an equivalent amount in today’s money. It should be noted that debt service costs are not included in the calculation. This is because the debt has already been incurred: thus the local authority is liable for the debt service costs regardless of whether the house is sold under RTB or whether it is retained.

38. The Scottish Government collects aggregate data\(^1\) from local authority landlords. Data for average rents, supervision and management costs and repairs and maintenance costs were taken from the HRA returns supplied by local authority landlords to the Government. Data for capital expenditure were taken from the capital returns supplied by local authorities to the Scottish Government. The most recent rents were used as a base from which to start modelling. Since costs fluctuate much more over time, a long-average of real costs (i.e. adjusted for inflation) was used for this data.

39. However, it is likely that the houses sold under RTB are in relatively better condition than the average house, and thus have higher rents and a lower requirement for repairs and maintenance and major repairs. In addition, supervision and management costs may not be very responsive to changes in the number of RTB sales. The explanation for this is that the presence of fixed costs involved in managing housing stock makes this type of expenditure less responsive to changes in stock than maintenance and capital expenditure. In the past, this has made it difficult for local authority landlords to reduce supervision and management costs as stock levels have fallen due to RTB sales. Correspondingly, following the abolition of RTB, it should be possible for local authority landlords to manage these retained houses within the same supervision and management budgets, i.e. there will be limited or no additional supervision and management costs required to manage the retained stock than under the no-reform scenario.

40. Various scenarios were therefore constructed. In Scenario A, national averages are used, and then in Scenarios B and C, various adjustments are made for the likely higher rents and lower costs associated with RTB stock as outlined at table 3.

Since these calculations are based on future rents and costs, it is necessary to estimate what these might be in order to calculate the rental surplus. Rents are assumed to grow at inflation plus 1.5%, in line with historic trends. Costs are assumed to grow at the same rate as inflation, which reflects the general need for government expenditure to be contained given the current fiscal climate. The discount rate used to calculate the net present value is a real rate of 3.5% - the rate recommended by HM Treasury’s Green Book for Appraisal and Evaluation in Central Government. Figures were calculated over the remaining life of the property. Because the remaining life can vary depending on the state of the property, totals were calculated for 30, 40 and 50 years. The rental surplus is then compared to the average capital receipt under modernised terms and preserved terms in 2011/12. An estimate of the combined impact is obtained by multiplying by the number of sales in 2011/12 for each type of sale.

Due to the limitations of working with aggregate data, and the fact that estimates are based on future variables, different outcomes could be feasible and these are shown in table 4. What table 4 shows is that, while it is not impossible that the net rental surplus could be less than the capital receipt under preserved RTB, under a range of plausible assumptions it is likely to be higher. However, the assumptions under which the net rental surplus would be higher than the capital receipt under modernised RTB are much more stringent. Despite this, because the vast majority of sales are on the preserved terms, in most cases where the net rental surplus exceeds the capital receipt from preserved RTB, then the overall impact of the reform will also be positive on this measure, even if the rental surplus is less than the capital receipt from modernised RTB sales.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

43. This section presents the financial impacts of RTB reforms upon RSLs, social housing tenants and other UK departments / bodies.

Registered social landlords

44. RSL respondents were also supportive of the proposed reform. None of the RSLs who responded to the consultation thought that the financial impact on them would be negative. Charitable RSLs are exempt from the RTB and, therefore, the proposed reform would not have any financial impact on their organisation. For the larger RSLs it was noted that many can and already are adjusting financial plans to accommodate any rebalancing of income away from RTB receipts to greater dependency on rental income.

45. RTB sales are a relatively less important source of capital funding for RSLs than for local authority landlords. In general, RSLs sell proportionally fewer properties under RTB than local authorities because most RSL tenants have either no RTB entitlement (for example, if the RSL is a charity) or have had their modernised RTB entitlements suspended until 2022. Local authority landlords have consistently sold a much higher proportion of their total stock (previously up to 1%) than RSLs (for whom the figure is usually below 0.5%). The figure for local authorities in 2009/2010 and 2010/2011 was 0.5%, decreasing to 0.4% in 2011/12. For RSLs it was 0.2% in 2009/10 and 2010/11, decreasing to 0.15% in 2011/12. These sales rates for local authority and RSL stock reflect that the majority of sales are under preserved terms. The impact of RTB reforms upon RSLs’ investment capacity was not modelled as for local authorities because the information collected by the Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR) on the sale of RSL assets is not suitable for this type of analysis.

46. RSLs’ capacity to invest in new and existing stock will not be significantly affected by the RTB reforms because RSLs do not and are not expecting to use RTB sales receipts as the main source of funding for these activities. The majority of funding for new RSL housing comes from capital grants from Scottish Government and private borrowing from banks and other institutions. Therefore RSLs typically only rely on minor contributions from RTB sales receipts. Like local authorities, they would retain any capital receipt (except where a RSL has acquired a property from Scottish Homes or through a stock transfer from a local authority). The receipts may be reinvested in the housing supply programme to displace further borrowing, used to keep rental increases below what they would otherwise be or added to reserves. However, RSLs are generally much more reliant on their incoming rental income and borrowing and, therefore, less reliant on RTB sales for this purpose than local authority landlords.
47. Six RSLs were created specifically to acquire and manage housing stock which was transferred from the following councils: Glasgow City, Inverclyde, Argyll and Bute, Dumfries and Galloway, Scottish Borders and Eilean Siar. The picture for these six stock transfer RSLs is somewhat different because a proportion of their tenants will have kept their preserved RTB entitlements when they transferred from their local authority landlord and may exercise their RTB at any time (subject to any conditions agreed as part of the stock transfer process or limits to their discount imposed by the cost floor rules). The capital receipts from any transferred stock are also treated differently (either retained or passed back to the Scottish Government to fund the AHSP) depending on the particular stock transfer.

48. These six stock-transfer RSLs are subject to additional monitoring by the Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR) and Scottish Government. In addition to routine submissions of information that are required of all RSLs, the six stock-transfer RSLs also submit business plans to SHR on an annual basis. SHR monitors progress made by stock-transfer RSLs in relation to registration conditions and also assesses how governance and management arrangements are working. SHR looks for assurances that these organisations: are investing in their stock (as promised to their tenants); are developing structures for devolved decision-making (through consultation with tenants); and have strategies in place for managing risks to their businesses.

49. In addition to the statutory RTB, RSLs may, if they so wish, consider disposing of houses to sitting tenants on a voluntary basis. The relevant provisions relating to RSLs are in sections 65 to 68 of the 2001 Act and require the consent of the Scottish Ministers. Scottish Ministers have delegated authority for this to the SHR, which has issued section 66 guidance relating to voluntary sales and disposals.

Social housing tenants

50. There was strong support for reform from tenants’ organisations. The reforms could retain up to 15,500 additional units in the social rented sector over 10 years, thus allowing more households to benefit from the greater security of tenure and lower average rents in the sector compared to private renting options. Responses received from the consultation indicate that some tenants do have concerns that decreasing RTB sales receipts could result in rent increases. However, although this is a decision for individual landlords, the Scottish Government considers that there should not be significant upward pressure on rents. If a landlord needs an amount of capital equivalent to that which would have come from RTB sales, the rental surplus on the units not sold as a result of the reforms should be adequate to cover the costs of borrowing the necessary additional principal. Even if the costs of borrowing this additional principal did require to be partially met from increases to rents across a landlord’s total stock, the Scottish Government does not think that this should be significant because the number of RTB sales foregone should be small relative to the number of units still generating rental income.

51. If a social landlord did consider increasing rents, there are provisions within the 2001 Act which place duties on social landlords to consult with tenants specifically on rent setting and a range of other housing and related matters.
Other bodies

52. If social landlords decide to increase rents or borrowing in order to compensate for reduced capital receipts that may result from ending RTB, this may increase housing benefit claims to the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) and, in the short term, applications from local authorities for loans to the Public Works Loan Board (PWLB). The effects of the reforms in retaining up to 15,500 additional homes within the social rented sector should mean that this number of households will be subject to lower rents than they might have paid in alternative private rented accommodation and may therefore have a reduced requirement for housing benefit support. There is also evidence emerging that RTB properties end up in the private rented sector. A recent Glasgow University study suggests that 43% of local housing allowance housing benefit claims in Renfrewshire are ex-RTB properties. The report estimates that the UK Government is paying an extra £3 million each year in housing benefit in Renfrewshire alone, compared to what it would have paid if those houses were still owned by the council.

Summary of financial implications of ending RTB entitlements

53. The chief impact of the reform will be on social landlords. They are broadly supportive of the reforms and are in the best position to assess any financial impact that may arise from them. Social landlords are of the view that no significant negative impact should arise as a result of the reform. Social landlords are already adjusting their businesses to accommodate the impact of falling RTB receipts as a result of the reforms in the 2010 Act and current housing market conditions. Moreover, as discussed previously, the financial impacts of RTB reforms should not be significant and thus any rent increases or additional loans that arise as a result of the reforms should not be significant.

54. This reform will improve the financial sustainability of the sector by continuing to promote reliance on income derived from rents and ending reliance on income derived from the sale of assets at a discount. This should in turn give all social landlords greater control over management of their assets and thus promote their strategic planning capacity to meet demand for social housing.

PART 2 - SOCIAL HOUSING

INTRODUCTION

55. This section of the Financial Memorandum sets out the expected costs and savings of the provisions in the Bill (at sections 3-16) on the allocation of social housing, the short Scottish secure tenancy (short SST) and the Scottish secure tenancy (SST). It considers the financial implications for the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses.

56. The expected costs and savings were arrived at with the assistance of the Scottish Court Service, Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers, the Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations, the Chartered Institute of Housing Scotland, the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations, the Antisocial Behaviour...
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

Officers’ Forum and the Antisocial Behaviour Lawyers’ Forum. There was extensive consultation with these key stakeholders on the content of this section of the Financial Memorandum between February and September 2013, with discussions at the Affordable Rented Housing Advisory Group (ARHAG) meetings of 21 February and 19 June 2013 and discussions with individual RSLs as part of the Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment (BRIA). The BRIA\(^2\) sets out more detail on consultation.

57. Stakeholders acknowledged that it was difficult to obtain information to inform this Financial Memorandum because landlords do not routinely collect the information to the level of detail required for the proposed changes to legislation. However, stakeholders recognised that this is a comprehensive and robust effort to identify the overall level of direct financial costs for social landlords. Landlords were content with the assumptions made about the number of cases and that the best use had been made of the data that was available. The costs and savings for individual social landlords will depend on whether, and to what extent, they use the tools available to them.

ALLOCATION OF SOCIAL HOUSING

58. In Part 2, the Bill includes the following provisions:

- Reasonable preference in allocation of social housing and rules on priority of allocation of housing: consultation (sections 3 and 4). Replaces the groups social landlords must give reasonable preference to in the allocation of their housing with a broader definition. Under this definition, social landlords will have to determine which groups they will prioritise. Scottish Ministers will be able to determine groups which all social landlords must include in their policy. Social landlords will have to publish a statement setting out the rationale for their priority groups and who they consulted.

- Factors which may be considered in allocation: age (section 5). Allows social landlords to take account of an applicant’s age in the allocation of housing (within existing equalities legislation).

- Factors which may be considered in allocation: ownership of property (section 6). Allows social landlords to consider property the applicant or a member of the applicant’s household owns or has owned (unless it would be unreasonable for them to occupy the property).

- Determination of minimum period for application to remain in force (section 7). Allows social landlords, in specified circumstances, to set a minimum period before an applicant is eligible for housing. Scottish Ministers will determine the maximum preceding period or periods over which landlords can consider behaviour and the maximum period or periods that landlords could make an applicant ineligible for the allocation of housing. Also introduces a new right for tenants to appeal a landlord’s decision to make them ineligible for the allocation of housing.

\(^2\) Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment for the Housing Bill: Social Housing
Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

59. There are no significant direct costs associated with the provisions for the Scottish Administration, other than some resource implications in producing guidance and the development of secondary legislation. These relate to setting out the groups that Scottish Ministers decide social landlords must include in their allocation policies and the maximum period or periods for which an applicant can be made ineligible for the allocation of social housing. These costs are expected to be minimal and to be absorbed within existing budgets.

Scottish Court Service costs

60. The new right of appeal to the courts in section 7 is expected to result in around 50 cases per year\(^3\). The Scottish Court Service has indicated that the impact of this number of cases, across Scotland, would be minimal with additional costs estimated around £5,000 and could be absorbed within existing court budgets.

Costs on local authorities

61. Local authorities will want to review their allocation policies given the increased flexibilities in these provisions. The size of the landlord and their housing list, what changes they wish to make and whether the review will be in-house will all affect the implications for local authorities. Landlords estimate that revising an allocation policy can cost around £10,000 (costs of consulting tenants and changes to IT, application forms and information for applicants). However, it is normal practice for local authorities regularly to review their allocation policies and, therefore, these provisions are not expected to result in additional costs for them. There may be minimal costs for the new requirement to publish a statement to accompany an allocation policy.

62. In terms of continuing costs, local authorities already verify applications and, therefore, the provisions in sections 5 or 6 are not expected to result in direct costs for local authorities. There may be modest additional staff time for monitoring applications for social housing from homeowners\(^4\), but there is no indication that this will result in a need for additional staffing.

63. The provision in section 7 formalises existing practice by local authorities and will not therefore result in additional costs for them. The new right for tenants to appeal to the courts may have implications for local authority legal staff. The number of cases, based on complaints to the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO) about applications,\(^5\)

\(^3\) See paragraphs 62 and 66.

\(^4\) Statistics on new RSL tenants from the Scottish Continuous Recording System (SCORE) indicate that around 1,100 of the 26,000 RSL lets a year are to people who own or are buying property. Equivalent statistics are not available for local authorities but there are a similar number of total lets by them each year and assuming the same number of applications to local authorities from homeowners then the number of lets to homeowners is anticipated to be small.
allocations and transfers are estimated at around 26 per year\textsuperscript{5}. Following consultation with stakeholders, it is expected that the implications for local authorities will be in terms of a modest amount of staff time rather than additional financial costs.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

Registered social landlords (RSLs)

64. Like local authorities, RSLs regularly review their allocation policies and it is expected that the implications of these provisions for RSLs will be a modest increase in staff time rather than direct costs. There may be minimal costs per RSL for publishing the statement to accompany their allocation policy.

65. As is the case with local authorities, the verification of homeowner applications might require additional staff time, but not additional staffing and therefore no direct costs. Similarly, landlords’ consideration of age is not expected to result in additional direct cost to RSLs.

66. The provision in section 7 formalises RSLs’ existing practice and will not, therefore, result in additional costs for RSLs. The introduction of a new right of appeal for tenants may however result in additional costs to RSLs. If applicants who currently complain to the SPSO take legal action instead, then that would be around 22 RSL applicants\textsuperscript{6}. The expected small number of cases, means that the financial implications for RSLs are expected to be around £22,000 across all RSLs (around £1,000 per case resulting from outsourced legal services).

SHORT SCOTTISH SECURE TENANCY

67. Part 2 of the Bill also includes the following provisions:

- Creation of short Scottish secure tenancy: antisocial behaviour (section 8).
  Gives social landlords the flexibility to grant short SSTs or convert existing SSTs to short SSTs where applicants or tenants have acted antisocially in or near their home within the last three years. Social landlords must provide or ensure the provision of housing support services they consider appropriate to enable the conversion of the tenancy to a SST.

- Grant of short Scottish secure tenancy: homeowners (section 9).
  Gives social landlords the flexibility to grant short SSTs to homeowners who require housing, to enable them to meet their own housing need.

\textsuperscript{5} Estimated number of complaints to the SPSO about local authority housing which relate to applications, allocations and transfers. A category breakdown is not available for local authorities beyond ‘housing’ for which there were 341 complaints in 2011/12. To estimate the number of housing cases that relate to allocations the percentage of housing complaints about RSLs that fall into the category of ‘applications, allocations and transfers’ (7.7%) is used as a percentage of the 341 housing complaints against local authorities (7.7% of 341 = 26).

- Short Scottish secure tenancy: term (section 10). Extends the minimum term from 6 to 12 months for short SSTs that are intended to automatically convert to a SST at 12 months. It also clarifies the terms of a tenancy when it changes from a SST to a short SST and back again to a SST.

- Short Scottish secure tenancy: extension of term (section 11). Introduces an extension for short SSTs that are intended to convert to SSTs at 12 months for a further one-off period of six months.

- Short Scottish secure tenancy: recovery of possession (section 12). Introduces a new requirement on social landlords to give tenants reasons why they are seeking to recover possession of any property let under a short SST. Introduces a right for tenants whose short SST is not going to convert to a SST to require their social landlord to review the decision to seek recovery of possession before court action is taken. Also, resolves issues that prevent landlords from taking action to recover possession under a short SST by way of the SST procedure at any time during the term of a short SST.

Scottish Government

68. There are no significant direct costs associated with the provisions for the Scottish Administration, other than some resource implications in producing guidance and the development of secondary legislation, which amends the notice for tenants to include reasons for seeking recovery of possession (section 12). These costs are expected to be minimal and they will be absorbed within existing budgets.

Scottish Court Service

69. Following consultation with the Scottish Court Service the provisions are not expected to result in any significant additional financial costs. While there may be an increase in appeals about landlords’ decisions to offer short SSTs, estimated at around 596 cases per year across Scotland⁷, this will be partly offset by around 60 fewer eviction cases per year⁸. The use of the short SST is expected to result in a reduction of evictions, as well as a reduction in court time for eviction cases that do go to court. The Scottish Court Service has indicated that the impact of the increased numbers of appeals per year, across Scotland, taking into account the predicted reduction in eviction cases and court time would be minimal.

Costs on local authorities

70. There is an existing requirement to provide housing support services to tenants with a history of antisocial behaviour who have been given short SSTs that are intended to convert to SSTs after 12 months. The support provided is that which landlords consider appropriate with a view to enabling the conversion of the tenancy. Homeless applicants will already have had their need for housing support services assessed and any support provided as part of the new housing support duty for homeless households, which came into force on 1 June 2013. The costs of providing housing support services under the housing support duty are estimated to be £2,970 per client per year (£1,485 per 6 months)\(^9\).

71. The provisions in sections 8 and 11 mean that assessments on the need for housing support services will be required in around 3,000 cases by local authorities across Scotland\(^10\). Stakeholders indicate this is likely to have a limited impact in terms of staff time and is not expected to result in the need for additional staffing and therefore direct costs for local authorities.

72. Estimates of the potential costs of providing housing support are set out below:

- Data on applicants suspended from receiving an offer of housing suggests that local authorities may, under the provision in section 8, grant a short SST to around 60 new tenants each year\(^11\). With around 42% of lets to homeless applicants\(^12\) it is expected that around 25 of these 60 new tenants will already have been assessed and be receiving any housing support services required under the housing support duty for homeless households. Of the remaining, around a third of applicants are expected to require housing support services\(^13\). The cost of 12 months of housing support services for the remaining 35 new tenants is therefore estimated to be £35,640 (12 cases requiring support (1/3 of 35) x £2,970) across 26 local authorities.

- Section 8 also means that local authorities may convert existing tenancies to short SSTs. It may affect existing tenants who engage in more than two instances of antisocial behaviour. Using available statistics it is estimated that local authorities manage around 5,282 antisocial behaviour cases (households) per year\(^14\). If tenancies are converted to short SSTs in 50% of these 5,282 cases, that \(^9\) Discussions with landlords on the Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment confirmed that there is significant variation in the type, costs and duration of support. Members of the Affordable Rented Housing Advisory Group suggested the costs of the new housing support duty for homeless households. These costs were set out in the Financial Memorandum for the 2010 Act (http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S3_Bills/Housing%20(Scotland)%20Bill/b36as3-stage2-fm.pdf) and were based on supporting people support costs in 2004 (Table 2.1 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/Doc/207283/0055011.pdf) uprated for inflation. The figures have been further uprated to reflect the period since the 2010 Act.

\(^10\) See bullet points in paragraph 72 (35 + 2,641 + 273 = 2,949)

\(^11\) Scottish Government statistics indicate that around 550 applicants were made ineligible for the allocation of housing between 2011 and 2012 across the 26 local authorities (http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0040/00400707.xls). Information from local authorities suggests most relate to rent arrears. A reasonable estimate that 10% could relate to previous antisocial behaviour means that around 60 applicants each year may be offered short SSTs under this new ground.

\(^12\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0040/00409265.xls (11,445 lets to statutory homeless applicants by local authorities/27,226 total lets by local authorities x 100 = 42%)

would be around 2,641 converted tenancies\textsuperscript{15}. The cost of housing support services for this group of existing tenants is estimated to be £2,613,600 (880 cases requiring support (1/3 of 2,641 tenancies) x £2,970) across 26 local authorities (0.28% of total rental income for local authorities\textsuperscript{16}).

The provision in section 10 replaces two 6 month tenancies, with a single 12 month tenancy and is therefore not expected to result in additional financial costs for local authorities. The provision in section 11, will potentially extend the period of support by six months for a small number of tenants (around 273 cases a year\textsuperscript{17}) and therefore the additional costs are expected to be £405,405 (273 x £1,485) across 26 local authorities (0.04% of total rental income for local authorities\textsuperscript{18}).

73. The above calculations are expected to be a very high estimate of the potential costs of providing housing support. This is because the costs are based on local authorities funding all of the housing support being provided, however stakeholders have said that the majority of housing support services are already being provided by NHS or social work due to the existing broader support needs of applicants and tenants or are provided by way of advice and \textsuperscript{15} The percentage of tenancies that will be converted to short SSTs will depend on landlords use of the flexibilities in the legislation. Some will use it more than others. It is anticipated that landlords will want to ensure they have a robust case for converting a SST to a short SST to avoid legal challenge in the courts as well as human rights issues. An assumption of 50% has therefore been used for the calculation.

\textsuperscript{17} There are currently 2 grounds for granting short SSTs that would be able to be extended for a further period of six months under provision 11. Current statistics indicate that there are around 30 short SSTs granted under these two grounds. Most short SSTs are expected to convert to SSTs at 12 months due to the provision of housing support and the potential impact support and a short SST will have on behaviour. But, if concerns were to remain about 10% of these 30 tenants at 12 months then short SSTs would be extended in three cases. The new ground for granting short SSTs for previous antisocial behaviour could add a further 273 cases (10% of 60 short SSTs for new tenants and 2,641 converted tenancies for existing tenants as set out in paragraph 71). The total number of cases which could be extended for a further six months is therefore 6 + 264 + 3 = 273.

assistance by housing officers. The actual financial cost to landlords will depend on the type of support provided and who is providing it. The range of potential costs of support based on 25%, 50% and 100% of the costs calculated in paragraph 72 are set out below. Given that the majority of housing support is not funded by social landlords, a best estimate of the financial cost to local authorities is 25% of the costs calculated in paragraph 72.

74. Applicants and tenants have the right to appeal a landlord’s decision to offer them a short SST rather than a SST, or a proposal to convert their secure tenancy to a short SST, in the courts. The provisions under sections 8 and 9 may, therefore, result in a small increase in cases (270 appeals per year under section 8\(^{18}\) and around 50 per year under section 9\(^{19}\)). This may have modest implications for local authority legal staff but the implications are expected to be in terms of staff time rather than additional financial costs.

75. The provisions under sections 8, 9 and 12 will require local authorities to amend their systems. There are therefore likely to be minimal one-off costs for local authorities. Social landlords have indicated that tenants would be aware of the reason for seeking recovery of possession (section 12) and local authorities already have internal processes and procedures for granting short SSTs (these will be used for the provisions under sections 8 and 9), including internal appeals mechanisms (section 12). Therefore, there are no continuing costs related to tenancy changes as a result of these provisions.

Savings

76. The intention behind section 8 is to allow local authorities to intervene in a meaningful way at an early stage of antisocial behaviour. The provision would allow local authorities to convert a SST to a short SST after two or more incidents of antisocial behaviour. Limited evidence related to the development of the antisocial behaviour framework in Scotland suggests that “around 50% of perpetrators will desist from antisocial behaviour to keep their tenancy secure”\(^{20}\). This is supported by anecdotal evidence from landlords. Therefore, if local authorities use the new flexibilities, this is likely to result in benefits in terms of a reduction in the monitoring and management of antisocial behaviour.

\(^{18}\) Based on an assumption of appeals in around 10% of the 60 short SSTs to new tenants and 2,641 converted short SSTs for existing tenants (see paragraph 71).

\(^{19}\) Statistics from the Scottish Continuous Recording System (SCORE) on new RSL lets indicate that there have consistently been 1000 lets a year over the last 10 years to people whose previous living circumstances were recorded as owning/buying. If around 50% of these lets were by short SSTs that would be around 500 lets per year. If 10% of these were to appeal that would be 50 appeals per year.

\(^{20}\) ‘Promoting Positive Outcomes: Working Together to Prevent Antisocial Behaviour in Scotland – Volume 2:
77. Landlords estimate the average cost of monitoring and managing an antisocial behaviour case at £2,000 per annum\(^{21}\). The savings that could result if 50% of the 60 short SSTs for new tenants and 2,641 converted tenancies desisted from future antisocial behaviour would result in efficiencies of around £2,701,000 (£2,000 per case x 2,701 cases x 50%). These efficiencies will reflect a move from monitoring and managing antisocial behaviour to focus instead on early intervention and support to prevent the antisocial behaviour continuing or escalating. However, the extent to which these efficiencies will result in financial savings for individual landlords will depend on the extent to which the efficiencies release staff to work on other things.

78. It is expected that section 8 will result in a reduction in the number of evictions for antisocial behaviour. Statistics from the Scottish Government on the number of antisocial behaviour local authority cases that went to court in the last three years was an average of around 80 per year. It is difficult to gauge the impact of the changes in terms of a reduction in the number of cases that social landlords take to court due to antisocial behaviour. If short SSTs were used in 50% of cases\(^{13}\), that would be 40 short SSTs and if 50% of these were to desist from future antisocial behaviour (see paragraph 77), then a reasonable estimate might be 20 fewer local authority cases across Scotland (50% of 40 SSTs). The efficiencies are likely to be in staff time, which will offset the staff time required for other provisions.

79. Recovery of possession under section 8 would use the short SST eviction process, if eviction is necessary. As early intervention, the conversion of the tenancy and the provision of support are expected to have a positive impact on the majority of tenants it is expected that eviction will be a consideration in only a small minority of cases. The short SST eviction process does not require courts to consider the reasonableness of eviction action therefore local authorities will not have to prepare cases in the depth currently required to demonstrate that the action is reasonable. As legal services tend to be in-house in local authorities, the efficiencies are likely to be in staff time, which will offset the staff time required for other provisions.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

Registered social landlords (RSLs)

80. RSLs will need to undertake around 2,500 assessments on the need for housing support services across Scotland\(^{22}\). This is likely to have a limited impact in terms of staff time, but is not expected to result in the need for additional staffing and therefore direct costs for RSLs. RSLs will need to provide or ensure the provision of support as a result of a number of provisions:

- The continuing costs for RSLs as a result of section 8 will result from the requirement to ensure the provision of support that they deem necessary in each case. Data on applicants suspended from receiving an offer of housing suggests that RSLs may grant a short SST to around 11 new applicants each year\(^{23}\). Around 27% of RSL lets are to homeless applicants\(^{24}\), and therefore of these 11 new tenants around three will already have been assessed and be receiving housing support services under the housing support duty for homeless households. The cost of 12 months of housing support services for the remaining eight new tenants is estimated to be £8,910 (three cases requiring support (1/3\(^{25}\) of 8) x £2,970).

\(^{21}\) Estimated cost of resolving a more complex persistent ASB case provided by the Anti Social Behaviour Officers’ Forum to Scottish Government officials that may be avoided by early tenancy intervention.

- If tenancies are converted to short SSTs in an estimated 50% of the 4,500 cases of antisocial behaviour involving existing tenants\(^{26}\), that would be 2,250 converted tenancies. The cost of housing support services for this group of existing tenants is estimated to be £2,227,500 (750 cases requiring support (1/3\(^{23}\) of 2,250 tenancies) x £2,970) across 162 RSLs (0.22% of total rental income for RSLs\(^{27}\)).

- Section 10 replaces two six month tenancies, with a single 12 month tenancy and is therefore not expected to result in additional financial costs for RSLs. Section 11 will potentially extend the period of support by six months for a small number of tenants (around 232 cases a year\(^{28}\)) and therefore the additional costs are expected to be £344,520 (232 x £1,485) across 162 RSLs (0.03% of total rental income for RSLs\(^{25}\)).

81. As with local authorities the range of potential costs of support based on 25%, 50% and 100% of the costs calculated in paragraph 80 are as follows:

\(^{23}\) Scottish Housing Regulator statistics indicate that RSLs made around 112 applicants ineligible for the allocation of housing between 2009 and 2010. Information from local authorities suggests that most are related to rent arrears. A realistic estimate that 10% could relate to previous antisocial behaviour means that around 11 applicants each year may be offered short Scottish secure tenancies under this new ground.

\(^{24}\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0040/00409265.xls (7,660 lets to statutory homeless applicants by RSLs / 28,786 total lets by RSLs x 100 = 27%)

\(^{28}\) There are currently 2 grounds for granting short SSTs that would be able to be extended for a further period of 6 months under provision 11. Statistics are not available on the reasons for short SSTs granted by RSLs but statistics on the number of tenants evicted for antisocial behaviour in 2011/12 indicate that RSLs evicted almost twice as many as local authorities (64 compared to 36). So, if the Scottish Government assumes that RSLs grant around 60 short SSTs a year (twice as many as local authorities), and if concerns were to remain about 10% of these 60 tenants at 12 months then short SSTs would be extended in 6 cases. The new ground for granting short SSTs for previous antisocial behaviour could add a further 226 cases (10% of 10 short SSTs for new tenants and 2,250 converted tenancies for existing tenants as set out in paragraph 80). The total number of cases which could be extended for a further 6 months is therefore 1 + 225 + 6 = 232.
82. Applicants and tenants have the right to appeal a landlord’s decision to offer them a short SST rather than a SST, or a proposal to convert their secure tenancy to a short SST, in the courts. Sections 8 and 9 may result in a small increase in cases (226 appeals per year under section 8 and around 50 per year under section 9). As RSLs tend to outsource their legal services, the additional costs for RSLs of these additional cases are expected to be around £276,000 (276 cases x £1,000 per case).

83. The provisions under sections 8, 9 and 12 will require RSLs to amend their systems. There are, therefore, likely to be minimal one-off costs for RSLs. Social landlords have indicated that tenants would be aware of the reason for seeking recovery of possession (section 12) and RSLs already have internal processes and procedures for granting short SSTs (these will be used for the provisions under sections 8 and 9), including internal appeals mechanisms (section 12). Therefore, there are no continuing costs related to tenancy changes as a result of these provisions.

Savings

84. RSLs are expected to gain efficiencies from a reduction in antisocial behaviour by applicants and tenants through their use of short SSTs. With around 2,261 cases, a 50% reduction in antisocial behaviour is estimated to create savings of £2,261,000 (£2,000 per case x 2,261 cases x 50%). However, the extent to which these efficiencies will result in financial savings for individual landlords will depend on the extent to which the efficiencies release staff to work on other things.

85. Section 8 is expected to result in a reduction in the number of evictions for antisocial behaviour. Statistics from the Scottish Government on the number of antisocial behaviour local authority cases that went to court in the last three years was an average of around 80 per year. Figures are not available for RSLs, but statistics for 2011/12 on the number of tenants evicted indicated that RSLs evicted almost twice as many as local authorities (64 compared to 36). If twice as many RSL tenants than local authority tenants are taken to court for eviction then there are around 160 cases per year from RSLs seeking recovery of possession due to antisocial behaviour. It is difficult to gauge the impact of the changes in terms of a reduction in the number of cases that social landlords take to court due to antisocial behaviour. However, if short SSTs were used in 50% of cases, that would be 80 short SSTs and if 50% of these were to desist from future antisocial behaviour then a reasonable estimate might be 40 fewer RSL eviction cases across Scotland (50% of 80 SSTs). RSLs tend to outsource their legal services and RSLs have told the Scottish Government that an eviction case costs on average £7,000. A reasonable estimate therefore is that 162 RSLs would save around £280,000 (40 x £7,000).

29 Based on an assumption of appeals in around 10% of the 11 short SSTs to new tenants and 2,250 converted short SSTs for existing tenants (see bullet points paragraph 80).
30 Statistics from the Scottish Continuous Recording System (SCORE) on new RSL lets indicate that there have consistently been 1000 lets a year over the last 10 years to people whose previous living circumstances were recorded as owning/buying. If around 50% of these lets were by short SSTs that would be around 500 lets per year. If 10% of these were to appeal that would be 50 appeals per year.
31 11 cases a year for new tenants and 2,250 converted tenancies a year (see paragraph 80).
32 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Statistics/Browse/Housing-Regeneration/HSfS/Evictions
86. The 2,261 short SSTs granted under section 8\(^{33}\) would use the short SST eviction process, if eviction is necessary. Again, eviction is expected to be a consideration in a small minority of cases. The short SST eviction process is more straightforward than the SST eviction process as it does not require courts to consider the reasonableness of eviction action. RSLs tend to outsource legal services, which are then an additional financial cost to organisations. RSLs have told the Scottish Government through engagement on the business and regulatory impact of the provisions that a straightforward eviction costs in the region of £1,000 but an eviction that requires repeat attendance at court costs on average £7,000. Therefore an estimate of the saving per case from this provision is around £6,000. If 10% of tenancies result in eviction action, that is around 226 cases, then a reasonable estimate is that RSLs would save around £1,356,000 (226 x £6,000).

87. The additional options available for tackling antisocial behaviour will not only have benefits for local authorities, they will also benefit communities who will experience a reduction in antisocial behaviour and will consequently benefit other organisations involved in its management, such as the police. It is not possible to quantify these benefits.

SCOTTISH SECURE TENANCY

88. Part 2 of the Bill also includes the following provisions:

- Assignation, sublet and joint tenancy of Scottish secure tenancy (section 13). Retains tenants’ rights to assign, sublet and make joint tenancy requests with their landlords consent, but only after a qualifying period of 12 months. It also gives social landlords stronger grounds for refusing consent to an assignation when it would result in under-occupation of the property or it being assigned to someone not in housing need.

- Succession to Scottish secure tenancy (section 14). Introduces a 12-month qualifying period before partners (cohabitees), family members and carers can succeed to a property (currently there is only a qualifying period for partners (6 months)).

- Grounds for eviction: antisocial behaviour (section 15). Requires a court to grant an order for recovery of possession in cases where a landlord is seeking possession because a court has convicted a tenant, within the previous 12 months, of using the property for illegal purposes or of an offence in or near the property that is punishable by imprisonment. Social landlords have to follow the procedures already set out in legislation for short SSTs.

- Recovery of possession of properties designed for special needs (section 16). Allows the existing ground for recovering possession for an adapted property to be used where the property is occupied by people who did not need the adaptations.

\(^{33}\) Based on 11 short SSTs to new tenants and 2,250 converted short SSTs for existing tenants (see bullet points on paragraph 81)
Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

89. There are no significant direct costs associated with the provisions for the Scottish Administration, other than some modest resource implications in publication of revised Model SST Agreement and Model short SST Agreements and revised leaflets setting out the changes to tenants’ rights. These costs are expected to be minimal and will be absorbed within existing budgets.

Scottish Court Service

90. These provisions are not expected to result in additional financial costs to the Scottish Court Service. There may be an increased number of appeals by tenants who are aggrieved by a landlord’s refusal to agree a request to assign or sub-let the tenancy (section 13). Social landlords have estimated that very few appeals are made to landlords (less than 1% of assignation requests are appealed) and, therefore, the increase is likely to be minimal. While there may be an increased number of cases going to court for recovering possession of an adapted property (section 16) discussions with landlords have indicated that this is likely to happen in no more than a handful of cases per year. The Scottish Court Service has indicated that the impact, across Scotland, will be minimal and could be absorbed within existing court arrangements.

Costs on local authorities

91. Section 13 introduces a qualifying period before tenants can request to assign or sublet a tenancy or make a joint tenancy request and gives local authorities’ stronger grounds for refusing consent to assignation requests. Local authorities already make decisions around whether to allow sub-letting, assignation and joint tenancies requests, but policies and procedures will need to be amended to take account of the new qualifying period. This is likely to require modest staff time but not result in additional financial costs to local authorities because additional staff would not be required. Additional staff time may be required on an on-going basis to undertake checks that a tenant and proposed assignee or joint tenant has met the residency requirement.

92. Sections 13 and 14 may have implications for local authorities in terms of an increase in staff time to deal with requests from tenants to internally review their decisions. This is not expected to result in additional direct costs to local authorities. Tenants who are aggrieved by a refusal to an assignation or sub-letting request can raise proceedings in court. An increase in such appeals will result in additional time for legal staff, but is not expected to result in additional financial costs for local authorities.

93. Recovery of possession under section 15 would use the short SST eviction process, if eviction is necessary. As early intervention, the conversion of the tenancy and the provision of support are expected to have a positive impact on the majority of tenants it is expected that eviction will be a consideration in only a small minority of cases. The short SST eviction process does not require courts to consider the reasonableness of eviction action therefore local authorities will not have to prepare cases in the depth currently required to demonstrate that the action is reasonable. Again, the efficiencies are likely to be in staff time, which will offset the staff time required for other provisions.

94. Section 16 is a minor amendment that allows local authorities to use adapted property to house applicants who do not need the adaptations rather than leave the property vacant for a period of time, in the knowledge that they can evict the tenants without the need for the adaptations and re-house them elsewhere when there are applicants who need the adaptation. Landlords have said that this is likely to happen in no more than a handful of cases per year and therefore the costs to landlords would be minimal.

95. Sections 13, 14, 15 and 16 will result in unquantifiable benefits for local authorities and communities as the best use is made of limited social housing. Social housing will be prioritised for those who need it most and who will fully occupy it. Having more properties available for those who need it will reduce the amount of time some families spend in temporary or overcrowded accommodation.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

Registered social landlords

96. RSLs will, like local authorities, also have to review their policies and procedures in light of section 13, but again this is likely to require staff time but not result in additional financial costs to RSLs. Additional staff time would also be required on a continuing basis to undertake checks that a tenant and proposed assignee or joint tenant has met the residency requirement. As with local authorities, RSLs have indicated that section 16 will only be used in a handful of cases and, therefore, the costs to RSLs would be minimal.

97. Sections 13 and 14 may have implications for RSLs in terms of an increase in staff time to deal with requests from tenants to internally review their decisions. This is not expected to result in additional direct costs to RSLs. Tenants who are aggrieved by a refusal to an assignation or sub-letting request can raise proceedings in court. An increase in such appeals and the associated costs may result in increased costs for RSL but these are expected to be minimal with the number of cases expected to be small.

98. The estimated eight short SSTs granted under section 15 would use the short SST eviction process, if eviction is necessary. Again, eviction is expected to be a consideration in a small minority of cases. The short SST eviction process is more straightforward than the SST eviction process as it does not require courts to consider the reasonableness of eviction action. RSLs have told the Scottish Government through its engagement on the Business and Regulatory Impact of the provisions that a straightforward eviction costs in the region of £1,000 but an eviction that requires repeat attendance at court costs on average £7,000. Therefore an estimate of the savings from this provision is around £48,000 (8 cases x £6,000 saving per case).

34 RSLs initiated eviction action in 26 cases relating to ‘antisocial behaviour’ in 2011-12. A breakdown is not available, but if these cases are evenly spread across the 3 grounds for recovery related to antisocial behaviour that is 8 cases per ground. Section 15 is intended to apply to ground 2.
99. Section 16 is a minor amendment that allows RSLs to use adapted property to house applicants who don’t need the adaptations rather than leave the property vacant for a period of time, in the knowledge that they can evict the tenants without the need for the adaptations and re-house them elsewhere when there are applicants who need the adaptation. Landlords have said that this is likely to happen in no more than a handful of cases per year and therefore the costs to landlords would be minimal.

100. As with local authorities, sections 13, 14, 15 & 16 will result in unquantifiable benefits for RSLs and communities as the best use is made of limited social housing. Social housing will be prioritised for those who need it most and who will fully occupy it. Having more properties available for those who need it will reduce the amount of time some families spend in temporary or overcrowded accommodation.

Overall Summary

101. In summary, the Scottish Government expects the following costs and savings resulting from the allocations, tenancies and housing management provisions:

Note: -- denotes no or minimal costs. The above table does not include an estimated £5 million of efficiencies from a reduction in managing and monitoring antisocial behaviour (£2.7 million by local authorities (paragraph 77) and £2.3 million by RSLs (paragraph 84)). The Scottish Government is unable to ascertain how much of these efficiencies will be realisable as financial savings to individual landlords as this will depend on whether staff can be released to do other duties. Focus will move from managing and monitoring antisocial behaviour to early intervention and support. The above table also does not take into account unquantifiable savings to communities from the better use of social housing or a reduction in the instances and management of antisocial behaviour as a result of the provisions in the Bill.
PART 3 - PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING

INTRODUCTION

102. This section of the Financial Memorandum sets out the expected costs and savings of the provisions in the Bill (at sections 17 - 25) on Private Rented Housing. The provisions are associated with the transfer of civil private rented sector (PRS) cases from the sheriff court to the new First-tier Tribunal (FTT), introduction of tacit approval for landlord registration and third party reporting to the Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP). It considers the financial implications for the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses.

TRANSFER OF PRIVATE RENTED SECTOR (PRS) HOUSING DISPUTE CASES FROM THE SCOTTISH CIVIL COURTS TO THE NEW SCOTTISH FIRST-TIER TRIBUNAL (FTT)

Caseload

103. The Scottish Government estimates that a PRS tribunal which considers cases transferred from the courts would have a caseload of approximately 700 cases per year.

104. Caseload estimates are based on:
- information relating to section 11 of the Homelessness etc. (Scotland) Act 2003 which places a duty on private landlords to notify local authorities when they raise proceedings for eviction and some other statutory notices (there were 566 cases in 2012-13);
- data from court statistics regarding non eviction land/heritable cases (there were 113 of these in 2011 - not all of which will relate to the private sector – this was the last year that this data was captured). It has not been possible to arrive at more definitive numbers for non-eviction PRS cases but the Scottish Government believes that this is a reasonable estimate for these cases; and
- projections for new cases involving appeals by landlords related to tacit approval of landlord registration applications which will also be contained in the Housing Bill. (approximately 50-60 per year).

105. Dependent upon successful passage of the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, the PRS tribunal will be part of a chamber within the FTT which could also include the existing Private Rented Housing Panel/Homeowner Housing Panel jurisdictions alongside the cases in the Bill related to letting agent disputes. This chamber could have a significant overall annual caseload and so there are likely to be economies of scale over time.

Timing

106. Establishment of a PRS tribunal is directly linked to the establishment of the FTT following the enactment of the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill. It is estimated that commencement of the new PRS tribunal is likely to be no earlier than 2016.
Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Tribunals Service

107. The Scottish Tribunals Service (STS), currently a delivery arm of the Scottish Government, provides support to the Scottish Tribunals (which includes the FTT) and will support the administration of the PRS tribunal. Under proposals currently being progressed by Scottish Ministers, STS could merge with the Scottish Court Service (SCS) to form a non-ministerial government department under the leadership of the Lord President of the Court of Session. In this case, support for the PRS tribunal will be provided by the new department with appropriate funding.

Cost range

108. Costings for the PRS tribunal are based largely on scaling the operation of the existing private rented housing panel (PRHP), which hears around 250 cases per year, including assumptions that:

- members of the new tribunal would be paid a daily fee at the same levels as PRHP members (currently £316 per day for legal members and £163 per day for housing members);
- most cases would be determined by the tribunal committees without carrying out site inspections; and
- most cases would be determined by two member committees (without the need for a surveyor member).

109. Data from other larger tribunal jurisdictions has also been used to augment the Scottish Government’s understanding of tribunal operating principles. The overall costs vary according to the number of cases that can be dealt with by a tribunal committee in a day without affecting the quality of decision-making. Information from tribunals with larger annual caseloads indicates that the number of cases handled in a day will be dependent largely on the tribunals’ judiciary and will develop as the tribunal builds up expertise; therefore, the Scottish Government has costed some scenarios to give a range. These scenarios show that the more cases heard by each committee per day, the lower the overall cost of the new tribunal. The PRHP generally handles one or two cases per hearing day, whereas larger tribunal jurisdictions and the courts can hear significantly more cases in a day. It could be that the PRS tribunal will start by hearing a small number of cases in a day (with associated costs in line with Scenario A shown at table 8) and, as it builds its experience and expertise, particularly in handling routine cases, it will progress to hearing more in a day (hence reducing costs to a level in line with Scenario B or C shown at table 8).

Set-up costs

110. Table 8 shows the set-up costs which have been estimated using data from the different scenarios and costs from the recent set-up of the homeowner housing panel (HOHP). The HOHP was an extension of the jurisdiction of the PRHP created by the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011. As such, some set-up costs may vary and there may be some additional costs.

Annual operating costs

Table 9 details the estimated annual operating costs based on initial assumptions, which include cases being generally handled by committees comprising two members - one legal and one housing member. At present cases are heard by a sheriff sitting alone and so a legally qualified member with a background in a relevant area of law and the addition of a housing member will allow greater specialism in the decision making process.

Cost variables

112. The costings are best estimates based on current information and a number of assumptions. There are a number of factors which could alter the final figures. The biggest variable that could affect costings is the caseload. Additional cases will require additional resources to process and a more accessible dispute resolution forum could receive more applications from private rented sector landlords and tenants.

113. Accommodation has been costed for administrative staff based within Scottish Government buildings as is the case with the PRHP. The actual costs will depend on capacity within Scottish Government buildings at the time of set-up and the need for additional venues. Therefore, there is a risk that accommodation costs could increase significantly if more external office space or venues are required, particularly as part of a wider housing chamber alongside other jurisdictions within the FTT.

Appeals

114. There will be a route of appeal from the FTT to the Upper Tribunal where an appeal from the sheriff court currently exists. Based on current appeal statistics from the court, the Scottish Government estimates that there will be three or four appeals per year. Appeal work will be redistributed from the civil courts to the Upper Tribunal where it will be heard by the same judiciary and so the Scottish Government does not expect additional costs.

Scottish Court Service

115. The Scottish Government estimates that the redirection of around 700 cases from the Scottish courts to the FTT will reduce fee income for SCS by around £49,000 per annum. The reduction in case numbers is not likely to yield any realisable savings but may have a limited effect in allowing remaining cases to progress more efficiently.

Members training has been estimated using the projected number of members required multiplied by daily fees for two days training per year per member.
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

Judicial Appointment Board for Scotland

116. The FTT will require additional members to hear cases in the PRS tribunal. Appointment processes will be overseen by the Judicial Appointments Board for Scotland (JABS). Based on a commitment of 15 days per year (which is consistent with the commitment for members of the PRHP/HOHP), the Scottish Government has estimated that the PRS tribunal will require the appointment of up to 39 legal members and 23 housing members to hear 700 cases. This estimate builds in time for legal members to carry out preparatory casework. JABS may require additional resource to oversee the necessary appointment exercise. Initial recruitment costs have been estimated based on the recent appointment of members for the HOHP at between £4,000-11,000 but this will depend on the process JABS adopt for tribunals appointments.

Scottish Civil Justice Council

117. It is the Scottish Government’s intention that in time, the Scottish Civil Justice Council (SCJC) will take over responsibility for making and amendment of tribunal rules. However, in the first instance, Scottish Ministers will continue to make rules for tribunals until the SCJC can assume its role. Scottish Ministers will make initial rules for the PRS tribunal and, as rules will already be in place before responsibility for rule making transfers, the Scottish Government expects no additional resource will be required for the SCJC.

Costs on local authorities

118. It is expected that there will be no additional costs for local authorities from proposals for a PRS tribunal.

119. Houses in multiple occupation (HMO) and landlord registration appeal cases will involve local authorities, although it is expected that there will be very few of these and the nature of the appeal will remain unchanged, except that it will be heard by a tribunal rather than the sheriff court. As tribunal procedures would be designed on the assumption that legal representation is not the norm, there may be some savings for local authorities.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

Fees

120. The FTT has a generic power to charge fees for applicants to bring cases. The PRS tribunal may charge a fee to parties to help offset some of the operating costs, although this would need to be balanced against ensuring access to justice. It is expected that, if required, these would be set at a level similar to current court fees so as not to be prohibitive and an exemptions policy would be required for those who could not afford to pay. Based on current court fees (around £70), the maximum fee income for 700 cases would be around £49,000 (equivalent to 7-9% of annual operating costs). It is expected that the impact on landlords and tenants would be no different than current court fees.
PRS advice agencies

121. There are likely to be marginal training costs for advice organisations to ensure that their staff are equipped to provide correct advice to clients regarding the appropriate forum and its processes for their disputes.

Potential for wider sector savings

122. Bringing a case to court can incur significant costs for landlords and tenants. A specialist housing tribunal with active tribunal judiciary and less formal inquisitorial (rather than adversarial) proceedings will assist parties to present their own cases effectively. Procedures would be designed on the assumption that legal representation was not required, which could save both landlords and tenants money.

123. In the Scottish Government’s consultation and engagement with stakeholders, many landlords expressed their frustration with inconsistency of court decisions, which is often attributed to a lack of specialist housing expertise on the part of sheriffs. Tribunal committees would include housing members with specialist knowledge to reduce this inconsistency in decision-making.

124. Many housing cases can remain in the court system for significant periods of time and are subject to repeated continuation which can add to the cost and the stress of the case. A PRS tribunal would be designed to pro-actively manage cases so that only those that are ready come to a hearing. This should reduce the number of times cases for issues such as arrears require to come to a hearing, which could save money for landlords and tenants.

125. Some stakeholders have commented on the success of the PRHP in raising standards across its narrow jurisdiction, both in terms of the individual cases it hears and as a deterrent against unscrupulous landlords. Effective enforcement of legal rights by a housing tribunal could deliver the same benefits across the wider sector to both tenants and landlords. It is not possible to quantify these potential savings at this time. However, the Scottish Government will monitor the impacts of the PRS tribunal on the wider sector.

Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment (BRIA)

126. The Scottish Government has published a BRIA\(^{38}\) which outlines the impact of these proposals on Scottish businesses and the third sector.

Summary

127. In summary, the Scottish Government expects the costs to be as detailed below at Table 10.

TACIT APPROVAL OF LANDLORD REGISTRATION APPLICATIONS

128. The Bill includes a minor technical amendment to the landlord registration system for the tacit approval of valid landlord registration applications after a period of 12 months from the date of receipt. This will support a consistent approach to determination of applications by local authorities across Scotland. This means that in the event of failure to determine the application within the period set, authorisation is deemed to have been granted automatically by the relevant authority. Engagement with local authorities indicated a broad support for this approach, which aligns landlord registration with the licensing of houses in multiple occupation regime.

129. In recognition of the fact that some cases are more complex, and require detailed investigation, local authorities will have the power to make a summary application to a sheriff for an extension to the 12-month period. The 12-month period may be extended by such period as the sheriff thinks fit, as long as the summary application is made before the 12-month period expires. The sheriff’s decision on such an application is final. It is envisaged that this process will transfer to the FTT that will be created under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, once the new tribunal is established.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

130. Introduction of tacit approval of landlord registration applications after 12 months will impact on the landlord registration IT system, which is managed by an external IT provider on behalf of the Scottish Government. There will be a one off-cost to make changes to the IT software to assist local authorities with the case management of applications that would automatically be deemed approved after 12 months, unless other arrangements were in place.

131. It is not possible for the IT provider to provide a quote for the work until the detail of the work has been discussed and agreed with the IT Subgroup which represents local authority users of the system. However, based on previous experience of upgrades to the IT system, it is estimated that the cost to be in the region of £14,000 - £18,000, including VAT. This would include system documentation, project management, development and testing and updated user guidance for local authorities and landlords. The cost would be met from the current budget allocated for landlord registration IT development.

132. In addition, the Scottish Government guidance for local authorities will need to be updated. This would be a one-off cost of approximately £1,000 which would be met by the existing budget.

Scottish Court Service

133. This provision will result in a power for local authorities to be able to apply for an extension to the 12-month time period for determining an application. As there are already established arrangements for similar cases under HMO licensing for example, the Scottish Government does not expect any initial set-up costs.

134. In terms of continuing costs it is difficult to know exactly how many summary applications relating to landlord registration there may be. Based on information provided by local authorities, a reasonable estimate of the number of summary applications would be around 50 – 60 per year. The Scottish Court Service has indicated that the average cost per summary application is £95, and that the estimated costs of £4,750 - £5,700 per year could be absorbed within the existing budget.

Costs on local authorities

135. The provision will only apply to any new applications received after the provision comes into force. The Scottish Government consulted with all local authorities about the impact of this provision. All but two of the authorities who responded indicated that they expected any applications made after the provision is implemented to be determined well within the 12-month time limit, and that there would be little need to consider an extension to that period. They did not expect any additional costs.

136. One local authority indicated that resources may need to be re-allocated to ensure that all cases would be approved within the 12-month time period. However, the proposed change will allow a local authority to apply to extend that period once for a limited time, where necessary.

137. Only one local authority (with the highest number of registered landlords) estimated between 10 – 20 cases a year where an application to a sheriff for an extension of the 12-month period may be required. Another authority estimated fewer than 20 cases per year.
Estimates provided by authorities on the costs of applying to a sheriff for an extension were £500 - £1000 per case.

138. Data from the landlord registration system on the time taken to determine applications indicated that, between August 2012 and June 2013, no applications had taken longer than 12 months. However, over the course of a full year it is reasonable to assume that a small number of cases may require a summary application to the court. It is estimated that this will be no more than 50 – 60 per year across all local authorities.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

139. No additional costs have been identified for landlords or any other bodies, individuals or businesses.

Summary

In summary, the Scottish Government expects the following costs to result from this provision:

THIRD PARTY APPLICATION IN RESPECT OF THE REPAIRING STANDARD

140. This provision will give local authorities discretionary powers to apply to the PRHP for a determination of whether the landlord has failed to comply with the Repairing Standard. Other third parties may notify the relevant local authority where they believe the repairing standard is not being met, so that an application by the relevant authority can be considered. This provision will not affect an individual tenant’s right to apply to the panel.

141. The policy extends the way that applications may be made to the PRHP and is aimed at giving local authorities increased flexibility to address substandard property condition either as a part of a strategic approach to tackling problem areas or for individual properties. There is broad support from stakeholders to enhance local authority powers to tackle the issue of poor quality housing, with discretionary powers to apply to the PRHP to enforce the repairing standard. A third party application may be made to the PRHP without the need for the tenant to be involved, unless the tenant chooses to participate in the process. By enabling enforcement action to be taken independently of the tenant, the Scottish Government aims to minimise the risk of the landlord taking action to remove the tenant by giving notice to quit or threatening eviction.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

142. It is the Scottish Government’s intention that there will be no charge to a local authority for making an application to the PRHP. This is consistent with the current policy that there is no charge for a tenant to apply to the panel.

143. Using data extrapolated from the Scottish House Condition Survey (SHCS)\(^{39}\), the Scottish Government estimates that around 1% of PRS dwellings in disrepair should be issued with a repair notice under the relevant Housing Act and 4% of PRS dwellings should be issued with an improvement order.

144. Based on these figures, the Scottish Government estimates that there are potentially around 13,000 properties in the PRS that are in a serious state of disrepair and about which councils may wish to consider taking repairing standard cases before the PRHP. These properties are likely to have built up in the housing system over an extended period of time, with properties gradually falling into disrepair. Given this, and the high volume of potential such cases, it is assumed that these cases will need to be dealt with over an extended period of time rather than in a single year.

145. According to the SHCS survey, around 60% of dwellings in the PRS are high-density type dwellings with a substantial number of shared elements including tenements, four-in-a-block and tower/slab dwellings. Where disrepair occurs in multiple dwellings in such properties, the PRHP may be able to hear multiple cases as a single group case, with the effect of reducing the annual caseload the panel actually hears. It is unlikely that all such cases would be suitable for a single hearing, and so, for the purposes of this Financial Memorandum, it is assumed that 50% of these cases would involve a group hearing. This figure reflects the fact that these cases will be about serious types of disrepair that are likely to affect multiple properties, such as shared roofs and party walls.

146. The Scottish Government cannot say with any certainty how many cases may be referred by local authorities, as this will depend on how councils use the discretionary powers available to them. The Scottish Government assumes that it will take 10 to 15 years to deal with the total number of disrepair cases that have built up in the private rented sector. Based on the maximum potential caseload of 13,000, and assuming that the number of cases that may be held at a single hearing may be reduced by 50%, the Scottish Government estimates that the additional number of repairing standard cases going to the PRHP per annum could range from:

- scenario 1: 6500 cases per year over a 10 year period = 650 cases per year,

\(^{39}\)[Scottish House Condition Survey: Key Findings 2011]
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

- scenario 2: 6500 cases per year over a 15 year period = 434 cases per year.

147. The cost estimates under the two scenarios would decrease depending on the number of cases heard by committee each year. These scenarios assume that each committee hears two cases per day and that the committee consists of a legal member, a housing member and a surveyor. In some circumstances, the membership of the panel may be reduced to two, and only on direction of the president and with the consent of the parties can the chairperson exercise the functions of the committee alone. The Scottish Government is unable to say to how many cases may be heard by a committee with fewer than three members and so for the purposes of this Memorandum, the estimates are based on a three member committee.

148. The Scottish Government has estimated the costs in two distinct ways. One method used a cost scaling technique. Firstly, a cost scaling factor was derived by dividing the new third party caseload estimate by the number of repairing standard cases currently going to the PRHP each year (650/229 = cost scaling factor 2.8). Secondly, the known costs to the PRHP of processing 229 repairing standard only cases were scaled-up using this factor to estimate the cost of processing 650 cases. Another method was used to estimate four items of cost including; members’ fees, members’ training, members’ expenses and staff accommodation. These costs were calculated, in full, using additional information and in order to incorporate a number of assumptions about how the new panel would operate – with several assumptions adopted to maximise cost efficiencies. The method used to estimate these four costs is set out in this Memorandum.

New member expenses

149. The number of members recruited to the PRHP will need to be increased to deal with the additional workload expected from local authority applications. The Scottish Government has calculated the number of new members that need to be recruited to hear 650 and 434 cases per year on the basis that each committee hears two cases per day. This hearing rate was deemed appropriate by the Scottish Tribunal Service, and represents an increase in output compared to the average of one case per day currently heard by the panel. The estimate also assumes that each member works 15 days per year – the current minimum requirement for PRHP members.

150. The number of new members required based on each of the scenarios is as follows:
- scenario 1: 65 members (21.7 each of legal, housing and surveyor members)
- scenario 2: 43 members (14.5 each of legal, housing and surveyor members)

151. Based on the average cost of expenses for existing PRHP members (currently £519 per annum per member, based on 229 repairing standard cases only\(^{40}\)), the Scottish Government estimates that the total cost of expenses for additional members is as follows:
- scenario 1: 65 members x £519 = £34,000
- scenario 2: 43 members x £519 = £22,000

\(^{40}\) Excludes rent assessment cases dealt with by the PRHP
Members’ fees

152. In addition to expenses, members are paid a daily fee. The current rates are £316 for a legal member, £253 for a surveyor and £163 for a housing member. The estimated cost of member’s fees is based on fees multiplied by number of members and the number of days worked. In terms of daily fees for members this equates to an annual cost as follows:

- scenario 1: (£316+£253+£163) x 21.7 members x 15 days per year = £238,000
- scenario 2: (£316+£253+£163) x 14.5 members x 15 days per year = £159,000

Members’ training

153. The current level of training provided for PRHP members is two days per year. Members are paid a daily fee for this. Based on this data, the Scottish Government estimates the average daily rate fee for all types of member to cover two training days per year are as follows:

- scenario 1: 65 members (legal, housing and surveyor members) = £32,000
- scenario 2: 43 members (legal, housing and surveyor members) = £21,000

Accommodation and administrative staff

154. The existing repairing standard caseload for the PRHP for 2011 was 229 cases, handled by 4 administrative staff. This means that average number of cases dealt with per staff member was 57. Assuming that staff will deal with the same average number of cases per year when third party reporting rights are introduced, the Scottish Government estimates that the following number of additional administrative staff will be needed to deal with the increased caseload:

- scenario one: 650 cases divided by 57 = 11 administrative staff
- scenario two: 434 cases divided by 57 = eight administrative staff

155. In order to maximise cost effectiveness, the Scottish Government has assumed that new staff will be housed in Scottish Government buildings which are less expensive to rent than in the private sector. Under scenario 1, of the 11 staff, two would be located in Dundee, two in Edinburgh and seven in Glasgow (which is currently the administrative centre for the PRHP). This would provide the new Panel with a central and a regional administrative base to process cases from all around Scotland. Under scenario 2, the eight additional staff would be distributed two in Dundee, two in Edinburgh and four in Glasgow.

156. The Scottish Government Property Advice Branch estimates the cost of accommodation for 11 staff to be £35,000 and £24,000 for eight staff.

157. In addition, accommodation will be required for committee hearings. In order to maximise cost effectiveness, the Scottish Government has assumed that the majority of hearings would take place in Scottish Government buildings, subject to future space capacity. There may be some hiring of venues and this has been factored into the overall cost estimate.
158. The Scottish Government Property Advice Branch estimated the cost of having two and one dedicated Tribunal hearing rooms in Scottish Government buildings are £12,000 and £5,000 respectively. Therefore total accommodation costs to cover staff and hearings are estimated to be £48,000 for scenario 1 and £29,000 for scenario 2.

One-off set-up costs

159. The main set-up costs for year 1 only would be for recruitment and judicial training for new panel members. The data on actual set-up costs incurred by the homeowner housing panel (HOHP), which was set-up in 2012, has been scaled up to estimate how much the PRHP would need to expand to deal with the higher volume of repairing standard cases.

160. The HOHP recruited 41 new members to process an estimated 340 cases per year. Under scenarios 1 and 2, the Scottish Government would recruit 65, and 43 members respectively. The HOHP judicial training and recruitment costs are scaled up based on the higher number of members that would need to be trained up and recruited for the PRHP.

161. The Scottish Government understands that the HOHP used two administrative staff (or 50% of its administrative staff) to set-up the HOHP. On this basis and the estimates for new administrative staff, it would require approximately four to six staff to be involved in the set-up of the extended PRHP. Staff salaries for those involved in the set-up and general office expenses incurred in setting-up the additional office are based on the higher number of new administrative staff that would need to be involved in setting up the extended PRHP compared to the HOHP. Some costs incurred by the HOHP were not deemed applicable because the PRHP does already exist and so items such as IT and web systems are already in place. The remaining set-up costs were assumed to be the same as for the HOHP e.g. the presidents fees for establishing an expanded PRHP.

162. The one-off set-up costs are summarised for each scenario at Table 12:

Overall costs

163. Given that the PRHP is already well established to deal with referrals relating to enforcement of the repairing standard, the PRHP model has been used to estimate the additional costs of processing third party reporting rights. The costs for the operation of the PRHP for 2011/2012 have been scaled up for the estimated number of third party reporting cases.

164. Based on the PRHP Annual Report 2011, it is possible to estimate that the total cost of 229 repairing standard cases received by the panel was around £360,000, equating to an average cost per case of £1,560.

165. The overall costs per annum for the continuing operating costs for an expanded PRHP are summarised for each scenario at Table 13.

166. The Scottish Government estimates therefore that the total costs and cost per case are:

- scenario 1: 650 cases a year over 10 years, 3 members. Total annual estimated cost of £777,000, including £125,000 for set-up costs in year 1 only. The average cost per case in year 1 is £1,195. The annual estimated cost thereafter is £651,000 with an average cost per case of £1,002.

- scenario 2: 434 cases a year over 15 years, 3 members. Total annual estimated cost of £522,000, including £90,000 set-up costs for year 1 only. The average cost per case in year 1 is £1,203. The annual estimated cost thereafter is £432,000 with an average cost per case of £996.
Scottish Court Service

167. This provision does not introduce any new rights of appeal to the courts. There are already established arrangements for tenants and landlords to appeal to a sheriff court in relation to a determination by the PRHP. Therefore the Scottish Government does not expect any initial set-up costs.

168. In terms of continuing costs it is difficult to know how many additional appeals may be made to a sheriff as a result of third party reporting rights to the PRHP. Based on evidence in the PRHP annual report for 2011 from a caseload of 229 cases, only four were appealed. Based on this figure and an estimated additional caseload of 650 and 434 cases, the number of appeals may only be between 11 and 8 appeals per year. The Scottish Court Service (SCS) has indicated that the average cost per summary application is £95, and that the estimated costs per year of £760 - £1,045 per year could be absorbed within the existing SCS budget.

Costs on local authorities

169. Feedback provided by a number of local authorities indicates that there may be some costs involved in gathering evidence on property condition, processing the application, and where appropriate defending a case in court on appeal by the landlord.

170. One local authority has indicated that the policy may help to reduce costs, by avoiding duplication of effort to deal with a complaint about property condition across different local authority services. Where a local authority can make a direct referral to the PRHP it may reduce the number of services and agencies who need to get involved.

171. Local authorities have generally not provided any estimation as to the value of any costs or savings. However, one local authority has offered very approximate figures as to the time and cost involved in referring a case to the PRHP. It was estimated that it would take 16 hours to prepare each case. This included visit(s) to the affected property, communication and letters to the landlord, completion of the application and attendance and preparation at a PRHP hearing. The estimated cost per referral based on staff wages of £22 per hour was £352.

172. This provision does not place any new mandatory duties on local authorities. The discretionary power to make an application to the PRHP means that applications can be made based on existing budgets and local priorities, as informed by individual local housing strategies.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

173. Landlords have a legal obligation to meet the repairing standard. More cases may be identified as requiring work to be done to meet that standard as a result of this policy, but the costs related to bringing properties up to standard are not regarded as additional costs.
Summary

174. In summary, the Scottish Government expects the following costs resulting from the introduction of third party reporting rights to the current PRHP structure, prior to ultimate transfer to the FTT:

ENHANCED ENFORCEMENT AREAS

175. In addition to provisions to enable third party application in respect of the repairing standard, the Scottish Government intends to include provisions at Stage 2 to enable local authorities to make an application to Scottish Ministers for additional enforcement powers for a specified geographic area designated as an enhanced enforcement area.

176. These enhanced enforcement powers would include mandatory criminal record disclosure checks for private landlords at registration and powers of entry to, and inspection of, private rented properties for the purposes of checking that statutory housing standards are being met.

177. A local authority would be required to provide evidence to support the need for Enhanced Enforcement Area status in its application. It is envisaged that an Enhanced Enforcement Area would be set for a specified time, for example, a period not exceeding five years.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

178. It is not envisaged that there would be any significant cost to the Scottish Government or other central public bodies arising from this provision.

Costs on local authorities

179. It is not envisaged that there would be any significant costs to local authorities. In the event that Scottish Ministers grant their approval to create an Enhanced Enforcement Area, it would be for the local authority to resource and deploy the enforcement using the powers conferred. The local authority might do this by targeting its existing enforcement resources in the Enhanced Enforcement Area.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

180. The costs envisaged for private landlords are minimal. Should a private landlord require to provide a disclosure certificate as part of an application for landlord registration, this will incur a cost every three years, at the point of registration. The cost for a disclosure certificate in 2013 was £25. Other additional costs are likely to relate to ensuring that the property complies with relevant legislation e.g. that statutory housing standards are being met.

Summary

181. In summary, the Scottish Government expects the costs resulting from enhanced enforcement areas to be minimal.

PART 4 – LETTING AGENTS

182. The Bill provides that:

- a mandatory register of all letting agents in Scotland is established, which will include an associated ‘fit and proper person test’;
- a statutory code of practice is developed in partnership with industry stakeholders; and
- a dispute resolution mechanism is established for customers of letting agents to apply to when a dispute arises.

Available Evidence

183. Whilst data exists at a UK level, no information in relation to how many letting agents are in operation in Scotland is available. Scottish Government Analytical Services Division, therefore, undertook analysis of the available UK data using a model which enabled figures to be scaled down in order to provide Scottish estimates of letting agent numbers. Assumptions have been based on the most robust evidence available.

184. Existing data suggests that there were in the region of 11,560 UK firms engaged in some form of letting agent activity in 2011/12\[^{41}\]. Using a scaling factor in relation to the % of UK PRS dwellings which are in Scotland (six per cent), analysts were able to estimate that there are around 719 letting agents operating in Scotland. Of the 11,560 UK firms, the Ombudsman received a total of 7,731 complaints against them, equating to 0.7 complaints per letting agent firm. When this proportion (0.7) is applied to the estimate of 719 Scottish letting agents, this provides an estimate of 481 potential complaints per year against Scottish letting agents. The following financial estimates are therefore based on the cost of processing 481 letting agent complaints per annum.

Scottish Government

185. The Scottish Government will take on responsibility for management and delivery of the letting agent registration system, code of practice development and establishment and funding for a dispute resolution panel. Provisions in the Bill will also enable Scottish Ministers to delegate another appropriate body to perform this role.

186. One-off set-up costs and continuing administrative costs will be incurred by the Scottish Government in relation to:

- establishment of an IT system to enable registration of letting agent details and publication of a register of letting agents online,
- facilitation and consultation costs in order to develop a stakeholder-led statutory code of practice, and
- establishment of a dispute resolution panel.

Registration system and online database of letting agents

187. The recent introduction of the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 saw the development of an IT system to handle all registration applications and a website to provide the public with access to that register. Currently, the property factors register and online database are administered centrally by the Scottish Government and, therefore, existing systems are in place, which can be amended to incorporate the registration of all letting agents.

188. It is expected that a letting agent registration database and website could be developed within an expanded Scottish Government property factors database and website, therefore presenting savings in terms of system development.

\[^{41}\] RICS Research: Better regulation of sales and letting agents: An impact assessment of costs and benefits
189. With regards to administrative costs associated with creation and maintenance of the letting agent register, provisions in the Bill permit Scottish Ministers to prescribe the level of fees to accompany an application to the register of letting agents. Furthermore, provisions outline that a fee to be prescribed can accompany any request to amend existing details on the letting agent register. Accordingly, the Bill’s provision for fee-charging will enable the cost of administering the letting agent register to be self-financing and result in neutral costs to the Scottish Government in that respect. Income from fees will not cover the running costs of the letting agent redress mechanism. Those costs will largely be borne by Scottish Government budgets.

190. The Scottish Government will estimate the potential set-up and running costs of the register and set fees taking into account the estimated numbers of businesses operating as letting agents.

191. As a guide, the recent introduction of a register of property factors saw the fees currently applicable to individuals and businesses operating as a property factor set at the following levels: £100 for property factors with a portfolio size of 100 or fewer properties; £370 for property factors with a portfolio size of more than 100 properties. The property factor registration fees are levied once every three years. At present, no fees are levied when requests are made to change existing details on the property factor register, although the power to prescribe such fees does exist within the 2011 Act.

192. The estimated number of letting agents in Scotland is 719. For illustrative purposes, if a three-yearly fee level of £250 per letting agent business was set (an approximate mid-point between the two tiers of property factor fees) and no fees were initially prescribed in relation to requests to amend existing details on the register (pending subsequent assessment of how many amendment requests were made by letting agents) then the total expected income to the Scottish Government would be approximately £180,000 in the first year of operation of the register. After 3 years of operation of the register, the Scottish Government would envisage charging re-registering lettings agents a similar fee to cover the subsequent three years. Therefore, income of approximately £180,000 would be accrued in the fourth year of the register’s existence.

Code of Practice costs

193. The Scottish Government expects that a statutory code of practice for the industry will be developed in partnership with a range of stakeholders. Voluntary codes of practice, published by a number of trade bodies, are already in operation and will help inform the development of a statutory code of practice.

194. Costs will therefore be incurred by the Scottish Government in relation to the facilitation of this process, however such costs are expected to be minimal (estimated to be around £3000), as meeting venues will be utilised within Scottish Government buildings and existing staff will undertake secretariat duties.
195. It is also expected that a draft statutory code of practice will be subject to full public consultation. This one-off cost is again expected to be minimal (around £3000), with a further cost in relation to analysis of consultation responses and publication of a consultation analysis report expected to be in the region of £4000. These costs are expected to be met from within existing programme budgets. Further minimal costs will be incurred in relation to the publication of the statutory code of practice, to be met from existing programme budgets.

Establishment of a dispute resolution panel costs

196. Building on the experience of the 2011 Act, provisions in this Bill in relation to dispute resolution for letting agent customers has been modelled on the existing Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP), see Annex A for further details. Based on the PRHP Annual Report 2011, it is possible to estimate that the total cost of 250 cases received by the PRHP was around £432,000 in 2011/12, equating to an average cost per case of around £1,730. The average costs of letting agent cases that have been modelled are therefore similar to this (see table 15).

197. Dispute resolution panel costs are modelled on three different scenarios based on the number of cases a committee could hear per day, as follows:

- scenario 1: Low caseload turnover – each committee hears 2 cases per day;
- scenario 2: Medium caseload turnover – each committee hears 6 cases per day; and
- scenario 3: High caseload turnover – each committee hears 10 cases per day.

Estimated members’ expenses

198. In order to estimate the number of hearing days which would be needed to hear 481 cases (assuming each committee hears 2, 6 or 10 cases per day), the Scottish Government has applied the following calculation:

- scenario 1: \( \frac{481}{2} \) hearings per committee, per day = 241 hearing days required;
- scenario 2: \( \frac{481}{6} \) hearings per committee, per day = 80 hearing days required;
- scenario 3: \( \frac{481}{10} \) hearings per committee, per day = 40 hearing days required.

199. It is assumed that each member will work 15 days each year (based on current minimum working days for PRHP members). It is also assumed that in the majority of cases heard, a panel would consist of one legal member and one housing member. However, it has been assumed that 80 per cent of Panels would have two members (a legal member and a housing member) and 20 per cent would have three members (a legal member, a housing member and a specialised member). Estimates of members’ expenses, fees and training have been uprated to reflect these additional costs for the three member Panel. The method for this is set out in paragraph 208-209.

200. Therefore:

42 However, it has been assumed that 80 per cent of Panels would have two members (a legal member and a housing member) and 20 per cent would have three members (a legal member, a housing member and a specialised member). Estimates of members’ expenses, fees and training have been uprated to reflect these additional costs for the three member Panel. The method for this is set out in paragraph 208-209.
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

- scenario 1: 241/15 days per member = 16 housing members required to process 481 cases. 16 legal members required also. Therefore, total members required = 32;
- scenario 2: 80/15 days per member = 5 housing members required to process 481 cases. 5 legal members required also. Therefore, total members required = 10.
- scenario 3: 48/15 days per member = 3 housing members required to process 481 cases. 3 legal members required also. Therefore total members required = 6.

201. As well as Panel members, it is assumed that 1 legal member would be required for interlocutory work (preparation of cases) every other day. This would result in an additional eight interlocutory legal members required for scenario 1, three interlocutory legal members required for scenario 2 and two interlocutory legal members required for scenario 3.

202. The average expenses costs for PRHP members is £625 per member per annum. However, in the vast majority of cases, the Scottish Government expects that letting agent panel members will not be required to make site visits and therefore this amount has been reduced by 33% to provide a more realistic average expenses costs for letting agent panel members. Therefore:
- scenario 1: (32 members + 8 interlocutory members) x £625 x 0.66 = then uprated as per footnote 37 = £17,642 estimated members expenses
- scenario 2: (10 members + 3 interlocutory members) x £625 x 0.66, then uprated as per footnote 37 = £5,858;
- scenario 3: (6 members + 2 interlocutory members) x £625 x 0.66, = £3,515

Estimated members’ fees

203. In the vast majority of cases, the Scottish Government assumes that 1 legal member and 1 housing member will sit on each panel. The daily fee rate for these members at current PRHP rates is £316 for legal members and £163 for housing members. Therefore, the estimated fee costs (including interlocutory work) for each scenario is:
- scenario 1 - £164,000
- scenario 2 - £55,000
- scenario 3 - £33,000

204. These estimates can be seen in Annex A.

Estimated costs for members’ annual training

205. The Scottish Government assumes that each member will undergo 2 days of training per year, based on the current level of PRHP training for members. PRHP members are paid

43 As per footnote 36
44 As per footnote 38
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

a daily fee for this. This would therefore result in the following estimated total costs (in relation to members’ fees) for training members each year:

- scenario 1 - £22,000
- scenario 2 - £7,300
- scenario 3 - £4,400

206. These estimates can be seen in Annex A.

Estimated costs should a larger panel be required

207. As per footnote 37, the Scottish Government expects that the majority of cases will be heard by a 2 person panel. However, there may be some instances where a 3 person panel may be required; for example, in cases where a member with specialised expertise is required. For the purposes of estimating the overall costs of such an increase to panel numbers, it is assumed within this Financial Memorandum that this would only occur in 20% of cases going before a panel.

208. Such an increase in panel members would result in increased costs in relation to members’ expenses, fees and training. In total, the Scottish Government estimates that these costs (shown in Annex A) would be expected to increase by 10%. This is included in the figures presented above. In relation to these three cost items, the three panel model would incur the following costs: Scenario 1 = £14,173, Scenario 2 = £4,654 and Scenario 3 = £2,409.

Estimated costs of administrative accommodation

209. Currently, 4 PRHP administrative staff deal with around 250 PRHP cases, providing an average of 63 cases per head of staff. The Scottish Government assumes that each member of staff for the proposed letting agent panel will process, on average, 63 cases per year. Therefore, assuming that the new panel would deal with an average 481 cases per year, this would result in an estimated eight members of administrative staff being required.

210. In order to maximise cost effectiveness, it is assumed that new staff will be housed in Scottish Government buildings. Under all scenarios, it is assumed that staff will be located in Glasgow (which is currently the administrative centre for the PRHP). Initial estimates by the Scottish Government for accommodation costs for eight staff in Glasgow are £30,000 per annum.

211. As a further maximisation of cost effectiveness, the Scottish Government assumes that the majority of hearings would take place in Scottish Government buildings (subject to space capacity), in order to minimise the need to hire expensive external venues.

212. This brings the total cost of accommodation to £35,000 under all scenarios, as can be seen in Annex A.

214. These estimated costs are based on data available from the establishment of the homeowner housing panel (HOHP), which was set up in 2012. The actual set-up costs shown have been scaled up or down to reflect the additional number of members and staff that would need to be recruited and training for the new letting agent panel under each scenario.

Costs on local authorities

215. The Scottish Government does not expect additional costs for local authorities as a result of further regulation of the letting agent industry.
Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

216. The introduction of a registration system will result in costs to individuals and businesses operating as letting agents. A fee will be applicable to join the register of letting agents, for requesting changes to registration details and/or when renewing a registration. Fee levels will be set by Scottish Ministers.

217. The introduction of a new dispute resolution mechanism for customers of letting agents is likely to result in savings for the court service. Currently, landlords who have contractual disputes with a letting agent are required to undertake civil court action. The Scottish Government proposes that such cases would be heard by a letting agent panel and, therefore, savings to the court service would be expected. However, it is not possible to quantify what this saving could be.

Summary

218. In summary, the Scottish Government expects the costs and savings resulting from further regulation of letting agents to be as follows:

* Estimates have been uprated to assume that 80 per cent of cases are heard by two Panel members and 20 per cent are heard by three Panel members.

219. The Scottish Government’s estimate of costs to ‘other bodies, individuals and businesses’ is based on the potential direct costs incurred in the payment of a registration fee (assuming a fee structure similar to the 2011 Act is implemented for letting agents). This estimate does not include any potential training costs or costs to alter business practices that a letting agent may have to undertake in order to comply with a code of practice. Therefore, this may be subject to change.

PART 5 - MOBILE HOME SITES WITH PERMANENT RESIDENTS

220. This section of the Financial Memorandum sets out the expected costs associated with the provisions included in the Bill (at sections 53 – 71) on the licensing of residential mobile homes sites. It sets out the costs and savings to the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses.

221. The following consultation was carried out in order to determine the costs set out in this Financial Memorandum:

• The Scottish Government’s Communities Analytical Services carried out an analysis of the mobile home industry in Scotland. This analysis included desk research of previous studies, and a survey sent to site owners of residential, holiday and mixed parks. The quantitative analysis from the survey was complemented with in-depth interviews with local authorities’ officials. The survey was sent in July 2012, and a total of 23 responses were received. The survey helped to inform the Scottish Government further about the mobile home industry in Scotland and was useful in assessing the impact site licensing changes might have on business.

• Formal consultation on the proposals for site licensing from 21 May to 13 August 2012. 129 responses were received and were independently analysed.

• Research into the mobile homes sector in Scotland was also carried out on behalf of (the then) Consumer Focus Scotland in 2012, and a report on the findings from that research was published in spring 2013. This was also taken into account in preparing this Financial Memorandum.

• Consultation with key stakeholders, through meetings and correspondence with individual bodies and through regular meetings with the Residential Mobile Homes Stakeholder Working Group. That group has continued to discuss the site licensing proposals since the end of the formal consultation. Its members include representatives from:
  • local authorities,
  • Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (COSLA),
  • British Holiday and Home Parks Association,
  • Independent Park Home Advisory Service,
  • National Association of Park Home Residents,
  • Park Home Legislation Action Group Scotland,

Consumer Focus Scotland, Stories To Be Told, 2013. As part of UK-wide government reforms, Consumer Focus was abolished in May 2013, and replaced with Consumer Futures, a new body representing consumers in the regulated markets of energy, post, and (in Scotland) water.
MOBILE HOMES SITE LICENSING

Current position

222. The Bill includes provisions to update the licensing regime for residential mobile homes sites. The current site licensing regime is governed by the Caravan and Control of Development Act 1960 (the 1960 Act). The 1960 Act requires an occupier of land to obtain a site licence before the land can be used as a caravan site. It covers privately-owned residential mobile home sites, holiday sites and privately-owned Gypsy/Traveller sites but excludes local authority sites\(^{46}\).

223. Local authorities can attach conditions to site licences but, although they can enter and inspect sites, they have limited powers to enforce compliance with those conditions.

Bill provisions

224. Part 5 of the Bill contains provisions in relation to the licensing of mobile homes sites with permanent residents (referred to in the Bill as “relevant permanent sites”). These provisions will insert a new Part [1A] into the 1960 Act to deal with the licensing of such sites. These will make the following changes to the 1960 Act:

- introduction of statutory minimum application criteria (to be set by Ministers in regulations), which would require all applicants for relevant permanent site licences to provide the same basic information;
- requirement to renew licences every 3 years;
- provision for local authorities to charge a licence fee. The level this fee will be set by each local authority, but the Bill allows Ministers to make regulations specifying matters to be taken into account in determining the fee and/or to set a maximum fee;
- requirement for site owners to satisfy a fit and proper person test;
- increased enforcement powers for local authorities to take action where there has been a breach of site licence conditions.

225. The proposed enforcement powers include powers for a local authority to:

- issue an improvement notice on a site owner, to require them to carry out work to comply with a licence condition;
- issue a penalty notice, which would suspend pitch fee payments, and the commission a resident pays to the site owner on the sale of their mobile home, if the site owner failed to comply with an improvement notice;
- undertake emergency works on sites and recover the costs from site owners;

\(^{46}\) The First Schedule to the 1960 Act lists sites which do not require licences – these include local authority sites.
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

- ask a sheriff to appoint an interim manager to take over the running of the site in specific circumstances, such as when a site licence is revoked, or a local authority has refused to renew a licence;
- revoke a site licence in certain circumstances;
- recover the costs of enforcement action from the site owner involved.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

226. The operation of the new licensing and enforcement regime will not have cost implications for the Scottish Government. There may be one-off costs to the Scottish Government in consulting on and developing secondary legislation that supports the implementation of the new licensing system (for example, regulations on the procedures to be followed in relation to licence applications, licence transfers and appeals against local authority decisions on applications).

227. The Scottish Government does not expect that secondary legislation will be required under all of these powers at the initial implementation stage. The intention is to discuss with stakeholders whether regulations are needed on some matters before the provisions are brought into force. Some other powers (such as to alter maximum fines) are required to provide flexibility to adapt and update the licensing regime in future. The cost of the SSIs required for implementation is expected to be between £600 and £1500, on the basis of an approximate cost of £300 per SSI and will be met from within existing programme budgets.

228. There will also be one-off costs to the Scottish Government for the development and publication of guidance on the legislative changes in this Bill and consultation on the SSIs. This is estimated to be less than £10,000 and will also be met from within existing programme budgets.

Scottish Court Service costs

229. Court figures cannot be broken down to the level of identifying how many court cases relate to mobile homes, but the Scottish Government is aware of only one such court challenge to site licence conditions in recent years. Site licences can be revoked at present, but only by a criminal court, on application by a local authority following the conviction of a site owner for breach of licence conditions (see section 9 of the 1960 Act).

230. The new licensing regime is likely to give rise to more court challenges to local authority decisions than the current regime. Licences will be due for renewal every three years. Local authorities will have greater discretion to refuse licence applications and where they do so, applicants may seek to challenge their decisions. Local authorities will also have enhanced enforcement powers, including the ultimate sanction of revoking a licence without first obtaining a criminal conviction. Licensees may challenge the use of those powers. In both cases the Bill creates routes of appeal which will allow local authority decisions to be challenged in the sheriff court. The Scottish Government expects that these appeals will be raised using the summary application procedure and follow the standard arrangements for such cases, meaning there would not be any initial set-up costs.

231. These new appeals in relation to mobile homes licensing will have continuing implications for the Scottish Court Service but, although it is difficult to predict how many appeals there may be, it is not expected that the annual case numbers will be significant. Research by Consumer Focus identified 92 mobile home sites in Scotland, with around 3,314 mobile homes. The majority of sites have fewer than 50 residential homes. If appeals were raised in relation to every site licence application in Scotland, this would give a total of 92 mobile home appeals over three years. However, the Scottish Government expects that the majority of site owners will satisfy the fit and proper person test, be granted a licence, and will continue to run their sites in compliance with the licence conditions and without the local authority taking enforcement action against them. As highlighted above, the Scottish Government is aware of only one court challenge to licence conditions in the past year. If that pattern were repeated in future years it would mean that slightly over 1% of the sites in Scotland might give rise to court action in any year. Even if, as an example, 5% of owners were refused a licence or were subject to enforcement action, and half of those owners raised an appeal, this would give a total of two to three appeal cases a year.

232. The estimated cost to the Scottish Court Service of a summary application case is £95 but the Scottish Government estimates that this small number of additional cases could be subsumed within existing sheriff court staffing and court sittings so there would be no additional cost to the Scottish Court Service.

Costs on local authorities

233. The provisions will require local authorities to consider licence applications for relevant permanent sites.

234. There are cost implications associated with licensing relevant permanent sites, including staff time, support and administration resources. The implications for each local authority will depend on the number of relevant permanent sites in a local authority's area, the geography of that area and the size of the sites. Most local authorities have at least one such site in their area.

235. The costs of an enhanced licensing regime can be separated into two parts. Firstly, the initial costs of administering the new application process and, secondly, the costs associated with enforcement action.

Costs of administering application process

236. Local authorities will incur administrative costs in logging, considering and approving applications, including assessing whether applicants meet the fit and proper person test. They will also incur costs in relation to site visits, both in terms of travel and reporting on the visits. The precise costs for each local authority will depend on the salary levels of the staff carrying out administrative work, the number of sites in their area, and the travel distances involved. These costs are to be met through the introduction of a fee on application.

237. The Bill confers power on local authorities to set their own fees, but requires them to take into account factors that the Scottish Ministers can set out in regulations. Local authorities will also have to observe any maximum fee level that the Scottish Ministers may choose to set. The cost of providing a licence will reflect the cost to an authority of providing one. This will clearly vary from authority to authority, depending on the size and geography of a local authority’s area and the way individual authorities decide to tackle the tasks involved. Based on research, analysis, and interviews with local authority stakeholders, the Scottish Government estimates that the likely cost of a site licence will be around £600 (for current sites, £56,511 every three years, across the sector). However, the exact cost will depend on many factors, such as the amount of staff time involved, staff salaries, and the procedures adopted by an authority. The Scottish Government’s estimated figure takes into account the elements set out at table 17.

Costs of enforcement action

238. The Scottish Government intends for the enhanced enforcement regime to be as cost-neutral as possible. Local authorities will retain discretion to undertake the enforcement action they consider to be most appropriate and to manage budgets accordingly. The Bill confers power on local authorities to issue a range of enforcement notices (considered below) and allows them to recover the expenses of issuing such notices. It also allows local authorities to charge fees for inspections, and other work, to investigate or assess compliance with licence conditions. Such a fee cannot exceed the costs reasonably incurred by the local authority in carrying out the work. It will be for local authorities to decide whether it is necessary or proportionate for them to use these powers of recovery in individual cases. For example, they may decide that charging a fee for a single inspection is unnecessary but it is desirable to charge fees for a series of additional inspections where a site owner is being uncooperative.

239. The Bill confers power on local authorities to issue improvement notices to require site owners to take action to remedy failures to comply with licence conditions. Where a site owner fails to comply with the improvement notice, the local authority can carry out the work required and can issue a penalty notice which suspends payments of pitch fees, and the commission a resident pays to the site owner on the sale of a mobile home, until the work is done. The Bill also allows local authorities to reclaim from site owners their expenses in relation to improvement notices, penalty notices and carrying out work so this provision should be cost-neutral for local authorities. The exact costs will vary from case to case, depending on the amount of work required by the local authority.

240. The Bill confers power on local authorities to enter land and take emergency action where a failure by a site owner to comply with licence conditions has created an imminent risk of serious harm to health and safety. The exact costs will depend on the work carried out. The Bill allows local authorities to recover their expenses from the site owner so this provision should be cost-neutral for local authorities.

241. The Bill makes provision for a local authority to revoke a site licence, and to apply to a sheriff to appoint an interim site manager. The Bill also allows Scottish Ministers to make regulations relating to the appointment of an interim manager. These regulations can include provisions relating to the powers of an interim manager, the qualifications they must hold, and the actions the interim manager must carry out. It is the Scottish Government’s intention that management by an interim site manager would be funded directly by the turnover from the site.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

Residential mobile home site owners

242. The majority of residential mobile home sites in Scotland are owned by family businesses, mostly small and medium enterprises. Most sites are relatively small (11 to 50 units). Site owners charge residents an annual pitch fee and also receive a percentage commission charge (usually 10%) when residents sell their mobile homes. A recent Scottish Government survey suggested that the average annual pitch fee for residential sites was £1,338, and that around 73% of turnover from sites comes from these pitch fees, but these results were based on a very low response rate. A much larger study carried out by the UK government in 2002 indicated that only 42% of turnover was attributable to pitch fees. The Scottish Government research suggested that the resale market for mobile homes had declined since the economic downturn, hence reducing the income site owners receive from commission fees. It, therefore, seems reasonable to assume that the percentage of turnover attributable to pitch fees will be more than 42% even if it is less than 73%.

243. The majority of the costs of the new licensing regime will fall to site owners, who will need to pay new fees for licences. The relative impact of the licence costs will depend on the size of the business and the level of the fee charged. As with the costs for local authorities, the costs can be separated into two parts. Firstly, the initial costs of obtaining a licence and secondly, any costs associated with enforcement action.

Licence costs

244. The provisions in the Bill (section 54, which inserts section 32C(3) into the 1960 Act) mean that when setting a licence fee a local authority will need to ensure that the fee they charge for a relevant permanent site application reflects what they consider to be the authority’s reasonable administrative costs in deciding an application (which will involve logging, considering and approving an application). This will include assessing whether the applicant has met the fit and proper person test, and conducting a site visit. As set out above the Scottish Government estimates that a three-year licence fee of around £600 would cover the likely costs to be involved.

245. Assuming that 73% of turnover was attributable to pitch fees and that the average annual pitch fee is £1,338, a licence fee of £600 would amount to 1-3% of turnover over 3 years for sites with under 20 units and less than 1% of turnover for larger sites. The Bill allows local authorities to charge reduced fees for smaller sites. If, as seems likely, annual pitch fees account for less than 73% of turnover, the total turnover from sites will be greater and the relative impact of licence fees will be reduced.

Enforcement costs

246. The Bill is drafted on the principle that site owners who do not comply with the legislation or with the conditions of their licences should bear the costs of action by local authorities in order to enforce compliance. These costs will vary depending on the enforcement action required but owners who comply with the licensing regime will not have to bear any further enforcement costs.

247. The Bill confers power on local authorities to issue improvement notices to require site owners to take action to remedy failures to comply with licence conditions. The Bill also allows local authorities to reclaim from site owners their expenses in relation to improvement notices. The exact costs will vary from case to case, depending on the amount of work required by the local authority. Where site owners fail to comply with an improvement notice, local authorities can serve penalty notices, suspending owners’ rights to receive pitch fees from site residents and the commission a resident pays to the site owner on the sale of their mobile home. These costs to site owners will be avoidable, as they will only be incurred where site owners fail to comply with licence conditions. The Bill also protects the interests of site owners by allowing them to challenge improvement notices by appealing to the sheriff.

248. The Bill confers power on local authorities to enter land and take emergency action where a failure by a site owner to comply with licence conditions has created an imminent risk of serious harm to health and safety. The exact costs will depend on the work carried out. Again, the Bill allows local authorities to recover their expenses from the site owner. These costs to site owners will be avoidable, as they will only be incurred in extreme cases where site owners fail to comply with licence conditions to such an extent that an imminent risk of serious harm is created. The Bill also protects the interests of site owners by allowing them to challenge emergency works by appealing to the sheriff.

249. The Bill makes provision to refuse or revoke site licences in certain circumstances, such as when a site owner is no longer a fit and proper person to hold a site licence. The Bill also provides for the site to continue in operation but to be managed by an interim manager. This management activity would be funded directly by the turnover from the site, with any surplus being returned to the owner. As with the other enforcement powers, these costs to site owners will be avoidable, as they will only be incurred where site owners do not pass the fit and proper person test or breach licence conditions.

Site residents

250. None of the Bill provisions will impose direct costs on site residents.

PART 6 – PRIVATE HOUSING CONDITIONS

INTRODUCTION

251. This section of the Financial Memorandum sets out the expected costs and savings of the provisions in the Bill (at sections 72-76) on private housing conditions. It considers the financial implications for the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses.

252. Local authorities have enforcement powers under Part 1 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 (“the 2006 Act”). These are discretionary powers to allow local authorities to require home owners, including owner occupiers and private landlords, to carry out work needed to repair or maintain private property. The Bill amends the 2006 Act to make the use of these powers more effective by—

- providing a discretionary power to allow local authorities, where appropriate, to support decisions by owners for repair works by paying missing shares on behalf of owners who are unable or unwilling to pay their share of the cost of work agreed by a majority of owners.
- extending the situations in which local authorities can issues maintenance orders to include an automatic follow-on where a work notice has been issued.
- reducing the number of documents in connection with maintenance orders that have to be registered in the Land Register and amending the ways in which local authorities can approve or devise maintenance plans.
- providing that a work notice which requires work to repair a substandard house can also include work to improve security or safety.
- extending the powers to issue repayment charges where a work notice or maintenance order has been enforced to include commercial properties.

253. The 2006 Act provides powers rather than duties and the use of the powers will vary by local authority. It is not possible to quantify the additional costs and benefits of the proposed changes because the use of these powers is discretionary. The Scottish Government assumes that the amendments will allow local authorities to make more effective use of existing resources.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

254. There are no new financial costs or requirements for the Scottish Government in the changes to local authority enforcement powers. Costs of any additional guidance are likely to be minimal.

Registers of Scotland

255. Registers of Scotland receives a fee for registration of maintenance orders, plans and repayment charges. The registration fee is £60 for each document. However, repayment charges are compatible with the Automated Registration of Title to Land (ARTL) and charges registered through ARTL are charged a reduced fee of £50.

256. The amendments would mean that maintenance plans would not be registered but could encourage an increase in maintenance orders and possibly also repayment charges.

257. It is not possible to quantify the impact of the amendments on these numbers, but as the numbers are relatively low, the Scottish Government does not expect a significant financial impact on Registers of Scotland from the Bill.

Costs on local authorities

258. Local authorities have a statutory duty to address housing that is below tolerable standard and enforcement powers to require owners to carry out work needed to address substandard housing. Local authorities already have powers to recover costs from owners. The current powers were introduced by the 2006 Act and came into effect from 1 April 2009.

259. Local authorities have discretionary powers to offer a wide range of assistance to help home owners with repairs, maintenance and improvements to private property. In 2012/13, local authorities spent £7 million on assistance for home owners with work to repair, maintain and improve their homes, and a further £4 million on assistance in connection with enforcement notices.\(^\text{50}\)

260. If owners are unwilling or unable to carry out work, local authorities can carry out work themselves and recover the costs. However, this requires an initial outlay by the local authority and there is a risk that the full cost will be unrecoverable.

261. This Bill makes changes to existing powers. It is not expected that the measures in the Bill will increase the costs to local authorities. The changes are intended to make the use of the powers more effective and this includes a reduction in the administration costs incurred by local authorities by reducing the number of documents that have to be registered. Because the measures in the Bill build on the existing enforcement powers no transitional costs are expected.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

Home owners

262. The primary responsibility for the cost of work to protect and preserve private property rests with owners, under the terms of their title deeds. The last estimate of the cost of repairs in the private sector was in the Scottish House Condition Survey (SHCS) 2002.\(^\text{51}\) The report estimated a total cost of £5 billion for comprehensive repairs needed for private housing in Scotland, including £825 million for comprehensive repairs needed for private rented housing. It was estimated that £598 million would be needed for the comprehensive repair of common parts shared between homes across all tenures (shared between owners and social landlords). In addition it was estimated that it would cost £1.24 billion to carry out essential improvements, including full central heating and thermal insulation, to private sector property.

263. Subsequent Scottish House Condition Surveys have not included estimates of repair costs but it is likely that overall costs have not reduced because measures of underlying disrepair have been static.

264. The importance of work is not always recognised by owners and in some cases local authorities need statutory powers to require owners to carry out work. This is work that would be required in any case over time to prevent the deterioration of the building, and the costs may in fact be lower than if the work was delayed.

265. Current enforcement powers allow local authorities to carry out the work and recover their costs from owners where owners are unwilling or unable to arrange work themselves. Local authorities can recover the costs of work that they undertake on behalf of owners who are unable or unwilling to do the work themselves. Local authority enforcement powers are discretionary and the main constraint on their use is the limits of local authority resources to meet the upfront cost of enforcement, even if these costs are in principle recoverable over the longer term. Local authorities have to prioritise intervention to best meet the needs identified in their local housing strategies and will only cover part of the total work that home owners should be carrying out.

266. The Bill amends the existing enforcement powers to improve their efficiency. This will not affect home owners’ responsibility for carrying out work on their home but should improve local authorities’ ability to ensure that owners are required to do so when intervention is necessary.

267. Local authorities can recover the cost of registering any documents in the land registers. Consequently, changes to reduce the number of documents that have to be registered will reduce that cost to home owners.

Private landlords

268. The Scottish House Condition Survey 2002 estimate that the cost of comprehensive repairs would be £825 million and the cost of essential improvements £223 million in private rented homes. It is likely that this figure has increased because, while measures of underlying disrepair have not changed much, the size of the private rented sector has increased. In 2002 there were an estimated 170,000 privately rented properties in Scotland. In 2011 this had increased to 290,000.

Local businesses

269. All owners in buildings which contain living accommodation are responsible for their share of the cost of enforcement of repair and maintenance work by local authorities. Local authorities can currently use a repayment charge to recover their costs from residential owners in 30 annual instalments. The Bill would extend the power to use repayment charges to recover costs owed by owners of commercial properties, such as a ground floor shops, including costs of registering repayment charges and the discharge of repayment charges. This would provide local authorities with more effective powers for recovering costs and allow local businesses the same timescale for repayment. Currently local authorities rely on civil recovery methods which are not always effective and may force businesses into insolvency.

Construction sector

270. The construction sector will benefit if more owners spend more money looking after their homes. The Scottish House Condition Survey Local Authority Report for 2009/11 estimates that on average each year 42% of owners of private sector homes have done work on their homes and spent a total of £2 billion.

271. Costs and savings will arise in the financial year from which the changes to enforcement powers come into effect and continuing. The maximum costs and benefits, so far as they can be quantified, are set out at table 19.

PART 7 – MISCELLANEOUS

INTRODUCTION

272. Part 7 makes a number of miscellaneous amendments in respect of:

- the right to redeem a security after 20 years in certain circumstances;
- the Scottish Housing Regulator’s (SHR) powers to transfer assets following inquiries, and
- repeals defective designation provisions in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 (“the 1987 Act”).

273. This section of the Financial Memorandum sets out the expected additional costs and savings of the provisions in the Bill (at sections 77 – 80) covering these provisions. It considers the financial implications for the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses.

RIGHT TO REDEEM HERITABLE SECURITY AFTER 20 YEARS: POWER TO EXEMPT

Introduction

274. The Bill includes the following provisions:

- it gives Scottish Ministers a power to designate securities to which the 20-year security rule will not apply. This is the right of a borrower to redeem a security over a private dwelling house after it has been in existence for at least 20 years, by paying the original debt plus interest, less any money already repaid.
- in designating securities, Scottish Ministers must describe the securities affected by reference to the type of debt that is secured. They may also attach conditions to the disapplication, or restrict it to specific descriptions of debt, specific creditors or types of creditor, or specific securities or types of security.

275. The Scottish Government intends to use these provisions to designate certain schemes that it operates which advance loans that are linked to the market value of dwelling houses, such as Help to Buy, Help to Adapt and the Low-cost Initiative for First-time Buyers (LIFT), as being exempt from the 20-year security rule. Without use of these provisions, in cases where securities are redeemed after 20 years or more have elapsed, Scottish Ministers would risk receiving the original value of the equity loan rather than the market value of its equity share at the date of redemption. Owners are not obliged to exercise this right, but would have an incentive to do so when the value of the equity has risen. When the equity value has fallen they can redeem the equity loan based on the property’s current market value. Thus exercise of this right is only likely to occur when it would reduce the receipt to Scottish Ministers.

276. In order to avoid this situation from arising, it is currently common practice to limit agreements to 19 years for securities of these types. In fact, by year 19, many homeowners may have already sold the home or, in the case of the shared equity schemes, tranch ed up to full ownership. For those who have not, there is unlikely to be a difficulty in agreeing a new loan period with the Scottish Government.

277. However, the repayment requirement at year 19 has become a barrier to lender participation in the new Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme and the existing LIFT schemes as a result of the new Financial Conduct Authority Mortgage Market Review (MMR) guidance 2014. Under the Mortgage Market Review guidance, lenders providing a first charge loan will be required to take account of the effect that a shared equity loan may have on the affordability of the first charge loan.

278. Lenders have raised concerns that any Scottish Government legal documentation for its shared equity schemes containing a “payment event” provision at year 19 introduces an element of risk for them. Lenders’ view is that under the MMR rules they will need to take any ‘payment event’ provision into account when assessing a buyer for a mortgage (as the 19-year period is likely to be less than the term of the first charge loan).

279. Lenders asked the Scottish Government to consider guaranteeing that its equity loan would extend as long as the term of the first charge loan. However, by granting such a guarantee Scottish Ministers would be committing themselves to agreements which would be longer than 20 years and would, therefore, incur the risk of Scottish Ministers foregoing significant receipts (as set out further below).

280. The proposed amendments will, therefore, enable Scottish Ministers to remove the 19-year payment requirement, thus facilitating lender participation in the new Help to Buy scheme and continued lender participation in the existing LIFT schemes. For the Help to Adapt scheme, the provisions simplify the delivery of the scheme and are likely to improve take-up. There may also be schemes run by other organisations which could benefit from such a designation, since these would be able to run for more than 19 years. Making it viable for equity loans to run for longer than 19 years will also make it easier to match the duration of such loans with the duration of any other loans over the property.

Costs on the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses

281. There are no significant costs for the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies and individuals associated with the 20-year security rule provisions.

Savings

282. As explained above, without amendment to the 20-year security rule, for its Help to Buy (Scotland), Help to Adapt and LIFT schemes, the Scottish Government would have to require repayment of loans in year 19 in order to avoid the risk of receiving the original value

52 The Mortgage Market Review guidance is at http://www.fca.org.uk/your-fca/documents/fsa-ps-12-16-mortgage-market-review of equity loans rather than the market value of those loans which remain in existence after 20 years. Any other lenders would be in the same position.

283. There are a number of benefits from avoiding the need for a year 19 repayment requirement. Firstly, it removes the need for households to enter into discussions and draw up new securities. This will result in direct savings by avoiding the associated time and legal costs. Each affected household could save around an estimated £900 by not having to enter into new securities after 19 years has elapsed. Although the majority of households are likely to have sold their house (or tranch up to full ownership) by year 19, a significant proportion is likely to still be in their house.

284. With the risk of decreased or no lender participation, another option for the Scottish Government would be not to include a year 19 repayment requirement, thus taking the risk of receiving no equity uplift on loans which last beyond 20 years. In such a case, the benefits which would arise from the proposed designations would be that the Scottish Government would no longer forego these receipts.

285. Modelling work undertaken for the relevant Scottish Government schemes can help illustrate the likely range of these foregone receipts. Their potential explains why, in the absence of the proposed designation powers, in practice the Scottish Government would be likely to insist on a year 19 repayment requirement. The savings given below are the net loss in nominal cashflow to the Scottish Government for as long as the equity loans are in existence.

Help to Buy (Scotland)

286. Based on a three-year scheme financed by £220 million of financial transactions, the range of potential foregone receipts can be illustrated by varying key parameters, particularly house prices and equity loan duration.

287. If it is assumed that in the absence of the 20-year security rule, all participants would repay the equity loan at year 25 (a common duration for a residential mortgage) and if it is assumed that house prices follow the UK OBR forecasts, then if the owners were instead able to exercise their rights under the 20-year rule the Scottish Government would forego receipts of around £250 million. The baseline of all repayment at year 25 is an extreme case however. If instead equity redemption is assumed to be constant over the 25-year period (i.e. people sell their houses or tranche up at a uniform rate over the 25 years), then foregone receipts would be around £100 million. Higher house prices would mean even larger foregone receipts. If instead of following the OBR forecasts, future house prices rise at the same rate as they did between 1985 and 2010, foregone receipts could be in the range of £220 million to £690 million. In this case and if there was no repayment requirement at year 19, there would be a considerable incentive for homeowners to exercise the right to redeem a security after 20 years, meaning a loss towards the higher end of the range would be more likely.

288. In summary, if the Scottish Government went ahead with the Help to Buy scheme without inserting a year 19 repayment requirement for the operation of the scheme, the proposed designation power could save the Scottish Government up to £690 million in receipts which would otherwise be foregone if house prices were to increase as rapidly as they have in the past. A more realistic estimate based on lower house price rises is for savings in the region of £100 million to £250 million.

LIFT

289. A similar modelling process has been undertaken for the LIFT programme, with results based on funding of £50 million for the financial year 2014/15. If the LIFT schemes become subject to the 20-year security rule, this could result in forgone Scottish Government revenue of between £20 million and £55 million, but, subject to high house price growth, this could be as much as £150 million.

Help to Adapt

290. Savings to the Scottish Government as a result of use of the provisions to designate the Help to Adapt scheme have been calculated for an initial pilot and a national scheme. Under the Help to Adapt scheme, repayment is due when the home owner dies or sells the property. Modelling indicates that around 26% of loans will be outstanding at year 20. In calculating savings, it is assumed that everyone in this position exercises the right to redeem at year 19. As the scheme includes a repayment cap to protect home owners from the impact of high house price inflation, the level of savings is based on zero real house price inflation and a 2% general inflation rate.

291. In an initial pilot scheme (running over three and a half years and distributing £6 million in loans), the expected reduction in income returned to the Scottish Government, compared with the scenario where a designation is made, would be around £700,000.

292. For a full national scheme (running over five years and distributing £26 million in loans), the expected equivalent reduction would be around £3 million.

Summary

293. There are no costs to the Scottish Government or stakeholders associated with the change to the 20-year security rule. There are potential savings for each affected household relating to avoiding the negotiating and legal costs of putting a new security in place in year 19 (with avoided legal costs estimated at around £900 per property), as well as reducing the uncertainty to the owner and third parties of what the future legal position relating to the property will be. In particular, the proposed changes will facilitate the participation of lenders in Scottish Government schemes. In their absence, the economic and social benefits from the Scottish Government schemes would be lost.

294. In a situation where the Scottish Government does not require a year 19 repayment, and the 20-year security rule continues to operate, the foregone receipts could be considerable. In this situation, the benefits from the proposed changes stem from the fact that these receipts will no longer be lost. The potential size of these savings has been illustrated for the various Scottish Government schemes. For a £220 million three-year Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme, the savings could be between £100 million and £250 million based on OBR house-price forecasts.

295. If the LIFT schemes become subject to the 20-year security rule, based on funding of £50m LIFT programme in 2014/15, forgone Scottish Government revenue is likely to be between £20 million and £55 million. For the Help to Adapt scheme the expected benefits to the Scottish Government as a result of the proposed amendment could be around £700,000 for an initial pilot and around £3 million for a full national scheme (running over five years and distributing £26 million in loans). The potential size of these foregone receipts, which involve a redistribution of equity gains from the Scottish Government to the owner merely because the owner has remained in the property for at least 20 years, explains why, in the absence of the proposed designation powers, the Scottish Government would be likely to continue to insist on a year 19 repayment requirement, with the additional costs and foregone benefits associated with this.

DELEGATION OF CERTAIN FUNCTIONS (PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING PANEL)

296. Following consultation with the Scottish Tribunal Service and the president of the private rented housing panel, provisions has been made to allow the president to delegate their duties to the vice president or any other panel member, as the president sees fit. This power of delegation is in addition to the existing powers of delegation which can be exercised during times of absence or incapacity, and is intended to increase flexibility to manage workloads effectively.

Costs on the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses

297. There are no other costs or savings identified in connection with these provisions in the Bill.

SCOTTISH HOUSING REGULATOR (SHR): TRANSFER OF ASSETS FOLLOWING INQUIRIES

298. The provisions amend section 67(4) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 (“the 2010 Act”) to give the SHR the power to direct a transfer of all or part of a RSL’s assets without a duty to consult where the RSL’s viability is in jeopardy for financial reasons, there is a risk of imminent insolvency, the proposed transfer of assets would remove the risk of insolvency and the need to direct the transfer is so urgent that it would not be possible to comply with the consultation duty.

299. The provisions also amend section 67(6)(a) of the 2010 Act by removing the requirement on the SHR to obtain an independent valuation prior to it making a direction to transfer some of a RSL’s assets and replacing it with a power to do so in cases where there would be time to undertake a valuation without imperilling an urgently required transfer.
Costs on the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses

300. There are no other costs or savings identified in connection with these provisions in the Bill.

REPEAL OF DEFECTIVE DESIGNATION

302. It is estimated that there are approximately 15,000 PRC homes designated as defective in Scotland, of which 3,000 are in the private sector. Almost all of the private housing is ex-local authority stock acquired under the right-to-buy scheme. The designation limits the availability of mortgage finance and restricts house sales and discourages investment to improve the quality of these houses.

303. Part 14 of the 1987 Act provided a grant scheme to assist owners of affected properties. This grant scheme expired in 1994. With the expiry of the grant scheme, the provisions are obsolete and have no benefit to home owners.

Costs on the Scottish Administration, local authorities and other bodies, individuals and businesses

304. There are no other costs or savings identified in connection with these provisions in the Bill.
These documents relate to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

1. Cost multipliers are derived by dividing the estimated number of letting agent complaints by the actual number of PRHP cases.
2. Includes stationery, printing, minor purchases of ACTS etc.
3. Based on three panel members per hearing (on average). In 2011 the PRHP had 40 panel members. Total fees include the variability of fees for different types of cases as they progress through the tribunal process. Some cases will take longer and cost more and vice versa. This fees variability has been accounted in the fee figures quoted above.
4. The PRHP currently employed 1 x B3 and 3 x A3s in to manage an average of 250 cases per annum.
5. Includes the costs associated with rejecting cases at the start of the process. It would be expected that these costs would be mainly covered by the President’s fees but also members’ fees in some more complex cases of rejection.
6. These items of expenditure have been uprated to incorporate 3 panel members on 20% of panels and 2 panel members on 80% of panels.

PRESIDING OFFICER’S STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 21 November 2013, the Presiding Officer (Rt Hon Tricia Marwick MSP) made the following statement:

POLICY MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Housing (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory Notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 41–EN.

BILL CONTENT

2. The Bill is structured in the following parts:
   - Part 1 abolishes the right to buy.
   - Part 2 amends the definition of reasonable preference in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 on allocating social housing; sets out the factors that may be considered in the allocation of social housing; makes provision for the use of short Scottish secure tenancies where there has been a history of antisocial behaviour and for temporary lets to homeowners; extends the term of the short Scottish secure tenancy; and introduces qualifying periods before tenants can exercise rights to assign, sub-let or request a joint tenancy.
   - Part 3 and schedule 1 transfers jurisdiction for civil cases relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff court to the First-tier Tribunal; introduces a time limit for determining applications for landlord registration; and allows local authorities to apply to the private rented housing panel for enforcement of the repairing standard, setting out the procedure for such applications and the right of appeal.
   - Part 4 provides for a registration system for letting agents.
   - Part 5 amends the site licensing requirements for mobile home sites with permanent residents.
   - Part 6 amends local authority powers to enforce repairs and maintenance in private homes.
   - Part 7 makes a number of miscellaneous amendments in respect of the right to redeem a security after 20 years in certain circumstances; provides for the president of the private rented housing panel to designate certain functions; amends the Scottish Housing Regulator’s powers transfer assets following inquiries; and repeals defective designation provisions in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987.
Part 8 makes supplementary and final provisions.

OVERVIEW OF THE BILL

3. The Scottish Government’s vision is that all people in Scotland live in high-quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs.

4. This Bill will contribute to that vision through its main policy objectives of:
   - safeguarding the interests of consumers,
   - supporting improved quality, and
   - delivering better outcomes for communities.
This document relates to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

5. The Bill will safeguard the interests of consumers by:
   - introducing a regulatory framework for letting agents to help improve overall levels of service and professionalism within the industry, and
   - modernising the licensing of mobile homes and park homes.

6. It will support improved quality by:
   - giving local authorities powers to improve the quality of houses in the private sector and
   - giving local authorities the ability to make applications to the private rented housing panel for a determination on the repairing standard.

7. It will deliver better outcomes for communities by:
   - ensuring that best use is made of existing housing to help meet the needs of those without a suitable home by abolishing the right to buy social housing,
   - increasing flexibility in the allocation and management of social housing so that landlords can deliver improved outcomes for their tenants and the communities they live in,
   - ensuring that applications for landlord registration are not subject to unnecessary delay and are consistent in terms of requirements for licensing of houses in multiple occupation, and
   - transferring private rented sector cases from the courts to a tribunal in order to provide more efficient, accessible and specialist access to justice for landlords and tenants in the sector.

8. Achieving those objectives will contribute to the Scottish Government’s overarching purpose “to focus government and public services on creating a more successful country, with opportunities for all of Scotland to flourish, through increasing sustainable economic growth” and in particular to the following National Outcomes:
   - “We live in well-designed sustainable places where we are able to access the amenities and services we need,
   - We have strong, resilient and supportive communities where people take responsibility for their own actions and how they affect others,
   - Our public services are high quality, continually improving, efficient and responsive to local people’s needs.”

9. In addition, meeting the Bill’s objectives will achieve some of the commitments and actions set out in the Scottish Government’s Strategy and Action Plan for the 10 years to 2020, Homes Fit for the 21st Century.*

Right to buy

10. The policy objectives for ending the right to buy ("RTB") are to protect and enhance social housing for future generations and to safeguard the investment made in social housing over many generations. Ending RTB entitlements contributes to the Scottish Government’s wider strategic objective of a wealthier and fairer Scotland and safer and stronger communities.

11. Most tenants holding a Scottish secure tenancy ("SST") from a social landlord that began before 2 March 2011 will have some form of RTB entitlement. The Bill contains provisions that will end all of these RTB entitlements. It allows for a three-year period, from the date of Royal Assent, during which those tenants who have a RTB and are able to exercise it, can buy their home.

Social housing

12. Legislation controls tightly how social landlords manage their houses. This includes how they allocate homes and the tenancies on which they let them, as well as their powers to tackle antisocial behaviour.

13. The provisions in the Bill are intended to provide better outcomes for communities by:
- increasing the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing,
- allowing landlords to make best use of social housing,
- giving landlords more tools to tackle antisocial behaviour,
- providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights in a number of ways,
- clarifying existing legislation on how short SSTs operate.

Private rented housing

Private rented sector tribunal

14. The policy objectives for transferring private rented sector ("PRS") cases from the sheriff courts to a tribunal are to provide more efficient, accessible and specialist access to justice for both landlords and tenants in that sector.

15. The Bill would transfer jurisdiction for hearing cases, including eviction cases, relating to the PRS from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal ("FTT") (which will be created by the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill). There would be a route of appeal to the Upper Tribunal ("UT") in cases where an appeal is currently available from decisions of the sheriff court. The FTT and UT will collectively be known as the Scottish Tribunals. In practice this means that individual cases would be heard by tribunal committees in a new jurisdiction which would be part of the new Scottish Tribunals.

Third party reporting to the private rented housing panel

16. These provisions are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector. The provisions would give local authorities the power to make a direct application to the private rented housing panel where there is evidence that a landlord is not meeting a repairing standard (the property condition standard for private rented housing). The Scottish Government envisages that this would be used by local authorities as part of their strategic approach to tackling poor standards of housing in an area.

Enhanced enforcement areas

17. The Scottish Government intends to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities that would enable them to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector. A local authority would apply to the Scottish Ministers for additional enforcement powers for a specified geographic area to be designated an enhanced enforcement area (“EEA”). The policy objective is to ensure that local authorities have a range of effective tools available to them to tackle poor standards in the PRS.

Landlord registration

18. The policy objective is to bring applications for landlord registration into line with other authorisation schemes, such as houses in multiple occupation, which have a specified time period in which a local authority must process an application. The provisions in the Bill are a minor technical amendment which will allow for an application to be deemed to have been approved after a period of 12 months from the date of receipt by the local authority. The Bill also provides a power for local authorities to apply to a sheriff for an extension to the 12 month period in complex cases.

Regulating letting agents

19. The scale of the letting industry has grown alongside the increase in the number of properties in the PRS in Scotland. A range of property management services for landlords is provided by solicitors, estate agents and accommodation agencies, making the sector a varied one. The industry plays an important role in helping to deliver high quality services to tenants and prospective tenants. For example, letting agents can help to ensure that landlords meet their statutory responsibilities and can enable effective management and maintenance of privately rented properties.

20. In bringing forward provisions to regulate letting agents, the Scottish Government has two aims. The first is to promote high standards of service and levels of professionalism across the country and the second is to provide landlords and tenants with easy access to a mechanism that will help to resolve disputes where these arise.
21. To achieve these aims, the Bill provides for the creation of
   - a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, with an associated “fit and proper person test”,
   - statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice, produced in partnership with key industry stakeholders, and
   - a mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants).

Mobile home sites with permanent residents

22. There are 92 mobile home sites across Scotland. Between them they have around 3,314 mobile homes spread across 22 local authority areas. An increasing number of people, many of whom are elderly, live permanently in mobile homes or park homes. While many sites are well run, there is evidence that some site owners do not comply with existing statutory obligations.

23. By amending the legislation, the Scottish Government’s objective is to improve and strengthen the licensing regime that applies to mobile park home sites on which people live permanently.

Private house conditions

24. The policy objective is to ensure that local authorities have a range of powers to tackle poor conditions in the private sector. The intention is that these new discretionary powers in relation to private sector housing would give local authorities more tools to use in a strategic approach to tackling poor standards of owner-occupied and privately rented housing in their areas.

25. The Bill contains a number of provisions in relation to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties. The Bill will clarify existing powers in relation to maintenance orders, streamline the process for issuing those orders and ensure that local authorities have an effective means to recover the cost of works from owners of commercial properties in housing blocks (for example where there is a shop or office on the ground floor of a block of flats). The Bill will provide local authorities with a number of new discretionary powers.

Right to redeem a security after 20 years: power to exempt

26. The 20 year security rule provisions provide powers for the Scottish Ministers to designate schemes which would be exempt from the “20 year security rule” in the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974. The policy objective of the provisions is to ensure the Scottish Ministers are not exposed to the financial risks associated with the 20 year security rule which allows borrowers to redeem their equity loan at its original value after the security has been in force for 20 years.
Delegation of certain functions

27. The expansion of the private rented housing panel’s jurisdiction to deal with third party applications will lead to an increased workload for the president. This is also likely to have an impact on the workload of the president in relation to the homeowners housing panel. The policy objective of the provisions is to provide greater flexibility to allow both the private rented housing and the homeowners housing panels to effectively manage this increased workload.

Scottish Housing Regulator: transfer of assets following inquiries

28. The policy objective is to equip the Scottish Housing Regulator (“SHR”) to meet its statutory objective, to safeguard and promote the interests of tenants of social landlords, in an increasingly difficult and challenging financial climate, particularly in cases where there is an imminent threat of a registered social landlord (“RSL”) becoming insolvent. The provisions would achieve the objective by making two amendments to the SHR’s powers, under section 67 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010, to direct a RSL to transfer some or all of its assets to other RSLs.

Repeal of defective designation provisions

29. By repealing the defective designation provisions in Part 14 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, the Scottish Government’s intention is to remove an obsolete provision.

ALTERNATIVE APPROACHES

30. The Bill content covers a number of housing policy areas. Stakeholders identified some areas for legislative change through their engagement with the Scottish Government’s discussion on its paper Housing: Fresh Thinking, New Ideas. Having committed to exploring these further, the Government then consulted on proposals for each policy area. These consultations explored a number of options, including the option to do nothing and options to take a different policy approach. Details of the alternative approaches considered are set out under each policy area in this document.

CONSULTATION

31. The policy objectives of the Bill have been developed through extensive consultation and discussion with stakeholders. Following the publication of its Strategy and Action Plan - Homes Fit for the 21st Century in February 2011, the Scottish Government carried out seven consultations on policy areas where it was considering legislation. As well as publishing the consultations on its website, the Scottish Government used a range of methods for widening the reach to stakeholders. These included social media, face-to-face workshops, establishing advisory groups and presentations at conferences. Further information on the level of engagement and the outcomes of these consultation exercises is provided in the detailed narrative about each part of the Bill.

32. Information on the impact of the Bill on these issues is provided in relation to each Part of the Bill. The Bill as a whole is expected to have a positive effect on the well-being of communities generally, including island communities. The Scottish Government has considered the potential effect of the Bill on human rights. It is satisfied that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights. The Bill creates a number of criminal offences where necessary, each of which is compatible with Convention rights. The Scottish Government considers that the provisions do not have any adverse effect on sustainable development.

33. The following sections of this Policy Memorandum set out the rationale for each part of the Bill.

DETAILED POLICY OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

PART 1 – RIGHT TO BUY

Policy objectives

34. The Scottish Government wants to end all right to buy (“RTB”) entitlements in Scotland in order to protect and enhance social housing and to safeguard the investment made in social housing over many generations. Ending RTB entitlements contributes to its strategic objective of a wealthier and fairer Scotland and safer and stronger communities.

35. RTB has extended the benefits of home ownership to many families. It has been a major contributor to the change in the number of homes owned in Scotland. Whereas home ownership stood at 36% in 1981, 65% of Scottish homes are now owner-occupied. However, the Scottish Government considers that RTB is outdated and has no place in Scotland because when it was introduced there were no other routes into low-cost home ownership. That is not the case now. The impact of RTB goes beyond tenants to their landlord and the wider community. Around 455,000 houses have been sold in Scotland since right to buy was introduced. It has severely reduced the number of homes available to rent from social landlords at a time demand exceeds supply in many areas. The Scottish Government set out its priorities for housing in Homes Fit for the 21st Century, its Strategy and Action Plan to 2020. This made clear its intention to increase supply across all tenures. The continuing depletion of social housing stock is unsustainable in the face of continued high levels of need for this form of housing in Scotland. For example, on 31 March 2013 there were 184,887 people on local-authority waiting lists.5

36. As a result, those on the waiting lists often have to wait longer for properties to become available and existing tenants who want to move to a home more suited to their needs can encounter difficulty because of a lack of available homes of the right type.

37. While new-supply social housing is not subject to RTB, social landlords can still lose existing stock. Although RTB sales have fallen substantially from their peak, there are still around 1,400 homes sold under RTB each year. Around 500,000 tenants still have a RTB, with around 207,000 of these having a preserved RTB. These are tenants who retain a right to buy that they held prior to 30 September 2002. One reason for the relatively low level of sales in recent years could be the lack of mortgage availability due to the current economic situation. It is possible that the annual sales figure could increase should the economic situation, and access to finance, improve.

38. RTB sales erode the asset base of landlords and can cause pressure to increase rent levels for other tenants. RTB discounts are calculated on the aggregated length of tenure in social housing and result in landlords selling homes for less than it will cost them to build a replacement. This is particularly true of sales under preserved RTB, where the maximum discount is 70% of the value of a flat or 60% of the value of a house. In these sales, the large discount leaves the landlord with an average receipt of only £31,000, yet it costs around £120,000 to build a replacement house. Most of the cost of new build is usually financed through borrowing against future rental surplus. Nevertheless, the shortfall under preserved RTB sales is too great to be sustainable. The average RTB discount is £42,000, and under “preserved” RTB it is over £50,000, but one third of tenants get a higher discount. In the last two financial years, 141 tenants got discounts of over £75,000. The highest discount was £119,000.

39. Statistics on market values, sale prices and discounts are published by the Scottish Government – Sales to Sitting Tenants. As well as meeting the needs of those on the housing list, local authorities also have responsibilities for housing homeless people. Between October and December 2012 alone there were 8,374 applications for homelessness assistance and 7,200 applications were assessed as priority.

40. There is emerging evidence that RTB properties end up in the private rented sector (PRS). A recent study by Glasgow University suggests that 43% of local housing allowance PRS housing benefit claims in Renfrewshire are for ex-RTB properties. Because housing benefit claims by PRS tenants are higher than claims by social rented tenants, the report estimates that the UK Government is paying an extra £3 million each year in housing benefit in Renfrewshire alone, compared to what it would have paid if those houses had still been owned by the council.

41. Through this reform, the Scottish Government aims to ensure that social housing should never be available for sale under RTB and therefore should always remain available for renting as social housing. This would mean that no current or future tenants of social housing would be entitled to buy their homes.

Smith, University of Glasgow and Renfrewshire Council
42. The Scottish Government recognises that many people want to own their homes but does not believe that this should be at the expense of homes in the social rented sector. It is, therefore, committed to supporting home ownership in other ways, including help for people on low to moderate incomes to become home owners where it is affordable for them. As part of this, the Low-cost Initiative for First-time Buyers (“LIFT”) brings together several schemes to help households become homeowners. In addition, the Scottish Government is helping credit-worthy borrowers to access 90 to 95% loan-to-value mortgages for new-build homes through its guarantee support for the private sector led MI New Home scheme. While the new Help to Buy (Scotland) shared equity scheme helps buyers to buy a new build home from a participating home builder without having to fund all of the purchase price.

Notice period

43. To ensure compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights, tenants who have and can currently exercise their RTB will be given a reasonable opportunity to do so before this reform comes into force. The Scottish Government considers that a notice period of three years from the date of Royal Assent for the Bill will afford tenants the opportunity to exercise their current rights if they wish to do so. This gives them time to consider carefully the implications of home ownership, and obtain financial advice before making any decision.

Alternative approaches

44. The Scottish Government considered, and consulted on, the option of moving all tenants with preserved RTB onto modernised RTB. This would have ended the discounts of up to 70% available under preserved RTB, and placed all tenants with the RTB on an equal footing. While this option would still see social rented properties being sold, there would be potential financial benefits for landlords as there is a smaller discount and larger sales receipt which could potentially fund re-investment in new housing.

45. However this option is not without complexity, particularly given the impact of pressured area status legislation and relevant provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001. More specifically, in areas of high housing need a local authority can suspend the RTB by designating pressured area status, and maintain that suspension for as long as it considers that this is justified by housing need. In addition, there are currently 52 RSLs where modernised RTB is suspended until 2022, for some of their stock. For some tenants, the effect of converting their preserved RTB to a modernised RTB would therefore be almost the same as ending RTB altogether. Ending RTB altogether was considered to be fairer and more transparent, placing all tenants in the same position.

46. Modelling shows that, over a 10-year period, moving tenants from preserved to modernised RTB could keep around 6,000 homes for social rent that would otherwise be sold. By comparison, the option of ending RTB would keep up to 15,500 homes in the sector.

47. Large discounts under preserved RTB cause particular problems for landlords. While ending the large discounts would have offered significant benefits, it would still leave a very complex system making it difficult for tenants and landlords to operate. Retaining RTB also leaves landlords with increased financial risks as there would still be some uncertainty about whether some of their stock would be sold. Ending RTB offers clarity for everyone.
48. The Scottish Government also considered the option to make no further reforms based on the argument that RTB sales have been declining and may continue to do so. However, the rate of sales is affected by the wider economy and could increase if the wider economic situation changes. This option would continue to mean that social rented housing would be lost to the sector and would exacerbate the situation for those in housing need. While the situation for landlords would remain unchanged under this option, they would not gain any benefit. It would also do nothing to address the complexity of the current system.

Consultation

49. The Scottish Government consulted on its proposals from 7 June to 30 August 2012 - The Future of Right to Buy in Scotland - A Consultation. This invited written views on the proposals and, during the consultation period, officials also held meetings with key stakeholders (tenant groups, COSLA, the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations (SFHA) and Shelter) in order to hear at first hand their views on the RTB reforms. The views noted at the consultation events largely reflected the responses to the consultation.

50. The Scottish Government asked for views on two main options:

- Move all tenants with preserved right to buy onto modernised terms. This would end the discounts of up to 70% and give tenants a maximum discount of £15,000.
- End all right to buy entitlements in Scotland.

Views were also sought on what the notice period should be for any change.

51. There were 169 formal responses to the consultation. Most (87%) of those providing a view considered that there should be further restrictions to RTB legislation. The vast majority (83%) favoured ending right to buy altogether. This included 92% of registered social landlords, 81% of local authorities, 75% of tenant groups and 73% of individuals. Should RTB end, 73% of respondents who commented recommended a notice period of two years or less. Around three-quarters (76%) of those who expressed a view considered that over the longer term the financial effect of the proposed changes on social landlords would be either neutral or beneficial. An analysis report was published on 16 November 2012.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

Effects on equal opportunities

52. The most significant equal opportunities issue raised in relation to RTB was a concern that ending RTB would further limit home ownership opportunities for younger households. However there are low cost home ownership schemes available now that did not exist when RTB was introduced. Conversely, respondents recognised that restrictions should result in greater availability of housing for social rent which would benefit those in housing need.

---

10 Analysis of Responses to the Future of Right to Buy Consultation in Scotland, The Scottish Government, November 2012
Effects on human rights

53. The Scottish Government has considered the potential effect of ending RTB on human rights. This potentially raises issues under the European Convention on Human Rights. However, it believes that the benefits to the community in terms of retention of housing stock, the aim of meeting housing need and wider issues of social justice outweigh any loss of individual rights. In addition, tenants who have and can exercise the RTB are being given a fair and reasonable notice period of three years to decide whether or not to do so.

Effects on island communities

54. There would be no differential impact upon island communities. The RTB reforms would help to safeguard island communities’ social housing stock.

Effects on local government

55. Twenty-six local authorities provide social housing in their respective areas. The remaining six local authorities have transferred their housing stock to RSLs that were created to acquire and manage the stock. There will be two principal effects arising from ending RTB.

56. Firstly, local authorities would be better able to fulfil their strategic housing function as more social housing stock will be safeguarded from sale under RTB as a result of the reforms and would therefore be available to house those on social housing waiting lists.

57. Secondly, the RTB reforms would affect the financial position of the twenty-six local authorities with their own housing stock. In response to the consultation, social landlords stated that they should be able to adjust their business plans to accommodate any impact, and that no significant negative impact should arise from the proposed reforms.

58. They also noted that while there is likely to be a reduction in local authorities’ RTB receipts as a result of the RTB reforms, this would be offset by the benefit of continued rental income over the remaining lifetime of the stock not sold as a result of the reforms. The certainty of this continuing income in comparison to unpredictable income, dependent on demand for RTB sales should allow them to plan ahead more accurately.

Effects on sustainable development

59. The Scottish Government considers that ending RTB reforms will promote environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development, as described below.

Environmental effects

60. Ending RTB reforms is unlikely to have significant environmental effects because its primary impact will be upon housing tenure of existing or planned future social housing stock.

Social effects

61. The chief disadvantage of RTB in social terms has been to remove properties from the social rented sector and to reduce the number of homes available for social rent. As a result, prospective tenants, many of whom are homeless, must wait longer for properties to become available. Ending RTB should result in greater availability of social housing. Scottish Government modelling indicates that it would retain up to an additional 15,500 units over ten years in the social rented sector. The Scottish Government expects that tenants and prospective tenants would benefit from this in two main ways. Firstly, more households would benefit from the greater security of tenure and on average lower rents in the sector compared to private renting options. Secondly, prospective tenants would experience shorter waiting times for suitable properties to become available.

Economic effects

62. The Scottish Government believes the RTB reforms would promote greater long term financial sustainability within the social housing sector by increasing social landlords’ stable revenue income from rents. Around three-quarters of those who expressed a view in the consultation considered that over the longer term the financial effect of the proposed changes on social landlords would be either neutral or beneficial, and even the majority of those who did not think this stated that social landlords would be able to adjust their business plans to adapt to the change.

PART 2 – SOCIAL HOUSING

Policy objectives

63. Housing legislation tightly controls the management of social housing in Scotland. This includes housing allocations, tenancies and limited powers for landlords to tackle antisocial behaviour. The provisions in the Bill are intended to provide better outcomes for communities by:

- increasing the flexibility that landlords have when allocating houses,
- allowing landlords to make best use of social housing,
- giving landlords more tools to tackle antisocial behaviour,
- providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short Scottish secure tenancies (“short SSTs”), by strengthening their rights in a number of ways,
- clarifying existing legislation on how short SSTs operate.

Increasing local flexibility

64. Research by the Scottish Government indicated existing priority groups for allocating social housing were outdated and needed to be revised11. The provisions would do this by replacing specified groups with a broader definition of housing need. Under this new definition, social landlords would have to determine which groups they will prioritise. Landlords would also be able to take more factors into account when deciding on an applicant’s priority for housing such as the applicant’s conduct at their previous tenancy. These flexibilities would help landlords respond to the housing needs of people in their local areas and ensure that affordable rented housing goes to people who need it most.

65. If some groups are consistently overlooked by social landlords, Ministers would have a power under the Bill to require all landlords to include these groups in their allocation policies. It would be up to landlords to decide what priority they give to any groups specified in regulations.

Allowing landlords to make best use of available affordable rented housing

66. Discussions about the future of housing policy in Scotland identified some potential ways to make better use of social housing. The Bill includes provisions that would:

- allow social landlords to take into account any property owned by applicants, tenants or members of their household when determining priority for housing and the type of tenancy to be granted,
- address concerns that the law around succession, subletting, joint tenancy requests and assignation effectively allows tenants rather than landlords, to decide who gets their home. These are important rights in the Scottish secure tenancy (“SST”). But to make sure that people who need housing are given priority, the Scottish Government is introducing qualifying periods before tenants can exercise these rights and is strengthening the grounds for landlords to refuse an assignation of a tenancy,
- allow landlords to take action to recover possession of an adapted, or specially constructed property, when there is nobody with special needs currently occupying it, but someone with special needs now requires that property. In such circumstances, landlords would have to make other suitable accommodation available.

Tackling antisocial behaviour

67. The Scottish Government wants to do more to tackle the serious impact that antisocial behaviour has on individuals and communities. During its consultation on the draft Social Housing Charter, landlords and tenants raised concerns with the Scottish Government about the impact of antisocial behaviour. Provisions in the Bill would give landlords more tools to support their continuing efforts to reduce antisocial behaviour.

68. Landlords would be able to impose a requirement that a minimum period of time must elapse before an applicant with a history of antisocial behaviour becomes eligible for an offer of social housing. The Bill sets out the circumstances under which such a requirement could be imposed, including where the applicant or someone who lives with them has been antisocial in the past. This provision is intended to make antisocial tenants and applicants aware of the consequences of their behaviour. It is also intended to help protect communities by anticipating future antisocial behaviour problems and taking steps to prevent this prior to the start of a new tenancy. There would be an opportunity for further consideration of a maximum period preceding the application over which landlords would be able to consider an applicant’s housing history and further consideration of a maximum period that a tenant can be ineligible for the offer of housing, through secondary legislation.

69. Where antisocial behaviour does occur, social landlords would have the power to grant short SSTs. Provisions in the Bill would allow landlords to grant a short SST to a new applicant where there is a history of antisocial behaviour. In the case of an existing tenant with a history of antisocial behaviour, landlords would be able to convert their SST to a short SST. The aim of doing so would be to encourage the anti-social tenant or member of their household to change their behaviour. The tenancy can then be converted to a SST after 12 months if the anti-social behaviour stops. In cases where the behaviour of the tenant or member of the tenant’s household has not reached the standard required at the end of the 12-month period, the landlord can decide to extend the short SST for a further one-off period of six months.

70. Where tenants do not respond to the help and support they are given, they may face eviction. Provisions in the Bill are intended to make eviction simpler in cases where another court has already convicted the tenant or member of the tenant’s household of illegal activity that affects the community. The landlord seeking possession would only have to demonstrate to the court that the criteria for possession have been met, rather than prove that anti-social behaviour has occurred. This simpler eviction process could include, for example, convictions for the production or supply of drugs.

Providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short Scottish secure tenancies

71. Provisions in the Bill clarify the circumstances in which an applicant may be made ineligible for an offer of housing for a minimum period of time. These circumstances include situations where the applicant or member of the applicant’s household has a history of anti-social behaviour or outstanding rent arrears above a certain level. This will be balanced by a new right of appeal for applicants to challenge, in court, a landlord’s reasons for doing so.

72. The Scottish Government also wants to give tenants with short SSTs greater protection by:

- extending the minimum term of a short SST that is intended to convert to a SST from six months to 12 months. This will provide more time for the tenant or member of the tenant’s household to receive support and change their behaviour,
- making sure that short SST tenants are fully aware of why repossession is being sought, by requiring landlords to give reasons for seeking repossession in all Short SST cases,
- giving tenants with a short SST that is intended to convert to a SST a right to request a review of the landlord’s decision to seek repossession of the property. This will give them the opportunity to discuss the reasons why repossession is being sought with their landlord.

Clarifying existing legislation

73. A recent court judgement South Lanarkshire Council v McKenna\(^\text{12}\) identified a number of issues around how a short SST should operate. Provisions in the Bill are intended to clarify the meaning of Sections 34 and 35 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001.

74. The Bill also includes provisions to resolve an issue identified in the Scottish Government’s consultation, which may prevent a landlord from taking action to recover possession during the term of a short SST. By addressing this issue, landlords would be able to

http://www.scotcourts.gov.uk/opinions/SD1463_09.html seek repossession of the tenancy at any time during the short SST if the tenant breaches the tenancy agreement, for example, by acting antisocially. A court order would be required before a landlord can recover possession of a property.

Alternative approaches

Do nothing

75. The Scottish Government considered whether legislation needed to be changed in order to give landlords more flexibility to respond to the needs of their communities and make better use of affordable rented housing (including social rented and intermediate rented housing).

76. Continuing with the current rules would mean that the issues identified by landlords and tenants around housing allocation and housing management would remain. Landlords would also continue to have limited powers to tackle antisocial behaviour. Doing nothing would also prevent social landlords from making better use of their stock and from being more responsive to the needs of their communities. The ambiguities in existing legislation identified by the South Lanarkshire Council v McKenna court case would still be in place.

Other possible changes

77. The Scottish Government also considered other ways of making the best use of affordable rented housing. The reasons why these approaches were rejected are explained below:

Making best use of affordable rented housing

78. Revising existing list of priority groups: The Scottish Government considered simply revising the list of priority groups in legislation as an alternative way of making best use of affordable rented housing. This approach was rejected however, as it would not have given greater local flexibility in line with the Christie Commission recommendations on the need for more local accountability.

79. The creation of an initial or probationary tenancy: The Scottish Government consulted on the possibility of creating an initial or probationary tenancy to help promote positive behaviour by new tenants around the conditions of their tenancy. Conditions of a tenancy include things like paying rent, care of the property and the standard of behaviour expected. The responses to the Scottish Government’s consultation showed that opinion was divided around this proposal. Tenants were very supportive, but there was less support for such a move amongst landlords. Overall support was 62%. In view of the issues currently affecting social housing tenants, particularly the increased uncertainty that welfare reform is bringing to the sector, the Scottish Government rejected this approach.

Creating local flexibility

80. Allowing social landlords to grant short Scottish secure tenancies for persistent rent arrears: The Scottish Government considered giving landlords the flexibility to address persistent rent arrears by allowing a SST to be converted to a short SST. The Scottish Government has however recently introduced greater protection for social tenants facing rent arrears. As evidence shows that rent arrears are now more likely under recent welfare reforms such as the under-occupancy deduction, or “bedroom tax”, the Scottish Government rejected this approach.

81. Considering an applicant’s income when deciding their priority for housing: Another option the Scottish Government consulted on was giving landlords the flexibility to consider an applicant’s income when allocating a tenancy. As there was a low level of support for this proposal in the consultation (36%) this option was rejected.

82. Allowing social landlords to use short SSTs to let intermediate rented housing: The Scottish Government consulted on giving social landlords the flexibility to develop and manage intermediate rented housing themselves rather than through a subsidiary or partner organisation. As there was a low level of support for this proposal in its consultation (40%) the Scottish Government rejected this option. Social landlords will, however, still be able to work with private sector partners to develop intermediate rented housing as an alternative choice for those seeking housing.

Consultation

83. The provisions in the Bill reflect extensive consultation and discussion with stakeholders. Consultation began in 2010 and took place over a number of phases.

84. The consultation document, Housing: Fresh Thinking, New Ideas\(^\text{14}\) started a public discussion about the future of housing policy in Scotland. It asked how the interests of current and future tenants can be balanced by making better use of existing stock. The Scottish Government had informal discussions in August 2010 with several social landlords and representative bodies to discuss some early proposals coming forward from the housing discussion.

85. Homes Fit for the 21st Century\(^\text{15}\) followed in 2011 and set out a commitment to consult on specific proposals. The Scottish Government consulted in August 2011 with housing professionals in 13 housing associations, nine local authorities and five representative bodies.

86. After this consultation, the Scottish Government was able to refine its proposals further, and in 2012 it published the consultation paper, Affordable Rented Housing: Creating flexibility for landlords and better outcomes for communities\(^\text{16}\) which proposed a number of changes to legislation on social housing allocations, tenancies and housing management. The consultation ran from 6 February 2012 to 30 April 2012. To reach as many people and organisations with an interest as possible, the Scottish Government also:

- distributed posters and flyers advertising the consultation to social landlords and the Citizens Advice network,
- held seven consultation events across Scotland for tenants, applicants, social landlords and anyone with an interest,
- set up a Facebook page to reach a wider audience, particularly amongst groups who may not usually engage in a formal consultation,
- attended Tenants Regional Network meetings to discuss the proposals,
- commissioned Young Scot, the national youth information charity, to facilitate four participative workshops with young people to help reach seldom heard groups,
- commissioned Streetlinks, a youth outreach organisation active in a number of local authority areas in the west of Scotland to run participatory workshops,
- commissioned the production of a DVD highlighting issues behind six of the consultation proposals as a tool for reaching and engaging with target groups for its Facebook page and as part of its events,
- met with a number of equality organisations, including Age UK, Glasgow Centre for Inclusive Living, Housing Options Scotland, Inclusion Scotland, Positive Action in Housing and the Scottish Women’s Convention.

87. In total, 237 consultation responses were received.\(^17\) The Scottish Government commissioned independent analysis\(^18\) of the consultation responses, which showed that over 50% of respondents supported eight of the 10 proposals. To refine the proposals further, the Scottish Government set up the Affordable Rented Housing Advisory Group (ARHAG)\(^19\) inviting key stakeholders to help develop and consider the original proposals and additional suggestions made by those who responded to the consultation.

88. ARHAG met six times between July 2012 and June 2013 to consider all of the proposals, including those arising from responses to the consultation. Membership of the working group was:

- Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers (ALACHO),
- Antisocial Behaviour Officers Forum (ASBOF),
- Antisocial Behaviour Lawyers’ Forum (ASBLF),
- Chartered Institute of Housing (CIH),
- Glasgow & West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (GWSF),

- Scottish Court Service,

89. A broader range of stakeholders were involved in regular communication and consultation with group members by correspondence. These included CAB (Citizens Advice Bureau), COSLA (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities), Equality and Human Rights Commission, Scottish Housing Regulator and TC Young solicitors.

90. Feedback was positive for all of the proposals that the Scottish Government has included in the Bill. Overall, more than 50% of responses to the consultation supported the changes now being made. More than 85% of landlords’ responses and more than 73% of responses from tenants groups supported the changes (with the exception of the qualifying period for succession which was supported by 59% of tenants groups). The greatest support was for proposals to tackle antisocial behaviour.

91. The feedback from consultation respondents on what they saw as the benefits and problems with proposed changes was considered by ARHAG. The issues varied, but common themes were the need for clarity, difficulty investigating issues, such as previous antisocial behaviour and home ownership and the need to make sure that a consistent and fair approach is maintained despite granting greater flexibility for landlords. These issues will be addressed in guidance that will be issued by the Scottish Government. Social landlords would have to have regard to this guidance when setting their allocations policies.

92. Further suggestions for changes that would make better use of social housing were also considered by ARHAG. These discussions led to the development and inclusion of the proposals on assignation, subletting and joint tenancy requests; the use of short SSTs for some homeowners (for example where an owned property has been rented out and the lease will come to an end in six months or where time is needed to make adaptations to the property to make it safe for the homeowner); and the proposals to give greater protections for tenants as well as the proposals to clarify existing legislation.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

Equal opportunities

93. The impact of these provisions on equality groups will depend on whether, and how social landlords use the additional flexibilities. Safeguards are, however, in place. These require social landlords to take account of the impact and needs of equality groups in any change to their policies or procedures. These include requirements under the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001, the Equality Act 2010 and the Scottish Social Housing Charter. As the provisions in the Bill focus on enabling social landlords to better meet housing need, it is anticipated that these would be likely to impact positively upon some equality groups. For example, the broader definition of priority for housing may be of particular benefit to disabled or older people who are more likely to need to move because they are in unsuitable housing. The provisions also provide social landlords with additional tools to tackle antisocial behaviour which may positively impact on those who have been victims of hate crime, a particular issue for some equality groups. The Scottish Government does not consider that there would be a negative impact on any equality group.

Human rights

Increasing local flexibility and ensuring best use of affordable rented housing

94. The Scottish Government has considered the potential effect of these policies on human rights. It considers that there are no significant European Convention on Human Rights implications resulting from these provisions. If a person does not have a right to occupy a property, Article 1 of Protocol 1 will not be engaged. Article 8, the right to respect for private and family life, could be argued to be relevant, and public authorities (which for these purposes are likely to be taken to include registered social landlords (RSLs)) would have to develop local policies which respected any such right, and any related right under article 14 (the prohibition of discrimination in the enjoyment of ECHR rights). Giving social landlords increased flexibility is not in itself incompatible with the ECHR.

Tackling antisocial behaviour

95. It might be argued that to have a short SST extended for a period longer than originally envisaged, rather than to grant the more permanent tenancy of a SST, impacts on a person’s right under Article 8. However, the Scottish Government considers that the social justification for tackling antisocial behaviour would make any such interference proportionate.

Providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short Scottish secure tenancies

96. The decision of the Court of Session last year in a devolution reference (McKenna v South Lanarkshire Council) held that amendments to improve tenant protection enhance tenants’ ECHR rights. They would include provision for landlords to provide reasons why repossession is sought and an opportunity for review of such a decision.

Non-discrimination

97. Article 14 of the ECHR prohibits discrimination. It is not intended that any of the changes would discriminate against persons in the enjoyment of their Convention rights. The provisions would have to be operated by public authorities in a manner, which respected such rights.

Island communities

98. The provisions at this part of the Bill raise no issues for island communities.

Local government

99. All of the provisions in the Bill around social housing relate to social landlords (local authorities and RSLs). The provisions will be of direct relevance to local authorities in their role as landlords. The provisions will give all social landlords greater freedom around the allocation and management of their housing, and more tools to tackle the difficulties that communities are facing from antisocial behaviour. Local authorities and COSLA are very supportive of this greater local flexibility.

Effects on sustainable development

100. The effect of the provisions in Part 2 of the Bill on the environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development, are described below.

Environmental effects

101. The changes to how social housing is allocated and managed are unlikely to have significant environmental effects because its primary impact will be upon the best use of existing social housing stock.

Social effects

102. The ability of landlords to tackle antisocial behaviour by social housing applicants and tenants through a requirement for applications to have been place for a minimum period of time before an applicant with a history of antisocial behaviour is eligible for an offer of social housing; by the ability to grant, or convert existing SSTs to, a short SST; and the simplification of evictions for serious behaviour is expected to have beneficial social effects on communities. Reducing such antisocial behaviour not only brings benefits to individuals, landlords, the police and other agencies but also reduces the incidence of neighbour disputes and potential movement of social housing tenants.

Economic effects

103. The changes to how social housing is allocated and managed are unlikely to have significant environmental effects because its primary impact will be upon the best use of existing social housing stock.

PART 3 - PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION FROM THE SHERIFF COURT TO THE FIRST-TIER TRIBUNAL

Policy objectives

104. The Scottish Government’s policy objective for a private rented sector (“PRS”) tribunal is to provide more efficient, accessible and specialist access to justice for both landlords and tenants in that sector.

Background

Private rented sector tenancies

105. The number of households in the PRS has increased over recent years, partly as a result of the economic downturn. The sector now accounts for 11% of homes and is characterised by a large number of individual landlords, most of whom own one or two properties.
106. There are some basic rights which affect all PRS tenancies. In general, the rights and responsibilities of tenants and landlords depend on the type of tenancy and the terms of the individual tenancy agreement.

107. Most PRS tenancies are regulated under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 ("the 1988 Act"). This provides for assured and short assured tenancies although, in practice, most tenancies created are short assured tenancies. These are usually for an initial term of six months and can come to an end without a need for court action after that term has ended.

108. Assured tenancies confer greater security of tenure but they are rarely created deliberately. They can arise by accident if a landlord fails to serve the necessary notice on the tenant stating that the tenancy will be a short assured tenancy. There is a continuing debate about whether greater security of tenure is needed in the PRS and if so, how this can be delivered. The Scottish Government is reviewing the PRS tenancy regime.

109. Older private sector tenancies, known as "regulated tenancies" are regulated under the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 (the 1984 Act). Regulated tenancies provide security of tenure and control over rent levels and must be registered with Rent Service Scotland ("RSS"). There are about 6,000 of these in existence. No new regulated tenancies have been created since the assured tenancy provisions in the 1988 Act came into force in 1989 but RSS handles a few new registrations each year. These are registrations of existing tenancies - usually in the context of a dispute between the tenant and landlord.

110. As well as rights and duties between landlords and tenants, there is a range of criminal offences and civil remedies to prevent undesirable behaviour by landlords in the PRS. These can also give rise to civil disputes. For example, unlawful eviction is a criminal offence and tenants who are unlawfully evicted can be awarded damages by the civil courts.

Landlord/tenant disputes

111. Most people who live in the PRS will do so without being involved in disputes which require escalation to a court. But where problems arise between landlords and tenants these can be escalated for formal dispute resolution by a court or tribunal. The majority of PRS disputes between landlords and tenants are currently handled by the sheriff court. These cases fall into two categories: repossession cases where the landlord seeks to evict the tenant and non-eviction cases, many of which can be raised by tenants.

112. Repossession cases (also referred to as eviction cases) are raised as summary cause actions in the sheriff court. It is estimated that the sheriff courts currently handle an average of around 500 of these cases each year from the PRS.

113. Non-eviction cases include applications to sheriffs under a range of housing-specific provisions. These include, for example, applications to permit contracting out of the repairing standard and applications for sheriffs to write tenancy agreements where landlords fail to provide...

20 See section 32(1)(b) and (2) in the 1988 Act.

them. These cases tend to be raised as summary applications in the sheriff court. It is not clear exactly how many of these cases are raised each year but it is estimated, based on general court statistics regarding housing-related cases, that the numbers are low.

114. Non-eviction cases also include disputes which relate to compliance with the terms of individual tenancy agreements. These will be actions to enforce compliance with contractual obligations or to seek damages for breach of contract. Examples include:

- Actions by tenants to recover tenancy deposits, particularly those which have not been paid into tenancy deposit schemes.
- Actions by tenants to enforce obligations of landlords to provide services and insure buildings.
- Actions by landlords to recover costs (e.g. for cleaning the property or destroyed/damaged furniture) from tenants without seeking to evict them.

115. A further category of PRS cases is handled by the private rented housing panel (“PRHP”). The PRHP considers whether private rented houses comply with the repairing standard and also reviews decisions on rent levels (primarily in relation to regulated tenancies). It handles about 250 cases a year. As part of reforms being taken forward separately in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, the PRHP will become part of the First-tier Tribunal (“FTT”). Further information about tribunal reform is set out in paragraph 126 below.

116. Private landlords must be registered with local authorities under Part 8 of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (“the 2004 Act”). Registration is subject to the local authority being satisfied that the landlord (and the letting agent, if the landlord uses one) meets a “fit and proper person” test.

117. Local authority decisions to refuse initial registration applications or to remove landlords from the register can be challenged by summary application to the sheriff. Very few of these appeals have proceeded to court so far.

118. Local authorities can also serve notices to suspend the payment of rent to unregistered landlords, as an incentive to them to apply for registration. These notices can be revoked without court action but can also be challenged by application to the sheriff.

Licensing of houses in multiple occupation

119. Houses in multiple occupation (“HMOs”) must be licensed under Part 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 (“the 2006 Act”). Licences are granted by local authorities.

120. A local authority must refuse an application for a licence if the applicant or the applicant’s agent is not a “fit and proper person”. The criteria for that test are the same as for landlord registration.
Licences may be revoked by local authorities in certain circumstances, including breach of licence conditions. The local authority also has a range of other enforcement powers and may issue:

- an order for suspension of rent payments to the landlord, if an HMO is not licensed or if licence conditions are breached,
- a notice requiring rectification of any licence breaches, and
- an HMO amenity notice, requiring the owner to carry out work on the property to make it fit for occupation.

Decisions by local authorities to grant or refuse licences or to use the enforcement powers outlined above can be challenged by appealing to the sheriff court.

Problems with the current dispute resolution system

There is a widespread view that the current dispute resolution system is not working effectively for parties involved in housing disputes. Some of the main issues that have been raised are:

- Cases can take a long time to reach court and can then be subject to frequent delays.
- In the PRS, tenants move or are moved on before their case reaches court. Some private sector tenants may feel intimidated by court procedures, fearing reprisals from their landlord.
- Some stakeholders feel that, when housing cases get to court, they are accorded a low priority within the court system.
- Many people involved in housing disputes do not have legal representation in court. This can place them at a disadvantage in adversarial court proceedings.
- Some sheriffs have more experience of housing disputes than others and court decisions can be inconsistent and unpredictable.
- Where private landlords seek to evict tenants before the tenancy comes to a natural end they can find it difficult to do so, even if they have a strong case to justify eviction.
- A small number of landlords make life difficult for their tenants. Such landlords contribute to a range of problems, including provision of low quality housing and failure to repair defects or to respect the rights of vulnerable tenants.

The Scottish Government is aware of the difficulty PRS stakeholders have in accessing justice through the current court system. A recurrent theme in the 2012 Consultation on a Strategy for the Private Rented Sector was the need for better access to justice. Tenants rarely assert their statutory rights in court (although this may be partly due to the lack of security of tenure offered by the short assured tenancy). The Scottish Government is aware that some PRS tenants are reluctant to take action through the courts for fear of repercussions from their landlords. As the Chartered Institute of Housing Scotland (“CIH”) confirms:

“Landlords in the private sector, particularly those smaller portfolio or ‘accidental’ landlords, may be reluctant to take proper action when they have a dispute with their tenant, with the potential for harassment and illegal eviction by less scrupulous landlords.”

125. Finally, there are difficulties with enforcement of existing legal requirements. There is a range of criminal offences in relation to the PRS (including illegal eviction, charging premiums and acting as an unregistered landlord) but prosecutions are rare.

Recent debate

126. The debate about the potential for a specialised housing court or tribunal has continued for many years. A report by the CIH in 2004 argued for the transfer of housing cases from the courts to a tribunal.

127. The Scottish Civil Court Review, chaired by Lord Gill and published in 2009, made numerous recommendations for court reform and also referred specifically to housing cases. It concluded that housing cases are of such a serious nature that they should remain within the jurisdiction of the courts. Proposals for court reform include some objectives similar to that of a tribunal such as increasing specialism and introducing less formal procedures.

128. The Civil Justice Advisory Group, chaired by Lord Coulsfield, directly disagreed with the Civil Court Review in its 2011 report restating the case for a specialist housing tribunal and citing examples of existing tribunals which already handle serious issues outwith the courts. The Scottish Committee of the Administrative Justice and Tribunals Council also recommended consideration of the transfer of housing cases to a tribunal in reports in 2011 and 2012.

Scottish tribunals reform

129. The Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, introduced to the Scottish Parliament on 8 May 2013, will create a coherent structure of tribunals under the leadership of the Lord President with the FTT for hearing cases and a general route of appeal to the Upper Tribunal (“UT”). Initially, the structure will transfer the functions of existing devolved tribunals and, as part of this transfer, the PRHP and homeowner housing panel (“HOHP”) will become part of the FTT. The FTT will also be flexible enough to accommodate new jurisdictions and this provides an opportunity to utilise existing expertise and experience as a foundation on which to construct a PRS tribunal jurisdiction.

26 Civil Justice Advisory Group Report Ensuring Effective Access to Appropriate and Affordable Dispute Resolution (2011)
The case for a private rented sector tribunal

130. The Scottish Government believes that a PRS tribunal would provide more efficient, accessible and specialist access to justice for both landlords and tenants. The PRHP has already shown that effective specialist decision making even across its relatively narrow jurisdiction can act as a deterrent to bad practice.

Potential for future development

131. The Scottish Government is mindful of the serious nature of the cases which are currently brought to court, including matters for eviction, across both the private and social rented sectors. These can involve some of the most vulnerable members of society. A PRS tribunal would tackle the well-documented difficulty for parties in the sector accessing justice but could also serve as an example for any future consideration of the status of social sector cases. Proposals for court reform (which are also due to be taken forward in separate legislation) and increased use of mediation will provide the opportunity to improve outcomes for social sector cases while they remain with the courts. A specialist PRS tribunal which can competently handle eviction cases and efficiently manage other cases could provide important data, and perhaps a platform, for other types of cases to be transferred to a tribunal should it be required.

Overview of the Bill

132. Provisions in the Bill would transfer jurisdiction for civil PRS cases from the Scottish courts to the FTT. This would take advantage of the broader functions and powers of the FTT such as provisions for the appointment of members and rule-making powers for specific practice and procedures.

133. The grounds which allow someone to raise an action and the issues to be taken into account in deciding a case would remain the same but the decision-maker would change from a sheriff to a tribunal committee. The procedural rules would also change so that cases are handled in a less formal setting.

Which private rented sector cases will the First-tier Tribunal handle?

134. Part 3 of the Bill would transfer jurisdiction for PRS disputes between landlords and tenants which are currently handled by the sheriff court to the FTT. These include private sector repossession cases where the landlord seeks to evict the tenant as well as the non-eviction cases. This part of the Bill would also transfer civil cases in relation to regulation of private landlords. These are generally appeals by landlords against registration decisions by local authorities. The case types to be transferred are set out in more detail below.

135. The Bill will transfer repossession cases including:

- Actions to evict tenants who have regulated tenancies covered by the 1984 Act. The grounds for eviction for such tenancies are set out in section 11 of and schedule 2 to the 1984 Act and cover matters such as non-payment of rent.
- Actions to evict tenants who have assured tenancies (including short assured tenancies) under the 1988 Act. The grounds for eviction for such tenancies are set out in section 18 of and schedule 5 to the 1988 Act and, again, include non-payment of rent and antisocial behaviour.

136. In all cases, the grounds for eviction would remain the same when cases are transferred to the FTT but in future, decisions will be made by the tribunal rather than a sheriff.

137. The Bill also includes provision to transfer non-repossession cases under the 1984 and 1988 Acts. These include:
   - certain cases about rent under the 1984 Act,
   - applications for compensation where landlords seek repossession on false pretences,
   - applications for a sheriff to draw up a tenancy agreement if the landlord fails to provide one,
   - applications for damages for unlawful eviction,
   - applications to contract out of the repairing standard, and
   - challenges to refusals by landlords to allow adaptation for disabled tenants or for the purposes of energy efficiency.

138. Cases relating to other landlord/tenant disputes about compliance with individual tenancy agreements, rather than under provisions of the 1984 or 1988 Acts, would also be transferred by the Bill. These cases would be actions for breach of contract and could include actions by tenants to recover tenancy deposits, to enforce obligations of landlords to provide services, carry out repairs or insure buildings. They could also include actions by landlords to recover cleaning costs or the costs of destroyed or damaged furniture or contents.

139. As with the repossession cases, the basis for raising an action and the matters to be taken into account in reaching a decision will remain the same, but in future decisions would be made by the specialist members of a tribunal rather than a sheriff.

140. The Bill contains provisions to transfer civil cases in relation to landlord registration under the 2004 Act. These include:
   - challenges to refusals and revocations of registration, and
   - challenges to notices suspending payment of rent.

141. The Bill also contains a power which would allow Scottish Ministers to transfer civil cases in relation to the licensing of HMOs from the sheriff courts to the FTT. These cases include:
   - Appeals against decisions by local authorities to grant or refuse licences, and
   - Appeals against orders issued by local authorities to suspend payment of rent or require landlords to carry out works on HMO properties.
How were these cases selected for transfer?

142. The Scottish Government has identified these case types for transfer to ensure that the majority of civil cases which can currently be raised in the sheriff court in relation to the PRS are transferred to the FTT. In future, the jurisdiction for handling PRS cases would rest with the FTT, rather than being split between the PRHP and the sheriff courts as at present.

143. The Bill provides an enabling power to transfer HMO cases at a later date (rather than transferring them in the Bill) because further consultation is considered desirable before deciding whether to transfer these cases. The Scottish Government consulted on general proposals for improving dispute resolution in housing but did not specifically mention HMO licensing cases in that consultation. The procedure for granting an HMO licence is slightly more complex than an individual landlord registration application. In addition, the HMO licensing regime applies to a wider range of properties than just those in the private rented sector. These factors will be relevant in considering whether it is appropriate to transfer jurisdiction for some or all HMO licensing cases to the FTT.

Operating principles

Internal organisation

144. Within the FTT, jurisdictions will be organised into chambers of relevant subject matter. It may be desirable for the PRS tribunal to be organised into a chamber alongside existing housing related jurisdictions for the PRHP and HOHP. However, this would be decided by affirmative order of the Scottish Parliament after consultation with the Lord President under powers in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill. Whatever the case, the jurisdiction would have enough flexibility to allow for its own distinct identity and practices while taking advantage of existing infrastructure where that is appropriate. The Bill does not include specific provision for this but would take advantage of the broader powers included in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill. This allows the flexibility for the PRS jurisdiction to be organised appropriately within the structure of the Scottish Tribunals.

Tribunal members

145. The PRS tribunal would be able to utilise legal members and ordinary members when hearing cases. Legal members would be legally qualified and would have experience of relevant areas of housing law. Ordinary members would complement this with an appropriate qualification or experience in a relevant area. The intention is for the tribunal to have ordinary members with a range of relevant experience at its disposal. The Scottish Government considers that the addition of a housing specialist in the decision-making process is important in improving both the consistency and effectiveness of decisions and the judicial leadership would be able to deploy members with the most appropriate skills and experience to hear the most appropriate cases. The independence of tribunal members is guaranteed in statute. The Tribunals (Scotland) Bill also provides that all tribunal members when sitting in tribunals will have the same status and capacity as the judiciary. Tribunal members will be appointed by Scottish Ministers after recommendation by the Judicial Appointments Board for Scotland following its independent appointment processes. This Bill does not contain any specific provision for the appointment of tribunal members as the PRS tribunal would take advantage of general provisions in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill.
Specialist practice and procedure

146. The PRS tribunal would enable proactive handling of cases by both the administrative staff and tribunal members which would improve the efficiency of case management. Tribunal practices and procedures will be set by secondary legislation under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill and will be specifically tailored to suit the new jurisdiction. In the first instance these will be made by Scottish Ministers by order, subject to negative procedure, but the longer term responsibility for procedural rules would pass to the Scottish Civil Justice Council and the Court of Session along with arrangements for rule-making for the rest of the Scottish Tribunals.

147. Tribunal procedures are designed to be accessible and understandable and do not generally require legal representation. This will also be the case in the PRS tribunal. Parties would be able to be represented if they wish but it is anticipated that this would not be the norm and the tribunal members would have the ability and expertise to ask questions and seek further information in particular cases to help parties make the best of their case. Procedures would be less formal than is currently the case in the courts. The Tribunals (Scotland) Bill contains provisions to enable procedural rules to be set by secondary legislation and these would be utilised for the PRS tribunal.

Powers

148. The PRS tribunal would be able to make the same orders with regard to individual cases as the sheriff courts. For example, sheriffs can currently make orders to evict tenants under the 1984 Act and the 1988 Act. The FTT would be able to do the same, once jurisdiction for those case types is transferred to it under the Bill. Provision in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill ensures that these orders would have the same authority as orders made by the court. For example, in certain instances non-compliance with a tribunal order would be a criminal offence in the same way that non-compliance with an order made by the courts may be a criminal offence.

Appeals

149. As part of the FTT, the PRS tribunal would have the ability to review its own decisions either on its own initiative or on application by one of the parties. This would be for matters such as administrative or procedural errors.

150. There would also be a route of appeal to the UT in cases where an appeal is currently available from decisions of the sheriff court. Potentially the onward route of appeal would also be from the UT to the Court of Session, where an onward route of appeal is currently available, and on to the Supreme Court on a point of law. The Tribunals (Scotland) Bill allows for courts judiciary to be deployed in the UT, including sheriffs, sheriffs principal and judges of the Court of Session. It would be for the judicial leadership of the Scottish Tribunals to deploy the most appropriate judiciary for appeals cases. The Bill does not include specific provision for this but would take advantage of the broader powers included in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill.

Fees

151. There would be scope to charge a fee for parties to bring a case before the FTT, in the same way that parties bringing a case to the courts have to pay a fee to cover some of the costs of the service. The decision whether to charge fees would involve balancing the requirement to recover a percentage of operating costs against the need to ensure access to justice and avoid deterring parties from raising actions. If fees are to be charged, the tribunal would require an exemptions policy for those who could not afford to pay. There is no provision in this Bill as the Scottish Tribunals will have a broader power to set fees by order, subject to negative procedure, under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill.

152. The Scottish Government considered a number of options to improve housing dispute resolution. These options included:

- further legislation to promote early dispute resolution (for example by requiring parties to make attempts to resolve disputes before raising court or tribunal actions),
- a pre-court panel which took a problem-solving approach and could make binding interim orders (e.g. for repayment of rent arrears) before a case reached court,
- measures to increase the use of mediation in rented housing disputes,
- a tribunal which replaces the courts as decision-maker in rented housing disputes.

153. These options were not intended to be mutually exclusive and were the subject of public consultation, Better Dispute Resolution in Housing: Consultation on Introduction of a New Housing Panel for Scotland. Alongside work to set up a PRS tribunal, the Scottish Government is also taking forward work to increase the use of mediation for rented housing disputes across all tenures. Legislation is not needed to take this work forward.

154. Although the Scottish Government consulted on dispute resolution for all rented housing disputes, the key factors in selecting PRS cases for transfer to a tribunal were:

- The mixed response regarding a tribunal in the Better Dispute Resolution in Housing consultation (detailed at paragraph 153).
- In the PRS, tenants can be reluctant to bring a case to court, fearing reprisals from landlords and, where private landlords seek to evict tenants before the tenancy comes to a natural end, tenants can find it difficult to do so, even if they have a strong case to justify eviction. This can lead to unscrupulous practice and is slightly different to the social sector which is already strongly regulated. A PRS tribunal would provide a more accessible decision-maker for these cases.
- The significant case numbers and resource implications of transferring all rented housing cases from the courts.
- A PRS tribunal would allow an opportunity to measure the impact of recent reforms for social sector cases in the courts, such as pre-action requirements.
- A PRS tribunal would also allow an opportunity to measure the impact of upcoming court reform for social rented sector cases.
- One of the benefits of this approach is that a PRS tribunal would also establish a clear model for a broader housing tribunal. It would give the Scottish Government a better understanding of handling issues (including eviction cases), caseload trends and costings data.

155. These proposals would help to deal with the issues specific to the PRS and are intended to enable stakeholders who may perhaps be reluctant to use the courts system to access justice. It also means that PRS cases would all be handled by the FTT and no longer split between the sheriff court and PRHP.

Consultation

156. The Better Dispute Resolution in Housing consultation ran from 16 January to 9 April 2013. Of the 116 responses, 101 were submitted by groups or organisations and 15 by individual members of public. Broadly, the majority of responses did not want further legislation to promote early dispute resolution or a pre-court panel. The majority of responses supported more use of mediation in housing disputes. The balance of responses with regards to a tribunal were less clear, 58 responses (half of all the respondents) were supportive of a tribunal, 35 were not, 12 did not know or were mixed and 11 did not answer the specific question. The main issues cited by those who did not support a tribunal were; cost implications of setting up a new jurisdiction; the view that matters involving eviction should remain within the jurisdiction of the courts; and the view that proposals for court reform should be allowed to be completed before cases are transferred to tribunal.

157. The Scottish Government Consultation on a private rented sector strategy for Scotland took place between 17 April and 10 July 2012 and received 82 responses. This consultation asked a number of questions relating to the private rented sector, including what could be done to improve access to justice for tenants, landlords and local authorities pursuing housing related cases. A clear theme across a majority of responses was the desire to establish some form of specialised housing court or tribunal. A key benefit of this approach was cited as quicker, simplified access to justice. The Scottish Government’s Private Rented Sector Strategy, A Place to Stay, A Place to call Home published in May 2013, included a key action to consider improving redress mechanisms for consumers.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

Equal opportunities

158. The Bill’s provisions do not discriminate on the basis of age, gender, race, disability, marital status, religion or sexual orientation.

159. The Scottish Government’s aim is that a PRS tribunal would deliver greater access to justice for all parties across the sector by offering a more accessible forum for dispute resolution, in which specialist decision-makers would take an inquisitorial approach and decide cases in a less formal environment than the current civil courts. This is likely to be particularly positive for those with protected characteristics, especially for those with disabilities or for whom English is not their first language as they may have difficulty participating effectively in traditional, adversarial, court proceedings.

160. The intention is that legal representation will not become the norm in proceedings before the Tribunal. However, it is recognised that some parties with protected characteristics may need support to participate effectively in proceedings. The Scottish Government is working with the Scottish Legal Aid Board to assess how best to provide this support. It may be delivered in the form of assistance by way of representation similar to some other tribunals.

161. An Equality Impact Assessment has been published for the Bill.\textsuperscript{32}

162. A PRS tribunal would have human rights implications as it would make decisions which determine the civil rights and obligations of tenants and landlords, in the same way as decisions by sheriffs under the current law. It is, therefore, necessary to ensure that the tribunal operates in compliance with Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), which covers the right to have rights and obligations determined by an independent and impartial body.

163. The Scottish Government’s view is that individuals’ Article 6 rights will be protected by the creation of a tribunal for PRS cases, particularly as it takes advantage of features of the reformed Scottish Tribunals system under the independent leadership of the Lord President of the Court of Session. The Tribunals (Scotland) Bill includes provisions designed to protect the independence of tribunal members.

164. The procedures specific to the practices of the PRS tribunal will be set by subordinate legislation and these will also be compatible with Article 6.

165. The decisions of a PRS tribunal also has implications on Article 1, Protocol 1, which protects the right to peaceful enjoyment of property and Article 8, which protects the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence. These are particularly relevant to cases which could lead to eviction. The Scottish Government is confident that a PRS tribunal can comply with the ECHR when handling such cases.

\textit{Island communities}

166. A PRS tribunal would be the forum for relevant disputes for island communities as for the rest of Scotland but would not have a detrimental effect. Hearings would take place across Scotland and the intention is that the PRS tribunal would use local venues when hearing cases.

\textit{Local government}

167. A PRS tribunal would have no detrimental impact for local authorities. 23 of the 32 Scottish local authorities responded to the consultation regarding housing dispute resolution. 14 were in favour of a tribunal, five were not in favour, three did not know or had mixed views and one did not answer the specific question.

\textsuperscript{32} The Scottish Government, \textit{Equality Impact Assessment Record – PRS and Housing Tribunal}
Sustainable development

168. The Scottish Government considers that a PRS tribunal would have implications for environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development, as described below.

169. It is considered that the Bill would be likely to have no effect in relation to the environment and, as such, is exempt for the purposes of section 7 of the Environmental Assessment (Scotland) Act 2005. A pre-screening report has been completed. This confirmed that the Bill would have no impact on the environment and consequently that a full Strategic Environmental Assessment did not need to be undertaken. The pre-screening report is published on the Scottish Government website under case number PRE\00518.33

Social effects

170. The main social impact from proposals for a PRS tribunal would be improved access to justice for both tenants and landlords in the sector. One of the key benefits would be effective and efficient access to routes of legal redress for tribunal users.

Economic effects

171. Proposals for a PRS tribunal are also likely to contribute to a well-functioning private rented sector in Scotland. Effective enforcement of legal rights by a private rented sector housing tribunal could deliver benefits across the wider sector to both tenants and landlords although it is not possible to quantify potential savings at this time.

Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment

172. A Business and Regulatory Impact Assessment (BRIA) has been prepared for provisions relating to a PRS tribunal.34

LANDLORD REGISTRATION

Policy objectives

173. The Bill contains a provision to bring applications for landlord registration into line with other authorisation schemes, such as the scheme for HMO licensing, which have a specified time period in which a local authority must decide an application.

174. The system of landlord registration was established by Part 8 of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004. Registration is designed to protect tenants by ensuring that only people who are fit and proper to let out residential property can operate legally as private landlords. Unless exempt, owners of privately rented property are required to register with the local authority in the area where property is let.

175. Local authorities are responsible for the operation of landlord registration. In order to be registered, a landlord must submit an application to the relevant local authority. The application must include specified information and be accompanied by the appropriate fee in order for it to be a valid application.

176. Once a valid application is received, the local authority must scrutinise it to assess whether the person is fit and proper to carry out residential letting. This may include a check of any information within an authority on cases of antisocial behaviour, breaches of landlord-tenant law and complaints from tenants or neighbours. Any discrepancy between information on the application and information held by an authority may result in an authority seeking a basic disclosure from Disclosure Scotland. This enables the authority to check the applicant’s declaration about convictions, if there is reason to doubt its accuracy.

177. There is currently no statutory timescale within which local authorities must make a determination on a valid application to be registered. This is not in line with other authorisation schemes, such as HMO licensing, which has a specified time period in which local authorities must decide an application. Whilst there is a presumption that applications will be dealt with in a timely manner, landlords could be subject to undue delay in some cases.

178. This provision in the Bill would insert a minor technical amendment to the landlord registration system for the tacit approval of valid landlord registration applications after a period of 12 months from the date of receipt. The provision would only apply to any new applications received after it comes into force. This means that in the event of failure to process the application within the period set, authorisation would be deemed to have been granted automatically by the relevant authority.

179. Some cases are more complex and require detailed investigation. Local authorities would have the power to apply to a sheriff for an extension to the 12-month period, where the circumstances of the request could be justified.

180. This provision would ensure that applications are not subject to unnecessary delay and would provide consistency with licensing regimes such as HMO licensing. The introduction of a specified period for approval of applications is also consistent with the principles contained in the EU Services Directive, as implemented in the UK by the Provision of Services Regulations 2009. The provision will not affect local authorities’ powers to review or revoke registration at any time after registration is granted.

Alternative approaches

181. No effective alternative methods of dealing with this issue have been identified. The Scottish Government rejected the option of doing nothing because that could leave landlords subject to undue delay in local authorities reaching a decision about their applications with no way of addressing this issue.

Consultation

182. The Scottish Government invited all 32 local authorities to give their views on the tacit approval of landlord registration applications. Of the eight licensing authorities that responded, six requested that the landlord registration scheme and HMO licensing regimes be aligned so that both have a 12-month time limit for determining applications. One authority said that it would still aim to work to a six-month timeline as a matter of good practice. Two local authorities favoured a shorter time limit, given that no property inspections, alterations or licence conditions apply to landlord registration.

183. The Scottish Government met with COSLA to discuss private rented sector provisions for the Bill. A key concern was that the provisions should not lead to additional duties for local authorities. The Scottish Government also consulted with members of the Private Rented Sector Strategy Group on the proposed items for inclusion in the Bill. This group included landlord representative bodies. There was no concern raised by the group regarding this item.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

184. The Scottish Government considers that the provisions relating to the landlord registration system are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion. The provisions promote equality by ensuring that all applications are subject to the same process for determination. The Scottish Government has considered the impact of these amendments on human rights and has concluded that they would encourage a consistent approach to the determination of all applications by local authorities. They have no specific implications for island communities. Feedback received from local authorities is that these provisions would not have a significant impact on them, with only a very small number of applications potentially requiring an extension to the 12-month period.

Sustainable development

185. The Scottish Government considers that the tacit approval of landlord registration applications would have implications for environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development, as described below.

Environmental effects

186. The provisions are unlikely to have significant environmental effects. The primary impact would be on standards of service delivery by local authorities in determining landlord registration applications.

Social effects

187. The main social impact from provisions for tacit approval of landlords’ registration applications would be to ensure that landlords can expect to have their applications determined within a specified period, and without undue delay.

Economic effects

188. The main economic effects of tacit approval of landlord registration applications would be encouraging local authorities to determine applications in a consistent and efficient manner. Unless other arrangements have been made, no applications would be take longer than 12 months to determine.
ENFORCEMENT OF REPAIRING STANDARD

Policy objectives

189. The provisions to allow third party reporting to the private rented housing panel (the PRHP) will enable local authorities to make a direct application to the PRHP where there is evidence that a landlord is not meeting the repairing standard, the property condition standard for private rented housing.

190. The PRHP helps tenants and landlords to resolve disputes relating to the repairing standard contained in Part 1, Chapter 4 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006. This covers the legal and contractual obligations of private landlords to ensure that a property meets a minimum physical standard. It also applies to some tenancies of social landlords, for example, tied houses (housing provided by an employer).

191. Currently tenants are responsible for making an application to the PRHP for a determination on the repairing standard. However, there is anecdotal evidence that some tenants are unwilling to take action to enforce the repairing standard, due to concerns that this may have a negative impact on the tenant/landlord relationship and could put the tenancy at risk.

192. The provisions in the Bill would not affect the PRHP’s role in considering appeals against rent determinations. Local authorities would be able to make a direct application to the PRHP, at their discretion. They would also be able to make an application based on evidence from others with an interest in ensuring that minimum standards of property condition are maintained (for example neighbours, owners of property in communal buildings, or fire and rescue services).

193. A third party application may be made to the PRHP without the need for the tenant to be involved, unless the tenant chooses to participate in the process. By enabling enforcement action to be taken independently of the tenant, the Scottish Government aims to minimise the risk of the landlord taking action to remove the tenant by giving notice to quit or threatening eviction.

194. The Scottish Government envisages that the process for local authorities would be similar to the process currently followed by tenants. Local authorities would notify landlords about the work needed to be done to meet the repairing standard before they make an application to the PRHP. Where a landlord appeals against a decision of the PRHP by summary application to a sheriff, and the application has been made by a local authority, it is envisaged that the local authority would be required to defend the case in court.

195. This provision does not place any new mandatory duties on local authorities. The discretionary power means that decisions on whether to make an application, or defend any subsequent appeal against a decision of a private rented housing committee, can take into account existing budgets and local priorities.

196. As part of reforms being taken forward separately in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, the PRHP will become part of the First-tier Tribunal (FTT).
Alternative approaches

197. Consideration was given to allow other relevant parties to make an application to the PRHP. This option was rejected due to concerns this could leave landlords vulnerable to frivolous or vexatious applications from some parties. The provision does allow for other third parties to raise valid concerns via the appropriate local authority. The option of doing nothing was rejected on the basis that it would not drive forward greater compliance with the repairing standard.

Consultation

198. The 2012 consultation on the development of a strategy for the private rented sector asked whether better regulation of the sector was required to improve standards of management and access to redress for consumers. Support for third party reporting to the PRHP comes mainly from Glasgow City Council. It sees this as a means of ensuring compliance with the repairing standard. Other local authorities also support the principle.

199. Scottish Government officials have had discussions with key stakeholders on these proposals. These include members of the Private Rented Sector Strategy Group, local authorities, the president of the PRHP, the Scottish Tribunals Service and COSLA. There is broad support in principle for third party reporting to the PRHP which is recognised as an effective way of addressing poor property condition for vulnerable tenants. COSLA was generally supportive of discretionary powers that did not impose any additional mandatory duties on local authorities.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

200. The Scottish Government considers that the provisions in the Bill relating to third party reporting to the PRHP would not have any specific implications for equal opportunities, human rights, or island communities. The provisions will give local government discretionary powers which will supplement existing powers. This wider range of powers aims to further enable local authorities to tackle poor quality in the private rented sector. These additional powers, because they are discretionary, should not increase pressures on local authority resources.

Sustainable development

201. The Scottish Government considers that the tacit approval of landlord registration applications would have implications for environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development, as described below.

Environmental effects

202. The provisions for third party reporting rights to the PRHP are unlikely to have significant environmental effects. The primary impact would be to enable local authorities to take action to improve local property condition through enforcement of the repairing standard.
Social effects

203. The main social impact from provisions for third party reporting rights to the PRHP would be the expansion of access to the PRHP. Local authorities would have the power to take action to enforce the minimum standards of property required by the repairing standard, thereby improving the quality of accommodation for tenants.

Economic effects

204. Proposals for third party reporting rights to the PRHP are likely to contribute to a well-functioning wider private rented sector in Scotland. Effective enforcement of minimum property standards could deliver benefits to both tenants and landlords by promoting a professional private rented sector as an attractive housing option. The proposals to give discretionary powers to local authorities would ensure that they can consider applying to the PRHP to enforce the repairing standard, in the light of local priorities and available resources.

ENHANCED ENFORCEMENT AREAS

Policy objectives

205. The Scottish Government intends to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to further enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor standards in the private rented sector. This is to allow time for further consultation with stakeholders on the detail of this policy proposal. These provisions would enable local authorities to apply to Scottish Ministers for enhanced enforcement powers by seeking approval for a geographic area to be designated as an enhanced enforcement area (EEA). This would allow local authorities to target enforcement action where poor standards of housing and landlord practice are concentrated.

206. A local authority would be required to provide evidence to support the need for enhanced enforcement area status in its application, setting out why the additional enhanced enforcement powers are needed. The Scottish Government envisages that an enhanced enforcement area would be set for a specified time, for example, for a period not exceeding five years.

207. The proposed enhanced powers for local authorities would include mandatory criminal record disclosure checks for private landlords at registration, and powers of entry to, and inspection of, private rented properties for the purposes of checking that statutory housing standards are being met. The Scottish Government envisages that these enhanced powers would be used by local authorities as part of their strategic approach to targeting enforcement action on areas that are shown to have poor standards of housing and landlord practice.

PART 4 – LETTING AGENTS

Policy objectives

208. Part 4 of the Bill provides for a new registration system for letting agents in Scotland. The policy objectives are to promote industry-expected and consistent standards of service and levels of professionalism among all letting agents across the country, whilst providing landlords and tenants with easy access to a redress mechanism that will help to resolve disputes with letting agents, where these arise.

209. The scale of the letting agents industry in Scotland has grown in recent years, with an estimated 750 providers offering a range of property management services to landlords. They manage around 150,000 lettings a year, which equates to 50% of all annual lettings in the private rented sector. The sector is a varied one, with letting agency services provided by solicitors, estate agents or accommodation agencies.

210. The private rented sector is characterised by a large number of small-scale landlords, many of whom prefer not to be involved in the day-to-day management of the tenancy process. The letting agent industry, therefore, plays an important role in providing a wide range of services, helping to deliver high quality services to landlords, tenants and prospective tenants. These services help to ensure that landlords meet their regulatory responsibilities, as well as enabling effective management and maintenance of privately-rented properties.

211. Many letting agents in Scotland operate in a professional manner, complying with voluntary codes of practice and ensuring high quality levels of service for the landlords and tenants they assist. Professional organisations such as the Association of Residential Letting Agents (ARLA) and the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors (RICS), provide members with a code of practice and rules of conduct to adhere to, encourage responsible business practice and offer a route of redress for landlords and tenants, should any dispute arise. Such good practice is not shared by all however, and evidence gathered from stakeholders, as well as correspondence with the Scottish Government, suggests that some landlords and tenants receive poor services and, in some cases, are subject to illegal practices by letting agents. Among the main risks arising from bad letting agent practice are: agents going out of business and losing all monies held on behalf of landlords and tenants; the use of poorly drafted and legally inaccurate tenancy agreements; and tenants being charged illegal premiums for accessing privately rented accommodation.

212. Recent action taken by the Scottish Government to clarify the law on the charging of illegal premiums and the introduction of tenancy deposit schemes has gone some way to addressing such poor practice. However, stakeholders continued to raise concerns about lack of regulation within the letting agent sector and calls were made for the Scottish Government to examine potential legislative solutions to address such concerns.

213. The provisions in the Bill would establish a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, with those applying to be on the register required to meet a “fit and proper person test”. The Bill also creates a statutory code of practice, which would be developed in partnership with key industry stakeholders and provides a mechanism for resolving disputes for customers of letting agents.

214. Together, these provisions would help to ensure high standards of service and levels of professionalism that are consistent across the country, whilst also providing an easily-accessible mechanism for landlords and tenants to resolve disputes where these arise.
215. The Scottish Government would administer and manage the letting agent registration system, following an approach that is similar to the one used in managing the property factors registration system.

Alternative approaches

216. Two alternative approaches to the regulation of letting agents were explored during the 2012 consultation on the development of a strategy for the private rented sector and in follow up discussions with stakeholders. These were to:

- expand the existing landlord registration system to include all letting agents, and
- introduce a legal obligation that all agents must be a member of a recognised professional or trade body.

Expansion of landlord registration

217. The proposal to expand the landlord registration system was rejected on the basis that it would result in significant additional financial and resource constraints being placed on local authorities at a time when they are being asked by a range of stakeholders to take tougher, more targeted enforcement action on the worst landlords within the sector by using local evidence and knowledge to focus resources on tackling such poor practice.

218. Furthermore, analysis of responses to the Scottish Government’s consultation on the development of a strategy for the PRS identified concerns that expanding landlord registration to include mandatory regulation of letting agents could place additional administrative burdens on local authorities.

Legal obligation to join a professional or trade body

219. Introducing a legal obligation that all agents must be a member of a recognised professional or trade body was rejected because it would amount to self-regulation by the industry, with approved trade bodies controlling letting agents’ entry to and exit from the market. This could potentially lead to smaller letting agencies being forced out of the market, as they may struggle to resource the new demands being placed upon them resulting from trade body membership requirements.

220. This approach would also be likely to place the most significant financial burden on the industry. All letting agent businesses would be required to undertake mandatory accreditation and training, before being considered for membership of a professional or trade body.

Consultation

221. The Scottish Government carried out a full public consultation on the development of a strategy for the private rented sector during 2012 (the PRS Strategy). As part of this consultation, stakeholders were asked to respond to the following key questions:

In addition to action on tenancy deposits and illegal premiums – what more can be done to address the problems identified from poor letting agent practice?

Is further regulation of letting agents in Scotland required? If you think it is, please provide reasons for your answer, explaining what the best format might be for regulation. For example:

- expansion of landlord registration to include all agents,
- a separate system for agents similar to that proposed for property factors, and/or
- a legal obligation that all agents must be a member of a recognised professional body.

222. A total of 82 responses were received, 66 from organisations and 16 from individuals. A range of stakeholders responded. They included local authorities, registered social landlords (housing associations), voluntary and third sector organisations, consumer representative and advocacy bodies and professional and trade body organisations. The majority of respondents answered the questions on further regulation of the letting agent industry.

223. In addition to the responses received during the PRS Strategy consultation, the Scottish Government undertook a number of stakeholder meetings to discuss each of the three potential options for further regulation of the letting agent industry. At each meeting, views were sought on the most appropriate format for further regulation, including discussions in relation to financial impacts on the industry itself and any administrative body. Views were sought from the following stakeholders:

- the Scottish Private Rented Sector Strategy Group,
- COSLA,
- Let Scotland,
- The Council of Letting Agents,
- The Association of Residential Letting Agents,
- The Scottish Association of Landlords,
- The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors,
- The Office of Fair Trading,
- Chartered Institute of Housing,
- Police Scotland, and
- TC Young, Solicitors.

224. Feedback from local authority representatives highlighted concerns about further administrative burdens being placed on local authorities in addition to those associated with their landlord registration responsibilities. COSLA, in particular, highlighted the financial and resource constraints already faced by local authorities and argued that placing the responsibility for regulation of letting agents on them would only compound this issue.
225. There was general consensus during all of the stakeholder discussions that further regulation of the letting agent industry, through membership of professional trade bodies, would be beneficial. However, it was felt by a number of stakeholders, including from representatives within the letting agent industry itself, that this would impact negatively on small letting agencies who are currently providing a good service but simply could not afford membership and accreditation training costs. There was a strong sense that such a system could prove to be unworkable. The consensus view was that adopting an approach similar to the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 would be the most appropriate and workable regulatory approach.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

226. The provisions relating to further regulation of the letting agent industry are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion. The Scottish Government has considered the potential effect of these provisions on human rights. It is satisfied that they are compatible with ECHR. They are expected to have no detrimental impact on local government and also do not raise any human rights issues and have no specific implications for island communities or sustainable development.

Effects on sustainable development

227. The Scottish Government considers that regulating the letting agent industry will promote environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development, as described below.

Environmental effects

228. Regulating the letting agent industry is unlikely to have significant environmental effects because its primary impact will be on standards of service and levels of professionalism among all letting agents across the country.

Social effects

229. The main social effects of regulating letting agents will be to improve tenants’ living conditions. As well as giving tenants and landlords confidence in the standard of service they should expect, this will also improve the framework for dealing with disputes where these arise, and provide consistent high levels of customer service.

Economic effects

230. Letting agents play an important role in providing a wide range of services, helping to deliver high quality services to landlords and tenants. These services help to ensure that landlords meet their regulatory responsibilities, as well as enabling effective management and maintenance of privately-rented properties. By regulating the letting agent industry, this will promote industry-expected and consistent standards of service and levels of professionalism among all letting agents and help to promote a professional private rented sector that will be attractive to potential investors.
PART 5 - MOBILE HOME SITES WITH PERMANENT RESIDENTS

Policy objectives

231. The Scottish Government wishes to improve and strengthen the licensing regime that applies to mobile park home sites on which people live permanently. The Bill will establish a mobile home site licensing system that:

- focusses on the licence applicant (whether applying for a first site licence or to renew an existing one), and the applicant’s fitness to have a site licence,
- gives local authorities a range of powers, and appropriate discretion in deciding how to use them, in relation to the granting, management, and revocation of licences,
- ensures standards on sites are maintained and, enables action to be taken by local authorities to address significant problems with sites,
- provides an effective process for site owners and site licence applicants to appeal against decisions by the local authority.

Background

232. While legally defined as caravans, many modern mobile homes resemble small bungalows rather than caravans. The larger ones are sometimes referred to as “park homes”, and can consist of two parts which are bolted together on site. An increasing number of people live permanently in mobile homes. Many of these residents are elderly, as these homes are commonly marketed as desirable and affordable retirement properties.

233. Research by Consumer Focus identified 92 mobile home sites in Scotland, with around 3,314 mobile homes. The research found that the majority of sites have fewer than 50 residential homes, and 22 out of 32 local authorities confirmed they have at least one mobile home site in their area. Sites are concentrated in six local authority areas: Perth and Kinross, Dumfries and Galloway, Fife, Angus, Argyll and Bute, and Aberdeen.

234. A mobile home owner generally owns the mobile home but not the land (the “pitch”) on which the home sits. The pitch will be rented from the site owner in exchange for a pitch fee. The rights and obligations of the site owner and the mobile home owner will be determined by the terms of a written agreement between them, and the applicable legislation.

235. While many sites are well run, there is evidence that there are unscrupulous site owners who exploit vulnerable residents and fail to comply with their statutory obligations. The provisions in the Bill will, therefore, give local authorities a range of tools to use in such situations. The Bill’s provisions are part of a wider set of measures that are intended to significantly strengthen the protections enjoyed by permanent mobile home residents.

The role of legislation

236. The current law relating to mobile home site licensing is set out in the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 (“the 1960 Act”). The 1960 Act requires an occupier of land to obtain a site licence before the land can be used as a caravan site. Local authorities can ask for information as part of the application process but, where the information is provided and the applicant has not previously had a site licence revoked, they do not have the discretion to refuse a site licence where planning permission has already been granted. Licences are effectively granted in perpetuity, and authorities cannot charge fees for issuing site licences. Local authorities may attach conditions to site licences and can alter those conditions from time to time.

237. As the number of people living permanently in mobile homes has grown, and with evidence that unscrupulous site owners are exploiting weaknesses in the current licensing system, it is appropriate to update the existing licensing system. This is part of a wider package of measures to improve the rights and protections of mobile home residents. Earlier this year the Mobile Homes Act 1983 (Amendment of Schedule 1) (Scotland) Order 2013 (SSI 2013/219) was introduced, and approved by the Scottish Parliament. It came into force on 1 September 2013. It gives mobile home owners a number of new rights, including:

- the right to undisturbed possession of their mobile home,
- the right to give their mobile home to a member of their family,
- the right to sell their mobile home without the need for a site owner to approve the prospective purchaser.

238. In addition to the changes above, the Scottish Government will be issuing new model standards for permanent mobile home sites. Under section 5(6) of the 1960 Act, model standards may be specified by Ministers with regard to the layout, provision and facilities on site. Local authorities must have regard to these model standards when setting licence conditions. The current model standards are set out in circular no. 17/1990. These will be replaced by new model standards, developed with local authorities, that reflect up to date practices in areas such as fire safety.

239. While SSI 2013/219 gave mobile home residents stronger rights and protections, it could not amend and improve the licensing system itself. Similarly, while the new model standards aim to improve the standard and quality of mobile home sites, they cannot give local authorities the stronger powers they need to enforce such standards. The provisions in the Bill, therefore, address the site licensing system itself. The intention of doing so is to create a robust licensing system that reflects modern practice and gives local authorities the tools needed to ensure mobile home sites meet acceptable standards, and that licences can be managed and revoked as required.

Statutory minimum information to be provided with a site licence application

240. The Bill provides for the Scottish Ministers to have the power to set in regulations minimum application information that must be provided when someone applies for a site licence.

---

39 A copy of the circular can be obtained from the Housing Services and Regeneration Division, Scottish Government.
To provide a suitable level of flexibility, and allow the information required to be adjusted as necessary, details of that information is not set out in the Bill itself. However, it is expected that the sort of information required will be:

- the address of the land in respect of which the application is being made,
- the applicant’s name, address, and date of birth, and other names by which the applicant has been known,
- the correspondence address for the applicant,
- previous addresses where the applicant has been resident in the last five years,
- the name and address of any other joint owner or occupier of the land,
- if the site is to be managed by another individual or managing agent, the individual’s or agent’s details in line with the requirements above,
- the contact address in connection with the day to day management of the site,
- if the application is from a company, the company name and registration number,
- if the application is from a charity, the charity name and registration number.

Local authorities would continue to have the discretion to request “other information as they may reasonably require”, which they currently have under section 3(2) of the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960.

The provisions in the Bill would allow for a suitable level of standardisation across the country in the type, and level, of information local authorities require from site owners. It would also lead to a greater level of information being provided, and, therefore, ensure local authorities have the information they need to effectively carry out other measures in the Bill, such as the “fit and proper person” test. Lastly it means that it is clear to site owners what information would be asked of them, and that this is consistent across the country.

A “fit and proper person” test

Provisions in the Bill would require those applying for, or looking to renew, a site licence to satisfy a test that they are a “fit and proper person” to hold a site licence. A local authority would decide whether or not someone passes the test, and in doing so would have to take into account:

- any unspent convictions for certain types of offence (e.g. fraud or dishonesty, violence, drugs, sexual offences, discriminatory activity, antisocial behaviour, firearms),
- whether a person has practised unlawful discrimination,
- contravention of any law that relates to mobile homes including if the courts have found the applicant(s), or proposed or actual site manager(s), to be in breach of their duties under the Mobile Homes Act 1983,
- contravention of any law relating to housing or landlord related activity,
- any previous breaches of site licensing conditions,
• any complaints that have come to the local authority’s attention in respect of the land or site,
• any complaints or reports of antisocial behaviour on the site that have come to the local authority’s attention,
• any other relevant information about the site that has come to the local authority’s attention from carrying out other regulatory activity, for example environmental health.

244. Applicants for a site licence would have to provide the information above. If they fail to do so, the local authority would be able to take that into account when deciding whether to grant a site licence. The Bill would also give local authorities a power to require a Disclosure Scotland check to be carried out, if they deem it necessary. The fit and proper person test would be applied to the person carrying out the day-to-day running of the site. This could be the site owner, or it could be someone the owner has appointed to run the site, such as a site manager.

245. The current site licensing regime does not include any assessment of the person who will run the site. Given the continuing relationship that residents have with that individual, (such as the provision of services and payment of pitch fees), the Scottish Government considers that this is a significant failing of the existing legislation. The introduction of a fit and proper person test would address this. For the first time the licence system would take into account whether the person who will be running the site is an appropriate person to do so.

Set site licence terms

246. The Bill provides that site licences will be valid for a period of three years. The Bill will also give Ministers the power to vary that period through regulations, subject to the affirmative procedure. At the moment site licences have no expiry date.

247. The Scottish Government’s intention is that once the provisions in the Bill are implemented, all those applying for a site licence for the first time would have to meet all the requirements in the Bill and associated regulations, e.g. the minimum application criteria. Current site licence holders would have two years after the provisions are implemented to apply for a new site licence, and meet the new conditions.

248. Having set licence terms will bring site licensing into line with other licensing regimes, such as that applied to houses in multiple occupation. It means there would be a regular assessment of site standards and of whether the person running the site remains fit and proper to do so. Such an approach also means that changes in requirements for sites (such as in site standards) can be reflected in site conditions on a regular and timely basis.

Process and timescales for issuing site licences

249. The Scottish Government intends to consult on the timescales that should be in place for issuing of site licences. The aim would be to strike a balance between giving site owners a clear indication of when their licence may be issued with the time needed by local authorities to carry out the preparatory work and reach an informed decision.
250. Having set, but realistic, timescales would give everyone involved in the site licensing process clear and shared expectations. Combined with an appropriate degree of flexibility it would allow site owners to make plans based on the timescales for local authorities to reach a decision on whether or not to issue a site licence.

Power to charge a fee for a licence

251. Provisions in the Bill would allow local authorities to charge fees for granting site licences and to set the level of those fees. The Bill also gives Scottish Ministers the power to;

- set a maximum fee level in regulations, and
- specify matters which a local authority must take into account in setting fees.

252. At the moment local authorities cannot charge a fee for a site licence. The Scottish Government considers that local authorities should be able to charge a fee that would reflect the cost of the work involved in issuing a licence and carrying out routine site inspections. By providing for a fee to be charged, the intention is that implementation of this more robust licensing system would be cost-neutral to local authorities.

253. The Scottish Government believes that there are good reasons for allowing flexibility to provide for fees to be set at a local level while retaining scope for Scottish Ministers to make regulations to manage fee levels. For example, some smaller sites operate with small profit margins, so it will be important to have fees set at a level which would not undermine their profitability. The Government also recognises that it is important that the level of fees reflects local conditions (including the work involved in issuing a site licence in specific local authority areas), which is why the Bill allows local authorities the flexibility to set fees. Provisions in the Bill would allow local authorities to set lower fees for smaller sites.

Enforcement powers

254. The provisions in this part of the Bill implement six specific policy proposals:

- Increasing the maximum criminal penalty for the offences of non-compliance with licence conditions to a maximum of £10,000. The fine for operating without a site licence will be a maximum of £50,000.
- Giving local authorities the power to serve an improvement notice on a site owner, to require them to carry out work to comply with a licence condition.
- Allowing local authorities to impose a penalty notice which would suspend pitch fee payments, and the commission a resident pays to the site owner on the sale of their mobile home, if the site owner failed to comply with an improvement notice.
- Allowing local authorities the power to revoke a site licence in certain circumstances.
- Make provision for an interim manager to take over the running of the site in specific circumstances, such as when a site licence is revoked, or a local authority has refused to renew a licence.
- Allowing local authorities to recover the costs of enforcement activity.
255. The Scottish Government considers that giving local authorities a range of robust and proportionate enforcement tools is crucial to ensuring that mobile home sites are managed well. The changes in the Bill would give local authorities a variety of options that they can use to tackle poor practice. Having well-run and well-managed sites is in the interest of residents and local authorities. It is also in the interests of the many legitimate site owners as it penalises those that behave in a way that reflects badly on the industry.

256. Allowing local authorities to recover the costs of enforcement work follows a “polluter pays” principle. Site owners who run their sites well would not be penalised for the cost of measures taken against those that fail to do so, and councils would have the funds they need to carry out such work without diverting funding from other services.

257. An alternative approach would have been to give local authorities the flexibility to determine the information they needed, rather than specifying a core set of data that all local authorities should collect. This could have led to inconsistent information being held across the country. Under the approach the Scottish government is taking, local authorities will retain the power to ask for additional information, but there will be consistency in the standard information that is required.

258. To address the problem of unscrupulous site owners, a test focussed on a person’s suitability to run a site, backed up by sanctions set out in the law, is considered by the Scottish Government to be the best approach. An alternative approach would have been to introduce some form of self-regulation by the industry. This would have been unlikely to be effective, as unscrupulous site owners could have avoided engaging with the industry’s bodies. Any system of self-regulation would also have lacked sanctions backed up the law, ensuring compliance with the system.

259. There is no alternative process that could be introduced that would be effective in ensuring that all site licences were formally reviewed on a regular basis. While site owners could (and would) be required to inform a local authority of a change in their circumstances, this would not be a substitute for the legal requirement on a local authority to formally review and approve or refuse a licence.

260. The existing timescales are linked to the current licensing regime, which requires local authorities to issue a licence only when set criteria are met. The current arrangements could have been left in place. However, the Scottish Government considers that the substantial changes proposed for the site licensing system provides an opportunity to review the process. It considers that the timescales required should reflect the time and work that local authorities would need to undertake before granting a licence. Using existing timescales in this new context would, therefore, not be a sensible approach.

261. There are two possible alternative approaches to site licensing fees: continue with no provision for fees; or allow the Scottish Government to set one fee that would apply across the country. Without the income from fees, local authorities would have difficulty operating the enhanced licensing regime. If fees were set centrally, it is unlikely these would be able to reflect the cost of issuing a licence in every authority. This is because the cost of issuing a licence is likely to vary from authority to authority, for reasons such as geographical differences as well as the number of permanent mobile home sites in an authority’s area. Setting one national fee could mean that it might exceed the costs for some authorities while it did not meet the costs of others.

262. The Scottish Government considers that, in order to tackle unscrupulous site owners who exploit the system, the only effective way of addressing this behaviour is through strong legal measures. Self-regulation by the industry would be unlikely to succeed, as the worst site owners would be unlikely to yield to pressure from their peers to improve their ways. In addition, many site residents are elderly, and so would be unlikely to have the financial resources to take legal action against the site owners.

Consultation

263. The Scottish Government consulted on its proposals for site licensing from 21 May to 13 August 2012. 129 responses were received. 53 of these were from groups or organisations, and 76 were from individual members of the public. Of the 53 group responses 13 were from local authorities, nine from mobile home resident groups, four by bodies connected with or representing various aspects of the mobile home or holiday park industries, and 21 from owners and operators of mobile home and/or holiday sites. 55 of the 76 responses from individuals drew on one of three versions of a set of answers, and were collated and submitted by residents of two mobile homes.

264. The analysis of the consultation responses found that:

- Those respondents who approached the proposals from the perspective of mobile home residents were generally supportive of the proposed changes, and often expressed clear support for an enhanced licensing and inspection regime.

- Respondents who approached the proposals from the perspective of the mobile home industry disagreed with some of the suggested changes. They often suggested that the proposed regime would impose additional administrative and financial burdens on reputable site owners, but would be unlikely to tackle the problems created by a small number of less scrupulous owners.

- Respondents from the industry (industry bodies, site owners, and individuals who appeared to be site owners) often focused their comments on how the proposals would affect that part of the industry with which they were most closely connected. This applied particularly to respondents who were concerned about the regime being applied to holiday sites.

- Local authority respondents were supportive of the need for change and of the requirement for an enhanced licensing regime. Local authority respondents were also generally in agreement with most or all of the proposals as put forward. However, some did express reservations about certain aspects of the proposals, and were looking for them to be strengthened.

265. In response to the consultation, the Scottish Government decided that the new licensing regime should only cover mobile home sites which are for permanent residents. This reflected views expressed in the consultation about the effect the proposals would have on holiday sites as well as the fact that it is permanent residents of mobile home sites that have experienced the most significant problems, such as sale blocking and intimidation from site owners. Scottish Ministers considered that it would not be appropriate for mobile homes on holiday parks, which are only occupied for some of the year, to be covered by this new legislation.

Equal opportunities

266. An Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) has been carried out and a summary of it will be published on the Scottish Government website. Through the EQIA process the Scottish Government has considered the potential impacts, both positive and negative, across the protected characteristics covered in an EQIA. The EQIA process has provided reassurance that the proposals in the Bill are not discriminatory against any particular equalities group. In fact they may bring benefits to some groups, such as residents who are disabled, and those living on privately run Gypsy/Traveller sites. The process also identified that the Scottish Government will have to take into account the needs of migrant workers in preparing for the detailed implementation of the policy (including consideration of the most effective ways to provide information to this group).

267. The Scottish Government considered the potential effect of these provisions on human rights. The new licensing regime would have an impact on the rights of site owners under Article 1 Protocol 1 (which protects the right to peaceful enjoyment of property). The current licensing regime under the 1960 Act already affects rights under Article 1 Protocol 1, in the sense that it requires land owners to obtain a licence if they wish to operate a caravan site. The Scottish Government considers that the strengthened licensing regime could increase the potential interference with Article 1 Protocol 1 but that this interference is justified in the public interest and that the Bill contains sufficient safeguards to ensure that local authorities would exercise their powers in compliance with human rights.

268. The Bill would require applicants to provide additional information when applying for, or renewing, a mobile home site licence so the Scottish Government has considered the privacy implications that could arise from the mobile home provisions in the Bill. The Government has considered whether a Privacy Impact Assessment is required and has concluded one will not be necessary as the information collected will not be intrusive, the policy will not require the use of new technology, and multiple organisations are not involved in handling the information.

Island communities

269. The provisions in the Bill would apply to all mobile home sites in Scotland where people are permanently resident, including those on island communities. These would apply to mobile home sites on islands in the same way as those on mainland Scotland. The Scottish Government has established that there are no permanent mobile home sites in the island local authorities of Shetland, the Orkney Islands, or Comhairle Nan Eilean Siar. Comhairle Nan Eilean Siar responded to the consultation and was broadly supportive of the proposals.

Local government

270. Thirteen local authorities submitted formal responses to the consultation on the Scottish Government’s site licensing proposals. Those who responded covered urban and rural areas (such as Comhairle Nan Eilean Siar and Aberdeen City), and different parts of Scotland (such as Highland and Dumfries and Galloway). Local authority responses were generally supportive of the need for change, and in broad agreement with most or all of the proposals put forward. Some authorities wanted the proposals to go further, and suggested that the licensing system should be further strengthened. Following the consultation, the Scottish Government has been in discussion with COSLA and local authority officials dealing with mobile home site licensing. COSLA has not taken a formal position on the proposals, but through discussions the Scottish Government is aware that it favours proposals that allow for maximum local flexibility and be cost neutral for local authorities. The Scottish Government considers that its proposals reflect this.

Sustainable development and environmental issues

Environmental effects

271. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill is likely to have minimal effect in relation to the environment and, as such, is exempt for the purposes of section 7 of the Environmental Assessment (Scotland) Act 2005. A pre-screening report has been completed. This confirmed that the mobile home provisions in the Bill will have minimal or no impact on the environment, and consequently that a full strategic environmental assessment did not need to be undertaken. The pre-screening report will shortly be published on the Scottish Government website under case number PRE/00526.

Social effects

272. The provisions in the Bill will strengthen the mobile home site licensing system, and will strengthen the protections enjoyed by permanent mobile home residents. A survey by Consumer Focus in 2012 found that many mobile home residents are over 55, and older people are generally recognised as a potentially more vulnerable group. The changes will benefit residents, increase confidence in the sector, and ensure that poor sites and unscrupulous site owners are tackled. The Scottish Government believes that this will bring social benefits to those living on sites, and the families of those living on sites.

Economic effects

273. The provisions on mobile home site licences will affect residents, site owners, and local authorities. Local authorities will be able to charge a fee to cover administration costs of providing a site licence, and based on Scottish Government research, it is estimated that this fee would be approximately £600. This fee will be a very small percentage of the turnover of a mobile home site (less than 0.5% for a site with 40 or more mobile homes). The Scottish Government believes that the improved standards of safety, facilities and management that are an intended outcome of the proposals will help ensure that site owners who provide a good service are not undercut by those who are not doing so. This will help to promote fairer competition in the sector. Residents will benefit from a more robust licensing regime that gives local authorities the tools need to ensure sites are of an acceptable standard, and to tackle unscrupulous site owners, therefore increasing confidence in the sector. Overall the Scottish Government believes that improving the licensing regime will have a neutral or beneficial economic effect.

Policy objectives

274. The policy objective is to ensure that local authorities have a range of powers to tackle poor conditions in the private sector. The intention is that these new discretionary powers in relation to private housing will give local authorities a broader range of tools that they can use as part of a strategic approach to tackling poor standard housing in their areas.

275. The provisions on house condition enforcement powers are intended to:

- Clarify the existing power to pay missing shares on behalf of owners who are unwilling or unable to pay their share, to ensure that local authorities are able to use that power to support majority decisions by owners under the tenement management scheme for repair works.
- Allow local authorities to issue maintenance orders where they have issued a work notice or a previous maintenance order. (Currently there is scope to do so only if the local authority is satisfied that the house has not been or will not be maintained to a reasonable standard).
- Reduce the administrative burden of maintenance orders.
- Enable local authorities to include incidental work to address safety and security work notices.
- Provide local authorities with effective means to recover the costs of work to address disrepair from owners of commercial property in housing blocks.

Alternative approaches

276. The Scottish Government sought views on more wide-ranging house condition enforcement powers, including powers to require owners to carry out energy efficiency improvements. Feedback from stakeholders was against this approach because:

- There were concerns about the capacity of local authorities to apply new enforcement powers and a view that this would require additional funding.
- Local authorities already struggle to address disrepair and some respondents considered that resources should not be diverted to improvements, especially in view of the Scottish Government’s position that disrepair is an obstacle to energy efficiency work.
277. The Scottish Government also considered doing nothing. However, there was strong support for a limited number of changes to make the existing powers more effective.

Consultation

278. The Scottish Government conducted a public consultation on a sustainable housing strategy (Homes That Don’t Cost the Earth, 2012).\(^{43}\) Chapter 2 of that consultation sought views on proposals:

- to improve the operation of existing local authority enforcement powers,
- in relation to work notices (for houses which are in disrepair),
- in relation to maintenance orders (to maintain a property to a reasonable standard) and
- recovery of expenses (where notices have been enforced).

279. The majority of respondents were in favour of changes that would make local authority enforcement powers more effective. Some local authorities noted that they are unable to carry out work to meet the Scottish Housing Quality Standard (SHQS) in social rented properties because private owners in mixed tenure blocks either do not agree to the work or block it altogether.

280. The Scottish Government met with a group of local authority private sector housing and environmental health managers to discuss the consultation responses, clarify the concerns of local authorities and consider possible legislative options. Local authorities reiterated their concerns about new kinds of enforcement powers raised in responses to the consultation. However, overall it was felt by local authorities that the amendments proposed in the Bill would be useful, provided that the use of enforcement powers was discretionary and would not add to local authority costs.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

Effects on equal opportunities

281. The Scottish Government considers that the provisions in the Bill relating to house condition enforcement powers would not adversely impact equal opportunities. The enforcement powers are intended to improve house condition and support other Scottish Government policies to enable older people to remain in their own homes and to enable adaptations to housing for disabled people.

Effects on human rights

282. The Scottish Government has considered the potential impact of these provisions on human rights. The Bill amends existing local authority powers to require private home owners to carry out work on their homes. Article 1 of Protocol 1 of the Convention guarantees peaceful enjoyment of possessions. The amendments in the Bill have a legitimate aim of the provision of reasonable standard of housing for the population of Scotland. Any of the controls of use are justified in pursuing this legitimate aim. The provisions strike a balance between the interests of the community in having a reasonable standard of housing and individuals’ rights to the peaceful enjoyment of their property. There are various safeguards and protections for the occupiers. There is a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed by the state and the aim pursued.

Effects on island communities
283. There would be no differential impact upon island communities.

Effects on local government
284. The provisions would give local authorities discretionary powers to supplement their existing powers to tackle poor conditions. This wider range of powers aims to further enable local authorities to tackle poor quality in the private owner occupied and rented sectors. These additional powers, because they are discretionary, should not increase pressures on local authority resources.

Effects on sustainable development
285. The Scottish Government considers that amendments to local authority house condition enforcement powers will promote environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development, as described below.

Environmental effects
286. The Scottish Government considers that disrepair in private sector housing is a barrier to some energy efficiency improvements. The amendments to local authority house condition enforcement powers were developed as part of the Sustainable Housing Strategy to support targets for reducing fuel poverty and tackling climate change.

Social effects
287. The Scottish Government considers that for people to live in warm, high quality, affordable, low carbon homes action is needed to improve both the physical condition and the energy efficiency of housing, including the use of regulation and enforcement powers. The house condition enforcement powers in the Bill contribute to that aim.

Economic effects
288. The Scottish Government considers that proactive maintenance is more cost effective than reactive repair of houses, but home owners do not always appreciate the value and necessity of the work need to protect and preserve their property. Amendments to local authority house condition enforcement powers will help local authorities to intervene where work is needed to address disrepair in Scotland’s housing stock.
PART 7 – MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS

RIGHT TO REDEEM A SECURITY AFTER 20 YEARS – POWER TO EXEMPT

Policy objectives

289. The 20 year security rule provisions provide powers for the Scottish Ministers to designate schemes, such as shared equity loan and equity release schemes, which would be exempt from the “20-year security rule” in the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 (“the 1974 Act”). The policy objective of the provisions is to ensure Scottish Ministers are not exposed to the financial risks associated with the 20-year security rule which allows borrowers to redeem their equity loan at its original value after the security has been in force for 20 years.

290. Section 11 of the 1974 Act gives a borrower the right to redeem a security over a private dwelling house after it has been in force for 20 years. However, the provisions about what the borrower has to pay do not fit securities arising from shared equity arrangements. In the early 1970s, the differing types of financing arrangements that now exist were not imagined and the legislation is centred around the idea that in home loan arrangements the borrower pays interest regularly and either gradually reduces the debt or slowly acquires more of the property.

291. Without amendment, this legislation means it could become unviable for the Scottish Government and other bodies to operate shared equity loan and equity release schemes, particularly as a result of the increased scrutiny which mortgage lenders must exercise for shared equity lending as a result of the Financial Conduct Authority Mortgage Market Review (MMR) guidance, that comes into force in April 2014.

Alternative approaches

292. The Low-cost Initiative for First-time Buyers (“LIFT”) shared equity schemes currently avoid the difficulty of the 20-year security rule by having a break clause at year 19 of the agreement. This has operated satisfactorily to date; if agreements reach year 19 a new agreement and security can be considered. This ensures that the Scottish Government is not exposed to the financial risks of the 20-year security rule i.e. that borrowers would be able to redeem their loan come year 20 at its original value by reference to pounds and pence, rather than by reference to property value.

293. Ministers had originally intended using the same arrangements for the Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme. However, changes to Financial Conduct Authority MMR 2014 guidance (related to affordability tests and mortgage duration) made the Council of Mortgage Lenders and some of its members unwilling to participate in the Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme on the basis of a break clause at year 19. Without lender participation that scheme would not be viable. The change in guidance is also likely to affect continued lender participation in the LIFT schemes.

294. To allow Help to Buy (Scotland) to be launched at the end of September 2013 with lender participation, the Scottish Government removed the payment event at year 19 from the draft shared equity agreement for the scheme. All potential participants will be advised of the intention to exempt the scheme from the 20-year security rule, and it is intended that the change effected by the Bill will apply to any agreements concluded under the scheme at the time the Bill’s provisions come into force, as well as any later agreements. As no right to redeem under the 20-year security rule could be exercised until after 20 years have elapsed, the Scottish Government considers that the notice of the proposed change will permit the change to be applied to existing agreements without any participant having grounds for complaint.

295. The arrangements currently utilised by the LIFT schemes (as explained above) can also be used for the Help to Adapt scheme, as the scheme does not involve private lenders and is not affected by changes to Financial Conduct Authority MMR 2014 guidance. However, this approach is far from ideal. A key tenet of the Help to Adapt scheme is certainty that the equity loan need only be repaid when the homeowner sells the property or dies, guaranteeing that there are no affordability issues. Having to trigger a repayment event at year 19 confuses this, will undermine confidence in the scheme, and is expected to present a barrier to take-up.

Consultation

296. The effect of the MMR 2014 guidance only became clear shortly before the Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme was due to launch in late September 2013. This meant there was not time for wide-ranging or formal consultation on the proposed changes to the 20-year security rule. However, officials have undertaken informal consultation with the Council for Mortgage Lenders and it has indicated that it and its members, who lend as part of equity schemes in Scotland, would be keen to see such provisions introduced. Officials have also undertaken informal consultation with Housing Options Scotland (HOS) on proposed changes to the 20-year rule, in relation to the Help to Adapt scheme. HOS believe the existing rule will undermine confidence in the scheme and strongly support the introduction of the provision to exempt the scheme. They have also been aware of the impact of the 20-year rule on their clients in shared equity schemes and strongly welcomed the introduction of a provision to address this.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

297. The provisions relating to the existing 20-year security rule are not in themselves discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion (though certain religious groups would be unlikely to create securities of the type that they envisage). The proposed change may assist the development of types of mortgage product that are Sharia compliant, something the Scottish Government intends to explore further with lenders who offer such products. They have no specific implications for island communities or for local government.

Effects on human rights

298. The Scottish Government has considered the impact of these provisions on human rights. It considers that they would raise a potential human rights issue for individual home buyers who participate in the Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme prior to commencement of the Bill’s provisions and associated secondary legislation. The right to redeem after 20 years have elapsed could be viewed as a possession for the purposes of Article 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights (“ECHR”). The Bill will remove that right. To ensure compliance with the ECHR, the Scottish Government is ensuring that all potential participants in the scheme are aware, before entering into an agreement, that the Bill intends to remove the right to redeem. There can, therefore, be no issue, in ECHR terms, with the removal of the right.

Effects on sustainable development

299. The Scottish Government considers that changes to the 20-year security rule are not likely to have any environmental effects or social effects although it believes there are wider economic benefits.

Environmental effects

300. Amending the 20-year security rule is unlikely to have any environmental effects.

Social effects

301. As the change to the 20-year security rule is to give Scottish Ministers a power to specify the circumstances for when the 20-year security rule will not apply, there are unlikely to be any social effects.

Economic effects

302. The Scottish Government believes there are wider economic benefits to amending the 20-year security rule. Use of the power can remove barriers to lender participation in the recently introduced Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme which aims to stimulate the construction industry in Scotland. It could also allow lenders to participate more easily in equity release schemes which will generate activity in the Scottish housing market. It is currently common practice to limit agreements to 19 years for securities of certain types, such as for shared equity. Without use of these provisions, in cases where securities are redeemed after 20 years or more have elapsed, the Scottish Ministers would risk receiving the original value of the equity loan rather than the market value of its equity share at the date of redemption. In a situation where the Scottish Government does not require a year 19 repayment, and the 20-year security rule continues to operate, the foregone receipts could be considerable. There could be significant potential losses for the Help to Buy (Scotland) scheme of between £100 million and £250 million based on Office for Budget Responsibility house-price forecasts and between £20 million and £55 million for the LIFT shared equity schemes.

Policy objectives

303. The Scottish Government recognises that the expansion of jurisdiction of the private rented housing panel ("PRHP") to deal with third party applications will lead to an increased workload for the president and that this is also likely to have an impact on the workload of the president in relation to the homeowners housing panel.

304. The provisions in the Bill would allow the president to delegate duties to the vice president or any other panel member as they see fit. This power of delegation is in addition to the existing powers of delegation which can be exercised during times of absence or incapacity, and is intended to increase flexibility to manage workloads effectively.
Alternative approaches

305. The Scottish Government anticipates that the PRHP’s workload will increase once third party reporting rights have been introduced. As a result it considers that the status quo would mean that undue pressure would be placed on the president so it is desirable to provide some degree of flexibility. No other approaches were considered.

Consultation

306. The Scottish Government consulted with the Scottish Tribunal Service and the president of the PRHP before reaching its decision to bring forward provisions to allow for the delegation of certain functions.

SCOTTISH HOUSING REGULATOR: TRANSFER OF ASSETS FOLLOWING INQUIRIES

Policy objectives

307. The policy objective is to equip the Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR) to meet its statutory objective, to safeguard and promote the interests of tenants of social landlords, in an increasingly difficult and challenging financial climate, particularly in cases where there is an imminent threat of a RSL becoming insolvent. The provisions would achieve the objective by making two amendments to the SHR’s powers, under section 67 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 ("the 2010 Act"), to direct a RSL to transfer some or all of its assets to other RSLs.

308. The first amendment, at paragraph (a) of section 79 of the Bill, creates a narrow exception to the general duty at section 67(4) of the 2010 Act, which requires the SHR always to consult tenants and lenders before it directs a transfer of assets. The exception would apply only where all four of the following conditions were met:

- a RSL was in financial jeopardy,
- the nature of the jeopardy was such that a person – either a creditor of the RSL, or the RSL itself – would have grounds for taking steps under section 73 of the 2010 Act towards making the RSL insolvent,
- a direction by the SHR to transfer the RSL’s assets would substantially reduce the likelihood of someone taking such a step, and
- There would not be time before making the direction to undertake the consultation normally required by section 67 of the 2010 Act.

309. In all other cases where the SHR might contemplate making a direction under section 67 – if there had been misconduct or mismanagement, or where there was financial jeopardy that was not so grave as to give anyone grounds for taking steps under section 73, or where there was time to consult – it would remain bound to consult. The narrowness of the exception reflects the Government’s intention to maintain the rights of tenants and lenders to be consulted by the SHR in all normal circumstances.
310. This amendment is intended to address cases where the SHR could remove the threat of a RSL becoming insolvent by a direction to transfer all or some of the RSL’s assets to other RSLs and where the need to make the direction is so urgent that there is no time to consult tenants and landlords.

311. The second amendment, at paragraph (b) of section 79 of the Bill, repeals the duty at section 67(6) of the 2010 Act on the SHR always to obtain, and direct a transfer based on, a valuation. It recognises that there could be a range of circumstances where it would not make sense for the SHR to obtain, and direct a transfer of assets, at a price that reflects an independent valuation. For example, pressure of time might, again, make this impractical, or there might be agreement among all the parties to a transfer on the value of the assets to be transferred, or it might be necessary to direct a transfer at a price that reflected other factors than a valuation. Repealing the duty would still allow the SHR to use its general powers under the 2010 Act, to obtain and act upon a valuation where it considered that one might help to pave the way for a direction, but would avoid it being required to do so as a matter of course and regardless of whether in practice it would help to facilitate a successful transfer.

Alternative approaches

312. The alternative would be to do nothing and leave the SHR under all of its current duties at section 67. The Scottish Government considers that that would constrain the SHR unnecessarily and limit its ability to act on behalf of tenants. In the case of the duty to consult, under section 67(4), it would mean that the SHR might be unable to act to avoid a RSL becoming insolvent solely because pressure of time made it impossible for it to comply with the duty to consult tenants and lenders before directing a transfer of assets. That would not be in the interest of tenants, or indeed of lenders. In the case of the duty to obtain a valuation under section 67(6), it would mean requiring the SHR to spend time and money obtaining valuations regardless of whether such valuations actually helped the SHR to safeguard and promote the interests of tenants.

Consultation

313. The Scottish Government decided to amend section 67 of the 2010 Act in light of the increasingly difficult and challenging financial climate facing RSLs and of several recent cases of RSLs having been in serious financial jeopardy and needing urgently to be rescued. It consulted the SHR about the case for amending the SHR’s functions under section 67. It also discussed what it proposed to do with representatives of tenants, lenders, RSLs and other stakeholders.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

314. The Scottish Government has considered the impact of the provisions in Part 7 which relate to the transfer of assets by the SHR following an inquiry into an RSL and has concluded that they do not raise any issues for equal opportunities, human rights, island communities and sustainable development. There is no potential impact on local government.
REPEAL OF DEFECTIVE DESIGNATION PROVISIONS

Policy objectives

315. By repealing the defective designation provisions in Part 14 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 ("the 1987 Act"), the Scottish Government’s intention is to remove an obsolete provision.

Background

316. In the early 1980s research identified a risk of deterioration of the steel frames of some non-traditional housing due to carbonation of concrete. Twelve types of Scottish precast reinforced concrete (PRC) house design were designated as defective under the Housing Defects Act 1984. The Scottish provisions of this Act were repealed and re-enacted as Part 14 of the 1987 Act.

317. The twelve types of construction which are designated as defective in Scotland are:

- Ayrshire County Council (Lindsay),
- Blackburn Orlit,
- Boot,
- Dorran,
- Myton-Clyde,
- Orlit,
- Tarran,
- Tarran-Clyde,
- Tee Beam,
- Unitroy,
- Whitson-Fairhurst,
- Winget.

318. The Scottish Government estimates that there are approximately 15,000 PRC houses designated as defective in Scotland, of which 3,000 are in the private sector.

319. The purpose of the designation was to specify entitlement to the scheme of assistance, but it remained in force when the scheme expired. The scheme is set out in Part 14 of the 1987 Act and provided grants to carry out repairs or, where this was impossible, to buy back the home at pre-designation value. The time limit for seeking assistance was specified in the housing Defects (Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Dwellings) (Scotland) Designations 1984. The legislation and the grant arrangements were a recognition that public housing had been built in this way and then tenants had been encouraged to buy under the right to buy introduced in 1981. The arrangements were time-limited because the problem had been widely publicised, and it was felt that subsequent buyers ought to take it into account.
320. The Scottish Government commissioned research by the Buildings Research Establishment (BRE) to provide information on the current condition of affected properties:

- to assess the extent to which deterioration has actually occurred due to the identified risk of corrosion,
- to assess the extent to which remedial work has addressed the risk, and
- to identify the scope for intervention to address owners’ concerns and allow more effective use of housing stock.

321. The research included a survey of data held by local authorities and RSLs, a physical survey of a small sample of affected properties and discussions with the Council of Mortgage Lenders (“CML”) and the National House-Building Council. The research recommended the repeal of Part 14 of the 1987 Act.

322. The Scottish Government accepts that the removal of the designation will not remove the potential problems or change the confidence of mortgage lenders in these properties immediately. It does consider that this will open up the possibility of reverting to a structural assessment that is meaningful for each property.

323. Repeal of the designation could lead to progress in this area in the future, because:

- it may encourage structural surveys of properties by lenders (an unintended consequence of designation is that surveys are currently discouraged),
- when recovery in the housing market occurs, there may be a greater willingness of lenders to provide mortgages for non-traditional properties,
- it may influence similar changes in England and Wales which will have more impact on the UK-wide mortgage industry.

324. However, the principle justification for repeal is that the legislation is obsolete with the expiry of the assistance provided under the 1987 Act and currently provides no benefit to home owners.

Alternative approaches

325. The Scottish Government considered doing nothing. This could be justified on the grounds that repeal may have limited impact in the short term towards improving the ability to secure a mortgage on these house types. However, this would do nothing to address the concerns of home owners and would perpetuate legislation which no longer serves a useful purpose.

326. It would also be possible to amend the designation, by removing some or all of the classes of buildings. However, the Scottish Government considers that it is preferable to include the repeal in primary legislation because this would be a clearer statement of the need to move beyond the existing designation towards treatment of individual properties on their actual physical condition.

Consultation

327. Scottish Government officials wrote to stakeholders on 19 October 2012 to seek their views on a repeal of Part 14 of the 1987 Act.

328. Local authorities hold a large number of the affected house types and are mostly in favour of repeal. Generally, they report that their experience of upgrading work on these properties confirms that they are structurally sound, and that the designation is perceived as unfair by owners in their area. They consider that repeal of the designation would not have an immediate impact on caution among lenders.

329. Generally local authorities felt that the repeal would have no, or only minimal, immediate impact on them. Some felt that it might lead to an increase in right to buy applications for affected properties. Some felt that it might, in the long term, lead to an improvement in the ability to secure a mortgage on these homes.

330. Home owners were strongly in favour of the repeal of the designation, which is seen as unfair and inappropriate. They were hopeful that the repeal would improve the ability to secure a mortgage on their homes.

331. The CML sought the views of its members on the proposal. It pointed out that lenders may also have other concerns in respect of individual properties which could affect lending decisions. It does not believe that repeal will improve the availability of mortgages. It also points out that there is potential confusion should the designation be repealed in Scotland while similar provisions remain in force in England and Wales.

332. Prior to bringing the repeal of Part 14 of the 1987 Act into force, the Scottish Government proposes to engage further with CML and mortgage lenders to agree ways to develop alternative approaches to assessing the risk of deterioration in PRC homes.

333. Responses to the consultation also suggested that it would be helpful to keep a continuing duty for local authorities to advise anyone who acquires one of these homes under right to buy of the designation.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development

334. The Scottish Government considers that the proposals in Part 7 which would repeal existing defective designation provisions do not raise any issues for equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, or have any significant environmental or social effects. The potential impact on local government is noted above in their responses to consultation. It is possible that in the longer term the repeal of the defective designation may improve the ability of owners to secure a mortgage and this may encourage investment in the designated types of housing.

HOUSING (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE

1. This memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, in relation to the Housing (Scotland) Bill. It describes the purpose of each of the subordinate legislation provisions in the Bill and outlines the reasons for seeking the proposed powers. This memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

2. The contents of the Memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by Parliament.

OUTLINE OF BILL PROVISIONS

3. The purpose of the Housing (Scotland) Bill is to abolish the right to buy social housing; to provide additional safeguards for tenants in the private rented sector (PRS) and permanent residents of mobile home sites; to introduce a regulatory framework for letting agents to help improve overall levels of service and professionalism within the industry; to support improvements in housing quality in the private rented and privately-owned sectors; to make better use of the existing stock of social rented homes; and to provide more efficient access to justice for landlords and tenants in the private rented sector.

4. The Bill is structured in the following parts:

- Part 1 contains provisions which will abolish the right to buy.
- Part 2 makes provision in relation to social housing allocations; the extension of the term of the short Scottish secure tenancy; the right to assign or sublet a tenancy, to establish a joint tenancy and to succeed to a secure tenancy.
- Part 3 and schedule 1 transfers jurisdiction for civil cases relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff court to the First-tier Tribunal. Part 3 also contains some further changes to private rented housing legislation, containing provisions which deem a landlord as being registered on the landlord register where an application has not been determined by a local authority within 12 months; which allow third party reporting to the Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP); and for enforcement of landlord’s repairing standard.
- Part 4 makes provision for the registration of letting agents (including a fit and proper person test); creates an offence of operating as a letting agent without being registered; sets out the process for handling disputes between letting agents and landlords or tenants and allows Scottish Ministers to provide for a Letting Agent Code of Practice by regulations.

- Part 5 makes provision for the licencing of permanent mobile home sites in Scotland; (including a fit and proper person test); offences relating to permanent sites and local authority enforcement of statutory requirements, including powers of entry and recovery of expenses in relation to enforcement action.

- Part 6 amends local authority powers to enforce repairs and maintenance in private homes.

- Part 7 makes a number of miscellaneous amendments: granting Ministers powers to exempt certain schemes, such as shared equity schemes from the right to redeem a heritable security after 20 years in relation to private dwellings; providing for delegation of certain functions of the president of the Private Rented Housing Panel; amending the Scottish Housing Regulator’s powers to transfer assets following inquiries; and repealing provisions in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 that permit designation of certain houses as defective.

- Part 8 sets out various supplementary and final provisions.

APPROACH TO USE OF DELEGATED POWERS

5. The Scottish Government has had regard, when deciding where and how provisions should be set out in subordinate legislation rather than on the face of the Bill, to:

- the need to strike the right balance between the importance of the issue and providing flexibility to respond to changing circumstances;
- the need to make proper use of valuable Parliamentary time; and
- the need to anticipate the unexpected, which might otherwise frustrate the purpose of the provision in primary legislation approved by the Parliament.

DELEGATED POWERS

6. The delegated powers provisions are listed below, with a short explanation of what each power allows, why the power has been taken in the Bill and why the selected form of Parliamentary procedure has been considered appropriate.

PART 2 – SOCIAL HOUSING

Section 4(2) –inserts new subsections (3A) to (3C) into section 21 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 – subsection (3B) Power to prescribe persons of a description or type who social landlords must include in their allocation policy.
This document relates to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

7. Section 4(2) inserts subsections (3A) to (3C) into section 21 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 (“the 1987 Act”). New subsection (3B) provides that Ministers may by regulations prescribe persons of a description or type who social landlords must include in their allocations policies.

Reason for taking the power

8. The Scottish Government wishes to give social landlords more flexibility in the allocation of their housing. New section 20(1) to (1AB) as inserted into the 1987 Act by section 3 of the Bill replaces a prescriptive list of persons to whom social landlords must give reasonable preference when allocating their housing, with a more general requirement to give reasonable preference to persons who are homeless or threatened with homelessness and persons who are living under unsatisfactory housing conditions, in both cases where they have housing needs which are not capable of being met by other housing options which are available.

9. The Scottish Government considers that there may, however, be a need to ensure that social landlords have regard to groups or categories of persons that are routinely being omitted from allocation policies. The regulation making power seeks to allow for a prompt and effective change to be made to the list of types of persons who should be in landlords’ rules governing the priority of allocation of housing in order to respond to changes in future practice in the social housing sector.

Choice of procedure

10. It is considered appropriate that this power is subject to affirmative procedure to allow Parliament a high level of scrutiny, given the potential effect of the use of the power on those types of person who must be included in landlords’ rules governing the priority of allocation of social housing.

Section 7 inserts new section 20B into the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 – section 20B(4) - Power to prescribe a maximum period preceding the application for which a social landlord may take account of any of the circumstances in subsection (5) and a power to prescribe a maximum period that a landlord may make an applicant ineligible for the allocation of housing as a result of the circumstances in subsection (5).

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

11. Section 7(2) inserts new section 20B into the 1987 Act. New subsection (4) of section 20B provides that Ministers may by regulations prescribe a maximum period preceding the application for which a social landlord may take account of any of the circumstances in subsection (5) and a power to prescribe a maximum period that a landlord may make an applicant ineligible for the allocation of housing as a result of the circumstances in subsection (5). The regulations may make different maximum periods for different circumstances.

Reason for taking the power

12. The Scottish Government considers that it may be appropriate to make certain applicants ineligible for the allocation of housing for a period of time where the circumstances set out in new section 20B(5) of the 1987 Act apply. However, it is considered that the time for which such circumstances are relevant should be limited. The Scottish Government, therefore, may wish to prescribe a maximum period of time preceding the application that the circumstances in section 20B(5) may be taken into account by a social landlord, if it appears that such landlords are inappropriately using the discretion that section 20B provides. The Scottish Government may also wish to prescribe a maximum period of time during which an applicant can be considered ineligible for an offer of housing.

Choice of procedure

13. The Scottish Government considers that the maximum periods for the purposes of this provision should merit a higher level of Parliamentary scrutiny, as they may significantly affect the use of the discretion being given to social landlords. They also could significantly affect the rights of applicants, with historical conduct issues, to be considered for allocation of housing. The Scottish Government therefore considers that affirmative procedure is appropriate for any regulations.

Section 7 inserts section 20B into the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 – section 20B(7) - Power to modify the circumstances under which social landlords may make an applicant ineligible for the allocation of housing

Power conferred on:  Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

14. Section 7 inserts section 20B into the 1987 Act. New section 20B(7) provides that Ministers may by regulations modify the circumstances under which social landlords may make an applicant ineligible for the allocation of housing and allows modification of the definitions in subsection (6).

Reason for taking the power

15. The Scottish Government may wish to vary the circumstances which may cause applicants to be made ineligible for the allocation of housing. Section 7 of the Bill inserts new section 20B into the 1987 Act which sets out these circumstances, these include antisocial behaviour, rent arrears, tenancy abandonment and making a false statement in applications for housing. The regulation-making power in subsection (7) will allow prompt change to be made to these circumstances if that is required to meet changing needs and future practice in the social housing sector, or to take account of changes in the legislation referred to in the subsection.

16. It is considered appropriate that this power should be subject to affirmative procedure both because of the significance of the provision that could be made for social landlords and applicants for tenancies with such landlords, and because the power is to modify primary legislation.

Section 12 – amends section 36 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 – section 36(4C) - Power to make provision about the procedure to be followed by social landlords in connection with a review of a decision to seek recovery of possession of a property

- Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
- Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

17. Section 12(c) amends section 36 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 by inserting subsections (4A) to (4C). New subsection (4C) provides that Ministers may by regulations make provision about the procedure that social landlords should follow when reviewing a decision to seek recovery of possession of a property.

Reason for taking the power

18. The Scottish Government considers that regulations are required to make provision about the procedure to be followed in reviewing a decision to seek recovery of possession of a house which is subject to a tenancy, following an application by the tenant, given the level of detail that is likely to be required. It is considered that regulations should include provision for who should be involved in the review, oral hearings, timescales for the review and communication with tenants.

Choice of procedure

19. The Scottish Government considers that the use of this power can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. The making of procedural rules for social landlords to follow when reviewing their decisions to seek recovery of possession is an administrative matter.

PART 3 – PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING

Section 21 – Power to transfer civil cases relating to Houses in Multiple Occupation from the sheriff to the First-tier Tribunal.

- Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
- Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure
Provision

20. Section 21 provides that Ministers may by regulations transfer jurisdiction for cases relating to Houses in Multiple Occupation (HMO) from the sheriff to the First-tier Tribunal (FTT). The cases which could be transferred under the power arise under specific provisions in Part 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006. These cases relate to:

- Appeals by landlords against decisions of local authorities regarding HMO licensing (for example, decisions to grant, revoke or refuse licences);
- Requests by local authorities to extend the 12 month period for considering applications for HMO licences; and
- Powers to ensure that work required under an HMO amenity notice can go ahead.

Reason for Taking Power

21. The Scottish Government wishes to improve the consistency and efficiency of decision making for cases relating to the private rented sector by transferring civil cases from the courts to the FTT.

22. The HMO licensing regime plays an important role in the regulation of the private rented sector and, given that most other PRS cases are to be transferred to the FTT, the consistent approach would be to transfer HMO licensing cases to the FTT as well. However, the possible transfer of cases relating to HMOs was not explored in the consultation ‘Better Dispute Resolution in Housing’. The Scottish Government view is that further consideration is required before a decision is taken on whether jurisdiction for these cases should be transferred.

23. In addition, the HMO licensing regime is also relevant to properties under different tenures, including some social rented sector properties. Consideration needs to be given to whether it would be appropriate to transfer all HMO licensing cases to the FTT and whether it would be practicable to transfer only those cases which relate to the PRS.

Choice of Procedure

24. As this power will require the amendment of primary legislation the Scottish Government considers that affirmative procedure would be appropriate. This would allow the Parliament the opportunity for full consideration of provision it is proposed to make.

Section 23(1)(a) amends section 22 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 by inserting new subsection (1B) – Power to specify persons who may make an application to the Private Rented Housing Panel in respect of the Repairing Standard.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure
Provision

25. New subsection (1B)(b) of section 22 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 (“the 2006 Act”) as inserted by section 23(1)(a) of the Bill provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order specify a person who may make an application to the Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP) for a determination of whether a landlord has complied with the repairing standard.

Reason for Taking Power

26. The Scottish Government wishes to expand access to the PRHP for the purposes of further enhancing local authority powers to tackle the problem of substandard housing. Subsection (1B)(a) therefore allows local authorities to apply to the PRHP for a determination regarding compliance with the repairing standard.

27. The Scottish Government recognises that there may be parties other than local authorities with an interest in ensuring minimum standards of property condition are met and consider that those parties may seek to enforce the repairing standard through a local authority application to the PRHP. However, the power to specify persons who may apply to the PRHP could be exercised in the future if there is evidence that there are such interested parties, that might require a direct route of access to the PRHP to enforce the repairing standard.

Choice of Procedure

28. The Scottish Government considers that the power to specify those persons, other than local authorities, who may apply to the PRHP for a determination of whether a landlord is meeting their repairing standard duties would not warrant Parliamentary debate. The power does not allow for the amendment of primary legislation and therefore, negative procedure is appropriate.

Section 24(7) amends paragraph 8(1) of schedule 2 to the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 by inserting reference to new subsection 22(1A) - Power to make further provision about the making or determination of applications made under section 22(1) and 22(1A).

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

29. Paragraph 8(1) of Schedule 2 to the 2006 Act, as amended by section 24(7) of the Bill, provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, make further provision about the making or determination of applications made under section 22(1A) of that Act. Section 22(1A) enables an application by a third party to be made to the PRHP to enforce the repairing standard.

Reason for Taking Power

30. The Scottish Government wishes to expand access to the Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP) by enabling third party applications for the purpose of determining compliance with the repairing standard. Section 22(1A) provides that local authorities and other persons specified by order may make such applications to the PRHP.

31. The existing power under paragraph 8(1) of Schedule 2 to the 2006 Act to make provision about repairing standard applications to the PRHP is extended so that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, make further provision about the making or determination of applications made by local authorities and third party applicants.

Choice of Procedure

32. The Scottish Government considers that the making of further provisions on the procedure relating to determination of applications made under section 22(1A) is an administrative matter which should not merit a higher degree of scrutiny than that which already applies to applications under section 22(1). Therefore negative procedure is appropriate.

PART 4 – LETTING AGENTS

Section 26(2)(b) – Power to prescribe the information that is to be contained in the public register of letting agents in relation to each person on the register.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

33. Section 26 requires Scottish Ministers to establish and maintain a register of letting agents. The register must contain an entry for each person in the register. The entry must set out the letting agent’s name and address. Section 26(2)(b) confers upon Scottish Ministers a power to prescribe further information that will appear on the public register relating to the letting agent, if they consider this information appropriate.

Reason for Taking Power

34. The power allows flexibility when developing the detail of the register. The purpose of making the register publicly available is so that all interested parties can see if a letting agent has been entered on the register. It will be important for the register to provide sufficient information so that each entry can be clearly identified. Section 26(2)(a) provides that at present this should be the name and address of the person. However, as the detail of the register is developed it may be considered appropriate to include additional information.

Choice of Procedure

35. In the Bill, it is provided that the information contained in the register of letting agents should be publicly available. What, if any, further information requires to be contained in the register and made publicly available is an administrative matter to provide flexibility on the detail of the register for which the Scottish Government considers that negative procedure is appropriate.

Section 27(2)(f) – Power to prescribe further information that must be supplied in an application for registration in the register of letting agents.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

36. Section 27 sets out a list of information that must be supplied in an application for registration in the register of letting agents. Section 27(2)(f) confers upon the Scottish Ministers a power, by regulations, to prescribe additional information that must be supplied.

Reason for Taking Power

37. Section 27(2) sets out the basic information that must be supplied in an application for registration. However, as the operational detail of the register is developed, it may become apparent that certain additional information would assist the administration of the register. This power allows this to be required. Any additional information which the Scottish Ministers prescribe does not require to be made publicly available, unless it is also prescribed in regulations under the section 26(2)(b) power.

Choice of Procedure

38. The Scottish Government considers that the power is concerned with operational matters relating to the administration of the register and does not merit any scrutiny higher than negative procedure.

Section 30(4) – Power to modify the material that must be taken into account when deciding if a person is a fit and proper person to be entered on the register of letting agents.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

39. Section 30 sets out the material which the Scottish Ministers must take into account when determining if a person is a fit and proper person to be a registered letting agent. These materials include convictions for certain offences, contraventions of housing law, statutory codes, and failures to comply with the regulatory regime set up by this Bill. Section 30(4) confers upon the Scottish Ministers a power, by order, to modify the list of materials.
Reason for Taking Power

40. The power enables the list of relevant convictions, contraventions and failures to comply to be modified if this is considered appropriate in light of experience. If the nature of the letting agency industry and its practices change over time, it may be appropriate to alter the list of relevant offences, contraventions and failures. In addition, future legislation which creates new offences or modifies existing ones may be considered relevant, and this power would allow adaptations to reflect such relevant changes.

Choice of Procedure

41. As the power involves the modification of primary legislation, the Scottish Government considers that affirmative procedure is appropriate for any adaptation of the requirements.

Section 32(2)(c) – Power to specify any additional type of document or communication in which a registered letting agent must include their letting agent registration number.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

42. Section 32(2) requires registered letting agents to include their letting agent registration number in certain documents and communications. The power at section 32(2)(c) allows the Scottish Ministers to add to the list of types of documents or communications in which the registration number must be included.

Reason for Taking Power

43. The register of letting agents is likely to be in place for many years. This power will allow flexibility in the future, in relation to potential changes in the way that letting agents carry out communications with clients and the public – for example in relation to changes in communications technology and methods or in industry practices.

Choice of Procedure

44. The basic principle that requires the inclusion of the letting agent registered number in communications is set out in the Bill. This power relates only to the detail of which documents and communications are included and therefore the Scottish Government considers that negative procedure is appropriate.

Section 41(1) – Power to set out a code of practice which makes provisions about the standards of practice of persons who carry out letting agency work.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure
Provision

45. Section 41 provides for Scottish Ministers to set out, by regulations, a code of practice with which all persons carrying out letting agency work must comply. Before finalising the code, Ministers must carry out consultation on a draft of it under section 41(3).

Reason for Taking Power

46. The code of practice will contain standards to which all persons carrying out letting agency work must adhere. This may require a detailed set of requirements to be developed, which the Scottish Government considers is most appropriately dealt with by regulations, rather than in the Bill itself. This will also allow for flexibility should the code of practice need to be adjusted in light of experience and having regard to any changes within the industry.

Choice of Procedure

47. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate, particularly in view of the obligation to consult with key stakeholders on a draft version of the code before regulations are made under section 41(3).

Section 47(1) – Power to provide that the functions and jurisdictions of the sheriff in relation to actions between letting agents and landlords/tenants are transferred to the First-tier Tribunal.

</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Regulations made by statutory instrument</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>Negative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

Provision

48. Section 47(1) provides that the Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, transfer jurisdiction for cases relating to letting agents from the sheriff courts to the First-tier Tribunal. The cases which could be transferred are those between letting agents and tenants or letting agents and landlords, relating to the carrying out of letting agency work.

Reason for Taking Power

49. The Scottish Government wishes to improve the consistency and efficiency of decision making for cases relating to the private rented sector by transferring civil cases from the courts to the First-tier Tribunal. Section 43 of the Bill provides that cases relating to alleged breaches of the code of practice (established by section 41) will be heard by the First-tier Tribunal. It is therefore consistent that other cases relating to letting agency work, which are currently within the jurisdiction of the sheriff courts, may also be transferred to the First-tier Tribunal at an appropriate point. Consideration needs to be given to matters of timing, volume and type of cases to be transferred before final decisions about transferring cases are taken.
Choice of Procedure

50. The Scottish Government considers that negative procedure is appropriate for the section 47(1) power, because the principle that letting agency disputes will be considered in the First-tier Tribunal is contained in the Bill, and therefore will have been subject to full Parliamentary scrutiny. The power to regulate transfers is an administrative matter and is in keeping with the principle that the First-tier Tribunal is the appropriate place for letting agency disputes.

Section 51(3) – Power to modify the meaning of “letting agency work” in relation to Part 4 of this Bill.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

51. Section 51(1) and (2) defines “letting agency work”. Section 51(3) confers upon the Scottish Ministers a power to modify, by order, this meaning.

Reason for Taking Power

52. The provisions in Part 4 of the Bill are likely to regulate the letting agency sector for many years. The private rented housing sector has changed over time, and may continue to change in the future. This power provides flexibility to adapt in light of these changes or other experience the definition of what is considered as “letting agency work” and therefore who and what is covered by the regulatory regime.

Choice of Procedure

53. The meaning of “letting agency work” is central to the provisions of Part 4. In effect, it defines which persons are considered to be letting agents, and therefore which persons are required to comply with the regulatory regime set out. For that reason, the Scottish Government considers that affirmative procedure is appropriate.

PART 5 – MOBILE HOME SITES WITH PERMANENT RESIDENTS

Section 54 - (inserts section 32C into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960) – Power to make regulations concerning fees for site licence applications

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure
This document relates to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

Provision

54. New section 32C of the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 ("the 1960 Act") gives a local authority the power to charge a fee for a site licence application for a permanent caravan site. Subsections (3) and (4) allow the Scottish Ministers to make regulations about the charging of such fees, which can include specifying matters a local authority must take into account when setting such a fee, and specifying the maximum fee that can be charged.

Reason for Taking Power

55. It is expected that local authorities will charge a fee that reflects the cost of processing and deciding on site licence applications, including carrying out a routine inspection during the licence period. The Scottish Government is aware that stakeholders have a range of views on whether fees should be fixed nationally or at local level. It is likely that the costs of carrying out licensing functions will vary between local authorities. It is therefore considered appropriate for the fee level to vary between different authorities. However, there should be clarity and consistency in the matters to be taken into account by all local authorities in setting reasonable fees. Excessively high fees could have a significant impact on site owning businesses. It is therefore considered appropriate to take the power to make more detailed provisions about the factors that a local authority must take into account when deciding on such a fee and a power set a maximum fee if that should prove necessary.

Choice of Procedure

56. It is considered appropriate that this power is subject to negative procedure. The principle that such fees can be charged is contained in the Bill, and therefore will have been subject to full Parliamentary scrutiny. Any regulations made under this power will provide details that supplement the operation of the fee provided for in the Bill, and are therefore appropriately dealt with through the negative procedure.

Section 56 - (inserts section 32J into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960) – Power to make an order to change the time period for which a site licence, when issued, is valid.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

57. Section 56 inserts section 32J into the 1960 Act. This section makes provision for the duration of site licences for relevant permanent sites. Under subsection (1)(b)(ii) a site licence remains in force for 3 years. Subsection (2) allows the Scottish Ministers to change that period to a different number of years.
Reason for Taking Power

58. The Bill replaces the existing system where site licences are valid in perpetuity with one where site licences are valid for a fixed number of years. A 3 year licence period received significant support in consultation responses and is considered an appropriate period between reviews of whether a licence holder continues to meet the fit and proper person test. However, there are also reasonable arguments in favour of longer licensing periods. The move from perpetual to fixed term licences is a significant change from previous practice and, once the new licensing regime becomes established, it may be desirable to review whether 3 years remains the most appropriate licence period. It is considered appropriate to take the power to vary the licence period in secondary legislation, rather than requiring a further Bill to adjust licence periods.

Choice of Procedure

59. This power allows the Scottish Ministers to change the period for which a site licence, when issued, is valid. As this would change the licence period set out in the Bill, exercise of this power would be a significant measure. It is therefore considered appropriate that it is subject to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny that the affirmative procedure would provide.

Section 60 - (inserts section 32N into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960) – Power to make regulations concerning the procedure to be followed in relation to the application, transfer, and appeals relating to site licences.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

60. New section 32N of the 1960 Act gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make provision in relation to the procedures to be followed in relation to an application for a site licence, an application for consent to a transfer and the transfer of a site licence on death. It also allows Scottish to make provision regarding appeals relating to a decision by a local authority to refuse a licence application, to transfer a licence, to refuse consent to a licence transfer, and to revoke a licence.

61. Regulations can include provision in relation to the procedures to be followed by a person following the transfer of a licence, information to be provided by a person making an application for a site licence application or an application for renewal of the same, and the procedure to be followed after an application is determined. It allows the Scottish Ministers to set in regulations time limits relating to a site licence application, a transfer of a site licence, the determination or consideration by the local authority, and appeals. It enables the Scottish Ministers to set out the circumstances in which the notification of a decision on an application for a site licence or on an application for consent to transfer a licence must include reasons. It further allows the Scottish Ministers to make provision regarding the procedure to be followed by the person making the appeal and the determination and consequence of appeals.
Reason for Taking Power

62. This provision enables Ministers to set out the procedures and time limits to be followed in relation to parts of the site licensing system. It is considered that this level of procedural detail is best dealt with through regulations, as these procedures will sit within the broad framework for site licensing that is created by the Bill.

Choice of Procedure

63. It is considered appropriate that this power is subject to negative procedure because it will be used to set details of procedure and timescales. These will supplement the overarching framework for handling site licences set out in the Bill.

Section 61 - (inserts section 32O into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960) – Power to make an order varying the material a local authority must have regard to in applying the fit and proper person test.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

64. Section 61 inserts section 32O into the 1960 Act. This section sets out the material a local authority must have regard to when deciding if someone is a fit and proper person when considering issuing, renewing, or transferring a site licence. This material includes convictions for specified offences, and breaches of specified areas of law (such as the law relating to caravans). Subsection (6) allows the Scottish Ministers to make an order subject to the affirmative procedure to amend the list of material a local authority must take into account.

Reason for Taking Power

65. The Scottish Government wants to ensure that a local authority is able to take into account all the relevant information when applying the fit and proper person test. It is therefore appropriate to allow for a mechanism to amend that test, to reflect developments in the law and to take into account material that in the future is deemed relevant to the decision on whether someone is a fit and proper person to hold a site licence.

Choice of Procedure

66. The Scottish Government believes the affirmative resolution procedure is appropriate in this case. It gives the Scottish Ministers power to vary the list of material without the need for another Bill, but with a level of Parliamentary scrutiny which is suitable to amending primary legislation.
Section 63 - (inserts section 32T into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960) – Power to make regulations concerning maximum fines for having a site without a licence, and breaching licence conditions.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

67. Section 63 of the Bill inserts new sections 32R and 32S into the 1960 Act and section 64 inserts section 32V. These set the maximum fine on conviction of operating a caravan site without a licence (£50,000), the maximum fine on conviction of breaching licence conditions (£10,000), and the maximum fine on conviction of failure to comply with an improvement notice (£10,000). New section 32T of the 1960 Act gives the Scottish Ministers the power to amend these maximum fine levels, through an order subject to the affirmative procedure.

Reason for Taking Power

68. The Bill specifies maximum fine levels which are significantly above level 5 on the standard scale set under the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. These maximum fines are not expressed by reference to a point on the standard scale and will therefore be unaffected by future changes to the fines on that standard scale. It is therefore considered appropriate to allow for maximum fines under these Bill provisions to be amended by order in the future. The licensing system established by the Bill may potentially be in place for many years (the previous system was established in 1960), and it is considered sensible to provide a mechanism to change the fine levels, enabling them to be adjusted in line with inflation and other relevant factors without the need for new primary legislation.

Choice of Procedure

69. Changing the maximum fine a court can impose following conviction for an offence is an important measure, and therefore requires a suitable level of Parliamentary scrutiny. The Scottish Government therefore believes the affirmative procedure is appropriate in this case.

Section 66 - (inserts section 32Y into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960) – Power to make regulations about the appointment of an interim manager

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

70. Section 66 inserts section 32Y into the 1960 Act. This section allows a local authority, in certain situations, to apply to a sheriff to appoint an interim manager for a mobile home site. Subsection (5) allows the Scottish Ministers to make further provision in regulations about the appointment of an interim manager. Subsection (6) lists particular matters which could be covered in such regulations. These include the powers of an interim manager, the qualifications an interim manager must hold, and the actions an interim manager must carry out. Regulations may also make provision for criminal offences which are to apply to failures to comply with any regulations relating to interim managers. This could be used, for example, to make it an offence for a site licence holder to refuse to provide the necessary assistance to an interim manager, or for the interim manager to be prevented from entering a site.

Reason for Taking Power

71. The Bill includes provisions on the appointment of an interim manager. However many of the issues that flow from an interim manager’s appointment, such as an interim manager’s powers, qualifications, and the way they handle property in their care, are areas that are likely to require detailed provisions. It is considered that this level of detail is most appropriately dealt with in regulations, rather than in the Bill itself. This will also allow greater flexibility to adjust procedural requirements in relation to the appointment of interim managers.

Choice of Procedure

72. The Scottish Government believes the negative procedure provides the appropriate level of scrutiny for these measures, as they will set out detailed matters that are likely to be necessary as a result of the Bill’s provisions around interim managers. Many of the matters such regulations would be likely to cover are also explicitly set out in section 32Y(6), which would be inserted into the 1960 Act by the Bill.

PART 7 – MISCELLANEOUS

Section 77 – inserts subsections (3D) to (3F) into section 11 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 – new subsection (3D) - Power by order to disapply the right conferred under section 11 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 to redeem a heritable security after 20 years, in relation to securities of debts of specified descriptions.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

73. Section 77 confers on the Scottish Ministers a power by order to disapply the right to redeem a heritable security after 20 years conferred by section 11 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 in relation to a heritable security which is in security of a debt of a description specified in the order.

Reason for taking the power

74. Section 11 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 (“the 1974 Act”) gives the debtor under a heritable security over a dwelling house the right to redeem the security from 20 years after the date of its creation. The statutory redemption terms allow borrowers to redeem a loan at its original value. They therefore do not fit situations where the creditor wishes to secure payment of a share in the equity value of the property.

75. Existing equity share schemes run by the Scottish Government have a break clause at year 19 of the agreement. If a shared equity owner fails to grant a replacement standard security in favour of the Scottish Ministers (a new agreement which is essentially the existing agreement agreed between parties afresh), the break clause obliges the shared equity owner to repay the Scottish Ministers’ equity share.

76. However, the Council of Mortgage Lenders and some of its members have expressed an unwillingness to participate in the Scottish Government’s new Help to Buy scheme and its Low Cost Initiative for First Time Buyers (LIFT) shared equity schemes. This is because an impending change to Financial Conduct Authority rules will require them to consider the affordability of their first charge loans taking into account any break clauses. Without lender participation in these schemes, they will not be viable.

77. The current power in section 11 of the 1974 Act to allow borrowers to waive the right of redemption could not be used to address this problem, because it relates to bodies of debtors (such as registered social landlords), as opposed to types of creditors or types of heritable securities. The new order making power being inserted into the 1974 Act by the Bill will allow the Scottish Ministers to disapply the right to redeem a heritable security over a dwelling house, in relation to specified securities and specified creditors (for example the Scottish Government) under particular schemes.

Choice of procedure

78. It is considered appropriate that this power is subject to negative procedure following the same approach as the order making power under section 11(3C) of the 1974 Act. It is not considered that using the power to disapply the right to redeem heritable securities in relation to descriptions of debt specified in the order requires more detailed scrutiny by Parliament on each occasion the power is used.

PART 8 – GENERAL

Section 83 – Ancillary provision

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure if adding to, replacing or omitting text in an Act, otherwise negative procedure

Provision

79. Section 83 confers a power on the Scottish Ministers, by order, to make such supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in connection with, the provisions in the Bill.
This document relates to the Housing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 41) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013

Reason for taking power

80. As with any new body of law, the Bill may give rise to a need for a range of ancillary provision. The power to make ancillary provision is considered necessary in order to ensure that the policy intentions of the Bill are achieved. For example, it is possible that unforeseen issues will arise which require further provision to be made or the further modification of the existing law. This power would allow such provision to be made without the need to make further primary legislation.

81. The Bill already includes a number of consequential amendments to related legislation (see schedules 1 and 2) but the power would allow the Scottish Ministers to make further changes should a need be identified, or change be expedient. It may, however, be that further provision is necessary in order fully and properly to implement the Bill’s provisions. The Scottish Government considers that the order-making power is necessary to allow for this flexibility, especially in light of previous operational experience. Without this power, it might be necessary to make further primary legislation to deal with a matter which is clearly within the policy intentions of the Bill. The Scottish Government considers that this would not be an effective use of resources by the Parliament or the Scottish Government.

82. The power, while potentially wide, is limited to the extent that it can only be exercised if the Scottish Ministers consider it necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in connection with, provision made by the Bill.

Choice of procedure

83. Any order made under section 83 which textually amends any Act is subject to the affirmative procedure. Where such an order does not seek to textually amend any Act, it is considered by the Scottish Government that negative procedure provides an appropriate degree of scrutiny.

Provision

84. Section 85(3) confers a power on the Scottish Ministers, by order, to bring the provisions of the Bill into force on such day or days as the Scottish Ministers appoint. Section 85(5) provides that such an order may include any necessary or expedient transitional, transitory or saving provision. It is usual to allow such provision in conjunction with a power to commence the provisions of a Bill.
Reason for taking power

85. Some formal sections of the Bill are commenced on the day of Royal Assent. The Scottish Ministers consider it appropriate for the substantive provisions of the Bill to be commenced at such a time as they appoint to be suitable. It is usual practice for such commencement provisions to be dealt with by subordinate legislation.

86. An exception is made for an order-making power at section 77 of the Bill, which it is intended to exercise soon after the Bill receives Royal Assent. A limitation is imposed in relation to commencement of the abolition of the right to buy social housing, to ensure that those who are in a position to exercise the right have an opportunity to do so.

Choice of procedure

87. As is usual for commencement orders, the default laying requirement in section 30 of the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 applies.

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

INTRODUCTION

Parliamentary scrutiny
1. The Housing (Scotland) Bill[1] was introduced to the Scottish Parliament on 21 November 2013 by Nicola Sturgeon, Deputy First Minister and Cabinet Secretary for Infrastructure, Investment and Cities.

2. The Parliamentary Bureau designated the Infrastructure and Capital Investment (ICI) Committee as the lead committee for the Bill. The lead committee is required, under Rule 9.4.1 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, to report to the Parliament on the general principles of the Bill.

Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee consideration
3. The ICI Committee agreed its approach to evidence taking at its meeting on 18 December 2013. The Committee issued a call for evidence on 20th December and received 105 responses. Links to all the submissions are available at Annexe C.

4. The Committee took oral evidence at eight meetings. Links to the Official Reports of those meetings are available at Annexe B.

5. The Committee held an external Committee meeting as part of Parliament Day in Dumbarton on 24 February 2014, and took evidence on aspects of the Housing (Scotland) Bill during that session. The Committee also held informal meetings with local tenants’ groups, housing associations and local authority representatives in Dumbarton to discuss those parts of the Bill which deal with social housing.

6. The Committee would like to thank all of those individuals and organisations who provided evidence in writing, at Committee meetings and during informal discussions.

Purpose of the Bill

7. The Bill makes a range of provisions related to housing in Scotland, including the abolition of the right to buy social houses, the management of social housing, the operation of the private rented sector, regulation of letting agents, the licensing of sites for mobile homes and private house conditions.

Scottish Government consultation

8. Following the publication of its Strategy and Action Plan – Homes Fit for the 21st Century, the Scottish Government carried out seven consultations on policy areas where it was considering legislation. After this work was undertaken, the Scottish Government refined its proposals and published a consultation paper, Affordable Rented Housing: Creating flexibility for landlords and better outcomes for communities. Paragraph 86 of the Policy Memorandum details the work undertaken to engage with a variety of hard to reach groups. Further information on engagement and the outcomes of the consultation exercises is set out in the Policy Memorandum in the relevant narratives covering each part of the Bill.

9. The Committee also noted that the Scottish Government carried out an Equality Impact Assessment, a summary of which was published on the Scottish Government’s website.

10. The Committee asked all of the witnesses who gave oral evidence for their views on the Scottish Government’s consultation. It was generally felt that the consultation was comprehensive and inclusive. Points were raised by Shelter, Chartered Institute for Housing in Scotland (CIH) and Tenants Participation Advisory Services (TPAS) on measures in the Bill that they considered were not consulted on, specifically section 79 on the Scottish Housing Regulator. The Committee has incorporated views on this provision at the relevant part of this report.

PART 1 – RIGHT TO BUY

11. The purpose of Part 1 of the Bill is to abolish the right to buy (RTB) in the social housing sector in Scotland. The Policy Memorandum states that—

“The Scottish Government wants to end all right to buy…entitlements in Scotland in order to protect and enhance social housing and to safeguard the investment made in social housing over many generations. Ending RTB entitlements contributes to its strategic objective of a wealthier and fairer Scotland and safer and stronger communities.”

and these changes were consolidated under Part III of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987. RTB was subject to subsequent reforms introduced by the Housing (Scotland) Acts of 2001 and 2010. These reforms were designed to provide some protection for existing social rented stock in light of increased demand for social rented housing and to encourage landlords to build new houses without fear of losing them under the RTB. The Bill repeals the relevant right to buy provisions contained within the 1980, 2001 and 2010 Acts.

13. The SPICe briefing on the Bill indicates that, since 1980, around 455,000 tenants have purchased their homes from their social landlord under RTB\(^5\). The Scottish Government estimates that, by ending RTB, around 15,500 houses could be kept in the social sector over a ten year period.\(^6\)

14. The Committee notes that the proposal will impact on the estimated 534,000 existing tenants who have RTB. Of these, 207,000 tenants are estimated to have the preserved RTB, which means they retain a RTB that they held prior to 30 September 2002. The remaining 327,000 have the modernised RTB i.e. that which applied after the introduction of the changes contained in the 2001 Act. However, not all of these tenants will be able to exercise their RTB, either now or within the proposed three-year notice period prior to the abolition of RTB, as they are subject to a limitation, such as when their tenancy is in a pressured area where RTB is suspended.\(^7\)

Abolition of right to buy

15. There was broad support expressed by those who provided oral and written evidence to the Committee for the proposed abolition of RTB. The Committee notes that 83% of respondents to the Scottish Government’s consultation on the proposal to remove the RTB agreed with the proposal to end RTB altogether, including 81% of local authorities, 92% of RSLs, 73% of individuals and 75% of tenant groups.\(^8\)

16. Those witnesses representing the interests of local authorities strongly supported the abolition of RTB to allow social housing to be retained within the sector. Councillor Harry McGuigan, of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (COSLA), expressed the view that “the abolition of the right to buy is absolutely necessary if we are to be able to meet the requirements and demands for housing in our communities.”\(^9\) Jim Hayton of the Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers (ALACHO) advised the Committee that local authorities had reached this view after “weighing up the pros and cons of retention versus abolition of the right to buy” and reaching the conclusion that “having available in perpetuity a supply of affordable rented housing that would otherwise be lost to the sector outweighed the legitimate aspirations of some people...to owner occupation.”

17. The benefits which the abolition of RTB would bring social landlords in terms of strategic and financial planning were highlighted by several witnesses, including the Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (GWSF), COSLA, CIH and various tenants’ groups. For example, David Bookbinder of CIH stated—

“The key benefit is supply...The certainty that abolishing right to buy will give local authorities, landlord local authorities and housing associations with regard to their strategic and business planning roles—they will know how much rental income they will have and how much stock they can use for allocations and homelessness—will be a huge benefit.”

18. Rosemary Brotchie of Shelter Scotland welcomed the fact that the abolition would also mean that better quality and types of social housing would be retained within the sector.

19. Broad support for the abolition was given by the various tenants’ groups who gave evidence to the Committee during its external meeting in Dumbarton. Hugh McClung, of the Central Region Tenants Network, highlighted what he felt this would mean for the sector, stating—

“...tenants up and down the land have been given a significant boost because landlords have protected stock and, with that, landlords will see a better influx and be able to plan ahead for their financial structures and rent accounts. They will be able to look at how best to preserve that stock.”

20. Other stakeholders suggested that further longer-term benefits might be realised, such as the potential for reducing the numbers of lower-quality properties in the private rented sector. Tony Cain of ALACHO asserted that “up to a third of all the properties that have been sold under the right to buy are now in the private rented sector” and that this had been “driving the growth of lower-quality private renting in many already pressured communities, which is problematic.”

21. Andy Young of the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations (SFHA) pointed to a study that had highlighted examples of ex-RTB properties now in the private rented sector with rents almost double the amount that the social rent would be and suggested that “...UK-wide, that is costing the public purse up to £2 billion a year in excess housing benefit.” He suggested to the Committee that the abolition of RTB might also impact positively by helping to address this situation.

22. The Committee also explored with witnesses the impact the abolition of RTB would have in terms of increasing the overall social housing stock, suggesting that in the short term it was unlikely to create a dramatic increase in vacancies. Alan Benson of GWSF, acknowledged this, but highlighted longer-term benefits, saying that—

“...abolishing the right to buy will not suddenly create 1,000 new vacancies every year because tenants will still be in those houses, but at least there will be no chance of those houses being lost to the sector over time.”

23. The Committee noted that statistical information produced during its scrutiny of the Bill suggested that expressions of interest in the purchase of social houses had increased markedly in the past few years, although the accuracy of this information was questioned by COSLA representatives. The Minister for Housing and Welfare (“the Minister”) indicated that the Scottish Government had anticipated that there would be an increase following the announcement of its proposal to end RTB. She explained that, although there had been an increase in RTB sales in the last quarter, she did not expect this to continue.

24. Witnesses were questioned on whether, if the abolition provisions are agreed, there could be a sharp increase in the number of social houses sold as tenants sought to exercise their right to buy whilst the opportunity still remained. In response, Tony Cain of ALACHO said—

“It is possible...that there may be a rise in right-to-buy sales in the next 18 months to two years or however long the sunset clause is for the right to buy. However, it is preferable as a way of extracting ourselves from a policy position that has definitely had its day...to take the risk and go through that process to get to a place where it is possible for us to plan the provision of housing over the long term.”

25. The Minister informed the Committee that a mortgage market review was currently taking place which was likely to result in “more stringent mortgage regulations...to ensure that, when people are borrowing to buy a house, they can afford the house”. She explained that the Scottish Government will be providing tenants with guidance “so that they realise that buying a house under the right to buy has disadvantages as well as advantages.”

26. The majority of the Committee\(^{23}\) shares the views of those who provided evidence that the abolition of RTB will bring significant benefits to the social housing sector. The retention of social housing stock moving forward will assist social landlords in their strategic and financial planning and contribute to the maintenance of sustainable social housing supply levels. The majority of the Committee\(^{24}\) therefore welcomes and supports the provisions in the Bill which will end the right to buy in Scotland.

Three-year notice period

27. The Scottish Government’s policy intention is that RTB will not be abolished until the end of a three-year period from the date on which the Bill receives Royal Assent, and this is provided for by section 85(4) (commencement section) of the Bill. When questioned on the rationale for opting for this timescale, Linda Leslie of the Scottish Government Bill team explained that—

“Ministers had to consider the effect on human rights of ending the right to buy. Our view was that there were potential issues under the European convention on human rights, so the decision that the notice period will be three years was made on the basis that that is a fair and reasonable timescale for tenants who have and can exercise their right to buy to exercise it.”\(^{25}\)

28. There was strong support expressed in evidence for reducing the three-year period, with a range of suggestions for alternative notice periods being made. For example, Rosemary Brotchie of Shelter Scotland was of the view that a period of six months to a year might be sufficient on the basis that awareness levels of the abolition would be high as the Bill continued its parliamentary passage and that “people will be considering from now on whether purchasing is the right thing for them.”\(^{26}\) David Bookbinder of CIH advocated a reduction to a period of two years and said—

“We believe that a period of two years would enable tenants to consider whether they want to buy and to progress the purchase if they so wish, while still allowing the Government to be seen to act reasonably in terms of human rights implications. A period of two years rather than three would also give landlords more stability and certainty about future finances, and it would perhaps also limit the period in which there might be some peaking of sales.”

---

\(^{23}\) Alex Johnstone dissented.

29. Councillor Harry McGuigan of COSLA also expressed the view that the notice period should be shortened, whilst ensuring that there was an appropriate balance between “the rights of an individual and our need to retain and grow an affordable housing stock”. He was of the view that this could be achieved if managed sensibly and with sensitivity.

30. From a tenants’ group perspective, Kevin Paterson of Glasgow and Eilean Siar Tenants Network said that “we are missing an opportunity to keep houses that we will lose during the next three years. Those losses could be stopped if we stopped the right to buy straight away”. Lesley Baird of TPAS highlighted the strength of feeling on this issue amongst tenants groups she had met. She said—

“. . .the majority of tenants at the sessions we held were absolutely behind stopping it now and not in three years...There are certainly very strong feelings about the issue.”

31. The Committee was also made aware of a practice whereby third parties from the private sector might seek to persuade tenants to purchase a property, provide a mortgage facility to enable them to do so, and subsequently let it back to them. Rosemary Brotchie was of the view that a longer notice period might provide “potential for such companies to build up more of an inroad into tenants who may not be considering their options quite as carefully as we would like.”

32. Andy Young of SFHA questioned why the Scottish Government appeared to be concerned about the possibility of legal challenge related to the period of notice when there are other housing policies which he considered would be more susceptible to such challenge, such as the removal of RTB from those who live in pressured areas.

33. When appearing before the Committee, the Minister acknowledged that whilst there was broad opposition to the three year notice period proposed in the Bill, there was no consensus amongst stakeholders on the most appropriate length of an alternative, shorter notice period. She indicated that she would reflect on alternative proposals following the publication of the Committee’s Stage 1 report. The Minister made clear, however, that the Scottish Government’s objective was “...to balance the need to protect the housing stock against the tenant’s right to buy”.

34. Colin Brown, the Scottish Government’s legal adviser on the Bill, explained that there was a need to ensure that the setting of a notice period on the abolition of the RTB took account of the rights of those tenants who currently have a right to buy. He said—

“People who currently have the right to buy have something that would be recognised as a right in ECHR terms, so any interference with that has to be proportionate. There has to be a balance, as the Minister said, between the justification for interference with the right and giving people an appropriate period to consider whether they want to exercise rights that they currently have before they lose them. That is not a purely ECHR point. There are wider issues to do with people having an opportunity to consider what is appropriate for their circumstances and to take proper advice on that.”

35. Mr Brown also made clear that the three-year notice period was selected “not because it was believed to be a minimum period to ensure ECHR compliance but because it was believed to be the right period”.

36. The Committee understands and accepts the reasoning behind the Scottish Government’s proposal to ensure that there is a reasonable notice period to allow those with an existing RTB to consider whether they wish to exercise their entitlement. However, the majority of the Committee shares the view expressed by the majority of stakeholders that the three-year notice period is excessive.

37. The majority of the Committee therefore recommends that this should be reduced to a period of one year from the date on which the Bill receives Royal Assent and calls on the Scottish Government to bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to achieve this.

38. The majority of the Committee considers that this period would provide an appropriate balance between the realisation of the benefits which the abolition of RTB will bring to social landlords and the provision of adequate notice for those who have a RTB entitlement to take advice, consider the implications of exercising their right and make an application.

39. There was a call from both the Tenants Information Service and TPAS for clear guidance to be provided to both tenants and landlords on the implications of the legislative change and the process leading up to the agreed date of the abolition, detailing the rights of tenants to exercise their RTB within the notice period.

40. The Committee agrees that this is essential to avoid any confusion arising amongst tenants in relation to this significant legislative change and calls on the Scottish Government to produce appropriate guidance material, facilitate its distribution via social landlords and make it available online.

Pressured areas

41. Local authorities have the power to make, amend and revoke pressured area designations, and it would be within their gift to decide to revoke or apply for a new pressured area designation prior to the abolition of the RTB. Local authorities could also make new pressured area designations within the three year period, as the Bill does not prevent this. Linda Leslie explained the background to the Scottish Government’s consideration of the treatment of pressured areas as the Bill was being developed—

"Local authorities are the strategic bodies that have the power to make, amend and revoke pressured area designations. Ministers considered whether there should be a measure to suspend those designations during the notice period, but on balance they felt that that would take away the flexibility of local authorities to respond to housing needs in their areas."

42. When asked for a view on the likelihood that tenants in pressured areas might bring forward legal challenges if they felt they had been unable to exercise their right to buy, the Committee was advised by Colin Brown, Scottish Government legal adviser, that whilst there was potential for such challenges, these would not be expected to succeed.

PART 2 – SOCIAL HOUSING

43. Part 2 of the Bill proposes a range of provisions which will impact on the management of social housing in Scotland. The Bill’s Policy Memorandum indicates that these provisions are intended to provide “better outcomes for communities” by—

- increasing the flexibility that landlords have when allocating houses;
- allowing landlords to make best use of social housing;
- giving landlords more tools to tackle antisocial behaviour;
- providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short Scottish secure tenancies (short SSTs), by strengthening their rights in a number of ways; and
- clarifying existing legislation on how short SSTs operate.

41 Policy Memorandum, para. 63.
Allocation of social housing

Reasonable preference in the allocation of social housing

44. Section 3 of the Bill proposes to change the reasonable preference provisions as set out in section 20(1) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 ("the 1987 Act") which governs to whom social landlords must give "reasonable preference" in the allocation of houses.

45. Background information on the legislation and practice in relation to allocations in the social housing sector and the reasonable preference provisions contained within the 1987 Act is provided in the SPICe briefing on the Bill.\(^\text{42}\)

46. Section 3 would replace the existing provisions with the following criteria—

- those who are homeless or threatened with homelessness and have unmet housing needs;
- those who are living under unsatisfactory housing conditions and have unmet housing needs; and
- tenants of houses held by the social landlord which the social landlord considers to be under-occupied.

47. Under the 1987 Act, those applicants falling into the existing reasonable preference groups must be given reasonable preference for housing, with no other qualification or criteria required to be met. The Bill proposes to change the existing position through the addition of a new criterion – applicants must also have unmet housing needs, which it defines as "needs that are not capable of being met by other housing options which are available".

48. The Bill also proposes that landlords must give their own existing tenants (but not tenants of other social landlords) reasonable preference if they want to transfer and are living in housing which the landlord considers to be under-occupied. The Bill does not require existing tenants who are seeking a transfer to demonstrate that they have unmet housing need.\(^\text{43}\)

49. The Committee sought views on the likely impact of the removal of some of the existing categories and whether this would provide social landlords with flexibility when they are allocating housing

50. Councillor Harry McGuigan of COSLA welcomed the proposed provisions and stressed the importance of social landlords being able to manage their housing stock in a way that best meets their particular local circumstances. He said it would be unreasonable if this was prevented because "an allocation policy is riveted in a certain fashion."\(^\text{44}\) David Bookbinder of CIH also indicated support for the proposals, stating that the "amendment to the reasonable preference criteria is modest and very sensible. It is not a radical change, but I do not think... that there was a need for radical change.”

51. Rosemary Brotchie also supported the changes, indicating that “Shelter Scotland has long argued that the reasonable preference groups in the current legislation are outdated and out of sync with current social housing allocation practice.” However, she suggested that the application of the provisions should be monitored in order to “keep an eye on how the reasonable preference categories are being identified locally, to ensure that housing need is being met on an on-going basis.”

52. The Committee heard from both Shelter and the GWSF, and from Homeless Action Scotland in written evidence, that the term “unmet housing needs” in section 3 could benefit from some clarification. However, when this issue was raised with the Minister, she indicated that “It will be for landlords to assess housing needs in line with their framework, as amended by the Bill, and with any guidance that we publish. The assessment of any housing needs or ‘reasonable preference’ is for the landlord”.

53. The Committee accepts that it will be a matter for landlords to assess housing needs in the manner suggested by the Minister. However, it agrees with the suggestion made by some stakeholders that further clarification on the types of “unmet housing needs” the Scottish Government envisages being covered by section 3 would be beneficial. The Committee therefore calls on the Scottish Government to provide further information on its policy intentions in this area and to indicate how it will reflect these in associated guidance.

54. The Committee is content with what are regarded by stakeholders as modest but beneficial changes to the “reasonable preference” criteria which will provide social landlords with greater flexibility when allocating houses.

55. However, the Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide information on the range of circumstances it expects to be addressed by this provision and to indicate whether it intends to provide guidance to support its implementation.

56. The Committee notes that, in its written submission, Inclusion Scotland welcomed the Scottish Government’s assurance in the Policy Memorandum that “the broader definition of priority for housing will be of particular benefit to disabled or older people who are more likely to need to move because they are in unsuitable housing”. However, Inclusion Scotland also called for information on how the Scottish Government intends to monitor whether this potential benefit is realised, and that disabled people and their representative organisations are included in the groups to be consulted by social landlords when considering their rules on priority allocations.

57. The Committee requests that the Scottish Government provides detail in its formal response to this report on how it intends to address these specific issues.

Age as a factor in housing allocation

58. As detailed in the SPICe briefing on the Bill, social landlords are currently prevented, under section 20(2)(a)(vi) of the 1987 Act, from taking account of an applicant’s age unless properties are specifically designed or adapted for a particular age group. Section 5 of the Bill would repeal this provision, therefore allowing social landlords to take age into account when allocating housing. Section 5(b) (inserting new section 2B into section 20 of the 1987 Act) provides that, where a social landlord takes age into account in allocating housing, they must treat the applicant as protected against age discrimination in terms of Part 2 of the Equality Act 2010.\(^{51}\)

59. Several organisations strongly opposed this provision, with their principal concern being that taking age into account as a factor in allocations could be used to discriminate against particular age groups. For example, Rosemary Brotchie of Shelter argued that—

> “The fundamental principle of social housing allocation should be that it is based on a framework of need and the circumstances that households are in, not on the characteristics of households. The homelessness legislation and the 2012 commitment made that change in principle, and we would not want to see the characteristics of households being used as a reason for preferring one group over another in housing allocation.”\(^ {52}\)

60. In its written submission, Homeless Action Scotland highlighted its concern that the measure would be discriminatory against young people, stating that its “only experience of age being taken into account, or of landlords seeking to take age into account, is in order to exclude young people from allocations”.\(^ {53}\)

61. The Scottish Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) expressed the view in a written submission that there are risks in allowing age to be taken into account, stating that “it is very likely that in prioritising one age group, then another group of tenants will be disadvantaged”. The SCCYP also made the point that it was unclear how an individual young person could seek to challenge any perceived unfairness on the part of the social landlord. He also sought “reassurance that this policy would not inadvertently lead to some younger

tenants, including young care leavers, being placed in less desirable areas at the expense of other age groups”. 54

62. However, a range of other stakeholders, such as CIH, the GWSF and the SFHA strongly supported the proposed measure. Alan Benson of GWSF said that it would “help social landlords to make greater use of sensitive lettings and promote greater tenant sustainability”. 55

63. The Committee was advised that local authorities would particularly welcome being able to take age into account when considering allocations, coupled with appropriate safeguards to protect people’s rights. Jim Hayton of ALACHO said —

“Councils would absolutely accept that the principle should be based on need, but that should not involve following a set of rules blindly without regard to the make-up of a community and what is likely to lead to sustainability and peaceful coexistence rather than the creation of friction. It is not social engineering; it is about allowing landlords to make sensible decisions in the interests of a sustainable community life.” 56

64. David Bookbinder of CIH expressed the view that the measure would not be discriminatory —

“We...think that the measure is genuinely sensible, especially taken alongside the bill’s strong reminder that all landlords have to comply with equalities legislation, which means that they cannot discriminate against any group, whether that is younger people or other groups. We are pleased with the measure.” 57

65. Tony Cain of ALACHO explained to the Committee that there would be safeguards against discrimination, given that local authorities would be accountable for their actions in allocating houses. He said —

“My observation is that, in preparing and approving allocation policies, local authorities are also required to prepare equalities impact assessments. To the extent that we are accountable for the EIAs through the statements and the challenges that can be made around them, then the risk of discrimination is minimised.” 58

66. Although he was supportive of the proposal to allow age to be used as a factor in allocations, Andy Young of SFHA suggested that there was potential that it could be open to legal challenge.59

67. Witnesses representing tenants’ groups were broadly supportive of the proposal that age should be taken into consideration. However, several of these groups also highlighted the importance of ensuring that young people are not discriminated against as a consequence. Lesley Baird of TPAS said—

“There is a worry about young people continuing to be excluded from housing because they are seen as a problem, rather than as part of the solution. Whatever we do, we need to ensure that young people are not excluded from allocations... We must be aware of sensitivities around lettings. The more flexibility, without excluding people, the better.”60

68. Kevin Paterson, of the Glasgow and Eilean Siar Tenants Network highlighted the strong tenancy sustainability rate amongst the 16-25 age group in Glasgow and the work done by support groups to help young people to obtain test tenancies which can often then lead to a full tenancy and positive engagement as part of a community. He said—

“Sometimes, young people are demonised, because we hear about the small number who do not keep their tenancies and who are involved in antisocial behaviour. However, we do not hear about the vast number of people who come through organisations such as Aspire and Ypeople and who go on to lead good and fulfilling lives.”61

69. In responding to the concerns expressed by some stakeholders on the potential for this provision to discriminate, the Minister explained that the intention was to allow social landlords to be more flexible and make better use of allocations. However, she emphasised that “there is no intention whatsoever to discriminate against young people or any other age group”. She made clear that “need is the absolute priority” and that “age should never take precedence over need”. The Minister explained that—

“...age could be involved in particular situations of housing need. For example, one of the downstairs flats in a block of four tenanted by young people could become empty and have to be reallocated; if the choice was between an older person or a younger person on the housing list, the council or the landlord could determine that it would be more appropriate to put the young person into the flat than put an older person into a building with young people. Of course, that could work conversely.”62

70. The Committee notes the concerns of many stakeholders that this measure has potential to be discriminatory towards certain age groups, particularly young people. In this regard, it is reassured that councils must be seen to be accountable and justify objectively the decisions they take in relation to allocations. They will also be required to carry out equality impact assessments when developing their allocations policies.

71. However, the Committee considers it to be essential that the application of the provision is fully monitored to ensure that the provisions are applied appropriately and that there is no consequential discrimination against any age group. It therefore calls on the Scottish Government to consider how such monitoring might be carried out in an effective and consistent manner across the social housing sector and to provide details in its response to this report.

Ownership of property as a factor in allocation

72. Under section 20(2) of the 1987 Act, landlords are also prevented from taking into account property ownership, or the value of property owned (or jointly owned) by an applicant, or any of the applicant’s family. Section 6 of the Bill would allow a social landlord to, should it chose to do so, take property ownership into account except in specified circumstances. For example, in the case of a property which has been let, the owner cannot secure entry to that property. The specific circumstances aim to reflect the fact that, while an individual may own a property, they may not be able to secure access to it, or their health would be endangered, or they would be at risk of abuse if they did occupy it.

73. Tony Cain of ALACHO expressed the view that the current situation whereby Registered Social Landlords (RSLs) are unable to take property ownership into account has a negative impact on the management of housing stock—

“...the practice results in an inefficient use of the overall stock and resources. We make landlords of tenants. In Stirling, about five or six owners a year, principally older ones, will be allocated a council house and will be left with their own property as well. It might not be a large number, but it is obvious and visible in the communities and it impacts on the credibility of the way in which we manage our stock.”

74. General support for this provision was provided in several written submissions. For example, South Lanarkshire Council, whilst making clear that it would not wish to prevent property owners from applying for social housing, felt it was important that their financial circumstances be taken into account. The Council said—

“We believe this provision will enhance the ability of social landlords to appropriately target available housing to those in most need.”

63 SPICe briefing on the Housing (Scotland) Bill, page 15.
65 South Lanarkshire Council. Written submission, page 5.
75. The Almond Housing Association was of the view that it was important to understand both the nature of the applicant’s housing need and how this related to their property ownership. It said—

“In order to be considered for housing there would have to be an established housing need which could not be met in the current property. There are safeguards in place for applicants who cannot occupy the property. If the applicant was unwilling to sell their house it could lead to questions being asked as to their needs.”

76. Homeless Action Scotland said in its submission that it would like to see the inclusion of a further circumstance to take account of situations where it would be unreasonable for the person to continue to occupy the property. This related to situations whereby the property has a large negative equity but the circumstances of the applicants have changed so that they can no longer afford the mortgage. It was suggested that in such circumstances it would not be sensible for them to sell the property or to continue to live in it since either of these options could lead to homelessness and substantial debt.

77. The Committee notes that the North Ayrshire Council submission suggested that the provision could have a “potential unintended consequence of excluding owners who have an accessible housing need due to illness or disability but whose current accommodation does ‘not endanger their health’.” The Council also expressed the view that the implementation of this provision could create certain complexities. By way of example, it said—

“In North Ayrshire the proportion of owners housed each year is negligible and where this does occur they tend to be older people who have previously exercised their right to buy. The majority of owners who have registered for housing in North Ayrshire are aged over 60. If this flexibility is used it could result in a disproportionate negative impact on older people.”

78. The Committee notes and agrees with the broad support for this additional tool to assist social landlords in increasing flexibility in allocations.

79. However, it notes the suggestion by Homeless Action Scotland that a further circumstance should be added at section 6(2) to cover issues around negative equity. The Committee also notes the examples provided by North Ayrshire Council on the potential for there to be unintended consequences of the application of this provision, either in terms of excluding those who may have an accessible housing need or in having a disproportionately negative impact on older people. It calls on the Scottish Government to comment on these issues in its response to this report.

Determination of minimum period for application to remain in force

80. Part 2 of the Bill also contains provisions that are aimed at giving social landlords more tools to tackle antisocial behaviour. Section 7 allows landlords to suspend an applicant from receiving an offer of housing for a period of time in certain circumstances, such as where there has been previous evidence of antisocial behaviour or a history of rent arrears. Scottish Government officials advised the Committee that the intention behind this provision is to encourage tenants to reflect on their previous behaviour and how it affects their ability to receive an offer of a house\(^{69}\).

81. It is understood that this provision effectively legislates for existing practice amongst many social landlords. For example, in its written submission, North Ayrshire Council welcomed this provision, but indicated it would have little impact in that council area as it already operates a suspension policy.\(^{70}\)

82. In its written evidence, the SHFA, whilst welcoming the proposals on suspensions in principle, said that “the implementation detail will be critical” and called for clear guidance to be produced which would detail “the level of evidence required in relation to previous antisocial behaviour, how long a suspension can last for, and also how far back in time it is reasonable for a landlord to go when considering historical antisocial behaviour”.\(^{71}\) The GWSF also called for clarity on such issues, indicating that this would be helpful for social landlords. The Legal Services Agency (LSA) discussed the detail of the provisions in its submission which highlighted to the Committee the potential complexities involved in their application.\(^{72}\)

83. The SFHA also highlighted a concern that the suspension provisions might be “rendered impotent by applicants who may have otherwise been subject to a suspension simply being referred for an allocation via the homelessness route”. It acknowledged that the Scottish Government had made it clear during the consultation process that such an outcome would “go against the spirit of the Bill’s intentions”. The SFHA suggested, therefore, that the Bill should be suitably amended to ensure that this is not allowed to happen in practice.\(^{73}\)

84. The Bill allows people whose application has been suspended to appeal the decision. In oral evidence, Paul Brown of the LSA said that in practice it would be difficult to appeal either through having difficulty in accessing legal aid or due to a chaotic lifestyle, mental health issues or other factors.\(^{74}\) However, the SFHA commented favourably on the appeal provision, saying that it is “fair and balanced, and will mean that landlords will need to be very clear on their reasons for suspension.”\(^{75}\)

85. The Committee is content with the provisions at section 7. However, it agrees with the comments made by some stakeholders that clear guidance is necessary on the detail of how these should be implemented and the range of factors that social landlords will require to take into account when considering suspensions. It therefore calls on the Scottish Government to provide details of its intended approach in producing guidance on these matters.

86. The Committee also calls on the Scottish Government to explain in its response to this report how it intends to ensure that those whose applications are suspended will be provided with access to information on the appeal process, including details of where they can obtain appropriate advice and support in making an appeal should this be required.

Short Scottish secure tenancy

87. The Bill would also widen the circumstances in which landlords can convert a secure tenancy to a short Scottish secure tenancy (short SST) where there is a history of antisocial behaviour. The period of a short SST will also be extended to 12 months. Landlords would be required to provide appropriate support services to tenants to help them change their behaviour during the 12-month period of the short SST. If, after this period, tenants can show that they have altered and improved their behaviour, their tenancy can be converted back to a secure tenancy.

88. There was broad support for these proposals. Shelter Scotland particularly welcomed the extension of period of a short SST which “enables them to have the support that is required to progress to a full, secure tenancy.” Andy Young of SFHA felt that the requirement for a landlord to have to provide a tenant with a reason for ending a short tenancy was a positive step.

89. Tenants’ groups also supported the proposals. For example, Hugh McClung, of the Central Region Tenants Network, said—

“With regard to clear, defined antisocial behaviour, the bill takes us a long way from what the provisions used to be for identifying people. We welcome the proposal by which the landlord can suspend a Scottish secure tenancy by converting it to an SSST.”

90. However, Rosemary Brotchie of Shelter Scotland raised concerns about the way in which section 8 is drafted and expressed the view there was a lack of available information on what constitutes antisocial behaviour, as it is currently defined in the Bill. Andy Young of the SFHA shared this view and also called for more information on "what the evidence test is for going through the process".

Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, 4th Report, 2014 (Session 4)

91. CIH also suggested that advisory good practice guidance should be produced to cover this element of the Bill which "gives examples of behaviour that it might be appropriate and might not be appropriate to take into account. Legislating for every single circumstance in the bill or in regulations would be very risky."

92. In response to the consultation on the proposals, some social landlords expressed concerns about the type of evidence they would need to make use of this proposed power, and CIH mentions this is in its written submission. Rosemary Brotchie also felt that insufficient information was available on the nature of the evidence that would be required for antisocial behaviour to result in a tenant losing their secure tenancy or security of tenure. She said—

"We want to ensure that, to be effective, that section of the bill ensures that there are sufficient checks and balances so that the provisions cannot be used inappropriately and would not unfairly penalise vulnerable tenants."

93. David Bookbinder of CIH was of the view that the measures do not in any way solve all of the issues associated with long-standing and recurring antisocial behaviour, but that they would provide landlords with additional options. He said—

"We strongly believe that landlords have an interest in using the measures only when they really want to and when they have struggled to take action… Any consideration of antisocial behaviour measures should involve consideration not only of the impact on the alleged perpetrator’s rights but of the impact on the rights of people who live around and in the community to enjoy their property peacefully."

94. The Committee notes and welcomes the fact that this provision will not conflict with the responsibilities of social landlords to address the needs of the unintentionally homeless.

95. The Committee also explored with witnesses the nature of any problems social landlords had encountered through the use of short SSTs and whether the increase in the term proposed by the Bill could perhaps exacerbate already difficult situations and make things worse. Jim Hayton of ALACHO indicated that this could be the case, suggesting that—“If a person has a short tenancy because of previous antisocial behaviour and they persist with that behaviour, neighbours will have to put up with it for 12 months, rather than six. So there are disadvantages, although there are measures to balance that.”

96. In discussing the increase in the minimum period of short SSTs from six months to 12 months with stakeholders, the Committee was told that a small proportion of people who engage in antisocial behaviour have underlying issues, such as mental health issues or learning difficulties, or just living in a highly stressed environment. Jim Hayton of ALACHO gave his view on how he would hope that such issues might be addressed. He said—

“We have high hopes that better-integrated working with our colleagues in health and social care could ensure that the support that people get is holistic and genuinely helpful in sorting out their problems. However, if the behaviour is intractable and continuing, we must accept the possibility that the extension from six to 12-month tenancies would work against rather than for us.”

97. The Committee notes the support for the proposals at this Part of the Bill and it agrees that they will provide a further useful tool to allow social landlords to address antisocial behaviour issues.

98. However, the Committee also acknowledges the calls from some witnesses for further clarity around the definition of antisocial behaviour as it applies to this Part of the Bill. It agrees that the production of appropriate good practice guidance which would provide examples of different types of behaviour which could be taken into account would be extremely useful to social landlords. It calls on the Scottish Government to commit to the production of such guidance.

Scottish secure tenancy

Assignation, sublet, joint tenancy and successions

99. The Bill would also introduce a 12-month qualifying period before a tenant can apply to be added to a tenancy as a joint tenant or before a tenant can sublet (section 13). A 12 month-qualifying period would also be in place for tenancy assignations (increased from the current 6-months) and two new grounds for landlords to refuse consent for an assignation would be introduced. A new 12-month qualifying period would also be introduced for some family members and carers to succeed to a tenancy (section 14).

100. There was broad support for these measures from stakeholders, including CIH and the SFHA. David Bookbinder of CIH said—

“The measure that gives the landlord an ability to refuse an assignation when the person who would benefit is not in housing need must be welcomed at a time when social housing is in such short supply. We also very much welcome, in the provisions for succession, assignation and so on, the requirement for the prospective beneficiary of succession or assignation to have told the landlord at the time that they were moving in that, from that point, they lived there. That is a significant measure.”

101. Jim Hayton informed the Committee that ALACHO would have found it preferable for landlords to have the power to make such decisions rather than assignation being a right of the tenant. He indicated, however, that his organisation was “happy with the halfway house of extending the qualifying periods…”

102. Tenants’ groups who appeared before the Committee also supported these provisions. For example, Lesley Baird of TPAS said—

“There have been concerns across communities about perceptions of queue jumping, particularly when it comes to assignations. The guidance will be all…but we definitely support the proposals to change the qualifying periods for assignation and subletting.”

103. Ilene Campbell of the Tenants Information Service (TIS) also suggested that the provision of clear guidance was necessary. She said—

“The landlord must provide information that makes it very clear that the tenancy can be assigned 12 months from the point at which the property became the tenant’s main residence. That issue was raised at almost every consultation event.”

104. In its written submission, Carers Scotland raised concerns with regard to the proposals at section 14(b) of the Bill to extend the qualifying period for succession for unpaid carers on the death of a tenant, where this has been the carer’s only or principal home, from six months to 12 months. The organisation stated—

“We have even greater concerns that this qualifying period will only begin once the carer has informed the landlord that this is their only or principal home. We believe that this proposal will disadvantage carers and see little reason for increasing qualifying periods for succession for carers or for this...
qualifying period to begin only when a tenant or carer informs the housing provider.\textsuperscript{93}

105. The Committee notes that there is general support for these provisions. However, it would welcome information from the Scottish Government on whether it intends to produce guidance on how it expects them to be applied in practice. More specifically, the Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide it with a response to the concerns raised in evidence that the provision at section 14(b) might potentially disadvantage unpaid carers.

Grounds for eviction: antisocial behaviour

106. The Bill would simplify the eviction process where an eviction of a tenant with a SST was being sought on the grounds that another court has already convicted a tenant of using the property for illegal or immoral purposes or of an offence in or near the property punishable by imprisonment (section 15). In these cases, the court would not have to decide whether it was “reasonable” to evict the tenant, as is currently the case. The landlord would have to, within 12 months of the tenant’s conviction or appeal, serve a notice on the tenant that the landlord intends to seek recovery of possession of the property.

107. The Committee sought views on how these measures would address some of the problems that social landlords currently experience in seeking to evict tenants with a SST who have acted antisocially. It was also keen to establish whether the proposals would strike an appropriate balance between the rights of landlords and the rights of tenants.

108. Jim Hayton of ALACHO welcomed the proposals and emphasised that they would apply only in cases where a conviction has been made in relation to a serious offence. He stated—

“Unfortunately, some people have suggested that that is an open door for councils to evict people...for things such as dropping litter or playing football on the street. We are not talking about that, and nothing could be further from the truth; we are talking about serious criminal or antisocial behaviour. It could be someone who has been dealing drugs and causing all kinds of problems for years and has then been convicted.”\textsuperscript{94}

109. The Minister confirmed this and explained how the provisions would be applied—

“There is not a mandatory requirement for landlords to evict a tenant who has been convicted of a serious offence. That is not the case, and it is not the intention. A 12-month period is provided for, which gives the tenant an opportunity to amend their behaviour. If that happens, the landlord will not necessarily proceed with eviction. Also, a tenant has the right to challenge the position in court if they think that they have been treated unreasonably or unfairly."

110. However, the Committee also received evidence which suggested that the removal of the test of reasonableness in certain eviction cases could be viewed as a fundamental erosion of tenants' rights. For example, the LSA said in its written submission that—

“The general view of the solicitors commenting on the Bill is that we have grave concerns concerning the balance of rights and powers adopted particularly to those accused, or guilty of, anti-social conduct or behaviour.”

111. Rosemary Brotchie of Shelter agreed with this view and told the Committee—

“We need to get the balance right between the rights of neighbours and communities, given the impact that antisocial behaviour has on them, and the rights of individual tenants who might have perpetrated antisocial behaviour. Landlords are often in a tricky situation in that regard.”

112. Other witnesses were concerned that not enough information was available on the types of conviction this part of the Bill is intended to cover. Lesley Baird of TPAS said—

“There were issues about getting clarity on what antisocial behaviour means and clarity on the part of the bill that mentions convictions. What convictions are we talking about? After all, a person can be convicted of dog fouling. In a lot of these matters, guidance is required on where a SSST would be offered and it is important that there is absolute clarity in those areas.”

113. The Committee agrees that these provisions will provide a helpful tool to help social landlords to deal more effectively with those tenants who have been convicted of serious criminal acts or antisocial behaviour. However, the Committee considers it essential that, in producing guidance covering the implementation of these measures, an emphasis is placed on the importance of balancing the rights of both tenants and landlords.

114. It also recommends that to assist social landlords and other stakeholders such guidance should provide further clarity on the types of convictions that might lead to an eviction. The Scottish Government is asked to provide details of its intentions in relation to the production of guidance on these provisions in its response to this report.

115. The Committee also heard that the Bill's proposals were unlikely in themselves to be a panacea for antisocial behaviour in communities. CIH stated in its written evidence that there are “few, if any speedy remedies” for serious antisocial behaviour.\textsuperscript{99} Silke Isbrand of COSLA expanded on this theme, saying that—

“...local authorities are still struggling with a number of issues. There are mixed-tenure blocks where antisocial behaviour arises from private properties...There is recurring low-level antisocial behaviour. The problems are different across the spectrum. The general feeling is that the proposals in the Bill are welcome but that the problem will not go away as a result of those proposals, so we need to continue to look at the issue. We need innovative practices as much as other methods.”\textsuperscript{100}

116. Ilene Campbell of TIS shared this view, and suggested that co-ordinated partnership working was necessary to address the wider and more fundamental problems of recurring antisocial behaviour. She said—

“The bill will simply tighten up provisions that already exist. However, although everyone will welcome that, I do not think that the measures in the bill in themselves will tackle the issue. The bill will not be the solution to antisocial behaviour in Scotland. Instead, we need the agencies to continue to work together and housing organisations to support agencies, the police and local communities. That is the central issue: people should work together.”\textsuperscript{101}

117. Members also explored with witnesses whether there was potential for tenants who are evicted on antisocial behaviour grounds to be continually moved around the housing stock in a local authority area or between council areas, leading to cycles of such behaviour in different places, with the core problem not being satisfactorily addressed. Tony Cain of ALACHO responded to this, stating that it was important that individuals who engaged in serious antisocial behaviour are seen by others in the community to be held accountable for their actions. He said—

“It is very difficult to remove from a home people who are perpetrating acts of antisocial behaviour, but our failure to deliver a response impacts directly on our credibility as a landlord and people’s view of and willingness to engage in that process. If there are no outcomes and problems are not dealt with, people will simply stop reporting issues and withdraw from being prepared to give evidence and assist in tackling the problems.”\textsuperscript{102}

Recovery of possession of properties designed for special needs

118. Section 16 of the Bill provides for landlords to take possession of adapted accommodation where no-one in the household requires it. In its written submission, Citizens Advice Scotland (CAS) welcomed this, saying that it “should ensure that the supply of adapted housing to those who require it is increased, whilst at the same time ending the policy of removing adaptations from properties, which are likely to have cost a considerable amount to install.” However, CAS also highlighted the importance of ensuring that, in any such cases, the sitting tenants are not disadvantaged and are moved to appropriate accommodation that meets their needs.\(^\text{103}\)

Initial/probationary tenancies proposal

119. During the Stage 1 scrutiny, local authorities and some tenants’ groups expressed disappointment that provisions to allow for initial or probationary tenancies were not included in the Bill and indicated that they viewed this as a missed opportunity. Councillor Harry McGuigan of COSLA explained why local authorities would find these useful—

“Initial tenancies are useful and they should not be interpreted as being an attempt to make it easier to evict tenants for antisocial behaviour or for other reasons. We feel that initial tenancies provide us with a tremendous opportunity to help new tenants to understand what their responsibilities and rights are and to work with us as a group to ensure that we can minimise the likelihood of antisocial behaviour developing.”\(^\text{104}\)

120. Jim Hayton of ALACHO expanded on this, saying that evidence from elsewhere in the UK where initial tenancies are available suggests that these are successful. He said that they appeared to be “a valuable tool in the toolkit, that they do not increase evictions and that they allow landlords to engage with tenants in the critical first year of a tenancy to emphasise that a secure tenancy is a valuable currency. At the same time, initial tenancies provide a meaningful sanction...to tenants...”\(^\text{105}\)

121. There were mixed views on the initial tenancies issue amongst the tenants’ groups who provided evidence to the Committee. For example, Hugh McClung of Central Region Tenants Network supported it, saying that it would give landlords time to identify those with an antisocial behaviour tendency. Kevin Paterson of Glasgow and Eilean Siar Tenants Network, on the other hand, said that his tenants’ network considered initial or probationary tenancies to be unacceptable and would represent “an erosion of the Scottish secure tenancy and take away tenants’ rights”\(^\text{106}\).

122. Both TPAS and TIS pointed out that there was no consensus when this issue was discussed with tenants, with strong views expressed both for and against, depending on tenants’ own experiences. However, Ilene Campbell made clear that “TIS would not advocate probationary tenancies, because we do not think that there is enough evidence at this stage to suggest that they would have a major impact on antisocial behaviour issues.\textsuperscript{107}

123. The Minister said that she was aware of support for initial tenancies that was shown in the responses to the Scottish Government’s consultation, but made clear that she did not think it was appropriate to proceed with initial probationary tenancies at the current time. She said that a number of measures designed to address antisocial behaviour are already included in the Bill. She told the Committee—

“For example, people who come through the homeless route have the right to support for a tenancy, so they are getting that support built into their tenancy. That is right and proper. People who have been waiting for ages on a housing list to get a house that they can make into their own home would all of a sudden be on trial as to whether they may remain in their home. For all those reasons, I do not think that it is right to proceed with that measure. It could be reviewed under a future bill, but I certainly do not think that the time is right.”\textsuperscript{108}

124. The Committee notes the support for initial tenancies amongst some stakeholders, particularly local authorities. However, it is of the view that there is no clear indication that it would be appropriate to introduce them at this time. The Committee notes that the Minister has not ruled out considering the initial tenancies proposal further at some future stage and considers that this may be appropriate once the other measures in the Bill designed to assist in dealing with antisocial behaviour have been implemented and their impact fully assessed.

PART 3 - PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING

Transfer to First-tier Tribunal

Private rented sector (PRS)

125. The Bill transfers jurisdiction for civil cases relating to the private rented sector from the sheriff court to the First-tier Tribunal, which is to be set up under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill. The grounds which allow someone to raise an action, and the issues to be taken into account in deciding a case, will not change but decisions will be taken by a tribunal rather than a sheriff. The procedural rules will change so that cases are handled in a less formal setting.\textsuperscript{109} However, in line with the general approach in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, the full details of how the new private rented sector (PRS) tribunal will operate will largely depend on secondary legislation.

126. The type of matters to be transferred which currently fall under the civil jurisdiction of the sheriff court include:

\begin{itemize}
\item General tenancy cases
\item Eviction cases
\item Rent arrears cases
\item Anti-social behaviour orders
\item Disrepair cases
\end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{109} Policy Memorandum, para. 133.
• repossession cases;
• non-repossession cases under existing housing legislation such as applications for damages for unlawful eviction or challenges to refusals by landlords to allow adaptation for disabled tenants;
• disputes concerning compliance with tenancy agreements (including actions to recover tenancy deposits); and
• landlord registration cases.\(^{110}\)

127. The transfer of private rented sector cases from the sheriff court to the First-tier Tribunal was widely welcomed in oral and written evidence, with support received from those representing both tenants and landlords. Concerns with the current system related to the lack of speed in the consideration of cases and a lack of specialist knowledge. Citizens Advice Scotland in particular felt that that one of the current barriers was “the low priority of housing cases within the court system”.\(^ {111}\)

128. The Scottish Association of Landlords and Scottish Land and Estates informed the Committee of the perceived financial benefits for landlords associated with the speed of treatment of a case, given the expenses that arise with both arrears and legal costs.\(^ {112}\)

129. Concerns were highlighted in relation to the difficulties in understanding and following the court process. The Scottish Independent Advocacy Alliance believes that “Tribunals are on the whole more accessible for users, particularly those who may be vulnerable, than court proceedings.”\(^ {113}\)

130. The Committee also heard that the tribunal might offer the opportunity to address an inequity between private sector tenants and landlords. ALACHO’s Jim Hayton stated that “there is a big perception that there is a real imbalance of power between landlords and tenants in the private rented sector—one that does not exist to anything like the same extent in the social rented sector.”\(^ {114}\)

131. This point was extended in written evidence from the Scottish Tribunals and Administrative Justice Advisory Committee. In their view—

“In cases involving landlords and tenants, there is likely to be an imbalance of power between the parties. It is important that any dispute resolution process is specialist in nature and can redress that imbalance of power through taking an inquisitorial approach.”\(^ {115}\)

\(^ {110}\) Policy Memorandum, paras. 135-137.

132. A number of landlord organisations welcomed “the potential for higher quality and more consistent rulings from more specialised tribunal decision makers”.

133. The Committee, having heard considerable evidence to endorse the transfer to the First-tier Tribunal of private sector cases, supports these provisions in the Bill. However, the Committee requests further information on the operation of the tribunal when it becomes available.

Costs relating to the establishment of the private rented sector tribunal

134. The Finance Committee highlighted (Annexe E) that the Financial Memorandum (FM) states that “It is expected that there will be no additional costs for local authorities from proposals for a Private Rented Sector (PRS) tribunal.” However, some local authorities consider that costs may arise in relation to this provision. For example, Renfrewshire Council notes that “as the provider of housing services, the local authority will need to train relevant staff and update existing information to reflect the new changes.”

135. The City of Edinburgh Council also commented on the FM’s assumption, stating that “it is anticipated that the creation of such a tribunal will generate a significant increase in enquiries to the Council and appeals against landlord registration decisions, Rent Penalty Notices and various HMO decisions resulting in increased pressure on existing staff resources.”

136. The ICI Committee noted the Finance Committee’s correspondence. However, the Minister, in evidence to the Committee, restated the Scottish Government’s position that—

“we do not expect that there will be any significant cost to local authorities from our setting up the private rented sector tribunal.”

The Committee is content with the assurances given by the Scottish Government on this matter.

Houses in multiple occupation

137. At section 21, the Bill provides an enabling power to transfer Houses in Multiple Occupation (HMO) cases to the jurisdiction of the First-tier Tribunal at a later date because further consultation is considered desirable before deciding whether to transfer these cases.

138. The Committee agrees with this approach.

118 Letter to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee from the Finance Committee on the Financial Memorandum, 19 February 2014.
121 Policy Memorandum, para. 143.
Tribunal members and representation at the tribunal

139. The Bill does not contain any specific provision for the appointment of tribunal members because the PRS tribunal will take advantage of general provisions in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill. Tribunal members will be appointed by Scottish Ministers after recommendation by the Judicial Appointments Board for Scotland, following its independent appointment processes. Practices and procedures will also be set by secondary legislation under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill. The PRS tribunal will be able to use legal members and ordinary members when hearing cases.

140. Parties would be able to have legal representation but “it is anticipated that this would not be the norm.” The Scottish Association of Landlords and Scottish Land and Estates supported this approach but also stated that “where it is appropriate, people should be able to access any type of advice, support and information that they need.”

141. CAS also considered that “by encouraging a specialist and interventionist approach parties are less likely to require representation as tribunal members (judges) know the questions to ask to get to the root of issues using plain English.”

142. However, although the approach taken by the tribunal is to move away from representation, the Scottish Independent Advocacy Alliance voiced the concern that—

> “Even allowing for the fact that Tribunals are generally held to be more user-friendly, accessible and understandable, for some it is likely that they will experience difficulty understanding and following process and procedure, which is made worse by a lack of representation. [...] The inclusion of access to advocacy in this situation would be important to support any vulnerable tenants in understanding and participating in a housing tribunal.”

143. The Committee was reassured by evidence from Scottish Government officials that “some parties might require support to engage effectively with tribunal proceedings and we want to look in more detail at what support we can provide. That could be through the provision of legal aid or through other means: a representation or advocacy service, for example.”

144. Whilst Capability Scotland generally welcomed proposals to transfer cases involving adaptations to let property from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal, it considered that “Given the implications to disabled people of unreasonable refusal to consent for an adaptation we would expect Tribunal Panels to be well trained in disability equality from a Human Rights perspective."^129

145. The Committee supports the approach being taken by the Scottish Government in respect of representation at PRS tribunals. However, now that the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill has completed its parliamentary procedure, the Committee requests that the Scottish Government undertakes to inform the Committee of any policy developments it takes forward in the area of access to, and representation at, private rented sector tribunals.

Extension of the power to social rented sector cases

146. Several witnesses suggested to the Committee that it would have been highly beneficial to transfer social rented sector cases to the First-tier Tribunal system in addition to the private rented sector cases. This had been set out as an option in the Scottish Government’s consultation, but was not carried forward to the Bill. However, witnesses such as Shelter and CIH acknowledged the likely high level of costs involved and considered that focus should be given to the PRS transfer with the option open to expand the tribunal service to the social rented sector at a future date. The CIH sought assurance that a future extension of the tribunal system to the social sector “is not closed off forever.”^130

147. Rosemary Brotchie of Shelter “supported the move to take private sector cases out of the sheriff court as the first stepping stone, particularly because there is such a degree of unmet need for dispute resolution in the private rented sector.”^132 Continuing that “in the first instance, private rented sector cases should be the priority.”^133

148. Ilene Campbell of TIS considered that there should be consideration of the cost of extending the transfer to the tribunal to social rented sector cases, with a separate consultation on cost.^134

149. The Scottish Government acknowledged the serious nature of cases currently brought to court across both the private and social rented sectors. The Policy Memorandum states that “A specialist PRS tribunal which can competently handle eviction cases and efficiently manage other cases could provide important data, and perhaps a platform, for other types of cases to be transferred to a tribunal should it be required.”^136

^129 Capability Scotland. Written submission, page 3.
^136 Policy Memorandum, para. 131.
150. The Committee also noted the Scottish Government’s awareness of “the significant case numbers and resource implications of transferring all rented housing cases from the courts”. However, the safeguards that exist within the social rented sector were highlighted by the Minister in evidence where she stated—

“—in the private sector, there is not a balance of power between the landlord and the tenant; the redress is not there for the tenant. In the social rented sector, tenants have a right to complain, the social housing charter looks at the housing quality standards and there are a number of other areas that go to the ombudsman. Tenants in the social rented sector have a form of redress that tenants do not currently have in the private rented sector. It was felt very strongly that we should start this tribunal in the private rented sector.”

151. The Minister highlighted the current court reform process, stating “We would want to see how those reforms bedded in with regard to the social rented sector before giving consideration to extending the tribunal system into the social rented sector.” However, the Committee heard evidence that reforms may not improve matters, for example evidence from COSLA and ALACHO suggested that the court reform would not necessarily provide sufficient improvements. The Scottish Tribunals and Administrative Justice Advisory Committee considers that—

“The intention is that the new summary sheriffs proposed in the current Courts Reform (Scotland) Bill will take an interventionist approach, and will specialise in certain types of civil cases, including housing cases. […] In reality, however, this will be a very small part of their caseload – the Scottish Government has estimated that 70-80% of their time will be spent on summary criminal cases. It therefore seems unlikely that summary sheriffs will have the opportunity to develop the level of specialism in this area that would exist within a specialist tribunal.”

152. The Committee understands that, in reaching its decision on whether to extend the First-tier Tribunal to the social rented sector, the Scottish Government has had to take wide-ranging financial and operational matters into account. The Committee noted the Minister’s statement that—

“We have said that we will look at how the tribunal system operates in the private rented sector to see whether the system delivers what we intend it to deliver. We will also look at the court reforms when they come in to see whether they have made any changes in the social rented sector or had any impact on it. The situation will have to be monitored and if at a future date…

137 Policy Memorandum, para. 154.
we have to legislate or change things further, that point could be considered but it will not happen in the immediate future. We have to see how the tribunal system works in the private sector first and whether it delivers the outcome that we want it to deliver. Then we will look at the court reforms to see whether further changes need to be made.\textsuperscript{142}

153. The Committee accepts the decision and supports the Scottish Government’s commitment to monitoring progress of the private rented sector tribunal and the impact of court reform in order to decide whether further changes should be made for social rented sector cases.

154. The Committee acknowledges work being undertaken in court reform that will affect social rented sector cases that remain within the court system. But it requests further information on how the impact of the reform on these cases will be monitored in order to inform future decision-making on the possible transfer of these cases to the First-tier Tribunal.

Enforcement of repairing standard

155. Part 3 of the Bill also makes provision to expand access to the private rented housing panel (PRHP) by enabling third party applications by local authorities to enforce the repairing standard, which is the standard landlords have to meet to rent out their property.\textsuperscript{143} Section 23(1)(a) enables a third party to apply to the private rented housing panel for a determination of whether a landlord has failed to comply with the repairing standard. (This standard is in section 13 of The Housing (Scotland) 2006 Act.)

156. Currently, only tenants can make an application to the PRHP to seek to enforce the repairing standard. The Bill allows local authorities the ability to report to the panel and aims “to give local authorities additional means to report properties where the condition is thought to be below that standard.”\textsuperscript{144}

157. Throughout evidence-taking the Committee heard of circumstances where tenants may be reluctant to report their landlord for fear of losing their tenancy. Shelter Scotland supported the provision, stating that “Tenants in such situations often do not want to challenge their landlord, because they fear retaliatory eviction and will not take them to a tribunal if they have only a six-month short assured tenancy”.\textsuperscript{145}

\textsuperscript{143} Section 13 of the 2006 Act sets out the repairing standard – a condition that landlords have to meet in order to rent out.

158. The Scottish Government considers that the provision “should help to protect tenants who might feel vulnerable and might not want to take the action that is required.”

159. The Committee was also alerted to the provision’s ability to address the problem of the tenants moving on before their case reaches court. David Bookbinder of CIH welcomed “the proposal in the bill to ensure that a tenant’s moving on does not stop the local authority pursuing the landlord”.

160. However, Shelter Scotland also considered that “the powers must not be implemented in a way that creates conflict between the landlord and the tenant and inadvertently leads to the ending of a tenancy […] Private tenants’ security of tenure is just not good enough to allow the sector to improve and to continue to meet housing need as it is at the moment. In short, although we welcome the introduction of third-party reporting, we believe that we need to consider what happens to tenants in those circumstances and whether they will be forced to move on from their tenancy.”

161. The Committee supports the provisions on the enforcement of the repairing standard at sections 23 to 25 of the Bill. However, the Committee seeks reassurance from the Scottish Government that it will monitor use of the power and its impact.

162. Some responses to the Finance Committee addressed the resourcing implications of enabling local authorities to make an application to the PRHP in respect of the repairing standard. Concern was expressed in relation to how to estimate costs for local authorities.

163. ALACHO noted—

“that several ALACHO members have drawn attention to the fact that the need to gather evidence on property condition, the processing of applications and defending a case (on appeal of a decision in court) could give rise to significant and potentially onerous new duties to local authorities.”

164. Similar comment was made by the City of Edinburgh Council. South Lanarkshire Council stated that “while we support the intention of the Bill’s approach that local authorities can act as a third party to the PRHP, and consider that the approach could increase flexibility to address poor standards in the PRS, we have some reservations…regarding the resourcing of it.”

considers it important that “further work is carried out to establish resource requirements” to support councils in relation to this power.

165. The Committee therefore asks the Scottish Government whether it is content that the resource requirements for local authorities of this provision have been considered.

Electrical safety and the repairing standard

166. The Electrical Safety Council (ESC) alerted the Committee to the fact that “According to government statistics, 69% of all accidental fires in Scottish homes (more than 3400 annually) are caused by electricity. Independent research also suggests that private tenants are more likely to be at risk of electric shock or fire than owner occupiers.”

The ESC considers that changes could potentially be made to the repairing standard to enable improvements in electrical safety to be made.

167. The Committee pursued the points the ESC had raised throughout its evidence taking. It heard suggestions to supplement the Bill’s provisions to provide improvements to the physical standard of private rented housing, in particular:

- mandatory five-yearly checks, carried out by a registered electrician, of electrical installations and any electrical appliances supplied with privately rented homes;
- to make the provision of suitable mains smoke alarms mandatory in private rented properties, as battery operated smoke alarms are unreliable;
- and to make the installation of carbon monoxide alarms mandatory for all private rented accommodation.

168. The Committee supports all of these initiatives and recommends that the Scottish Government brings forward amendments to this effect at Stage 2.

PART 4 – LETTING AGENTS

169. Part 4 of the Bill provides for the registration of letting agents. The two main policy objectives of this part are firstly “to promote high standards of service and levels of professionalism across the country” and secondly, “to provide landlords and tenants with easy access to a mechanism that will help to resolve disputes when these arise.”

170. Under the provisions Scottish Ministers are required to create and maintain a national register of letting agents. Letting agents must apply for registration and section 30 of the Bill sets out “fit and proper person considerations” which apply to their application. Letting agents would be required to re-register after three years or be removed from the register. Scottish Ministers can also remove a letting agent from the register if they consider that the agent no longer meets the fit and proper person test. Appeals on decisions made in respect of the register can be made to the First-tier Tribunal.

171. Section 41 of the Bill gives Scottish Ministers the power to create a Code of Practice which sets out the standards of practice which are required by people who carry out letting agency work. The Bill enables a tenant or landlord to apply to the First-tier Tribunal for a determination that a letting agent has failed to comply with the Code of Practice.

172. The provisions in the Bill are based largely on the system of regulation operating for property factors, introduced by the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011.

173. Evidence to the Committee widely supported the establishment of a registration scheme for letting agents. Disagreement with the provisions centred on whether the Bill has gone far enough in its registration requirements and the extent of the governance of letting agents. Concerns were raised in relation to the effectiveness of the current Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 and whether the Bill should mirror its provisions in respect of registration.

174. The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors (RICS) suggested that the Act’s necessary “qualifications” for registering as a property factor are “too low and very simplistic”, with the result that property factors with “a history of malpractice or misconduct, are now legitimised to practice.” ¹⁵⁷ LetScotland “would not support simply replicating the process and principles established for the Property Factors Register.” ¹⁵⁸

175. Debate around the extent of the Bill’s ability to tackle bad practice of letting agents also focused on the Bill’s provision on the Code of Practice. ARLA does “not think that the proposed Code of Practice (outlined at section 41) which will contain a prescriptive set of requirements is sufficient to raise standards in the industry.” ¹⁵⁹

176. RICS set out in written evidence the requirements that it perceived should be included in any Code of Practice. These were that letting agents should—

- avoid conflicts of interest and any actions or situations that are inconsistent with its professional obligations;
- provide regular training and/or continuing professional development (CPD) for all staff;
- make provisions for their tenants and landlords to access a comprehensive complaints handling procedure;

¹⁵⁷ Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors Scotland. Written submission, page 3.

¹⁵⁹ Association of Residential Letting Agents. Written submission, page 3.
• have access to separate client money bank account and client money protection; and
• carry professional indemnity insurance.\textsuperscript{160}

177. The Minister stated that—

“We have looked at the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011, and I agree that, in practice, we might need something stronger for letting agents.”\textsuperscript{161}

178. The point was developed later in evidence when the Minister stated—

“We will certainly look at strengthening what is required of a letting agent. We are not going down the road of thinking that letting agents have to be a member of a professional body, because that is about the industry regulating itself. In effect, it would say who gets into and out of the register. However, we will certainly look at things such as training, qualifications and how letting agents operate their business.”\textsuperscript{162}

179. The Committee has heard evidence, both from those within and outside the letting agent profession, to support the strengthening of the provisions regarding the registration and governance of letting agents.

180. The Committee recognises that much of the detail of the register of letting agents and the Code of Practice is subject to further regulations. However, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government considers how it might include on the face of the Bill details of what those regulations might cover, such as professional conduct, qualifications/training and financial obligations.

181. In oral evidence, the Committee heard concerns in relation to the three year registration period at section 34 of the Bill. Witnesses considered that agents should be required to re-register on a more regular basis.\textsuperscript{163}

182. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government considers an initial period of registration of one year before an agent progresses to three year registration.

183. In response to whether the Code of Practice could “help the sector develop more sustainable business practices”, RICS stated that it is currently collaborating with the UN Global Compact to produce a best practice toolkit for the real estate, land and construction sector, and would welcome any future opportunity to discuss the progress of this initiative with Members.

184. Given letting agents’ role in property management and in providing advice to landlords, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government considers how the Code of Practice could seek to encourage letting agents to support Scotland’s climate change targets in this capacity.

185. The Committee heard that it is not clear how many letting agents operate in Scotland, although the Policy Memorandum suggests that there are an estimated 750 providers operating, managing around 150,000 lettings a year, which equates to 50% of all annual lettings in the private rented sector. The Policy Memorandum also points out the range of property management services for landlords provided by solicitors, estate agents and accommodation agencies.\textsuperscript{164}

186. The Committee considers that the Scottish Government should take an active role in identifying unregistered letting agents and seeks the Minister’s views on how this might be taken forward.

187. RICS has also raised with the Committee that the letting agent registration system should also have provisions “for ensuring that letting agents that fail the ‘fit and proper’ person test, or are struck off, are not allowed to re-enter the sector through alternate means; for example, by taking a ‘lower’ position in a large firm i.e. not director level, as to avoid ‘detection’ when the company applies for registration.”\textsuperscript{165} ARLA has raised similar concerns.\textsuperscript{166}

188. The Committee seeks clarification from the Scottish Government on how this might be tackled through registration or the Code of Practice.

Context

189. Residential mobile homes are also known as “park homes”, and are used by their owners as a permanent home. Mobile home parks are increasingly popular with elderly residents. People living in park homes rent the land their mobile home stands on from the site (park) owner for a pitch fee, but own the mobile home itself.

190. Research by Consumer Focus (2013, identified 92 mobile home sites in Scotland, with around 3314 mobile homes, spread across 22 local authority areas. In the same research, 61% of residents stated that they were satisfied with the site they lived on. However, 29% expressed dissatisfaction and 73% reported at least one problem on their site in the last five years. Problems experienced on site included maintenance, security and safety standards. Some respondents reported problems with their site owner or manager’s behaviour, including intimidation, or damage to property.\textsuperscript{167}

Intentions of the Bill

191. Part 5 of the Bill provides the licence mechanisms by which the Scottish Government intends to address problems experienced by permanent residents of mobile and park homes.\(^{168}\)

192. Scottish Government analysis of its consultation found residents were supportive of the principles of Part 5, and welcomed legislation which would protect permanent residents and improve site conditions across the country. However, a number of stakeholders have raised concerns with the Committee concerning the potential impacts of this legislation, and comments focused on a few key areas, including:

- the proposed three year renewal/review period for licences;
- the costs associated with site licencing;
- the fit and proper persons test; and
- local authority enforcement.

193. This Committee has addressed these issues in some detail in this report in order to take account of the wide range of points highlighted in oral and, particularly, written evidence.

Part 1A site licence

Duration of site licences

194. Section 56 of the Bill proposes that mobile home site licences would be renewed every three years. This provision divided respondents during the Scottish Government’s consultation period, and during the Committee’s scrutiny process.

195. The Committee heard that some respondents welcomed the proposed three year licence renewal period rather than the current situation by which licences are treated as being for an indefinite period.\(^{169}\) Other stakeholders were opposed to fixed term licences.

Impact upon site financing

196. The British Holiday and Home Park Association (BH&HPA) raised concerns about the potential impact of set licence renewal periods on financial arrangements for park homes. In evidence to the Committee, the BH&HPA cited the impacts of similar licencing on park home sites in Wales\(^{170}\), where withdrawal of financing has been experienced.\(^{171}\)

197. The Minister responded during her evidence to the Committee that the Scottish Government was aware that this may be an issue, but that it had no firm evidence on this matter. She added that Scottish Government officials were in discussion with Welsh Assembly colleagues to establish the facts on this matter.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 12 March 2014, Col 2811.}

198. The Committee is concerned by the suggestion that financial lenders may withdraw support for sites on the basis of the introduction of fixed term licences. The Committee supports the Scottish Government’s commitment to learning from experiences following the introduction of similar legislation by the Welsh Assembly and to establish whether there has been an impact on lending for mobile home sites in Wales.

199. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government also work with lenders groups to clarify their views on the introduction of a fixed term licence, and what it might mean in Scotland.

200. The Committee heard that mobile and park home owners and representative groups were in favour of a system where licences are subject to review rather than renewal, with an assumption in the favour of continuation of the licence.\footnote{British Home & Holiday Park Association. Written submission, page 7.}

201. Residents groups took a similar view from the perspective of avoiding rogue operators from using a fixed term licence to threaten residents. Both Brian Doick, of the National Association of Park Home Residents, and David Tweddle, of the Independent Park Home Advisory Service, were in agreement that the expanded range of local authority enforcement powers provided for in the Bill, and the fit and proper person test (FPPT), would mean that a fixed term licence was unnecessary, and that licences could continue in perpetuity subject to compliance by site owners.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 19 February 2014, Cols 2625 – 2626.}

202. The Minister clarified in evidence the Scottish Government’s vision for a fixed term licence—

“I do not want to say that the licence will roll on, which might mean something else, but the bill says that the licence will be renewed automatically every three years, unless the site owner has breached requirements. As the park owners suggested, they would apply for the licence and, although they would have to apply again three years later, the local authority would automatically renew the licence, unless any breaches had occurred. We are not quite sure how that differs from what the owners propose.”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 12 March 2014, Col 2811.}

203. It has been clear from evidence that there is some confusion about the implications of the use of the word ‘renewal’ in the Bill versus ‘review’. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government sets out as clearly as possible what it intends by using the word ‘renewal’ as opposed to ‘review’, and what the implications are for site residents as part of an education campaign for residents and site owners.

\begin{itemize}
\item\footnote{Scottish Parliament Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 12 March 2014, Col 2811.}

Local authorities

204. Some witnesses expressed concern about the lack of local authority involvement with mobile home sites. Mobile home residents’ representative Brian Doick told the Committee that local authorities have not had a duty to police site licence conditions, and so checks have not taken place.

205. Local authorities themselves expressed concerns regarding licencing, particularly regarding enforcement tools and the availability of resources. Angus Council was of the view that policing licencing conditions can be challenging and costly, especially in its region where there are a large number of mobile home sites of varying types. It stated—

“...in Angus breaches of planning permission and breaches of site licences are relatively common. We are not convinced that the Bill has sufficient cost efficient tools and penalties to deter misbehaviour until further legislation is introduced to address holiday and migrant worker sites. Again there will be cost implications in terms of administration for local authorities and in the current time when savings are being made there could be inadequate resources.”

206. Local authorities also stated their concern about sites which are officially designated as holiday sites, but where there is evidence to suggest they also have permanent residents. Angus Council noted that there are increasing numbers of such sites in its region—

“The Bill deals with permanent residential sites only and does not address the issue of “holiday” sites. The boundaries between the two in practical terms are very often blurred as many sites are a mixture of residential and so called holiday lets.”

207. Local authorities and COSLA added that it was unclear where, or if, migrant workers sites would fit into the Bill, and requested clarification on this matter.

208. The Finance Committee, in its letter to the ICI Committee noted the concerns raised by Angus Council regarding the cost of licence policing, and the issue of migrant worker site and holiday sites.

209. The Minister responded on the matter of resourcing that the provisions of the Bill were intended to cover most or all of the cost of the licencing and inspection scheme—

“The bill gives local authorities an income stream in relation to issuing and enforcing mobile home site licences. It also gives them the ability to claim back from site owners the costs of any enforcement action. We expect the fees to cover the cost of a site inspection at least once in the term of a licence.”\textsuperscript{182}

210. The Minister also clarified the Scottish Government’s intention that local authorities would concentrate their resources on problem sites where a greater degree of intervention is required.\textsuperscript{183}

211. The Committee recognises concerns about the potential impact on resources of the new licencing scheme but, as outlined by the Minister, the scheme should in effect be cost neutral.

212. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government works with local authorities to enhance councils’ understanding of mobile and park home site regulations, and to enhance awareness, and embed the need for a consistent and thorough approach to inspections.

Cost of site licencing

213. Provisions in the Bill would allow local authorities to charge fees for granting site licences and to set the level for those fees. The Bill grants Scottish Ministers the powers to set the maximum level of fee in regulations, and specifies the matters which a local authority must take into account when setting fees. It is the intention that the fee would allow local authorities to carry out necessary inspections on a cost neutral basis, and that the fee charged could be flexible to take into account the size of the site in question.\textsuperscript{184}

214. CAS was supportive of the charging measures, but felt that local authorities should be bound to carry out certain specified inspections, in addition to any routine inspections.\textsuperscript{185}

215. The BH&HPA did not object to the principles of site licence fees, but suggested a number of points regarding fee levels, and how the money from fees should be used.\textsuperscript{186}

216. One mobile home site owner suggested that consideration be given to sites where there are both holiday homes and permanent residents, to ensure that there was not an unfair duplication of costs for different licences for the same site.\textsuperscript{187}

217. Residents representatives groups expressed opposition to the cost of licencing being passed onto residents—

“The resident is paying for the owner’s licence, but that should be a business cost to him. That is a disgrace, but owners seem to have got away with it in England. We certainly do not agree with that.”

218. Written evidence from the Minister clarifies the Scottish Government’s position that the cost of licencing could be passed onto residents, but that protections in the Bill will ensure that the fee for the site (thus cost to the residents) will be proportionate to the size of the site. Fees will not exceed a maximum licencing fee that will be set by Ministers. Scottish Government research suggested that the average cost increase to site residents as a result of the new licencing scheme will be between £5 and £10 per annum.

219. The Committee recognises that there is flexibility in the Bill to ensure that the cost of a site licence is proportionate to the size of the site, and should reflect only the costs of administering the licence scheme.

220. The Committee views the expected cost increase for residents to be fair given the increased protections residents will enjoy under the provisions of the Bill. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government considers the ways by which it can be ensured that the additional cost to residents (if passed on) is in line with the plan set out in its letter to the Committee of 21 March 2014.

Impact of perceptions around licencing

221. The Committee heard that a three year renewal cycle could put prospective park residents off purchasing a park home due to uncertainty about what might happen if a site were to lose its licence.

222. The Committee also received written evidence from a number of permanent site residents expressing confusion about what the Bill might mean for them in the future. One couple said—

“If the new licensing scheme goes ahead we feel that we would be in a very worrying situation as we would be put in a position of "wait and see" if the Site is going to be granted a licence every 3 years? Where are we to live if the site is not granted a licence?”

223. The Committee also heard from a number of stakeholders their concern that the fixed-term licence might be used as a ‘weapon’ by rogue site operators to threaten and intimidate vulnerable site residents. David Tweddle, of the Independent Park Home Advisory Service, outlined to the Committee how residents could be misinformed by such site owners.
224. The Minister responded to these concerns by stating that the intention of the fixed term licence is to protect residents—

“I know that evidence has suggested that site owners are telling tenants, “If we lose our licence after three years, you’re off the site.” That is simply not the case. We need to do some work on that by talking to both site owners and residents to assure them that that is not the intention. The intention was to protect tenants, and the situation seems to be turning, so we will issue advice and information to residents and to site owners about our views on the matter.”

225. The Committee has heard in evidence that there is confusion about the potential impacts which the new licencing scheme may have upon residents of mobile and park home sites, both for site owners, and prospective and current residents. It is concerned that deliberate or accidental misinformation could create undue stress and concern, and negatively impact upon people’s ability to buy or sell their mobile homes. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s assurances that the loss of a site licence to the owner would not result in the eviction of site residents, and that statements to the contrary by site owners is misinformation, deliberate or otherwise.

226. The Committee recommends an awareness campaign to ensure that residents and site owners are provided with accurate and clear information about the intentions and impacts of the Bill. This should specify where further information can be accessed, and bodies they can contact for support. The Committee believes that this would both support legitimate site owners, and empower residents, as well as providing reassurance and answering core questions.

Fit and proper person test

227. A FPPT is provided for in the Bill, and would require those applying for, or looking to renew, a site licence to satisfy a test to confirm that they are a ‘fit and proper person’ to hold the site licence. The test would consider a range of factors as laid out in the Policy Memorandum.

228. The inclusion at section 61 of a FPPT was generally welcomed by stakeholders who believed that it would help to weed out rogue site operators, ensure the safety and security of site residents and help local “authorities when granting, managing and reviewing licences.”

229. Brian Doick of the National Association of Park Home Residents expressed in evidence to the Committee his belief that the new test could prove to be significant. Barry Plews, of the Park Home Legislation Action Group, added that it would have a positive impact upon the types of persons permitted to run a site.\textsuperscript{197}

230. However, mobile home site owners representative group BH&HPA expressed reservations about the provisions as they stand, and called for the criteria for the test to be clearly defined, as well as applied consistently across Scotland.\textsuperscript{198} It recommended in its written submission that a national FPPT would help ensure consistency. It said—

“We would further recommend that a standard procedure be set-up to establish fit and proper status for applicants so that it can be used across all local authorities in Scotland to ensure consistency throughout the country.”\textsuperscript{199}

231. Similarly, Brian Doick suggested that a register of persons deemed not to be fit and proper persons should be kept and the information should be shared between local authorities.\textsuperscript{200}

232. CAS recommended that an addition should be made to the list of criteria in the FPPT — that an individual seeking a licence should not have been shown to profiteer on energy costs. Although legislation is in place which specifies that utilities on mobile home sites should only be re-sold to residents on the basis of cost plus a small administration fee, CAS believed that this may not always be complied with. It said —

“Despite this Consumer Futures found extensive suspicion on the parts of residents that site owners were profiteering from the resale of utilities and we believe that if profiteering is proven this should be considered as part of a FPPT.”\textsuperscript{201}

233. Tenancy and Estate Management Service (TEMS) also highlighted the concerns raised in Scottish Government consultations about the potential for rogue operators to subvert the FPPT. It stated—

“We respect the views expressed in the consultation that the system should seek to avoid onerous bureaucracy and that for the more malicious site owners there is often a difficulty in identifying from complex business and family structures, who should sit the fit and proper test.”\textsuperscript{202}

234. The Committee believes that the FPPT represents a positive step in ensuring the safety and security of park home residents in Scotland, and in driving up standards in the industry. It is vital that the test be consistent, fair and robust to ensure that rogue operators are exposed.

\textsuperscript{202} Tenancy and Estate Management Service. Written submission, page 6.
235. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government consider the feasibility and potential benefits of a FPPT register in Scotland which could be shared across local authorities in Scotland, and which captures data about site owners who have passed FPPT, and applicants who do not. The Committee is of the view that this will help to ensure that compliant site owners are enabled to expend their businesses as they wish, and that non-compliant owners are prevented from simply moving to another authority and continuing to employ non-compliant behaviours.

236. The Committee also recommends that the Scottish Government considers whether there is scope in the FPPT to take into account issues regarding operators who have been shown to have profiteered from energy re-sale to mobile home owners.

Local authority enforcement at relevant permanent sites

237. The Scottish Government intends that the provisions in the Bill on enforcement powers for local authorities will help tackle non-compliant behaviour.\(^{203}\)

238. These provisions are intended to operate on a ‘polluter pays’ principle whereby compliant site owners would not be penalised for the behaviours of non-compliant site owners.

239. There was some debate between stakeholders about the levels of fines proposed in the Bill. The maximum fine level was raised to ensure consistency with other areas of legislation. The CAS took the view that fines should be unlimited\(^{204}\), whereas the BH&HPA took the view that the proposed maximum fine was too high.\(^{205}\) Craigtoun Meadows suggested there should be a sliding scale of fines for non-compliance.\(^{206}\)

240. The Committee asked residents’ representatives whether the Scottish Government’s proposed range of enforcement tools in the Bill is wide enough to act as a deterrent to rogue operators, whether the tools are proportionate, and whether they suggested any additional enforcement tools for local authorities. The representatives agreed that they were happy with the range “as long as the enforcement tools are used.”\(^{207}\)

241. The Committee also asked whether the representatives were content that residents would be protected from fines being passed on by site owners, and respondents were content that the Bill takes measures to protect residents from this.

242. When questioning the Minister on the same issue the Committee sought assurances that fines could not be passed on to residents. She sought to assure the Committee that this is something the Scottish Government would not tolerate—

“The intention is certainly not that residents should pay for bad services that landlords have been made to correct. We will look into that.”

243. On 21 March 2014, the Minister wrote to the Committee with further information and acknowledged that, as it stands, the Bill does not protect residents from potentially bearing the cost of fines, but sought to assure the Committee that this would be considered at Stage 2 of the Bill. She said—

“Under section 68 of the Bill, if a local authority took enforcement action against a site owner it could recover the costs of that action from the site owner. As currently drafted, the Bill would not prevent the site owner from passing on those costs to residents through pitch fees…I am looking at the possibility of whether it would be possible to amend the Bill to prevent that happening.”

244. The Committee is concerned at the prospect of fines for non-compliance by site owners being passed on to residents. The Committee is of the view that it is insupportable that residents should pay for a good service, not receive it, and end up paying the fine for the non-compliance of the site owner and the bad service they themselves received. However, the Committee is reassured that the Scottish Government is considering the possibility of addressing this issue at Stage 2.

PART 6 – PRIVATE HOUSING CONDITIONS

Objectives
245. In Part 6 of the Bill, the Scottish Government’s objective is to ensure that local authorities have a range of powers to tackle poor conditions in the private sector. It is intended that these new discretionary powers will give councils a wider range of tools to use as part of a strategic approach to improving poor standard housing in their areas.

246. The Policy Memorandum to the Bill lays out the objectives of the provisions on house condition enforcement powers, which are intended to:

- clarify the existing power to pay missing shares on behalf of owners who are unwilling or unable to pay their share, to ensure that local authorities are able to use that power to support majority decisions by owners under the tenement management scheme for repair works;
- allow local authorities to issue maintenance orders where they have issued a work notice;
- reduce the administrative burden of maintenance orders;
- enable local authorities to include incidental work to address safety and security work notices; and

provide local authorities with effective means to recover the costs of work to address disrepair from owners of commercial property in housing blocks.

247. Stakeholders generally welcomed of the new powers and clarification of existing powers, and saw it as a positive opportunity to tackle poor housing standards in private ownership. Others saw the new powers and amendments as limited, and a potential additional burden on local authorities.

Tenement management scheme - “missing share”

248. Section 72 of the Bill makes provisions to allow local authorities to step in where an owner is unwilling or unable to pay or cannot be found or identified. It also makes provision for local authorities to use repayment charges to recover the costs of paying the missing shares.211

249. Property management groups in particular welcomed this aspect of the Bill, and saw it as beneficial to those landlords with properties in multi-ownership buildings. Edinburgh Scottish Property Centre (ESPC) stated in its submission to the Committee—

“It will put an end to the current situation that some landlords can face in having to cover other people’s share of communal repairs in order to comply with the repairing standard for their property and provide a compliant property for their tenants.”212

250. However, some local authorities took the view that the ‘missing share’ powers were not new, and that the clarifications under Part 6 of the Bill would make little difference in real terms. Glasgow City Council stated that it believed the ‘missing share’ power already exists. It said—

“Authorities already have ‘missing shares’ powers under Section 50 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 therefore the Council questions the relevance or need for this.”213

251. The biggest concern raised around the ‘missing share’ powers was that of local authority resources, both to fund the resources up front and to recover the costs. Local authorities, and some residents groups, believed that resources were already under pressure, and that enacting these powers may add to the strain. The City of Edinburgh Council stated in its submission that—

“While amendments to support home owners to carry out shared repairs are welcome, there is some concern that local authorities will be unable to make use of these powers because of a lack of resources to cover upfront costs and difficulty in recovering costs.”214

252. This was a view echoed by Jim Hayton, of ALACHO, in oral evidence to the Committee. He said—

211 SPICe briefing on the Housing (Scotland) Bill, page 44.
“There are some amendments in the bill to the tenement management scheme to allow local authorities to step in and pay so-called missing shares, where owners are reluctant to carry out works... those are broadly welcomed by local authorities... We still have the thorny problem of paying the money up front and trying to recover it.”

in tenements to progress repairs and maintenance in cases where the majority of owners support the work, but a minority of shares are ‘missing’.

257. The Committee also acknowledges the mixed response of local authorities to these amendments, with the principles of the amendments being generally welcomed but the practicalities of initially resourcing the ‘missing shares’, and laterally the cost and administrative burden of recouping ‘missing shares’, raising concerns.

258. The Committee takes the view that as the ‘missing share’ amendments are powers rather than duties, it can be expected that there will be variation between authorities as to whether they choose to employ these powers or not. Therefore, the Committee welcomes the principles of these amendments, but believes that the impact may be limited by local authorities’ reticence, or inability, to commit funding where they believe it may have difficulty recovering it, and the timescales for recovering those funds is prolonged.

259. The Committee is of the view that a 30-year repayment period is excessive, and that there is sense in the suggestion that local authorities should be given the flexibility to determine the time period over which the share must be paid back based on individual circumstances. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government considers the feasibility of this suggestion, and considers other ways of enabling and encouraging local authorities to use these powers where appropriate.

Work notices, maintenance orders and repayment charges

Objectives

260. The Bill makes several minor changes to the powers associated with work notices and maintenance orders and plans as set out in the 2006 Act. These amendments are described on page 45 of the SPICe briefing.

261. As with the ‘missing share’ power in Part 6, the new powers regarding work notices and maintenance plans were broadly welcomed by stakeholders.

262. City of Glasgow Council stated—

“The streamlining of the maintenance order process is welcomed as are the proposals to allow local authorities to record repayment charges against commercial premises and increasing the scope of work to allow security measures to be included within Work Notices.”

263. But similarly to the missing share provision, questions were raised regarding local authority resources. Angus Council in its written statement said—

“Again the question to ask would be who is going to be responsible for managing this provision as at the present time local authorities are stretched on resources and if they were given more discretionary powers additional resources would be needed.”

219 Glasgow City Council. Written submission, page 8.

264. This was echoed in West Lothian Council’s submission—

“The proposed changes to work notices and maintenance plans are welcomed, although may create expectation which resources do not exist to satisfy.”

265. The Committee welcomes these powers but, as with the ‘missing share’ provision, encourages the Scottish Government to consider other ways of enabling and encouraging local authorities to use these powers where appropriate.

Sustainability in private housing

266. The Policy Memorandum to the Bill states that the Scottish Government considers that amendments to local authority house condition enforcement powers will promote environmental, social and economic aspects of sustainable development. Improvement to private home disrepair will improve energy efficiency (reducing fuel consumption and waste) and the physical environment, which will in turn have a positive social, environmental and economic impact upon people’s lives.

267. Stakeholders generally took the view that the Bill would do little to support the improvement of energy efficiency in private housing. The SFHA said—

“... we would repeat our concerns in relation to the physical standards of privately owned homes, particularly in respect of energy efficiency, that they are generally much lower than in the social rented sector. There is nothing in this Bill that would have a robust impact on driving these standards up in the privately owned sector.”

268. Both RICS and the City of Edinburgh Council suggested that, in properties of multiple ownership, there would be benefit in owners taking a planned approach to maintenance, with regular roof inspections being a key point. They take the view that a planned approach may help identify problems before they become serious, and enable the work to be carried out swiftly. They envisaged ‘stairwell committees’ developing maintenance plans for their buildings, with guidance and advice from local authorities, and the possibility of enforcement measures if necessary.

269. The Committee recognises the importance of improving domestic energy efficiency in order to meet Scotland’s ambitious climate change targets. The Committee notes that this Bill does not directly address energy efficiency of private housing and recalls its previous recommendation that 223 Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors. Written submission, page 8.

The Scottish Government considers the introduction of minimum standards across the private sector earlier than 2018.\textsuperscript{225}

270. The Committee sees the value in suggestions regarding the creation of maintenance and inspection systems in properties of multiple ownership, and considers that this would promote community empowerment, and prevent minor repairs and associated costs spiralling as a result of continued disrepair. However, the Committee also recognises the potential difficulties which individual properties may experience in setting up and administering such schemes, especially in properties of mixed tenure.

Other issues
271. The Policy Memorandum to the Bill states that it is intended that condition enforcement powers would support housing improvements, and support other Scottish Government policies to enable older people to remain in their own homes and to enable adaptations to housing for disabled people.\textsuperscript{226}

272. Inclusion Scotland noted in its submission that it was unclear how the provisions in Part 6 would support this intention—

“…it is not clear from the Bill or the Explanatory Notes how the enforcement powers will enable adaptations to housing for disabled people. We hope this can be clarified by the Scottish Government during Stage 1.”\textsuperscript{227}

273. The Committee welcomes any provision which enables people to live independently in their own homes for as long as possible. While it is possible to envisage how improvement to energy efficiency and physical improvements to properties may support older people in continuing to live independently, the Committee shares Inclusion Scotland’s lack of clarity about how these provisions will support adaptation for disabled people. The Committee would welcome more information from the Scottish Government on this point.

PART 7 – MISCELLANEOUS

Scottish Housing Regulator: transfer of assets following inquiries
274. Section 79 (paragraph a) of the Bill proposes to remove the requirement for the Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR) to consult with tenants prior to the removal of assets of a registered social landlord (RSL) where there is immediate threat of insolvency.

275. The Policy Memorandum states that that this provision will create a narrow exception to the general duty at section 67(4) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 which requires the SHR always to consult tenants and lenders before it directs a transfer of assets. It indicates that it is “intended to address cases where the SHR could remove the threat of a RSL becoming insolvent by a direction to transfer all or some of the RSL’s assets to other RSLs and where the need to make the direction is so urgent that there is no time to consult tenants and landlords”.228

276. The Policy Memorandum also states that, although the Scottish Government consulted the SHR on this proposal, there was no formal consultation with “representatives of tenants, lenders, RSLs and other stakeholders” prior to its inclusion in the Bill.229

277. Tenants’ representatives who provided evidence to the Committee voiced strong opposition to this provision, For example, Lesley Baird of TPAS said—

“To say that it is unpopular would be an understatement. What is the regulator doing if we get to the stage at which we have to transfer properties without any consultation? How long does it take? There is absolutely no support at all for that proposal.”230

278. Ilene Campbell of TIS questioned at what stage the SHR would make a decision that immediate action was required and there was no opportunity to consult with tenants. She expressed the view that, even in urgent circumstances, tenants still had a right to be consulted, even if this had to be carried out to an abbreviated timescale. She also queried how a point could be reached where such urgent action was required, without earlier warnings having become apparent—

“If we were advising a group of tenants on the matter, they would ask why they were only being informed about the situation so late on in the day. In such a case, something would have gone wrong in the regulatory process, because there would have been lots of warnings signs before the situation arose.”231

279. Jennifer Macleod of the Highland and Argyll and Bute Tenants Network agreed that it should be possible to identify at an earlier stage through appropriate monitoring when an RSL is experiencing financial difficulties. She also argued that the provision eroded tenants’ rights and said—

“If an organisation has to be dissolved or passed on to another housing association, the tenants must be consulted. Over the past 10 years, we as tenants have been given rights that we did not dream of having 20 years ago. The proposal is a backwards step....”232

280. The Committee raised these concerns with the Minister who stated that the provision was “about protecting tenants to ensure that in those very extreme

228 Policy Memorandum, pages 57-58
circumstances they would be protected and they would have a landlord”. She explained—

“We envisage it being exercised only if a social landlord is in financial jeopardy that means that they could imminently become insolvent as the lender could call in the debt. In those circumstances, a direction from the Scottish Housing Regulator to transfer the assets to another registered landlord would reduce the likelihood of that happening. In those circumstances, there might not be time to consult.”

281. The Committee understands and accepts the rationale behind the Scottish Government’s decision to include this provision in the Bill. However, it considers it to be very unfortunate that the opportunity was not taken to consult key stakeholders in advance of the Bill’s introduction to explain the reasons behind its approach. It is of the view that it is possible that such dialogue may have served to reassure those stakeholders who are now opposed to its inclusion in the Bill that it is designed to provide added protection for tenants, as opposed to what they consider to be a diminution of tenants’ rights.

282. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to provide details of how it intends to engage with stakeholders, tenants’ representative groups and RSLs in particular, to provide clarity on the specific circumstances in which this power would be used. It also recommends that clear and unambiguous guidance should be produced by the Scottish Government setting out these circumstances and the process to be followed by the SHR should they arise.

283. The Committee further recommends that this guidance should set out how, in the event that this power is to be used by the SHR, information on the specific reasons for its use should be quickly and effectively communicated to all affected tenants and representative groups.

RSL restructuring – proposal for ballot of tenants

284. When appearing before the Committee, the Minister indicated that representations from the GWSF had been received which contained what she described as “compelling arguments” as to why tenants should be balloted when an amalgamation or a merger of RSLs is proposed. The GWSF also set out the reasoning behind its proposal in its written submission to the Committee.

285. She explained that tenants are currently only balloted if there is a proposal to change their landlord, whereas a ballot is not required if a housing association intends to amalgamate with, or enter a constitutional partnership with, a larger housing association.

234 Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations. Written submission, page 9.
286. The Minister advised the Committee that the Scottish Government believes that “for there to be openness and transparency, tenants perhaps should be consulted in those circumstances.”235 She indicated that she would be writing to stakeholders to inform them that the Scottish Government is minded to consider addressing this matter at Stage 2. The Committee notes that a consultation letter was issued on 12 March 2014.

DELEGATED POWERS AND LAW REFORM COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

287. Under Rule 9.6.2 of Standing Orders, where a Bill contains provisions conferring powers to make subordinate legislation, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform (DPLR) Committee must consider and report to the lead committee on those provisions.

288. The DPLR Committee report is attached at Annexe D.

Powers to issue guidance

Section 4(2) – Power to issue guidance regarding the making or altering of social landlords’ rules on allocation of housing (inserts new subsection (3A) in section 21 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987).

Section 7(2) – Power to issue guidance on the maximum period preceding an application for housing during which a social landlord may take account of certain circumstances, and on the maximum period for which a landlord may make an applicant ineligible for the allocation of housing as a result of those circumstances (inserts new section 20B(3) in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987).

Section 8(1) – Power to issue guidance regarding the creation of, or conversion of a tenancy to, a short Scottish secure tenancy on the grounds of antisocial behaviour (inserts new section 34(9) in the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001).

289. The DPLR Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to consult on and publish any guidance issued under the powers conferred by sections 4(2), 7(2) and 8(1) of the Bill. However, the DPLR Committee asks the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to require consultation on, and publication of, any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers under the powers conferred by those sections.

290. The ICI Committee supports the view of the DPLR Committee and requests that the Scottish Government brings forward amendments to require consultation on and publication of the guidance at Stage 2.

Letting Agent Code of Practice

Section 41(1) – Power to set out a code of practice which makes provision about the standard of practice of persons who carry out letting agency work.

291. Under section 41(3) of the Bill, the Scottish Ministers must consult on a draft of the Letting Agent Code of Practice before it is finalised. The regulations which set out a Code of Practice are subject to negative procedure.

292. The DPLR Committee has asked the Scottish Government to consider further in advance of Stage 2 of the Bill whether the significance of the legal consequences of failure to comply with a letting agent code of practice are such that the affirmative procedure is a more suitable level of parliamentary scrutiny than the negative procedure.

293. Given the importance of the Code of Practice, the ICI Committee supports the DPLR Committee recommendation and seeks the Scottish Government’s views on this power.

Power to make provision in relation to procedure

Section 60 – Power to make provision concerning the procedure to be followed in relation to the application and transfer of site licences, and appeals relating to site licences (Inserts section 32N in the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960).

294. New section 32N of the 1960 Act gives the Scottish Ministers the power, by regulations, to make provision in relation to the procedures to be followed for an application for a site licence, an application for consent to transfer a site licence, and the transfer of a site licence on death. It also allows Ministers to make provision in relation to appeals against a decision by a local authority to refuse a licence application, to transfer a licence, to refuse consent to transfer a licence or to revoke a licence.

295. The ICI Committee notes the series of points that the DPLR Committee has raised with the Scottish Government in relation to the drafting, effect and points of consistency within this section of the Bill. The overall point made by the DPLR Committee concerns the balance between what is on the face of the Bill and in the regulations.

296. The ICI Committee will monitor the Scottish Government’s response in respect of this provision in advance of Stage 2 consideration.

Power to vary maximum fine

Section 63 - Power to vary maximum fine. (Inserts section 32T in the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960)

297. The DPLR Committee does not consider that section 32T(1) of the 1960 Act (inserted by section 63 of the Bill) should confer an unlimited discretion to vary the maximum fine for conviction in respect of the offences listed. It considers that the circumstances under which the maximum fine may be varied are matters for the Parliament and that the power should be restricted to permit variation of the maximum fine only where it appears to the Scottish Ministers that particular circumstances apply. The DPLR Committee considers that these circumstances should reflect the specific policy intention in taking the power.
298. The ICI Committee supports the DPLR Committee’s request that the Scottish Ministers consider bringing forward a suitable amendment at Stage 2.

CONCLUSION

General principles
299. Under Rule 9.6.1 of Standing Orders, the lead committee is required to report to the Parliament on the general principles of the Bill. In doing so, the ICI Committee has taken into consideration evidence from a wide range of groups and stakeholders.

300. The Committee welcomes the Housing (Scotland) Bill as providing a package of measures which will contribute to the improvement of housing in the social, private rented and owner-occupied sectors.

301. The Committee has made a number of recommendations and comments in this report in response to the evidence it has heard. It calls on the Scottish Government to consider and respond to these during the later stages of the Bill's parliamentary scrutiny.

302. The Committee recommends that the Parliament should agree to the general principles of the Bill.

Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee

Wednesday 15 January 2014

[Housing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1]

The Convener (Maureen Watt): Good morning, and welcome to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee’s first meeting in 2014. I remind everyone to switch off any mobile devices, as they affect the broadcasting system. Having said that, I note that some members will be working from tablets, as their committee papers are on the devices.

The only item of business is evidence on the Housing (Scotland) Bill at stage 1 from Scottish Government bill team representatives. We have Linda Leslie, housing strategy team leader; Claire Tosh, team leader, private housing services; Barry Stalker, team leader, private rented sector policy; Daniel Couldridge, senior policy officer, housing options and support; and Colin Brown, senior principal legal officer, communities and education division. Would Ms Leslie like to make any opening remarks?

Linda Leslie (Scottish Government): Yes, if that would be all right. The Housing (Scotland) Bill is a wide-ranging bill with provisions that affect all types of housing. Its policy objectives can be summed up as being to safeguard consumers’ interests, support improved quality and achieve better outcomes for communities.

To take each of the main topics in turn, the bill will end all right-to-buy entitlements; increase flexibility in the allocation and management of social housing so that landlords can deliver improved outcomes for their tenants and the communities that they live in; introduce a regulatory framework for letting agents to tackle those who do not meet industry standards of professionalism and conduct; create a new specialist private rented sector housing tribunal; give local authorities greater enforcement powers to improve the quality of houses in the private sector by requiring owners to carry out work to repair or maintain their properties; and improve and strengthen the licensing regime that applies to mobile home sites on which people live permanently. There are also miscellaneous provisions, as well as technical amendments to previous housing legislation.

Many of the provisions form part of the Scottish Government’s housing strategy in “Homes Fit for the 21st Century”. Since that document was published in 2011, we have developed the detail of the provisions through extensive consultation and discussion with stakeholders. Between 2012 and 2013, we held seven public consultations that covered each of the main policy areas in the bill. The Minister for Housing and Welfare continues to engage with stakeholders through her housing policy advisory group, which includes representatives from across the housing sector, and she is keen to reflect on stakeholders’ evidence and the committee’s views as the bill goes through stage 1.

We understand that the committee wishes to focus the session on four main areas: the private rented sector tribunal, which Dan Couldridge will cover; mobile homes, which Claire Tosh will cover; letting agents, which Barry Stalker will cover; and social housing allocations and tenancies, on which I will answer questions. I will answer general questions on the bill and I will try to answer any questions that members have on other areas but, if necessary, we will provide more detailed answers in writing. The final member of our team is our solicitor, Colin Brown.

The Convener: Adam Ingram will start with some general themes of the bill.

Adam Ingram (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP): The bill aspires to contribute to realising the Scottish Government’s housing vision, which, as you helpfully laid out in the slide that you provided to us, is that “All people in Scotland live in high-quality sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs.”

To what extent will the bill’s provisions support that vision?

Linda Leslie: As that slide shows, the separate policy areas in the bill feed into the supporting outcomes that underpin the vision. Those outcomes are a well-functioning housing system, high-quality sustainable homes, homes that meet people’s needs and sustainable communities. Each policy area does not map directly on to only one of the outcomes—some contribute to more than one outcome—but, taken as a whole, the provisions will contribute to those outcomes and therefore to the vision that ministers have for housing.

Adam Ingram: I will focus on one element of the vision—sustainability. Paragraph 32 of the policy memorandum states that the provisions have no adverse effect on sustainable development. Through what process was that determined?

Linda Leslie: The policy areas in the bill were assessed individually and collectively for their effect on sustainable development. We considered the effects in relation to the environment, society and the economy. In essence, the bill is concerned with property rights, processes and powers, none of which directly impacts on the environment.

We carried out a strategic environmental assessment pre-screening for the bill and concluded that, under section 7 of the Environmental Assessment (Scotland) Act 2005, a full SEA was not needed. We set out in the policy memorandum the possible effects of the various areas on the basis of existing evidence and discussions with key stakeholders as we developed the policies. For example, extending local authority discretionary powers to enforce repairs and maintenance in the private sector should indirectly have a positive effect. That was developed through consultation on our sustainable housing strategy.

Adam Ingram: You mentioned consultations and your discussions with stakeholders. Will you summarise the nature and extent of the consultation exercises and provide an overview of how you engaged with the stakeholders in the process?

Linda Leslie: We started discussions back in 2010, when we asked stakeholders whether any legislative changes could be made to help the housing system to work better. That formed part of our discussion paper “Housing: Fresh Thinking, New Ideas”. The outcome of that discussion fed into the strategy in “Homes Fit for the 21st Century”, and we identified a number of areas where legislative change might be appropriate and which we would explore in more detail. Based on that, we undertook over 18 months the seven consultations that I mentioned.

The approach of undertaking individual consultations reflected the fact that many of those areas have a discrete set of stakeholder interests, so each consultation was targeted at those interests and used methods that were appropriate to the relevant stakeholders. We did not just rely on publishing a consultation document. For example, officials who are leading on the right to buy met tenants groups across the country through the regional networks of registered landlords, so there has been a mix of approaches to our consultations.

The Convener: How many replies did you get via Facebook and social media?

Linda Leslie: I do not have that data here, but I can certainly write to you to let you know.

The Convener: We shall move on to part 1, on the right to buy.

Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): What views were expressed during the consultation on the proposed end to the right to buy?

Linda Leslie: There was a range of views. On the whole, landlords supported ending the right to buy, and the majority of tenants who responded to the consultation also supported ending the right to buy.

Alex Johnstone: You described the consultation a moment or two ago, and it is obvious that work was done to consult tenants as well as landlords. Was any special effort made to consult directly the tenants who have a right that they will lose?

Linda Leslie: That would have been done through the discussions with tenants groups, because the tenants groups that my colleagues met contained a mix of people who have the right and will lose it and of those who do not have a right.

Alex Johnstone: Why will there be a three-year notice period before the right to buy is ended, rather than a shorter notice period, as some social landlords suggested?

Linda Leslie: Ministers had to consider the effect on human rights of ending the right to buy. Our view was that there were potential issues under the European convention on human rights, so the decision that the notice period will be three years was made on the basis that that is a fair and reasonable timescale for tenants who have and can exercise their right to buy to exercise it.

Alex Johnstone: That is a reasonable argument, which I would accept. However, a complication is that the right to buy has already been suspended in a number of areas, and that suspension could continue through to the end of the three-year period. What consideration was given to the position in which tenants in those areas find themselves?

Linda Leslie: Local authorities are the strategic bodies that have the power to make, amend and revoke pressured area designations. Ministers considered whether there should be a measure to suspend those designations during the notice period, but on balance they felt that that would take away the flexibility of local authorities to respond to housing needs in their areas.

Alex Johnstone: The answer to a previous question was based on human rights. The answer to the question that followed was based on the balance of responsibilities. Is it possible or conceivable that challenges will be brought by tenants in pressured areas who are not allowed to exercise their right?

10:15
Linda Leslie: My colleague Colin Brown will answer that.

Colin Brown (Scottish Government): There is always a possibility of legal challenge, and someone can bring one if they so wish. My advice is that I would not expect such a challenge to succeed.

Alex Johnstone: I have one other thing to ask about the right to buy. The number of houses that have been bought by their tenants has dropped in recent years, but that remains a source of income and resource for social landlords. Has any assessment been made of the financial implications for social landlords of abolishing the right to buy?

Linda Leslie: Yes. The financial memorandum goes into quite a lot of detail about that impact. Landlords who responded to our consultation felt that, on balance, the impact of losing those capital receipts would be neutral or positive. They cannot predict when they will sell the properties and receive the capital receipts whereas, if the stock is retained in their ownership, they can predict the rental income that they will receive, so they can base their business planning on that rental income stream.

The Convener: Will you clarify how legislation on the right to buy might come up against human rights legislation?

Colin Brown: Under article 1 of protocol 1 to the ECHR, the right to buy is part of a package of rights that a tenant has under a secure tenancy. The tenant has a right to buy; that is a possession in ECHR terms, and to interfere with the person's possession, which is that right, and which the person might or might not be able to exercise in practice, needs some sort of justification. Whether that interference is justified has to be considered in a social context. It is slightly arcane, because it is not a very obvious right and it is only one of a package of rights, of which the remainder are unaffected.

The Convener: So the right to buy is part of the tenancy agreement.

Colin Brown: It is a right that a tenant has in the same way as they have the right to have certain repairs carried out, the right to assign in certain circumstances and the right not to be evicted except through certain processes and in certain situations.

The Convener: Did you seek advice about the issue from the Equality and Human Rights Commission?

Colin Brown: The Government sought no external advice on the matter. The Government's legal directorate considered it as part and parcel of developing the proposals.

The Convener: We will move on to part 2, which is on social housing.

Mark Griffin (Central Scotland) (Lab): What changes will the bill make to the existing reasonable preference provisions for the allocation of social housing and how will those changes give social landlords more flexibility than they currently have?

Linda Leslie: As you say, the purpose of the reasonable preference provisions is to give social landlords greater flexibility in allocating their housing. The bill will replace the current reasonable preference categories of failing the tolerable standard, overcrowding and large families, all of which are contained in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, and it will introduce new categories of being homeless or threatened with homelessness, unsatisfactory conditions and underoccupancy.

The unsatisfactory conditions category will cover a range of housing needs, such as housing that is unsuitable for an applicant's health condition because, for example, they live in a top-floor flat but require ground-floor access. It might include social reasons, such as the property being in the wrong location to allow the occupant to receive support or the person being a victim of domestic violence.

The bill will require landlords to set out in their allocation policies what those conditions are. They will have to consult tenants, applicants and registered tenants organisations when they create or revise their allocation policies and report on that consultation.

Mark Griffin: Can you give a bit more detail on why the categories of occupying overcrowded houses and large families have been dropped? Is there a shift away from giving priority to those who live in overcrowded conditions?

Linda Leslie: I do not have the detail of that, but I would be happy to write to you with it.

Mark Griffin: Thank you. Are there any other ways in which the bill would allow social landlords to make best use of social housing?

Linda Leslie: Yes. The bill will make a number of other changes, one of which is to allow landlords to take account of an applicant’s age in the allocation of housing, subject to equalities legislation. The intention behind that is to allow landlords to make best use of their stock in light of local circumstances. That suggestion came from responses to our consultation on affordable rented housing. We felt that removing the ban on taking age into account could allow landlords to develop policies that better meet the needs of people from different age groups. For example, a landlord might use a particular block of housing specifically for older people instead of having a mixed group of people whose different lifestyles could cause issues to arise. There were some concerns that the shift to allow landlords to take age into account might lead to young people being discriminated against, but the bill extends protection under the Equality Act 2010 to 16 and 17-year-olds to ensure that that does not happen.

Mark Griffin: I note from the Scottish Parliament information centre briefing that there was some support for allowing allocations policies to include consideration of whether an applicant was from the local area. Why was that not taken forward?

Linda Leslie: The bill makes no changes to existing legislation in relation to local connection. Existing legislation allows landlords to take into account whether an applicant has a local connection—for example, whether they work in the area or need to move to the area because of special medical or social needs. However, in order to ensure that housing is allocated on the basis of need, landlords cannot take into account the length of time that someone has been in an area. There is no change to that.

Alex Johnstone: I am sorry for raising this point, which is a bit cheeky, although it is relevant. A number of people on significantly above-average earnings continue to occupy social rented housing. There has been publicity in the past few days about attempts south of the border to end that practice. It was suggested to me that such a provision might appear in the bill, but it does not. Was one ever considered? If so, why was it dropped?

Linda Leslie: Ministers consulted on whether income should be taken into account, but they decided that, on balance, that should not be taken forward because they want social housing to remain accessible to all.

The Convener: You have mentioned various factors that were taken into account. Did they include economic conditions in a particular area? I ask because I am from Aberdeen, which is a very pressured area for housing, with lots of people moving into the area to take up jobs.

Linda Leslie: As I said, existing legislation allows such local connections to be taken into account, so no change has been made to that.

Mark Griffin: Can you explain how the bill will provide social landlords with additional tools to tackle antisocial behaviour and what impact such provisions will have in practice?

Linda Leslie: Yes. There are a number of provisions in the bill that will help social landlords deal with antisocial behaviour more effectively, the first of which is to allow them to suspend an applicant with a history of antisocial behaviour from the waiting list for a period. The hope is that the ability to take past behaviour into account and to allow a period of time before an applicant is eligible for housing will encourage tenants to think about their behaviour and recognise the impact that it has on their ability to access housing.

We understand that landlords already suspend applicants for a variety of reasons. The latest figures indicate that 10,000 applicants on the housing list are ineligible for housing. That is mainly because of existing rent arrears or because the applicant has refused what a landlord considers to be a reasonable number of offers of accommodation. The evidence from landlords suggests that they take into account behaviour over up to three to five years. In effect, the bill puts into legislation something that is done in practice by some landlords now.

Mark Griffin: I will ask about suspending applicants because of antisocial behaviour. Is there any clash at all with social landlords’ responsibility to make offers of housing to those who are homeless?

Linda Leslie: The provision will not affect those who are unintentionally homeless.

Mark Griffin: So there will be no suspension in those cases. That is fine.

What is the Government’s thinking on the types of evidence that social landlords would require to make use of the proposed powers to issue a short Scottish secure tenancy?

Linda Leslie: That is one of the other provisions that would allow landlords to tackle antisocial behaviour. The intention is that it would help to reduce antisocial behaviour. Landlords would need evidence of antisocial behaviour on at least two occasions before they could convert a secure tenancy into a short Scottish secure tenancy, which would limit the tenant’s security of tenure to 12 months. A short secure tenancy currently lasts for six months, so we are extending its length from six to 12 months.

Alongside that, the landlord would have to provide housing support services to help the tenant to change their behaviour during the period for which they had a short secure tenancy. That is not only about tackling antisocial behaviour but also about giving people a second chance to sustain their tenancy. At the end of the 12 months, if the tenant has demonstrated that they can meet the requirements of a secure tenancy, the tenancy would convert back to that. Alternatively, two months before the end of the short secure tenancy, the landlord could serve a notice to extend it for another six-month period, as long as they provided additional housing support during that time.

Mark Griffin: Are there any other protections for tenants who are placed on a short SST or who have their SST converted to a short SST?

Linda Leslie: Yes. The landlord would have to serve a notice to let the tenant know the grounds on which it was considering ending the short secure tenancy if the behaviour had not changed—that is not necessarily a requirement at the moment—and they would have to set out the reasons why they wished to recover possession. That is also a new measure.

Mark Griffin: What would be the right of appeal for a tenant who had their tenancy converted to a short SST?

Linda Leslie: I think that they would have a right of appeal to the social landlord and that the bill will allow ministers to set the requirement for that appeal process in regulations, but I will clarify that in writing.

The Convener: Jim Eadie has some questions on private rented housing.

Jim Eadie (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP): Thank you, convener. I will ask about the transfer of jurisdiction from the sheriff to the first-tier tribunal. There is a proposal to transfer certain types of civil court actions in relation to the private rented housing sector from the jurisdiction of the sheriff court to the jurisdiction of the first-tier tribunal, which is a new body that will be established under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill. Can you set out the rationale for that change? What will be the benefits for tenants and landlords? Can you also explain to the committee why social rented sector cases are not being transferred from the sheriff’s jurisdiction to that of the first-tier tribunal, despite that having been flagged up as a possible option during the consultation process?

Daniel Couldridge (Scottish Government): Yes. The social rented sector is very different from the private rented sector. For example, the Scottish Government’s 2009 review of the private rented sector showed that 75 per cent of private rented sector landlords have only one property, and half the properties surveyed were managed wholly by the landlords themselves. We have heard that private rented sector tenants and landlords can be reluctant to take cases to court and have difficulty accessing justice.

The social sector is different. For example, tenants have recourse to an ombudsman and landlords have pre-action requirements that they must fulfil before they can take eviction action against tenants. Social sector cases tend to proceed to court when that is absolutely necessary.

Ministers have decided that, on balance, private rented sector cases should transfer to a tribunal that will deal with issues that are specific to that sector, to enable tenants and landlords to access justice. The proposals will create a specialist, efficient and accessible forum so that tenants and landlords can access justice.

Jim Eadie: You have outlined the reasons for excluding the social rented sector from the proposal for the private rented sector. Can you tell me in a little bit more detail what benefits the proposal will have for landlords and tenants?

Daniel Couldridge: Tribunal procedures are less formal than court procedures, legal representation is not always required before tribunal proceedings, and a tribunal judiciary tends to be more active in asking questions and getting to the root of the issues involved in a case. The rationale behind transferring such cases to a tribunal is that that will enable tenants and landlords to access justice. They will have a more accessible forum in which to bring cases in situations in which they might have been reluctant to bring cases previously.

Jim Eadie: Can you clarify whether one of the advantages is that tenants who want to bring an action to the tribunal will not face the legal costs and barriers that they would have faced if they brought an action through the civil courts?

Daniel Couldridge: Parties that come before the tribunal could be represented if they wished, by a family friend or someone to speak on their behalf, who could be legally qualified. The tribunal’s advantage over the courts is that the tribunal judiciary has the expertise and time to ask questions, investigate the matter in question and get to the root of an issue. That should enable parties who are generally unrepresented in court proceedings at the moment to make the best of their case.

Jim Eadie: Are there any specific proposals regarding legal aid for tenants who will appear before the tribunal and what the tribunal fees are likely to be?

Daniel Couldridge: There are two elements to that. There would be scope for the tribunal to charge a fee under general powers provided for in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, which ministers want to consider further. That would involve balancing the interests of seeking to recoup a percentage of the tribunal’s overall running costs against those of ensuring accessibility for tenants and landlords, which we have said is a key issue. Any proposal to charge a fee for the private rented sector tribunal would require secondary legislation, so the Parliament would have the chance to scrutinise such a proposal.

Tribunal procedures are designed to be accessible and understandable, and generally parties do not require legal representation. However, we are aware that some parties might require support to engage effectively with tribunal proceedings and we want to look in more detail at what support we can provide. That could be through the provision of legal aid or through other means: a representation or advocacy service, for example.

Jim Eadie: I want to confirm that I have understood you correctly. Is the motivation for transferring jurisdiction from the sheriff court to the first-tier tribunal to do with strengthening tenants’ rights and rebalancing the relationship between the tenant and the landlord? Is that the motivation, rationale and justification for the move?

Daniel Couldridge: Partly. It is about improving the quality of and access to justice, for both tenants and landlords in the sector. Tenants will be able to bring cases on various issues to the tribunal, and landlords will also be able to bring cases to the tribunal.

Jim Eadie: You touched on tribunal fees being a source of income to offset the costs of setting up the tribunal. Do you have any information at this stage about what the expected cost of setting up the new process will be? Is there anything further that you can tell us about the staffing arrangements that would be required to get the service up and running and to sustain it?

Daniel Couldridge: We have provided cost estimates in the financial memorandum. Our estimates are that there would be one-off set-up costs of between £90,000 and £140,000 and ongoing operational costs of between £580,000 and £880,000 a year. Those costs are based on data from other existing tribunal jurisdictions. The Private Rented Housing Panel is the only other dedicated housing tribunal that operates in Scotland.

Jim Eadie: We will come on to that in a second.

Daniel Couldridge: In the process of producing the costs, we visited some of the larger tribunal jurisdictions in Scotland—the social security and child support tribunal and the employment tribunal—to look at practice in those jurisdictions so that we could accurately model the costs.

We estimate that the tribunal will need up to 60 members to deal with the projected caseload of around 700 cases a year. Again, that is based on what happens in other tribunal jurisdictions and how many members they have in their pool to deal with their caseloads.

Jim Eadie: Sixty employees is not an insignificant number of people. That suggests to me that there is an unmet need in terms of tenants being able to access justice through the current legal system, which might be addressed through the new tribunal system. Is that a fair assessment?

Daniel Couldridge: In consultation and during the development of the proposals, we have heard that, sometimes, tenants and landlords in the private sector can be reluctant to bring cases to court. The tribunal is intended to help parties who may have been reluctant to bring cases. A requirement for 60 members is not significant for tribunal jurisdictions of comparable size, because members are paid fees and generally tend to give around 15 days a year to tribunal work.

Jim Eadie: I would like to move on to other provisions in the bill on private rented housing matters. In sections 23 to 25, there is provision to expand access to the Private Rented Housing Panel, which you mentioned earlier, by enabling third-party applications by local authorities to enforce the repairing standard. The policy memorandum also makes reference to providing “additional discretionary powers for local authorities that would enable them to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions”.

Could you say a little more about each of those?

Barry Stalker (Scottish Government): The overall outcome that we seek to achieve through those provisions is to continue to improve the quality and condition of houses in the private rented sector that require improvement.

Currently, only tenants can make an application to the Private Rented Housing Panel to seek to enforce the repairing standard, which is a condition standard that the landlords have to meet in order to rent out their property—it is a legal obligation. The broadening out to local authorities of the ability to report to the panel, which was based on stakeholder feedback, aims to give local authorities additional means to report properties where the condition is thought to be below that standard. We hear of circumstances in which tenants might be reluctant to report to the Private Rented Housing Panel—you mentioned the panel's work in previous years—and one of the reasons for expanding reporting rights is to give local authorities the ability to do that instead of only tenants. That should help to protect tenants who might feel vulnerable and might not want to take the action that is required.

Jim Eadie: What will that mean in practice? How will the change benefit tenants?

Barry Stalker: There should be more of an opportunity for properties that do not meet the repairing standard to be brought to the panel's attention and for the panel to do its job in assessing whether those properties meet the standard. If they do not, the panel can take action by issuing repairing standard enforcement orders to ensure that landlords bring properties up to the appropriate standard.

Jim Eadie: So that change could be quite significant and strengthen tenants' rights.

Barry Stalker: Yes. The change is based on feedback from stakeholders, including local authorities, which felt that they would benefit from it. Ministers certainly felt that the move would help to improve properties out there that still do not meet the standard, and it increases opportunities for such properties to be brought to the PRHP's attention.

Jim Eadie: What about the introduction of enhanced enforcement areas?

Barry Stalker: That is another means of seeking to improve the condition of properties where required and, again, is based on feedback that we received through the consultation that Linda Leslie mentioned and on-going dialogue with stakeholders.

Some local authorities, particularly urban ones, have discussed with us their current range of powers and other powers that they might need to tackle problems with the condition of accommodation in the private rented sector. The objective of enhanced enforcement areas, which we intend to introduce in a stage 2 amendment, is to provide, where appropriate, local authorities with additional powers to deal with areas where the issues might be complex. We intend to set out in the amendment that local authorities will make an application to Scottish ministers and that, if the application is approved, they will have additional powers for a set period of time to deal with that area.

The powers that we are currently considering include mandatory disclosure checks for landlord registration purposes. At the moment, when a local authority carries out its fit and proper person test it can ask an applicant whether they have reasonable grounds for receiving a disclosure certificate. However, as a result of the proposed provision, the authority will not need reasonable grounds and will simply be able to ask for a full disclosure check on a mandatory basis.

In addition, there will be inspection rights with regard to private rented properties, to check whether they are complying with all statutory obligations. In response to your previous question I mentioned local authorities' ability to report to the PRHP, and our intention with the enhanced enforcement area measure is to give local authorities the ability to inspect a property to find out whether it complies with the repairing standard.

Jim Eadie: That is very helpful. I understand that the intention behind the measure is to allow local authorities, if they so wish, to target enforcement action in areas where the conditions in the private rented sector are poor. Were the views that you received from stakeholders in the consultation process unanimous in their support for such a measure, or was there a range of views? Were there any conflicting views?

Barry Stalker: As we have discussed with stakeholders, the measure is designed for a particular context and we envisage its being used predominantly in urban areas. Local authorities, particularly urban ones, see it as being helpful because of the complex nature of the conditions that they might have to deal with. For example, a certain area might have a high proportion of private landlords or there might be issues with the make-up of the housing stock, and it was felt that such a power would help in those situations. Some stakeholders are particularly keen to have the measure as it will enable them to take further action to improve conditions in those areas.

Jim Eadie: Have you had any representations that suggest that we need to go further than that provision, or is it considered adequate to achieve the improvements that are sought?

Barry Stalker: That is the position at present, but because the amendment will not be lodged until stage 2 we can continue to discuss matters with stakeholders, and we will do that over the next wee while.

Jim Eadie: I am trying to establish whether you have received any early indication from stakeholders that they are satisfied that the proposed provision goes far enough or whether it
Barry Stalker: The early indication is that an ability to inspect properties would be a significant and helpful power.

Jim Eadie: Thank you.

The Convener: We move to part 4 of the bill, which is on letting agents. Mary Fee has some questions.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): I apologise for my hoarseness—I hope that my voice lasts.

From the evidence that you gathered and the consultation that you carried out, can you explain what benefits the customers of letting agents will gain from the regulation of letting agents?

Barry Stalker: I am happy to do so. Your question is about the benefits of further regulation of the industry. We are on a journey, and we describe the process that we are going through as the further regulation of letting agents. We have taken measures to tackle some of the problems to do with letting agents that have been brought to our attention over recent years. Those measures will help, but they will not address the issue entirely. I will quickly set out the journey that we are on.

Some of the problems that have been raised with us relate to the situation in which a letting agent—which, currently, anyone can set themselves up as—folds and the tenant’s deposit money or the landlord’s rent money is lost. To an extent, the tenancy deposit scheme will address the issue of deposit money, which is now protected under that scheme. In addition, in November 2012—as I am sure that you are aware—the Scottish Government clarified the legislation on the charging of premiums by letting agents. From a tenant’s perspective, in particular, those measures seem to be helpful from the point of view of a customer engaging with the services of a letting agent. However, feedback from the private rented sector strategy group, which consulted on the strategy and continues to have a dialogue with stakeholders, indicated that there continue to be problems with some letting agents regarding the service that landlords or tenants might receive. Interestingly, the industry and groups that represent it were quite keen for a consistently high-quality service to be provided by letting agents.

The benefit of the further regulation of letting agents is that it will address the basic problem that any organisation can set itself up as a letting agent. There are no compulsory standards and no compulsory code of practice governing what a letting agent should do. There are some voluntary schemes but joining them is optional, and although some form of redress is available it is limited to circumstances in which a letting agent is a member of a particular redress scheme. There should be benefits for tenants and landlords in its being clear and transparent what standards of service they can expect from a letting agent. In the event that those standards are diverged from, there will be an ability to seek redress.

Mary Fee: Can you give me a bit more detail about how the regulatory regime would work in practice and what the enforcement provisions would be? In the explanatory notes there is no definitive number of letting agents across Scotland; there is just an estimate.

Barry Stalker: Yes.

Mary Fee: When a regulatory regime is set up, how will people who we do not know exist be brought on board? That is my concern. How will that work in practice?

Barry Stalker: I will start with what our intentions are in the bill. Put simply, there are three elements, the first of which is a register of letting agents. You are quite right that we do not have a definitive number of letting agents at present, but the register should give us that. It will be a legal requirement for a letting agent to register, and they will need to pass a fit-and-proper-person test. Our intention is that the Scottish Government will maintain the register. That should give a letting agent’s customers an assurance that it is indeed a letting agent, and there will be the assurance that a fit-and-proper-person test has been taken.

The second element is the code of practice that we intend to develop through secondary legislation, which we will need to consult on. We intend to work with the industry on that. I mentioned previously that different organisations have codes of practice, but we are looking to put the code of practice on a statutory basis. The intention is to ensure that it is very clear and transparent to customers what standards of service they should expect.

The third element is a means of redress. If a letting agency’s customers feel that there has been a transgression of the code of practice, they will be able to seek redress through the first-tier tribunal. That provision is currently in the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, which is also in the parliamentary process, and links to what Dan Couldridge talked about with regard to the PRS-specific tribunal.

Those are the three elements: a register, a code of practice and a redress mechanism.

Mary Fee’s second question was about enforcement. There will be a legal requirement for a letting agent to register to be able to practise. If they do not, that will be a criminal offence set at, I think, level 3—I would be happy to write to the committee to confirm the detail of that.

There are provisions in the bill that mean that letting agents who are not registered should not be able to incur costs. If a letting agent has failed the test or been revoked or refused, they should not, on the final date of that decision, be able to charge costs for their work.

On consumer empowerment, we hope that if unregistered letting agents were operating out there that would be brought to the attention of the appropriate authorities.

Mary Fee: The onus would be on customers.

Barry Stalker: The onus will be on letting agents to register because it will be an offence if they do not do so.

Mary Fee: I am still not completely clear about how letting agents that operate under the radar and have only one or two properties will be brought on board. If we do not know that they exist, they cannot be asked to register, so how will they be got on board?

Barry Stalker: The first and most obvious way is through the legal requirement for them to get on board. When ministers looked at the approach to letting agents, they were keen to ensure that we took a pragmatic and proportionate approach. That is one of the reasons why we set out the options that we set out. For example, we set out in the financial memorandum that we envisage that the cost to a letting agent would be £250 for a three-year membership. Therefore, the cost to a business of registering would be relatively small. There could have been further costs if we had chosen to go down another route. For example, we could have insisted on a proportion of staff having compulsory qualifications.

There has been consideration of the best approach to ensure that all letting agents, beyond the legal requirement, feel that they are able to register and participate in the new regime to achieve the aim that the sector is looking to achieve, which is to improve the overall consistency and standards of service of their businesses for their customers.

Mary Fee: There is a view across many letting agents that they are happy with the bill and that it will help their sector. Are you confident that the proposals in the bill will be enough to bring on board every private letting agent?

Barry Stalker: Scottish Government ministers are confident that the provisions in the bill will achieve the aims that we have set out. In particular, the fact that the bill makes it an offence not to be registered should send a strong signal to any letting agent out there who feels that they would be able to avoid their legal requirement to register.

Mary Fee: As you said, it will be a level 3 offence not to register. If someone registers and you then find that there is a breach of what they should be doing, will it be possible to remove them from the register?

Barry Stalker: Yes. Just to clarify, I said that it will be a level 3 offence, but it will actually be a level 5 offence. I apologise.

As part of the fit-and-proper-person test, we have set out a range of considerations that can be taken on board, which include contraventions of housing law and other law that relates to housing. That can also include consideration of whether a letting agent has been taken to the first-tier tribunal for a breach or infringement of the code of practice.

The intention is that that will act as an incentive to letting agents to meet their obligations—first, because no letting agent would want to be put out of business because they have been deregistered and, secondly, because there is a cost implication in that they will not be able legally to charge or recover costs if they have been deregistered. Also, the decisions will be made public, so there is a business risk. If a letting agent is looking to attract landlords and tenants as customers, they will want to avoid having decisions made against them and put out in the public domain.

The Convener: I know of a situation in which a property that was to let was in such poor condition that, in order to get a letting agent, the owner had to get one from Manchester. I presume that, if a letting agent works in Scotland, they will have to register here even though their head office may be outwith Scotland. Is that correct?

Barry Stalker: Yes. For a letting agent to operate in Scotland, they need to be registered.

The Convener: Alex Johnstone has a supplementary question.

Alex Johnstone: For a letting agent to be registered, they will be required to pass a fit-and-proper-person test. I take it that there is no plan to introduce a similar register of tenants.

Barry Stalker: No.

The Convener: We will move swiftly on to mobile home sites with permanent residents. What evidence is there that the site licensing regime for permanent residential mobile homes needs to be improved?

Claire Tosh (Scottish Government): Just to set the scene, I note that the current licensing regime is set out in the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960, which is now relatively old, and Scottish ministers are aware that an increasing number of people are living on mobile home sites, including many older people. The survey that Consumer Focus carried out—I think that it was in 2012—found that the majority of interviewees were aged over 61. Such sites are marketed as desirable and affordable retirement communities.

The aim of the provisions in the bill is to improve and strengthen the licensing regime to ensure that quality is maintained and that mobile home sites meet an acceptable standard. A consultation was carried out prior to the bill’s publication, in which some mobile home residents stated that they were concerned about the standards on some sites. As I said, there was also a Consumer Focus report in 2012, which indicated that some residents were concerned about problems with maintenance and security, problems with electricity supply, pitch fees and written statements under the Mobile Homes Act 1983.

Within the licensing regime that is in place under the 1960 act, a licence for a mobile home site can run in perpetuity. The only point at which a licence can be revoked is when the local authority applies to a court to have it revoked because the mobile home site owner has received a third conviction for an offence under the 1960 act. Ministers think that, as an older licensing regime, it appears not to fit the current mobile home site sector or the provision of mobile homes. Also, the range of enforcement tools that are available to local authorities under the current licensing regime seems not to be broad enough to enable them to improve the quality of sites.

The aim of the provisions in the bill is to improve and strengthen the licensing regime to ensure that quality is maintained and that mobile home sites meet an acceptable standard. A consultation was carried out prior to the bill’s publication, in which some mobile home residents stated that they were concerned about the standards on some sites. As I said, there was also a Consumer Focus report in 2012, which indicated that some residents were concerned about problems with maintenance and security, problems with electricity supply, pitch fees and written statements under the Mobile Homes Act 1983.

The Convener: What key changes does the bill make to the site licensing regime, and what benefits will that bring for mobile home residents?

Claire Tosh: The key change is the introduction of a fit-and-proper-person test akin to those that are used in other licensing regimes. A person who owns a mobile home site and applies for a licence will have to pass such a test under the new provisions. The bill sets out what material must be taken into account in considering whether somebody is a fit and proper person, which includes convictions for quite serious offences and, similar to tests for other licensing regimes in the housing sector, whether the person has previously contravened housing law. Somebody who runs a site on behalf of somebody else will also have to be a fit and proper person to do so.

The Convener: Both the owner of a site and the person who runs it will have to be licensed.

Claire Tosh: That is correct. For the owner to obtain a licence, the person who runs the site will have to be considered a fit and proper person as well.

An additional measure is that, under the bill, the licences will have a fixed three-year term. Currently, licences run in perpetuity and, as I said, the only time that a licence can be revoked is on the licence holder’s third conviction for an offence, when the local authority can ask the court to revoke the licence.

In addressing enforcement measures that might be lacking in the current framework, the bill seeks to introduce a range of measures to give local authorities tools to intervene at an earlier stage. First, a local authority will be able to issue an improvement notice that will require a site owner to take steps to improve something if, for example, they fail to comply with a condition of the site licence. Secondly, a local authority will be able to issue a penalty notice. That power could be used by a local authority when a site owner does not have a licence or if an improvement notice has been served but the site owner has failed to comply with it. Under a penalty notice, the site owner would lose their income from the site for a certain period.

The Convener: The site owner would lose their income from the rents.

Claire Tosh: Yes.

The Convener: Where would that money go? Would the residents stop paying?

Claire Tosh: The site residents would be told that they did not have to pay on-going pitch fees. That is part of a range of enforcement measures that could be used if a person did not have a licence and continued to operate without one or if there was a failure to comply with an enforcement notice. It is anticipated that local authorities would engage with site owners prior to taking enforcement measures, but local authorities will be able to use a range of options for on-going enforcement on a site. A local authority will also be able to revoke a licence if a site owner is no longer considered to be a fit and proper person to own the site or they fail to continue to comply with the fit-and-proper-person test.

As I said, the intention is to provide local authorities with a range of tools that they can use. That is different from the current situation, in which there is only revocation and the criminal offence of operating a site without a licence. Ministers consider those to be quite blunt tools that do not really allow for proper enforcement.

The Convener: A few mobile home owners and residents in my constituency have been alerted to the bill and have had quite a lot of discussion about it. When you were drawing up the bill, did you get an impression that some local authorities... have more of a handle, shall we say, on mobile home sites than others, and that the regimes in some local authority areas are very different from those in others?

Claire Tosh: There is on-going consultation with local authorities on the regime and how it is operated. The policy memorandum indicates that, in the consultation responses, there was a varied reaction from local authorities, with some perhaps not responding and others being in favour of enhanced enforcement measures. In the continuing discussions with local authorities, the Scottish Government is making them aware of the bill’s provisions and the new enforcement powers that local authorities will have.

The Convener: What views did mobile home site owners and residents express in the consultation on the proposed revised licensing regime?

Claire Tosh: The responses to the formal consultation that was done before the bill’s provisions were drafted indicated that mobile home residents generally supported the proposed changes and an enhanced licensing and inspection regime.

The mobile home site owners had some concerns about there perhaps being an additional burden on them. Particular concerns were expressed during the consultation regarding the effect on the industry as a whole. As a consequence, although the proposals indicated that the new licensing regime should apply across the board to all sites, ministers decided, having looked at the consultation responses, that it would be appropriate and proportionate to change the regime in respect of those sites on which people live permanently—those that have a residential aspect. The concerns were listened to and taken on board in the development of the proposals.

The Convener: Why did you alight on three years, as opposed to five years, for the term of a licence?

Claire Tosh: We consulted on the term being three years, and more than half of the 129 consultation responses supported that. Ministers consider that that term is similar to the terms for other types of licensing regime in the housing sector—for example, landlord registration—and that it takes account of residents’ desire for an effective, on-going review process that requires site owners to apply and local authorities to consider the fit-and-proper-person test.

The Convener: How will permanent residents be protected in respect of on-going service provision and so on if the owner’s licence is refused or revoked?

Claire Tosh: It might be helpful if I set out a bit of background to the measures. The proposals in the bill deal almost exclusively with the licensing regime. The law that underpins mobile home sites and the rights of site residents is covered in various pieces of legislation, so this is part of a package of measures. The rights of people who live on mobile home sites and own the homes in which they live are protected under an act of 1983, which includes a set of terms relating to their residency. There is a provision in the bill to make it clear that those rights will not be affected by the provisions on the licensing system.

In addition, there is a provision in the bill to allow local authorities to appoint an interim manager if a licence is revoked, which will enable the on-going provision of maintenance.

The Convener: What have local authorities said about the resource implications for them of enforcing the new licensing regime?

Claire Tosh: In developing the proposals, it was considered that there should be an element of cost recovery. There is a provision that enables local authorities to charge a fee for licence applications as long as it relates to what is required to be carried out under the licensing process. There are also provisions that enable local authorities to cover any expenses that they incur from carrying out enforcement action.

The Convener: That would be from the site owner.

Claire Tosh: Yes.

The Convener: Do you have a ballpark figure for the cost of a licence?

Claire Tosh: Costings were carried out for the financial memorandum. It is estimated that the cost of a three-year licence will be £600. However, local authorities will be given the power to charge fees on the basis of costs to the individual local authority, so the figure may or may not be £600.

The Convener: That is quite a lot if the mobile home site is not a terribly big one. I have some idea of pitch fees and they are not that much. That could be quite a lot in respect of the site owner’s income.

Claire Tosh: The £600 would be over three years, and it is anticipated that local authorities will take into account the size of the site and the general inspection costs. As I said, the fee must not exceed the reasonable cost to the authority of deciding on the application—it is tied to that. Moreover, Scottish ministers will have a power to make regulations on fees if it becomes apparent that issues are arising in respect of the bill. Such regulations could state that the fee must not exceed a certain amount and set out the factors that local authorities would have to take into... account. However, it is expected that local authorities will look at the actual costs of processing licence applications.

Alex Johnstone: As a result of work on a different committee, Mary Fee and I visited Travelling people’s sites, which, as you would realise from visiting them, fall under the criteria that are covered in the bill. In the preparation of the bill, was its impact and effect on Travelling people’s sites, or its interaction with them, taken into account?

Claire Tosh: The provisions in the bill will not affect Travellers sites that are maintained or operated by local authorities. However, it will affect privately-run Travellers sites, so there will be implications for them. People who own or run such sites will be required to have a licence under the provisions in the bill.

Alex Johnstone: Will it basically apply in those circumstances as it will anywhere else?

Claire Tosh: Yes, but it is my understanding—if I am wrong about this, I will write to correct what I have said—that the provisions will not affect sites that are provided by local authorities. I am not sure whether the sites that were visited were local authority sites or not.

Gordon MacDonald (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP): Part 6 of the bill amends local authorities’ powers to enforce repair and maintenance of private homes. Will you explain the policy objectives behind that?

Linda Leslie: I will try, but it is an area that I am not so familiar with, so we may have to write to you with some further details.

The provisions on house condition enforcement powers are intended to clarify the existing power to pay missing shares on behalf of owners who are unwilling or unable to pay their shares, and to ensure that local authorities are able to use the power to support majority decisions by owners under the tenement management scheme for repair works. They also allow local authorities to issue maintenance orders where they have issued a work notice or a previous maintenance order. They are intended to reduce the administrative burden of maintenance orders and address a number of other issues around safety and security notices.

Gordon MacDonald: We have had a situation in Edinburgh in which, under the statutory notice system, the City of Edinburgh Council could intervene to organise repair work on private properties when the owners of shared buildings could not reach agreement. The system was accused of being open to bribery, overcharging and unnecessary work being done, and police later charged 15 people. What safeguards are in place for home owners to ensure that we do not replicate the problems that existed in Edinburgh?

Linda Leslie: My understanding is that the provisions in the bill do not replicate the system in Edinburgh. I can write to you about the safeguards and how they fit with the previous legislation in the Tenements (Scotland) Act 2004.

Gordon MacDonald: I have two other questions that relate to that. If a council ends up paying an individual’s share, what recovery methods will be available to the council, especially in a situation where the householder or house owner has limited resources, perhaps because they are retired or unemployed?

Linda Leslie: We will have to write to you about that, to ensure that we give an accurate answer.

Gordon MacDonald: The City of Edinburgh Council has £22 million of repairs outstanding for which it has not yet recovered the costs from home owners. Given the financial pressures on councils, how will they be able to manage such situations?

Linda Leslie: The powers are discretionary, so it will be up to the council to decide whether it wishes to use them.

Gordon MacDonald: Moving on to part 7, will you provide a brief overview of the bill’s miscellaneous provisions? I am particularly interested in hearing about the changes to shared equity schemes, as I have a number of Orlit homes in my constituency. What are the practical changes with the repeal of the defective designation provisions? That is one of the four areas that are covered in part 7.

Linda Leslie: Colin Brown will answer that.

Colin Brown: The heritable security stuff is fairly technical. It stems from legislation from 1974, which was part of a scheme to address the feudal tenure system. Those with long memories who know arcane details of feudal systems will know that people were able to redeem feu duties by paying 20 years’ worth of feu duties. In 1974, there was a concern that securities might create a form of feu duty in perpetuity when they ceased to be able to be created. The legislation for that covers all heritable securities and states that a person who has a debt or a property as security—the debtor on a security—has the right to redeem that security come year 20, as long as they pay what they originally borrowed plus the interest less what they have already paid.

For a conventional security, that works perfectly normally—I am sure that my bank would be perfectly happy if I wanted to pay off my security in year 20—but it does not work properly for shared equity, where the loan is advanced on the basis that the recovery will not be through on-going interest but will be linked to the value of the property in a number of years. In theory, it opens up the possibility that a person could redeem a security come year 20 and pay back only a percentage of the value when they initially received it.

Existing shared equity schemes get round that problem by entering into only a 19-year security, so that people never reach the year-20 question, and they can then enter into a new security if they want to do so. As certain provisions were developed around the right to repair and assistance to repair, it became apparent that lenders would experience difficulty with that, because there are changes to the background mortgage legislation and good practice regulations that they have to operate. The gist of it is that there would be a break event in year 20, and they would have to take that into account, and for certain people they would not be happy to advance a commercial mortgage on those terms.

The intention behind the provision in the bill is simply that there will be types of loans that can be prescribed by order, to which the 20-year rules will not apply. They are intended to be used for shared equity-type loans to get round that difficulty and avoid the emerging problem that has arisen because of changes to practice. It is fairly technical stuff, but I am happy to bore you for longer on it if you want.

What else is in the miscellaneous provisions? For completeness, section 78 allows the president of the Private Rented Housing Panel to delegate various functions to the depute. That is essentially just a pragmatic change; it was sought, and it seems entirely sensible. Section 79 affects the Scottish Housing Regulator’s powers to transfer assets. It addresses some practical difficulties that were found in a particular emergency situation where there was simply not time to do various things that appeared to be needed.

On the repeal of the defective designation provisions, there was a scheme to assist owners of defective housing that allowed them to seek assistance over a period of years. The scheme has now run its course and is closed to business. It served its time, but a redundant decision remains on the statute book.

Gordon MacDonald: So the bill just removes the provision.

Colin Brown: Yes. It removes stuff that no longer has any practical significance.

Gordon MacDonald: Thank you.

The Convener: We have had a good run through the generalities of the bill. I thank all the witnesses for attending, and we look forward to receiving written information from you shortly.

The committee’s next meeting will be on 22 January, when we will consider a draft report on the Procurement Reform (Scotland) Bill and take evidence from two panels on the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

Meeting closed at 11:23.
Shelter Scotland welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee on the Housing (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1. Shelter Scotland supports the broad aims of this Bill: to “enhance housing conditions, retain much needed social housing for the people of Scotland and safeguard social and private tenants”.

Shelter Scotland has been involved in the consultations and advisory groups which have fed into this Bill and supports many of the intentions of the proposed legislation. However, we feel strongly that all legislative changes must help to ensure that the housing sector functions as effectively as possible so that everyone has access to a safe, secure and affordable home and the right to a fair, transparent service.

This evidence is in three parts:

1. A summary of Shelter Scotland’s key positions

2. Shelter Scotland’s proposals for the Housing (Scotland) Bill

   This section covers Shelter Scotland’s proposals for additions to the draft Housing (Scotland) Bill. These proposal are in line with the overall aims of the bill and are opportunities to strengthen the bill.

3. Shelter Scotland’s response to the draft Housing (Scotland) Bill

   This section covers Shelter Scotland’s main points in relation to the draft Bill showing the areas which we support and where we have significant concerns.

1. Summary of Shelter Scotland’s key positions

   Shelter Scotland proposals for the Housing (Scotland) Bill:

   - Unsuitable Accommodation Order: Strengthen current legislation to make sure that households with children or expectant mothers have a right to challenge being placed in homeless temporary accommodation that is of a very poor standard.

---

1 Scottish Government press release (Nov 2013)
standard of physical repair.

- Homelessness referrals: All referrals for settled accommodation for statutory homeless households from councils to registered social landlord (RSL) partners should be made through mandatory use of a ‘Section 5’ referral. This would make all housing allocations and partnerships transparent, comparable and measurable.

- Carbon monoxide alarms (PRS): Shelter Scotland would like to see carbon monoxide alarms become mandatory in all privately rented property in Scotland. This could be achieved by an amendment to the Repairing Standard in the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006.

Shelter Scotland’s response to the draft Housing (Scotland) Bill:

- Age and allocations: The draft Bill includes an amendment to existing legislation which would remove the current prohibition on taking age into account when allocating social housing. We strongly oppose this unfair and discriminatory measure and want to see this removed from the Bill.

- Right to buy: Shelter Scotland supports the abolition of Right to Buy (RTB) in order to protect existing social rented housing stock. We would, however, like to see a commencement date sooner than the proposed three years.

- Social housing: There are many proposals in this section, some of which will make detailed but important changes and improvements to the management and allocation of social housing. Some of the proposals however, could have serious unintended consequences and Shelter Scotland feels these need to be considered in more detail or removed entirely:
  - increased use of Short Scottish Secure Tenancies (SSSTs) for antisocial behaviour
  - a simplified eviction process after a criminal conviction

2. Shelter Scotland’s proposals for the Housing (Scotland) Bill

   In addition to what is proposed in the draft Bill, Shelter Scotland believes that an opportunity has been missed to strengthen existing legislation, specifically around housing for homeless people and families to improve outcomes for those experiencing the crisis of homelessness, and safety in privately rented homes.

Proposal 1: Strengthening the Unsuitable Accommodation Order

Strengthen current legislation to make sure that households with children or expectant mothers have a right to challenge being placed in homeless temporary accommodation that is of a very poor physical repair.

Shelter Scotland wants to see an amendment to existing legislation which would mean that families with children in sub-standard temporary accommodation have a legislative right to challenge the local authority which has provided it.

The Unsuitable Accommodation (Scotland) Order 2004 was introduced to restrict the use of bed and breakfast (B&B) as temporary accommodation (TA) for households with children and pregnant women. This Order has been very successful in eliminating the use of unsuitable types of accommodation for these households, with a reduction of 92% in the use of B&B over the past 10 years. However in a minority of cases, the temporary accommodation that is provided to these groups can still fall below an adequate physical standard of repair. Shelter Scotland regularly helps clients who come to us after being placed in TA which is in poor repair, damp and or with inadequate heating\(^2\). This specific issue is not covered by existing legislation and although the Code of Guidance defines good practice around TA accommodation, this is not legislative and currently vulnerable families have no recourse to challenge the conditions they face.

Shelter Scotland wants to see an additional clause added to the Unsuitable Accommodation Order that explicitly covers poor physical repair.

\(^2\) ‘Temporary accommodation Standards: Campaign briefing’ (Shelter Scotland, November 2013)
http://scotland.shelter.org.uk/professional_resources/policy_library/policy_library_folder/temporary_accommodation_standards_campaign_briefing
• A legislative amendment to the existing Homeless Persons (Unsuitable Accommodation) (Scotland) Order 2004 to add a clause(s) relating specifically to minimum physical standards for families with children or pregnant women in temporary accommodation.

This change to existing legislation would ensure that the standards of repairs in temporary accommodation are the same for those with a Scottish secure tenancy (SST) and those in the private rented sector (PRS) have, but would be explicitly to help households with children and pregnant women placed in temporary accommodation.

Proposal 2: Homeless referrals

| All referrals for settled accommodation for statutory homeless households from councils to registered social landlord (RSL) partners should be made through mandatory use of a ‘Section 5’ referral. This would make all housing allocations transparent and measurable. |

With local authorities increasingly working in partnership with RSLs to meet their duty to house homelessness households, we must ensure that the provision of that accommodation is fair, transparent and measurable and people understand how allocations are made.

Across all social housing, the allocation of housing to households classified as statutorily homeless households is 35%. Currently, local authorities have 54% of all social housing stock while RSLs have 46%. Yet, local authorities allocate 42% of their annual lets to homeless households whereas RSLs only allocate 27% on average. There is a wide range of practices across Scotland and different partnerships and protocols have been established. Given the increasingly significant role that RSLs are playing in housing homeless people, Section 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 introduced a formal process for the referral of homeless households by councils to RSLs. More than ten years after commencement, this legislation there is still mixed practice and little consistency.

4 Data from 2012/13 shows that, of homeless referrals housed by RSLs, 65% are described as section 5 referrals with 29% described as ‘LA nominations’ and 8% described a ‘other’, which are generally informal nomination arrangements RSL statistics from Scottish Housing Regulator: http://www.scottishhousingregulator.gov.uk/publications/benchmarking-tables.
Shelter Scotland has been monitoring the use of section 5 referrals and believes that in some areas RSLs are doing more work to respond to and prevent homelessness than these figures portray but this cannot be tracked because of the inconsistent use of Section 5 referrals. Although 65% of all homeless households accommodated by RSLs are housed using a Section 5 referral, the data shows that some RSLs/councils use Section 5 referrals in 100% of their allocations while some don’t use section 5 referrals at all, meaning there is very little consistency for the individuals involved. In order to ensure that we are making best use of resources, we need to understand more about homeless allocations and have a standard process in place.

Shelter Scotland believes that the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 should be amended to require a Section 5 referral to be used in all instances where a RSL let is sought to meet a statutory homelessness duty. Data from 2012/13 shows that, of homeless referrals housed by RSLs, 65% are described as ‘Section 5 referrals’ with 29% described as ‘LA nominations’ and 8% described as ‘other’, which are generally informal nomination arrangements. We need to ensure greater transparency and make referrals easier to track and monitor which in turn, would improve partnership working.

Proposal 3: Improving tenant safety in the Private Rented Sector

Mandatory carbon monoxide alarms for all private rented homes

Shelter Scotland would like to see carbon monoxide alarms become mandatory in all privately rented property in Scotland. This could be achieved by an amendment to the repairing standard in the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006.

Carbon monoxide (CO) gas is known as the ‘silent killer’ because it is invisible and has no smell. CO can be emitted by any faulty appliance which burns a carbon based fuel such as gas, petrol, oil, coal and wood, and as little as 2% in the air can kill within one to three minutes. Children, elderly people, pregnant women and people with respiratory problems are particularly at risk from carbon monoxide poisoning.

6 RSL statistics from the Scottish Housing Regulator: http://www.scottishhousingregulator.gov.uk/publications/benchmarking-tables
7 A briefing on this proposal to improve Section 5 referrals is available on the Shelter Scotland website http://scotland.shelter.org.uk/professional_resources/policy_library/policy_library_folder/housing_scotland_bill_2013_policy_proposal_on_section_5_referrals
According to Department of Health figures for England and Wales, 50 people a year die from CO poisoning, and around 4,000 are taken to A&E\textsuperscript{8}. All private landlords in Scotland must provide a valid gas safety record and annual checks for the appliances in the property they rent out\textsuperscript{9}, but there is currently no legal requirement for them to provide a carbon monoxide detector and alarm. From October 2013, building regulations in Scotland were changed to require CO alarms to be fitted whenever a \textit{new or replacement} boiler, heater, fire or stove is fitted to residential property. Shelter Scotland would like to see carbon monoxide alarms become mandatory in \textit{all} privately rented property in Scotland. This could be achieved by an amendment to the Repairing Standard in the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006.

Safety of electrical wiring installations

This Bill also presents an opportunity to protect tenants in the PRS from the dangers posed by unsafe electrical installations. Shelter Scotland fully backs the call from the Electrical Safety Council, as detailed in their written evidence, for mandatory five yearly checks by a registered electrician, of both fixed electrical installations in all privately rented property and any electrical appliances supplied with lets.

3. Shelter Scotland’s position on the draft Housing (Scotland) Bill

Part 1: Right to Buy [Section 1 & 85(4)]

Shelter Scotland supports the abolition of the Right to Buy (RTB) in order to protect existing social rented housing stock. The Scottish Government estimates that removing the Right to Buy would retain 10,000 houses that might otherwise be sold in the period 2015 to 2020.

Given the current pressures on social housing, it is regrettable that the Scottish Government has set a 3 year delay before implementation. The process of legislating to end RTB will bring with it publicity and therefore plenty of opportunity for tenants who wish to purchase to exercise their right. \textbf{We argue that abolition should take effect immediately from the date of commencement which might be, for example, 6 months or a year after the Bill receives Royal Assent.} There is a need to balance allowing people

\textsuperscript{8} Reliable data for deaths from CO poisoning in Scotland is not available since inquests for unexplained deaths are not routinely held, unlike in England where the coroners system investigates all unexplained and sudden deaths.

\textsuperscript{9} Under the The Gas Safety (Installation and Use) Regulations 1998 to take time to properly consider the option of buying, with the potential for less-than-scrupulous commercial companies having the opportunity to persuade people to “buy before it is too late”.

Part 2: Changes to social housing - allocation and management

This section of the Bill proposes a series of detailed changes to the allocation and management of social housing. These have been consulted on and discussed at the Scottish Government’s Affordable Rented Housing Advisory Group (ARHAG) of which Shelter Scotland is a member\(^\text{10}\).

Shelter Scotland agrees that more needs to be done to ensure that social landlords make best use of the limited supply of existing stock. While some of these proposals are welcome – enhancing tenants’ rights and technical amendments to clarify existing legislation, other proposals, especially around eviction processes, have potentially negative consequences as currently drafted. It is important that responses to anti-social behaviour are strong, consistent and effective. But we do not want to see detrimental changes to housing law and tenancy rights in response to concerns over anti-social behaviour which may not be effective and could cause serious problems for some vulnerable tenants.

There are three proposals that we do not support and believe should be removed from the Bill altogether:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Taking age into account when allocating social housing:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bill proposal [section 5]: This proposal seeks to remove the prohibition on social landlords taking someone’s age into account when allocating housing.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

Shelter Scotland position: This proposal would mean social landlords can take the age of an applicant into account when allocating housing. This goes against the principle that the need of the household should dictate any allocation. We feel this change is potentially discriminatory and there is already sufficient flexibility in the national framework and legislation to allow landlords to make sustainable, common sense allocations. We are not aware of any evidence to suggest that the current legislation is inhibiting good practice in allocations. We want to see this proposal removed from the Bill entirely. We strongly believe that:

- The allocation of social housing must be determined by the needs and circumstances of the household and age in itself is not a need category.
- By removing this important safeguard there is a very real danger that vulnerable groups will be unfairly penalised and will not be allocated the homes they need and are entitled to. In particular, we feel that young people will be discriminated against as potentially less attractive tenants.
- Current legislation and guidance means that there is sufficient flexibility when allocating homes to ensure tenancies are suitable and sustainable in the long term, for example if there are accessibility requirements or if someone needed a specially adapted property.

Increased use of the SSST for antisocial behaviour

Bill proposal [Section 8]: This proposal would extend the circumstances when a social landlord can allocate or demote a secure Scottish tenancy (SST) to a short Scottish secure tenancy (SSST) where “tenants (or any one of joint tenants) or a person residing or lodging with, or a subtenant of, the tenant” has acted anti-socially in or near their home within the past 3 years.

Shelter Scotland position: Shelter Scotland believes that antisocial behaviour (ASB) which blights communities and causes misery and distress should be tackled quickly and effectively. We do not believe that this proposal will be effective and do not think that linking behaviour to tenancy rights is the correct approach. We need changes to practice to compliment the raft of existing legislation and partnerships to tackle ASB and its causes.
Specifically, we want to see this proposal removed from the Bill entirely because:
- We are concerned about what constitutes ‘anti-social behaviour’ in this provision and the low burden of proof that is required to result in someone losing their security of tenure and possibly their home.
- The 3 year time limit in this proposal would mean people could be penalised for actions a long time ago even if they have taken steps to turn their lives around. This means they could be over-zealously penalised for the previous bad behaviour of a joint tenant or family member.
- we are concerned about the inequity between existing and new tenants under this proposal. Existing tenants would have the right to review the demotion of their tenancy while new tenants granted a SSST would have no rights to challenge the decision to give them an unsecure tenancy.
Simplified eviction process after criminal conviction

Bill proposal [15]: This proposal effectively simplifies the eviction process once a tenant has a conviction for an offence punishable by imprisonment, or for using the property for illegal purposes within the previous 12 months. This proposal would mean the court does not have to consider whether it is ‘reasonable’ to evict: effectively an ‘auto-eviction’ in certain cases.

Shelter Scotland position: Shelter Scotland understands there may be frustrations for landlords when they have to go through a court process for an eviction order, when the tenant has already been convicted of a criminal offence. However, we have concerns about how this proposal could be used to penalise tenants who have sought to change their behaviour since an initial conviction, or who were convicted of a low level offence which did not impact or harm other tenants. We believe this could have serious unintended consequences and would like this measure to be removed from the Bill. Our specific concerns are:

- This measure will remove the test of ‘reasonableness’ that Sheriffs currently apply during eviction cases. This takes the power away from the courts to decide if in each case, a person losing their home is a ‘reasonable’ outcome. This is often where judgements can be made on whether the person has made efforts to change their behaviour or if there are mitigating circumstances. As a consequence we are extremely concerned that by removing this option, sheriffs will have no option but to make someone homeless when it is not reasonable to do so\(^\text{11}\).
- We do not believe that this measure will be effective in tackling anti-social behaviour and may have a range of negative consequences including homelessness for vulnerable tenants who are effectively being punished twice – through a criminal conviction and then loss of their home.
- We also believe this could increase litigation in general and potentially court costs in challenges and appeals.

The remaining proposals in this section dealing with a range of allocation and social housing management tools are non-contentious and we broadly supports these. It will be crucial once the legislation is amended, that the right regulation and statutory guidance is put in place to ensure good, consistent practice by social landlords using these measures and to make sure there are no unintended consequences.

\(^{11}\) While ‘proportionality’ can be considered under European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) this does not cover reasonableness and there is no guarantee that every Sheriff will be willing to hear proportionality arguments.
Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Shelter Scotland believes that greater security is the key to ensuring that private tenancies provide stable and secure homes for Scotland’s private renters. This is increasingly important as 12% of all households in Scotland now rent privately, double the number ten years ago, and 26% of households renting privately in Scotland have children.

Greater security of tenure would also empower tenants to be active consumers and use their rights effectively. A review group established by the Scottish Government is currently considering possible changes to the tenancy regime in the private rented sector. The group, of which Shelter Scotland is a member, is submitting its recommendation for reform to the tenancy regime in the PRS to Ministers in early March 2014.

Establishing a Private Rented Sector Tribunal

This provision proposes taking civil housing disputes in the private rented sector – both eviction and non-eviction – out of the sheriff court, and into a dedicated private rented sector tribunal.

Shelter Scotland supports the creation of a private rented sector tribunal. We believe this will improve dispute resolution for private tenants and landlords, making dispute resolution more accessible, cheaper, less time-consuming and less intimidating for all parties. Decision-makers in a tribunal would also have a higher degree of specialisation, potentially giving a higher quality of decision.

Importantly, the tribunal should be free-to-access for vulnerable tenants and those on low incomes. It is also important that free legal advice and representation be made available for these groups through the Scottish Legal Aid Board, exploring the possibility of rolling out lay representation across the tribunal. This would ensure that everyone is able to navigate the dispute resolution process effectively. The panel should also be designed to encourage participation by tenants. We believe that a less adversarial approach to housing related disputes would encourage tenants to assert their legal rights.

Third party reporting to the Private Rented Housing Panel

The Bill contains a provision for local authorities to make applications to the Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP) where a landlord has failed to meet the repairing standard.¹⁷

Shelter Scotland supports this proposal; currently the PRHP is not working as an effective mechanism for tenants to force improvements in private properties. However, it must be implemented in such a way as to not create conflict between tenant and landlord which put the tenancy at risk.

The proposal allows local authorities to address poor conditions in private rented housing, without the need for private tenants to take forward applications. Shelter Scotland regularly advises private tenants experiencing problems with poor repair in their homes. Many who are unwilling to apply to the PRHP because they fear it will have a detrimental effect on their relationship with their landlord, putting them at risk of losing their tenancy.

It is important that third party reporting to the PRHP does not in any way lead to a tenant fearing that their tenancy will be ended by their landlord. Tenants should be made fully aware of the implications of a third party application to the PRHP. To guarantee that private tenants’ security of tenure is not affected, and to encourage more tenants to pursue their right to repair through the PRHP, the Scottish Government should act to increase security of tenure for private tenants.¹⁸

¹⁷ The full repairing standard is contained in s.13 Housing (Scotland) Act 2006
Part 4: The regulation of letting agents in Scotland

The Bill creates a requirement for letting agents to register as an agent, adhere to a statutory code of practice and sets up a dispute resolution process for landlords, agents and tenants.

Shelter Scotland supports this approach to regulating letting agents. We have long argued for regulation of this industry – alongside landlord and agent representative bodies. Regulation would benefit tenants, landlords and good letting agents. It is critical that any regulatory system has sufficient power to force positive changes in practice.

Regulation is important to drive elements of poor practice out of Scotland’s lettings industry, including: the charging of unlawful upfront fees to tenants, the failure to register tenants’ deposits and the failure to carry out important safety checks.

The code of practice must set a high standard for the conduct of all lettings professionals, driving poor practice out of the market. It should be clear about what constitutes a failure under the code of practice and, where tenants and landlords believe they have been treated unfairly, it should be clear what action they can take under the code of practice. Importantly it should also apply to all professionals in the lettings industry, ensuring consumers – both landlords and tenants – are clear about what standards and forms of redress apply.

The dispute resolution process must be easy to understand and access by both landlords and tenants. The cost should not be prohibitively expensive. Applications from vulnerable tenants or those on low incomes, should be free. This is particularly important where tenants or landlords have experienced a financial loss as a result of the actions of an agent – for example where unlawful pre-tenancy fees have been required.

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

A tabular summary of CIH Scotland’s provisional views on each of the main measures in the Bill is attached in the second part of this submission. Our Board is meeting in early February to consider the measures in detail.

In December we published a detailed briefing on the Bill, which can be seen here.

To complement the summary table, below we make some general comments on the Bill and then highlight some particular areas on which we are especially keen to highlight our views to the Committee.

General comments

Overall there is much to welcome in this wide-ranging Bill. As a member of key Scottish Government working groups, CIH Scotland has been closely involved in the development of some of the main provisions, particularly in relation to social sector allocations and tenancies and the private rented sector.

The social sector allocations and tenancy changes are broadly welcome. Some are aimed at helping landlords tackle anti social behaviour (ASB): CIH Scotland supports all of the proposed measures, but no-one should overplay the extent to which they will make ASB easier to deal with. Serious ASB will always be very challenging to deal with, as in most cases there are few, if any, speedy remedies.

CIH Scotland welcomes the changes relating to the private rented sector, including the creation of a new Housing Tribunal to consider all landlord/tenant disputes. We are disappointed, though, that the Tribunal is to cover only the private rented sector and not the social sector, as the current shortcomings of the court system impact much more significantly on social sector tenants and landlords.

Comments on specific provisions

Sections 1 and 85(4) – Abolition of the right to buy

CIH Scotland warmly welcomes the measures to abolish the right to buy. We recognise that when an existing right is being withdrawn, a reasonable notice period is required. However, we believe that a period of three years from the date of Royal Assent is longer than is necessary. A shorter period will help social landlords plan for the future with greater certainty, and will limit the size of a peaking of sales in the period before abolition. CIH Scotland believes that a period of two years would be more than sufficient to enable tenants to consider their options, plan ahead and make the purchase if that is what they decide to do.
Section 5 – Removal of prohibition on taking age into account in social sector allocations

This measure was requested by CIH Scotland, as it removes an unnecessary and unhelpful barrier to landlords wanting to allocate to particular groups in specific situations, as recently suggested to us with the following example from a local authority:

“Lifting the age restriction would be very useful to us in dealing with fairly complex neighbourhood issues where, say, we may have a higher than average concentration of young, inexperienced, complex or vulnerable households within close proximity to each other and where an interim policy not to allocate anyone under 40 may achieve a more balanced community.”

We are aware that some organisations appear to believe that this measure could result in younger people being unfairly discriminated in social landlords’ allocations policies, but we cannot see that this will be the case. The Bill makes it explicit that removing this age bar does not mean that landlords can discriminate against particular age groups – such as younger people – within their overall allocations policy as this would contravene the Equality Act 2010. The Bill promises to provide greater flexibility for councils and housing associations and this is a common sense measure which will enable landlords to deal with very specific situations without impacting on the overall spread of allocations they make across the age groups.

Section 7 – Suspensions

This part of the Bill, which applies to housing list applicants and not to those being housed as a result of homelessness, helpfully clarifies the circumstances in which an applicant can be temporarily suspended from receiving an offer of housing. The measure provides for regulations to set out (a) how long a suspension can remain in force and (b) how far back previous conduct can be considered. CIH Scotland has reservations about the latter, as this will mean that a landlord has no discretion at all in any case to consider conduct which goes back more than the specified period. So, for example, the actions of a former tenant may have led to him been imprisoned for a period which is longer than the period specified in the regulations and so a landlord has no way of knowing if the applicant’s conduct has changed and improved.

CIH Scotland produced good practice guidance on suspensions in 2010, in which we emphasised the importance of landlords not unduly punishing tenants for poor conduct many years ago, and we have every reason to believe that landlords currently act very reasonably in assessing how far back previous conduct should be taken into account. But for legislation to completely remove a landlord’s capacity to exercise discretion is an unhelpful straitjacket and we do not support this measure.

Section 10 – Increase in minimum term of a Short SST

This provision extends from six to 12 months the minimum term of a Short Scottish Secure Tenancy given for on grounds of anti social behaviour. This is to enable a longer period in which to address any conduct issues prior to conversion to a full tenancy. As now, housing support must be offered to the tenant during this period.

CIH Scotland has reservations about this measure. Whilst it is well intended, it will mean that where serious anti social behaviour occurs at an early stage, the landlord will normally have to manage the situation until 12 months has elapsed and will not be able to end the tenancy any earlier, even if the behaviour is causing difficulty and distress for neighbouring tenants and residents. With good intent, the Bill amends the 2001 Act to enable a landlord to take recovery action through the courts as if the tenancy were a full tenancy. However, with all the inherent delays in the current court system, it is highly unlikely that this process could be completed before the point at which the landlord could automatically end the Short SST.

Section 15 – Grounds for eviction – anti social behaviour

This introduces a new requirement for the court to grant a possession order made within 12 months of a tenant’s conviction for using the property for illegal purposes or for an offence in or near the property punishable by imprisonment. This measure could make a significant difference in those long standing and difficult cases where landlords have not been able to secure eviction, for example because of lack of willing witnesses.

Some reservations have been expressed about the possibility that landlords might seek eviction after a tenant has been convicted of a relatively minor offence, such as possession of a drug where no other household was involved or harmed. CIH Scotland does not believe that landlords are interested in seeking eviction in such cases, and any concerns about this should be considered in the context of the key aim of this measure, which is to address more serious cases of anti social behaviour.

Sections 17 to 21 – New housing tribunal for the private rented sector

CIH Scotland very much welcomes the prospect of a new, specialist and more modern approach to dispute resolution in the private rented sector (PRS). Neither tenants nor landlords in the PRS see the current sheriff court system as user friendly or efficient, and so we recognise the Scottish Government’s wish to introduce the new system into this sector initially.

However, having instigated the case for a tribunal system across all housing tenures as long ago as 2004, we remain disappointed that the social rented sector in particular is not to benefit from all the advantages that the tribunal approach can bring. It has always been the case that the greatest impact of a tribunal system would be on this sector, where there is immense scope for a quicker, expert and more user friendly redress system for tenants and landlords alike.

Whilst it would not be practicable to seek to amend the Bill, we will be seeking reassurances from the Minister that the door has not been closed on a future extension of the tribunal system to the social sector.
Section 23 – the Repairing Standard in the private rented sector

The Bill’s amendments to the Repairing Standard all relate to the very welcome proposal for third parties to apply to the Private Rented Housing Panel to enforce the Repairing Standard.

CIH Scotland has long supported calls led by the Electrical Safety Council for the Repairing Standard to be amended to introduce a requirement for five-yearly electrical safety checks by a registered electrician, covering both fixed electrical installations and any electrical appliances supplied with the let. Over two thirds of accidental fires in residential property in Scotland are caused by electricity, and private tenants are more likely to be at risk than any other tenure.

We recognise that the Scottish Government has not consulted on such an amendment to the Repairing Standard, and so may feel that it might not be appropriate to legislate at this stage. If this is the case, we would want to see an indication from the Minister that consultation on this issue will be undertaken at the earliest opportunity.

Stage 2 amendments on the private rented sector

The Committee will be aware of the Scottish Government’s intentions to table amendments at Stage 2 to enhance local authority enforcement powers, including strengthened rights of inspection. CIH Scotland very much welcomes this, as powers to inspect individual property are currently very limited.

But will mean that where serious anti social behaviour occurs at an early stage, the landlord will have to manage the situation until 12 months has elapsed and is unlikely to be able to end the tenancy any earlier, as court action (as if the tenancy were a full tenancy) is unlikely to be completed before the 12 month period of the SSST has elapsed.</td>

<td>Sensible tightening up of the law to prevent abuse such as assignation to people not in housing need. Introduction

1.1 As the national representative body for housing associations and co-operatives in Scotland, the SFHA welcomes the opportunity to follow up our oral evidence on the Housing (Scotland) Bill 2013 with this written submission to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee.

1.2 To provide context, housing associations and housing co-operatives in Scotland own and manage 46% of the country’s affordable rented housing stock. This represents 274,996 homes across Scotland, concentrated in some of the poorest communities in our country.

1.3 There are some important and distinctive features of associations which differentiate us from other public bodies. Our members are:

- Independent businesses with goals aligned to the Scottish Government in providing and managing high quality affordable accommodation and housing services;
- Responsible for accessing and managing some public resources for house building, but mostly reliant on our tenants’ rents for income and expenditure;
- Managing businesses imaginatively and inventively to benefit housing and communities through our not-for-profit ethos;
- Accountable to our members and tenants, who live or have other interests in the communities and places which they create;
- Regulated by an independent Scottish Housing Regulator;
- Able to demonstrate added value in terms of care and support, wider role and financial inclusion.

1.4 At the same time, it would be misleading to think of housing associations as a homogeneous group. They were formed from a variety of different circumstances and come in all shapes and sizes, ranging from large ex-local authority stock transfer organisations with tens of thousands of properties, to small community-controlled organisations owning a couple of hundred homes. There are also various group structures and other constitutional arrangements in place within the sector, increasingly so.

2 Executive Summary

2.1 The SFHA commends the Scottish Government for having the courage to abolish the Right to Buy in Scotland. However, it is our view that a three year notice period is excessive and we would wish to see this reduced to one year.

2.2 The SFHA broadly supports the proposals for social housing allocations and the changes to tenancy agreements. However, in our view, some of their impacts are being slightly overstated, particularly in relation to increasing flexibility within allocations policies. It is our view that it would be more accurate to say that the Bill’s proposals will increase landlords’ confidence to better utilise flexibility. While the proposals around short tenancies, suspensions and streamlined evictions processes are welcome, they are not a panacea to combat antisocial behaviour. This will still require a multi-agency approach – social landlords are not solely responsible for ‘tackling’ antisocial behaviour - and a less congested court system. There is a danger that the expectations of those tenants whose lives are blighted by the thoughtless actions of their neighbours will be raised to unrealistic levels by some of the language being used by the Scottish Government. The measures contained in the Bill are but a small part of the overall action required to tackle antisocial behaviour properly.

2.3 In respect of the private sector, we would make the general comment that we welcome any moves to address poor private landlord practice.
However, we note that there is nothing in this Bill that will bring the private rented sector anywhere near the levels of the social rented sector in terms of the regulation of management or of physical property standards. There appears to be nothing in this Bill that would have a robust impact on driving up standards in the privately owned sector.

2.4 In respect of regulation, while we support the principle underpinning section 79 (a) (which seeks to enable the SHR to act decisively where an RSL is in serious financial jeopardy) the practical impact of the proposed legislative changes is not clear. We do not support section 79 (b) of the Bill and have proposed an alternative to repeal.

2.5 We urge the Committee to establish a requirement for the SHR to produce a Code of Regulatory Practice and we agree with others that it would be desirable to establish an appeal mechanism in line with the current Scottish Government consultation on a draft Strategic Code of Practice for Scottish regulators.

2.6 It is SFHA’s view that the prospects for achieving more constructive and productive relationships between SHR and the regulated and representative bodies would be enhanced by amending section 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010.

2.7 Within the spirit of the 2010 Act affecting mergers, there may be merit in considering the case for a ballot in cases where RSLs seek to join group structures. We offer alternative views on this matter to assist the Committee in its deliberations.
Specific Questions on the Housing (Scotland) Bill 2013

3.1 The ICI Committee’s call for evidence asked a specific set of questions. Not all are of direct or significant relevance to our members, and we have therefore limited our responses to those that are.

3.2 As we respond to the individual questions posed by the ICI Committee, we also intend to make comment on some wider principles in relation to how this Bill is likely to impact upon our sector.

Part 1: Right to Buy

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

3.3 The SFHA is pleased that the Bill aims to end all forms of Right to Buy (RTB). We fully support the proposal and have campaigned long and hard for this. It is vital that we protect the existing social rented stock.

3.4 However, we wish to make it clear that we are not against the principle of home ownership or mixed tenure per se. Rather that we are against the principle of high discounts, particularly given the urgent need for more social housing. The SFHA made its position on RTB clear in our response\(^1\) to the 2012 Scottish Government consultation The Future of Right to Buy in Scotland. The vast majority of housing associations and co-operatives not already protected by charitable status also successfully made their cases to extend the ten year RSL exemption from the Modernised RTB until 30\(^{th}\) September 2022. All 57 organisations that applied for this exemption were successful.

3.5 During our oral evidence to the ICI Committee we referred to research\(^2\) that tracked what happened to properties purchased under RTB, and suggested that up to £2billion per year is paid out in excess Housing Benefit on ex RTB properties now rented out, at higher rents, in the private sector.

Q2. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

3.6 It is the SFHA view that 3 years is excessive. While we understand the principle of reasonable notice and the Scottish Government’s concern at a potential legal challenge under Human Rights legislation, it is our view that there is no real test or precedent as to whether one, two or three years is a fair notice period other than subjective opinion. Moreover, there are many other issues within the complexities of RTB that are more open to legal challenge than this, (e.g. there are those whose RTB is currently suspended that will effectively have their right ended without notice – Pressured Area Status and the RSL ten year suspension from Modernised RTB being two examples). Notwithstanding any of this, almost three quarters of responses to the RTB consultation were in favour of a notice period of less than three years. It is our view that, in the spirit of the credibility of future Scottish Government consultations, it would be reasonable to reflect this when setting the length of the notice period.

3.7 Based on the majority of our members’ views, a notice period of one year from the date of Royal Assent would strike a reasonable balance between giving fair notice to tenants and giving certainty going forward for landlords.

3.8 One or two of our members have made suggestions about how receipts might be utilised during the notice period (whatever its eventual length). Our understanding is that in the main the receipts that are generated from RTB sales go back in to the Scottish Government and are redistributed as part of the HAG programme. This approach is unfair on those organisations that may have lost stock through RTB but who are no longer developing.

3.9 There is a case for any RTB receipts generated between the period of Royal Assent and the Bill’s application to be allowed to be retained by individual RSLs, on the basis that they are ring fenced for re-investment into social housing activities, stock improvements or capital developments. This is the way RTB receipts are dealt with in organisations derived in full or in part from Scottish Homes’ stock transfers.

Part 2: Social Housing

Q4 (there appears to be no Q3). In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

3.10 We welcome and support the aims and principles of the proposals to increase local flexibility within allocations. We do feel that landlords have already had more flexibility than they perhaps realised and in that sense the Bill is simply reinforcing some of that flexibility and perhaps eradicating any concerns that landlords might have had about just how flexible they could be when deciding who should get priority for their houses.
3.11 The Reasonable Preference Categories were introduced as far back as 1966 and their relevance to the 21st century is questionable, particularly in light of the Scottish Government research in 2011 Reasonable Preference in Scottish Social Housing which found that they were not widely recognised nor were they widely utilised by landlords.

3.12 That said, despite the need for an overhaul, some of them could and have been used (e.g. living in unsatisfactory housing conditions) to cover a variety of different circumstances. The new category of “Persons living in unsatisfactory housing conditions…” is a very similar catch-all category, and for that reason it may well be that in practice we don’t see major changes to the allocation policies of many housing associations and co-operatives.

3.13 The redefinition and introduction of locally agreed categories may give some landlords the confidence to take a broader, more strategic view of their allocations policy and deal with the twin issues of tenancy sustainability and community sustainability. It may also make the introduction of local lettings initiatives more transparent.

3.14 The duty to take Local Housing Strategies into account should reinforce the strong partnership work already being carried out across Scotland between housing associations and co-operatives and local authorities, particularly in relation to homelessness and housing options.

3.15 The duty to consult on changes to allocation policies ties in with the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001. We agree with the non-prescriptive approach being suggested by the Scottish Government and trust that the Regulator will do likewise. There may be resource implications for some landlords, although we get the strong sense that the vast majority of housing associations and co-operatives already consult widely on their allocations policies, in the spirit of the 2001 Act.

3.16 Taking ownership of a property into account when deciding priority for housing is a reasonable move, designed to prevent applicants from profiteering. However, owning a house that is clearly unsuitable for the applicant should not prevent an allocation, and reasonable landlords will continue to allocate sensitively and sensibly in this regard. The introduction of the new short tenancy specifically for homeowners who find themselves in particular circumstances may also help to strike the balance between legitimately excluding homeowners who clearly do not need social housing and accommodating those whose owned property is unsuitable or inaccessible.

Taking age into account - our members were keen for this to be included and it should certainly help in relation to sensitive lettings and avoiding 'lifestyle clashes'. However, because age is a protected characteristic under the Equality Act, we do wonder how this will actually operate in practice, and the inclusion of this proposal – despite it being, on the face of it, slightly at odds with existing legislation – is a bold move. We would suspect that this proposal, if enacted, is every bit as likely to face a legal challenge as any RTB notice period.

The proposals around suspensions are welcome in principle, and build on existing good practice. However, as with many of the Bill’s proposals, the implementation detail will be critical and we will be seeking clear guidance from the Scottish Government as to the level of evidence required in relation to previous antisocial behaviour, how long a suspension can last for, and also how far back in time it is reasonable for a landlord to go when considering historical antisocial behaviour. The same principles – a need for guidance on levels of evidence required etc. – apply in relation to the creation/conversion to a short tenancy for previous antisocial behaviour.

Some tidying up of the drafting of section 7 is required to achieve consistency of approach in relation to taking into account the abandonment, damage or eviction from previous tenancies in other parts of the UK, and not just in Scotland.

Some of our members have expressed concern that the suspension provisions might be rendered impotent by applicants who may have otherwise been subject to a suspension simply being referred for an allocation via the homelessness route. The Scottish Government has been very clear in its discussions and consultations with the SFHA that this would go against the spirit of the Bill’s intentions and we would suggest, therefore, that some sort of provision is made to ensure that this is not allowed to happen in practice.

The introduction of a right of appeal for the applicant is fair and balanced, and will mean that landlords will need to be very clear on their reasons for suspension.

One of the aims of the Bill is to clarify previous legislation, and particularly in relation to the existing Housing Acts. With this in mind we would like to highlight a concern that has been raised by several of our members. Prior to the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 being enacted, housing associations and co-operatives were able to advise applicants that they were not in sufficient housing need to enable them to be placed on a housing list. In other words, they operated a ‘cut-off point’. This served the dual purpose of managing the applicant’s expectations and preventing unnecessary landlord resources (tenants’ rents in other words) being diverted into maintaining lists of people who were never going to be housed. Then the 2001 Act introduced the ‘right’ for anyone aged 16 or over to be on the housing list of a social landlord. We suspect that the policy aim at the time was to allow anyone over the age of 16 to apply for social housing, rather than simply be kept on a meaningless and expensive list. We therefore feel that it would be in keeping with the aims of the Bill, in respect of both the clarification of legislation and the commitment to introducing more flexibility for landlords, to revert to the pre-2001 position of allowing landlords to set needs thresholds that they can apply when maintaining housing lists, thus managing expectations and creating resource efficiencies. This approach would necessarily include the provision of advice for the applicant on any alternative housing options they may have.

Q5. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

3.23 Short Tenancies - It is difficult to argue against the principle of any of the proposals. Because of the highly technical nature of some of the proposed changes, there may be some practical implementation difficulties, which will require training for landlords’ staff. Some issues still aren’t clear. For example, short tenancies go hand-in-hand with support, which needs to be resourced. The ‘who’ and ‘how’ this is to be resourced will require clarification. It is also unclear whether there is a limit on how often a tenancy can be converted.

3.24 Full Tenancies - The new 12 month qualifying period for assignations, sublets, joint tenancies, and some successions is welcome. We are confident that landlords will continue to be flexible according to the many different circumstances which present themselves in respect of such tenancy amendments. We are pleased to see the introduction of grounds under which landlords may refuse an assignation request even if the 12 month qualifying period is met. The SFHA and CIH Scotland wanted to go further in this respect and shift the onus by removing the tenant’s right to assign, replacing it with a landlord power to allow it, where it made best use of stock or where the assignee would have been at, or close to, the top of the priority list for housing.

3.25 The SFHA supports the new streamlined evictions process. We were disappointed in Shelter’s reaction to this proposal during the oral evidence to the ICI Committee, which was that, in their view, some social landlords would use the process to evict tenants for very minor criminal offences. Social landlords have made great strides in recent years to reduce the number of evictions they carry out, and can clearly demonstrate that evictions are a last-resort measure. Shelter have acknowledged this in their annual evictions report, published in March 2013 stating “This plateau in evictions follows a 49 per cent decrease in evictions over the past 4 years which is likely to be due to landlord good practice and work on tenancy sustainment”. Shelter can possibly even take some of the credit for it, in their role as ‘critical friend’, but the notion that social landlords would in some way abuse this streamlined system is not supported by any evidence. The fact of the matter is there are antisocial behaviour cases where the landlord’s hands are tied in respect of eviction because of the understandable reluctance of witnesses to give evidence in a civil case. Our understanding of what is being proposed is that, while the reasonableness test in respect of other social housing evictions is being waived (which is what Shelter are concerned about), there will still be a proportionality test applied by sheriffs, in relation to Human Rights legislation (Article 8; European Court of Human Rights). This ought to allay any fears that Shelter might have around tenants being evicted for very minor offences.

3.26 The SFHA supports amending the eviction grounds for adapted properties. The safeguard of ‘suitable alternative accommodation’ provides sufficient comfort for us that the housing needs of the successor are suitably protected.

Q6. Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government’s objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

3.27 There appears to be a reasonable balance between allowing landlords to take more robust action and affording more protection for tenants by ensuring that landlords can fully account for any action to end a short tenancy. As with many of the other proposals, we await further detail and guidance on the issue.

Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

3.28 The SFHA and others would have preferred to see a pilot housing tribunal covering both private and social sector cases. The delays in the current sheriff court system are likely to undermine some of the proposals in the Bill and raises tenant expectations to unrealistic levels in relation to how swiftly antisocial behaviour can be dealt with. We do acknowledge that there is a civil court review in progress, which may address some of the concerns our members have around the congested sheriff court system as it currently operates.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authority discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

3.29 The SFHA will leave detailed comment on this to others, but the private rented sector, while clearly not a homogeneous group, is of interest to many of our members who operate within mixed tenure communities. The private rented sector is increasingly being used as a way of discharging homelessness duties by local authorities, and is being promoted by the Scottish Government as a genuine housing option. The sector is also a strain on the welfare budget, with SFHA’s own 2012 research, Housing Benefit Spending: Busting the Myths\(^5\) estimating Housing Benefit to have increased in the private rented sector by 153\% in the past decade, compared to a 21\% increase in the social rented sector. In light of this, we would therefore make the general comment that we welcome any moves to address poor private landlord practice, though we note that the proposals fall far short of bringing the private rented sector anywhere near the levels of the social rented sector in terms of the regulation of management or of physical property standards. On that last point, there may be a missed opportunity to have included in the Bill an enhanced Repairing Standard.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

3.30 The principle is welcome, though once again we cannot really comment at this stage until more detail on the content of any proposals and how they will be resourced is known. We note that once again the Bill is legislating for discretionary powers, which may not lead to a consistent, Scotland-wide approach across all 32 local authorities.

Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

---

3.31 These proposals are broadly in line with the arrangements for Property Factors (which many of our members are) and it seems a sensible move. We look forward to seeing the detail, particularly in relation to a Code of Practice, as this is where the potential strength of the proposal lies.

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

3.32 It would be sensible, and consistent, to allow for third party reporting to the tribunal in relation to the activities of letting agents. This would allow local authorities to raise any concerns they may have, in a similar way that is being legislated for in Part 3 of the Bill.

Part 5: Mobile Home Sites with Permanent Residents

Q12. Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?

3.33 This proposal will not have a significant impact on our members and we therefore do not intend to make any detailed comment on it.

Q13. What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

3.34 This proposal will not have a significant impact on our members and we therefore do not intend to make any detailed comment on it.

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

3.35 SFHA will leave detailed comment on this to others. However, we would repeat our concerns in relation to the physical standards of privately owned homes, particularly in respect of energy efficiency, that they are generally much lower than in the social rented sector. There is nothing in this Bill that would have a robust impact on driving these standards up in the privately owned sector.

Part 7: Miscellaneous Provisions

Q16. Do you have any comments relation to the range of miscellaneous housing provisions set out in this part of the Bill?

3.36 We agree that the introduction of an exemption to the 20 year rule should facilitate the ‘Help to Buy’ scheme.
SFHA’s main interest in this section of the Bill relates to the proposed changes to the powers of the Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR), as described in section 79 of the Bill. We are content with the general principle behind the section 79 proposals which is to ensure that SHR can respond effectively to exceptional circumstances where an RSL may be in serious financial jeopardy.

The section 79 proposals should be seen as a backstop for worst-case scenarios. In practice, it is far more important to prevent the proposed powers having to be exercised at all. A key issue is how SHR uses its existing statutory powers to ensure early detection and an effective response to serious financial problems. SHR has spoken publicly on a number of occasions (including in its evidence to the ICI Committee in December 2013) about its role in “managing three RSLs out of near insolvency” during 2012. In our view, the financial crises that occurred in these cases were not the product of SHR lacking appropriate statutory powers:

- SHR had long-standing involvement in each case;
- For whatever reason, regulatory scrutiny and intervention failed to avert or provide early warning of the financial problems that crystallised in 2012;
- SHR relied on non-statutory methods of engagement, instead of using of its existing formal statutory intervention powers.

On the specific measures now proposed in section 79 of the Bill:

- While supporting the general principle underpinning section 79 (a), the practical impact of the proposed legislative changes is not clear. None of the recent cases involving RSLs in financial jeopardy involved a transfer of assets directed by SHR. Instead, the mechanism used in these cases was for the RSLs in financial difficulty to join a group structure. The arrangements proposed in section 79 would not have applied, since none of the cases involved a directed transfer of assets.
- A number of our members have commented that the wording of section 79 (a) could be strengthened by requiring that the SHR obtains ministerial consent before using these powers. This should include a requirement that the SHR would need to provide a detailed explanation as to how each of the four criteria were met before using the power.
- We do not support section 79 (b) of the Bill. This would repeal the Regulator’s general obligation to base a directed transfer of an RSL’s assets on an independent valuation. Directed transfers are extremely unusual (the last one occurred more than 10 years ago) and we do not see any value in removing the general requirement for independent valuations.

- Instead, it would be more appropriate to retain as the norm the current requirement for independent valuations set out in section 67 (6) of the Housing (Scotland) 2010, and to amend section 67 (6) so that the obligation to obtain an independent valuation can be set aside in the highly exceptional circumstances where emergency action is needed. In other words, the obligation to obtain an independent valuation would remain, but would be set aside where the four specific conditions relating to financial jeopardy narrated in section 79 of the Bill are met.

- There should be transparency and accountability for exceptional regulatory action that results in a directed transfer of an RSL’s assets. This could be achieved by requiring SHR to publish information about inquiries that result in a direction to transfer an RSL’s assets.

- We have a concern that removing the duty to consult lenders (where all of the four criteria specified in section 79 (a) apply) may have the potential to reduce lenders’ appetite to lend to the sector and/or encourage less favourable borrowing terms. It is our understanding that the current obligation on the SHR under Section 67(4) to consult with secured creditors is not onerous, i.e. there is no minimum consultation period and no specification as to the level of consultation required. There is also no obligation on the SHR to comply with the views of secured creditors. Any decision still rests at the discretion of the SHR. So we are not convinced that there would be too little time to consult lenders in such instances.

Other Issues

Q17. Are there any other comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives or specific provisions?

3.40 SFHA has had sight of GWSF’s Housing Regulation in Scotland paper, which is being submitted to the Committee alongside GWSF’s written evidence on the Bill. SFHA endorses the content of the paper.

3.41 We recognise that the proposed changes set out in section 79 of the Bill are designed to make changes to the housing regulation framework in response to issues that were not foreseen when the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 was enacted. SFHA\(^6\) believes that the same principle should be applied to other aspects of housing regulation. In this regard, we have identified three key areas for legislative change, described below:

- Regulatory intervention and the need for statutory mechanisms for reviews and appeals;
- Consultation and involvement requirements;
- Tenant consultation and RSL moves to group structures.

Regulatory intervention and the need for statutory mechanisms for reviews and appeals

3.42 The 2010 Act requires the SHR to publish, following consultation, statutory codes of practice on its powers to carry out inquiries and to seek information (section 51 of the 2010 Act) and to exercise statutory intervention powers (section 54 of the 2010 Act).

3.43 These aspects of the current legislation are not operating satisfactorily:

- SHR has not published the codes of practice referred to in the 2010 Act, beyond high level information contained in its April 2012 Regulatory Framework.
- A number of housing associations have expressed strong concerns to representative bodies about the scope and proportionality of regulatory interventions in their organisations. Without commenting on the merits of individual cases, SFHA is concerned that there is such a high level of dissatisfaction with SHR’s activities and approach. The root cause in our view is a lack of transparency and of sufficiently clear ground rules for the kind of intervention approach typically being used by SHR.
- That intervention approach involves non-statutory methods “behind the scenes”, rather than the more transparent and accountable processes set out in the 2010 Act (e.g. published inquiry reports for named organisations and use of the formal statutory intervention powers described in Part 5 of the 2010 Act). To date, SHR has not made any use of those formal intervention powers and it has published only one inquiry report for a named RSL.
- SHR’s Regulatory Framework provides for a review process in the case of published inspection reports, but there are no review processes for other types of regulatory action.

\(^6\) in common with the Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (GWSF)
Moreover, there is no appeals process available to RSLs who believe that regulatory actions are disproportionate or inappropriate.

3.44 SFHA and GWSF agree that these issues need to be addressed in the current Housing Bill. We propose that the Bill should:

- Establish a requirement for SHR to publish, following consultation, a consolidated Code of Regulatory Practice that addresses all of its methods for intervening in the affairs of social landlords (i.e. including interventions that are not publicly reported and those that do not involve the use of statutory intervention powers);
- Provide a statutory right for social landlords to request a review by the SHR Board of regulatory decisions or actions;
- Establish a formal external appeals process, which allows social landlords to challenge SHR’s regulatory decisions or actions.

3.45 We wish to highlight to the Committee the current Scottish Government consultation on a Scottish Regulators’ Strategic Code of Practice, which includes a requirement on all Scottish Regulators, including the Scottish Housing Regulator, to offer an independent, impartial and transparent appeals procedure and to regularly publish data on appeals made and the proportion upheld.

3.46 In putting forward our proposals, it is not our intention to constrain SHR’s ability to take effective regulatory action. Rather the introduction of a review process would enhance SHR’s ability to perform its functions in a fair and transparent manner and would improve confidence in the regulatory system. That confidence is being put at risk by the way in which the regulatory system currently operates, i.e. overwhelming reliance on “offline” non statutory interventions, limited public reporting, and no opportunities for social landlords to question or challenge regulatory action that is often perceived, rightly or wrongly, to be inappropriate, disproportionate or excessive.

3.47 We suggest that the Housing Bill should make provision for an external appeals process, independent of SHR. This would be consistent with statutory arrangements for the charity sector. The Charities and Trustee Investment (Scotland) Act 2005 makes statutory provision for both reviews of decisions made by the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator (OSCR) and for independent consideration of appeals against OSCR decisions by a Scottish Charities Appeal Panel. Members of the Panel are appointed by Scottish Ministers and are independent of OSCR.

3.48 In the absence of an appeals system, the only mechanism currently available to RSLs who have serious concerns about regulatory action is to seek judicial review. This is not in our view in the interests of social landlords, tenants, SHR or the Scottish Parliament.

Consultation and Involvement Requirements

3.49 The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 places the SHR under an obligation to consult with social landlords and their representative bodies on a range of specific matters. Although there has been some improvement in recent months, these arrangements have not been operating effectively in terms of consultation on regulatory guidance, discussion of the operation of the overall regulatory framework, or how SHR and the sector can work together more effectively to promote good practice for the benefit of RSLs and their tenants.

3.50 The prospects for achieving more constructive and productive relationships between SHR and the housing sector would in our view be enhanced by amending section 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010. This requires SHR to consult and involve representative bodies in discussions about the performance of its functions. We suggest that section 5 of the 2010 Act should be amended, to add bodies representing social landlords to the list of representative bodies that SHR is required to consult and involve. This would be a more proactive and constructive approach by SHR to working with the housing association sector and would provide a platform for greater partnership working and co-operation on how housing associations can improve standards and meet regulatory expectations.

3.51 We would wish to highlight to the Committee that the current Scottish Government consultation on a draft Scottish Regulators’ Strategic Code of Practice includes a requirement on all regulators, including the Scottish Housing Regulator, to develop effective relationships with those they regulate and to have clear, two-way communication in place.\(^8\)

Tenant consent for RSL moves to group structures

3.52 As our introduction indicates, RSLs should not be thought of as a homogeneous group as they vary in size, focus and geography. Increasingly organisations are looking at group structures and other constitutional partnerships as the potential for mergers anticipated in 2009/10 is complicated by pension liabilities. There has been just one merger in the last three years.

3.53 It may help to provide some context. Currently listed on the SHR website are 161 registered housing associations of which 14 registered Scottish housing associations operate as subsidiaries providing housing within group structures and more under discussion. Four housing associations registered in Scotland act as parents with one more to be added shortly. Five Scottish housing associations are part of groups operating under parent bodies registered in England.

3.54 The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 requires tenant consultation and ballots to take place where RSLs decide to restructure through mergers or transfers of engagements that result in a change of landlord. The 2010 Act does not make equivalent provision for tenant consultation and ballots where an RSL intends to join a group structure.

3.55 The current Bill could provide an opportunity to address this, to ensure proper protection for the interests of tenants. The current Housing (Scotland) Bill could make provision for the protection of tenants’ interests by:

- Amending Parts 8 and 10 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010, to expand the statutory definition of restructuring to include the formation or joining of a group structure involving more than one RSL;
- Extending the tenant authorisation provisions in Part 10 of the 2010 Act (including the provisions for tenant ballots) to all restructuring cases falling within the expanded definition, regardless of whether the restructuring proposal would result in a change of landlord.

3.56 We have explored views on the potential to extend formal tenant consultation. Views within the sector on this issue vary and we have tried here to capture the arguments for and against.

The case in support of statutory changes relating to housing association group structures can be summarised as follows:

- Restructuring via group structures is happening on a substantial scale in the Scottish housing association sector with potentially significant implications for the future interests of many thousands of tenants and service users and with no

---

9 A total of 145 subsidiaries are listed mostly unregistered and many dormant. The subsidiaries were set up for a variety of reasons, not necessarily housing provision.
requirement for consultation;
- Group structures could have long-term consequences for tenants, because a parent housing association could, potentially, exercise ultimate control over such matters as a subsidiary RSL’s business plan, rent policy, housing investment policy, funding costs and service delivery structures and locations.

The arguments against statutory changes relating to housing association group structures can be summarised as follows
- A group structure is not the same as a transfer of engagements as there is no change of landlord. A ballot of members should be all that is required. Tenants can become members and therefore have a say in whether the organisation becomes part of a group in that way;
- Requiring a ballot of tenants can be onerous, costly and time consuming. The turn-out for any ballot might be low with inconclusive results, particularly dangerous where there is a threat of insolvency;
- A ballot in every case of a proposed group structure is overly prescriptive: it should be up to each individual organisation as to how it communicates and gauges the opinion of its tenants when joining a group.

3.57 If a proposal for extending tenant ballots were to be adopted, it should involve the same exceptions as already apply to other types of RSL reorganisation. For example, tenant ballots are not required in cases where the Scottish Housing Regulator directs an RSL to transfer its assets following a statutory inquiry, and section 79 of the Bill proposes that tenant consultation requirements would be waived in directed transfers where an RSL is at risk of imminent insolvency. These are highly exceptional circumstances and it is appropriate that the same arrangements should be applied in all cases.

Q18. Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

3.58 As noted in the recent SPICe briefing on the Bill, SFHA and GWSF both argued during the pre-legislative consultation process for clearer, more permissive provisions on how social landlords can incorporate local connection provisions in their allocations policies. This is not reflected in the Bill as introduced and is in our view a significant gap. While Scottish Ministers have in the past made helpful statements about the use of local connection provisions, this does not have any statutory expression beyond the “negative” provisions in existing
4  Concluding Comments

4.1 We have outlined above our views on the content of the Bill and have proposed additional regulation-related issues for inclusion.

4.2 We acknowledge that we have already provided oral evidence to the Committee on the Bill and we wish to thank the Committee for that opportunity. However, at that time, due to ongoing discussions with members and other partners, we were not in a position to comment on the proposed changes to regulatory powers nor to propose additional content. We would be very happy to provide further oral evidence on issues in this written evidence that the Committee did not have the opportunity to explore with us during the earlier oral evidence.

10 Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, section 20
GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND FORUM OF HOUSING ASSOCIATIONS (GWSF)

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Introduction

GWSF represents 68 community-controlled housing associations and co-operatives (CCHAs) in 9 local authority areas in west central Scotland. CCHAs provide housing for 75,000 households in the region and own around 28% of all RSL housing in Scotland. This submission sets out our views on the Housing (Scotland) Bill, based on the questions the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee has asked in its call for views. We would draw the Committee’s particular attention to our response to question 17. This suggests that amendments to the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 should be considered in relation to various housing regulation matters, including tenant consent for RSL restructuring through group structures.

Part 1: Right to Buy

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

1. GWSF supports the measures set out in the Bill to abolish the right to buy (RTB). When consulting our members in 2012, almost 90% of GWSF members told us they preferred abolition of the RTB to the alternative policy option of retaining the right to buy and making further changes to discounts and eligibility. We warmly welcome the Scottish Government’s proposals, and support the rationale for the legislative changes as set out in the Policy Memorandum accompanying the Bill.

Q2. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

2. We do not support the proposed 3-year lead-in period for abolishing the RTB. It means that tenants would be able to exercise their RTB throughout that period under the myriad entitlement/discount schemes that currently exist. In responding to the Government’s pre-legislative consultation in 2012, GWSF made the case for a shorter 1-year lead-in period. This would give fair notice of the end of the RTB while minimising further reductions in housing stock.

3. The introduction of the Bedroom Tax in 2013 has underlined the need to abolish the RTB at the earliest opportunity. Social landlords and tenants affected by the Bedroom Tax need every support in retaining one- and two-bedroom properties. We are also concerned that companies canvassing tenants to buy their homes are likely to exploit a longer lead-in period to abolition.

4. The Policy Memorandum for the Bill states that abolishing the right to buy could be challenged under the European Convention of Human Rights if tenants are not afforded “reasonable opportunity” to exercise existing RTB entitlements. However, it does not explain why a 3-year notice period is preferable to a shorter notice period. The overwhelming majority of responses to the Government’s 2012 RTB consultation favoured a notice period of 2 years or less. The rationale for the Government’s 3-year proposal is therefore a key area for scrutiny.

5. The Policy Memorandum also states that abolishing the RTB would keep 15,500 additional houses available for social renting over a 10-year period. We suggest the Committee should seek information about how those estimates would change if a shorter notice period of 1 year or 2 years were adopted.

6. If a 3-year notice period is retained, this will undoubtedly lead to calls for exclusions, exemptions and restrictions at Stage 2 of the Bill, for example in relation to:

- Abolishing the RTB immediately or on a shorter timescale for smaller properties (as a result of the Bedroom Tax) and in pressured areas;
- Regulating the activities of companies that promote the RTB to tenants.

7. The Bill does not make any proposals for simplifying the administration of RTB during the 3-year notice period. RTB administration is complex and time-consuming for social landlords, and our members have raised the question about whether they would still be required to give notice to new tenants about RTB entitlements during the lead-in period to abolition. This could be avoided by ensuring that RTB entitlements are safeguarded only for those tenants with an existing RTB at the date on which the Bill receives Stage 1 approval (i.e. RTB would not apply at all to tenancies created after that date).

Part 2: Social Housing

Q4. In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

8. The primary purpose of community controlled housing associations and co-operatives is to respond to housing needs in their local neighbourhoods and communities. Accordingly, we welcome the principles of greater local flexibility that underpin this part of the Bill and many of the detailed provisions. We have a number of comments on the specific provisions in the Bill, set out in the paragraphs below.

9. Section 3 of the Bill defines unmet housing needs as needs that are “not capable of being met by housing options which are available”. We do not think the meaning of this is clear. We also have some concerns that the proposed definition could allow some landlords to screen out certain types of applicants (e.g. working households) on the basis that their needs might be met in the private rented sector, even if they have a positive preference for more secure and more affordable housing from a social landlord and in some areas social housing is the predominant tenure. GWSF members wish to frame their allocations policies in a way that balances the wider range of needs within their communities – including those of working households - and achieving sustainable tenancies. We would not wish the Bill to undermine such approaches.

10. The proposals on consulting on allocations policy priorities and publishing consultation results (section 4 of the Bill) match existing good practice. Our members will wish the non-prescriptive approach proposed in the Bill to be respected by the Scottish Housing Regulator.

11. The new requirement (section 4 of the Bill) for landlords to have regard to local housing strategies is important, particularly in relation to partnership working with local authorities on ensuring access to suitable housing for homeless people. Equally, our members will want local authorities to respect their role in meeting housing needs in their local neighbourhoods, and the involvement of tenants and housing applicants in endorsing local allocations priorities.

12. It is essential that community controlled housing associations should be able to set priorities that are relevant to their own neighbourhoods, as well as taking account of local housing strategies which apply across wider local authority areas. In that regard, we seek assurance that the terms of the Bill will not enable local authorities to impose blanket requirements on RSLs through local housing strategies, for example fixed quotas for lets to homeless households or other types of housing applicants.

13. The proposed additional flexibility to consider applicants’ ages when letting housing (section 5 of the Bill) is very welcome. The new provision would help social landlords to make greater use of sensitive lettings and to promote greater tenancy sustainability, for example in letting certain properties to older housing applicants.

14. The Bill would reverse the current prohibition on taking ownership of property into account (section 6 of the Bill). The proposals in the Bill are permissive rather than compulsory. This will help landlords to strike a balance between excluding applicants who quite simply don’t need social housing, without resorting to blanket exclusions of people who may own property but who may also still have a legitimate need for social housing. We would welcome greater clarity about the meaning of heritable property (e.g. does it include property owned outside the UK?) and of the term “a person who normally resides with the applicant” (we are assuming that this does not extend to people using “care of” addresses).

15. The provisions on suspending housing applications (section 7), and those on the use of short Scottish Secure Tenancies build on existing practice relating to letting suspensions. GWSF agrees that landlords should have additional flexibility in these areas, to support their efforts to address antisocial behaviour.

16. In relation to section 7 of the Bill, some key aspects of the proposed new arrangements are not fully clear. For example:

- The Bill does not address basic questions such as how long ago antisocial behaviour occurred, or how long suspensions can last for. An early indication of intentions on these matters would be helpful for social landlords.

- It is not clear whether restrictions as a result of past antisocial behaviour would apply equally to households referred under homelessness legislation, as to all other types of housing applicants. We suggest that there should be a level playing field, i.e. similar criteria relating to past antisocial behaviour should apply in local authority decisions about whether a household is intentionally homeless and therefore eligible to be provided with settled accommodation.

- There is no obvious rationale for proposing that abandonment or damage to property must relate only to tenancies in Scotland, particularly when the Bill proposes that provisions on recovery of possession of a tenancy will apply to previous tenancies anywhere in the UK.

- The provisions in the Bill about “using a house for immoral or illegal purposes” should in our view be limited to illegal purposes, since that sets an objective test. A test of “immoral purposes” would be subjective (and somewhat outdated).

17. The Bill does not propose any changes regarding the maintenance of housing lists. Many GWSF members are concerned about the substantial costs associated with maintaining housing lists, where they have large numbers of applicants on their lists who have very limited prospects of ever being rehoused. In our view, the Bill should introduce new flexibilities for landlords to set needs thresholds that they can apply when maintaining housing lists (i.e. they are able to exclude from subsequent reviews housing applicants with no realistic prospects of ever being rehoused, which each landlord would determine itself by setting a cut-off point).

Q5. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

18. GWSF supports the principle that social landlords should have greater flexibility to use short SSTs in cases involving antisocial behaviour. However, the proposals in the Bill must be set within a realistic understanding of the respective responsibilities of social landlords, the Police and other agencies in addressing different types of antisocial behaviour. In scrutinising the Bill, Parliament should have realistic expectations about the likely impact of the changes proposed.

19. The Bill is not sufficiently clear about some of the issues that may arise in implementing the proposals relating to short Scottish secure tenancies. While these are perhaps matters for Stage 2 of the Bill, we highlight the following as examples of the types of issues that need to be addressed:

- Whether the criteria for use of short SSTs as set out in the Bill would apply equally to lets made directly by an RSL and to homeless households referred under section 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001;
- What action landlords can take during the period of a short SST, if problems occur;
- How the potentially greater requirement for housing support services could be met (given that the provision of such support is often reliant on external funding and/or provision of support services by other agencies);
- Ensuring greater clarity about who is responsible for providing tenancy support and what recourse social landlords have if tenants do not engage with the support provided;
- How many times conversion to a short SST can occur;
- How repossession proceedings would operate.

Q6. Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government's objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

20. The Bill proposes new measures that would enhance the rights of tenants who have short SSTs. These parts of the Bill have been developed in direct response to recent court judgements. Landlords will have a particular interest in the proposal that possession proceedings for short SSTs will be subject to a legal right to request a review, and in the detailed proposals (still to be brought forward) about the procedure for such reviews.

21. The Bill proposes a number of measures relating to assignation, sublet and joint tenancy arrangements, and succession to a Scottish Secure Tenancy. We support these measures provided that landlords remain able to exercise flexibility in individual cases. For example, while the Bill would require a 12-month qualifying period before a person can qualify for succession, it is important that landlords are able to respond sympathetically to circumstances such as the death of a tenant in deciding whether that requirement should always be applied.
Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Introductory comments

22. The Bill proposes a number of improvements relating to the private rented sector (PRS). While the proposed changes impact primarily on local authorities, they are also of significant interest to housing associations because of the difficulties poor private landlord practice creates within mixed tenure neighbourhoods.

23. Overall, the PRS proposals in the Housing Bill are very much around the margins and the Bill will not address more fundamental issues, such as:

- The need for appropriate and legally-enforceable standards of management in the PRS;
- The need for an overall framework of standards, enforcement levers and financial resources to address existing property disrepair and improve housing quality and energy efficiency in the PRS;
- The need for more proactive regulation of the PRS and the severe resource pressures many local authorities are under in seeking to enforce standards;
- The overwhelming disparity between regulation and standards for social housing and those for the PRS.

24. In our view, the scope of the Bill is disappointingly narrow:

- Scottish Government policy is promoting an expanded role for the PRS in meeting housing needs in Scotland, despite poor housing quality and management standards in parts of the PRS (particularly at the lower end of the market). There has been a rapid and uncontrolled increase in housing benefit subsidies for the PRS in Scotland (estimated by SFHA to be a 153% increase for the PRS in the last decade, compared with a 21% increase for social landlords).

- The physical quality and energy efficiency of housing in Scotland are substantially better in the social housing sector than the private sector. Improvements in the social sector have been driven by detailed standards set by the Scottish Government and enforced through scrutiny by the Scottish Housing Regulator. By contrast, house conditions and energy efficiency standards in the PRS are substantially poorer. Private landlords must only comply with a basic Repairing Standard (enforced only in response to tenant complaints) and minimum statutory standards on property disrepair (enforced on a much more limited basis than would be desirable, because of limited local authority financial resources relative to the levels of housing disrepair that exist).

1 Housing Benefit Spending: Busting the Myths, Scottish Federation of Housing Associations (October 2012)
The Scottish Housing Regulator has extensive statutory powers to enforce management and property standards in the social sector. Standards in the PRS are enforced by local authorities which have far more limited regulatory powers and operate under severe financial pressures.

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

25. We support the proposals in the Bill to consolidate responsibility for private rented sector civil cases in a new tribunal. However, the impact and effectiveness of these changes is subject to the bigger question of how tenancy rights in the private rented sector can be improved. This is not addressed in the Bill and the Scottish Government has instead stated a more generalised intention to "consult with all stakeholders to examine the suitability and effectiveness of the current private rented sector tenancy regime, considering legislative change where required."2

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities' discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

26. Any measures to improve local authorities’ ability to tackle poor conditions and standards in the PRS are to be welcomed. However, the scope of the Bill means that change will be piecemeal rather than transformational.

27. The Bill proposes minor administrative changes to the private landlord registration system, by introducing statutory timescales for completing consideration of applications for registration. Otherwise, the Bill does not do anything to strengthen the statutory scope or “teeth” of the private landlord registration system.

28. The proposed measures on third party applications relating to the Repairing Standard recognise that tenants – especially vulnerable tenants, or people housed by unscrupulous private landlords - may be reluctant or unable to complain about a landlord’s failure to carry out repairs. However, the Bill does not address the substantive question of the Repairing Standard itself. The present Repairing Standard is extremely basic and the means for enforcing it are reactive.

29. The Policy Memorandum for the Bill states that local authorities “would also be able to make an application based on evidence from others with an interest in ensuring that minimum standards of property condition are maintained (for example neighbours, owners of property in communal buildings, or fire and rescue services)”. This is consistent with what is already happening in Glasgow, where the City Council is seeking to work in partnership with local housing associations to tackle problems created by poor private landlords. However, the Bill does not create any obligations that would encourage all local authorities to adopt such proactive approaches. This creates a weakness in cases where local authorities may be less willing (or less able, due to resource pressures) to act on problems reported by housing associations, as owners of neighbouring properties or as property factors.

30. The Policy Memorandum suggests some different attitudes on the part of local authorities. Glasgow City Council is said to be particularly keen to have statutory third party reporting powers, to help address poor private housing conditions and poor management standards for tenants. The views of other local authorities appear to be more equivocal, with the Government emphasising in the Policy Memorandum that the third party reporting provision in the Bill “does not place any new mandatory duties on local authorities. The discretionary power means that decisions on whether to make an application, or defend any subsequent appeal against a decision of a private rented housing committee, can take into account existing budgets and local priorities”. This reduces confidence in what practical impact the Bill may have unless local authorities (as in the case of Glasgow) decide to make tackling poor management or standards in the private rented sector a priority.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

31. The principle of powers to promote area-based approaches is welcome although it is difficult to comment on the proposals for Enhanced Enforcement Areas until more substantive information is available. While the proposal may have been conceived with particular areas such as Govanhill in Glasgow in mind, we are interested to learn more about what wider application such approaches could have and how they could support partnership working in areas where poor private housing is present on a significant scale.

32. However, this brings us back to the question of resources. As with all other aspects of private rented sector regulation, enhanced area-based statutory powers will only be effective if there are adequate resources available to support the delivery of local enforcement strategies. The risk of displacement effects must also be managed effectively. Intensive action to stamp out the worst effects of private landlordism in areas with a high concentration of problems is important, but the end result should not be that the same private landlords simply move their operations to other neighbourhoods.
Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents' practice?

33. Letting agents are not regulated at all at present and poor practice by some agents is a major contributor to the serious problems the private rented sector is creating in some communities. We therefore support the principle of a statutory registration scheme and a code of conduct with statutory force.

34. The Bill does not include any proposals to strengthen the private landlord registration scheme or how private landlords themselves are regulated. This will limit the effectiveness of the measures proposed on letting agents. Much will also depend on the terms of the proposed Code of Practice for letting agents, to be developed separately from the Bill. It is important that the Scottish Government acts on the available evidence about poor practice by some letting agents and the resulting negative impact on housing and environmental conditions in local communities.

35. As in the case of property factors, it appears that the registration of letting agents would be undertaken by the Scottish Government rather than by local authorities. The Policy Memorandum suggests that some local authorities do not wish to be responsible for the registration scheme. In our view, letting agent and property factoring registration schemes administered by local authorities would provide a much better means for effective enforcement.

36. The Bill makes no provision for third parties to report concerns about letting agents' activities. The Bill provides for this in relation to enforcement of the Repairing Standard. It seems illogical that there should not be equivalent arrangements in relation to concerns about letting agents' activities. The Bill suggests that only private landlords and tenants would be able to refer concerns about a letting agent to the tribunal and there appears to be no role for local authorities to do the same.

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

38. The Bill makes relatively minor administrative provisions. Glasgow City Council has already used missing shares funding and maintenance plans on a targeted basis, so we are unsure what substantive changes the Bill would actually introduce. The bigger issue for local authorities will be one of financial capacity to use their powers on the scale that is
39. The Policy Memorandum for the Bill suggests that concerns held by some local authorities have been a major factor in the Government’s reluctance to propose more significant changes. This raises important issues for further scrutiny by the Committee, whether as part of its consideration of the Bill or more generally. There are substantial, unresolved political and financial obstacles to tackling disrepair and improving standards in private housing in Scotland. Despite the measures proposed in the Housing Bill, the bottom line is that:

- No legislative solutions are being proposed to address poor private property condition to a significant degree;
- Legislation, policy and regulation are all being used to drive energy efficiency improvements in the social rented sector (where such standards are already higher). There is no such leverage for the private rented and owner-occupied sectors, aside from funding incentives to owners and private landlords to improve their properties on a voluntary basis.

40. The Government’s Sustainable Housing Strategy published earlier in 2013 states that it will work with stakeholders to develop options for setting minimum energy efficiency standards in private sector housing, ahead of public consultation on draft regulations in 2015. This suggests we are still a long way away from having the robust framework of standards, enforcement and financial resources that will be necessary to make the necessary improvements in the energy efficiency of private housing, particularly those that are hard to treat.

Part 7: Miscellaneous

Q16. Do you have any comments relation to the range of miscellaneous housing provisions set out in this part of the Bill?

41. GWSF’s main interest relates to the proposed changes to the powers of the Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR), as described in section 79 of the Bill. We are content with the general principle behind the section 79 proposals which is to ensure that SHR can respond effectively to exceptional circumstances where an RSL may be in serious financial jeopardy.

42. The section 79 proposals should be seen as a backstop for worst-case scenarios. In practice, it is far more important to prevent the proposed powers having to be exercised at all. A key issue is how SHR uses its existing statutory powers to ensure early detection and an effective response to serious financial problems. SHR has spoken publicly on a number of occasions (including in its recent evidence to the ICI Committee in December 2013) about its role in “managing three RSLs out of near insolvency” during 2012. In our view, the financial crises that occurred in these cases were not the product of SHR lacking appropriate statutory powers:

- SHR had long-standing and serious concerns in each case (for one of the three RSLs, SHR was closely involved from 2008 onwards);
- SHR made limited use of its formal statutory intervention powers and relied instead on non-statutory methods of engagement;
- For whatever reason, regulatory intervention failed to avert or provide early warning of the financial problems that crystallised in 2012.

43. On the specific measures now proposed in section 79 of the Bill:

- It is reasonable that SHR should have powers to act decisively in cases where an RSL is in serious financial jeopardy and this may lead to insolvency, as proposed in section 79 (a) of the Bill
- We do not support section 79 (b) of the Bill. This would repeal the Regulator’s general obligation to base a directed transfer of an RSL’s assets on an independent valuation. Directed transfers are extremely unusual (the last one occurred more than 10 years ago) and we do not see the purpose of removing the general requirement for independent valuations.
- Instead, it would be more appropriate to retain as the norm the current requirement for independent valuations set out in section 67 (6) of the Housing (Scotland) 2010, and to amend section 67 (6) so that the obligation to obtain an independent valuation can be set aside in the highly exceptional circumstances where emergency action is needed. In other words, the obligation to obtain an independent valuation would remain, but would be set aside where the four specific conditions relating to financial jeopardy narrated in section 79 of the Bill are met.
- There should be transparency and accountability for exceptional regulatory action that results in a directed transfer of an RSL’s assets, including SHR’s own role in matters. This could be achieved by requiring SHR to publish information about inquiries that result in a direction to transfer an RSL’s assets.

44. While supporting the general principle underpinning section 79(a), we are unsure what practical impact the proposed legislative changes will have. None of the 3 recent cases involving RSLs in financial jeopardy involved a transfer of assets directed by SHR. Instead, the mechanism used in these cases was for the RSLs in financial difficulty to join a group structure. The arrangements proposed in section 79 would not have applied, since none of the cases involved a directed transfer of assets.

Other Issues

Q17. Are there any other comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives or specific provisions?

45. The proposed changes set out in section 79 of the Bill are designed to make changes to the housing regulation framework in response to issues that were not foreseen when the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 was enacted.

46. GWSF believes that the same principle should be applied to other aspects of housing regulation. In this regard, we have identified three key areas for legislative change, described below. While we have wider concerns about other aspects of housing regulation, we believe that these could be addressed by changes to current regulatory practice by SHR within the existing scope of the 2010 Act and by enhanced parliamentary scrutiny of how the 2010 Act housing regulation framework is operating in practice.

 Tenant consent for RSL restructuring

47. GWSF has recently published a detailed analysis of RSL group structure activity in Scotland. We have made our briefing report available to members of the Committee in light of the Committee’s role in scrutinising housing and regulation issues and its previous interest in the restructuring taking place within the Scottish housing association sector.

48. Our briefing report makes a number of proposals for policy and regulatory changes that can be introduced within existing legislation, to respond to the rapid growth of RSL group structure activity in Scotland. Legislative change is also needed, to provide for tenant consultation and ballots, where an RSL is seeking to join a group structure as the subsidiary of another RSL. The current Bill provides an opportunity to address this, to ensure proper protection for the interests of tenants.

49. The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 requires tenant consultation and ballots to take place where RSLs decide to restructure through mergers or transfers of engagements that result in a change of landlord. The 2010 Act does not make equivalent provision for tenant consultation and ballots where an RSL intends to join a group structure. This is now a serious omission and there is a strong case for making statutory changes that would bring group structures within the statutory definition of restructuring set out in the 2010 Act, with a resulting extension of tenant ballot provisions.

50. The main reasons in support of statutory changes relating to RSL group structures are as follows:

- Restructuring via group structures is happening on a substantial scale in the Scottish RSL sector and has a significant impact on the future interests of many thousands of tenants and service users (almost 90,000 tenants are now housed by an RSL that is part of a group structure comprising two or more RSLs). It is unacceptable that tenants have no legal rights to be consulted or to give their consent to such significant changes, as would be the case if a restructuring proposal resulted in a change of landlord.

- When an RSL joins a group structure, it relinquishes sovereignty and ultimate control over its affairs to a third party in return for whatever benefits the group structure arrangement is intended to provide. This has long-term consequences for tenants, because a parent RSL will have direct influence (and potentially, ultimate control) over a such matters as a subsidiary RSL’s business plan, rent policy, housing investment policy, funding costs and service delivery structures and locations.

- An RSL seeking to join a group structure needs only to obtain the agreement of its shareholding members, not its tenants and rent-payers. This produces a substantial democratic deficit. For example, the decision to create The Wheatley Group and for Glasgow Housing Association to become a subsidiary of Wheatley was made by GHA’s board (under GHA’s constitution, its board are the only shareholding members). More than 40,000 GHA tenants had no say in the decision, nor will Wheatley’s Board be directly accountable to GHA tenants for its current plans to expand the Group’s activities, even though the Group’s main assets are tenants’ homes. While the democratic deficit is particularly pronounced in the case of The Wheatley Group, the same deficit applies in all other cases – there is no formal requirement for tenant consent.

- Very large RSLs, including The Wheatley Group and a number of UK-based RSLs, are actively pursuing business growth strategies which involve absorbing smaller Scottish RSLs into their group structures. The long-established and distinctively Scottish policy of promoting greater localism in housing service delivery and accountability now appears to be in reverse, more as a result of a vacuum in housing policy thinking rather than any explicit desire on the part of government to promote a policy of big being better. Many Scottish housing associations are increasingly concerned that they are becoming sitting targets for takeovers by very large RSLs and that the current statutory and regulatory framework offers no safeguards against this happening. In making statutory provision for tenant consent to mergers and transfers of engagements during the passage of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010, the Minister for Housing and Communities told Parliament that “...Such a safeguard is important not only for tenants but for landlords as the need to secure tenant support will make it much harder for another landlord to contemplate a hostile takeover bid. (Col 3491)”.

3 SPICE Briefing: Housing (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (October 2010)
51. We have set out at Appendix 1 details of the current statutory provisions for RSL restructuring and their limitations. We suggest that the current Housing (Scotland) Bill should make provision for the protection of tenants’ interests and that this could be achieved by:

- Amending Parts 8 and 10 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010, to expand the statutory definition of restructuring to include the formation or joining of a group structure involving more than one RSL;

- Extending the tenant authorisation provisions in Part 10 of the 2010 Act (including the provisions for tenant ballots) to all restructuring cases falling within the expanded definition, regardless of whether the restructuring proposal would result in a change of landlord.

52. If adopted, our proposal for tenant ballots would involve the same exceptions as already apply to other types of RSL restructuring. For example, tenant ballots are not required in cases where the Scottish Housing Regulator directs an RSL to transfer its assets following a statutory inquiry, and section 79 of the Bill proposes that tenant consultation requirements would be waived in directed transfers where an RSL is at risk of imminent insolvency. These are highly exceptional circumstances and it is appropriate that the same arrangements should be applied in all cases. Therefore, we suggest that tenant consultation and ballots should be the norm for all types of restructuring including group structure proposals, but would not be required where an RSL was potentially insolvent and a statutory inquiry by SHR resulted in emergency action to avert the potential insolvency.

Regulatory interventions and the need for statutory mechanisms for reviews and appeals

53. The 2010 Act requires SHR to publish, following consultation, statutory codes of practice on its powers to carry out inquiries and to seek information (section 51 of the 2010 Act) and to exercise statutory intervention powers (section 54 of the 2010 Act).

54. These aspects of the current legislation are not operating satisfactorily:

- SHR has not published the codes of regulatory practice referred to in the 2010 Act, beyond high level information contained in its April 2012 Regulatory Framework.

- A number of housing associations have expressed strong concerns to representative bodies about the scope and proportionality of regulatory interventions in their organisations. GWSF offers no view on the merits of individual cases, but we are concerned that there is such a high level of dissatisfaction with SHR’s activities and approach. The root cause in our view is a lack of transparency and of sufficiently clear ground rules for the kind of intervention approach typically being used by SHR.
• That intervention approach involves “behind the scenes”, non statutory methods rather than the more transparent and accountable processes set out in the 2010 Act (e.g. published inquiry reports for named organisations and use of the formal statutory intervention powers described in Part 5 of the 2010 Act). To date, SHR has not made any use of those formal intervention powers and it has published only one inquiry report for a named RSL.

• SHR’s Regulatory Framework provides for a review process in the case of published inspection reports, but there are no review processes for other types of regulatory action. Moreover, there is no appeals process available to RSLs who believe that regulatory actions are disproportionate or inappropriate.

55. We believe that these issues need to be addressed in the current Housing Bill. We propose that the Bill should:

• Establish a requirement for SHR to publish, following consultation, a consolidated code of regulatory practice that addresses all of its methods for intervening in the affairs of social landlords (i.e. including interventions that are not publicly reported and those that do not involve the use of statutory intervention powers);

• Provide a statutory right for social landlords to request a review by the SHR Board of regulatory decisions or actions;

• Establish a formal external appeals process, which allows social landlords to challenge SHR’s regulatory decisions or actions.

56. In putting forward these proposals, it is not our intention to constrain SHR’s ability to take effective regulatory action. The introduction of a review process would enhance SHR’s ability to perform its functions in a fair and transparent manner and would improve confidence in the regulatory system. That confidence is being put at risk by the way in which the regulatory system currently operates, i.e. overwhelming reliance on “offline” non statutory interventions, limited public reporting, and no opportunities for social landlords to question or challenge regulatory action that is often perceived – rightly or wrongly - to be inappropriate, disproportionate or excessive.

57. In the absence of an appeals system, the only mechanism currently available to RSLs who have serious concerns about regulatory action is to seek judicial review. This is not in our view in the interests of SHR, social landlords or tenants.

58. Instead, we suggest that the Housing Bill should make provision for an external appeals process, independent of SHR. This would be consistent with statutory arrangements for the charity sector. The Charities and Trustee Investment (Scotland) Act 2005 makes statutory provision for both reviews of decisions made by the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator (OSCR) and for independent consideration of appeals against OSCR decisions by a Scottish Charities Appeal Panel. Members of the Panel are appointed by Scottish Ministers and are independent of OSCR.

Consultation and Involvement Requirements

59. The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 places SHR under an obligation to consult with social landlords and their representative bodies on a range of specific matters. These arrangements are not operating effectively at present in terms of consultation on regulatory guidance, discussion of the operation of the overall regulatory framework, or how SHR and the sector can work together more effectively to promote good practice for the benefit of RSLs and their tenants.

60. The prospects for achieving more constructive and productive relationships between SHR and the housing sector would in our view be enhanced by making amendments to section 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010. This requires SHR to consult and involve representative bodies in discussions about the performance of its functions. We suggest that section 5 of the 2010 Act should be amended, to add bodies representing social landlords to the list of representative bodies that SHR is required to consult and involve. This would encourage a more proactive approach by SHR to working with the housing association sector and would provide a platform for greater partnership working and co-operation on how RSLs can improve standards and meet regulatory expectations.

Q18. Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

61. As noted in the recent SPICe briefing on the Bill, GWSF and SFHA both argued during the pre-legislative consultation process for clearer, more permissive provisions on how social landlords can incorporate local connection provisions in their allocations policies. This is not reflected in the Bill as introduced and is in our view a significant gap. While Scottish Ministers have in the past made helpful statements about the use of local connection provisions, this does not have any statutory expression beyond the “negative” provisions in existing legislation\(^4\). These only cover circumstances where residence in a landlord’s area of operation cannot be taken into account. Clearer, enabling statutory provisions on local connection would be extremely helpful.

Appendix 1
Current Legislation and Regulatory Guidance relating to RSL Restructuring

Part 8 of the 2010 Act, sections 96 to 104 sets out statutory requirements for regulatory consents where an RSL is seeking to restructure:

- “Restructure” in this context includes transfers of engagements, amalgamations and voluntary winding up/dissolution.
- Section 96(3) says SHR shall not give consent to restructuring proposals “… unless satisfied that (the RSL) has consulted its tenants about the matter for which consent is needed”.
- Section 97 confirms that transfers of engagements, amalgamations etc require the RSL seeking to restructure to pass a special resolution (in practice, an affirmative vote by its shareholding members) and to have this approved by SHR and registered by the Financial Conduct Authority.
- The RSL seeking to restructure needs to show it has consulted with tenants in order to obtain SHR consent. If a restructuring proposal would result in a change of landlord, Part 10 of the 2010 Act applies (“Special procedure for disposals and restructuring resulting in change of landlord”)

The main features of the special procedure set out in Part 10 of the 2010 Act are that:

- There is a statutory requirement for enhanced tenant consultation, with a range of specific requirements set out in section 115 of the Act (e.g. issue of a formal notice by the RSL, provision of information about the consequences of the change proposed, opportunities for tenants to make representations about the changes proposed).
- SHR’s consent to the disposal is subject to “tenant authorisation”. Tenant authorisation (i.e. consent) may take the form of a tenant ballot (section 118 of the Act) or the written agreement of the tenants affected (section 119).

Part 8 Sections 96 to 104 of the 2010 Act and the special procedure for tenant authorisation set out in Part 10 of the Act do not apply to circumstances where an RSL is seeking SHR approval to join a group structure as the subsidiary of another RSL.

Instead:

- Part 8, section 93 of the 2010 Act requires only that SHR should give its consent to material changes to an RSL’s constitution (becoming a subsidiary of another RSL would require this).
There are no provisions in the 2010 Act that require tenant consent if an RSL is seeking to become the subsidiary of another RSL.

2. Regulatory Policy and Procedures

Regulatory policy and procedures about RSL restructuring proposals are set out in the following documents published by SHR:

- SHR Regulatory Framework: Consent to constitutional and organisational change and disposals (March 2012)
- SHR Regulatory Guidance: Organisational Changes (April 2012)
- SHR Regulatory Guidance: Requirements for Tenant Ballot or Written Authorisation

Where a change of landlord would be involved, the Regulatory Framework states that a tenant ballot will normally be required, unless a landlord makes a convincing case for why another form of written consent by tenants should be sought.

The separate SHR guidance on organisational change proposals and group structure proposals replicate the 2010 Act in applying different thresholds for tenants’ rights and tenant consent, depending on whether restructuring proposals will result in a change of landlord.

If there is no change of landlord, SHR’s guidance on Group Structures and Constitutional Partnerships confirms that there will be a lower threshold in terms of tenant information and consent:

“If the proposal does not involve a change of landlord we will expect tenants to be consulted about the proposal. We will wish to see a description of action taken to inform and consult tenants and any Registered Tenants Organisations about the proposals, and consultation outcomes. We may require the RSL to ensure tenants have access to independent advice funded by the RSL. RSLs should have a clear communications/ consultation strategy that allows sufficient time for meaningful tenant consultation on the RSL’s proposals”. GWSF Briefing: Housing Regulation in Scotland

February 2014
1. Introduction

1.1 The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 established new arrangements for regulating registered social landlords and local authority housing and homelessness services, and a new Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR) which took up its role in April 2012.

1.2 SHR is accountable to the Scottish Parliament and has recently given evidence to the parliamentary Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee about its activities, based on its Annual Report for 2012/13.¹

1.3 Our Briefing identifies a number of areas where GWSF is concerned about how the regulation framework is operating. Our starting-point is that housing regulation serves an important purpose and that effective regulatory intervention is essential in individual cases where there may be a serious and material risk to tenants' interests or to an RSL’s assets. However, we do not think the current system of housing regulation is fully meeting the requirements for proportionality, transparency and accountability set out in the 2010 Act. We also wish to see much better dialogue between SHR and the housing association sector about how the regulatory system is operating, the impact it is having on RSLs, and how SHR and the sector can work together to improve matters.

1.4 We have sent a copy of our Briefing to the Scottish Housing Regulator and to members of the Scottish Parliament’s Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, the parliamentary committee to which SHR is accountable. We have also sent our Briefing to Scottish Ministers and MSPs, so that they can consider our proposals for improving the statutory framework for housing regulation through the current Housing (Scotland) Bill.

How the regulatory system is working in practice

2. SHR’s purpose and the focus of its activities

2.1 SHR’s statutory purpose is to protect the interests of tenants and those seeking to use social landlords’ services. The regulatory approach SHR has developed does not always provide a direct line of sight to that objective or to the specific policy intentions stated by the Scottish Government when it introduced the 2010 Act to the Scottish Parliament²:

“In bringing forward provisions to modernise regulation, the Scottish Government has two aims: to place current and future tenants, homeless people and other service users at the heart of the new regime; and, consistent with its wider approach to scrutiny reform, to create a proportionate and risk based regime that encourages and supports social landlords to improve their performance.”

2.2 In practice, SHR’s regulatory approach for RSLs has focused much less on the outcomes they deliver for their tenants and service users than on governance and organisational/financial management issues. GWSF’s analysis of RSL Regulation Plans³ for 2013/14 shows that:

¹ Meeting of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, 4 December 2014
² Housing (Scotland) Bill 2010, Policy Memorandum
³ Regulation Plans are published for RSLs with which SHR intends to have increased levels of engagement, based on its assessment of risks. 62 Regulation Plans proposing medium or high levels of SHR engagement have been published for 2013/14 (covering around 40% of RSLs).
• 50% of SHR’s reasons for engagement with RSLs relate to financial or risk management issues;
• 33% of reasons for engagement relate to RSL governance and organisational management issues;
• Only 13% of reasons for engagement are directly related to services to tenants and others.

2.3 SHR’s regulatory focus for local authority landlords is quite different. Audit Scotland’s 2013/14 Assurance and Improvement Plans show that SHR’s planned engagement with local authority landlords relates overwhelmingly to two issues, both with a direct impact on tenants and those seeking to use services:

- The performance of homelessness services (60% of the reasons for SHR engagement with local authorities stated in the published Plans);
- Performance in meeting the Scottish Housing Quality Standard by 2015 (26% of the reasons for SHR engagement stated in the published Plans).

2.4 Scrutiny of RSLs’ governance and financial performance greatly exceeds scrutiny of these matters in other sectors and is disproportionate to the scale and organisational resources of many RSLs. SHR’s approach does not appear to be justified in terms of the primary purpose of scrutiny, which the 2007 Crerar Report described as being “to provide an independent assurance that public money is being used properly and that services are well managed, safe and fit for purpose”. In the same report, Crerar set out the need for scrutiny activity to have a clear public focus: “The needs and priorities of service users and the public must be the prime consideration in all external scrutiny. The public is the ultimate beneficiary of external scrutiny”.

2.5 SHR has suggested that its scrutiny of RSLs’ governance and financial management is needed to promote good service quality and outcomes, but there is little evidence to suggest that service failures by RSLs are widespread or significant:

- SHR recently reported to Parliament that it carried out 22 performance inquiries in 2012/13 on service quality or performance issues in RSLs and local authorities. SHR told Parliament that “Nothing has come out of those inquiries has been so significant that we have had to consider using our statutory powers.”. To date, SHR has not published a single inquiry report relating to service performance in individual RSLs.
- Our analysis of SHR’s Regulation Plans for 2013/14 indicates that levels of regulatory engagement on service quality issues are relatively low for RSLs. This is illustrated in the following table:

4 Assurance and Improvement Plans are published by Audit Scotland and incorporate planned engagement by other scrutiny bodies, including SHR. Any proposed engagement or scrutiny relating to governance or financial management issues is led by Audit Scotland.

6 SHR evidence to meeting of Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, 4 December 2013
2.6 The statutory system for reporting on the Scottish Social Housing Charter is due to take full effect during 2014. We suggest that this should trigger a change in SHR’s regulatory focus, so that its activities and use of resources are better aligned with the original policy intention of placing tenant interests at the heart of the housing regulation system.

3. SHR analysis and reporting of RSL governance

3.1 There is widespread concern among housing associations that SHR’s recent methods of reporting on RSL governance are damaging the reputation of the sector.

3.2 SHR published five “Governance Matters” reports during 2013. These set out (in the form of anonymised case studies) reported governance failures in a number of individual RSLs, along with action points that SHR suggests are relevant to all RSLs. These reports have created an unjustified impression of widespread, systemic weaknesses in the governance of RSLs in Scotland:

- In SHR’s recent evidence to Parliament, a member of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee asked SHR whether the Governance Matters publications “… suggest that there is a weakness in RSLs as far as governance is concerned that must be addressed”. SHR agreed with that statement, telling the Committee “… it would be fair to say that there is”.

- GWSF members have told us recently that funders are now citing concerns flowing from the Governance Matters reports in discussions about future funding for their organisations. The availability and terms of funding are already highly challenging. It is essential that SHR does not compound these difficulties by making generalised statements that are rooted in opinion rather than hard evidence or more transparent public reporting.

3.3 The Governance Matters reports provide evidence of governance problems in specific organisations in specific circumstances. But the impression that they may be illustrative of widespread, systemic weaknesses throughout the sector must be challenged:

- Some of the material in the case studies reported on date back to the early 2000s, but this is not clear from the reports.
- The reports set out SHR’s perspective, with little or no opportunity for the organisations reported on to comment on factual accuracy or interpretation. In that respect they differ substantially from public reporting for named organisations, where a scrutiny body would be accountable for ensuring factual accuracy and for meeting the Crerar principle on accountability, that “assessments and findings must be fair and capable of being defended”.
- SHR’s reliance on anonymised reporting and limited public reporting for named organisations mean that there is a gap in accountability and transparency. The Governance Matters series appears to be a substitute for public reporting on named organisations, rather than something that complements it. SHR published only one governance inquiry report for a named RSL in 2012 and it published no such reports in 2013. Moreover, SHR’s Regulation Plans for 2013/14 indicate that it will engage with 12 RSLs (7% of all RSLs in Scotland) on specific governance concerns. This does not support the suggestion that serious governance weaknesses are commonplace.

3.4 Drawing on the Governance Matters case studies, SHR has published a series of action points for all RSLs to consider. There are 98 such action points to date, in addition to all of the other guidance SHR publishes on RSL governance, financial management and notifiable events. While SHR intends the action points to be helpful, their practical value is limited by their number and in some cases by their content. We suggest that joint working by SHR with housing associations and representative bodies would be beneficial, as a way of co-producing practical tools that will help RSLs of different types and sizes to address any general issues SHR is seeking to raise through the Governance Matters reports and action points.

4. Regulatory engagement and interventions

4.1 Regulatory engagement and interventions have been a cause of tension between SHR and some individual RSLs. SHR has expressed concerns in its Governance Matters reports about a perceived lack of co-operation on the part of some RSLs. Equally, some housing associations subject to regulatory engagement and interventions have expressed concerns to us (and to SFHA) about SHR’s approach.

4.2 The main issues housing associations have raised with GWSF have included:

- SHR’s reasons for intervention action;
- The proportionality of action taken;
- SHR’s manner of communicating with RSL governing bodies and senior officers;
- A perceived reluctance on the part of SHR to provide clear, written information about regulatory concerns, requirements and actions;
- The suggestion that regulatory involvement has in some cases slowed down or impaired efforts to tackle problem issues in a decisive manner; and
- The absence of any means to raise and resolve differences of view.
Underpinning all of this is a sense of uncertainty about SHR’s role and powers in cases where it is not using formal statutory inquiry or intervention powers.

4.3 GWSF has no wish (or basis for) second-guessing SHR’s judgements in individual cases. Instead, our concerns relate to:

- The processes in place and how these are managed;
- The apparent absence of clear ground rules for the kind of engagement and intervention approach typically being used by SHR; and
- The absence of review or appeals processes available to RSLs if they believe that regulatory actions are disproportionate or inappropriate.

4.4 The key to understanding these issues lies in the fact that SHR relies heavily on “behind the scenes” methods of engagement and intervention rather than the more transparent and accountable processes set out in the 2010 Act (for example, published inquiry reports for named organisations and the formal statutory intervention powers described in Part 5 of the 2010 Act). Since April 2012, SHR has not made any use of its formal intervention powers and it has published only one inquiry report for a named RSL. Despite this, SHR is intervening to a significant degree in the management of many RSLs, through its support and intervention team.

4.5 If regulatory engagement and intervention continue to rely on non-statutory methods, a more transparent and accountable framework is even more essential. This should describe more clearly triggers for regulatory engagement; how engagement will be managed and communicated; the respective roles and responsibilities of SHR and RSLs; how SHR will report on regulatory engagement; and how housing associations can seek redress if they have concerns about the reasons for non-statutory regulatory engagement or how it is being managed.

4.6 While some RSLs have expressed concerns about regulatory action being too heavy-handed, SHR’s effectiveness in identifying and acting upon serious problems in some RSLs is also an important issue.

4.7 For example, SHR has spoken publicly on a number of occasions about its role in managing three unnamed RSLs out of near insolvency during 2012. Information about these cases has focused on what the RSLs did wrong, but consideration of regulatory action is equally important. SHR had a long-standing involvement with the three RSLs concerned (in one case, for 4 years from 2008 to 2012; in another case, for two years from 2010 to 2012). It would appear that regulatory interventions did not – for whatever reason - avert or provide early warning of the financial crises that subsequently occurred. SHR’s reliance on behind the scenes intervention methods rather than formal statutory powers means that there is little transparency about its regulatory interventions in such cases, and there is a resulting lack of accountability for ensuring that serious problem cases are identified and acted upon in a manner that is timely, effective and decisive.

5. Statutory checks and balances

5.1 The Housing (Scotland) Act sets a number of statutory requirements which we do not think are fully reflected in SHR’s regulatory practice since 2012. These include the following obligations placed on SHR by the 2010 Act:

- To perform its functions in a way that is proportionate, accountable and transparent and which is targeted only where action is needed (section 3 of the 2010 Act);
To perform its functions in a manner that takes account of the different types of social landlord it regulates, based on legal status and governance arrangements, property owned or managed, annual turnover and number of employees (section 4 of the Act);

To consult stakeholder groups, including social landlords and their representative bodies, on codes of practice relating to SHR’s powers to carry out inquiries (section 51 of the 2010 Act) and to exercise statutory intervention powers (section 54 of the Act).

5.2 In relation to the requirement for proportionality described in the 2010 Act, we have already articulated concerns about SHR’s general focus on RSL organisational management issues rather than service quality and outcomes for tenants. Based on comments from our members, there appears to be significant dissatisfaction about the proportionality of SHR’s regulatory engagement with individual RSLs on specific issues. Some Housing Associations have told us they are reluctant to speak publicly about these issues or to raise them directly with SHR. This stems from the fact that SHR does not operate any review or appeals processes, and from the perception that raising concerns with SHR will be interpreted as a failure to engage or co-operate. This is an unhealthy situation.

5.3 SHR’s statutory remit is to regulate individual social landlords rather than the sector as a whole. However, SHR’s published outputs relate overwhelmingly to sector-wide issues rather than to the performance of individual landlords. Since April 2012, SHR has published only three performance reports relating to named individual organisations (two inquiry reports relating to local authority housing services, and one inquiry report relating to governance concerns about an RSL). This diminishes accountability and transparency.

5.4 SHR generally has higher levels of engagement with large RSLs categorised as being of systemic importance. It has not adjusted regulatory requirements or processes for smaller landlords, which we think is the clear intent of sections 3 and 4 of the 2010 Act. This is a significant issue for many GWSF members, because of their scale and organisational resources. The median number of office-based staff employed by RSLs in Scotland is 20, and a quarter of Scottish RSLs employ fewer than 10 office-based staff. Tailoring regulatory requirements for smaller landlords is essential, to prevent scarce organisational resources being diverted or overloaded in small housing associations with lean staffing structures.

5.5 SHR has not published the regulatory codes of conduct required by sections 51 and 54 of the 2010 Act. Instead, there are high-level descriptions in the SHR Regulatory Framework of SHR’s general approach to carrying out inquiries and using statutory intervention powers. Since SHR makes virtually no use of formal inquiry procedures or statutory intervention powers to address concerns about governance or other organisational matters within RSLs, there is a resulting lack of transparency. This could be addressed by SHR developing a consolidated code of regulatory practice, to establish clearer procedures for non-statutory engagement and intervention, as well as the statutory inquiry and intervention powers described in the 2010 Act.

6. Consulting and involving housing associations

6.1 The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 places SHR under an obligation to consult with social landlords and their representative bodies on a range of specific matters. These matters include regulatory guidance on the Scottish Social Housing Charter and on RSL governance and financial management; and the codes of regulatory guidance on inquiries and interventions described in sections 51 and 54 of the 2010 Act.

6.2 These arrangements are not operating effectively at present. Consultation with housing associations and representative bodies has been limited on regulatory guidance and publications that impact directly on the sector, with the notable exception of the framework for reporting on the Charter. Where SFHA undertook to develop a model code of conduct for RSL governing bodies, the process became protracted due to SHR effectively demanding rights of approval and editorial control over a code produced by the sector. In addition there is no structured framework for discussing how the overall regulatory framework is operating, or how SHR and the sector can work together more effectively to promote good practice for the benefit of RSLs and their tenants.

6.3 Formal structures to promote meaningful involvement, consultation and joint working are in our view badly needed, with clear terms of reference and protocols on how consultation and involvement arrangements should operate.

7. Proposals for change and improvement

Non-legislative solutions

7.1 There is considerable scope to improve how the housing regulation system is working within the existing statutory framework set by the 2010 Act, although this will depend on SHR’s willingness to make the kind of changes housing associations want to see.

7.2 We suggest that improvements can be made in the following areas:

- SHR should review the scope and focus of its current regulatory approach for RSLs, to better reflect its core purpose (proportionate regulation of individual social landlords, focused on outcomes for service users and risks that impact directly on tenants’ interests). This should also reflect SHR’s specific obligations under section 3 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010: the requirement that the performance of SHR’s functions should be proportionate, transparent and accountable and targeted only where action is needed.

- SHR should tailor its regulatory requirements and processes for different types and sizes of RSLs, to better reflect the diverse nature of Scottish RSLs and its obligations under section 4 of the 2010 Act.

- SHR should review its approach to reporting on RSL governance issues. This should include more public reporting for named RSLs; correcting any impression that problems in individual RSLs are indicative of sector-wide weaknesses; and more co-operation and joint working between SHR and the sector to promote good practice.

- SHR should create more formal structures and protocols for consultation and involvement by RSLs and their representative bodies.

- SHR should meet its statutory duty to publish, following consultation, the codes of regulatory practice specified in sections 51 and 54 of the 2010 Act. Beyond this, SHR should consider producing a consolidated code of regulatory practice that addresses all aspects of its regulatory practice, to include non-statutory engagement and interventions as well as use of its inquiry and statutory intervention powers.

- SHR should introduce formal mechanisms enabling RSLs to seek reviews of its decisions or regulatory actions.
• SHR and the RSL sector should work together more closely on issues that relate to the sector as a whole (as distinct from SHR’s regulatory engagement with individual RSLs). SHR and the sector have a strong shared interest in developing and promoting practical tools that will help RSLs to improve standards and manage risks. We suggest that work on sector-wide good practice issues is best addressed on the basis of co-production and partnership working.

Accountability to Parliament

7.3 SHR’s accountability to Parliament is a key part of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010. It is inevitable that SHR’s views about the housing sector as a whole will feature prominently in its evidence to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, but there is a risk in such circumstances that this will deflect from what we believe should be the key focus of the SHR’s accountability to Parliament, namely holding SHR to account for the performance of its regulatory functions and for its performance in meeting its statutory obligations under the 2010 Act.

7.4 In the immediate future we believe that the issues set out in this paper are worthy of further scrutiny, namely:

• Whether SHR’s current regulatory approach is sufficiently focused on service quality and outcomes for tenants and service users
• The evidence underpinning the views SHR has expressed to the Committee about general weaknesses in RSL governance and the impact those views are having on the RSL sector
• The limited extent of public reporting by SHR in relation to individual, named organisations, in carrying out its functions
• The transparency and accountability of SHR’s non-statutory methods of engagement and intervention in the management of RSLs, and the effectiveness of its interventions in serious problem cases
• The effectiveness of SHR’s current methods for consulting and involving RSLs on regulatory guidance and the overall operation of the housing regulation framework.

Improvements to the statutory framework for housing regulation, through the current Housing (Scotland) Bill

7.5 Most of the improvements GWSF wishes to see can be achieved within the existing statutory framework set out in the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010, subject to the willingness of the Scottish Housing Regulator to adjust its current approach. We also believe that statutory changes are required in some areas, and that these should be considered in the context of the current Housing (Scotland) Bill. Our proposals in this regard involve selective enhancements to the 2010 Act rather than a fundamental review of it.

7.6 Our proposals for legislative change are set out in GWSF’s response to the call for views on the Housing Bill issued by the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. These proposals, as they relate to regulation, may be summarised as follows:

• The Bill should establish a requirement for SHR to publish, following consultation, a consolidated code of regulatory practice that addresses all of its methods for intervening in the affairs of social landlords (i.e. including regulatory engagement and interventions that are not publicly... reported and those that do not involve the use of statutory intervention powers).

Our proposal recognises that non-statutory engagement and intervention methods (rather than published inquiry reports and use of statutory intervention powers) have become established as SHR’s main way of working since its creation in 2012. We do not think this was envisaged during the passage of the 2010 Act.

- The Bill should establish a statutory right for social landlords to request a review by the SHR Board of regulatory decisions or actions. It should also establish a statutory appeals process, which allows social landlords to challenge SHR’s regulatory decisions or actions.

  Our proposal is based on the fact that the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 makes no provision for reviews or appeals and the only redress available to social landlords is to seek judicial review. This is a significant weakness in the existing legislation.

- The Bill should amend section 5 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 by adding RSL representative bodies to the list of bodies that SHR is required to consult and involve in performing its functions.

  Our proposal reflects the fact that SHR’s current arrangements for consultation and involvement are not operating satisfactorily. Statutory provision would provide a platform for making the changes that are needed.

GWSF Briefing: Registered Social Landlord Group Structures in Scotland

February 2014
Summary

Since 2010, there has been rapid growth of group structures consisting of two or more RSLs. Group structure registered social landlords (RSLs) now house almost one-third of all RSL tenants in Scotland, with further group structure proposals in the pipeline. These changes have huge significance for tenants, the RSL sector and the Scottish economy.

Key Concerns

- Expansion by very large RSLs north and south of the border is running unchecked.
- Tenants affected by group structure proposals have no rights of consent through tenant ballots, unlike in stock transfers and other landlord restructuring scenarios.
- Local and specialist housing associations are increasingly becoming takeover targets. Some RSL group structure arrangements are taking financial resources and jobs out of fragile local economies and the Scottish economy as a whole.
- Regulatory guidance and practice on group structures need to be strengthened, to ensure that the Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR) is able to meet its core purpose of safeguarding tenants’ interest and so that public reporting of group structure proposals is improved.

Legislative changes needed, through the current Housing (Scotland) Bill

- Tenant authorisation/ballot requirements should be extended to group structure proposals.

Non-legislative changes needed

- The Scottish Government’s housing and regeneration policies should champion the role of locally focused and accountable social landlords, such as local authorities and place-based housing associations and co-operatives. The Government should prioritise the role these organisations play in the delivery of its policies and programmes, to maximise the economic benefits for local communities and economies.
- Increased parliamentary scrutiny of RSL restructuring activities is desirable, due to the scale of change taking place and the high impact on large numbers of tenants in Scotland.
- SHR should strengthen its regulatory guidance to ensure that RSLs are required to act transparently when entering into group structures and that they are accountable to tenants about group structure proposals and their future operation.
- SHR should strengthen its approach to assessing group structure proposals, by giving full consideration to the prospective group parent as well as to the RSL seeking to become a subsidiary.
- SHR’s Board should assume responsibility for approving statutory consents for group structure proposals. SHR should also improve public reporting, by publishing assessments of how restructuring proposals will benefit tenants and service users, and by reporting publicly on the achievement of these benefits after group structure changes take effect.
- SHR should meet its existing statutory obligation to consult on and publish a code of practice on regulatory intervention. This should address SHR’s role in decisions about group structure partners, in cases where it is already intervening in the affairs of an RSL, either through the use of statutory powers or non-statutory engagement and intervention.
Introduction

1) Since 2010, there has been a rapid growth of RSL group structures that consist of a parent RSL and one or more subsidiary RSLs. This raises major issues for tenants and for the future of housing associations and co-operatives in Scotland, but there is currently very little information in the public domain to explain or analyse the changes that are taking place.

2) This GWSF Briefing seeks to address that gap. The Briefing includes a series of recommendations about how housing legislation, policy and regulation all need to be strengthened in response to the growth of group structures.

Restructuring within the RSL sector in Scotland

3) Restructuring in the RSL sector is not new, but the current scale of restructuring activity is unprecedented.

- 16% of Scottish RSLs (owning around 90,000 houses and housing around one third of all RSL tenants in Scotland) are now part of, or are in the process of joining, a group structure containing more than one RSL;

- An increasing number of Scottish RSLs are becoming the subsidiaries of much larger national/regional or UK-wide RSLs.

A detailed analysis of which Scottish RSL’s are a part of a group structure is available.

4) In the past, RSL restructuring was typically based on transfers of engagements (merging the assets and liabilities of two RSLs in a single organisation) rather than group structures, and partnerships were more likely to involve RSLs working in neighbouring communities or serving similar client groups.

5) The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 sets out the statutory framework for regulating RSL restructuring through mergers and transfers of engagements, including provision for tenant ballots. This framework now needs to be updated, because transfers of engagements are no longer a significant factor in RSL restructuring. Instead, group structure solutions are now the norm for RSL restructuring, and these are not addressed specifically in the 2010 Act.

6) Group structures involving more than one RSL are based on:

- One RSL acting as group parent and having constitutional control over other RSLs in the group;

- Subsidiary RSLs retaining their own legal identity and housing stock, but having the legal status of subsidiaries of the parent RSL.

These are not matters of administrative detail. To make a direct comparison with the present Scottish constitutional debate, joining a group structure as a subsidiary is akin to an RSL giving up sovereignty in order to become a devolved administration, with the parent organisation always having ultimate control over the subsidiary’s affairs.

7) The drivers for RSL group structures are sometimes positive. For example, a wish to improve or expand services for tenants or to help keep rents affordable in the face of financial challenges. Achieving these benefits in practice is by no means assured and depends entirely on the specific circumstances of the RSLs involved and how they plan to work together. For example:

- Sharing staff or services within a group structure can increase as well as reduce management costs for a smaller RSL joining a group structure as a subsidiary. The financial benefits may in some cases be greater for the prospective parent, if it is a large organisation with a top-heavy management structure and high overheads which it can offset by selling management and other services to subsidiary RSLs.

- A smaller RSL joining a group structure may be able to access private finance sourced by the parent RSL. But on lending within a group structure must be on commercial terms; a smaller RSL will not receive preferential terms because it is part of a group structure. Nor does it follow that a larger parent RSL will necessarily be able to access funding more easily or on better terms than much smaller RSLs.

8) RSLs that have entered into group structure arrangements are understandably keen to emphasise the benefits they think this might bring for tenants. But the current growth of group structures in Scotland is also being driven by wider, more worrying factors:

- In the last 2-3 years, we have seen a number of very large Scottish and UK-wide RSLs pursue business growth strategies that are designed to expand their presence in different parts of Scotland. The main players have included The Wheatley Group (based in Glasgow), The Riverside Group (headquartered in Liverpool), The Sanctuary Group (headquartered in Worcester) and the Gentoo Group (based in Sunderland).

- Some Scottish RSLs have allowed their future financial sustainability to be compromised, because of the scale of new housebuilding they have chosen to carry out at sub-marginal rates of Government subsidy. This has resulted in substantial increases in debt levels and may be a key driver for some group structure arrangements. Other RSLs, originally set up as local vehicles for Scottish Homes or New Town Development Corporation housing transfers, have not had sufficient provision in their business plans to invest in improving the quality of their housing stock.

- Where RSLs get into financial or other difficulties, and supervision by the Scottish Housing Regulator takes place, the outcome is increasingly for the RSL in difficulty to join a group structure.

In some cases, this has led to a group structure involving neighbouring RSLs (for example, Cloch and Oak Tree Housing Associations in Inverclyde).

More frequently, the resulting partnerships have been with much larger organisations that have no connection to the RSL’s local community. Recent examples include Tenants First Housing Co-operative in Grampian, which is now a subsidiary of the UK-wide Sanctuary Group; and Cordale Housing Association, a community-based housing association in West Dunbartonshire which is in the process of becoming a subsidiary of Caledonia Housing Association, an RSL that has no connection with West Dunbartonshire and whose main housing stock areas are in Perth and Kinross, Dundee and Angus.
9) There are some important lessons to be learned from elsewhere in the UK. Firstly, patterns of stock ownership among many of the largest UK RSLs are highly dispersed:

- For example, The Riverside Group (now the parent of Irvine Housing Association in North Ayrshire and seeking further growth in other parts of Scotland) owns social rented housing in more than 150 local authority areas in England. Its social housing stock is located in such diverse places as Liverpool, Leicester, East Anglia, Kent, London and Milton Keynes.
- The Riverside Group is a major landlord in several local authorities in the north of England. But it is a minor player in the vast majority of areas where it has stock: it has fewer than 100 houses for low cost rent in 120 of the local authorities where it owns such housing.¹

We are already seeing some group structure relationships in Scotland that have no apparent strategic rationale, other than a desire for growth on the part of the parent RSL. Based on the English experience, this will lead to more landlords providing tenant services through call centres or agency services, rather than having a physical presence for service delivery in their communities. This will also reduce the ability of local authorities to achieve effective partnerships with RSLs in their areas.

10) A further important lesson from England is that RSLs joining group structures as subsidiaries have no long-term guarantees about retaining their own separate legal identity. The early 2000s saw many smaller or locally based English housing associations becoming subsidiaries of much larger organisations. By the end of the decade, many parent RSLs in England were seeking to “collapse” their group structures for reasons of simplification, with smaller group members fully absorbed into the parent organisation rather than maintaining their own legal identity.

11) To provide some illustration of the collapsing of group structures in England, the Tenant Services Authority reported in 2010 that Sanctuary Housing Association was the parent of 8 other English RSLs which owned more than 22,000 houses between them. By 2013, it appears that only one of the registered subsidiaries (owning less than 2,000 houses) remained as an RSL in its own right.² Sanctuary is just one of a number of group parents in England that have reportedly collapsed their group structures in this manner.

Action needed to provide a clearer strategic and policy context

12) The rapid growth of RSL group structure activity is divorced from any rational strategic or policy framework for the future structure of the social housing sector in Scotland. The Scottish Government has stated the following position:

> "The Scottish Government’s vision for the future of housing associations and housing co-operatives and all other registered social landlords (RSLs), is focused on the outcomes these bodies can achieve rather than on their...

² Data Sources: Tenant Services Authority Regulatory Judgement for Sanctuary Housing Association Ltd (December 2010) and Homes & Communities Agency Statistical Data Return 2012/13
structure as a sector… The Government does not believe that it could or should have a particular vision of what that structure might be in the future; rather it should encourage, and work with, all parts of the sector to achieve good housing and other outcomes for communities across the country.

An unintended consequence of this laissez-faire position is that it has created an environment in which very large Scottish and UK-wide RSLs can pursue their ambitions for expansion.

13) Scottish RSLs are not looking to the Government to play a detailed role in prescribing what the structure of the RSL sector should be. But the current position is untenable if the Government wishes to have an effective influence over how its own policies are delivered and if it also wishes to promote rational, effective delivery partnerships between local authorities and RSLs.

14) It is essential that the Scottish Government and leaders from across the political spectrum should now take a more decisive position that actively supports and promotes the key delivery role of Scottish local authorities and of Scotland’s extensive network of local, place-based housing associations and co-operatives.

15) Within the Scottish housing system, democratic accountability and a focus on local communities are clear-cut matters for local authorities, community-controlled housing associations and other place-based RSLs with open membership policies and “one member, one vote” constitutions. Given this, Scotland’s politicians should champion the role of locally focused and accountable social landlords and give them real priority as delivery partners of choice for housing policy and programmes.

16) There are strong economic arguments for adopting this approach. Social landlords with a local focus and accountability (local authorities and local housing associations) are major contributors to sustaining local economies. By contrast, some of the types of RSL group structures that are now emerging will dilute these economic benefits:

- RSL subsidiaries within a group structure will frequently be required to arrange borrowing and to buy “group services” from the parent (for example in relation to corporate services, tenant call centres, housing development services, etc);

- Economic resources (rental income, loan repayments and jobs) will shift from local economies to where the parent operates – whether that is another part of Scotland, or elsewhere in the UK.

The economic impacts of group structure activity are not being quantified far less considered or debated at present. In our view, economic impacts should be central to government thinking about its support for housing in Scotland.

Tenant consent for RSL group structures

The Housing (Scotland) Bill

17) Group structures involve fundamental changes to an RSL’s constitutional control and its future arrangements for delivering tenant services. But because there is no

3 Scottish Government response to the report of the Scottish Parliament’s Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee on the draft Scottish Budget for 2013/14 (January 2013) change of landlord, the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 provisions for tenant consultation and ballots in cases of RSL restructuring do not apply to group structure proposals. Instead, the only statutory controls are that the Scottish Housing Regulator must give its consent to changes to an RSL’s constitution. Appendix 1 sets out in detail the statutory provisions and their limitations.

18) The current Housing (Scotland) Bill provides an opportunity to address these issues directly. The miscellaneous provisions in the Bill propose changes to tenant consultation requirements in cases where an RSL is at risk of possible insolvency\(^4\), the rationale being to respond to circumstances that were not foreseen at the time of the 2010 Act. We suggest that the same principle should apply to tenant consultation and consent in relation to group structure proposals. The 2010 Act did not make specific provision for these matters and this omission is now significant because of the growth of group structure arrangements since 2010 and the need to provide appropriate safeguards for tenants’ interests.

19) We suggest that the Bill could be revised as follows:

- Amending Parts 8 and 10 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010, to expand the statutory definition of restructuring to include the formation or joining of a group structure involving more than one RSL;
- Extending the tenant authorisation provisions in Part 10 of the 2010 Act (including the provisions for tenant ballots) to all restructuring cases falling within the expanded definition, regardless of whether the restructuring proposal would result in a change of landlord.\(^5\)

20) There is a strong case for making these statutory changes:

- Restructuring via group structures is happening on a substantial scale in the Scottish RSL sector and has a significant impact on the future interests of tenants and service users. It is unacceptable that tenants have no statutory rights to be consulted or to give their consent to such significant changes, as would be the case if a restructuring proposal resulted in a change of landlord.
- When an RSL joins a group structure, it relinquishes sovereignty and ultimate control over its affairs to a third party in return for whatever benefits the group structure arrangement is intended to provide. This has long-term consequences for tenants, because a parent RSL will typically have direct influence (and potentially, control) over matters such as a subsidiary RSL’s business plan, rent policy, housing investment policy, funding costs and service delivery structures and locations.

Appendix 2 sets out extracts from current SHR guidance on RSL group structures. The guidance extracts show the extent to which an RSL cedes

\(^4\) In exceptional cases where an RSL is threatened with insolvency (section 79 of the Bill).

\(^5\) Our proposal for tenant ballots would not apply to cases where exceptional regulatory action is needed. Section 79 of the current Housing (Scotland) Bill proposes that SHR would not be obliged to consult tenants before using its exceptional statutory powers to direct a transfer of an RSL’s assets, if the RSL was potentially insolvent. We would expect the same principle to apply to any tenant ballot requirements introduced for group structure proposals, ie ballots would be the norm but would not be required where an RSL was potentially insolvent and a statutory inquiry by SHR resulted in emergency action to avert the potential insolvency.
ultimate control over its affairs, if it decides to become a subsidiary within a group structure and if the parent RSL wishes to exercise its constitutional control over a subsidiary RSL. As we have already shown, this could include the risk that the subsidiary RSL will ultimately lose its separate legal identity at some point in the future.

- An RSL seeking to join a group structure needs only to obtain the agreement of its shareholding members, not its tenants and rent-payers. This can create a substantial democratic deficit.

For example, the decision to create The Wheatley Group and for Glasgow Housing Association to become a subsidiary of Wheatley was made by GHA’s board (under GHA’s constitution, its board are the only shareholding members). More than 40,000 GHA tenants had no say in the decision, nor will Wheatley’s Board be directly accountable to GHA tenants for its current plans to expand the Group’s activities, even though the Group’s main assets are tenants’ homes.

While the democratic deficit is most pronounced in the case of The Wheatley Group, it also applies in other cases and is largely hidden from public view. RSLs are under no obligation to publish a record of how many shareholders take part in votes about joining a group structure, or how the number voting relates to the total number of shareholders or the total number of tenants affected.

- There are strong concerns among many Scottish housing associations that they are becoming sitting targets for takeovers by very large RSLs.

In making statutory provision for tenant consent to mergers and transfers of engagements during the passage of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010, the Minister for Housing and Communities told Parliament that “…Such a safeguard is important not only for tenants but for landlords as the need to secure tenant support will make it much harder for another landlord to contemplate a hostile takeover bid. (Col 3491)”. The same thinking and safeguards now need to be applied to restructuring through group structures.

SHR’s regulatory requirements and decision-making framework for RSL group structures

21) Changes to legislation should be accompanied by improvements to SHR’s regulatory requirements and decision-making processes for RSL group structures. Currently, these are set out in SHR’s Regulatory Framework and in a Regulatory Guidance Note published in April 2012.

22) SHR has recently announced that it has commissioned external research to inform changes to its regulatory guidance on group structures. We look forward to having the opportunity to discuss the research findings when these are published by SHR.

23) We would suggest three main areas where current regulatory guidance and practice could be strengthened to improve transparency and accountability and to better safeguard the interest of tenants.

---

6 SPICe Briefing: Housing (Scotland) Bill as amended at Stage 2 (October 2010)
a) How group structure partners are identified/selected

24) Some important aspects of group structure activity lack transparency and are not subject to any clear rules on ethical practice.

- Some GWSF members have told us recently that they have been contacted by consultants acting for other RSLs, to test potential interest in group structure discussions. There is also a degree of ambulance chasing, to target RSLs suspected of being in difficulty.
- Group structure discussions can create significant potential for conflicts of interest (for example, in relation to senior staff salary increases/bonuses and enhancement of pension entitlements if an RSL joins a group structure).

25) Addressing these issues does not require changes in legislation. Through changes to its regulatory guidance and practice, SHR could ensure that:

- RSLs are required to adopt a transparent and accountable process for identifying potential group structure partners (whether on a voluntary basis or in cases where a group structure forms part of a rescue plan for an RSL in difficulty);
- RSLs are required to provide their tenants with a proper level of information about the process they have followed, and about the criteria applied and options considered, when selecting a group structure partner;
- SHR itself scrutinises how potential conflicts of interest have been managed in the development of group structure proposals, and ensures that RSLs are accountable to tenants for any material enhancements to senior staff remuneration that have occurred, directly as a result of group structure proposals.

26) Greater transparency would also be beneficial with regard to SHR’s own role in cases where rescue partners are being sought. This can be addressed under existing legislation which requires SHR to consult on and publish a code of practice on regulatory intervention. Such a code of practice should make clear that SHR has no role (formal or otherwise) in recommending potential group structure partners, unless it is using the statutory intervention powers set out in the 2010 Act.

b) How group structure proposals are assessed, to safeguard tenants’ interests

27) Current regulatory guidance is focused overwhelmingly on the business case put forward by the RSL that is seeking to join a group structure. It is much less clear how the prospective parent RSL is assessed by SHR. For example, in relation to:

- The prospective parent RSL’s risk profile
- The prospective RSL’s reasons for seeking to expand its structure to areas where it has no existing role and with which it has no strategic connection
- The impact the group structure proposal may have on the parent RSL’s own tenants, and their views on the proposal.

7 Section 54 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010
28) These issues need to be embedded in SHR’s approach, since its overall purpose is to safeguard tenants’ interests. A number of the very large RSLs seeking to expand through group structures are complex organisations whose business models involve significant risks that potentially impact on the future interests of tenants. For example, if the prospective parent has multiple non-registered subsidiaries that operate for commercial purposes; or if the prospective parent uses complex financial instruments or higher-risk types of borrowing that may expose their subsidiaries to much higher levels of risk if there is on lending within the group.

29) Greater clarity is also needed about SHR’s role in assessing impact on the interests of the prospective parent RSL’s tenants. For example, does SHR expect prospective parent RSLs to meet financial neutrality conditions? If not, are the parent RSL’s tenants subsidising direct financial incentives to RSLs joining their landlord’s group structure?

30) Some group structure proposals involve parent organisations that are regulated by the Homes and Communities Agency (HCA), the housing regulator for registered housing providers in England, rather than by SHR. It is not clear whether SHR relies on information provided by the HCA when assessing group structures involving an English-based parent, or whether it carries out its own independent assessment of the motivations, risk profiles or business plans of the RSLs concerned. It is important that there should be transparency on these matters, since SHR’s statutory purpose is to safeguard the interests of tenants and service users in Scotland. SHR has still to publish details of its joint working protocols with the HCA, and this would seem to be a key area for action in making changes to SHR’s guidance on group structures.

c) Transparency and accountability for regulatory decisions

31) SHR does not currently publish any information about the specific benefits it expects RSL group structure proposals to deliver for tenants, when giving its consent to the proposals. Similarly, it does not publish any information about the extent to which those benefits for tenants are subsequently achieved. As such, there is a significant gap in public reporting of regulatory decisions on group structures. This does not sit comfortably with SHR’s statutory purpose of safeguarding tenants’ interests or with its overarching statutory obligation to perform its functions in a transparent and accountable manner.

32) The public minutes of SHR Board meetings indicate that with one exception (The Wheatley Group), the SHR Board has not been responsible for approving regulatory consents for constitutional changes relating to group structures.\(^8\) It is in our view essential that SHR’s Board should be directly responsible for group structure consents:

- Group structure proposals have a direct and significant impact on tenants’ interests. SHR’s statutory purpose is to safeguard those interests.
- Statutory consent to group structure proposals should not be classed as routine operational decisions that SHR’s Board should delegate to officers.

\(^8\) SHR Board meeting minutes suggest that an exception was made in the case of Wheatley because its registration as a non asset owning RSL was deemed to be a policy decision.
• SHR’s Board rather than its executive officers are accountable to Parliament for the performance of its regulatory functions. It is right that SHR’s own internal processes should reflect that accountability relationship where major decisions affecting large numbers of tenants are concerned.

Appendix 1
Current Legislation and Regulatory Guidance relating to RSL Restructuring

Part 8 of the 2010 Act, sections 96 to 104 sets out statutory requirements for regulatory consents where an RSL is seeking to restructure:

- “Restructure” in this context includes transfers of engagements, amalgamations and voluntary winding up/dissolution.
- Section 96(3) says SHR shall not give consent to restructuring proposals “... unless satisfied that (the RSL) has consulted its tenants about the matter for which consent is needed”.
- Section 97 confirms that transfers of engagements, amalgamations etc require the RSL seeking to restructure to pass a special resolution (in practice, an affirmative vote by its shareholding members) and to have this approved by SHR and registered by the Financial Conduct Authority.
- The RSL seeking to restructure needs to show it has consulted with tenants in order to obtain SHR consent. If a restructuring proposal would result in a change of landlord, Part 10 of the 2010 Act applies (“Special procedure for disposals and restructuring resulting in change of landlord”)

The main features of the special procedure set out in Part 10 of the 2010 Act are that:

- There is a statutory requirement for enhanced tenant consultation, with a range of specific requirements set out in section 115 (eg issue of a formal notice by the RSL, provision of information about the consequences of the change proposed, opportunities for tenants to make representations about the changes proposed).
- SHR’s consent to the disposal is subject to “tenant authorisation”. Tenant authorisation (i.e. consent) may take the form of a tenant ballot (section 118) or the written agreement of the tenants affected (section 119).

Part 8 Sections 96 to 104 of the 2010 Act and the special procedure for tenant authorisation set out in Part 10 of the Act do not apply to circumstances where an RSL is seeking SHR approval to join a group structure as the subsidiary of another RSL.

Instead:

- Part 8, section 93 of the 2010 Act requires SHR to give its consent to material changes to an RSL’s constitution (becoming a subsidiary of another RSL would require this).

There are no provisions in the 2010 Act that require tenant consent if an RSL is seeking to become the subsidiary of another RSL.

2. Regulatory Policy and Procedures

Regulatory policy and procedures about RSL restructuring proposals are set out in the following documents published by SHR:

- SHR Regulatory Framework: Consent to constitutional and organisational change and disposals (March 2012)
- SHR Regulatory Guidance: Organisational Changes (April 2012)
Where a change of landlord would be involved, the Regulatory Framework states that a tenant ballot will normally be required, unless a landlord makes a convincing case for why another form of written consent by tenants should be sought.

The separate SHR guidance on organisational change proposals and group structure proposals replicate the 2010 Act in applying different thresholds for tenants’ rights and tenant consent, depending on whether restructuring proposals will result in a change of landlord.

If there is no change of landlord, SHR’s guidance on Group Structures and Constitutional Partnerships confirms that there will be a lower threshold in terms of tenant information and consent:

“If the proposal does not involve a change of landlord we will expect tenants to be consulted about the proposal. We will wish to see a description of action taken to inform and consult tenants and any Registered Tenants Organisations about the proposals, and consultation outcomes. We may require the RSL to ensure tenants have access to independent advice funded by the RSL. RSLs should have a clear communications/consultation strategy that allows sufficient time for meaningful tenant consultation on the RSL’s proposals”. Regulatory Guidance on Group Structures and Constitutional Partnerships, Appendix 1
Scottish Housing Regulator Guidance on RSL Group Structures

The following extracts from SHR’s Regulatory Guidance (April 2012) illustrate the reduction independent decision-making capacity that will typically be involved if an RSL joins a group structure as the subsidiary of another RSL:

“We place a strong emphasis on the role the parent body plays within the group structure, for example by determining the group’s strategy and objectives, monitoring the performance of subsidiaries, and taking action where objectives and standards are not being met” (para 14);

“The constitutions of group members must enable the parent to exercise and to take corrective action, where required” (para 20);

“Within group structures, the parent must have constitutional control over its subsidiaries… Constitutional control by the parent should normally be exercised through:

- Powers to control the majority of votes at a general meeting of a subsidiary; and
- Powers to appoint and remove a majority of the subsidiary’s governing body” (paras 24-25)

“Parent RSLs should exercise high-level control, by monitoring the activities and performance of their subsidiaries. Parent RSLs should take timely and effective action if their subsidiaries do not operate within approved limits or fail to meet agreed standards of performance.” (para 27)

“We require that if a subsidiary is an RSL, its governing body should as a minimum have sufficient members to form a quorum independently of any members who are also governing body members of the parent organisation. This does not restrict constitutional rights a parent may have to appoint or remove governing body members of a subsidiary or to use any other step-in rights”. (para 31)

“The basis for interventions by the parent should be clearly described and applied. For example:

- If a subsidiary does not adhere to financial or other agreed limits, the parent should have clearly defined rights to step in and take action;
- Parent RSLs should have unrestricted step-in rights where a subsidiary or its governing body is experiencing serious problems (for example, relating to the governance, financial management or performance of the subsidiary). Step-in rights should include the power to appoint and where necessary remove members of the subsidiary’s governing body”. (para 42)
LEGAL SERVICES AGENCY

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

The general view of the solicitors commenting on the Bill is that we have grave concerns concerning the balance of rights and powers adopted particularly to those accused, or guilty of, anti-social conduct or behaviour.

Very generally, we appreciate that it is important for neighbours, the community and, in the long, term, those guilty of anti-social behaviour, that that behaviour be controlled and the individuals and families concerned be rehabilitated.

However the route to that end entails a balancing of the rights and interests of all concerned including those who have committed, or are accused of, anti-social behaviour, their partners and children.

All are entitled to somewhere to live and should not be pushed into a homeless underclass. Where are they to go?

Whilst the allocation of housing and eviction, or the threat thereof, play a part in the control and ultimate cessation of anti-social behaviour they must be a last resort. Eviction followed by, in effect, removal of any further housing options for tenants and their families is a draconian step that will impact most on the youngest who of course will have been entirely innocent of any fault.

Your Committee will be fully aware, of course, that many of those who behave in an anti-social manner do so because of either highly stressed circumstances, mental disorder, learning difficulties or other difficulties. Many are motivated to change and do so. Whilst others are suffering an exacerbation in their mental ill health and require additional care to manage behavioural symptoms arising from the disorder. There can also be issues of neighbours who are acting in a discriminatory way towards those with mental disorder or learning difficulties.

We can hardly overstate the adverse impact mental health and addition problems can have on families, including children: for that to be exacerbated by eviction followed by the removal of further housing options is harsh indeed.

Some of the issues arising in the Bill to which these general comments are directed include the following (the numbers relate to the section numbers of the Bill).

Section 5 repeals earlier provisions concerning the allocation of housing and seeks now to permit social landlords to take into account the age of an applicant age 16 or over. As the proposed amendments comments, this does not alter the requirements to avoid unlawful discrimination on the grounds of age.

We are not comfortable with this provision and think that it will be difficult, in practice, for RSL’s to manage lawfully and clearly. If the problem aimed at related to maturity and the ability to sustain a tenancy or needs that may arise as a result of mental or physical frailty or disability these factors should be highlighted rather than attempting to use age as a proxy.

Section 7 (2) permits RSL’s to impose a requirement that an application for housing must have remained in force for a minimum period before the applicant is eligible for the allocation of housing. We are not advised as to the period concerned: at the very least there should be a maximum time (3 months?).

In any event, we have difficulty understanding why those in housing need should have to wait before they are even considered for housing as a matter of policy. In permitting RSL’s to desist from housing tenants and their families with difficulties, policy makers do have to follow on by indicating their views as to precisely where such citizens (at fault though they may be on occasion) should live, whether temporarily or permanently. There is plainly already a major crisis in the provision of temporary accommodation.

We note that the proposed amendments state that a RSL may not impose a requirement (a minimum period of time) “if the landlord … is a local authority and has a duty to an applicant” (a duty to secure accommodation where the applicant is homeless).

In passing it should, of course, be noted that local authorities are under limited duties to homeless persons if it can be said they are “intentionally homeless” unless, of course, they suffer from a mental disorder in which other duties come into play.

Given that so much housing is now, of course, owned and let by RSL’s, the protection given by this subsection to homeless persons is very limited. The protection should be extended to provide that it applies not only to local authorities but also to RSL’s.

The proposed change goes on to provide that RSL’s must have regard, in imposing a qualifying period for the allocation of housing, to any Guidance issued by Scottish Ministers on the maximum period preceding the application which should be considered in relation to a variety of circumstances (see below), including where the applicant has (been alleged) to have acted in an anti-social manner or pursued a course of conduct amounting to harassment.

The judgement as to whether the circumstances relating to anti-social behaviour apply or not, seems to be entirely in the hands of the RSL concerned and could be open to a variety of interpretations. We are not happy with the high level of discretion given.

Other grounds for the removal of eligibility for housing for undefined periods of time include “abandonment” by the tenant or joint tenant of a former tenancy. The new provisions include even a joint tenants interest having been terminated by the abandonment procedure – this could mean a couple separate, one leaves and then cannot access public sector housing for a period of time simply because they haven’t informed the landlord that they have left. Recovery of possession through the abandonment procedure can occur owing to mental health problems, hospitalisation, imprisonment, a chaotic lifestyle or a range of difficulties: as well as, simply a mistake by the landlord concerned.

Whilst an applicant for housing may appeal by Summary Application to the Sheriff against a requirement that an application for housing must have remained in force for a minimum period of time before the applicant is eligible for allocation of housing, no criteria as such are given for how the Sheriff would reach his/her decision on the matter. Not even a test of “reasonableness”.

Of course, human rights “proportionality” would apply: we would however very much prefer that it be stated that the RSL’s decision on the requirement be subject to a test of statutory “reasonableness”.

Such a statutory test would inform the policy of the RSL as well as give guidance as to the forms of argument to be expected as part of a summary application.

It should be noted that it would appear that quite tough procedural requirements would exist for such a Summary Application. The Court action would for instance, probably be required to be raised within 14 days of the decision complained of.

We would suggest that the timelimit for such an application to the Court be extended to a minimum of two months.

From our experience in dealing with “homelessness” cases we have found the Review procedure that is provided for, in terms of that legislation useful, (a Review by a more senior, independent officer of the local authority) and would suggest that there might be much to be said for introducing such a procedure in these cases as well as an application to the Court.

We would also like RSL's to be required to formally intimate by First Class and First Class Recorded Delivery any such decision which should include not only the decision, the reasons for the decision as well as the facts founded upon by the decision maker, as well as details of the Review and Appeal's process.
Section 8 deals with the creation of a Short Scottish Secured Tenancy (SSST’s).

The Section develops the principles upon which a SSST can be created by, amongst others, permitting a landlord to serve a conversion notice on grounds that the tenant, a person residing or lodging with, or a subtenant of the tenant, or a person visiting the house has, within the period of three years preceding the date of service committed a range of anti-social conduct and behaviour.

We are concerned that the notice may be served on the basis of quite limited contact with the tenant (by visitors) and the premises and, that within a period of 3 years. This period is far too long and it may make it impossible for tenants to dispute a claim given that the landlord may have records but that the tenant may not have any records, or not even remember any incidents. The period should be reduced to a period of one year at the most.

The conduct upon which the service of a Notice creating the SSST can be based, is vague involving acting in an anti-social manner or pursuing a course of conduct. The change of a secure tenancy to a much more insecure SSST is a serious step concerning a tenant and his/her family’s home. The criteria upon which such a step is to based should be as clear as possible with some indication in the statute requiring that the behaviour be of some significant objective seriousness.

We would also prefer that it be required that the landlord in deciding to serve the notice creating a SSST have regard to the overall “reasonableness” of the step.

Section 12 relates to recovery of possession of the SSST. We consider this step to be a major one given that as a result of it the tenant and his/her family may be evicted with considerable difficulty thereafter in obtaining accommodation elsewhere.

Section 12 provides that a ground for recovery of possession/seeking eviction from a SSST be, amongst others that an obligation of the tenancy has been broken.

We would suggest that it be made clear that an obligation of some substance requires to have been broken.

Section 13 relates to a “tightening up” of the rights that flow from secure tenancy status. (The “Tenants Charter”).

The change to the rights concerned would not appear generally to have a major impact on those in significant housing stress for whom we generally act.
However, we are concerned that the rights in relation to assignation and subletting and, in Section 14, succession all require notification that the house concerned was the applicant’s only or principal home before the application concerned.

This is contrasted to showing as a matter of fact that the house concerned was the applicant’s only or principal home.

We do not see how the landlord’s interest would be prejudiced in any way by requiring proof as a matter of fact and or notification as opposed to merely by notification.

Section 15 concerns grounds for eviction based on anti-social behaviour from a SSST.

Paragraph 31 of the Guidance states that this (Section 15) inserts new paragraphs to the 2001 Act to remove a requirement that the court considers whether it is reasonable to make an order for eviction in cases where another court has already convicted a tenant of using the house for immoral or illegal purposes or an offence punishable by imprisonment, committed in or in the locality of the house.

The Guidance goes on to state that the tenant would go on to retain a right to challenge the court action.

It should be noted that where there is no defence of “reasonableness”, the grounds to challenge a court action are limited to disputing whether the acts founded upon did, or did not, take place.

The additional test of “reasonableness” allows the court to take into account the seriousness of the facts as proven, the impact of the eviction on the tenant and his/her family as well as the benefit (if any) to the landlord, the neighbours and the community.

In general, the statutes relating to eviction provide for a requirement of reasonableness and, in any event, in some situations human rights “proportionality” will import such a requirement as a matter of law and principle anyway.

Insofar as Parliament chooses to change this area of law we would urge that a requirement of reasonableness be retained. We are reasonably confident that if Parliament were not to choose to do so, the Court would, as a consequence of human rights proportionality, in effect have to reinstate such a requirement to some degree.

We refer to Orlic v Croatia [2011] HLR 44 at paragraph 65:
“in this connection the court reiterates that any person at risk of an interference with his right to home should in principle be able to have the proportionality and reasonableness of the measure determined by an independent tribunal in the light of the relevant principles under art. 8 of the Convention, notwithstanding that, under domestic law, he or she has no right to occupy a flat (see muttatis mutandis McCann v United Kingdom ay [50]).

Reliance on human rights proportionality is however not a substitute for the full assessment of reasonableness which entails looking at the circumstances of landlord and tenant as a whole and provides the court with an opportunity to look at all the facts.

Part 3 provides for certain recovery of possession/eviction actions currently raised through the Sheriff Court to be taken to the Private Rented Housing Panel.

This is a comparatively modest step and we do not as such have significant concerns about this currently given that the numbers involved are small and the grounds for disputing recovery of possession in the private sector are generally much more limited than in the social rented sector. We would however wish it to be made emphatically clear that whilst we are making no objection to the proposal, we should not be taken to in any way support a proposal, if it were made, for eviction actions in the public and socially rented sector to be taken out of the courts.

As regards the proposal in the Bill our main concern is that currently Legal Aid is not available for the Tribunal. (Private Rented Housing Panel). Where eviction, and all the technicalities of private rented sector law is concerned there will be many tenants who currently receive Legal Aid in the Courts who would not do so through the Panel system. An absence of Legal Aid will infringe their Article 6 Rights and we would propose that some form of Legal Aid be made available for those threatened with eviction in cases before the PRHP (this is of course as usual subject to tests on the grounds of reasonableness and financial circumstances).

Summary

We are very pleased to have had the opportunity to have made written submission followed by verbal submissions albeit at a comparatively late stage in this Bill.

We would have much preferred to have had the opportunity to take part in the initial discussions upon which the Bill is based and have no doubt that Parliament would have ended up being better briefed on the range of views of relevant had that taken place.
Nonetheless, of course, we remain appreciative of the time provided to us for us to articulate our views.

THE LAW SOCIETY
WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Introduction

The Law Society of Scotland aims to lead and support a successful and respected Scottish legal profession. Not only do we act in the interests of our solicitor members but we also have a clear responsibility to work in the public interest. That is why we actively engage and seek to assist in the legislative and public policy decision making processes.

General Comments

This is a very significant Bill which covers a number of items. Part 1 relates to the right to buy; Part 2 relates to social housing; Part 3 relates to private rented housing; Part 4 relates to the regulation of letting agents; Part 5 relates to mobile home sites with permanent residents; Part 6 relates to private housing conditions and Part 7 is a miscellaneous Part dealing with various aspects of housing law.

Part 1 – Right to buy

Section 1, Abolition of the right to buy

The abolition of the right to buy is a policy decision of the Government on which the Society has no view. However the exercise of that right over the years since 1980 has reduced the availability of good quality affordable housing in the public sector. It is important for Government to encourage the public and private sectors to build sufficient houses so that people can have access to good quality affordable homes.

Section 2, Amendment of right to buy provisions

The Society has no comments to make.

Part 2 – Social housing

Sections 3 – 7 deal with the allocation of social housing. The provisions appear to be reasonable and will achieve their objective.

Sections 8 – 12 deal with short Scottish secure tenancy in the context of anti-social behaviour.

These provisions seem reasonable and will attain the objective set out.

Sections 13 – 16 deal with the Scottish secure tenancy in connection with assignation, sub-let, joint tenancy, succession, grounds for eviction (where there is anti-social behaviour) and recovery of possessions. These provisions seem reasonable and will attain their objective.
Part 3 – Private rented housing

Sections 17 – 21 deal with the transfer of the sheriff’s jurisdiction to the first tier tribunal. The Society approves of this change.

Sections 22 – 25 deal with landlord registration and the time limit for determining applications and the enforcement of the repairing standard.

The Society approves of these provisions.

Part 4 – Letting agents

Part 4 creates a register of letting agents and requires letting agents to register operating as a letting agent without registration is a criminal offence. Letting agency work means things done by a person in the course of that person’s business in response to relevant instructions which are:-

(a) carried out with a view to a landlord who is a relevant person entering into or seeking to enter into a lease or occupancy arrangement by virtue of which an unconnected person may use the landlords house as a dwelling; or

(b) for the purpose of repairing, maintaining, improving, insuring or otherwise managing a house which is or is to be subject to a lease or arrangement mentioned in paragraph (a).

Section 26 requires Scottish Ministers to establish and maintain a register of letting agents.

The Society supports the regulation of letting agents. This will be of assistance to landlords and tenants alike.

However the Society is of the view that it is inappropriate for solicitors who act as letting agents to be subject to an additional registration process governed by Scottish Ministers and that Scottish solicitors should be exempt from this scheme. The reasons for the exemption are:-

1) The legal profession must be independent of Government.
2) Solicitors in Scotland are regulated by the Law Society of Scotland and subject to stringent rules of admission and detailed practice rules covering professional ethics and conduct and many other aspects of practice. Those practice rules require the approval of the Lord President.
3) Solicitors are subject to an independent, statutory complaints body, the Scottish Legal Complaints Commission.
4) Under the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980, the Law Society of Scotland maintains a wide set of public protections including the Master Policy for professional indemnity and the Scottish Solicitors Guarantee Fund which provides compensation in the event of dishonesty.
5) Creation of the scheme of regulation for letting agents which would include solicitors would duplicate some aspects of regulation and add cost and expense to solicitor businesses.

The Private Landlords and Letting and Managing Agents (Regulation) Bill, which is a private members bill in the House of Commons creates the letting agent regulation system by amending the Estate Agents Act 1979. That Act does not apply to solicitors in England and Wales.

Section 27 sets out the details of the application process for registration.

Section 28 makes it an offence for a person who makes an application to provide false information.

Section 29 provides that Scottish Ministers must determine an application and must enter the applicant in the register if they are satisfied that the applicant is a fit and proper person to carry out letting agency work.

Section 30 provides the considerations which Scottish Ministers must have regard to in determining whether a person is a fit and proper person to become a registered letting agent. It is material to this consideration if the person has been convicted of an offence involving fraud or other dishonesty, violence, drugs, firearms or is a sexual offence or has practiced unlawful discrimination on the grounds of any of the protected characteristics in the Equality Act 2010 or has contravened any provision of:-

(a) The law relating to housing;
(b) Landlord and tenant law; or
(c) The law relating to debt

Material information also relates to compliance with the letting agent code of practice, compliance with any other letting code or failure to comply with a duty to use a letting agent registration number or contravention of any letting agent enforcement order or failure to pay any costs in connection with an application to the first tier tribunal.

The definition of a “fit and proper” person in the context of section 30 is limited to certain defined characteristics. It is unclear what is meant by any contravention in relation to the “law relating to debt” or the “law relating to housing”. These expressions need further definition. Does ‘person’ in this section only relate to a ‘natural person’?

The section does not include contravention of professional rules or removal from the roll of a professional body of which the applicant for registration as a letting agent may have been a member and it also fails to take into account ‘associations’ which the applicant may have.

Furthermore, there is no requirement for the person who wishes to become a registered letting agent to have training or qualifications in letting property, nor to have in place any client protections. It is difficult to envisage how this system will actually protect prospective landlords or tenants (except in a very basic way) or enhance the services of letting agents.

Section 31 relates to the criminal record certificate of a fit and proper person.

Section 32 requires Scottish Ministers to allocate a letting agent registration number to each registered letting agent. This number must be included in any document sent to a landlord, tenant, prospective landlord or prospective tenant during the course of the agent’s work; any property advertisement or any other document or communication specified by Scottish Ministers.

Section 33 imposes of registered letting agents a duty to inform Scottish Ministers of any information provided by the agent should it become inaccurate. It is an offence to fail to comply with this obligation.

Section 34 requires Scottish Ministers to remove a registered letting agent from the Register if the agent has not made an application for renewal at the expiry of three year’s registration.

Section 35 provides Scottish Ministers with the power to remove a registered letting agent from the register if they are satisfied that the person is no longer a fit and proper person to carry out letting agency work. Scottish Ministers are required to provide notice to the individual who is subject to the revocation order. Scottish Ministers must consider any representations before making the determination.

There is no provision for making oral representation or for the agent to be represented in connection with the making of representations.

Section 36 – appeals

A person may appeal to the First tier Tribunal against the decision by Scottish Ministers under Section 29 to refuse to enter that person’s name on the Register or to renew a registration or under Section 30 to remove the person from the Register.

Section 37 requires Scottish Ministers to note a refusal to enter a person in the Register or renew an entry on the Register. It also requires Scottish Ministers to note a removal on the Register.

Section 38 provides that where a person has been refused entry to the Register, or has been removed from the Register, no costs incurred by that person in respect of letting agency work are recoverable and no fees may be charged.

There does not appear to be a sanction for seeking to recover expenses or fees in these circumstances.

Section 39 provides that it is an offence to operate as a letting agent without registration.
Section 40 provides that it is an offence for using a registration number where the person is not registered.

Section 41 provides Scottish Ministers with discretion to make by regulations a code of practice which provides the standard of practice of persons who carry out letting agency work.

Solicitors are already subject to a code of standards as part of The Law Society of Scotland Practice Rules 2011. It is inappropriate for Scottish Ministers to set a code of practice for solicitors.

Section 42 prohibits contracting out of the letting code of practice or to impose any penalty disability or obligation in the event of a person enforcing compliance by the letting agency with such a duty.

Section 43 provides that a tenant or landlord may apply to the First-tier Tribunal for a determination that a letting agent has failed to comply with the letting agent code of practice.

Section 44 provides for the First-tier Tribunal to vary or revoke enforcement orders.

Section 45 provides that if a letting agent fails to comply with an enforcement order from the First-tier Tribunal, it may notify Scottish Ministers of that failure.

Section 46 provides that it is an offence for a letting agent who, without reasonable excuse fails to comply with a letting agent enforcement order.

Section 47 provides for transfer of jurisdiction of actions involving letting agents.

Section 48 provides for offences by bodies corporate.

Section 49 allows Scottish Ministers to delegate any of their functions relating to the Register to such persons as they consider appropriate.

This provision requires further thought. The qualifications and training of the delegate, the method of appointment and removal and the powers which the delegate will exercise should be stated on the face of the Bill.

Section 50 amends the 2004 Act in respect of landlord registration where an agent is a registered letting agent.

Section 51 provides the definition of letting agency which means “things done by a person in the course of that person’s business in response to relevant instructions which are carried out with a view to a landlord who is a relevant person entering into or seeking to enter into a lease or occupancy arrangement by virtue of which an unconnected person may use the landlord’s house as:-
Section 51(1)(b) is very widely drafted and could include a number of people in the definition of those doing 'letting agency work' who are not actually letting property.

The Private Landlords and Letting and Management Agents (Deregulation) Bill contains a definition of letting agents work as follows:-

(a) things done by any person in the course of a business (including a business in which he is employed) pursuant to instructions received from another person (in this section referred to as “the client”) who wishes to let or have the letting of an interest in land managed (for example, the collection of rents on his behalf) –

(i) for the purpose of, or the view to, effecting the introduction to the client of a third person who wishes to let an interest in land; or

(ii) after such introduction has been effected in the course of that business, for the purpose of securing the letting of the interest in land; or

(iii) the for the purpose of, or with a view to, managing the letting of the interest in land on behalf of the client; or

(iv) for the purpose of, or with a view to, block management of interests in land; and

(b) management activities undertaken by any person in the course of a business (including a business in which he is employed) in connection with land or interests in land”.

This is a more comprehensive definition which might be (with appropriate modifications) more effective than the one in the Bill.

Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee

Wednesday 22 January 2014

[Housing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1]

The Convener (Maureen Watt): Good morning and welcome to the second meeting in 2014 of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. I remind everyone to switch off mobile phones and other such devices as they can affect the broadcasting system, but I note that some committee members will use their tablets to consult their papers. I also welcome Patrick Harvie to the meeting.

Adam Ingram will begin the questioning.

Adam Ingram (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP): Good morning, everyone. The Scottish Government's declared vision is "that all people in Scotland live in high quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs." To what extent do the bill's provisions support that vision?

David Bookbinder (Chartered Institute of Housing in Scotland): I am happy to kick off on that. A lot of areas in this wide-ranging bill will contribute to the improvement of housing and housing standards in the private rented sector, the owner-occupied sector and indeed the social sector. Only certain parts of it relate to physical standards, particularly in the owner-occupied and private rented sectors, but the overall issues with regard to rights, obligations and an improved housing system across the sectors are reflected in almost every part of the bill.

Rosemary Brotchie (Shelter Scotland): I thank the committee for the opportunity to give evidence. Shelter Scotland very much supports the bill's aims and feels that many of the measures will achieve them. However, as the session continues, members will note that a few concerns that we have about some areas will emerge, and we suggest that the committee might wish to look for certain areas to be strengthened. If you have had an opportunity to read our submission, you will have seen that there are a few areas—particularly the provision of temporary accommodation and permanent homes for people who have found themselves homeless, and safety standards in the private rented sector—where we think an opportunity to strengthen the bill has been missed.

Andy Young (Scottish Federation of Housing Associations): I thank the committee for inviting the SFHA to give evidence. We support the bill's broad aims and principles, but I agree with David Bookbinder that in general it deals with the management of tenancies rather than with supply, which is more linked to your question.

Alan Benson (Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations): On behalf of the forum, I thank the committee for the invitation to give evidence. Like others, we agree with the bill's general principles and think that it is certainly moving in the right direction. Housing bills do not come around very often, so when they do it is essential that we use them to deal with the real and difficult housing issues that still exist in Scotland.

I back up the other witnesses' comment that certain details still need to be addressed. We can discuss them later in the meeting but, as far as the private rented sector is concerned, the bill does not contain much to try to improve standards, which will be a major issue for the sector if it is increasingly to be used to help people in housing need.

Adam Ingram: I am sure that my colleagues will pick up on some of the issues that you have mentioned.

The Scottish Government expects one of the bill's main outcomes to be sustainable communities. Do you agree that its provisions support that outcome?

David Bookbinder: As the committee knows, the bill contains a number of measures to help landlords to have more flexibility on allocations and to deal more effectively with antisocial behaviour. Those provisions could be said to have the aim of helping to maintain sustainable and cohesive communities and we very much welcome them.

However, we should not overegg the extent to which the provisions on allocations and antisocial behaviour will dramatically change the situation. Social landlords already have good flexibility on allocations. The bill contains welcome clarification and minor amendments to the existing legislation. We very much welcome provisions such as that to allow landlords to take age into account when allocating housing, which is common sense.

No single measure on antisocial behaviour will change the world. Serious antisocial behaviour cases will always be tricky to deal with, but there are significant improvements that will help. Any way in which legislation can help landlords to deal with antisocial behaviour will contribute to happier and more settled communities.

Rosemary Brotchie: Adam Ingram's question pointed to management in the social rented sector. On achieving sustainable communities, David Bookbinder identified the antisocial behaviour measures in the bill. Shelter Scotland agrees that much more needs to be done to ensure that social landlords provide the best supply from a limited social stock, but we have concerns that the proposals on eviction processes could have negative consequences, given how they are defined in the bill.

We have concerns, but we agree that responses to antisocial behaviour should be strong, consistent and effective. We do not want any detrimental change to housing law that would affect tenancy rights as a knee-jerk reaction. We want to ensure that landlords can use the responses in the bill effectively.

Andy Young: David Bookbinder is right and I agree with him again. It is important to realise that the bill’s measures alone will not be a panacea for tackling antisocial behaviour, which will always require a multi-agency approach.

Alan Benson: Our forum represents community-based housing associations in Glasgow and the west of Scotland. We argue that we have provided sustainable and cohesive communities for the past 35 years or so. We feel under siege to an extent, because the major issue is that it is becoming more difficult to maintain those communities and all the good work that has happened. We would support anything that the bill can do to reverse that trend.

The rent payers in our communities are now expected to meet a lot of added costs that were not expected to be met in the past, such as the cost of maintaining waiting lists. That was a good idea in previous legislation, but it costs an organisation such as the one that I work for £6,000 a month. Perhaps that money could be better spent. Our organisation has 150 voids in a year, but 1,000 people are on our waiting list. It would be useful to debate that and consider how best existing resources can be used. However, the thrust of maintaining stable communities is good.

Adam Ingram: Are you content with how the Scottish Government’s consultation process was conducted? Do you have any issues with that?

David Bookbinder: The consultation was comprehensive. Various issues were covered in different consultation processes, such as the right to buy, social sector tenancies and allocations and the future of the private rented sector. By and large, we could not say that consultation has been lacking. However, there was no prior consultation on one or two measures that appear towards the end of the bill. I will not go into detail on that now, but it meant that some of us were not in a position to comment in detail on some of the newer provisions relating to, for example, the Scottish Housing Regulator. We need more time to look at such provisions, but thankfully there is more time between now and stage 2 in which to do that.

Rosemary Brotchie: I agree with David Bookbinder. Different Scottish Government teams consulted on different parts of the bill, so there was no single consultation. I echo the point that measures have appeared in the bill that we were perhaps not expecting as a result of the consultation process, and we need some time to consider them. That approach has meant that there are some additional measures that we would have promoted through the consultation process had we had the opportunity to do so. I hope that the committee will consider those issues at stages 1 and 2.

The Convener: What specific measures are you talking about?

Rosemary Brotchie: An example is that there was no opportunity during the consultation to raise particular issues around electrical safety in the private rented sector. We have also identified other matters on which we would have wanted to respond but that did not fit into any of the areas that were consulted on.

Andy Young: It is a fair point to say that some issues were not consulted on but, on a positive note, the consultation was very thorough on those issues that were consulted on, and our members were allowed to feed into the process.

Alan Benson: I echo that. Some of the views that our members expressed in the pre-legislative consultation were taken on board when it came to the drafting of the bill, so we were pleased with the process. Probationary tenancies is one such issue on which our members commented and that has not appeared in the bill, so someone must have listened to us during the pre-legislative process.

Adam Ingram: Thank you.

The Convener: As members have no further questions on that topic, I call Alex Johnstone, who has some questions on the right to buy.
Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): Abolishing the right to buy is a headline objective of the bill. What benefits will come from that?

David Bookbinder: The key benefit is supply. For reasons that everyone is familiar with, recent years have not seen as many sales as were made in the 1980s and 1990s. The certainty that abolishing right to buy will give local authorities, landlord local authorities and housing associations with regard to their strategic and business planning roles—they will know how much rental income they will have and how much stock they can use for allocations and homelessness—will be a huge benefit.

Ultimately, right to buy is an individual right, and it is difficult to use it in a strategic way. Its time in Scotland has very much come. Even if, as I said, sales are not enormously high at the moment, that could change, which would make greater inroads into removing supply. CIH Scotland believes that the measure is hugely welcome.

Alex Johnstone: Will you reduce the matter to simple numbers? How many vacancies do you expect to be created by the abolition of right to buy?

David Bookbinder: I do not have those figures.

Alex Johnstone: Those who are denied right to buy, for the most part, will continue to be tenants. A deep assumption in the argument is that abolishing right to buy would massively increase housing stock availability, so how many vacancies will be created by abolishing that right?

David Bookbinder: An oft-used argument in favour of right to buy is that a tenant who buys does not vacate the property, but if they had not bought, they might not have immediately vacated the property either. That is a short-term argument. The longer-term argument is a no-brainer—that supply is increased by maintaining council and housing association stock at its maximum.

I do not have figures to hand, but I would be happy to supply them. I think that the Scottish Government has already supplied figures in the policy memorandum that accompanies the bill. It is undoubtedly the case that abolition will have a beneficial impact on supply over the longer term.

Alex Johnstone: I think that the sales rate is currently about 1,000 a year in Scotland, but if we abolish right to buy, we will not create 1,000 vacancies a year. We will create a number that is very much smaller than that—if there are any, initially.

David Bookbinder: It is a longer-term move. As I said, if we look at the impact on supply over the longer term, there is no doubt about the contribution that right to buy has made to depriving councils and housing associations of the ability to house people in housing need.

Rosemary Brotchie: I agree with everything that David Bookbinder has said. I add that the issue is not just the volume of stock that is lost through right to buy but the types of homes that are lost. When I say “lost”, I mean lost from the social sector. We have often seen the most desirable and best maintained homes in the best areas—often homes with particular characteristics—sold to their tenants, so that they are no longer available to social tenants in the future. Being able to secure those properties for the future is important.

Andy Young: The long-term issue is important. A study was done a couple of years ago—off the top of my head, I cannot remember the names of the people who carried it out, but I can supply the details later—that revealed horror stories about ex-right-to-buy properties that are now in the private rented sector for rents approaching double what the social rent would be. The study suggested that, UK-wide, that is costing the public purse up to £2 billion a year in excess housing benefit. That is one of the longer-term issues that David Bookbinder referred to.

Alan Benson: Working for a housing association, I know that there are practical issues around right to buy in relation to trying to manage the business, as the asset base is at risk all the time. That is one of the issues that we are dealing with.

Alex Johnstone is right to say that abolishing the right to buy will not suddenly create 1,000 new vacancies every year because tenants will still be in those houses, but at least there will be no chance of those houses being lost to the sector over time.

As time has gone on, the issue from our perspective has been the discount. If people in our community want to buy a house that they have lived in at the full market value and become owner-occupiers, that is fine, but that is not what happens in reality. What happens is that the discount gets used and people move the property into the private rented sector and, as Andy Young said, double the rent. That problem has never been addressed over the past 30 years.

Alex Johnstone: The proposal to abolish right to buy includes a three-year notice period. When we discussed that with officials last week and asked them the reason for it, they cited human rights as one of the issues. Given that a right is being taken away, they believe that a three-year notice period is appropriate. What are your views... on the notice period? Do you believe that it is a human rights issue?

David Bookbinder: I am not a lawyer, but I think that there are probably human rights implications when an existing right is taken away. I can understand why ministers have been keen to ensure that they are acting reasonably in this situation so that tenants have a chance to plan ahead and consider their options.

We believe that a period of two years would enable tenants to consider whether they want to buy and to progress the purchase if they so wish, while still allowing the Government to be seen to act reasonably in terms of human rights. A period of two years rather than three would also give landlords more stability and certainty about future finances, and it would perhaps also limit the period in which there might be some peaking of sales. We believe that two years would be a reasonable period.

Rosemary Broatchie: The proposed notice period is excessive. I do not think that it is necessary to give tenants that long. It could be quite damaging, and not just from the point of view of the peaking of sales, which David Bookbinder mentioned. We also know—this has been evidenced before—that when the right to buy has been restricted or limited, companies out there almost prey on vulnerable tenants to persuade them to purchase the property when that might not be the right thing for them to do financially or in terms of their security. If we give people too long an opportunity to decide whether to purchase, we might see some detrimental effects on tenants.

We need to give people long enough to make an informed decision on whether to purchase their rented property, but three years is too long for that. We have suggested that six months to a year would be a reasonable period. A lot would also give landlords more stability and certainty about future finances, and it would perhaps also limit the period in which there might be some peaking of sales. We believe that two years would be a reasonable period.

Andy Young: It is probably worth pointing out that three quarters of the respondents to the consultation also thought that three years was too long. I agree with Shelter that a year seems more appropriate.

It puzzles me slightly that the Scottish Government seems to be a bit concerned about legal challenges to the provision. The situation with the right to buy is so complex and multilayered that there are lots of other situations within it that are probably more open to legal challenge than the notice period. For example, the right to buy for people who live in areas that have pressured area status has, in effect, ended. I would have thought that that would have provoked more of a chance of legal challenge.

Alan Benson: I echo what has been said. I am not a lawyer so I cannot comment on the human rights issue. However, I agree with what Rosemary Broatchie said on behalf of Shelter, which was that three years is too long. We reckon that the period should be one year, as we have said previously. The vast majority of our members feel that that is an appropriate timescale.

Alex Johnstone: As Andy Young pointed out, people who live in pressured areas will not get the right to buy unless that status is lifted prior to the end date. Does the bill adequately address the position in which individuals in pressured areas might find themselves? Is it necessary for the bill to look further at the situation of people who would like to buy but who live in pressured areas and will remain there until the right is gone?

Andy Young: To be honest, I do not think that you could legislate for every little connotation of the current right-to-buy situation. For me, it would be quicker and cleaner just to draw a line under it.

Alex Johnstone: Is there a danger that, if we try to legislate for every area, we will create anomalies that will then be exploited through the courts?

Andy Young: Possibly.

Rosemary Broatchie: Pressured area status has been brought in for a significant and important reason. On the point about the committee possibly undermining that by trying to alter the abolition, the consensus in the consultation was that the sooner the right to buy is ended, the better.

Alex Johnstone: I will come at the right to buy from an entirely different angle. Another issue is that, regardless of whether you approve of it, right to buy has been an income stream for social landlords—money has come in as a result of properties being sold. Will losing that income stream have any implications for social landlords?

Andy Young: It is likely that the worst affected will be the larger stock-transfer type of organisations. The indications are that the abolition of right to buy will have either a positive or a neutral effect, so the organisations are really not concerned about loss of receipts at all.

Rosemary Broatchie: I cannot comment on the landlords’ perspective on the issue. However, even if the right to buy is removed, landlords will still be able to sell if they choose to do so. Such sales will be planned sales; landlords will be able to plan for them and sell the stock that they think is appropriate for selling. If a landlord needs to raise income and considers that selling off stock is the best way to do that, they will not be precluded from doing it by the abolition of right to buy.

Alex Johnstone: Okay. Thank you very much.

The Convener: If you want to have a shorter notice period—a year, say, rather than three years—might there be any difficulties in that? Even if the period is three years, do you envisage a rush of tenants wanting to buy within that three years—or one year? Has there been any indication from tenants that that might be the case?

Andy Young: The honest answer is that we just do not know. There is always a danger that, if we make the notice period a year, there will be a stampede. I cannot see that happening in reality, but it is of course a risk—there is no question about it.

Rosemary Brotchie: As I said a few minutes ago, the committee will need to consider what an appropriate time is to allow people to take advice and consider the implications properly. The issues are not limited to the purchase price and the cost of the mortgage; they also include maintenance costs. Shelter Scotland sees cases in which people have bought rashly, without taking proper advice. They have not fully considered all the costs of running and maintaining an owned house, and they have got into difficulty and trouble later on.

We have spoken about the impact of the cost of houses in the private rented sector that were previously bought under the right to buy. There is a significant repair and maintenance implication with homes in blocks where some flats are owner occupied and others are owned by social landlords. Owners can potentially find themselves with very significant bills for common repairs, which they had not anticipated. We would encourage anybody who considers purchasing a right-to-buy property to take proper advice.

We are aware that a number of companies are pretty much urging people to buy before it is too late, and we want to limit the impact that such companies might have on tenants.

The Convener: What kind of companies?

Rosemary Brotchie: They persuade tenants—they facilitate a mortgage, potentially so that they can buy the property to let it out. That is called mortgage to rent: tenants are persuaded to purchase their property, which the company then purchases and lets back to the tenant. We have seen that problem in the past, and it can be seen across the owner-occupied sector.

The Convener: Would that situation be helped by reducing the notice time?

Rosemary Brotchie: Potentially, yes. If we allow a longer time period, there is potential for such companies to build up more of an inroad into tenants who may not be considering their options quite as carefully as we would like.

The Convener: As regards housing associations, and as far as borrowing and relationships with the banks are concerned, do you think that the right-to-buy measures will assist with the situation, as you will not have a depletion of your stock and assets?

Alan Benson: I said earlier that it is much easier to do our own internal business planning if we know that our asset base is not at risk. That is bound to help. Over the years, the right-to-buy numbers have reduced significantly, but it is still an issue for us: we want to be able to plan ahead, knowing the amount of stock that we have and budgeting accordingly. In that respect, the measure can only help.

The Convener: If there are no further questions on right to buy, we will move on to part 2 of the bill, on social housing.

Mark Griffin (Central Scotland) (Lab): What are the panel’s views on how the bill would amend the reasonable preference provisions in relation to allocation policy for social landlords?

David Bookbinder: It is a modest tinkering with the reasonable preference criteria. For many years now, very sensibly, the criteria have covered people coming out of homelessness and people living in unsatisfactory housing conditions—which include almost any kind of circumstance that people might find themselves in. Those criteria remain, with a very slight amendment to clarify that such people would of course have to be in housing need. There is also the welcome addition of people who are in social housing who are underoccupying, and we all understand the reasons for that.

The amendment to the reasonable preference criteria is modest and very sensible. It is not a radical change, but I do not think that any of us felt that there was a need for radical change.

Rosemary Brotchie: Shelter Scotland has long argued that the reasonable preference groups in the current legislation are outdated and out of sync with current social housing allocation practice. We therefore think that the move is positive, in that it will give landlords scope to prioritise groups in a way that reflects local need.

However, we want to ensure that the use of the provision is monitored. The Scottish Housing Regulator or groups such as Shelter Scotland should keep an eye on how the reasonable preference categories are being identified locally, to ensure that housing need is being met on an on-going basis.

Andy Young: David Bookbinder nailed it when he said that the effect should not be overegged. In practice, we do not think that the measure will make an awful lot of difference to housing association allocation policies.

Alan Benson: We agree that the measure is a modest change. However, the term “unmet housing needs” in the bill could do with a bit of clarification.

Mark Griffin: I think that we all understand the reason for including the provision on underoccupied properties, which is to do with the effect that there is on many tenants. However, will the removal from the existing criteria of large families and overcrowded properties have a negative impact on some larger families or people who are struggling in houses that are too small for their needs?

David Bookbinder: No, not at all. A large family might not in itself be in any housing need. If such a family is in housing need, I believe that the situation will be covered, because I cannot imagine an allocation policy that would not include overcrowding under the criterion of unsatisfactory housing conditions. Therefore, in practice, I do not see that change making any difference.

As Rosemary Brotchie alluded to, it is fairly outdated to have large families as an isolated category in the reasonable preference provisions because, in itself, that has no relation to housing need. I am sure that, if such a household is in housing need, it will be covered by the allocations policy under unsatisfactory housing.

Mark Griffin: The bill gives the Scottish ministers the power to make regulations on the categories of people that should be included in allocation policies. Is that power necessary and, if so, what categories of people should be specified?

Rosemary Brotchie: The three key groups that are currently identified in legislation are homeless households, those living in unsatisfactory living conditions and, as we said, those with unmet housing need. That covers the broad range of people who would be given any kind of reasonable preference. However, I echo the point that the term “unmet housing needs” is a little woolly and could do with clarification.

Mark Griffin: The bill will allow social landlords, for the first time, to take into account an applicant’s age, although that cannot affect the overall policy to give priority to certain household types. What are the panel’s views on that? How could that assist in allocations?

David Bookbinder: I will unashamedly go first on that question, because CIH Scotland specifically sought the measure.

Over the years, local authority and housing association landlords have told us that if, for instance, they wanted to house five or six older households in a group of non-specialist ground-floor houses, where the location seemed particularly suitable and for other sensitive allocations reasons it seemed the right thing to do, they could not lawfully do that—they could not say that those five or six houses would go only to older people.

We therefore think that the measure is genuinely sensible, especially taken alongside the bill’s strong reminder that all landlords have to comply with equalities legislation, which means that they cannot discriminate against any group, whether that is younger people or other groups. We are pleased with the measure.

Rosemary Brotchie: This might be one of the few areas in the bill on which there will be disagreement. We do not agree that the measure is necessary. It was not consulted on, so we did not have the opportunity to respond to it in the consultation process.

We think that the current legislative framework already allows sufficient flexibility for landlords to take such issues into account where there is a real need for them to be taken into account. The fundamental principle of social housing allocation should be that it is based on a framework of need and the circumstances that households are in, not on the characteristics of households. The homelessness legislation and the 2012 commitment made that change in principle, and we would not want to see the characteristics of households being used as a reason for preferring one group over another in housing allocation.

As David Bookbinder said, it is not the policy intention that the allocation rules could be used in a discriminatory way, and we want to be certain that they are not used in a discriminatory way. We do not see any reason to have age listed in the bill as a specific reason for allocations being made.

Andy Young: Consideration of age should help with sensitive lettings and it should help to avoid what we might call lifestyle clashes. However, because age is a protected characteristic, as was said, I wonder how the provision will operate in practice.

That is partly what I meant when I talked about the Government seeming to be frightened of a legal challenge in relation to the three-year notice period. With that in mind, it is a little contradictory to include in the bill the measure on taking age into account, which I think is wide open to legal challenge at some point.
That said, I understand why the measure was included and we support it, although in practice I wonder how readily it will be used.

Alan Benson: We support the measure. I think that it concurs with the proposals that we put forward in the Government’s pre-legislative consultation. The new provision would help social landlords to make greater use of sensitive lettings and promote greater tenant sustainability. We think that it is a good measure.

Mark Griffin: I have one last question. Do you have any comments on the bill’s provisions relating to qualifying periods for joint tenancies, subletting, assignations and successions?

David Bookbinder: We are pleased to see those provisions. Without over dramatising the extent to which abuse occurs in those areas, I suggest that most landlords have experienced cases of people who move in the day before a relative dies or something like that. The protection measure is therefore welcome.

The measure that gives the landlord an ability to refuse an assignation when the person who would benefit is not in housing need must be welcomed at a time when social housing is in such short supply. We also very much welcome, in the provisions for succession, assignation and so on, the requirement for the prospective beneficiary of succession or assignation to have told the landlord at the time that they were moving in that, from that point, they lived there. That is a significant measure.

Andy Young: Despite the perception, queue jumping is probably not as widespread as some people might think. That said, it is right that loopholes should be closed. I am pretty sure that our two organisations wanted to go further when it came to assignation: we wanted to remove the tenant’s right to assign a tenancy and, instead, confer a power on the landlord to allow assignation if necessary. Nevertheless, we agree with all the provisions.

The Convener: Let us move on to antisocial behaviour as it is dealt with in part 2.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): I have some questions about the Scottish secure tenancy.

The bill contains provisions that would allow landlords to create a short SST or convert an SST to a short SST when the tenant or applicant has a history of antisocial behaviour. Do you think that the proposals are appropriate and proportionate?

Rosemary Brotchie: Shelter Scotland certainly believes that antisocial behaviour, which we know can blight communities and cause misery and distress to individuals and neighbours, should be tackled quickly and effectively. However, we have concerns about the way in which section 8 is drafted—particularly about what constitutes antisocial behaviour, as it is defined—and about what evidence would be required for antisocial behaviour to result in somebody losing their tenancy or security of tenure.

We want to ensure that, to be effective, that section of the bill ensures that there are sufficient checks and balances so that the provisions cannot be used inappropriately and would not unfairly penalise vulnerable tenants.

David Bookbinder: I think that the measures are proportionate. Social landlords are heavily regulated, of course. It is a question of whether the system and the law trust landlords to use measures sensitively.

The exasperation that is felt by most landlords whom we come across is usually to do with long-standing and very difficult cases, not isolated incidents in which somebody is causing too much noise, for example. We are talking about protracted cases that have gone on for a long time, perhaps because of a lack of witnesses or a lack of satisfactory evidence as a result of people being afraid to come forward.

The measures do not in any way solve all those issues, but they give landlords additional options. We strongly believe that landlords have an interest in using the measures only when they really want to and when they have struggled to take action, and that they will protect the majority of tenants who live around the property in question from extreme distress and upset.

Any consideration of antisocial behaviour measures should involve consideration not only of the impact on the alleged perpetrator’s rights but of the impact on the rights of people who live around and in the community to enjoy their property peacefully.

Andy Young: I do not necessarily disagree with Shelter Scotland. Clarity on what antisocial behaviour is and what the evidence test is for going through the process would be welcome—we flagged that issue up at quite an early stage in the consultation. That said, we agree with the measure.

Alan Benson: We agree that giving more flexibility to landlords is a good thing, but the briefing note that we have issued to our members says that one consequence of the bill is to talk through the implementation issues with housing staff. Some practicalities of how such a power would be used in practice have to be worked through. We have a fair way to go to bottom that out.

Mary Fee: If the Government produced guidance on how that particular provision should be used, would you like to see anything in particular in it? Does the guidance need to be quite specific and detailed about what evidence can be used and the length of time that people need to go back in examining the evidence?

Rosemary Brotchie: We would certainly be interested in seeing whether there will be a check or balance in the primary legislation to identify what the burden of proof would be to penalise somebody under section 8. That is not to say that we do not take antisocial behaviour very seriously, but the means to address it should be effective and should not create unintended consequences.

David Bookbinder: We would favour advisory good practice guidance that, for instance, gives examples of behaviour that it might be appropriate and might not be appropriate to take into account. Legislating for every single circumstance in the bill or in regulations would be very risky.

I will give a quick example, if I may. A measure in the bill suggests that, in respect of somebody possibly being suspended from receiving a housing offer because of antisocial behaviour, the ministers will have the power in regulations to set the maximum period that people can be suspended for—it seems perfectly reasonable that ministers could do that—and to set how far back a landlord can go in considering the behaviour that has taken place.

Again, we think that the issue is a matter of good practice. CIH has good practice guidance out on suspensions, and there are situations in which it would not be reasonable for landlords to go back many years and penalise somebody for behaviour a long time ago. However, if you legislate for that—by, for example, naming on the face of the bill or in regulations the maximum period that landlords can go back—you are legislating for something that we think would be better left to landlords’ discretion, because there might always be odd cases in which it is appropriate to go back a decent amount of time. We have to be careful not to overlegislate for every type of circumstance when it comes to antisocial behaviour.

Rosemary Brotchie: We need a slightly stronger definition in the bill. Just as we can use such an example to show how such a measure could be unfair to landlords, we could probably point to an equivalent example in which such a measure could be used to unfairly penalise a tenant. We have to accept that people can reform and improve their behaviour over time.

We also have to acknowledge that the bill sets the definition very broadly—it could include somebody who is just living in that household, not the tenant themselves. It could even include somebody who is just visiting the household. There is a concern that the definition might be open to misuse and might be used inappropriately in some circumstances.

Mary Fee: The bill also makes provision for protection for tenants who are on short SSTs. Is any other protection required for tenants who are on short SSTs, or are you content that what is in the bill is adequate?

Rosemary Brotchie: We certainly welcome those measures, particularly the increase in the period of time for which somebody can have an SSST, which enables them to have the support that is required to progress to a full, secure tenancy.

Andy Young: A landlord having to give a tenant a reason for ending a short tenancy is a positive move as well.

Alan Benson: Yes.

Mary Fee: Thank you.

The Convener: I will go back to the earlier discussion on taking into account an applicant’s age. Is it correct that allocations could previously be made in terms of age? As MSPs, one of the major issues that we deal with is antisocial behaviour when younger people have been moved into a block that was traditionally a block for older people. Is being able to allocate based on an applicant’s age going back to what used to happen?

David Bookbinder: For as long as I can remember, it has not been possible to take age into account when allocating. I would have to double-check and get back to the committee on whether that was because of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 or the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001. I rather think that it goes back to the 1987 act, but I will happily clarify that for the committee. The age-related provision in the bill will remove that prohibition on taking age into account.

Rosemary Brotchie: You may be thinking of a situation, convener, in which landlords can already make decisions about how they allocate their property because of the type of property that it is. Clearly, if landlords have a block of adapted property or property with particular characteristics that make it more suitable for particular types of occupants, they can already distinguish people from others on a waiting list and allocate them to that property if it is suitable. As I said before, I think that there is already sufficient flexibility in allocations and that the addition of age as a category is therefore not required.

David Bookbinder: The existing provision that Rosemary Brotchie refers to relates to accommodation that is specially designed—for older people, for example. The whole idea of the new provision is to enable a degree of flexibility in relation to mainstream, ordinary accommodation that is not specially designed. That is where the barrier is at the moment.

The Convener: On the antisocial behaviour proposals, do you think that tenancy agreements will be written up differently or rewritten to be more specific about what constitutes antisocial behaviour in the view of the landlord?

Andy Young: Possibly. It depends on what comes out at the end of this process: I think that the tenancy agreement will be based on whatever guidance you give to us.

On your previous question, convener, I go back further than David Bookbinder and you are right—councils and housing associations used to advertise blocks for the over-55s, for example. That seemed to be common. I am not too sure quite what happened when someone turned from 54 to 55 years old—although I am about to find out. Landlords could not do that now under the Equality Act 2010, so we cannot turn the clock back.

Gordon MacDonald (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP): I will continue on the subject of antisocial behaviour. The bill intends to make evictions simpler in cases in which an individual has been convicted of illegal activity that affects the community. How will that address some of the problems that social landlords currently experience when they seek to evict tenants who have a Scottish secure tenancy and who have been convicted of antisocial behaviour?

David Bookbinder: That particular provision about eviction after conviction will apply only in a small number of cases. The cases in which it could apply are likely to be protracted and difficult ones in which a criminal case is being built up at the same time as the landlord is trying to build a case to recover the property. Generally, those would be very serious cases. The landlord will often struggle in that situation, because witnesses can be afraid to come forward. If there is a conviction in those cases, it will help. So we should not exaggerate the number of cases in which the measure will help, but the cases in question are usually quite serious.

The wording of the provision means that, in theory, a landlord, if so motivated, could choose to evict someone who has been convicted for a relatively minor offence that does not harm or distress other people, such as a small possession of drugs case that does not involve anyone else. The CIH feels that landlords are not interested in using the provision to evict that kind of person, but they are interested in using it for long-running and serious cases in which other people have been harmed significantly and for a long time.

Rosemary Brotchie: Shelter Scotland absolutely understands why landlords are seeking the change, and why MSPs might support it, but we urge a bit of caution. David Bookbinder talked about the ability to assess the nature of the offence. To take away sheriffs’ ability to assess reasonableness in the pursuit of an eviction would be a significantly detrimental measure. We argue strongly that a sheriff should still have the option of considering reasonableness in considering an eviction under the power.

For certain types of offence or certain characteristics of the person whose eviction is sought, an eviction might not be reasonable. Part of the reform of a person or of someone changing their behaviour might be to maintain a secure and stable home. We therefore recommend that reasonableness is retained and potentially that tenants should have a right of appeal against such evictions.

Andy Young: I point out that social landlords’ record on evictions has improved significantly in the past three or four years. We are not in the business of evicting people; it just does not make any sense at all on any level. Obviously, I disagree with Shelter on that.

I understand the point about reasonableness, but my understanding is that a sheriff would still have to consider proportionality, if not reasonableness, which is more of an issue in such cases. It might be worth checking that out—perhaps we can come back to the committee on the issue.

Alan Benson: The measure in the bill is welcome, but we are talking about a very small number of cases. There is a wider discussion to be had about what social housing providers can do in the general context of antisocial behaviour and criminality. There might be a concern that everything seems to be falling at the door of the landlord. The interface with the police and other services is important.

Although the measure is welcome, ultimately, we always see eviction as a failure. The main issue for landlords is that there should be levers that ensure that people engage with us, because if people engage with us properly a lot of issues can be prevented. However, there are extreme cases in which landlords have no alternative but to seek recovery.

Gordon MacDonald: On the small number of cases in which eviction must take place, the Legal Services Agency said in its written submission:

“The general view of the solicitors commenting on the Bill is that we have grave concerns concerning the balance of rights and powers adopted particularly to those accused, or guilty of, anti-social conduct or behaviour.”

It went on to say:
“All are entitled to somewhere to live and should not be pushed into a homeless underclass. Where are they to go?”

Does the proposed power strike the correct balance between the rights of tenants and landlords?

Rosemary Brotchie: I concur with what the agency said, to the extent that people who are convicted of a criminal act and whose conviction might lead to a prison sentence will need somewhere to live when their sentence ends. There is a significant problem in Scotland with homelessness among people who come out of prison. We need to consider the longer-term implications of the approach.

We need to get the balance right between the rights of neighbours and communities, given the impact that antisocial behaviour has on them, and the rights of individual tenants who might have perpetrated antisocial behaviour. Landlords are often in a tricky situation in that regard. We want to ensure that the balance does not swing one way or the other and that the right checks and balances are put in place, to ensure that the courts can make an assessment on an eviction case in such circumstances.

David Bookbinder: If members were discussing this issue with a group of tenants who had, over a long period, been affected and had their lives blighted by serious and intimidatory antisocial behaviour, it would not be satisfactory to say, “Look, we could do something, but we would just be moving the problem somewhere else.” That is not a satisfactory response to such tenants.

Gordon MacDonald: The CIHS said in its submission:

“Serious ASB will always be very challenging to deal with, as in most cases there are few, if any, speedy remedies.”

What impact is the bill likely to have on social landlords’ ability to tackle antisocial behaviour? Will the bill help to tackle the causes of antisocial behaviour?

David Bookbinder: I am not sure that the bill seeks to tackle the causes of antisocial behaviour. As Alan Benson suggested, there are wider issues, which are to do with how people behave and how other agencies, not least the police, deal with antisocial behaviour.

Overall, the measures are welcome. There will be some additional tools for landlords. However, we live in a society in which—quite rightly—someone is innocent until proven guilty. It is exasperating for tenants to find that landlords cannot suddenly remove an alleged perpetrator from their property, but of course that cannot happen. We have strong tenancy rights, particularly in Scotland.

The bill contains measures that will help landlords. However, in the publicity that surrounds the bill as it goes through its stages and becomes law, let us not overegg to the public the extent to which it will help landlords to solve every antisocial behaviour case quickly, because that probably will not happen.

Rosemary Brotchie: It is evident that antisocial behaviour is not a tenure-based issue; it is found across all housing tenures. We talked about the impact of the right to buy on the creation of mixed communities. There are instances of antisocial behaviour blighting communities where there are private landlords or owner-occupiers. We want to give social landlords proportionate and effective powers to deal with antisocial behaviour, but the problem is not about housing; it is about how people behave in society.

We need a strong response, with significant and appropriate powers to deal with such situations; we also need to consider what support can be provided to individuals and communities. Landlords should give just as much consideration to that as they give to how they can end tenancies in such situations.

Andy Young: To be honest, landlords see their relationship with agencies such as the police as far more important and influential in dealing with antisocial behaviour than anything that is in the bill.

Alan Benson: I reiterate that it is good that the bill might provide additional tools for landlords, but the basis for that should always be to allow us to engage with people who carry out antisocial behaviour and with other agencies that can support us to find a suitable remedy.

As we said in our written evidence, we know of cases in which tenancies have been recovered. What happens is that the problem is moved within the same area to the private rented sector. Rather than the remedy being to recover the housing, it would be much better if the behaviour was tackled. From our perspective, perhaps there are unrealistic expectations of what housing providers can do.

We need an interface with other agencies, and their full support. As a housing association director, I hear all the time about the bun fight on whether the problem is a police one or a housing one. There is not enough co-ordinated and joined-up work to deal with such issues without the recourse of recovering the tenancy.
The Convener: We will move on to part 3, which is on private rented housing.

Jim Eadie (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP): The bill makes provision to transfer certain types of civil court actions in relation to the private rented sector from the jurisdiction of the sheriff court to the jurisdiction of what will be a newly established first-tier tribunal. What are your views on that? Will it significantly improve the quality of and access to justice for landlords and tenants?

Rosemary Brotchie: We have certainly recommended that and supported it strongly. Over the past 10 years, we have seen a continuing problem with access to justice for private tenants and, indeed, landlords in the sector. The private rented sector now houses a significant number of households across Scotland—double the number that it was 10 years ago—and we know that 26 per cent of tenants in the private rented sector have children. Increasingly, the sector houses people for much longer periods; it is becoming less about providing transitional tenancies.

There are big problems with private renting. There are conflicts between landlords and tenants and unresolved issues, particularly around repairs. We think that access to justice is a significant problem for tenants, who might want to improve the condition of their tenancy or challenge their landlord in certain circumstances. We would welcome the introduction of a private rented sector tribunal to try to overcome some of the problems that have been with the court system in the past little while.

David Bookbinder: I echo everything that Rosemary Brotchie said and add that all the advantages that a tribunal system would bring to the private rented sector, including that it would be less adversarial and more user friendly, would apply equally if we had a tribunal system in the social sector. I realise that that is a bigger issue, but if you were going to come on to that—

Jim Eadie: We are coming straight on to that, but first I would like to hear the panel’s views on the transfer of jurisdiction in the private rented sector, please.

Andy Young: I do not think that I can add anything to what Rosemary Brotchie said on that, but we want some sort of full housing tribunal pilot that deals with social cases, too.

Alan Benson: We think that that would be a sensible measure.

Jim Eadie: That brings us seamlessly on to the next point, which is about extending the tribunal system to the social rented sector. The Chartered Institute of Housing has made the case that the transfer to the first-tier tribunal should apply also to the social rented sector. Can you outline your reasons for that and, if you have costed that proposal, say what the cost implications of such a move would be?

David Bookbinder: It would be a much greater move in terms of volume and cost. We are not arguing that the bill should be amended to take on board social sector cases, because we appreciate that a lot of costing work would need to be done. However, it is hard to find an advantage of the first-tier tribunal that does not apply across the sectors. We are aware that some changes will be made to the sheriff court system in the coming years and we acknowledge that the Scottish Government would want to consider the impact of those changes on the system, whether they reduce delays and whether the system can be made more user friendly. We are simply asking that the option to apply the tribunal system to the social sector is not closed off forever.

Rosemary Brotchie: I do not disagree with anything that David Bookbinder has said. As I said, we supported the move to take private sector cases out of the sheriff court as the first stepping stone, particularly because there is such a degree of unmet need for dispute resolution in the private rented sector. Tenants and landlords avoid it as far as possible. We see the consequences of that in the way that the private rented sector works at the moment. We know that repairs cases are not dealt with as effectively as they might be because access to the PRHP is perhaps not as easy as it should be for tenants—

Jim Eadie: Will you explain what PRHP stands for?

Rosemary Brotchie: I beg your pardon—it is the Private Rented Housing Panel, which is an existing tribunal specifically for dealing with repairs cases. One of the reasons for that is that tenants do not have the security of tenure that they might need in order to pursue such cases. Although we welcome the introduction of the tribunal for private rented sector cases, we think that it should be accompanied by increased security of tenure for tenants to enable them to use the new access to justice most effectively.

Jim Eadie: I want to be clear about what you mean by that. Are you saying that the scope of the tribunal should be extended?

Rosemary Brotchie: Do you mean in terms of the social rented sector?

Jim Eadie: Yes.

Rosemary Brotchie: That is certainly something to look at in future but, in the first instance, private rented sector cases should be the priority, and the new tribunal should be accompanied by an increase in security of tenure... for tenants, to enable them to use that access to justice most effectively.

Andy Young: I would not argue with anything that has been said. I particularly agree with what David Bookbinder said. We talked earlier about access to justice. One of the biggest complaints to me from our members is about swift access to justice. The current sheriff court system appears to be unfit for purpose in respect of social housing cases.

Alan Benson: Andy Young just stole my thunder. I was just going to say that the current system, as it applies to the social rented sector, is not fit for purpose. In fact, it penalises tenants. I look at spreadsheets all the time, and see rent arrears cases where the legal fees are as high as the rent arrears because of the length of time that the processes take. That issue should be looked at seriously in future. Since the Scottish Parliament was re-established, there has been a lot of talk about whether there should be a housing court to deal with some of those issues. The current sheriff court system is definitely not fit for purpose.

Jim Eadie: Ms Brotchie, you mentioned the Private Rented Housing Panel. Sections 23 to 25 of the bill make provision to expand access to the panel by enabling third-party applications by local authorities to enforce the repairing standard, which is the condition standard and legal obligation that landlords have to meet in order to rent out their property. I presume that you agree with that but, in responding to the point, could you refer to your earlier comments about the bill perhaps being in need of strengthening in relation to safety and electrical safety?

Rosemary Brotchie: Certainly. You are right that we support the proposal for third-party reporting. The number of cases that are taken to the PRHP by tenants to challenge their landlord over the basic condition of the property is minuscule in comparison with what we know is significant disrepair throughout the private rented sector. Shelter sees cases every day. Some of the most significant things that people call us about are problems of disrepair and damp with their private rented property. Sometimes, those problems are severe and significant.

Tenants in such situations often do not want to challenge their landlord, because they fear retaliatory eviction and will not take them to a tribunal if they have only a six-month short assured tenancy. In some cases, tenants might get only a month’s notice if that secure period has ended. To deal with disrepair in the private rented sector, local authorities must have powers to take action against private landlords in such circumstances. However, the powers must not be implemented in a way that creates conflict between the landlord and the tenant and inadvertently leads to the ending of a tenancy, which, as I have said, is a much bigger problem.

Private tenants’ security of tenure is just not good enough to allow the sector to improve and to continue to meet housing need as it is at the moment. In short, although we welcome the introduction of third-party reporting, we believe that we need to consider what happens to tenants in those circumstances and whether they will be forced to move on from their tenancy.

We also ask the committee to consider strengthening the bill with the introduction of stronger regulation of electrical and, in particular, carbon monoxide safety in privately rented homes. Provisions on increasing electrical safety standards in the private rented sector might be considered, but we would also like the committee to consider the possibility of making the installation of carbon monoxide monitors or alarms mandatory for all private tenants.

Jim Eadie: That was helpful, but I want to understand where you think the gap in the bill is so that we can address it. The Private Rented Housing Panel can issue repairing standard enforcement orders to ensure that landlords bring properties up to the appropriate standard. As I have said, that is a legal obligation. Would not that be the mechanism for ensuring that the additional electrical safety standards that you have mentioned are met?

Rosemary Brotchie: Absolutely. However, although such orders are the mechanism for achieving standards, we are also looking for additions to the repairing standard to cover the specific issues of electrical safety and carbon monoxide alarms, in order to prevent unnecessary deaths.

Jim Eadie: Could that be achieved through an amendment?

Rosemary Brotchie: It certainly could.

Jim Eadie: We look forward to seeing such an amendment. Do the other panel members have anything to add?

Alan Benson: The repairing standard is very basic; we concur that it needs to be strengthened for the private rented sector. A parallel can be drawn with the social rented sector, which has to comply with the Scottish housing quality standard and for which a whole system of regulation is in place. That is absolutely fine, but the fact that the private rented sector has no equivalent must be addressed urgently. After all, the crisis in the quality of housing lies in the private sector and not in the social rented sector.

David Bookbinder: Over the past couple of years, CIHS and a number of other housing... bodies have been working closely with the Electrical Safety Council on trying to get better electrical safety standards reflected in the repairing standard, including regular safety checks by qualified persons. We realise that the fact that such a provision has not been consulted on creates issues for the Scottish Government, but we very much want the Government and Parliament to keep the matter in mind, so we ask—if it is not possible to put such a measure in the bill—that it be considered at the earliest possible opportunity thereafter.

On the very welcome move with regard to third-party reporting to the Private Rented Housing Panel, if, unfortunately, a tenant has to move on either because of difficulties or because they simply have to—of course, I echo Rosemary Brotchie’s hope that it does not lead to that—the local authority will, if it so wishes, still be able to pursue action through the power. That course of action does not exist at the moment, so I welcome the proposal in the bill to ensure that a tenant’s moving on does not stop the local authority pursuing the landlord.

Rosemary Brotchie: We mentioned just now the difference between repair in the private rented sector and in the social sector. I agree with most of those points, but we also seek a strengthening of the right of tenants who are placed in temporary accommodation to access to good-quality accommodation and good standards. That would be a simple amendment to an existing regulation that provides measures on unsuitable accommodation for certain categories of tenants who are placed in temporary accommodation. It should be extended to cover the condition of the accommodation in which they are placed.

Jim Eadie: I received a petition from Shelter Scotland before Christmas on that issue, so I am aware of it and look forward to further discussions on it.

Do the witnesses have an opinion on the Scottish Government’s view, as outlined at paragraph 131 of the policy memorandum, that “Proposals for court reform ... and increased use of mediation will provide the opportunity to improve outcomes for social sector cases while they remain with the courts”?

David Bookbinder: I think that that is a reference to reforms of the civil court system. The jury is out—if you will excuse the pun—on what the impact of the changes will be. CIHS has always been a supporter of mediation where that is appropriate; I am sure that every organisation that is represented here is, too. There are, of course, cases in which mediation might be particularly difficult. The idea of mediation is that people volunteer for it rather than their being coerced into it, so it will not be appropriate for every case. However, more use of mediation and reform of the court system can help the social sector

Andy Young: Mediation is a useful tool; there is no doubt about that. It is also well used in the social sector. However, access to mediation is a bit of a problem at the moment; I understand that it is quite patchy throughout Scotland, which should be examined.

Patrick Harvie (Glasgow) (Green): I am sure that I am by no means alone among members in seeing an increase in the volume of issues that are raised with me in relation to the private rented sector, so I appreciate the opportunity to contribute to the committee’s discussions.

There has been a general welcome for the bill’s measures on the private rented sector. Do the witnesses have views about areas in which the bill could have gone a little further? Rosemary Brotchie mentioned security of tenure; the bill could have addressed that. We know that the Government is undertaking some further work and there could be moves down the line, after the bill is passed.

From the issues that constituents have raised with me, it seems to me that the vulnerability that insecure tenure creates is most damaging when it also relates to other issues. That might be the small minority of illegal evictions, harassment and aggressive or threatening behaviour by landlords, or the much more common things that would never—to be realistic—go to a panel or tribunal because people just put up with them, such as minor repairs not being done. It could relate to the proliferation of alternative ways of getting around the tenancy deposit scheme, failure to comply with that or using so-called advance rent to replace deposits. It could also relate to discrimination against housing benefit claimants in the private rented sector.

Would the witnesses like the Government to take additional measures or make further progress in the bill, or in policy at the same time?

Rosemary Brotchie: I am a member of the Government review group that has been mentioned, which is considering how the private rented sector tenancy currently operates. That group’s considerations so far have identified a very significant range of problems in how the tenancy works for landlords and for tenants.

One of the conclusions to which we are coming—I do not speak for the group; this is my point of view—is that the current tenancy regime is working very informally. In the vast majority of cases, tenancies are not set up correctly and the protections that should exist for landlords and tenants are not properly enforced. In fact, because landlords and tenants do not choose to use the court system because of all the reasons that we have just mentioned, most often, tenancies are ended with a no-fault ground at the end of the period.

Tenants themselves tend not to want to pursue the landlord or to seek changes or improvements to their property; they would rather just move on. It is a fluid and transitory sector. It does not need to be, however. Many people rent from private landlords because they want the flexibility to stay for a few months and then to move into owner occupation or move on. Sometimes, they want to try out an area. It is absolutely not the case that we want to see the end of that. Security of tenure does not necessarily mean recreating a longer-term sector.

However, we want security of tenure to exist so that tenants who face problems can challenge their landlords. If they wished to do so and if their doing so were appropriate, they could turn to the local authority for help. It is to some extent a matter of rebalancing the power between landlords and tenants in such situations.

Patrick Harvie: On some of the other issues that I mentioned, such as failure to comply with the tenancy deposit scheme, we know that the Government is not able to put a figure on compliance, but I am sure that Shelter will be aware of many cases of landlords or letting agents working their way round the provisions by claiming not to be charging a deposit, although they are in fact charging a deposit in all but name. Are there provisions that we could be considering that would improve the operation of existing systems that are not working as they were intended to work?

Rosemary Brotchie: Yes. The onus is on the tenant to take the landlord to court over non-protection of their deposit, and the penalty on the landlord is up to three times the deposit. There is almost an incentive for tenants to pursue such cases, but not many of them take that action. That being moved to the tribunal would be very welcome, but we would be interested to consider other options for addressing that problem.

Patrick Harvie: Do you have concerns about discrimination in the private rented sector against housing benefit claimants now, or about how that might increase with the housing benefit changes that are coming through? Is there anything that we could be doing to address that issue?

Rosemary Brotchie: I, as you and everybody else round the able has, have over the past few months heard of cases of landlords deciding wholesale not to accept tenants who are in receipt of housing benefit. That is not a new problem; it has existed many times in the past. I am sure that everybody is familiar with adverts saying “No DSS”.

We are concerned about the availability of private rented accommodation at the levels that people on housing benefits can afford. There will be continuing uncertainty, as we move towards the introduction of universal credit, among landlords who might not be prepared to take the risk. We are certainly concerned about the situation, and we would welcome measures to try to address it.

David Bookbinder: CIH Scotland and CIH across the UK are concerned at reports of private landlords pulling people who are in receipt of housing benefit out of housing. It is hard to see how any Government can legislate to tell people who to house and who not to house. One obvious reaction from us is that, if more people are going to be excluded from the private rented sector who might have turned to it in the past, that increases the importance of there being an improved supply of social sector houses. The current target is to build 4,000 a year. I know that times are difficult, but the more we can do to increase that target, the more we can offer an option to people who may not now have the private rented sector to turn to.

The Convener: We have touched on the subject of letting agents, and there has already been legislation concerning them. Do you agree that regulation of letting agents is required? If so, why?

Rosemary Brotchie: We whole-heartedly agree that regulation of letting agents is necessary. I do not know of anybody who does not agree with that. Even the sector itself is calling for regulation.

We get a disproportionate number of calls to our helpline from tenants who are having problems with their letting agent. As you may know, we have been running a campaign over the past little while on charging of unlawful fees to tenants by letting agents. However, that is not the only problem that we see. Some letting agents engage in a wide range of management practices that are counterproductive to ensuring that there is a secure and stable private-sector experience for tenants.

We would like regulation of letting agents and we want to ensure that it is effective and, especially, that there are sufficient powers to enforce change in the sector. As we have seen with landlord registration, it is all very well to have a list, but we need to ensure that regulation has teeth and can enforce change in practice among agents in practice.

The Convener: How do you propose the regulatory regime should work in practice?

Rosemary Brotchie: The proposal in the bill is that the Scottish Government will set up a register of letting agents and that, to be accepted on to it, an agent will have to accept a code of practice and pass a fit-and-proper-person test. The nature of the code of practice and the dispute resolution that will surround it need to be looked at carefully to ensure that they will be effective.

The Convener: Do you believe that provision needs to be beefed up, over and above what is in the bill?

Rosemary Brotchie: We do not know the detail of what will be in the code of practice because that is for secondary legislation, but we will be interested to see what it covers. On dispute resolution, again the bill introduces powers rather than sets out in detail how it is will operate. We encourage the committee to look for assurances from the Government about how dispute resolution will operate in practice.

The Convener: Would you expect to be consulted on that?

Rosemary Brotchie: Yes, we certainly would.

The Convener: Okay.

We move on to part 5, which is on mobile home sites with permanent residents. Does anyone have any comments on that? Perhaps only Shelter will want to comment.

Rosemary Brotchie: I do not have any detailed comments on the provisions in the bill, I am afraid. We acknowledge that there is a need for reform and we are glad that the Government is acting on that need.

The Convener: Does Shelter get calls from people on mobile home sites?

Rosemary Brotchie: We get such calls occasionally. Park homes are not a big concern. In rural Scotland, there is a problem with people living in caravans on unlicensed sites, but that is not what part 5 of the bill covers.

The Convener: Okay. Part 6 is on private housing conditions, on which we have already touched, in particular in relation to local authorities’ ability to pay a missing share and recoup that from the private part of a block, usually. Do you have any views on the provisions on that?

David Bookbinder: I merely say that it appears that there are welcome clarifications or modest amendments to the existing powers. Probably, the broader issue here is not so much a legislative one but a question of what resources hard-pressed local authorities are able to use to exercise the powers. Money is usually involved, which presents challenges for local authorities at any time, and especially at present. However, that is not something that the bill can tackle.

The Convener: We will certainly ask about that when we have the local authority representatives in.

Do you have any comments about the bill’s miscellaneous provisions? Are there any other issues that you want to raise, while you have the chance?

Rosemary Brotchie: There is an area that has not come up in which we would like to see an additional power that is not currently in the bill. What is termed the section 5 referral process is the process whereby local authorities make referrals to housing associations to house people under the homelessness duties. Currently, there is mixed practice across Scotland regarding whether the section 5 referral process or a more informal nomination practice is used.

As we have said to the committee in relation to previous bills, we believe that there are strong arguments for making it mandatory across the board for local authorities to use the section 5 process to secure housing from social landlords. That would increase transparency and enable local authorities to see where registered social landlords in their areas are providing more help. It would also enable tenants to understand why they have been refused, which is not the case when the current more informal approaches are used.

David Bookbinder: Rosemary Brotchie is right that local authorities use a variety of mechanisms to work with registered social landlords to house homeless people. Sometimes, the mechanism is section 5, and at other times, it is a more informal arrangement, as she said.

It strikes the CIH that a local authority that is dissatisfied with RSLs’ contribution to its achieving its homelessness objectives can, if necessary, use section 5 referrals, if informal nomination arrangements are not working well. It feels like Shelter is asking to mend something that is not broken, if local authorities are happy with how things are working.

Andy Young: The proposal seems to move away from the person-centred approach that we have moved on to, and it does not sit comfortably with me. It is almost as if Shelter wants to monitor what RSLs are doing rather than worry about the outcome for homeless people, which must be first and foremost in everybody’s thoughts. If a different mechanism from section 5 referrals works best for an applicant, surely to change that would be ludicrous.

Rosemary Brotchie: Shelter is not clear whether that approach is working best for applicants. As I said, RSLs play a large role in housing homeless people in some areas but do not in other areas.

To answer David Bookbinder's point, I think that the section 5 referral process is sometimes seen as a big stick in the allocations process. It need not and should not be that. It is not a complicated or overly burdensome process, but it increases transparency and makes the figures measurable, so that we can see the contribution. That should also help partnership working.

To answer Andy Young's point, we do not suggest the removal of informal nomination arrangements, under which personal contact between a person in a local authority and somebody in a housing association facilitates availability of a house. However, we want that to be backed up with the section 5 process. The two things do not have to be at either end of a spectrum; they can work hand in hand. That would improve the situation for many homeless people across Scotland.

The Convener: I thank all the witnesses for their helpful input.

11:33
Meeting suspended.

11:38
On resuming—

The Convener: In the second panel of witnesses on the bill, I welcome Paul Brown, chief executive officer of the Legal Services Agency; Michael Clancy, director of law reform at the Law Society of Scotland; and Garry Burns, prevention of homelessness caseworker at Govan Law Centre.

Adam Ingram: Good morning, gentlemen. The Scottish Government's vision is "that all people in Scotland live in high-quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs".

To what extent does the bill support that vision?

Michael Clancy (Law Society of Scotland): Thank you, convener. I am probably the least qualified member of the panel to answer Adam Ingram's question.

It is important to have a vision in housing provision. As the committee will see from our paper, the Law Society of Scotland does not comment on the policy behind the Government's views on the issue. However, solicitors buy and sell houses for people all over the country, and we try to do our bit in helping to make that provision a reality for people. Beyond that, I am not really sure that I am qualified to comment on Government policy in that kind of context.

Paul Brown (Legal Services Agency): I absolutely buy into the vision. Abolishing the right to buy and tackling tenemental repairs are important initiatives. I think that my colleague Garry Burns concurs with our view that there is a major problem of homelessness and that, in some respects, the bill will make that worse. The Legal Services Agency advised 256 rough sleepers in Glasgow between 12 April 2012 and 11 April 2013, but that figure soared between 12 April 2013 and 11 December 2013, which is a period of much less than a year, to 355 rough sleepers. We think that the number will double this year from a baseline four or five years ago of very few rough sleepers.

There is a major problem, and we are concerned that some of the approaches to managing antisocial behaviour in general and to allocation policies will make the position more difficult, particularly in Glasgow. We understand from Glasgow City Council press releases that one of the reasons why it has a homelessness problem is the difficulty in getting housing through registered social landlords. We are concerned that there appears to be an implicit strategy behind the bill that people who are accused and sometimes guilty of antisocial behaviour are going to be thrown on to the tender mercies of the private sector, which is the opposite of what one would expect. The private sector has none of the resources required to deal with people with mental health or behaviour problems. However, the policy seems to be to further exclude such people from RSLs and local authority housing stock. We are concerned about that.

The Convener: Does the position that you have described not relate particularly to Glasgow? Overall in Scotland the number of applications for homelessness assistance has fallen by about 13 per cent over the past year. I get the feeling from newspaper articles and so on that there is a passing-the-buck situation that relates particularly to Glasgow because Glasgow City Council does not have its own housing stock. As part of our evidence taking for our homelessness inquiry, we went to Glasgow and met Glasgow Housing Association and another organisation. They said that they were very proud of the work that they had done in Glasgow. However, we now seem to be finding that Glasgow City Council is reneging on its obligations to the homeless.

Paul Brown: Glasgow City Council states that it cannot get the housing from RSLs—I am not privy to what is the true situation. We heard in the earlier evidence session about section 5 referrals by the local authority to registered social landlords, but there is basically not very much compulsion on RSLs, because they can turn down a referral if there is a good reason for them to do so. There is therefore a lack of alignment between a local authority’s obligations and the ability to provide housing. If there has been a stock transfer, the people who have the housing do not really have the obligation to provide housing for people who are homeless, but the local authority does—that is a mismatch. I suggest that the allocation policy for all public sector organisations, including RSLs, should be aligned with the public policy to provide accommodation for people who are homeless. The two things need to be aligned, or the mismatch will continue.

It is wonderful law. The homelessness law has improved enormously—there is no question about that—and it is something of which we can all rightly be proud. However, there has to be a means to implement it, and it appears that there is not.

Glasgow City Council has announced that it will provide 60 new beds for temporary accommodation. That is great—I do not know where it got the money from—but, given the numbers concerned, it does not look to me as if that will get it very far.

There needs to be a change in the way that housing is allocated, to give more priority to people who are vulnerable to homelessness. A proportion of them will inevitably be people who have had behaviour problems in the past. We cannot have a situation where there is nowhere for them to go. I appreciate that people who have behaved in an antisocial manner need to be controlled, but that cannot be done in a way that results in their becoming a homeless underclass. One suspects that the fantasy that people have is that those people will go off to London or somewhere. The point is that they are not going to go away; they are here to stay and we need to have a joined-up policy.

The Convener: My point was that it seems to be a particular problem in Glasgow. As far as we can ascertain from the dealings that we have with our local authorities and housing associations, they work together in the rest of the country. The letting is done on a cross-social-housing basis. There seems to be a particular problem in Glasgow because the council does not have its own social housing stock. I think that we should move on.

Adam Ingram: I will ask Garry Burns to pick up on that, given his experience. One of the outcomes that the Scottish Government is seeking from the bill is to encourage sustainable communities. Could you talk to that in response to what you have heard already?

Garry Burns (Govan Law Centre): I echo what Paul Brown said. I agree that Glasgow is a specific case as it has the worst homelessness in Scotland, but the figures do not always tell the true story. Hidden homelessness is not happening only in Glasgow; it is happening in every community. I have worked with enough local authorities in this job and in my previous job to know that there are significant barriers to everybody who presents to a local authority. That has to be investigated. Sometimes local authorities will do everything they can before they take somebody on as a homelessness case. I dealt with a case like that just at the end of last week. I will not name the local authority, but it did everything that it could rather than take the client on as a homelessness client. The people involved were a couple—the young person involved was 16 years old. The local authority was just bashing them back and forward. The idea that this happens only in Glasgow is not completely true.

If we are to have sustainable communities, something has to be done about private landlords. Our work with private landlords represents probably about 30 per cent of my case load. Some private landlords are charging very high rents. More and more people are coming to my organisation saying, “I can’t afford my rent. What am I supposed to do?” We cannot really offer them a solution. They cannot present as a homeless family because technically they have a tenancy. We are quite reluctant to tell them to ramp up rent arrears, because then they will have a big debt and they will have to go through an eviction process. Unaffordable private rents are a significant problem. There is a very simple solution to it, which is that the Scottish Government has to do something about rents in the private sector.

Also, with regard to tenancies in the private sector not being fit for purpose—

The Convener: I will stop you there because we are getting into detail that we might come to when we look at the private rented sector. We are just taking a broad-brush look at this at the moment. We will certainly come back to the detail of what you were saying.

Adam Ingram: In general terms, you are saying that we need to do more than what is in the legislation to create the kind of sustainable communities that we are looking for.

Garry Burns: Absolutely.

Adam Ingram: My final question is about the consultation process for the bill. Are you content with it? Were there deficiencies?
Garry Burns: I have had a look at the consultation process. We got a lot of the material quite late on, so it has been difficult to look at it thoroughly, but I think that there are a lot of tenants’ voices missing. There is talk about changing age criteria in relation to reasonable preference, but I do not see that any young people or young persons’ organisations have been consulted. In my experience, inserting provisions to do with age would not be to the detriment of anybody apart from young people, so if you are changing the process, the voice of young people’s organisations such as Barnardo’s and Save the Children, which have homelessness places all over Scotland, would be positive in informing the debate. However, that part of the consultation document says that the Government did not consult on that issue. If the consultation paper itself says that it did not consult on it, that part definitely has to change.

I would also like to see more tenants’ views on the process. A lot of the policy looks to me as if it has been written for and on behalf of the registered social landlords, without taking account of tenants’ voices.

Adam Ingram: Witnesses on a previous panel of tenants’ representatives suggested that they were actually quite pleased with the pre-consultation consultations that they had had, but I take your point about some of those things coming late on the scene.

Garry Burns: The ones who are excluded from getting into tenancies by the bill have not been consulted. It is easy for a tenant to say that that is a good idea because it means that they will not get somebody who has had an antisocial behaviour order or who has been evicted living next to them, but those people also deserve housing. Instead of listening to only a select few tenants, there should be a wider debate that includes people who have chaotic lifestyles, because there are enough organisations working with them to allow us access to them. That would allow us to ask them, if they are going through homelessness or into different tenancies or in and out of places, what they think could help them to sustain a tenancy, as opposed to telling them how not to get housing.

Paul Brown: I entirely agree with Garry Burns. I suggest that the membership of the affordable rented housing advisory group should have been markedly wider. There are no lawyers represented on it who specifically represent homeless people. Shelter is represented, but it bore the full weight of representing that constituency. No organisations representing people with mental health problems are represented, and that is one of the areas that we are talking about when we consider some aspects of antisocial behaviour. The membership should have been broader. I entirely agree that young people do not have a voice in established tenants’ organisations or housing associations in general, so an effort needs to be made there.

Michael Clancy: The general point about consultation is that it can always be done better. The Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee is currently looking at the legislative process, and it will probably receive comments on consultation, which is something that we should look at in the round.

Garry Burns made a point about reaching those constituencies that are not among the so-called usual suspects. Doing that is a challenge to Parliament and to Government, and we can make efforts to address that by using social media and thinking out of the box. If the box is a committee room, you can go out into the community. It is a question of getting to those who are affected by legislation. As a long-time consultee and responder to consultations, I have no doubt that it is easier for organisations that have dedicated staff and resources than it is for individuals or for underresourced organisations.

Adam Ingram: That is helpful. We will move on to the detail of the bill. Part 1 is about the abolition of the right to buy. Do you have any comments to make about the proposed abolition of the right to buy, particularly in relation to the impact on tenants’ rights?

Michael Clancy: I think that that is another one for me. Having listened to some of the earlier questioning and having read last week’s Official Report, I know that questions have been raised in the committee about whether the abolition of the right to buy is compliant with the European convention on human rights. If one looks at the provisions of the convention that engage with property rights, such as article 8, which says that “Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence”, and article 1 of protocol 1, which deals with “the peaceful enjoyment of ... possessions”, one can see exactly how it could be concluded that the provisions abolishing the right to buy are compliant with article 8 and protocol 1.

A case in 2001 called Chapman v the United Kingdom—33 EHRR 399—says in effect that article 8 does not give the right to be provided with a house. I have tried to track down a 2004 case relating to Northern Ireland that spoke of the right to buy there not engaging article 1 of protocol 1, which says:

“Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law.”
When we stack those up, the abolition of the right to buy is being done by law and in accordance with what is considered to be the public interest. Although the way in which the abolition of the right to buy is being done would not prevent someone from taking a case that their human rights have been contravened, I would agree with the comment made last week by a Government official that it is unlikely that such a case would be successful.

Adam Ingram: The length of time for the process to extinguish the right to buy has been stipulated at three years. We have heard from others that one year might be sufficient. Do you have a view on that?

Michael Clancy: It is a personal view only—I did not consult anyone back at the office on this. I think that three years is quite reasonable. It gives people a reasonable time in which to decide whether to exercise the right to buy.

Adam Ingram: Do any of the other gentlemen have views on the matter?

Garry Burns: We support it.

Paul Brown: We support it, too. It is a bold and important reform.

The Convener: Part 2 of the bill is on social housing.

Mark Griffin: Does the panel have any comments on provisions in the bill that are aimed at increasing the flexibility that social landlords have in allocating properties, particularly relating to the changes to the existing reasonable preference provisions and the inclusion of age as a factor that social landlords are able to take into account?

Paul Brown: My view is that RSLs’ obligations in the allocation of housing need to be aligned with local authorities’ obligations to provide housing, particularly where there has been a stock transfer. I have no difficulty with increasing flexibility but within the context that the flexibility needs to be constrained by enabling the local authority to meet its obligations to people who are homeless.

What I would be concerned about is that the increased flexibility may well make that more difficult. It also gives the message, if you see what I mean—rather than necessarily what is in law—that it is public policy that RSLs should be able to decide their own priorities without regard to the needs of the wider community.

I entirely accept that the old section 20 of the 1987 act was out of date and, to an extent, was not terribly helpful in referring to “reasonable preference”, which does not really mean all that much. I would be in favour of something much clearer and more specific, basically requiring RSLs to have their policy aligned with the needs of allocation to homeless people. That would be along with other issues, of course. It is not an easy issue, but it needs to be highlighted.

Garry Burns: When it comes to reasonable preference, one danger is to do with removing the category of overcrowding. We would be concerned if that were to be removed, as overcrowding is certainly an issue in Glasgow and, I guess, in other local authority areas. Removing people living in overcrowded houses as a category for reasonable preference would not be a great idea.

I will go back to the issue of age, although I have already touched on it. Young people are experiencing significant changes with regard to housing benefit—those that have already happened and those that are going to happen. To start to take away their right to social housing at a time when their rights have been eroded significantly is not the best move. Young people should have exclusive rights within housing. Some young people cannot stay at home—some young people do not have great families. There is some help from social work, and there is some policy. By consulting other organisations, we can figure out a way of getting young people into decent housing. If they can get into decent housing, they can get into college or go to work. It would be a good idea for the Scottish Government to do that.

When it comes to the tolerable standard, some definition is needed. There is quite a lot in the policy before us that says that the Scottish Government is going to come back and define the term. Removing the tolerable standard would not be a good idea either, as it means people living in accommodation that is not tolerable. If they cannot move because of that, I do not see how they can do so otherwise.

The problem is that, given that RSLs are set up to help housing, if the tolerable standard becomes so bad, people would then go to statutory homeless, which creates more problems and leads to more money having to be put into social housing anyway. To remove the tolerable standard as a way of facilitating social housing taking on a new tenant would be a bad idea.

The Convener: Do you wish to discuss issues around antisocial behaviour, Mary?

Mary Fee: Thank you, convener. I have some questions about Scottish secure tenancies. The bill contains provisions that would widen the circumstances in which landlords can use short SSTs where there is a history of antisocial behaviour. I am interested in the panel’s views on whether those proposals are appropriate and proportionate. Do the witnesses have any concerns about the type of evidence that a social landlord would need to have to make use of those powers?

Paul Brown: We have considerable concerns about the overall direction of travel regarding antisocial behaviour in the bill.

Starting with the allocation provisions, there is codification of the means whereby allocation of housing will be delayed for a minimum period, set by the landlord, in cases where someone is held to be guilty of antisocial behaviour. There is no real way of protesting about that under the bill. A summary application is no more than an article 6 fig leaf, because the number of people who will have sufficiently easy access to legal advice and representation in order to submit a summary application will be no more than one a year. I imagine that that is the case; I have never been consulted by anyone on that area.

The point is that there are groups of people in some areas who will not be allocated any social housing for a minimum period—we do not know what that period will be. Their access to any ways to dispute that will be limited. They may then be allocated a house. Perhaps they have not gone down that route, but they are allocated a house, and antisocial behaviour is committed or alleged to have been committed.

The demotion process is very vague. Previously, if someone already had a secure tenancy, the demotion to an SSST was subject to a case having gone through a criminal court. That was very clear, but the new demotion process is much more vague and, although we entirely approve of the idea that people get reasons for it, there is no easy way of protesting about it. Again, it is a summary application—we seem to be having a summary application fest here. Anyway, that will not cash out in real terms in applications to the court, because it will just not happen.

Someone might be accused of antisocial behaviour without the matter having gone through any court process, and their tenancy could be demoted to an SSST; then, that SSST can be brought to an end. Again, there is a summary application process. A full judicial process to evict the person is not easily available.

I am concerned about the potential for misuse and about the difficulty that people who have chaotic lives or mental health problems, or whatever it may be, will have with getting an opportunity to get an outside court—as that is the forum that society provides—to consider the matter.

I would prefer either that the demotion was made more restricted, going back to the old criteria, or, if the new criteria are to be left in, that the landlord be required to raise a summary cause action so that they, rather than the tenant, have to take the matter to court. The issue is getting into the court. No doubt we will discuss later whether a court or a tribunal is best, although I am not too bothered about that particular question. The point is to provide another bite at the cherry—an opportunity to go to a court and get the forms of advice, assistance and representation that are provided through that route, which is currently much easier than taking the initiative to make a summary application.

Garry Burns: I think that a solution is being designed for a problem that does not exist. SSSTs can be used at the moment anyway, if there has been antisocial behaviour. In cases involving families or individuals in which antisocial behaviour is taking place, there will be other issues and other things going on. There might be mental health problems, addiction issues or both; other things could be going on in the family.

Tenants do not want to lose their homes. Some tenants might be acting in a way that is not great for everybody else, but we feel that it is a matter of working with such tenants, instead of threatening them, which is what we feel that the measures will do. We have to keep an eye on the wider community, but if we are going to make it easier to get people with issues out of a property, we have to be concerned to ask where they will go. Once people have been put out of their social housing, where do they go? They go to the council for accommodation and the council is obliged to accommodate them in temporary accommodation, which costs a lot of money. They may well end up in a private flat.

If people have issues, those issues do not disappear when they move into a private flat. Whatever issues they had that created the ASBO go with them into their new tenancy, wherever they go. ASBOs as they are used now are sufficient as a tool, but for people with behaviour that needs to be changed for the wider community, why not include in the policy a statutory obligation on the local authority to put support services in place? Most councils will not provide tenancy support unless there is homelessness. If we are helping folk with homelessness, why not help folk who are struggling in tenancies and keep the SSSTs as they are now?

Mary Fee: Would it be helpful if the Government issued specific guidance to landlords on how the powers should be used?

Paul Brown: I think that the procedure and the rights need to be tightened up. It is not just a matter of guidance. There will be human rights challenges.

Mary Fee: Specifically with this?

Paul Brown: Yes.
The new demotion criteria relate to how the defender—the tenant, a member of the family or visitor—has acted within a period of three years. The landlord might have records, but if somebody was accused of having done something two and a half years ago, most people would not have a record of that and getting evidence of that sort of thing would be a very complex matter. If one wanted to test the fact, it would be by way of summary application. However, there is no test of reasonableness; the court will not be told, “You have to look at reasonableness.” In the 2001 act, reasonableness is defined in various ways in a situation where someone is evicted from a secure tenancy.

I would suggest that in order to be human-rights compliant, you will probably need to have a test of reasonableness for most of these disputed issues. The test of reasonableness can be explained in more detail either in statute or in guidance, but if one does not include the test, people will try proportionality challenges, which are not quite the same thing. If landlords want certainty and clarity, it is much better to say that their decision making has to be reasonable, rather than leave things to proportionality.

The course of conduct in a demotion situation might not be proven by way of a criminal court or through an ASBO. However, if it has been so bad that demotion is obviously reasonable, the defender’s lawyer will tell them that the demotion is perfectly reasonable and if they do not go along with it, they will get evicted. They will not get legal aid either and the sheriff will be very annoyed if a defence is attempted that is obviously absurd.

One has to trust the process to some extent, rather than leave things to good practice on the part of landlords. I think that good practice among landlords is probably general, but mistakes are made and there are prejudices—sometimes witnesses are prejudiced. These things need to be tested properly and I do not think that the way that this issue is dealt with in the proposals provides for that fully.

Mary Fee: Does Garry Burns have any further comments?

Garry Burns: No. I could not add anything that Paul Brown has not already said.

Mary Fee: There are provisions in the bill that would provide further protection for tenants, particularly those with short SSTs. Do you think that any other type of protection is required? You have talked at length about issues that you have, but could something specific be added that would help?

Paul Brown: To protect tenants?

Mary Fee: Yes.

Paul Brown: I am concerned about the new proposed recovery of possession procedure for secure tenants. Section 15 removes reasonableness from the test for antisocial behaviour. It says that if someone has been convicted of various offences, there is no defence to the action for eviction—apart from the proportionality route. I think that that was accepted in the earlier session. It seems a bit absurd to have people know that proportionality may be raised but not to explain it in statute in a way that is accountable and clear. The rule of law should give people a clear indication.

If someone went to see their lawyer and said that they wanted to defend their eviction but they had attacked their next-door neighbour with a hammer, the lawyer would tell them that the eviction was perfectly reasonable and they would not get legal aid. However, if more explanation was provided about the behaviour that led to the eviction, such as that it happened some time ago and that social work, the general practitioner and everybody else said that the individual had been rehabilitated, there would be a reasonableness test argument, so the test should be retained. It would be a mistake to let things fall to proportionality challenges, because they are much more complex and it would be much more expensive for landlords, who would instruct advocates and go for appeals left, right and centre. It would be much better to have it put into the bill.

We can be proud of the way in which the reasonableness test has been understood, of how the courts generally apply it, where it exists, and of the way in which it has been explained in statute. That principle should be built on, rather than there being an attempt to remove it for hard cases, which would be a mistake.

Garry Burns: The way to improve all tenants’ rights is to bring private sector tenancy rights more in line with social sector tenancies, because it is a lot easier to get somebody out of a private let. There are examples of people who have been in their homes for four, five or six years, or even longer, and who can be out of there relatively quickly because of certain ways in which the landlord can raise actions. Sometimes not a lot of evidence is required for those actions to get somebody out, and the period can be as short as six weeks to two months. That is quite unfair, particularly where families are involved. If someone has been in a tenancy for five years, that is their home and they think that they will be there for a long time. We should bring things in the private sector more into line with the social sector.
Across Scotland, there are some good third sector agencies and legal services that provide help for citizens, but there seems to be a bit of a mismatch in how that happens. In places such as Glasgow and Edinburgh, there are services all over the place for people who are going through an eviction and there is a lot of expertise on how to stop evictions, but in smaller local authorities there does not seem to be the same knowledge about how to access services.

We have come across that because there have obviously been a lot of issues with the bedroom tax and Govan Law Centre has been in the media, so we are getting phone calls from all over Scotland. Although the bedroom tax is a specific issue, other issues have also come up, because there are not enough services that are independent of the local authority and of Government. That is important, because sometimes agencies that get funding from Government or from local authorities might not be great at challenging the local authority that funds them, although they should do, based on their remit.

To recap, we need more independent agencies that can fight for people’s rights across Scotland, and we need to make private sector tenancies stronger for tenants.

Mary Fee: What is Michael Clancy’s view?

Michael Clancy: I am afraid that I am inexpert in this area and must defer to the two experts on either side of me.

Mary Fee: I suspect that I know the answer to my next question, because we have touched on the eviction process and the bill simplifies that process. Do you think that it balances the rights of tenants and landlords, or does it swing too much in favour of one or the other?

Paul Brown: I reckon that, for the most vulnerable tenants, quite a lot of rights could be removed by the bill, and I have concerns about that. I do not understand why landlords appear to fear the legal process so much. I appreciate that there are sometimes problems, but we have heard evidence that they do not like the arrangements and that they seem to think that they do not get their remedies. That is not our experience at all. RSLs and local authorities in Scotland raise thousands of actions, sometimes on quite modest grounds, and they frequently get the remedy that they seek. I am not talking about rent arrears cases, but they frequently get the remedy that they seek in other cases. I am concerned about the way in which the changes to the SSST regime can result in naive tenants and members of their families losing their homes, or losing a lot of security, without really understanding what is going on.

I am not in any way saying that all tenants should always stay in their homes. There are times when people need to be evicted and I am not querying that, but it is a question of getting the balance right, which I appreciate is not always easy.

Garry Burns: Any erosion of tenants’ rights or any policy that makes it easier for a landlord to evict a tenant should be avoided at all costs. It should be more difficult to evict, although I echo what Paul Brown said—we are not saying that tenants have a right to their home no matter what they do.

I return to my original point about most people to whom eviction happens. People with SSSTs who have received ASBOs will often have mental health issues or addictions. However, there can also be a breakdown in the relationship between the tenant and the landlord, which can sometimes be really personal. When there is that personal relationship, housing associations—just like any organisation—can dig in their heels. That is not to say that that is the practice of all social landlords—of course it is not—but relationships like that can be so close that when there are a lot of pressures on social landlords, such as the bedroom tax and so on, a lot of them break down. The problem is that it might not be in the best interests of vulnerable tenants to give social landlords extra powers to evict.

The Convener: Moving on to part 3, on the private rented housing sector, Jim Eadie has some questions.

Jim Eadie: I kick off by asking whether panel members have information that they can provide about housing cases, particularly those in the private rented sector, that are currently dealt with by the sheriff courts. What are some of the problems in relation to equality and access to justice?

Garry Burns: One of the significant barriers is the private landlord. We deal with illegal evictions—a rough estimate is about five or six a month. By that, I mean a landlord changing someone’s locks or removing their property from their home and putting it out on the street.

The police refuse to get involved in that. Without a court order, forcing a lock is a criminal act; it is not a civil matter. Landlords are doing that routinely. The problem is that the people they are doing that to tend to be young and female, and they tend to be mothers. There is an element of bullying there, and an element of people not getting their rights.

I have spent days talking to the police when that happens and no action is taken. The person gets fed up because she is out on the street and cannot get into her house and get her child’s clothing, toys and bedding. She is having to go to her mother, when the relationship broke down years ago. It is important that there is stronger advice and terms for the police to take action on such situations.

Jim Eadie: Are you saying that in such cases, when a criminal act has been committed, the police refuse to intervene?

Garry Burns: Not in every case.

Jim Eadie: You have experience of the other side of the situation.

Garry Burns: In almost every case, I have had to spend a significant amount of time with the police, going through different types of officer to get the sergeant so that I can report the landlord’s action as a crime. Even when it is reported as a crime, the police ask questions such as whether the tenant has paid rent. That is not the issue. The tenant has been evicted illegally and the police are not there to make judgments on rent. Usually the police do get involved but, unfortunately, it can take a significant amount of time, during which the tenant has nowhere to go. In quite a lot of cases, the police have not really done their job. As I understand it, there have never been any prosecutions, despite significant evidence that a crime has been committed.

Private landlords do not like their tenants getting their rights. They get quite huffy when you phone them up. They say, “Why’s the tenant going to a law centre?” You tell them that it is to get their rights. That is not the case with all private landlords, because some are decent, but private landlords need to know what they are doing. You get landlords putting in a handwritten note telling their tenants that they need to be out of the property by, for example, 12 o’clock on a certain day in August. I phone them up and tell them that that is not really a proper notice to quit and they come back to me and ask why, and say that they are going to put the tenant out. I tell them that if they do that, they are breaking the law.

Private landlords have the right to put people out—of course they do—but they need to do it legally. I love it when they do it legally because it means that somebody is not out on the street, terrified because they are homeless.

Jim Eadie: Do the other witnesses have any perspective on that issue?

Paul Brown: Our experience of private rented sector cases is that they can be very complex. If the short assured tenancy is created and ended properly, there is no defence, but sometimes it is a lot more complex than that. In the case of long-running tenancies that predate the assured tenancy regime, we are looking at an earlier statutory regime. I would agree that there is a problem of landlord education.

There is also a problem—it is to some extent in the bill—about repairs in certain sorts of stock. If the tenant has only a short assured tenancy, they do not really feel confident enough to take repairs issues up because they think that the tenancy will just be brought to an end and that is them out.

There is also an issue about common parts. The ideas about how tenemental repairs may be made easier will help private rented sector tenants, too. However, as I think Shelter was saying earlier, the long-term aim has to be to look at the assured tenancy regime and to increase the rights and security of short assured tenancy tenants. That would be worth looking into.

Jim Eadie: Do you have any other perspective that you can share with the committee on your experience of how cases in the private rented sector are currently dealt with by sheriff courts?

Paul Brown: We have little experience there, because very few tenants consult us. We have done some unlawful eviction cases, which can be very difficult if the landlord is intransigent. There is an education issue there. My impression is that some sheriffs quite enjoy the very complex cases, because they are getting their teeth into complex legal issues. However, those are quite few and far between at the moment.

Jim Eadie: I will move on in that case, unless Mr Clancy has anything to add.

Michael Clancy: Your question was also about access to justice. That can frequently depend on eligibility for legal aid, especially for tenants. Although there may be a wider eligibility for advice and assistance these days, legal aid availability is more restrictive. That is an area that needs examined. Matching eligibility and availability is a continual problem.

Jim Eadie: What are the views of the panel on the proposals contained in the bill to transfer certain types of civil court actions in relation to the private rented sector from the sheriff court to the first-tier tribunal?

Michael Clancy: The Law Society is in favour of the way in which the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill is proceeding. It is currently at stage 2. Tribunals, on the whole, have a different ethos from that of the courts. They are more accessible and more user friendly, and they can be more specialised. They are relatively less adversarial, and they are relatively more inquisitorial in the way in which they do their business. They are also quite informal. All of that adds up to a balance in favour of tribunals. Under the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, a first-tier chamber for housing, land and property questions is envisaged.
There are two reservations, which we talked about just before the evidence session began, relating to legal aid. Although legal aid is widely available for courts—schedule 1 to the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 has a list of courts for which legal aid is available—there is a much shorter list of tribunals in that schedule. Employment tribunals and the Lands Tribunal for Scotland are included there, as are one or two others. We must be careful about the issue of ECHR compliance when it comes to shifting cases off to tribunals. In the past, one would have access to legal aid when going to a court. For a tribunal, one might not have direct access to legal aid—although advice and assistance would be available in those circumstances. That is one reservation.

Jim Eadie: You raise an important point about access to justice through legal aid. Do you have a sense of whether transferring the jurisdiction from the sheriff court to the newly established tribunal would be cost neutral, or whether there would be a cost implication attached? If it is the latter, how much might that be?

Michael Clancy: My capabilities in arithmetic and mathematics are so limited that I cannot answer that question just now.

Jim Eadie: I do not believe that for a moment. I do not believe that there are any limits to your capabilities.

12:30

Michael Clancy: You are charming as ever, Mr Eadie, and also overly optimistic. However, I shall take that question back and ask our access-to-justice team to look at it and see whether we can write to the committee at a later point during stage 1.

I was going to reflect on the fact that, under section 70 of the Tribunals (Scotland) Bill, there is a provision for Scottish ministers to make regulations for tribunals to charge fees. That, too, could be a barrier to using tribunals, which we must watch carefully. Of course, in court circumstances, there are already fees charged by the court for various steps in the process, so we just need to be aware of those possibilities.

Jim Eadie: That is helpful. Could the other panel members address the issue of legal aid and fees?

Paul Brown: Provision of legal aid for the tribunal process is crucial. There will be non-compliance with article 6 of the ECHR if that is not the case, and it would also make life difficult for the tribunal itself if none of the defenders in eviction cases in the private rented sector is represented. A proportion will have difficulties, such as communication difficulties, and will have no idea how to gather and deploy evidence or legal arguments. We are talking about a family losing their home, which is the removal of a fundamental freedom—with the obligation to pay rent and so forth, of course—so legal aid is crucial.

On the cost, I would have thought—I am taking a risk here—that the number of cases will not be great because most tenancies are short assured tenancies, and if they are properly created and brought to an end there will not be much of a defence for an eviction case. It would be a different matter if the tenancy regime was changed, and it would be an enormously different matter if registered social landlords' tenancies and secure tenancies go through a tribunal process. I would imagine that the cost would be very high indeed, because of the sheer numbers.

There are positive advantages to a tribunal in terms of programming, having an expert panel and the perceived informality of the process—although sometimes it is no less formal than the courts. However, I doubt whether it really ends up being cheaper where there is a substantive defence. At the moment, the Private Rented Housing Panel would not be used to having a case that would last two or three days, with scores of witnesses. When that happens, I cannot imagine that it is going to be cheaper for landlords or for anyone else. That is my guess, anyway.

Garry Burns: We would be concerned about not having a solicitor representing a tenant at a tribunal—the whole point of tribunals, as I understand it, is that there should not be—and about not having a sheriff. I am not so sure that sheriffs lack the specialism that the briefing says they lack. You can go to see a sheriff for small amounts and they can make decisions on whether or not you have bought a dodgy sofa—are we saying that it is more important for a sheriff to decide on that than to decide on your home? Our concern is that a person's home is vital; you cannot do anything in life without a strong home. So long as it does not have the power to evict, the tribunal could be a good forum, but only as an arbitrator. If it comes to making a decision on an eviction, we feel that that power should stay with the sheriff courts, as it is at the moment. We may disagree about that, but we are from different organisations, so that is fine. We do not think that it is a great idea to move into the tribunal system.

Jim Eadie: That is helpful. Perhaps we can pursue the need for clarification that you have highlighted.

Michael Clancy: Yes.

Jim Eadie: In response to an earlier question from Mr Ingram, you mentioned the level of rents in the private rented sector. Could you say a little more about that?
Garry Burns: The level of rents in the private sector just now is very high in comparison with the social sector. Brick by brick is the best way of looking at it: potentially, the rent for a two-bedroom house in Glasgow can be about £600 a month; the neighbours could be paying about half of that if they are in the social sector, for the exact equivalent flat. We do not see that as fair, and we think that the Government should take a role in dealing with that. For a lot of people, particularly those on the minimum wage, most of their income goes on housing costs. When most of a household’s income goes on housing costs—I was there myself not too long ago—it is not nice. It is not nice to pay half your wages to somebody else who is making quite a lot of money—and it is often the case that they are providing a poor service.

Everybody is talking about housing benefits. The housing benefit bill is astronomical, but a lot of it relates to the private rented sector.

Jim Eadie: What is the remedy that you suggest the Scottish Government should adopt?

Garry Burns: For the Scottish Government to do a review, looking into the matter at a deeper level. I appreciate that this might not be the greatest format, but there should be a big review on rent. If there is a legal way to proceed with this—we suggest that there is—and if there is a fair and just way to do it, what we are essentially talking about, to put it in a brutal way, is capping rents. I think that there is a way for the Scottish Government to consider that, potentially using legislation to protect people from having to pay exorbitant rent out of their income and at the same time protecting the public purse. That rent gets charged to people who are getting housing benefit to pay it, and they need a top-up with their £70-a-week benefits to pay off the rest of it.

People are in abject poverty. Solving high housing costs would free up a lot of money and would make Scotland a far fairer society.

Jim Eadie: I have a final question on this area. Do you think that the Government’s proposals for court reforms could achieve similar outcomes, in terms of efficiency and access to justice, to those that are envisaged through the transfer of jurisdiction from court to tribunal?

Michael Clancy: The court reform programme is broad and wide ranging. It has already begun in some respects, following on from the report of Lord Gill. There are other reports involved, too, including that of Sheriff Principal Taylor. It is a very big programme to improve efficiency in the courts and to ensure that the right level of court deals with the right level of matter.

As we can see from earlier consultations on the draft courts reform (Scotland) bill, proposals to raise the threshold for the jurisdiction of the Court of Session and to push cases into the sheriff court will mean that there will be more cases in the sheriff court. If one considers the civil justice system as a whole, the inclusion of reforms to tribunals along with reforms to the courts is a very sensible idea. I refer not just to the structural aspect with regard to the Scottish Court Service and the Scottish Civil Justice Council but to the more operational aspect. From our point of view, shifting jurisdiction from the sheriff court to the tribunals—not just in this area but in other areas, too—will perhaps allow for those cases that cascade from the Court of Session to the sheriff court to get dealt with more efficiently there.

I hope that that answers your question, Mr Eadie.

Gordon MacDonald: Should social rented sector cases also be transferred to the first-tier tribunal?

Garry Burns: We are in opposition to that for the private rented sector, so it follows that we will be opposed to it for the social rented sector. I will not add anything further.

Paul Brown: I did not realise that this would be such a hot potato. I would like to submit some more detailed written representations later. The fundamental issue is not between a tribunal and a court—it is about the resources that go into the provision of the court or tribunal facilities; ensuring that the judges, whether on a tribunal or in a sheriff court, know about the subject matter beforehand; and ensuring that there is legal aid. In the past—it is less the case now—there was an idea that a case going to a tribunal meant that it was not necessary to have representation and that, if someone did have representation, they did not need to be all that expert.

That idea is probably going, although it has not entirely gone. We hear stories about people being represented at employment tribunals, with very large sums of money involved. A lot of what happens can be intimate and upsetting for people, who could be represented by people with no knowledge or experience of that form of remedy at all. Sometimes they are solicitors, but the point is that sometimes they are not. If the case is approached with a degree of seriousness, if proper, full legal aid is provided—not some edited version—and if the right messages are given about the seriousness, importance and power of the tribunal, I am fairly neutral on the matter.

We at the Legal Services Agency appear before a wide range of tribunals and courts. Some of my colleagues are mental health tribunal chairs, in fact, and they have huge powers. I do not have any difficulty in principle with that route, as long as people do not think that that is an easy, cheaper approach. Landlords appear to think that that would be the case, but it will not be. If there is a tribunal with three experts, they might spend a lot longer on difficult cases than a sheriff court would. I am not against such a transfer, but it needs to be done with one’s eyes open.

Gordon MacDonald: The rest of the questions that I was going to ask have been covered.

The Convener: Mark Griffin has some questions on other matters relating to the private rented sector.

Mark Griffin: What are your views on expanding access to the Private Rented Housing Panel by enabling third-party applications by local authorities to enforce the repairing standard?

Paul Brown: Great.

Garry Burns: Brilliant.

Michael Clancy: You have a consensus there.

Mark Griffin: Okay—that was an easy one.

I will move on to the subject of letting agents. The Law Society’s submission had a high focus on that. Do you agree that the regulation of letting agents is required? If so, why?

Michael Clancy: We agree with the regulation of letting agents. The policy intention is a clear one, and we support it. We have an issue, however, with the way in which the regulatory scheme is being set up, the extent of the regulation of letting agents by Scottish ministers and the functions that the Scottish ministers would perform as regulators. Those are our issues—as well as the inclusion of solicitors in the regulatory scheme.

Mark Griffin: So you would hope that solicitors would be excluded from the scheme.

Michael Clancy: In the scheme under the bill, Scottish ministers are to establish a register of letting agents, and it will be a criminal offence not to register yet to act as a letting agent. In order to be on the register, someone has to be which amounts to their not having been convicted of an offence involving dishonesty, violence, drugs or firearms or a sexual offence, and not having practised unlawful discrimination under the Equality Act 2010 or otherwise contravened the law on housing, landlord and tenant law or the law relating to debt. Not having been convicted of any of those things adds up to someone being a fit and proper person. However, there is no mention in section 30 of qualifications or training, nor of any consumer protections that would apply.

12:45

Ministers will provide a code of practice that will apply to letting agents, but our view is that solicitors already have to undergo a fairly extensive fit-and-proper-person test and are already regulated by the practice rules and code of conduct approved by the Lord President of the Court of Session. They also have an independent complaints body, the Scottish Legal Complaints Commission, to which complaints should be sent and which can award compensation of up to £20,000, stipulate the repayment of fees and expenses and take other action against solicitors. However, none of that seems to apply to letting agents under this bill. We have reservations about the robustness of the regulatory system under the bill as it applies to letting agents on their own and think that the scheme should not apply to solicitors, who already have a very robust and structured system of regulation that we believe is a significant improvement on what is in the bill.

Mark Griffin: Do the other panel members wish to comment?

Michael Clancy: Convener, if you do not mind, I would like to put on record some comments about certain drafting points in the bill.

We have already had discussions with the bill team and have offered to give them all the assistance that they might want from us. We certainly want to continue that dialogue, but I should note that, with regard to wording such as contravening “any provision of ... the law relating to housing, ... landlord and tenant law, ... the law relating to debt”, which can be found in section 30, it is quite difficult to find out what that means. I am not really sure how we find out what it means to contravene

“the law relating to housing” or, indeed, what one might say about that and how it might be interpreted. Given that that is one of the strands of the fit-and-proper-person test, we need to look very carefully at that.

With regard to the business of being a letting agent, I also draw your attention to the definition of “letting agency work” in section 51, which refers to “things done by a person”, who is not defined,

“in the course of that person’s business in response to ... instructions which are ... carried out with a view to a landlord who is a relevant person entering into ... a lease”

so that

“an unconnected person may use the landlord’s house as a dwelling”.

That strikes me as being quite limited—in fact, it sounds like it relates only to the landlord’s own house—and one would want to look carefully at that wording to ensure that it is broad enough to achieve the intention.

Moreover, the same section states that a letting agency would get instructions to repair, maintain, improve, insure or otherwise manage a house. Without being too flippant, I would suggest that that could mean that someone who is repairing a house—a roofer, say, or someone who knows about drainage—or a person such as a painter and decorator who maintains a house could be described as carrying out “letting agency work”. We have to be very precise about how such provisions are worded and how the bill fits together to ensure that we capture those who are actually doing letting agency work, not those who are not.

In my submission, I point out that a private member’s bill, the Private Landlords and Letting and Managing Agents (Regulation) Bill, is currently going through the Westminster Parliament. I do not know how far it will get, but you never know—it was high up the ballot in the House of Commons. By modifying that bill’s definition of letting agents’ work, we might be able to improve this bill.

A significant point is that that English legislation is being treated as an amendment to the Estate Agents Act 1979, which does not apply to solicitors. Again, I reinforce the point that we as a profession already have a group of client protections and an adequately robust code of conduct. We should be aware that in this area we would be creating an unlevel playing field across the UK but, of course, that situation might change after September.
Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

This proposal will simplify and speed up private rented sector cases and make the court process more user friendly and less intimidating for landlords and tenants. This will be particularly beneficial in speeding up the eviction process for landlords who are unfortunate enough to find themselves with a tenant who fails to pay rent or commits other serious breaches of their tenancy agreement. The potential for higher quality and more consistent rulings from more specialised tribunal decision makers is also welcomed.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

The ability for local authorities to apply to the private rented housing panel for a determination on the repairing standard will provide a means of addressing poor standards in individual properties without having to rely on the tenants to take action against their landlord. This will assist in cases where tenants feel too intimidated by the landlord or the application process to take action themselves, or where they consider that direct action on their part may cause the relationship with their landlord to deteriorate and consequently put them at risk of losing their tenancy. It will also help in situations where the tenant has already vacated the property (or been evicted) but the local authority still wishes to take the case to the PRHP.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

This proposal will not only benefit those tenants who reside in areas characterised by poor conditions in the PRS, but will also improve the overall image of the PRS, which for some time has suffered at the hands of poor landlords and letting agents. It will also assist local authorities who are undertaking regeneration work in particular areas in forcing private landlords to improve their properties in line with other properties in the local area.
Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

This is a welcome proposal as it will drive out poor practice and improve standards and the reputation of the industry while at the same time providing landlords and tenants with better recourse in the event that they are dissatisfied with their agent.

There is the potential for confusion between agents who are registered through landlord registration (as established by the Antisocial Behaviour (Scotland) Act 2004) and registered letting agents as defined in the Bill. In order to reduce bureaucracy and avoid this confusion, registered letting agents should be automatically entered on the landlord register and the letting agent reference number should be used by all local authorities for the purposes of identifying letting agents on the landlord register (replacing the current system of giving agents registration numbers which differ from authority to authority).

Careful consideration must also be given to the status of individuals who act as ‘agents’ but do not act on a commercial basis i.e. family relatives acting as agent on behalf of the absentee landlord who might be resident temporarily overseas. SAL argues that these individuals should not be required to register given that their sole client is a relative and that they are not carrying out the function on a commercial basis.

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

The proposed mechanism is appropriate in providing a simple and swift method of resolving disputes. It is also considered that all commercial agencies should be required to abide by the same statutory code of conduct; thus assuring landlords and tenants of easy access to the same redress mechanism.

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

For landlords of properties in multi-ownership buildings this proposal will be of great benefit in ensuring that essential repairs can be carried out even when some property owners can’t be identified or are unable or unwilling to contribute. It will put an end to the current situation that some landlords can face in having to cover other peoples’ share of communal repairs in order to comply with the repairing standard for their property and provide a compliant property for their tenants.

On resuming—

Housing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Item 3 is to take evidence from private landlord representative groups on the Housing (Scotland) Bill. I welcome John Blackwood, who is the policy and parliamentary affairs director for the Scottish Association of Landlords, and Sarah-Jane Laing, who is the director of policy and parliamentary affairs for Scottish Land & Estates. I also welcome Patrick Harvie MSP, who is joining us for this session. Adam Ingram will start.

Adam Ingram: Good morning. The Scottish Government’s vision for housing is that all people in Scotland should live in high-quality sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs. To what extent do the bill’s provisions promote that vision?

John Blackwood (Scottish Association of Landlords): I will kick off. From our perspective, there are some positive elements in the bill. In effect, it is about redress and access to justice, and it also introduces the potential for letting-agent registration. It will help the consumer to get redress, if they feel that they need to do so. Overall that can only increase the quality and standard of the physical condition and management of properties.

Sarah-Jane Laing (Scottish Land & Estates): I support what John Blackwood says; we believe that the bill will help to increase standards and deliver on its aims. It is the next step in a long process that landlords’ organisations, tenants’ groups and the Scottish Parliament have been working towards for a number of years. As John Blackwood highlighted, a number of the bill’s provisions will help to deliver on the aims that we seek to achieve.

Adam Ingram: Good. My only other question is on the consultation process. Were you satisfied with the process? How did you participate? What are your reflections on the consultation?

Sarah-Jane Laing: The consultation process was very inclusive. We were able to participate as an organisation through the stakeholder group, but there were also a number of opportunities for individual landlords—certainly among our members—to participate. Over the past few years, there have been a number of routes for consultation on policy objectives and on particular provisions in the bill, so we are entirely happy with the process.
John Blackwood: I would say the same. There are a number of things in the bill for which we have been campaigning for some years, so we are delighted that those things will eventually—we hope—be introduced in legislation.

Jim Eadie: The bill makes provision for transferring jurisdiction for certain types of civil court action concerning the private rented sector from the sheriff court to a first-tier tribunal. It would be useful first to hear about your experience of landlords taking civil actions through the sheriff courts, and any problems with access to justice. Secondly, do you agree with the proposal to transfer jurisdiction?

Sarah-Jane Laing: Our experience to date has been pretty unsatisfactory. We have provided a number of pieces of evidence to the Scottish Government and to Parliament in the past few years concerning the speed—or, rather, the lack of speed in consideration of cases. The lack of specialist housing knowledge in the court system has also been a huge issue for landlords, and there is a lack of confidence in the court system’s ability to deliver adequate outcomes within defined timescales.

Looking to the future, our organisation initially wanted the court system to be improved—if possible improvements have been identified, it makes sense to carry them out. We thought that a number of the Gill review’s recommendations, for example, could have resulted in improvements. However, after discussing the matter with the Scottish Government and others, we bought in to the tribunal method, and if that is going to be progressed, the system that the bill sets out is the most appropriate plan to follow.

John Blackwood: Again, I largely agree with that. The current system involving the sheriff courts is expensive, for a start, and very cumbersome. There are inconsistencies in decisions and it lacks expertise. We have been campaigning for a number of years for a specialist housing tribunal. There are already a couple of tribunal services in Scotland, which are respected and could easily be built on. Such a service would be more cost effective for the public purse and would provide better access to justice where that is required.

Jim Eadie: You mentioned cost effectiveness and better access to justice. Can you say a bit more about the potential benefits for tenants and landlords, from your perspective?

John Blackwood: One of the main points concerns the speed of getting to the sheriff court in the first place. The process is very much a postcode lottery—it is based on where one lives—and many landlords and tenants alike feel that it is too adversarial. We need another system that takes a more holistic approach to dealing with the housing issues that are faced by landlords and tenants. A tribunal service would be much more appropriate, and mediation—which is already available in existing tribunal services—could be provided where that would be appropriate.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I agree with everything that John Blackwood has said. There would also be a financial benefit to landlords, especially in rent arrears cases. The time that is spent in court means that arrears continue to increase as one goes through the process. If the tribunal works as it should, there will be financial benefits for landlords because cases will be resolved much more quickly.

Jim Eadie: That is helpful. I have one further question. With regard to the licensing process for houses in multiple occupation, the bill will not transfer civil cases from the sheriff courts to the first-tier tribunal, but rather will give ministers an enabling power to do so at a later date. The Scottish Government has committed to consult further on the issue. What are your views? Are you open minded on the transfer taking place at a later stage?

John Blackwood: We would certainly encourage it to happen, because it is important that the tribunal would deal with all private rented housing cases, including HMO cases. We believe that the reason for the decision is that the issue has not been consulted on, but we would have no problem at all with those cases being transferred.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I echo those thoughts; we would have no issues with the transfer being included in the bill. We would not want to wait until a later date; as John Blackwood said, we would like everything to be brought together.

Gordon MacDonald: Continuing on the tribunal theme, it has been suggested that the Scottish Government may provide support for people to access the proposed tribunal, possibly through legal aid or an advocacy service. Do you have any views on what the policy on access to legal aid and expenses should be? You already touched on the location of tribunals.

John Blackwood: I believe that more work needs to be done on the cost benefits. Overall, the tribunal system will be cheaper for the public purse; we know that from experience of tribunals. Access is important, and the opportunity to use an advocacy service is even more important, especially for vulnerable tenants. Any system needs to have such provision built in. It would be for all users of the service—landlords and tenants. Where it is appropriate, people should be able to access any type of advice, support and information that they need.
Sarah-Jane Laing: I agree with John Blackwood. We do not want to create a system in which legal representation becomes the norm. It must be there for when it is required, but we do not want a system in which it becomes a business.

Gordon MacDonald: It has been suggested that there could be scope for the tribunal to charge a fee. What are your views on that?

John Blackwood: That would depend on the fee, as you can imagine. A charging system is currently in place in the sheriff court system. We are open to looking at the issue in the context of the tribunal service, when it has been properly costed.

Let us not get too bogged down in the charging process and who would pay for what. What is important is that we produce a system that is effective, robust and easily accessed by all, and in which all users—landlords and tenants—feel that the system will listen to their case and operate in their best interests. I think that tribunals can do that better than traditional court services.

Sarah-Jane Laing: What is important is that we have an effective system. If it is deemed necessary to charge fees to ensure that the system operates effectively, we will not object to that.

Gordon MacDonald: We heard from Shelter Scotland and the Govan Law Centre that the tenancy regime in the private rented sector should be changed to give tenants more rights. What is your view on that?

Sarah-Jane Laing: The Shelter proposals are not just about giving tenants more rights; they are much more complex, when we look at them in detail. They are about making the tenancy regime work more effectively. I do not think that landlords’ representatives would argue with that; where we disagree with Shelter is on how to achieve such effectiveness. Shelter’s view is very much that we should remove the short assured tenancy and move to assured tenancy.

However, we have been able to provide evidence on why the short assured tenancy is used. It is used largely for two reasons. First, it provides flexibility for both parties. We have evidence of landlords trying to offer longer tenancies, but tenants not wanting them. The other reason is to do with the lack of confidence in the court system, which I mentioned. If a landlord is not confident that they can get their property back as a result of rent arrears or another reason, their default position will be a short assured tenancy. If we can create confidence, I think that the sector will change and longer tenancies will be provided. There might even be a move to assured tenancy.

However, it is very much about change coming about as a result of increased confidence, rather than because of regulation.

John Blackwood: I concur with that. It is important that we get the message across that we support the current short assured tenancy regime. Research by the Scottish Government backs up the claim that both landlords and tenants feel that the regime is in their interests—there has been recent work on the matter. The Scottish Government is actively involved in reviewing the system and hearing from all stakeholder interests.

There is an argument for reconsidering the system. For example, landlords think that the grounds for repossession are not strong enough. We often hear from communities about antisocial behaviour. Landlords feel disempowered and feel unable to take action on it through the courts, and communities feel that no one is doing anything about the problem. There is an issue in that regard, perhaps more so than there was 30 years ago, when legislation to deal with such problems was introduced.

We need to consider how to modernise the service without throwing the baby out with the bath water. The current system works.

Patrick Harvie (Glasgow) (Green): The witnesses represent organisations that want bad practice to be driven out of the sector, and I am sure that all stakeholders share that view. A concern is that even if the tribunal system works well, there is a big disincentive to raising issues in the first place. Someone who has a complaint but knows that they can be given a month’s notice to quit will not make that complaint. If you are not convinced by Shelter’s proposal on security of tenure, what would be a better way of removing that barrier and ensuring that people have the confidence to express concern and to challenge bad practice where it exists, without feeling that they will lose their home?

John Blackwood: There is an issue to do with tenants getting used to the service and feeling that it is accessible to them. The current service is not publicised enough; tenants are not aware of it. I know that lots of tenants access the service after having been issued with notice to quit—the private rented housing panel is able to continue cases even when tenants have been given notice. The system needs to be used more, and perhaps that can happen if information, advice and support is given to tenants. Likewise, landlords need to have confidence in the service.

It is still a new system. The tribunals have only recently been introduced and many people out there are still not aware that they exist. I think that they are important and that they do a good job. However, we must ensure that everybody is aware of the new system and can access it, and that there are no legal or financial barriers to their doing so.

Patrick Harvie: There may be no legal or financial barriers, but if someone still feels that they will lose their home, that is obviously a barrier that is very difficult to overcome.

John Blackwood: It can be, but I question whether that is much of an issue for tenants taking their cases to the tribunal, because that is certainly not what I have seen going through the tribunals so far. Perhaps some people are put off before they even approach the tribunal, but I am afraid that we do not know that that is the case. I do not see much evidence of that at the moment. I am sure that it must happen, but the point is that we need a system in which people feel confident. I do not know whether security of tenure alone would address the problem.

As I said, we often have tenants who have already been given notice to quit, so their security is gone but they still pursue cases through the PRHP because they want their case to be dealt with. That is an important message to get across.

Patrick Harvie: I am sure, however, that I am not the only member who has had such concerns raised by constituents who I do not think are making it up. Thank you very much, convener, for the opportunity to ask the question.

The Convener: Okay.

Mark Griffin wants to address other issues related to private rented housing.

Mark Griffin: What are the witnesses’ views on the bill’s provision to allow third-party applications by local authorities to the PRHP to enforce the repairing standard?

Sarah-Jane Laing: We are wholly supportive of the proposals in the bill.

John Blackwood: We think that the provision is a very positive step that would help tenants who feel disenfranchised in that respect. The provision would allow local authorities to take on their cases.

Mark Griffin: Is other action required to improve physical standards in the private rented sector?

John Blackwood: Overall, improved enforcement of the existing legislation is needed. We see that as being the problem, largely. As we have said many times, landlord registration is not being enforced properly by our local authorities. That is often put down to a resourcing issue. Even with cases that are going to tribunals at the moment, is anybody really enforcing that regulation and taking action against a landlord as a result? We are not seeing that. We therefore need to ensure not only that people can access the legislative provisions that we have, but that the provisions have teeth and are properly enforced. That is a big issue for us.

Mark Griffin: Do you therefore agree with the Government’s intention to introduce at stage 2 a provision on enhanced discretionary powers for local authorities to designate enhanced enforcement areas to tackle poor standards in private rented housing?

John Blackwood: Absolutely—we have no problem with that at all.

Sarah-Jane Laing: We originally suggested that approach a number of years ago in order to focus limited resources on problems that had been identified. We have no problem with the Government’s proposal.

Mark Griffin: Do you agree with Shelter Scotland’s suggestion that carbon monoxide alarms should be mandatory in all private rented properties in Scotland?

Sarah-Jane Laing: Yes.

John Blackwood: Again, we have no problem with that. Electrical safety should be taken into consideration, too. Safety measures are recommended at the moment, but there is no legal requirement to have them. However, it is in everybody’s interest to ensure that properties are as safe as possible.

The Convener: So, you would be quite happy for electrical safety measures to be made mandatory as well.

John Blackwood: Indeed. We are on record as supporting that proposal.

Mary Fee: Part 4 of the bill provides for the regulation of letting agents through the establishment of a register of letting agents, with the necessity for them to pass a fit-and-proper-person test. Do you agree with that general policy approach of a regulatory framework? If so, what benefits would that have for landlords and tenants?

John Blackwood: We agree with that approach. The regulation of letting agents is long overdue. There was always a question as to whether this Parliament had jurisdiction to deal with the matter, so we are delighted that it is considered that it does and that the issue can be progressed.

We have heard for a long time from landlords—tenants are saying the same thing—that somebody could set up an office in the high street of their local town without the need to be regulated by anybody at all. They can set up as a letting agent, take rent, carry our property repairs and take deposits, but nobody is checking that.
Ultimately, the landlord is the legally responsible person, but landlords say that it is not right that somebody can set up a business in that way. They assume that somebody, somewhere—at the very least, trading standards—has checked them at some point. That anomaly has always existed. I hope that the proposed system—we will need to ensure that it is properly enforced and has teeth—will make sure that letting agents are properly checked and registered and that a fit-and-proper-person check is carried out on those individuals.

There are issues when companies are checked out as opposed to individuals. What could happen—this is a concern of ours that we want to share—is that an agent who has run away with the tenants’ deposits and the landlords’ rents could close down their high street office one night and set up a new office on the same high street the next day under a new trading name and nothing can be done about those individuals. That situation—it has happened a number of times in Scotland—is wrong.

As part of the fit-and-proper-person test we must take into consideration previous offences carried out by a company’s principals, as well as the company name, if that is a legal entity in its own right. There are issues around how we enforce the fit-and-proper-person test when we are dealing with legal entities or, in other words, companies.

Sarah-Jane Laing: As John Blackwood said, both organisations are on record as saying that we support the proposals. Landlords, as well as tenants, have suffered through bad practice by letting agents. We do not oppose the proposals at all. However, we have an issue with the definition of a letting agent. Under the terms of the Antisocial Behaviour etc (Scotland) Act 2004, a tenant farmer is deemed to be a letting agent for the head landlord. We do not want to impose duties on a family relative who is managing a property on behalf of someone else.

Mary Fee: A code of practice will be developed. Will some of the concerns that you have raised be covered in that code? Should that code include other elements?

Sarah-Jane Laing: All the issues to do with good practice, unfair fees and widespread bad practice are fine to cover in a code, but the issues with the definition must be dealt with through the legislation.

John Blackwood: We welcome the consultation on the code to which the Scottish Government has committed. Our organisation has been looking at a range of things, such as whether agents should have professional indemnity insurance. That is the sort of thing that you would expect from a commercial outfit and which would be in the consumer’s interest. However, I question whether that would be appropriate in the case of a family relative who is managing a property on behalf of someone else.

Mary Fee: What measures should the Scottish Government undertake to ensure that letting agents, tenants and private landlords are aware of the registration requirements?

John Blackwood: It largely comes down to good publicity, to be honest. We had the same argument and the same issues with landlord registration. It is a bit easier with commercial firms, as letting agents are easier to identify—they tend to be more visible in our high streets and local communities, and they advertise their properties at some point, making them easier to access. Again, however, it is about ensuring that the information is proportionate and targeted.

People must be aware that enforcement action will be taken. At the moment, there seems to be a culture in our sector in which people think, “Well, nobody does anything about it, so it doesn’t really matter whether we’re registered.” That is not good news for good agents, of whom there are many out there who are doing a really good job. They feel that they are always the ones who have to pay the dues and sign up to everything while nobody chases the bad agents. We must ensure that the bad ones are being chased. We believe that that would be in the interests of all consumers, tenants and landlords alike.

Sarah-Jane Laing: Lack of awareness has been an issue with all new regulation for the tenancy sector. One of the issues has been the fact that we have a plethora of acts and new legislation of which there is a lack of awareness not just among tenants, but among landlords. The Scottish Government is to be commended for having spent a lot of time and effort in trying to raise awareness. The most success has been achieved where action has taken place at quite a local level. Scottish Borders Council, for example, really took ownership of the awareness-raising aspect and there were radio campaigns and campaigns within the letting pages of the local newspapers. That approach seems to have achieved much more success than nationwide campaigns. All of us in the sector have a role to play—it is not just down to the Scottish Government to raise awareness.

John Blackwood: It is important to emphasise that agents, too, welcome registration, as they believe that it is a good, positive step in legitimising their businesses. Letting agents are not generally regarded by society as being the best of the bunch in providing a service to local communities, so those who are providing a good service welcome registration. We hope that it will distinguish them from others, and for the industry overall it is a positive step in legitimising what is already a very good service. We must make sure that it continues to be so and is seen to be so.

Mary Fee: Do you think that the proposals will provide landlords and tenants with easy access to a redress mechanism that will help to resolve disputes between letting agents and tenants?

Sarah-Jane Laing: I think that it will, but as part of the system. If it was on its own, as a stand-alone measure, I would have concerns. However, if it is linked to the new tribunal, I think that it will.

John Blackwood: Exactly. It is only a positive step. Who they feel they are contracting the service from is an issue for many tenants. They get the property from the landlord and the agent is the middle man, but the agent has not entered into any contract with the tenant. Tenants are not aware of that—nobody informs them of that and makes them aware of their rights and what they can do if something goes wrong. Equally, they could have a gripe with the agent as opposed to the landlord, just as the landlord could. Often, if the middle man does not communicate properly with both the landlord clients and the tenants of those landlords, that is where things start to go wrong. If there is a redress mechanism, at least experts can get round the table and have a really good look at the situation to see where bad practice is happening and how it can be stopped or changed.

The Convener: There may be cases in which the mechanism to resolve disputes just will not do that. Should there be more penalties for rogue landlords and letting agents, to hammer home the point that they have to be up there with the best or we are not going to get any improvement in the relationship between tenants and landlords and improvements to the properties?

Sarah-Jane Laing: As John Blackwood has touched on, we do not need more penalties; we need more use to be made of the penalties that we have and more profile to be given to penalising that bad behaviour.

John Blackwood: I think that that is true. We do not have any regulation for letting agents at present, so anything is welcome, but the point is that a number of bits of legislation are in place that are just not being enforced. There is an issue with the enforcement of that legislation and with its being publicised that it is being enforced. We could send that strong message to landlords and agents alike.

Patrick Harvie: The issue about enforcement of existing legislation has come up two or three times. Is there room for the bill to do a bit more to achieve that, particularly in relation to the deposit protection system? I have honestly lost count of the number of tenants who have contacted me to say either that they are being denied information to which they are entitled—it has to be said that that is most often by a letting agent, but sometimes it is by a landlord—or that they have not been told whether their deposit has been protected. In many cases, people are told that they will have other charges or fees or so-called advance rent, but that that is not really a deposit, when it is a deposit in all but name. Apparently, the Scottish Government still cannot gauge the level of compliance with the deposit protection system. What could the Government do, through policy, the code of practice or the bill, to get the system working better and to prevent bad agents and landlords—I am sure that they are in the minority—from finding workarounds rather than complying with the spirit of the system?

Sarah-Jane Laing: There are a couple of points to pick up there. On the scale of compliance, I think that, at the outset, the Government overestimated the number and levels of deposits... held in Scotland. At the time, we certainly made representations on that, because we had canvassed our members, and we knew that only about 50 per cent of them actually took deposits. However, when the Government looked at the sector as a whole, it assumed that the figure was much higher. That is why the Government is struggling to gauge the level of non-compliance. Similarly, the discrepancy in relation to the level of non-compliance with registration arose because the number of landlords in Scotland was underestimated.

However, there is no excuse at all for non-compliance with the tenancy deposit scheme regulations, for landlords who take a deposit. Regulations are in place to say that any other fees are illegal so, again, the issue goes back to enforcement. Local authorities, through the landlord registration process, can take such issues into account. More instances should be being fed into the landlord registration process, and questions should be asked about whether someone is a fit and proper person to be a landlord. We have no problems at all with that being used as relevant information. However, there is no excuse for non-compliance with the tenancy deposit scheme standards.

John Blackwood: Again, I concur. It is difficult for us to gauge the numbers. We still do not know how many private landlords are out there, and we are going on the basis of how many have registered. On the assumption that the majority have registered, we are saying how many have lodged deposits. Often, we come to the conclusion that all landlords take a deposit but, especially in rural communities in Scotland, we find that that is not the case and that deposits are not taken. It is always difficult to know that.

Patrick Harvie: Yes, but it is pretty clear that some letting agents, including large and very professional ones, simply stop calling it a deposit and start calling it advance rent. Tenants find that they are in the same position as they would have been in previously, because in effect they have a deposit that is entirely unprotected.

The Convener: Alternatively, it is called a management fee or something like that.

John Blackwood: Advance rent is not a deposit, so I take issue with Mr Harvie on that. Advance rent covers only rent on a property and is not used for any deductions that a landlord could make for damage. However, I can understand the principle.

Patrick Harvie: In some cases, it is used for that. If tenants are told that they will not be charged a deposit any more, but that their advance rent will go from one month to two months and when they leave they will get some of it back if they have not damaged the property, that is a deposit in all but name—it is a workaround.

John Blackwood: Well, certainly, if landlords say that the tenant will get something back if there is no damage at the end of the tenancy, that is a deposit. I am talking about genuine cases of advance rent. In fairness, that happens and it has always happened; we should not automatically confuse the two. We argued that this would be a problem if tenancy deposits were brought in. We said that people would find a way round it. There will always be a way round it.

Patrick Harvie: That is what I am asking. How do we stop that? How do we crack down on that kind of behaviour?

John Blackwood: A good way could be through the new tribunals service. At the moment, it is not easy for tenants to take summary cause action through the sheriff court system. They are often not aware that they can do that. They could be made more aware of it through the tribunals service, if we get it right. It should be easier for them to access such a service. That would be a positive step, rather than having people take the cumbersome route of the sheriff court.

Patrick Harvie: If they had the confidence to do it without thinking that they are going to lose their home.

John Blackwood: Yes, although many who go through the system do not find that their deposit is not protected until the end of their tenancy. It is only when the tenancy comes to a natural end, or the tenant wants to move out, that they research everything and realise that the landlord or letting agent never lodged the deposit in the first place. Even beyond the end of the tenancy, the legislation is such that they still have three months to make a claim against their landlord.

A big issue is that many letting agents have not complied with the law, which has disenfranchised the landlords for whom they are acting, because the landlords are liable in law but the agent is not. That is wrong, and many letting agents have been hiding behind that. That is a major issue and it is probably bigger than we realise.

The Convener: We move on to discuss mobile home site licensing. Sarah-Jane Laing, your organisation’s response to the Scottish Government’s consultation on licensing of caravan sites indicated that it did not believe that the proposed licensing of mobile home sites would be the best way of preventing rogue operators from continuing to operate. Your organisation also expressed concerns about the fit-and-proper-person test for mobile home site owners, and about the three-year licensing period. Does your organisation still have those concerns and, if so, why?
Sarah-Jane Laing: Our concerns relate to the operation of landlord registration. They are built on our experience that the landlords who operate within the system and who are fit and proper are the first to register, and the first to reregister after three years, while the rogue landlords still have not registered. Our concern was that if a similar system is set up for mobile home parks, the ones that are already being run to standard will be the first to register and will already have reregistered before we have targeted the ones that need to raise their standards.

We have no problems with looking at ways in which to raise standards but, as it is laid out, the system has inadequacies. We wonder whether replicating a system that is almost aligned with landlord registration is the right way to go.

The Convener: I have a fair bit of experience in this area and it seems to me that some local authorities are much better at registration systems and keeping tabs on mobile home sites than others are. To be fair, we are not talking about a huge number of sites throughout Scotland, so what are your concerns? The local authorities should know where their mobile home sites are and which have registered and which have not.

Sarah-Jane Laing: Certainly you would think that. When I worked in the local authority and private rented sectors, we knew where some of the bad landlords were. However, how the system was set up meant that it was hard for local authorities to target the resources where they were required. The focus was very much on licensing the landlords who came forward. It was the same during the first round of HMO licensing. I know that the number of mobile home sites is not the same as that, so, if the local authorities are convinced that they know where all the mobile home sites in Scotland are, we have no issue.

The Convener: Do you have any comments, Mr Blackwood?

John Blackwood: No, the issue does not come within our organisation's remit, so we do not have a comment.

The Convener: Sarah-Jane Laing, I suppose that this question is for you as well. What are your views on the enforcement provisions for proposed site licensing? You might have answered this question already: do you think that they are an effective deterrent to rogue site operators?

Sarah-Jane Laing: I think that the Scottish Government’s proposals do deliver. They refer to the term "the polluter pays" and the Government has developed a system of sanctions under which the person who is responsible and who should be sanctioned and fined will be.
RICS Scotland

1. A global organisation, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors (RICS) is the principal body representing professionals employed in the land, property and construction sectors. In Scotland, the Institution represents over 11,000 members comprising chartered surveyors (MRICS or FRICS), Associate surveyors (AssocRICS), trainees and students.

2. Our members practise in sixteen land, property and construction markets and are employed in private practice, central and local government, public agencies, academic institutions, business organisations and non-governmental organisations.

3. As part of its Royal Charter, RICS has a commitment to provide advice to the government[s] of the day and, in doing so, has an obligation to bear in mind the public interest as well as the interests of its members. RICS Scotland is therefore in a unique position to provide a balanced, apolitical perspective on issues of importance to the land, property and construction sectors.

4. RICS Scotland comprises many working professional group boards and forums relating to the aforementioned sectors, and recently initiated the member-based RICS Scotland PRS Forum.

5. This Call for Evidence was circulated to members of the forum for their assessment of the Bill’s provisions regarding letting agent registration, and their views have been collated within this response.

6. RICS Scotland tenders this submission having recently provided oral evidence to the Scottish Parliament’s Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee on the Housing (Scotland) Bill’s provisions for letting agent registration (part 4).

7. Additionally, RICS Scotland has discussed Part 6: Private Housing Condition of the Bill with expert members of the RICS Scotland Quantity Surveying and Construction Professional Group Board and the RICS Scotland Building Control Professional Group Board.
Part 4: Letting Agent Registration

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

Oral Evidence

8. The Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee’s Call for written views on the Housing (Scotland) Bill, solicited the following: Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

9. During the oral evidence session, RICS Scotland provided the following key points on various aspects of this query regarding letting agent registration:

10. Following consultation with relevant sector participants, including RICS, before publishing this bill, Scottish Government Ministers instructed officials to pursue ‘Option 2’.

11. RICS Scotland supported, like most of the letting industry stakeholders and representative bodies, the foundation of ‘Option 3’.

12. Whilst ‘Option 2’ falls short of the more consistent and targeted regulation of ‘Option 3’ that RICS Scotland supports, we recognise this development as a step in the right direction.

13. However, for option 2 to realise desired policy outcomes, in terms of raising professional standards and reducing consumer detriment, it is absolutely vital that there is a consistent and effective approach to enforcement of the proposed registration arrangements and associated code of practice.

14. RICS Scotland would like to emphasize that should letting agent registration go ahead, as set forth in the current provisions of the Bill, that it is important to ensure that Registration is not misperceived as Regulation – nor that “registered agents” are considered “regulated” or “accredited” agents.

15. It has been indicated that the Property Factors Act will form a ‘template’ (we use this term loosely) for the Letting Agent Registration element of the Housing Bill. RICS Scotland has published an impact review report on PFA, and is currently in dialogue with Scottish Government on its findings:
15.1 The compulsory registration of property factors has not stopped rogue factors. This is because the necessary “qualifications” for registering as a property factor are too low and very simplistic. So much so that some property factors with a history of malpractice are now legitimised to practice.

15.2 This shortcoming is coupled by both a lack of a visible policing body that enforces registration and monitors the sector, and the view that many owners and tenants are unaware of the need for their property factor to be registered, and abide by a code of conduct.

15.3 On a related note, the report indicated that the Code of Practice, and subsequent Standards, are too minimal.

UN Global Compact for Sustainable Development

16. During the oral evidence session, the Chair of the Committee asked the RICS Scotland representative “As a signatory to the United Nations’ Global Compact for sustainable development, what elements should a Code of Practice include to help the sector develop more sustainable business practices in line with the Compact’s 10 principles, in particular Principle 8, ‘undertake initiatives to promote environmental responsibility?’

17. The UN Global Compact is a strategic policy initiative created by the United Nations for businesses that are committed to aligning their operations and strategies with ten universally accepted principles in the areas of human rights, labour, environment and anti-corruption. By doing so, business, as a primary driver of globalization, can help ensure that markets, commerce, technology and finance advance in ways that benefit economies and societies everywhere.

18. To improve responsible business practices in the land, real estate and construction industry, the United Nations Global Compact and RICS (Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors) are jointly developing a best practice toolkit for the sector. This collaboration was in January 2014 and will run for 2 years.

19. The primary goal of the collaboration is to support the process of developing a best practice tool kit for the real estate, land and construction sector. To this end, the UN Global Compact and RICS are working together to meet the following three objectives:

   a) To identify key opportunities and challenges for the land, real estate and construction sector pertaining to the Global Compact’s issue areas and United Nations’ goals;
b) To actively engage UN Global Compact participants from the land, real estate and construction sector as well as associated users and stakeholders to capture and scale up existing best practice efforts and initiatives in applying and implementing the Ten Principles of the UN Global Compact;

c) To elaborate on the Ten Principles of the UN Global Compact in order to develop a sector specific practical toolkit tailored to the needs of the land, real estate and construction sector and its "downstream users", by initiating a constructive intra-sectoral dialogue

20. By being signatories to the whole of the Global Compact, RICS has an obligation to “undertake initiatives to promote environmental responsibility”.

21. In considering the embryonic stage of the collaboration, RICS is not in a position to sufficiently advise the Committee on how the principles can be implemented into the proposed Code of Conduct beyond what we have stated above.

22. However, RICS would welcome the opportunity to discuss future activity and progress of this collaboration with the Scottish Government and Parliamentarians.

RICS Scotland Views on Letting Agent Registration

23. In considering the potentially pivotal role that letting agents will play in the lives of many Scottish citizens, RICS Scotland welcomes the prudent move by the Scottish Government in making provisions to raise standards in the sector.

24. As previously stated, RICS Scotland favours option 3 – the introduction of a legal obligation that all agents must be a member of a recognised professional or trade body.

25. If option 3 is not taken forward, RICS Scotland makes the following recommendations on letting agent registration:

25.1 The registration process system would need to be more robust than its Property Factors Act counterpart by comprising, for example, details beyond basic personal or company details.

25.2 There needs to be a visible policing body for the letting agent sector, with a purpose to inspect and investigate the industry, in a bid to scope out unregistered, or sub-standard, practitioners.

25.3 The letting agent registration system would also have provisions for ensuring that letting agents that fail the ‘fit and proper’ person test, or are struck off, are not allowed to re-enter the sector.
through alternate means; for example, by taking a “lower” position in large firm i.e. not director level, as to avoid “detection” when the company applies for registration.

25.4 Registration should include a renewal that is more regular than the every three years proposal.

26. Members of RICS, and other accreditation or trade bodies, already have to adhere to a code of conduct that includes the elements mentioned above, and more to ensure excellency in practice standards.

Costs of Letting Agent Training

27. Article 220 of the Housing (Scotland) Bill Policy Memorandum (which illustrates the notions of option 3 (A legal obligation to join a professional or trade body]) states that “This approach would also be likely to place the most significant financial burden on the industry. All letting agent businesses would be required to undertake mandatory accreditation and training, before being considered for membership of a professional or trade body.”

28. RICS Scotland believes that the notion put forward in this statement was one of the key reasons for the rejection ‘option 3’ a suitable course of action to raise standards in the sector.

29. If the Housing (Scotland) Bill provisions are to eliminate poor or malpractice and raise standards in the sector, then it is imperative that personnel who practice as letting agents – as sole practitioners or as part of a firm – undergo regular training.

30. If training of letting agent businesses staff is not undertaken, then standards will more than likely decrease over time.

31. Therefore, an adequate level of training will be required, and this will naturally place a financial burden on sector participants.

32. RICS Scotland believes that the raising of standards can only been achieved through ongoing training, or Continuous Professional Development (CPD), of market participants in order to ensure letting agent business staff are knowledgeable and compliant with any legislative changes.

33. RICS members have to undertake 20 hours of CPD to ensure they are aware of new best practice methods and procedures and recent legislative changes. This is one reason why RICS Scotland, and other sector bodies, endorse ‘Option 3’. Members of other accredited bodies also have to partake in developmental programs of a similar nature.
34. In a letter to this Committee from the Scottish Government’s Bill team Leader, the proposed details of criminal offence if failing to register were outlined. This letter stated “It will be an offence to operate as a letting agent without registration (at section 39). A person who commits the offence is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months, to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, or to both. It is also an offence (at section 40) for a person who is not registered to use a number purporting to be a letting agent registration number in any document or communication, without reasonable excuse. A person who commits that offence is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 in the standard scale.

35. RICS Scotland wishes to raise key questions relating to the above points:

35.1 What mechanisms will be put in place to ensure that individuals who fail, or are removed from, the registration scheme cannot return to practice via alternate means?

35.2 Who will enforce or police the industry?

35.3 Can offenders apply for registration following their imprisonment term or payment of an imposed fine?

35.4 Where will the monies raised through fines, and potential registration fees, extend to?

35.5 Code of Conduct

36. RICS members already have to adhere to a code of conduct. Will there be provisions for RICS members, and members of other accreditation bodies to bypass the need to sign up to another Code? We refer to paragraph 14 of this submission regarding registered agents and regulated agents.

37. We would recommend that the Code of Conduct undergoes thorough consultation to ensure it carries weight and is accepted by the sector.

38. The code of conduct should be legally binding with and make obligations to ensure that practitioners:

- Avoid conflicts of interest and any actions or situations that are inconsistent with its professional obligations;
- Provide regular training and/or continuing professional development (CPD) for all staff;
- Make provisions for their tenants and landlords to access a comprehensive complaints handling procedure;
- Have access to separate client money bank account and client money protection; and
- Carry professional indemnity insurance.
39. We also believe that the Scottish Government should provide guidance for organisations and firms on how to adhere to all elements of the Code, and consider the provision of a rough template for the written statement.

40. RICS is well-placed to assist with the code of conduct formation should letting agent registration proceed as the preferred method, and offers expertise and knowledge on this particular element.

Reason for Regulation as the Preferred Option

41. RICS Scotland has put forward this element in its submission to the Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, but wishes to reiterate the benefits of option 3.

42. Principles-based regulation, targeted where the risks are greatest, have the following three distinct elements:

   i. legislation/standards;
   ii. enforcement; and,
   iii. redress.

43. RICS consumer surveys indicate that consumers want more consistent and targeted regulation of residential agents.

44. Other supporters of regulation of letting agents include: ARLA, CLA, Ombudsman Services, The Property Ombudsman, and Which?

45. Recent RICS impact assessment research shows there is a robust business case for full regulation – this was included in our written submission to the Scottish Parliament Finance Committee’s Call for Evidence on the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

46. In short, the summary figures from this research indicate that the benefits will outweigh the costs in less than 2.5 years (if regulation was obligatory on a UK-wide basis).

47. RICS’ proposed approach to regulatory reform mirrors the now well established approach in the financial services market. The benefits of introducing clear, consistent, and targeted regulation covering all aspects of the UK residential property market will include:

   - consolidated and reduced legislation/regulations;
   - a simplified regulatory framework – easier for consumers and businesses to understand;
   - reduced costs associated with business compliance; and
   - enhanced consumer protection.
48. A copy of RICS Scotland’s submission to the Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, which outlines the benefits and costs of professional body membership, can be found here: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_FinanceCommittee/ROYAL_INSTITUTION_OF_CHARTERED_SURVEYORS_H.pdf

Redress Mechanism

49. The Housing (Scotland) Bill Call for Evidence queried. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

50. RICS Scotland agrees that a redress mechanism is required – but it will all come down to the detail.

51. RICS Scotland would not have an issue with a nominal charge, £25 as an example, for dispute body applications. This could deter vexatious cases and “serial complainers”

52. The dispute body members would not only have experience in the sector, but also have to undertake regular training to ensure they fully understand new legislative provisions that affect the sector, and the possible impact of their decisions.

Part 6: Private Housing Condition of the Bill

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

53. Building maintenance is key to sustaining the fabric of the built environment - its value to the economy in employment and expenditure terms is equally significant.

54. RICS Scotland suggests the introduction of a mandatory Scotland-wide Planned Maintenance scheme for residential property in multi Ownership or Estate situations, following the example of ‘Home Reports’, is considered through legislation.

55. This legislation would also make provisions for ‘Scheme’ Planned Maintenance documentation and Guidance.

56. This scheme could be provided for by a mechanism within legislation for punitive measures, such as fines or similar, for non-compliance, to be imposed (Belgian Monument is a case example here).

57. The fabric of the Built Environment could be maintained, and therefore reduce hazards and subsequent risk to owners and public from building failures, collapse or decay.
A requirement for ‘Sinking Funds’ could be put in place, managed and maintained by all Owners.

This proposal recognises the following:

a) Money spent on this area should not be considered as money waste - in the long term, sustainability performance will influence capital value, as buildings which show good performance are likely to suffer less obsolescence and value depreciation.

b) Maintenance plans need to incorporate some flexibility in budgeting in case resources become more restricted or more available during the course of the maintenance plan.

c) Curtailing maintenance budgets should be presented clearly to the client.

d) Increased risk of disruption to building use due to breakdowns if planned maintenance is cut back.

e) A potential decline in the overall standard of the building and its probable effect on rents, asset value or salability.

Other Issues

Q17. Are there any other comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives or specific provisions?

Q18. Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

RICS Scotland supports an Electrical Safety Council (ESC) proposal to introduce mandatory electrical safety inspections in private rented housing.

RICS Scotland co-signed an open letter to the Housing and Welfare Minister Margaret Burgess in October 2013 to introduce a requirement for five yearly checks, by a registered electrician, of both fixed electrical installations in all rented property and any electrical appliances supplied with lets.

This proposal, and letter, was supported and co-signed by 12 trade associations, businesses and charities. A copy of this letter is attached in Appendix 1, and we refer the Committee to the ESC written submission for further background and information on this proposal.

RICS Scotland would like to suggest the expanding of the ESC proposal so that the Repairing Standard includes provisions for compulsory smoke and carbon monoxide alarms.

The mains operated smoke alarms should be fitted by an approved electrician, such that multiple alarms are interconnected; properties on more than one level must have a smoke alarm on each level; and that the entrance to each room must be within a maximum allowed distance of an alarm unit.

65. We would also suggest that The Repairing Standard is further amended to state that every property must have suitable CO alarms in each room that has a gas appliance or, if in a cupboard, then immediately outside the door to that cupboard.

66. This could be based on the standard set by Edinburgh Council for HMO properties such that they must be long life (5 years plus) and have batteries which last as long as the alarm.

RICS Scotland

Dear Ms Burgess,

ELECTRICAL SAFETY IN THE PRIVATE RENTED SECTOR

How we live is changing. The Private Rented Sector (PRS) in Scotland has more than doubled in size over the last decade, with ever more families and vulnerable people renting privately. As a consequence, the PRS will continue to play an important role in meeting housing need. But all too often, private renters face poor conditions and serious safety hazards.

According to government statistics, over two thirds of all accidental fires in Scottish homes (more than 3,000 annually) are caused by electricity. Independent research also suggests that private tenants are more likely to be at risk of electric shock or fire than owner occupiers.¹

Whilst we welcome the Scottish Government’s efforts to improve conditions in the sector and drive up standards, more must be done to reduce risks to private renters by putting precautionary measures in place to ensure their safety.

We the undersigned believe that housing standards in the PRS can be improved without placing a significant additional burden on landlords, and that improving electrical safety for tenants should be a core part of any new requirements.

Given that a new Housing Bill is due to be considered in Holyrood before the end of this year, we urge you to seriously consider any future regulation that would further improve the PRS, including:

- Mandatory five-yearly safety checks by a competent person of electrical installations and any electrical appliances supplied with lettings
- Mandatory provision of RCD protection in all properties²

Improving standards will not only benefit tenants but also help landlords keep their properties safe from the risk of fire. Making private renting a better option is crucial to ensuring everyone has a safe, affordable home to live in so we hope that you will seek to introduce these much-needed changes and will await your response with great interest.
ASSOCIATION OF RESIDENTIAL LETTING AGENTS (ARLA)
WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Background:

1. The Association of Residential Lettings Agents (ARLA) was formed in 1981 as the professional and regulatory body for letting agents in the UK. Today ARLA is recognised by government, local authorities, consumer interest groups and the media as the leading professional body in the private rented sector.

2. In May 2009 ARLA became the first body in the letting and property management industry to introduce a licensing scheme for all members to promote the highest standards of practice in this important and growing sector of the property market.

3. ARLA members are governed by Codes of Practice providing a framework of ethical and professional standards, at a level far higher than the law demands, and the Association has its own complaints and disciplinary procedures so that any dispute is dealt with efficiently and fairly. Members are also required to belong to an independent redress scheme which can award a consumer financial redress where a member has failed to provide a service to the level required.

Part 3: Private Rented Sector

Q7: Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the Sheriff Courts to the new First-Tier Tribunal?

4. ARLA welcomes the proposals to transfer certain private rented sector cases from the Sheriff Courts to the new First-Tier Tribunal. Many organisations, including ARLA, have longed caller for cases involving the private rented sector, particularly landlord possession claims, to be moved out of the standard court system and into specialist tribunals.

5. However, we feel the provisions of the Bill could go further and would suggest the Scottish Government should consider transferring all landlord possession claims to the new First-Tier Tribunal. Such a course of action should have several positive benefits:

   a. Providing the First-Tier Tribunal is well resourced, this should speed up the possession process; meaning cases will reach court hearing dates much faster and allow landlords to gain Possession Orders in a much more timely fashion than currently exists. Indeed, anecdotal evidence suggests that landlords currently have to wait several months before a court hearing date becomes available; all while, in many cases, tenants have stopped paying rent. This delay causes landlords and letting agents significant financial hardship and places their businesses in financial jeopardy.

b. The Sheriff Courts are, by their very nature, generalists. This has resulted in some Sheriffs hearing landlord possession cases despite not being experts in housing matters and not always aware of recent developments in case law. The First-Tier Tribunals could appoint members who are experts in housing law and landlord possession cases to solely hear such matters. This will ensure decisions are made by experts in the field of the case and that Tribunal members can be easily updated on relevant developments in case law. This will result in much greater consistency in the application of the law than currently exists through the Sheriff Courts.

c. Only moving certain private rented sector cases to the First-Tier Tribunal is likely to cause confusion for letting agents, landlords and tenants as to where to bring a claim. This is particularly true for cases that may involve both rent arrears (brought by the landlord) which would sit in the Sheriff Court and repairing standards (either brought by the tenant or used as their defence to a rent arrears case) which would sit in the new First-Tier Tribunal (assuming the provisions in this Bill come into force). The result may be that two cases have to run simultaneously in two different courts. This will increase costs for all parties and may act as a significant disincentive for tenants to bring legitimate claims against unscrupulous and criminal landlords and letting agents.

d. Finally, in moving landlord possession claims into the new First-Tier Tribunal, much needed time will be made available in the already overstretched Sheriff Courts for other matters.

Q8: Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector

6. ARLA has always supported targeted enforcement by local authorities of the minority of unscrupulous and criminal landlords and letting agents who provide substandard accommodation and poor property management. They blight the industry and bring the entire private rented sector into disrepute.

7. It is regularly reported by tenant organisations and local authorities that tenants do not bring complaints against landlords and letting agents for fear of eviction. Therefore, we can certainly see the benefits in allowing third parties, such as local authorities (as outlined in Section 23(1) (a)), to bring repairing standard claims. This would both remove the fear of eviction from tenants and; as part of a targeted, intelligence-led enforcement operation; should help raise property standards in the sector.
8. However, we would suggest that any persons “specified by order made by Scottish Ministers” (as outlined in Section 23(1) (a)) should be restricted to public bodies in order to ensure a consistent approach to such third party applications.

Q9: Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

9. As has been stated at paragraph 6 above, ARLA supports the targeted enforcement by local authorities of the minority of unscrupulous and criminal landlords and letting agents who provide substandard accommodation and poor property management.

10. However, until the intended provisions have been announced, we are unable to comment on whether an area-based approach is the most appropriate method of achieving these aims. We would also suggest that before additional powers are created, robust scrutiny is required in order to determine why the extensive statutory powers local authorities already have to deal with poor conditions in the private rented sector are not being effective. Without such scrutiny and a clear understanding of why existing legislation is not being effective, the Scottish Government risks creating additional ineffective regulation.

Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10: Do you have any comments on the proposals to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

11. ARLA has long called for more regulation of the lettings industry. As you will see from paragraphs 1 – 3 above, we have strict entry criteria for membership (including the need for professional qualifications) combined with a requirement for Continued Professional Development (CPD), compliance with our own Code of Practice, participation in an independent redress scheme, the need for robust Client Money Protection procedures and regular financial reporting. Failure to comply with these strict conditions can result in financial penalties, compensation to tenants and the termination of membership.

12. As such, we do not feel a register of letting agents is sufficient to remove the criminal operators from our sector. We also do not think that the proposed Code of Practice (outlined at Section 42) which will contain a prescriptive set of requirements is sufficient to raise standards in the industry. Codes of Practice are only effective if users understand the background to why certain provisions are contained within the Code and why they need to comply with them. The only way letting agents will gain this level of understanding is by undertaking appropriate training and qualifications which is then backed up with CPD. This is the way the medical, legal and many other professions already operate and we would strongly urge the Committee and the Scottish Government to look to these professions as a model for how the lettings industry should be governed.

13. Therefore, we feel the Scottish Government may be missing an opportunity by only creating a register of letting agents and a Code of Practice. Last year ARLA produced a comprehensive proposal for regulating the property sector (attached as Appendix One). We would urge the Infrastructure and Capital Investments Committee as well as the Scottish Government to consider our suggested approach with a view to using the Housing (Scotland) Bill as an opportunity for much more comprehensive regulation of the letting industry. We firmly believe this is the only way of removing those criminal letting agents from the sector and feel the Scottish Government has both the ability and political will to show real leadership over the other legislatures of the United Kingdom on this issue.

Q11: Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents in Scotland and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

14. We consider the proposals outlined in sections 43 – 46 as sensible and reasonable mechanisms for resolving disputed between letting agents and their customers. If the committee were to take forward our recommendations outlined in paragraph 5 above the PRS Tribunal could become a very effective body for dealing with all issues relating to the private rented sector in Scotland.

15. Indeed, if the committee and the Scottish Government take forward the recommendations we have outlined in this Call for Evidence, ARLA believes Scotland can create a model framework for the sensible, appropriate and practical regulation of the private rented sector.

Association of Residential Letting Agents
28 February 2014
Why the letting industry needs regulation

The Association of Residential Letting Agents (ARLA) has campaigned over many years for regulation of the letting agency sector. The majority of letting agents are professionals, working in the interests of their clients and consumers. However the sector is tarnished by the conduct of a minority of agents who fail to adhere to basic standards. Failure to protect client money, mis-advertising of properties, failure to properly maintain leased accommodation and provide a safe environment for tenants – all of these issues must be addressed.

Failure to do so will mean that rogue agents continue to blight the sector, failing consumers and undermining trust in the majority of responsible agents.

Industries including energy, telecommunications and transport are currently regulated, and rightly so. Energy bills constitute a significant proportion of the average family’s budget, consumers should be able to expect basic standards from digital communications providers, and promotion of safety on our roads and railways is paramount.

Yet the property sector on the whole – and the lettings sector in particular – remain largely unregulated. Given that the average member of the public spends significantly more on rent or a mortgage than they do on energy or transport, for example, it beggars belief that such an important industry is not properly regulated. This needs to change, and soon.

ARLA believes that the best way to tackle rogue agents and promote professionalism and basic standards in the letting sector is to introduce a system of mandatory regulation for those working in the letting, sales and management of property.

Currently, anyone can set up a letting agency. They can do so without appropriate qualifications or industry knowledge – leading to a public perception of ‘wheeler dealers’ dominating the sector. There is also no requirement to participate in a client money protection scheme, meaning that significant sums of money belonging to tenants and landlords are put at risk. And agents can operate without any sort of professional indemnity insurance. It is little surprise that as a result, not all letting agents operate with the professionalism, expertise and ethics that ARLA agents do.

In the absence of full, mandatory Government regulation, ARLA has introduced a licensing scheme for its members. We believe this scheme provides the most effective protection for consumers currently on offer. However not all agents are members of professional bodies such as ARLA, and the levels of professionalism and consumer protection vary widely as a result. There are many agencies that are failing consumers – and the time has come to do something about them.
Why we need regulation now

At a time when the Government is working to reduce red tape and bureaucracy – which is to be welcomed – new regulation may not be seen as desirable. However the private rented sector (PRS) in the UK is growing at a rapid rate, and more households are renting privately than any time in the past fifty years\(^1\).

According to the Government, more than 3.6 million households in England rent their home from a private landlord\(^2\) - making up one in six UK households.

The PRS is also expanding at a rapid pace – it made up just 8 per cent of housing tenure in 1993/94, but by 2010/11 this figure was 16 per cent\(^3\).

In the past, private renting was broadly used for short term tenures – often by young people and students. Yet today, the PRS is no longer the 'stop gap' that it once was. More than one million families with children are renting privately\(^4\) – almost double the number that were just five years ago – and this figure continues to rise year on year.

Likewise the PRS is increasingly becoming an involuntary mode of tenure for young people, many of whom are unable to build up enough capital for a deposit to buy a home (or unable to secure a mortgage from increasingly cautious banks).

Of course, many who use the private rented sector do so voluntarily – it offers flexibility, choice, and an alternative to investing in buying a home. However with more and more private tenancies come more unscrupulous landlords and letting agencies. As a result, standards in the sector are, according to many measures, slipping:

- 37 per cent of homes in the PRS in England fail to meet the Government's Decent Home Standard\(^5\)

• During the last year, there were over 85,000 complaints about private landlords\textsuperscript{7}
• 62 per cent of those complaints were about serious hazards – e.g. dangerous gas and electrics\textsuperscript{8}
• There were 487 successful prosecutions against private landlords last year – up by 77 per cent\textsuperscript{9}
• Calls to a Shelter helpline from PRS tenants about concerns over how their deposits are being protected have increased by more than 80\% over the last two years\textsuperscript{10}

Furthermore as availability of social housing stock drops and pressure on housing stock grows, more and more vulnerable people are moving into the PRS.

In short, we have a rapidly growing sector serving more and more people, with all projections pointing towards further rapid growth in the years ahead. And as the economy recovers from recession, we will likely see rents rising across the sector. In these circumstances, consumers will need better basic protection.

ARLA believes that we need to address these issues as a matter of urgency, with mandatory regulation of the sector, to ensure that tenants are protected in the future. Without government action, millions of PRS tenants – many of whom are vulnerable – will potentially face poorer housing conditions and unscrupulous agents.

Consumer confidence is paramount to revive faith in the letting sector. ARLA sets out below how we think that this can be achieved.

The problem

With the majority of letting agents operating legitimate, professional practices, one could argue that it is the responsibility of consumers to make an informed choice about which agent they use. In reality, the system is much more complex.

At present, there are a huge number of organisations, industry bodies and government departments involved in the letting and property sector more widely, all playing a different role, which complicates the industry for consumers:

\textsuperscript{6} http://england.shelter.org.uk/news/october_2012/complaints_about_landlords_up_almost_30

\textsuperscript{10} http://media.shelter.org.uk/home/press_releases/rent_deposit_complaints_up_80_in_two_years
Multiple Government Bodies

Various Government Departments have oversight over the sector – for example BIS is the sponsor department for the estate agency sector whilst DCLG oversees the lettings sector. However given that many agencies offer both lettings and sales, this arrangement clearly does not make sense.

DECC also has oversight of environmental standards in rented accommodation, whilst the Office of Fair Trading (OFT), a non-ministerial government department, and Trading Standards also hold various responsibilities within the sector.

Multiple Means of Redress

Likewise in terms of bodies offering some sort of redress, the landscape is very complex. Trade bodies such as ARLA and the NAEA offer a complaints process for their members’ clients, ensuring that agents acting unprofessionally or against ALRA policy are dealt with appropriately. However a number of other means of lodging complaints also exist.

Local Trading Standards are a port of call for many, whilst complaints can be made about private landlords to local authorities. The OFT handles complaints about estate agents, and The Property Ombudsman (TPO) and Ombudsman Services – Property are able to consider disputes referred by landlords or tenants relating to lettings and management – but only if the agency in question is a member of the relevant scheme.
In short, it is not always clear to tenants – and consumers more generally – where and to whom they should complain about their agent or landlord, and who holds responsibility for oversight of the sector.

Kite Marks and Accreditation Schemes

Finally, and serving to increase the complexity of the sector further, several ‘kite marks’ and accreditation schemes are also emerging – in part as an attempt to remedy the lack of regulation in the sector.

ARLA and the NAEA, like RICS and others, operate a comprehensive licensing policy for their members.

Other ‘kite mark’ schemes have however emerged, particularly in recent years, which have served to complicate the sector – particular for consumers who are looking for a simple, known brand that denotes quality and professionalism.

- SAFEagent – a mark denoting firms that protect landlords and tenants money through client money protection (CMP) schemes – is one recent example – although these schemes have different rules and parameters
- Likewise, the Mayor of London has recently proposed a London Rental Standard, which accredits both landlords and letting agents through a voluntary scheme
- Finally, and like London, new and emerging schemes are being developed in both Scotland and Wales, serving to complicate the landscape further

Whilst these schemes are inevitably well intentioned, the result is a hugely complex system which consumers do not understand.

| Tenancy Deposit Schemes – e.g. The Dispute Service | • Various schemes that adjudicate issues around deduction disputes for deposits at the end of a tenancy |

Too much complex legislation

Finally, the lettings sector – like the estate agency sector – is subject to multiple pieces of legislation, creating an unclear, complex environment in which agencies must operate. The RICS ‘Blue Book’ – a best practice guide developed in conjunction with consumer groups and industry bodies – lists no fewer than ninety pieces of legislation currently on the statute book that apply to the sales and lettings sectors across the UK.

Navigating such a complex legislative landscape is a burden for agents. Furthermore, different laws and regulations are overseen by different government departments, serving to complicate things further. In short, an overly complex legal landscape only increases the likeliness of agents failing to adhere to the law.
The solution

ARLA believes that through the implementation of a new, comprehensive regulatory structure for the whole property professional sector, a simpler, more transparent system would emerge – trusted by consumers and industry alike.

The following section sets out ARLA’s current thinking, and proposes a simple, feasible model for regulation. However we are not wedded to one model, and are open to discussion on how regulation should work. ARLA would welcome the views of parliamentarians, government, other industry bodies and consumers about how a new regulatory structure could, and should, work.

Under this simplified regulatory structure, letting agents and other property professionals would be licensed, registered and monitored by an accredited industry body – such as ARLA, NAEA, RICS and others. These bodies in turn would be audited and overseen by a single industry regulator. ARLA would propose that The Property Ombudsman would be the most appropriate body – its structures already exist, and would only need to be ‘beefed up’ and better resourced, as opposed to created from scratch. We would also encourage a wider debate about which body would prove the most appropriate for industry oversight.

We would propose that for each level of the regulatory structure, the roles are as follows:

Industry regulator

- A single industry regulator would oversee the work of a number of accredited bodies across the lettings, sales, management and landlord sectors
• It would audit these accredited bodies and, should it be necessary, remove their ability to grant licences
• It would also act as a final port of call for complaints from consumers – handling complaints in instances where the complaints process of the relevant accredited body has been exhausted without satisfactory results

Accredited industry bodies

• All letting, estate and management agencies, and landlords, would be required by law to be members of an accredited industry body
• In the letting, sales and management sectors, accredited industry bodies would be required to register all members, and to license members based on a comprehensive set of criteria, including:
  ✓ Education and qualification to a satisfactory level
  ✓ Use of an approved client money protection scheme
  ✓ Holding of professional indemnity insurance
  ✓ Proof of external examination of client accounts and satisfactory accounting practices

• Accredited industry bodies would be the first port of call for consumers looking to complain about the service that they are receiving from an agent
• These bodies would also be responsible for provision of relevant training – for example on legal issues – and for the promotion of best practice throughout their memberships
• Finally they would be responsible for monitoring the activities of their members, and where unprofessional conduct has taken place, use their powers to take disciplinary action – including revocation of licenses if necessary

In the case of landlords, licensing would be overly onerous, given that many landlords own just one or two properties. However landlords would be required to register with an accredited industry body, which in turn would be responsible for promotion of best practice

Property Professionals

All companies and landlords operating in the property sector should be required by law to hold membership of one of these accredited bodies. This regulatory structure allows for a choice of memberships, which is essential given that some letting agents also manage properties; some estate agents also offer lettings etc.

In order for an agency to be licensed, they would need to demonstrate to the accredited industry body that they are promoting professionalism amongst their client facing staff – for example through provision of qualifications. Without a basic ‘entry level’ criteria for those working in the professional property sector, there needs to be a degree of flexibility in this regard. For example, we cannot expect a letting agency to sponsor their staff through significant amounts of training before taking up a client facing role.
ARLA would propose therefore that licences are granted at a company level. Companies would then hold responsibility for ensuring that their staff attain relevant qualifications. Basic criteria for licensing should be established – for example a requirement to ensure that all client facing staff are fully qualified within three years. Failure to do so would result in an agency risking their licence, and the accredited industry body would hold responsibility for monitoring this.

Landlords should also be required to hold membership of an accredited industry body – for example the National Landlords Association (NLA) or Residential Landlords Association (RLA). Given that in the UK many landlords own just a few properties let out for private income – as opposed to being full time property professionals – ARLA would propose that registration is compulsory, but licensing is not.

We would envisage that under this new regulatory structure, the burden on local authorities would be reduced, as landlords would be required to register with an accredited body, and professional standards would be encouraged across the sector.

Ultimate oversight – the Department for Communities and Local Government

ARLA believes that one government department should hold responsibility for overseeing the property sector more broadly, as well as the appointed sector regulator (e.g. The Property Ombudsman). When so many estate agents offer lettings, and vice versa, it seems illogical that BIS currently oversees estate agency, whilst the DCLG oversees lettings.

The establishment of clear lines of accountability will ensure a transparent regulatory structure. Oversight by just one department will reduce the burden on industry bodies and agents to understand a highly complex legislative landscape, and will also ensure joined up thinking across the estate and letting sectors, which currently is somewhat lacking.

Case Study – Medical Regulation in the UK

ARLA’s proposed regulatory structure for the property sector is similar to that utilised to regulate medical professions in the UK. The Professional Standards Authority is the industry regulator, overseeing nine organisations – for example the General Medical Council – and auditing their performance. These organisations in turn oversee one or more of the health and social care professions (e.g. opticians, or dentists) by regulating individual professionals across the UK. This structure ensures that an expert body oversees specific professions – as ARLA would oversee letting agents for example – whilst also providing for overall industry supervision and audit, with clear lines of responsibility and accountability, as well as a clearly defined and transparent complaints procedure.
The advantages

ARLA envisages that the introduction of mandatory regulation of the property sector will result in a number of advantages – for consumers, industry and government alike.

Advantages for consumers

- Consumers want a simple and recognisable quality standard. A key problem for consumers is that there is currently no one, clear mark of a responsible, professional agent or landlord. Multiple industry bodies and ‘kite marks’ exist, resulting in confusion. A simple regulatory structure should remedy this.

- A clear means of redress. Consumers will be able to look for ARLA accreditation – or similar – as a clear signal that the agent in question is reputable, licensed and monitored. There will be clear means of redress should a consumer not be satisfied with the service that they receive. There will also be a single body to which a consumer can raise their complaint, in the case that an initial complaint to an accredited industry body is not resolved satisfactorily.

- Illegitimate agents will be easy to identify. With all legitimate agents registered with an accredited body, consumers can be confident that they are dealing with a professional agency, adhering to basic standards.

- Raising standards. As a result of compulsory licensing, the quality of rented accommodation should rise, resulting in more satisfied customers, and better safeguards on health and safety.

- Consumer trust in the sector will improve. All evidence suggests that current consumer trust in the letting sector is very low indeed. Through licensing agents and promoting professional practice, consumer trust will improve. Vulnerable consumers will receive the same level of protection, and rogue agents will be forced out of the market – or forced to change their practice – as a result.

Advantages for industry

- Although some within the property industry are opposed to mandatory regulation, these individuals tend to be those that would be forced to improve their practices as a result of regulation. Rogue agents operating illegitimate agencies would suffer as a result of statutory regulation. Shelter has argued that for the landlord sector, regulation “would protect, not affect, good and law-abiding landlords”\(^\text{11}\). The same can be said for letting agents sector.

- Professional, reputable agents on the other hand – including those represented by ARLA – have been calling on the Government to introduce mandatory regulation for many years. The reputation of letting and estate agents is poor – almost exclusively as a result of unlicensed, unprofessional agents damaging the reputation of professionals.

- Not many industries call on the Government to increase or strengthen regulation. Yet in the property sector, a regulatory vacuum has allowed rogue agents to thrive. ARLA therefore believes that mandatory regulation would be a positive move.

- The system does not need to be overly complex or burdensome – letting agents are not calling for more red tape and bureaucracy. What is needed is a simple structure and clear lines of accountability within which legitimate agents can operate, whilst unprofessional practices are weeded out.

- Finally, the property sector is currently burdened by both a considerable range of relevant legislation, as well as a number of government departments with which the sector must engage. By simplifying legislation, potentially repealing repetitive laws, and giving one government department – the DCLG – oversight of the entire sector, a simpler, more transparent system emerges. Industry would welcome this.

Advantages for government

- ARLA understands that the Government is working to reduce the regulatory burden on businesses – this is to be welcomed. However regulation does have a legitimate place in some areas, and the property sector is one such sector.

- The Department for Business, Innovation and Skills is operating a ‘one in, one out’ policy on regulation at the moment. ARLA’s suggested regulatory structure would add new regulation for businesses – the DCLG – oversight of the entire sector, ample opportunity to reduce regulation elsewhere.

- Numerous pieces of legislation – from across different Government Departments – apply to the property sector, including many that are decades old. ARLA believes that the Government should look to consolidate these laws, scrap unnecessary red tape and use the opportunity to legislate for a basic regulatory structure. Much of the organisational infrastructure is already in place – including The Property Ombudsman and industry bodies. As such, a new regulatory system would be about structuring these bodies in a meaningful way to promote accountability, as opposed to creating new regulatory bodies.

- ARLA also believes that the Government can save taxpayers’ money by using our proposed regulatory structure. By giving one government department responsibility for oversight of the sector, multiple workstreams will be merged and result in economies of scale. Likewise the need for joined up thinking across Departments will be reduced, saving effort and time. We would envisage that the number of civil servants working in this area could be marginally reduced.

- By simplifying legislation, savings could also be made. Likewise savings would be made at the Office of Fair Trading (in the short term) and at Trading Standards, allowing these organisations to concentrate on their core roles, and local authorities would have to spend less capital overseeing landlords locally.

- Finally, by introducing mandatory regulation of the property industry, we can expect the amount spent in the courts on disputes to fall rapidly. The Government estimates that tenancy breakdowns and evictions currently cost around £120 million per year\(^\text{12}\). Regulation and the promotion of professional practice should result in this figure falling significantly.

Wider advantages

As demand for private rented housing increases, so too must the supply. In the UK, much of the private rented sector is owned and run by relatively small private landlords and agents. Indeed only 1% of landlords in the UK own more than ten properties\(^\text{13}\). This alone is unlikely to satisfy demand – we need to do more to encourage institutional investment in private housing for let.

This was the recommendation of Sir Adrian Montague in his recent report for the Government on barriers to investment in private rented housing. Sir Adrian pointed out that in 2009/10 there were just 115,000 new build housing completions in England, whilst projections suggest that the number of households will grow by an average rate of 232,000 per year until 2033\(^\text{14}\).

One barrier to institutional investment in the sector is the reputation of the lettings and management industries – and ARLA believes that promoting a more professional industry is vital to encourage investment. We need to expand and improve the managerial capability of the sector to demonstrate to investors that the PRS is ripe for both investment and returns.

As Sir Adrian Montague also argues, the benefit of building more homes for private rent is not just satiating rising demand – it is also a key driver of growth. Housing construction, repairs and maintenance are worth an average 3% of GDP over the last decade\(^\text{15}\), whilst housing construction supports jobs – for every £1m of new housing output, 12 additional jobs are supported\(^\text{16}\).

Conclusion

ARLA believes that the exponential growth that we have seen in the private rented sector – and the growth that is widely expected over the coming years – means that the time is right to regulate the letting industry. ARLA also believes that a cross-industry approach – encompassing the estate agents, managing agents and landlords that lettings agents work with every day – would ensure a simpler, yet more comprehensive system. Clear lines of accountability, compulsory licensing and statutory regulation will lead to a more professional property sector, weeding out rogue agents and promoting consumer protection.

Like all industries, we do not want to see over-regulation. We support the Government’s drive to rid industry of unnecessary red tape and bureaucracy – particularly during tough economic times. However regulation – if implemented in a pragmatic way – does have its place. For most people, monthly rental payments (or mortgage repayments) are their biggest single expenditure. When so many other industries, which account for less of the average person’s outgoings, are regulated, it rather begs the question – why shouldn’t we regulate the property sector?

The advantages of regulation are numerous. Consumers can expect a better experience when dealing with letting agents and other property professionals, their money and rights are protected and better quality rented accommodation will result. Industry too will benefit – unprofessional practices will be weeded out and the reputation of the sector will improve as fewer members of the public have to deal with the small number of agents that tarnish the reputation of the industry. And the Government too will reap the rewards in the medium term, with fewer laws to enforce, fewer civil servants to employ in this sector, and the cost of resolving property disputes through the courts falling.

This paper sets out ARLA’s current views, and proposes a feasible model for regulation. However we are open to discussion on how regulation should work – our position is not set in stone. Indeed in order to make regulation work as best it can, a full and open debate – encompassing agents, landlords, consumers, industry bodies and the Government – is paramount. We hope that this paper catalyses that debate.

LETSCOTLAND

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

LetScotland was formed in 2013 and currently has a growing membership throughout Central Scotland, the mission statement for LetScotland in representing the Letting Agent industry in Scotland is, LetScotland – the Association of Professional Letting Agents in Scotland, is the new representative voice for professional letting agents in Scotland. It is making the case for a strong, sustainable and successful private rented housing sector.

General comments

Letting Agents fulfil an important role within the broader housing market.

The improvement in services provided by landlords, letting agents and property managers is vital.

In the same way as individual landlords need to be encouraged to invest and supply good quality housing so do the national and international investors to provide scale to this supply chain which is in urgent need of additional numbers both for sale and rent.

Renting housing has to be encouraged as an option by householders as a matter of choice. Improvements in the supply and quality of houses and the associated services has the potential to achieve this along with attracting the required investment.

Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

This proposal will simplify and speed up private rented sector cases and make the court process more user friendly and less intimidating for landlords and tenants. This will be particularly beneficial in speeding up the eviction process for landlords who are unfortunate enough to find themselves with a tenant who fails to pay rent or commits other serious breaches of their tenancy agreement. The potential for higher quality and more consistent rulings from more specialised tribunal decision makers is also welcomed.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities' discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

The ability for local authorities to apply to the private rented housing panel for a determination on the repairing standard will provide a means of addressing poor standards in individual properties without having to rely on the tenants to take action against their landlord. This will assist in cases where tenants feel too intimidated by the landlord or the application process to take action themselves, or where they feel that direct action on their part may cause the relationship with their landlord to deteriorate and consequently put them at risk of losing their tenancy. It will also help in situations where the tenant has already vacated the property (or been evicted) but the local authority still wishes to take the case to the PRHP.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action in an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

This proposal will not only benefit those tenants who reside in areas characterised by poor conditions in the PRS, but will also improve the overall image of the PRS, which for some time has suffered at the hands of poor landlords and letting agents. It will also assist local authorities who are undertaking regeneration work in particular areas in forcing private landlords to improve their properties in line with other properties in the local area.

Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

This is a welcome proposal as it will drive out poor practice and improve standards. It is essential that the reputation of the industry is improved while at the same time providing landlords and tenants with better recourse in the event that they are dissatisfied with their agent.

We believe there should be a new stand-alone Letting Agent Register operated by the Scottish Government.

The Register should include all businesses which let and manage private rented residential property in Scotland. However, we would not support simply replicating the processes and principles established for the Property Factors Register. Whilst it has improved that sector, this system is not robust enough in our opinion for the letting and management sector, and considerable consideration needs to be given to the detail of implementation for our sector.

A strong Code of Practice is needed. Along with the other representative organisations, we welcome the planned consultation in preparing the Code as secondary legislation.

Registration should include:

an annual renewal (not every 3 years)
a legally binding commitment each year to possessing the following:
professional indemnity insurance client money protection
a ring-fenced client money bank account annual audit of client accounts membership of an Ombudsman scheme to ensure an easily available and cost effective redress mechanism for tenants and landlords.

Depending on the registration processes put in place there could be a requirement for the agent to produce annual documentation to confirm the above. It may be more appropriate to consider the registration process to be more the issuing of a Licence approving the Letting Agent.

We believe that any Registration process should be Government operated free of any involvement with professional bodies such as the RICS or ARLA and others. Agents should aspire to differentiate themselves in the market place by achieving the standards required to gain membership. Within the code of practice there may be the requirement over a period of time to require owners of and staff employed in an agency to be say 50% qualified to a certain level of professional knowledge and competency.

The operation of a Licensing system could be carried out within the same departments that effectively implement the HMO Licences issued by the Councils in Scotland. They have the skills; it would be a case of achieving an acceptable licence fee to the letting agent industry balanced with the cost of operating by the respective Councils.

The impact of these proposals on our industry is to be welcomed. It will however highlight even further the disparity in enforcement that currently exists on compliant letting agents and landlords and those who operate below the required standards. The passing of legislation and implementation of registration of Letting Agents will create an environment where landlords who are self-managing will perceive the enforcement of regulation on them to be far less onerous. We recommend that at the same time as these regulations are implemented that the Landlord Registration regulations are enforced more robustly

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

See the above comment about Ombudsman services in response to Question 10; under these schemes redress is readily available to customers of such organisations at no cost to the claimant.

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?
For landlords of properties in multi-ownership buildings this proposal will be of great benefit in ensuring that essential repairs can be carried out even when some property owners cannot be identified or are unable or unwilling to contribute. It will put an end to the current situation that some landlords can face in having to cover other people’s share of communal repairs in order to comply with the repairing standard for their property and provide a compliant property for their tenants.

LetScotland are pleased to have been part of this consultation and would be pleased to explain further its comments as and when requested by the Committee.

Housing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Our third agenda item is evidence on the Housing (Scotland) Bill from representatives of letting agents organisations. I welcome Kathleen Gell, who is convener of the Council of Letting Agents; Jonathan Gordon, who is chair of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors Scotland private rented sector forum; Ian Potter, who is managing director of the Association of Residential Letting Agents; and Malcolm Warrack, who is chairman of Let Scotland.

I also welcome Patrick Harvie MSP, who has joined us.

I invite questions from members.

Adam Ingram: Good morning, lady and gentlemen.

I will start with a gentle general opening question. The Scottish Government has a vision that all people in Scotland “live in high quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs.”

To what extent do you think the bill’s provisions support that vision?

Ian Potter (Association of Residential Letting Agents): I think that the bill goes some way towards that. It is like any other piece of legislation: it depends on how well it is enforced. Currently, we have legislation that looks at the fitness of property generally, but there is a lot of evidence that it is not overly enforced by local authorities, which have the statutory powers. If we are just going to create another piece of legislation that will not be meaningfully acted on, it will not achieve what you are trying to achieve with it.

There are other areas in the private rented sector that provide examples of that. We know that not every landlord is registered. Some local authorities are very good and are working on that, but others are simply ignoring it. That is what is happening. Last week, I was at a landlord registration review meeting with representatives of local authorities and that is what they said is happening.

Tenancy deposit protection came in last year past November. Again, we know that there is a lot of compliance, but we also know that many tricks are being looked at to try to get round that, and there is no real evidence of anyone tackling that issue at the moment.

With the caveat that legislation needs to be seen to be enforced, I think that the bill could do an awful lot.

Kathleen Gell (Council of Letting Agents): I think that your aim is good, and the CLA welcomes it absolutely in order to give the good letting agents a better voice. There are rogue agents out there, although probably not as many as the public perceive, and the bill will help.

There are two issues. First, what is in the code of practice will be critical. We would certainly be keen to help to draft that code and feed into it at that stage.

Secondly, how the code of practice is enforced will be very important. We are all aware that enforcement has been a hot topic with landlord registration. That enforcement is patchy throughout Scotland, and landlords are very dismissive of that legislation.

I was very interested to hear Professor Duncan MacIennan at a recent RICS conference. His view is that we are perhaps lacking a longer-term strategy for housing in Scotland. Perhaps that needs to be looked at as part of the consideration. If we are seriously looking to have good-quality housing for the longer term, we need to encourage the private rented sector, and not just stamp down on bad practice. There must be a mix of both.

If I look at the fit-and-proper-person test for letting agents—

The Convener: We will come on to that.

Kathleen Gell: That test is very negative. I would like to see some positive things coming out.

Jonathan Gordon (RICS Scotland): The bill covers a diverse range of initiatives across the social and private rented sectors, and we think that the key issue is the right of redress for people across those sectors. Those are the most important positive aspects of the bill.

The RICS is the leading organisation of its kind in the UK. That is a bit of a plug for us, but it means that chartered surveyors are already qualified and regulated by their own self-regulating body to be letting agents, so we at the RICS have a good understanding of what regulation means. Client, consumer and public protection are at the heart of everything that RICS Scotland does and are part of our professional standards and our ethics.

As we see it, the bill does not include enough of that, specifically in relation to the private rented sector initiatives on letting agent registration. The Government’s vision of is an aim that we welcome, but we do not think that the measures in the bill are quite strong enough. They could be adapted and amended through the bill process, but without proper enforcement and professional standards in the industry, a list of things that have to be done will not be self-enforcing. There are many examples of cases in which that approach does not work.

Malcolm Warrack (Let Scotland): Without repeating what has been said, I would like to pick up on the word “vision”. As we move through 2014 into 2015, we have a wonderful opportunity to develop a vision to make the private rented sector something that, in the years to come—sitting within the broader housing market—operates well, has a good supply chain leading into it and is well managed and provided for from the point of view of services, and which allows us to look back and say that we got it right in 2014-15. We will come on to talk about the detail, but as far as the vision is concerned, I think that we are in a wonderful place to make some real changes and to create something that works for the future.

Jonathan Gordon: An issue that is often mentioned is how to improve standards in the industry. One of the most important ways of doing that would be to bring more new, high-quality properties into the market to compete with the existing stock. Much of the existing stock is made up of old properties that have old heating systems, are inefficient and do not meet many of the Government’s energy efficiency aims. New-build properties are built to a much higher standard on that side of things. If a whole block of new flats were built in each area that has a high rental demand, that would do much more than any of the measures in the bill to drive up standards, because people with properties to rent would have to compete with those flats and improve standards in their properties.

The Government commissioned research on the issue—“Building the Rented Sector in Scotland” was published before Christmas—and a lot more focus should be put on that, but I think that that is outside the scope of the bill.

The Convener: Before we proceed, do you have any idea of what proportion of letting agents your organisations cover? How many letting agents are still outwith your sphere of influence, if I can put it that way?

Kathleen Gell: The CLA has slightly more than 320 members at the moment, about 84 of whom have opted to sign up to an accreditation scheme as letting agents—the landlord accreditation Scotland scheme. I believe that there are 155 ARLA members in Scotland, but Ian Potter will be able to correct me if I am wrong.

Malcolm Warrack: We are a relatively new organisation, as we were formed in the middle of last year. We currently have around 50 members.

In answer to your question, about 30 per cent—maybe 40 per cent—of agents around Scotland are probably not members of groups such as ours.

The Convener: How many letting agents does 40 per cent represent?

Ian Potter: The key question is how an agent is defined. Are you speaking about someone who operates on the high street, someone who operates on the internet or Uncle Tom Cobbleigh who acts for his Auntie Mary? In our opinion, the latter example is often where the worst of the problems lie. It relates to cases in which someone acts purely for half a dozen landlords—who are often members of their own family—has absolutely no knowledge of the law that they are operating within and does what they want. That is when the consumer gets the worst experience. It often involves the worst quality of property, too.

The Convener: How many hundreds or thousands of those cases do you think there are?

Ian Potter: We can look at where other jurisdictions have started to try to identify agents through legislation. I will give the London borough of Newham as an example. Newham Council has now discovered, 15 months into its scheme of licensing all agents, that nearly three times as many agents operate in its borough than it had thought. It thought that about 3,500 to 4,000 landlords owned about 25,000 to 30,000 properties. It now knows that in excess of 10,000 landlords operate 38,000 properties.

An achievement of bringing in a measure such as this is identifying an accurate picture of the size of the market. We are all using best guesses. I have worked with civil servants on this as well, and they would accept that we have always been guessing how big the market is.

The Convener: Can you explain a bit more about how Newham went about that? Did it go through virtually every single property?

Ian Potter: Newham Council marketed a requirement—I used the word “marketed” advisedly. It created the legislation, which it had the power to do under the English Housing Act 2004, through which it created a licensing scheme, which it advertised from 1 January 2013. All landlords and all agents had to register with that.

The council has been seen to be out there, knocking on doors. It has been looking at its London Housing Authority payment records and asking whether benefit is being paid to a tenant in a property that is not registered to a landlord on the register. Is the agent who is dealing with the property—and quite often showing on a tenancy agreement that would have been taken in for an LHA claim—showing on the records? There has been lots of joined-up thinking and practical measures to identify agents and make that happen. Newham is now at the stage at which it is looking at active prosecution of people who have not but should have registered.

The Welsh Government is looking at a similar set-up. It is putting through a bill that is in some ways not dissimilar to what the Scottish Government is doing at the moment. I was at an evidence session there last week and exactly the same issues are coming up. In the meantime, in anticipation of the act, it has started trying to identify landlords and agents. Their numbers are going up exponentially.

Jonathan Gordon: There is a lot of information and it is hard to know how much of it you have seen. Around 12 per cent of households are in the private rented sector at the moment. That figure doubled in past years and Shelter estimates that it is expected to rise to 20 per cent over the next few years.

About half of those properties are managed by letting agents. We guess that there are about 1,000 letting agents in Scotland, but it is hard to tell, because there are so many individuals who manage five or 10 properties. They start off with their friends’ properties and then move on.

The biggest problem, which the bill would need some adaptation to cover, is that, although 40 per cent of agents are members of bodies, only 150 are regulated in any way. The RICS and ARLA provide a regulation scheme for licensed members, which leads to client money protection for their clients and professional standards and training, and all the benefits that come with that.

Although only a small number of letting agents might be rogue agents—as we call them—some of those are very large, well-known firms. Patrick Harvie mentioned one in a previous committee meeting, when he said that a well-known, large and very professional firm was trying to get round the tenancy deposit scheme. We would say that a very professional firm would not do that, so that firm is not professional. An RICS member—and I assume an ARLA-licensed member—would not try to flout the law; it would try to comply with it as best it can. It would work in the spirit of the law and not employ advocates to try to find wee nuances that would allow it to charge a fee. Professional standards are one of the key things that are important in an industry such as this, because consumers cannot be relied on to understand the market themselves and it needs to be laid out more clearly for them.

Adam Ingram: That is an interesting range of answers and I am sure that my colleagues will explore the issues that you have raised. Do you have any observations on the bill consultation process? Are you quite happy with how you have been consulted?

Ian Potter: I am nodding my head, so I might as well say yes, I am happy that the bill has been consulted on. Once the bill becomes an act, a lot more consultation work will be required on the impact of the secondary legislation. We would all welcome the opportunity to contribute to that consultation and we all believe that we have something to contribute to it.

Kathleen Gell: I feel that the consultation process was good. It is a fairly standard process, I believe, in the Scottish Government. The difficulty is that people are short of time and they do not make it a priority to respond. That is a weakness, but it has nothing to do with the Scottish Government—it is really down to apathy, you could say. I would like to know what happened with the tenancy reform proposals—I believe that somebody was tasked to set up focus groups throughout the country. That would be another avenue for gathering information and responses.

Jonathan Gordon: I sit on the tenancy review group that I think Kathleen Gell was referring to. I think that the key stakeholders who sit on that group are the right people to look at that issue. The same stakeholders were involved in this process. As Kathleen said, there has been very good research within that process involving the real stakeholders, if you like—the tenants and landlords out in the field. Some qualitative data has come out of that research, with some very interesting results in relation to that group.

The Scottish Government consulted the RICS and other bodies on three options before publishing the bill. Nobody was keen on the first option, which was to expand the landlord registration scheme. Option 2, which was chosen, is in the bill and is clear. Option 3 was to introduce a legal obligation that all agents must be a member of a recognised professional body. It was assumed that legislation would establish in law how that body or bodies would regulate their members. Scottish Government ministers instructed officials to pursue option 2. Although we recognise that that is a step in the right direction, we think that it falls short of the more consistent and targeted approach to regulation of option 3, for some of the reasons that I have mentioned already. We think that option 2 could be amended to get as close as possible to option 3.

The Convener: We will look at that area in more detail but, in general, were you able to put Jonathan Gordon: Yes.

Malcolm Warrack: Yes.

The Convener: Thank you. As set out in the policy memorandum, the Scottish Government has two main aims in part 4 of the bill:

“The first is to promote high standards of service and levels of professionalism across the country and the second is to provide landlords and tenants with easy access to a mechanism that will help to resolve disputes where these arise.”

We broached the subject earlier, but do you agree with the Scottish Government that there is evidence of poor practice? Can you expand a bit more than you did in your introductory remarks about how we can manage to promote higher standards of service across the country among your members and among those people who are not your members? Also, how can we try to get those people to the level of realising that they must register?

Ian Potter: For me, education is key. At the moment, anybody can be a letting agent. They do not need high street premises or any training; they can simply advertise for landlords to give them their property to let. They do not need to know what they are doing and, generally speaking, that is part of the problem.

The other part of the problem is lack of knowledge on the landlord’s part. When I operated as an agent in the west of Scotland, I spent a lot of my time explaining to my landlord clients what they could and could not do. It would be fairly typical for a tenancy agreement to say that once rent is 14 days late, the landlord would start to take action. A landlord might think that that means that after 14 days they can change the locks and the tenant is gone. We all know that, practically speaking, that cannot happen, because there is a legal process that has to be gone through.

Tenants are similarly uneducated in lots of ways. There is plenty of evidence to show that they do not read tenancy agreements. The student market is a brilliant example of that. Tenants do not need to know high street premises or any training; they can simply advertise for landlords to give them their property to let. They do not need to know what they are doing and, generally speaking, that is part of the problem.

Clear, simple language in guidance is needed. At the moment, virtually 100 pieces of legislation—consumer law, lettings law or housing and property law—impact on a letting agent in one way or another. An awful lot of primary and secondary legislation impacts on the sector. We acknowledge the ethos behind the legislation, but we have had several new housing acts in Scotland over the past few years and bits of all of them impact on the private sector. There are more and more different pieces of legislation to consider and we have to understand which pieces of legislation impact on others and which pieces supersede others. I think a long-term objective for the Government should be to introduce a consolidation bill.

Malcolm Warrack: I support what Ian Potter said. The education of all the main stakeholders—tenants, landlords and letting agents—should be brought up at the same time. I see a differential between how landlords and letting agents should behave under regulations. As the letting agent regulation comes through, it is important that landlords are encouraged to come up to similar standards. It all comes back to education.

Kathleen Gell: I agree with Ian Potter and Malcolm Warrack that education is key. As you know, I represent the Council of Letting Agents. I work closely with a group of fantastically dedicated people in a steering group. We are about raising standards, which is what our members want to see, so that letting agents are respected. We give freely of our very limited and precious time, because we think that this matters very much. We are a division of the Scottish Association of Landlords. SAL has its own complaints process; we are working on a complaints process for the CLA, which is very important.

We are working closely on education with Elspeth Boyle at Landlord Accreditation Scotland. We are looking at providing more training modules for letting agent members. Such training would be on-going and tailored to what letting agents want. We might decide as a body to insist on continuing professional development for our members.

My firm, which is a small family firm, happens to have chosen to be a member of the RICS, ARLA, the CLA, Landlord Accreditation Scotland and the safe agent fully endorsed—or SAFE—scheme. Very often, those things mean nothing to the man in the street. It is not just about educating the letting agents; it is about educating tenants and landlords as to why they should choose to use a member of a particular body. That is very important.

The Convener: I agree that education is key, but I do not agree with Mr Potter that students do not know about these things. My student children have been telling me what I should be doing with my landlord. Student associations are keen to ensure that university students know their rights and responsibilities when they rent properties.

Ian Potter: The National Union of Students says that its members do not read as much as they should. They perhaps do research once they have a problem—I would not disagree with that—but if we can eradicate the problems in the first place, that will help.

I will add to what Kathleen Gell said. We are—and have been for several years now—an awarding body that is regulated by the statutory body in the area, and we have a formally regulated qualification for letting agents. That is the only route by which we take in new members, who have to be qualified.

The Convener: Is there a queue to do the course and join?

Ian Potter: A lot of people are studying. They do not necessarily come and join us, although we wish that they would, but last year more than 500 people passed the technical award in residential letting in Scotland.

The Convener: Should regulation include a requirement for people to do that course or a similar one?

Ian Potter: That is what I was getting at in saying that people need to be educated. The course does not tell people everything—nothing ever will—but it makes them more aware of key problems and where to go to get advice on how to solve them.

Jonathan Gordon: This comment might move us slightly off topic. It is about misunderstandings about types of tenancy. The tenancy review group is looking closely at simplifying the tenancy regime so that people have a better chance of understanding it. Tenants have to sign up to eight pieces of paperwork for a letting agent, but our experience from taking over properties from other letting agents is that we rarely get all the pieces of paperwork, perhaps because people have not issued the tenant information pack or the prescribed information for the tenancy deposit scheme. That really comes down to training, so the point is relevant to our discussion.

Most letting agents are not trying to break the law or get round the legislation. We need enforcement where agents are doing that, but the problems are really about a lack of knowledge. There are so many letting agents in each town and city that it is hard for people to choose the best one, and there is no real competition because nobody understands what a letting agent should and should not do or how to judge them.

Going back to the registration scheme, I note that the RICS has some recent evidence that registration schemes in themselves do not improve standards. We have to start with a list of who is fit and proper, but people who are not fit and proper know that and will not apply; they will stay under the radar. We need something that hunts those people out.

The Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 is only a year and a half old but I believe that the registration scheme in the bill, although it is not going to match the provision in that act exactly, is intended to be similar to it. The RICS produced an impact review report on the act last year and is in dialogue with the Scottish Government on its findings. There are some issues with the registration scheme, which factors believe is not working.

Three key things came out in the review. The compulsory registration of property factors has not stopped rogue factors operating, because the necessary qualifications for registering as a property factor are too low and simplistic. Some property factors with a history of malpractice now see themselves as being legitimised to practise. A more robust registration process or system would help. It should comprise details beyond basic personal and company details so that we can explore a bit further who is registering.

I turn to one of the key dangers or risks of the current legislation as far as registration is concerned. Even in evidence to the committee, people keep asking about this part of the regulations or that part of the registration process. Regulation does not happen unless there is enforcement. There needs to be a code of practice, a list of people who are fit and proper and a redress system. There need to be professional standards and enforcement. There really needs to be a professional body overseeing what happens and making judgments on whether people comply with the code of practice.

We operate as a factor in a very small way—we factor one block of rented flats, as well as renting out those flats. We had to register through the property factors scheme. This is anecdotal, but we have read a number of written statements of services, which people produce to comply with the legislation, and found that they were misrepresenting the code of conduct in those written statements of services. How are consumers supposed to be able to unravel all that themselves? It is just not going to work.

Alex Johnstone: I return to a point that was raised earlier—we stopped that discussion because this question was coming. I want to hear your general views about the Scottish Government’s proposed model of regulation. In particular, how do you think it compares with the other potential options?

Jonathan Gordon: As I have said, the RICS thinks that it would be better to have a single professional body that is regulated. The best example is the RICS itself. It is established by royal charter and operates in accordance with a self-regulation model, and its members are heavily regulated. That regulation is enforced.

There is a requirement for people to do 20 hours of continuous professional development each year—people must comply with that. That does not mean that people cannot make things up, but the standards are there to be enforced by the body.

We have had auditors in our office, checking that we manage our client accounts properly. There are specific ways to manage client accounts. We must not let any one person’s ledger go into a negative balance; otherwise, if the company goes bust, the money has to come from somewhere else. Unless somebody is checking that and ensuring that people understand it, there is no point having a code of conduct that requires client accounts. Of course, that still means that if a company is going to go bust or is already engaging in malpractice and causing trouble for its clients, and if it can see that everything is going to blow up, it can easily move all the money out of the client accounts. In such a case, the clients would not be able to get their money back when the company goes bust.

Client money protection is one benefit of involving a professional body, with standards, training and enforcement. However, that is impossible without enforced regulation. People can buy various insurance policies, but policies do not cover the same things. It is like a big failsafe. For example, if someone puts £50,000 in the Royal Bank of Scotland, they might not know what is going to happen with RBS, but they know that the Government will give them their money back. RBS could have been allowed to go bust, but perhaps one of the reasons why the Government protected it was so that the Government did not have to give all the depositors their money back.

We need that basic level of client money protection, backed up by a professional body. That is another key thing that must be brought in. Three key things are already there, but one final piece of the puzzle is missing.

Malcolm Warrack: I have a fear that that route is somewhat exclusive. There is a route by which registration could be strengthened: all registered letting agents could be invited to carry out the requirements for membership of ARLA or RICS. That would include having professional indemnity, client bank accounts and an annual audit of those client bank accounts, and ensuring that all the certification takes place annually, not every three years, as proposed in the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 and the current proposals. A letting agent would be required annually to provide online legal confirmation that they were carrying out each of those activities. Something along those lines could be explored in detail so that we could reach the point at which the wish for everybody to be properly qualified would become an aim. That is not being achieved today.

The Convener: I do not want the witnesses to get into a bun fight about which body is better.

Kathleen Gell: I take issue with what Malcolm Warrack said. I make it clear that a client bank account is very different from client money protection. Members may or may not be aware that brokers out there offer client money protection to firms that act as letting agents and are not members of professional bodies such as ARLA or RICS, which require firms to have such protection. We in the CLA are tossing around whether we want to look at asking our members to move towards that.

If an agent has client money protection through those bodies, it is required to buy professional indemnity insurance and to sign up with one of the two ombudsman services. I have looked at that and spoken to Simon Morris from Ombudsman Services: property. Such a scheme is not hugely expensive and would in a sense be self-regulating.

Jonathan Gordon: I hope that a bun fight will not happen, because we four witnesses are all from regulated bodies. The RICS regulates my company; Kathleen Gell’s husband was my predecessor, so I know that her company is also regulated by the RICS; ARLA is a regulation body; and Malcolm Warrack’s company is a member of ARLA.

There is no argument about the principles; the key issue is what is cost effective for letting agents. We must remember that, if a letting agent carries out their business poorly and adopts poor practice, which affects landlords’ investments and the homes that tenants live in, it is essential that somebody checks what is happening. Malcolm Warrack’s self-audit idea is good but, if nobody checks, it will not work.

There are different types of client account. It is often said that an agent needs to have a non-designated client account or, indeed, a designated client account. Does anybody know what that means? I did not know until I got such an account, when the RICS told me what it had to look like.

There are different types of professional indemnity insurance. That insurance is key, because it is the ultimate backstop against a landlord’s investment being ruined. It is possible to sign a lease in the wrong way that ties in a landlord for ever, so that the tenant never has to leave. Some people might like things to be that way, and in some ways it might not be a bad thing, but at the moment, the legislation is complex and things need to be done in a particular way—the process is not simple.
My professional indemnity insurance quote this year included a different retroactive date, which meant that we would not have been covered beyond a certain date. The quote was cheaper because of that, but I had to adjust it, because the RICS tells me that my retroactive date must go all the way back. I hardly even know what “retroactive” means, but I have to fill in a thing for the RICS that asks whether my insurance is retroactive. I then have to check that the insurance is fully retroactive. Nobody understands that.

Alex Johnstone: I am keen to hear what Ian Potter has to say, but it is clear that the Scottish Government’s opinion is that requiring letting agents to be a member of a recognised trade or professional body would amount to self-regulation by the industry and would force smaller letting agents out of the market. How do we reconcile that?

Ian Potter: To be honest, I do not think that smaller agents would be forced out. I have a huge concern about the self-certification of compliance. Like the RICS, we have a compliance regime. The quality of what comes in—from agents that think that they are complying and which are trying to comply—leaves a lot to be desired. We must work with them to achieve full compliance. They let their professional indemnity insurance run out and forget to renew it, or they open a new bank account and do not get it designated as a client bank account. The annual audit picks those things up, but would there be that awareness with a self-certification scheme? The agents often come back to us and say, “The bank has made a mistake”. They provide evidence that they asked for a designated client account, but were not given that by the financial institution. That is where we need the audit; otherwise we break away all the protection we have been speaking about.

Another problem with client bank accounts at the moment—I do not know whether it has come across RICS’s radar; I only came across it recently in a meeting with the successor to the Financial Services Authority—is that banks are probably breaking anti-money laundering regulations by allowing an agent to open a designated client bank account. What due diligence was done on the client, who is the ultimate beneficial owner of those funds? A whole piece of work is going on to ensure that we can get regulation down that route, which would mean agents having to do a lot more due diligence work on their client. Letting agents are not covered under the money laundering directive, although estate agents are. You can go into a shop where half the business is regulated and the other half is not. That does not help the consumer.

One of the key things in the proposals in terms of impact is the fact that dispute resolution between an agent and a client through the Private Rented Housing Panel is very expensive. If you look at the evidence, you will see that the ombudsman schemes that currently operate for Jonathan Gordon’s members and my members are far cheaper to operate. The majority of consumer complaints are easily fixed—that is where the evidence about lack of education comes in. Let me give the example of a tenant who complains that they have been given notice to leave their property. The tenancy has come to an end—the landlord is legally ending it through the agent—but the tenant is unhappy. They do not want to leave, so they complain to the ombudsman. Taking such a complaint through the PRHP route would probably cost, according to the figures that have been quoted, between £1,600 and £1,800, which would be disproportionate to the problem. The consumer needs to be advised about that issue.

Some people take negatives out of the rise in the number of complaints that have gone to ombudsman schemes over the past few years. However, the rise in the number of complaints that have gone to ombudsman schemes—to which lettings agents have signed up voluntarily—is a positive, for the simple reason that it is evidence of the consumer starting to understand that a route exists that did not exist previously.

The number of agents that have signed up to the existing ombudsman schemes has grown exponentially since 2006, so you would expect the number of complaints to rise. When the bill is enacted, whichever body looks at complaints against letting agents has to be prepared to accept that the figures on impact that are in the papers are the equivalent of holding a finger to the wind to see what way it is blowing. I think that the figures will turn out to be much higher. The better agents, who are trying to do it right, have signed up voluntarily to those schemes. When we start to bring in the rest—as I believe that we should—we have to be prepared to see the numbers go up, but that is what consumer protection is about.

Jonathan Gordon: Alex Johnstone might want to ask about the redress situation itself, which I would have comments on. I think that his last point was about the specifics of letting agents going bust or going out of business if too much is forced on them.

I was not in the stakeholder groups myself, but someone from our policy team was, and there was a genuine feeling that the third option that I mentioned earlier was the preferred option. The key thing that stopped that was the issue of small agents not being able to afford the training and accreditation. The Government was concerned about that and that those small agents could go out of business, but the nature of any well-regulated market is that there must be some basic entry requirements.

I do not think that most letting agents, or even a significant number of them, would go bust, but if agents are not qualified to operate in the market and cannot afford the costs of training, they will not improve standards or provide basic protection for their customers, and those agents should leave the market.

For the bill to realise its desired policy outcomes of raising professional standards and reducing consumer detriment, consistent and effective approaches to the enforcement of the proposed arrangements and the associated code of practice are vital. Summary figures in a recent RICS impact research paper, which we can make available to the committee, suggest that the benefits will outweigh the costs in under 2.5 years. Those are high-level research findings on the costs to society and so on, but we have to remember that we are dealing with tenants’ homes that need protecting and tenants who cannot get what they need from their letting agent or landlord.

Quite a big study is being done for the tenancy review group, which has been mentioned a couple of times, and it will report soon. Qualitative research was commissioned, paid for by the Government, and interviews were conducted with tenants all over the country—in small towns such as Dumfries and Inverness, for example—to gather views on how well they felt the tenancy regime was working for them, whether they understood the lease that they had signed and whether they wanted a longer tenancy or more security of tenure. However, what the research fed back in was that they did not really care about those things. Few people—landlords or tenants—understood exactly what was happening with the tenancy regime. The comments that came back from the tenants were distressing to the group. Its report is the first research that I have seen on the issue, and I would recommend that everyone get a copy of it. It shows that there are people sitting at home with a boiler that does not work, so they cannot heat water to give their children a bath. Those vulnerable tenants are at the bottom of the ladder of ability.

We tend to manage properties in the centre of town that are let out to professional working people, or sometimes to students whose guarantors are professional working people, and those tenants can move. There have been landlords who have refused to do a repair, and we have given up those properties. In trying to get things sorted and make repairs happen, we have told tenants’ parents that landlords are not meeting the repairing standard and that we will give up those properties. We have also told them how they can resolve what is a repairing standard matter by going the Private Rented Housing Panel.

As I said, those people can move. For example, one tenant’s parents told the tenant just to leave and not to pay the next month’s rent, because the landlord was not fixing the problem. The tenant moved into a more suitable property and never came back. However, people who are living in more deprived areas and who are more vulnerable are not able to leave or to demand their rights. They do not feel empowered to act. It is those people who need to be protected.

Letting is not a simple process. Agents look after complex obligations, and there are letting agents who will allow landlords to manage their own maintenance. The question is whether that maintenance is being done poorly or well, and there are letting agents out there who will allow landlords not to meet the repairing standard while still collecting the rent, passing it on and signing the lease. That practice will not disappear with a registration scheme, but a bit more enforcement is required to create more compliance, even with existing legislation.

Mary Fee: Sections 26 to 52 set out the detail of how the regulatory regime will work in practice. I would be interested in the panel’s views on the proposals for registration of letting agents, the definition of letting agents, the fit-and-proper-person test, and the requirement for agents to reregister every three years. I note that Mr Warrack from Let Scotland takes the view that renewal should be annual. Why do you think that, Mr Warrack?

Malcolm Warrack: We have touched on the weaknesses of the property factors legislation. Letting agents will have a pivotal role in the housing market over the next five to 10 years. Whether they are controlled by the Government overseeing the certification of auditing and all the detail that my colleagues have just talked about, or by the RICS, a three-year period is too long to leave something before it is tested properly.

Whatever the fine detail that is determined at stage 2 with regard to letting agent registration, I think of it in almost terms of a licence. Perhaps letting agents should have an annual licence to operate. To be licensed, they could be required to provide certification to demonstrate that they have the things that we have been talking about: the right professional indemnity; the correct client bank account; and the correct audit of that bank account. There are other things, too, but the list is quite long so I will not go into it.

As we go through stage 2, the devil will be in the detail. We hope that the proposed legislation will provide an excellent example of what being part of a wider housing market can be in the years to come. I would like us to look back in five or 10 years' time and say that what we have is envied by the world. People refer to the private rented sector in the US and Europe in that way. I like to think that we can cherry pick the best elements of what happens in the global private rented sector, bring it to the bill and ensure that we get something that works for the long term.

Mary Fee: I agree that the devil is in the detail, and I am sure that we will get more detail as we go along. However, in relation to the fit-and-proper-person test, what would you like to see? What do you think should be required for someone to become a fit and proper person?

Malcolm Warrack: Ideally, it should be a professional qualification, but—

Mary Fee: If you want to think about it, you can come back to it later.

Malcolm Warrack: I will have to think about it and come back to you.

Kathleen Gell: I will comment on the fit-and-proper consideration as it is set out in the bill. As I said earlier, I feel that it is coming across in a very negative way, that it is not particularly helpful and that it does not set a minimum standard. The CLA wants to see a minimum threshold for a letting agent to be able to operate.

The situation with regard to qualifications is a little patchy in Scotland. I believe that one of the London universities is considering offering a degree specialising in residential property management. In Scotland, the highest level that can be reached by someone who wants to develop their career path in the PRS is a level 3 certificate, which is equivalent to a Scottish higher. It is not possible for an ARLA member to go beyond that in Scotland.

There are training opportunities—an excellent one is afforded by Elspeth Boyle through Landlord Accreditation Scotland. It is not for me to say this, but the Scottish Government could perhaps look at putting some funding into the bodies that are out there—for example, the Chartered Institute of Housing and Landlord Accreditation Scotland. It would be good to feel that the Scottish Government was helping letting agents to meet a minimum standard of competence.

When we look at the age profile of letting agents in Scotland, it is clear that we need to think about the future. The average age of most of us is certainly not in the 20s, so we need to develop career paths for people and enable them to become qualified and even better qualified. Let us set the standard in Scotland—please let us do that.

Mary Fee: What is your view on reregistration every three years?

Kathleen Gell: I agree with Malcolm Warrack that three years is far too long. Let us just get in there and check the position every year. A lot can happen in three years.

Ian Potter: There is a halfway house. I have no issue with the three-year licence; the issue is the checking that is carried out during that period. The suggestion about annual documentation offers a practical way forward.

My concern, from my practical experience of looking at the documentation, is about who will look at issues to do with client accounts, for example. We have succeeded in having registered auditors—chartered accountants—struck off for making false declarations on behalf of members. Whoever is looking at the documentation, whether it is the Scottish Government or a body such as my association, the question is how robust they can be. That is the key.

Jonathan Gordon mentioned professional indemnity insurance and retrospective cover. That is hugely important, because someone could have made a mistake two years ago and subsequently changed their insurer, and if they do not have retrospective cover, when the problem comes to light there will be no insurance in place—their current policy will not cover them.

People are generally comfortable with what something like motor insurance covers. They understand that if they change their insurer and then say that they had an accident three months ago the insurer will say, “Well you didn’t tell us—tough.”

Jonathan Gordon: I echo all that. Mary Fee asked about the registration scheme and the fit-and-proper-person test. I understand that the test for landlord registration in the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011 involves checking high-level details about criminal activity and so on.

It is important to know who the letting agents are and to have a list of them, and it is important that certain types of person should not be allowed to operate. The register is therefore a key starting point. In all the evidence that I have given, I have said that a fit and proper person should be a member of a professional body that regulates their activities and protects the public.

We have to keep going back to what we are doing. There has been a lot of research into problems in the sector and complaints about landlords and letting agents, but it is common for surveys to show that 79 per cent of tenants are satisfied with their agent—the statistic is cited on letting agents’ websites as a key reason why there is no requirement to legislate in relation to letting.
agents. However, we are talking about 300,000 properties, so perhaps 60,000 households are living in homes that are in poor repair—with no working boiler, mould in the bedroom and so on. That is a lot of homes, and the sector is growing.

I am here to represent the RICS, but as a letting agent who is regulated I have other comments to make. Whenever we take over properties from other agents or access properties that other agents manage—our company often has to get access to a property above one of ours, for example if there has been a leak—we find that the standard of knowledge among the letting agents that we meet is poor, even when they are from well-known companies, which are on the high street. There is no training, and agents show a lack of knowledge about the legislation and the documents that are required.

Some letting agents do not even know how to deal with simple maintenance problems. Regardless of tenants’ rights, landlords’ rights and everything else, they are meant to be managing the property and inspecting it every three or six months, depending on the type of property. What do those inspections involve? A landlord will expect the agent to look at the property and not only assess what is happening with the tenant but find out whether maintenance is required, whether anything is going to fall down, whether the tiles are coming off the wall or whether the grout is cracking. If they can catch, say, a grouting problem, it can just be regouted; otherwise it could end up as a £2,000 repair job. That is the kind of thing that we look at as a property-managing organisation.

Training is key. As far as the highest standards are concerned, I am not suggesting that everyone should be a chartered surveyor—although that would be good for us—but I studied for seven years to learn how to manage property, carry out structural surveys and inspecting it every three or six months, depending on the type of property. Ian Potter: Ms Fee alluded to the business models of agencies and the question of who should satisfy the fit-and-proper-person test, which is an issue that we have begun to find quite interesting. There are plenty of examples of agencies in which the shareholders and the board come nowhere near the day-to-day running of the business. In such cases, the person who is likely to be left to meet the fit-and-proper-person test will be the office manager, the business manager or the lettings manager who, in practice, cannot always comply with what they should be doing if the owner of the business is telling them to do something different and they want to keep their job. That issue certainly needs to be addressed.

The route that has been suggested in Wales to get round that particular problem is to apply the fit-and-proper-person test that is set out in houses in multiple occupation legislation to the principals, partners and directors of a business and ensure not only that they have an educational qualification at a particular level but that two thirds of their staff who work in a customer-facing position also have a level 2 or 3 qualification. Although that might be a minimum level, it is felt that such a move would begin to raise standards. We very much support that ethos. We have to set the bar at an achievable height to begin with, and we can crank it up later when we start to get the mass that people are concerned about. As for the impact on smaller business, the bar can be set at a lower level to begin with and when they begin to see the business benefit they will be able to achieve a higher level. I do not think that setting the bar at a level to begin with is a bad thing, so long as there is a planned strategy to achieve a higher level.

Jonathan Gordon: As far as smaller letting agents are concerned, we have six staff members; on the other hand, some agents have 10,000 properties. The scale can be huge, but professional bodies tend to regulate all of that quite well.

Someone can become an RICS member by going through the associate qualification process. It is fairly straightforward; they have to prove their competence and, depending on which route they take, they might have to undergo training. If they have worked in the letting industry for five or 10 years, they might be able to take a direct route but, even so, they will need to undertake continuous professional development after that. They also have to understand professional standards and ethics; there are basic tests on those that have to be sat before a person can join. Routes to becoming a chartered surveyor already exist for people who, unlike me, have not done a degree. I might be slightly jealous of that but it is a good approach because it brings everyone up towards the right standard.

My only other point was going to be a repetition of a point that Ian Potter made, so I will leave it there.

Mary Fee: Ms Gell, do you want to come back on that before I move on?
Kathleen Gell: Yes. Actually, I have a query. Is the committee thinking about how the legislation might capture agents south of the border who act as agents for and manage properties in Scotland? The fact is that they never go near those properties, which are in a shocking state of repair. I simply wonder whether you have given thought to such agents, because they are out there and we frequently get calls about them.

Mary Fee: That is something that we are aware of, but I thank you for pointing it out.

The bill makes provision for a letting agent code of practice. I know that many letting agents already comply with existing professional codes of practice. Will the panel members give me a bit more information on what is in the existing codes of practice and, more important, how they are enforced when there is a breach?

Ian Potter: The bodies that Jonathan Gordon and I represent have codes of practice and requirements. ARLA has, in effect, two bits to our code of practice. We require all our members to belong to one of the two ombudsman schemes that were created under the Consumers, Estate Agents and Redress Act 2007 for sales agents. Those schemes also cover lettings complaints.

The Property Ombudsman service developed a code of practice that is based on a code of practice that ARLA had developed previously. The code has got to Office of Fair Trading stage 1 approval. It covers many of the wider issues around what the consumer should experience and it offers the consumer—landlord or tenant—redress, if financial recompense is looked for, for actions that have impacted materially on them.

To complement that, we have a disciplinary process. If we receive a complaint that is not just about looking for redress, we take that complaint through the process. The punishments under that process can be anything from a warning, to a requirement to do further training, to expulsion from membership.

Last year, nationally—within the UK—we removed 270 members for non-compliance, so we do act. The problem is that because it is a voluntary self-regulatory scheme, expulsion does not stop those people from practising. There is no route in any of the UK jurisdictions for banning a person from being a letting agent.

Mary Fee: So, you can expel agents, but they can just carry on working.

Ian Potter: That is what happens in practice, unless the agent has totally gone bust and disappeared with all its clients' funds. We had one case last year from which the agent has risen again like the phoenix from the ashes and is doing exactly the same thing. Those agents belong to no body, so there is no consumer protection. We need to make sure that that loophole is closed in order to stop that sort of thing from happening.

Jonathan Gordon: There is lots of evidence from work that has been done by the Property Ombudsman and the RICS itself, for example. The RICS has not formulated a view on what the code of conduct should be—we understand that that will be part of another consultation.

The RICS has significant experience of direct relations with its members. There are lots of differences between us and ARLA, but in relation to regulation of our members, the key things are client money protection and what must be in place to achieve that. ARLA licenses members; a principal can be a member. You can be a member of ARLA and work for a company, which means that you have gone out and got the qualifications yourself, but your company is not necessarily a member. That is the key difference. If you are a chartered surveyor, you have to comply with the professional practice and codes of conduct.

The code of conduct is generally about checking some basic high-level things. I can leave a copy of the code of conduct with the committee. The key things are client money advice for firms and professional indemnity insurance advice for firms. There are also professional and ethical standards with which we must comply.

The key element of the code is that there must be a complaints-handling procedure to deal with low-level complaints, to provide people with a redress system that they understand and can deal with themselves, and to help firms to avoid statutory interference or complainants having to go to an ombudsman.

The procedure is very similar to how the Financial Conduct Authority deals with complaints about mortgages. We have eight weeks to deal with the complaint—if we are not dealing with it at all, I think that there are other redress mechanisms—and after that point the person can go to the ombudsman. That would cost us a £230 fee; the consumer pays nothing. It is up to the ombudsman whether it takes on the case, but if the case is valid there is a procedure to go through, including an appeals system and everything that goes with that.

Client money protection and professional indemnity insurance advice are the other two key elements. The fact that advice on them is dealt with in separate documents illustrates their importance. Compliance with those two elements leads to the client money protections, which are the ultimate protections for investors.

The code of conduct deals more effectively with the landlord side of things, as the investor. We must remember that most landlords are not sophisticated investors, but happen to have a house that their parents owned, or have moved in with their partner and are renting out their home. Most landlords in the rented sector are not institutions, and most properties in the rented sector are not owned by institutions. The properties are owned by individuals who are using the property as their pension pot for when they retire. It may be that their mortgage costs more than they get in rent, so it is important to them that their agent manages matters properly. However, that might be the only normal consumer investment that is not regulated in a properly enforced way, so it is vital that the bill is not only passed but amended to ensure that how the investments are managed is enforced in the same way as management of other investment products.

Mary Fee: It would be very useful if you could leave those details with us.

The Convener: It would be more helpful if you could send them to us electronically.

Mary Fee: The code of practice would raise the standards for tenants. I also imagine that, in your view, it would help to weed out rogue landlords and letting agents.

Ian Potter: The code has the potential to do that. What is not particularly robust in either code—I say that despite the fact that we signed off a new code yesterday at a board meeting—is provision in respect of property standards. That issue, which is covered under different legislation, is key. Both the RICS code and our code include the requirement for the agent to act within the law. A catch-all phrase encapsulates the issue in the code of practice. Concern has been raised about the coverage of the property standard in the bill; it is a difficult matter for a code of practice to enshrine properly or to have teeth on when there is already legislation and, as I have mentioned, a body—the local authority—that has statutory powers to deal with the issue.

If the agent or landlord was found guilty of breaching the statutory obligations and that information got back to us about one of our members, we would view the code as guidance on what disciplinary action we could take. I do not sit on the tribunals that look at such cases, so I cannot say what the regulation should do; neither can the membership part of the body. The regulation must be ring fenced and independent. However, if we are talking about just one incident, the member might very well just get a formal warning, which would count as one strike against them. If we saw a repeated pattern, we would look at other means. We recently amended our code of practice so that we can impose a fine of up to £5 million.

Jonathan Gordon: That is a good point to make. Other than that being a part of professional standards—we give up landlords’ properties and will not manage them if they do not comply with the repairing standard—the property standard is probably missing from our code of conduct. I had not thought of including it in the code of conduct, although that would be a good idea; it would bind the letting agent to the landlord’s obligations.

All the evidence is anecdotal, however. For instance, someone might take over a property from another letting agent and look for the gas safety certificate, but find that it is three years out of date. They go back through the paperwork and find email from the landlord to the previous letting agent, saying, “Don’t worry about it. I’ve already spoken to the tenants; I have keys and will deal with it myself”. Then the landlord says, “That’s fine”, but the matter is not dealt with.

In other situations, which are more common in London, letting agents offer a rent collection and legal service only: they find the tenant and move them in but do not manage the maintenance. When they do viewings they know fine well that the property is not in good condition, but at the end of the day they are going to get 10 per cent of £500 for doing nothing. There are lots of significant landlord obligations, but the letting agent has no obligation, other than a general duty of care that anybody has under law to look after the property. To bind agents to the landlord’s obligations would be a good idea.

Ian Potter: That area of law is still unclear. The OFT recently produced guidance for letting agents on the Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading Regulations 2008 in consultation with the industry. Simply put, that legislation has a requirement that the agent should tell the consumer everything they need to know that would impact on their transactional decision making. Landlords should be told everything they need to know when agents take a new instruction from a landlord client. Similarly, the tenant should know everything they would be likely to need to know before they even go to see a property. Although that has been law since 2008, there is no case law yet. The industry is on guard.

As I mentioned earlier, Newham London Borough Council says—under consumer protection regulations, I can understand this—that when advertising a property the maximum occupancy rate should be advertised. Its licensing scheme says how many people can be in any one property. For instance, a two-bedroom property might be allowed a maximum of five people, or a family, or a combination. That should be made clear to the consumer.
The Private Rented Housing Panel in Scotland has looked at occupancy rates and over-crowding. It is a problem in Scotland; it comes back to the Govanhill discussion, which I think this committee had two or three years ago.

The Convener: It was not this committee.

Ian Potter: One of the committees certainly discussed overcrowding, anti-social behaviour and landlord registration. They all come together: we just need some joined-up thinking.

Mary Fee: That was very helpful: thank you.

The Convener: The RICS is a signatory to the United Nations’ global compact for sustainable development. What elements should a code of practice include to help the sector to develop more sustainable business practices, in line with the compact’s 10 principles—in particular principle 8, which is about undertaking initiatives to promote greater environmental responsibility?

Jonathan Gordon: I had to refer to my policy adviser for that one. The UN global compact is high-level stuff. I have talked about the environmental side of things. Driving up standards by having more new housing stock to rent is probably the best way forward. RICS Scotland believes that consideration of principle 8 in the code of practice is a good starting point, but the whole compact has the potential to play a role. RICS Scotland will be able to provide further detail in its written submission.

The Convener: Should the compact be considered in secondary legislation in relation to drawing up codes of practice?

Jonathan Gordon: Each part of the code of practice could be looked at. You would not need a separate part of the code, but would need to consider whether each part of the code related to the compact.

Patrick Harvie (Glasgow) (Green): The panel has given very clear evidence on the scale and nature of the problems that the bill is intended to address, which has been very helpful. It is recognised that we need to talk not only about competence and qualifications but about ethical practice.

On the balance between what should be in the legislation and what would be in the code of practice, I want to float a couple of suggestions to find out whether you think that they fall on one side or the other. I suggest that the issues would be well addressed in the code of practice.

Mr Gordon mentioned my comments in a previous meeting about a letting agent who had clearly decided, “I cannae be bothered with this deposit protection lark, so I’ll just charge more advance rent,” and was finding legal workarounds. If a person pays two months’ rent and is given a month’s notice to quit, they will still have a fight on their hands to get their money back, and will probably also need to come up with rent for a month or two to get another place to live in. The question how we could close those loopholes is therefore serious.

The other issue is the continuing problem of discrimination against housing benefit claimants. We have seen a recent media outburst from a big landlord south of the border who wanted to give all his housing benefit recipient tenants notice to quit. Even in Scotland, there is a significant problem, with the historic phrase “No DSS” still being familiar in the private rented sector. Would that kind of discrimination be effectively dealt with in the code of practice?

Kathleen Gell: My understanding is that that term is illegal, but nobody has challenged it.

Patrick Harvie: I am talking about the practice as well as the term.

Kathleen Gell: Yes. The practice is really driven by mortgage providers. I believe that the Bank of Scotland is guilty of not permitting buy-to-let borrowers who are looking for a mortgage to rent to people who receive benefits. I think that that was driven by the introduction of the universal credit. That is my take on the matter.

Jonathan Gordon: “No DSS” is a common phrase. I stated earlier that the majority of landlords whom we speak to are not wealthy people; the majority of our clients are not wealthy people. The majority of properties that we look after have a mortgage, and often the mortgage is more than the rent. Those people cannot afford not to receive the rent, so the affordability test is critical.

People who receive benefits are not excluded from our process, but we have an affordability test that is carried out by an independent company and for which we pay. It checks the tenant’s suitability for the property in order to meet what we have told the landlords we will do.

In addition to the banks, many insurance companies will not allow people who would have been called DSS tenants. The cheapest insurance that people can get, which is advertised everywhere online, specifically excludes students and people who would have claimed DSS benefits. I do not know how it defines what a benefit is, because there are obviously tax credits and other different types of benefit. Therefore, a person could be—or is likely to be—working, as well.

We have a couple of people who receive housing benefit, and we get the money direct from the council. It will reduce that amount without
I know exceptionally well the English case to which you referred. I have had to face it in the media on more than one occasion, as the landlord did the same thing back in 2004 and 2006. I have to be careful what I say publicly, but I do not think that the reason that he gave was the right reason.

One of the big problems for the benefit tenant is that the rent that they can afford or that they will receive benefit for is often below the market rent and the landlord wants to know that they are maximising the return on their property.

Patrick Harvie: You have to look at it from both perspectives, though.

Ian Potter: Of course we have to look at it from both perspectives, but if people were told that they would make a more socially acceptable investment by putting their money into one bank interest free as opposed to getting even what they would get in today's market—0.25 per cent—from another bank, what percentage of the population would think that that was a good deal?

The rent return on a landlord’s property is no different. We want institutional investment in the private rented sector of the type that Jonathan Gordon spoke about earlier, and quality new stock coming into the private rented sector will be very much yield driven.

We must address the issue. I know that the Scottish Government has had concerns about universal credit and has said that it will do what it can to support people in that situation, but it is a fact of life.

The Convener: I think that we are veering off the subject, and we are rapidly running out of time. Does anyone have anything to add on the current subject before we move on to dispute resolution and enforcement?

Jonathan Gordon: I have a very quick point to make. The Scottish Government would do well to look at investing in the rented sector as the way to improve the situation, with the right proportion of affordable homes being created as part of building a new sector. Encouraging the sector would play a massive part. If 20 per cent of houses have to be affordable, that will create more homes that people can afford.

If the Government is not able to do everything that is required to allow a tenant to stay in a property when they fall on hard times, it is not feasible for an individual person—who has just enough money to feed their own family and who happens to be a landlord—to be the one who steps in to support the tenant who cannot afford to pay the rent.
Nobody would be thrown out for losing their job. They would be thrown out—or, rather, the correct legal process to evict them would be started—if they could not afford to pay the rent or if they stopped paying the rent. A professional and ethical body that looked after a landlord who tried to do anything else would not last very long.

I will stop there so that the committee can move on.

Kathleen Gell: I will make one final point. I come back to the point that I made at the outset in support of Professor MacLennan, which is that there needs to be a bigger strategy. The barrier to investment in new build in the private rented sector is apparently cited as being the cost of land. Investors are, in effect, sterilising land that could be used for building. The Scottish Government could look at freeing up or ring fencing land and not allowing it to be bought by investors.

The Convener: That is for local authorities.

Let us move on to dispute resolution and enforcement.

Gordon MacDonald: What mechanisms currently exist for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers? How effective and fair are those procedures for resolving customer complaints? How aware are people of the existing schemes?

Ian Potter: The ombudsman schemes that we referred to earlier are the ones that are most commonly used. They are independent; the ombudsman bodies are not controlled by the industry. The schemes work and they are cost-efficient business models. I have concerns about the costs of using the Private Rented Housing Panel that are given in the documents that accompany the bill. Typically, the cost of dispute resolution that goes to either of the ombudsman is less than £250 as opposed to the figure that is given of £1,600 to £1,800 for the PRHP.

One thing that we have to look at is whether, for some issues that are likely to be areas of complaint, we could come up with something as simple as alternative dispute resolution. ADR works quite effectively for tenancy deposit cases: the cost of ADR schemes that are running for tenancy deposit protection ranges from about £80 to £150, and the process is a desktop exercise. I do not have a problem with the suggestion that there might be a requirement for a higher-level, more complicated route, but we have to look at how quickly and efficiently some of the problems can be addressed.

Obviously, there has to be a code of conduct that requires an agent to have a dispute resolution and internal complaints procedure. Often, a more junior member of staff digs in their heels and says, “No, that is not right,” but when the problem gets to the boss, they have a solution. I know that, as an agent, I used to spend money to keep both sides happy.

Malcolm Warrack: Another element is the education and empowerment of the tenant. The better their education about the circumstances and their rights and responsibilities, the more likely we are to be able to move to the situation that Ian Potter has been talking about, in which problems are captured and dealt with sooner rather than later. It is the escalation process that is often the problem. Tenants need to be better informed.

Gordon MacDonald: What are your views on the bill’s proposals regarding how tenants and landlords could seek to enforce a letting agent’s compliance with the letting agent code of practice? Do you agree with the Government that the proposals provide easy access to a redress mechanism?

Jonathan Gordon: The Government’s proposals are good and it has thought about the issue in the right way. The difficulty is that the Private Rented Housing Panel is the best example of a tribunal at the moment, and it is not operating as it is meant to. People who have problems in relation to the repairing standard are not going to the panel, or their cases are taking too long to be resolved. Investment in that is therefore key.

The RICS’s view is that the best-placed people to manage disputes between letting agents and their clients, whether they are landlords or tenants, are ombudsmen. The two ombudsman schemes that are in place are credible and, as Ian Potter said, they provide good low-cost solutions and easy access for people.

Gordon MacDonald: Tribunals would be fine, if that is what is wanted, but it is unnecessary to add another layer that the Government gets involved in. If a scheme that already operates can be used, why introduce another one? Extending the scope of tribunals to take cases away from sheriff courts is a good idea, but perhaps issues to do with the registration of letting agents should lie with ombudsmen.

A disparate set of organisations is involved and there is a huge number of codes of conduct. Nobody understands the position at the moment. What need is there for the Scottish Government to add another level?

ARLA is well known in England as a licensing body for letting agents and it has a strict code of conduct. The RICS has an additional element in professional development—the on-going training on what is required is slightly more entrenched. However, as Ian Potter said, ARLA provides training to its members, and that is something that it is supposed to do. Why would we not use something that exists already? Why spend £500,000 or £1 million on setting up a scheme that nobody will comply with or which requires an enforcement body to be set up?

If someone tries to call the trading standards department at the City of Edinburgh Council, they will not get through, but they can get through to a citizens advice bureau helpline. I understand that that is the route that people would use to complain about a letting agent at the moment. Why not take advantage of existing bodies?

The RICS has white-labelled the regulation of other sectors. Members of the Institute of Residential Property Management and the Association of Residential Managing Agents, which work in similar sectors, are regulated by the RICS. The RICS also regulates every surveyor who values a house that is for sale.

Experienced practitioners in RICS regulation have written to the Government to offer advice on three ways in which they could help. At the top level, people could be required to be surveyors. At the next level, the RICS could provide the regulation in a white-label format. Finally, the RICS could set up the code and manage it for the Government.

Lots of stuff could be done. The fit-and-proper-person test will need to be set up, and a code of practice that everybody must stick to will have to be established. We should use the existing low-cost ombudsman services, which work well for consumers. We should also use something that already exists to manage all that, such as ARLA, the RICS or a combination of them.

We could follow what was done with tenancy deposit schemes. The Government said what a company would have to do to run a deposit scheme, and three companies, including one in which the RICS is involved, set up independent schemes for that—although those bodies are not involved in enforcement, which would need to be added in this case. All the schemes have their own rules and sets of guidance, but they do pretty much what the Government wrote that they have to comply with.

Why do we not do something like that and let the market, which already has experienced people, take over the role? That is my main suggestion.

The Convener: Are there any other suggestions?

Kathleen Gell: I do not know whether this is a suggestion; it is really an observation. We have a lot of different bodies, not all of which know what they are meant to regulate. For example, Highland Council’s trading standards department was—sadly—not aware that it was meant to oversee the display of energy performance certificates. It needed me to tell it where it could find out about that.

Local authorities regulate landlords, the Scottish Government is to regulate letting agents, and the police regulate some aspects. The Private Rented Housing Panel, ombudsmen, the RICS and ARLA are also involved. We need just one body that has an overview and the ability to regulate the system. That would be much clearer and would make the system much easier to enforce. I do not have a suggestion on who that should be or how that should be done.

Mark Griffin: We have heard concerns that existing private rented sector legislative requirements such as private landlord registration schemes are not being enforced effectively. That came through in your opening remarks, when you said that enforcement was key. Are there any concerns about the Government’s ability to enforce their letting agent registration requirements?

Ian Potter: My main concern is whether the Government can enforce its own legislation effectively. Where things are sitting in the proposals, the enforcing body is the Government. I am still trying to work out how that will be devolved: where it will go and who will have that responsibility.

Kathleen Gell made a point about something that has happened south of the border, which has not been able to be extended north of the border, which is a scheme known as primary authority. Through it, one local trading standards department can provide what is known as assured advice, which every other trading standards officer in the jurisdiction—remember that I am speaking about England—will abide by. That leads to uniformity of standards and enforcement, which makes it much easier for everyone to know where to get advice.

I will be perfectly honest and say that the scheme is in its infancy for the private rented sector. However, since we launched our scheme in October, almost 1,000 agents have signed up to it and we are starting to see cases coming through. Cases are referred, advice is given quickly and clearly, and other local authority trading standards departments are accepting it. Something like that is workable and could be made to happen in Scottish legislation.

Kathleen Gell: I can think back five or six years to when the City of Edinburgh Council ran the letwise scheme—correct me if I am wrong—which was excellent, with very high-standard training sessions for landlords. We travelled down from Inverness to go to them, because there is such a lack of training opportunities.

People are eager for knowledge; they want to do a good job. Many of us are out there, trying to raise the bar. It is something that could be looked at and which could cover a lot of areas.

Jonathan Gordon: There is a theme in what I am saying about regulation needing enforcement by a proper professional body. The fact is that there are good letting agents, who do everything right and know exactly what they are doing—the top percentage—and there are a few bad ones at the bottom, who either do not care whether they do everything right as long as they get the money, or deliberately do things to make more money.

A big percentage of letting agents have a lack of understanding and knowledge, but the vast majority want to do a good job. The self-regulation model is something that even the hardest campaigners and others such as the press support. The Government is trying to improve redress for tenants in the court system, by moving their cases away from the court system to specialist tribunals where housing people will look at them. The best people to regulate the sector are the people who know how the sector should work.

There is a massive lack of information for tenants, landlords and the Government. Whenever the Government looks at something, it interviews people such as us and gets anecdotal evidence of things that are happening in the market. However, there are 1,000 letting agents and we do not know anything about those who are not members of a trade body. Even for those who are, there is no compulsion to do anything right—there is no formalisation of stuff. Why not take the opportunity to change that? The Scottish Government is unique in the UK in that it wants to regulate housing to improve standards. The best route to doing that is to create a single body that will self-regulate, using people who understand the market. Why would the Government want to get tied up in something that people will complain about? Why not set it off in the market in the right way and have proper self-regulation, enforced by an independent body?

Mark Griffin: What are your views on the proposed offences in the bill? Are they proportionate?

Jonathan Gordon: The level of fines is set out clearly, but the RICS is concerned that they appear to be lower than the fines for non-compliance with landlord registration, which seems strange. I spotted that but did not have time to look into the detail. I think that for a particular offence, it is level 3—I apologise; I am not sure how it works, but I think that you will find that the approach does not match the approach to landlord registration.

Mark Griffin: What will letting agents be required to do to comply with the registration scheme? Will the approach create undue regulatory burdens?

Kathleen Gell: My feeling is that it should create regulatory burdens—otherwise why do it?

Jonathan Gordon: That is my view, too.

Malcolm Warrack: Yes, it should do.

Jonathan Gordon: We all agree.

Ian Potter: What agents will have to do will vary across the market. Some agents will not have to do anything; others will have to take a long, hard look at their current business model and everything else. The impact will be greatest on the latter group, but that is the group in relation to which we—and, I am sure, members of the committee—think that the biggest problems arise. Therefore, we should not be frightened of the regulatory impact.

Malcolm Warrack: There are cost implications, of course. I said in a meeting with Shelter some months ago that the cost of landlord registration is too low. It is about finding a balance, to ensure that the regulatory costs and efforts to comply with the code of practice and everything else are in balance with the size of the business.

Jonathan Gordon: Cost is an important issue for RICS members and particularly for its regulated firms, which operate as limited companies or whatever. For us, the cost of regulation can be well over £1,000, not counting the high level of professional indemnity insurance that we must have. We think that to require regulated firms of chartered surveyors to pay another fee to a Government registration scheme—in order to adhere to a lower set of standards—would place an unnecessary burden on those firms. The RICS heavily regulates its members already, and it might create confusion in the market and among its members’ operations if firms had to comply with two codes of conduct.

The Law Society of Scotland made similar points. Its members deal with particular pieces of legislation in relation to signing documents, I think, and are covered by the society’s code of practice.

The management of property is core to what surveyors do. Why would they be regulated by someone else, when strong regulation is already in place?

Kathleen Gell: We accept that there will be a cost, but I echo what Jonathan Gordon said. I am here speaking on behalf of the CLA, but let me put this in the context of our firm, which is very small— it is me and my husband. The fee for membership of the CLA is £295; I think, so my firm pays that. We also pay into the SAFE—safe agent fully endorsed—scheme, the Landlord Accreditation Scotland scheme, ARLA and RICS. My accountant tells me that last year our fees to those bodies were just short of £3,000. Therefore, some of us might not take kindly to a hefty fee of several hundred pounds, unless it will achieve what the Government is trying to do—so please give the approach teeth.

Jonathan Gordon: There is a competition issue and a risk to businesses that are already accredited and are already providing a good service, in that everyone else will be legitimised by the term "regulation", even though agents will be unregulated if the bill is enacted without change.

People will automatically start talking about regulation, even if they mean registration, and that would be extremely unfair. At the moment, we are able to set ourselves apart as being qualified and regulated, but once the scheme comes into force as set out in the bill at the moment, other letting agents will also be able to say when asked, "Yeah, we’re regulated by the Scottish Government," and the perception will be that surely that is better.

The Convener: I think that we have got the point.

Would the witnesses like to add anything that we have not covered? We have had a fairly long and detailed session, and it has been of great benefit to the committee.

Kathleen Gell: I have one last concern. If a letting agent has been removed from the register, can that letting agent set up as a new partnership, a new limited company or whatever, and reregister? How do you propose to deal with that?

The Convener: We shall certainly pass that question on.

Jonathan Gordon: I have talked a lot about enforcement, and I want to make it clear that we support the Government’s intention to regulate letting agents. We just feel that it needs to address another couple of points.

I have watched videos of the evidence sessions that have taken place and I know that electrical safety and fire safety have been mentioned, so I would like to say a quick word about that. The Scottish Government’s own figures show that the number of accidental residential fires is falling each year. However, faulty electrical wiring or installation is the number 1 cause of fires and the number of such fires is rising. In 373 of the 5,000 accidental dwelling fires noted last year, the source of ignition is listed as the electricity supply. There were more than 600 more in which an appliance is listed as the cause. Unfortunately, the data is not clear enough on whether those fires were in rented properties, but we can assume that 20 per cent of them were in rented properties—or perhaps that the rented sector is worse, because people look after their own property first.

Legislation on gas safety is clear, and all landlords have a duty of care to the tenant and must provide safe gas installations. The relevant legislation also makes it clear that that must be achieved by way of an annual gas safety inspection. Legislation on electrical safety is also clear, in that all landlords have a duty of care to the tenant and must provide safe electrical installation and appliances, but unfortunately, the relevant legislation is not clear about how that is to be achieved, with the result that most landlords do not carry out electrical wiring and installation checks by way of an electrical installation condition report or portable appliance testing. Strangely, anecdotal evidence suggests that more people check that the kettle works than check the socket that it goes into.

That is likely to mean that many properties that are let out privately, or perhaps even the majority of such properties, are not safe. It is relevant to the bill that letting agents—people from whom we are trying to win business—often advise people that they do not have to carry out electrical safety checks. We believe that that is not correct, because they are failing in their duty to the tenant to provide a safe system.

The issue of smoke alarms in the repairing standard is also confusing. Having a suitable smoke alarm is a requirement, but nobody is telling anyone what is meant by a suitable smoke alarm. Battery smoke alarms are unreliable: tenants take the batteries out and such alarms often fail and do not work as well as mains-operated smoke alarms do. The Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 introduced the repairing standard, which is quite well drafted, but we think that it should be amended to make the provision of suitable mains smoke alarms, as well as electrical safety checks, mandatory.

Given that the new building standards say that any new gas installation should have a carbon monoxide—CO—alarm in the same room, it seems strange that that is left out of the letting legislation. We feel that CO alarms should be compulsory in rooms in which people have a gas appliance.

Kathleen Gell: Letting agents who choose to sign up and be members of Landlord Accreditation Scotland have to insist that landlords provide an EICR, fire blankets and so on, so there are higher standards, and that is an excellent thing.

The Convener: Thank you for your evidence, which has been really good. I shall allow the witnesses to leave the room and then the committee will continue for a couple of minutes in private.
BRITISH HOLIDAY AND HOME PARKS ASSOCIATION

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

SUMMARY

Government’s work to ensure local authorities work more proactively in monitoring parks’ site licences is welcomed.

BH&HPA asks the Committee to consider, above all, the dangers of unintended consequences of the Bill with its potential for adverse impacts on park owners and park home owners. In particular:

- The Association recognises the need for good, targeted enforcement by local authorities where significant breaches of site licence conditions occur. Decent park owners with businesses where there are no ‘wrongs’ to be ‘righted’ are finding the burden of legislation increasingly difficult to manage.
- The principle that the ‘Polluter Pays’ should apply in site licensing. At-fault businesses should rightly pay for local authorities’ work in enforcement, good businesses should not be penalised for the faults of others.
- Time-limited site licences would have adverse consequences for all stakeholders; we would support measures requiring local authorities’ five yearly review of site licences.
- We are not convinced that the fit and proper person licensing regime, as proposed, would be practicable and as such would not deliver the desired outcomes.
- It would be a retrograde step if honest, decent and diligent park owners were driven out of the industry by unworkable red tape, feeling they had no option but to sell their parks to the highest bidder.
- The Bill includes provision that a series of regulations may be made by Scottish Ministers; we would urge the fullest possible consultation with the industry in the course of that work to ensure the practicality of further proposed measures.
- Close attention should be given to the transitional and commencement arrangements, especially given the proposed measures to limit the duration of site licences.
- Notwithstanding that local authorities’ site licensing work is proposed to be charged for, park owners’ experience is that there is often poor understanding among many local authorities who sometimes fail to understand site licensing and the role of Model Standards.

Finally, we would note that the Consumer Focus report, (‘Living the Dream?’ 2012), and the SPICe briefing paper for the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee (15th January 2014), arrive at their conclusions based on a small sample and the failure to identify the nature of respondents. We are concerned at the weight given to these reports in formulating these measures.
Introduction

The British Holiday & Home Parks Association (BH&HPA) is the UK’s national representative body of the parks industry. Across the UK, BH&HPA members own and manage 384,137 pitches. These include 969 parks accommodating 47,612 residential pitches.

In Scotland, BH&HPA members own and manage 227 parks providing 30,901 pitches for caravan holiday homes and lodges, touring caravans, motorhomes, tents and residential park homes. Members in Scotland own and operate 52 residential parks with 1,892 pitches for residential park homes.

BH&HPA Scotland supports efforts to introduce measures to prevent the actions of the small minority of park owners who abuse park home owners and welcomes the opportunity to provide evidence to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee on behalf of its members. Our concerns are of a practical, legal and economic nature with regard to the detail of the Bill.

Responding to the questions of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee

Q12. Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?
Q13. What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

In reviewing the proposed measures, we have identified the issues of concerns and the some of the potential consequences in each case.

1. Charges for a site licence (32C in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

1.1 What objective justification is there that a fee should be levied for local authorities’ site licensing work?

We have seen no evidence of a robust Economic Impact Assessment in advance of these measures proposed in the Housing Bill. The Policy Memorandum accompanying the Bill states:

'Economic effects
273. The provisions on mobile home site licences will affect residents, site owners, and local authorities. Local authorities will be able to charge a fee to cover administration costs of providing a site licence, and based on Scottish Government research, it is estimated that this fee would be approximately £600. This fee will be a very small percentage of the turnover of a mobile home site (less than 0.5% for a site with 40 or more mobile homes). The Scottish Government believes that the improved standards of safety, facilities and management that are an intended outcome of the proposals will help ensure that site owners who provide a good service are not undercut by those who are not doing so. This will help promote fairer competition in the sector. Residents will benefit from a more robust licensing regime that gives local authorities the tools need to ensure sites are of an acceptable standard, and to tackle unscrupulous site owners, therefore increasing confidence in the sector. Overall the Scottish Government believes that improving the licensing regime will have a neutral or beneficial economic effect.’

The evidence base for these assertions is not provided.

1.2 The principle that the ‘Polluter Pays’ should apply in site licensing. At-fault businesses should rightly pay for local authorities’ work in enforcement, good businesses should not be penalised for the faults of others.

1.3 While Government is empowering local authorities to levy fees it should be included in supporting regulations that:

- all site licence charges must be on cost-recovery basis and ring-fenced so that good park owners would not pay for the work to ensure licence compliance by rogue park operators
- charging regimes must be transparent in each local authority area, be on a cost recovery basis and any future increases justified according to these criteria
- any fees would be proportionate to the size of the park/number of pitches and the work required by the local authority in administering the park’s site licence
- any fees should reflect the targeting of local authority enforcement – it would be unjust for a park to pay the same rate for five-yearly inspections as one requiring six-monthly checks.

1.4 Our underlying concern is that most parks are well run and require minimal attention from the local authority. Why should decent park owners, and the park home owners on their parks, be required to foot the bill for local authorities’ work in policing the rogues? Why should home owners on rogues’ parks be required to pay for the site licensing necessary to protect them?

1.5 Adopting a ‘polluter pays’ approach, whereby the rogue is charged directly – and without the ability to pass on the cost to his/her customers – would:

- provide a stronger deterrent against park management failures
- give a stronger incentive to local authority staff to act, and,
- be fair and proportionate.

1.6 Where is the incentive to take action for the local authority who can charge what they like, essentially, whether or not they take action and/or provide good service?

1.7 If local authorities are going to be able to charge for licensing parks, it is essential that any fees should reflect the targeting of local authority enforcement – it would be unjust for a park to pay the same rate for say five-yearly inspections/reviews as one requiring six-monthly checks.
1.8 Adopting a ‘polluter pays’ approach, whereby the rogue park operator is charged would:
- provide a stronger deterrent against park management failures
- give a stronger incentive to local authority staff to act, and,
- be fair and proportionate.

2. Issue, renewal and transfer of site licences (32D in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

2.1 The reprehensible activities of a minority of rogue park operators should not be taken as typical of the sector. The vast majority of park owners have committed no civil or criminal wrong. Why increase the administrative burden on those businesses by having them re-apply for their licences within a 24 month period following the introduction of the Housing (Scotland) Bill?

2.2 Park businesses are typically established small family businesses where little changes year on year; for good reasons, some park owners have had no contact from their local authority in connection with site licensing for many years, nor have they, or their customers, had any need of it.

Renewal of existing Site Licences within two years

2.3 There is no sound reason for making park owners apply for a new Site Licence within 2 years as proposed. The Local Authority has the power at any time to alter licences under the 1960 Act, item 8 (1), which states: ‘The conditions attached to a site licence may be altered at any time whether by variation or cancellation of existing conditions, or by the addition of new conditions, or by a combination of any such methods by the Local Authority but before exercising their powers under this subsection the Local Authority shall offer to the holder of the Licence an opportunity of making representations’.

2.4 If there is a case for government to act to tackle criminality in the sector, it will not be best served through requiring good park owners to reapply for their site licence, or similar regulatory change, but rather through targeting police and local authority resources at the issue.

3. The time to be allowed for a local authority to decide whether or not a licence should be granted (32F in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

3.1 The Housing (Scotland) bill states that local authorities will have 12 months to decide whether or not to grant a site licence. That timescale is far too lengthy -how can parks can be expected to do business on that basis?

3.2 We would ask the Committee to consider the practical implications for the sale of residential parks if potential purchasers had to wait up to 12 months for a decision. It could be disastrous for the seller of the business, make the situation untenable for the buyers and indeed work against the interests of home owners who may be in the process of selling/buying a home. Such uncertainty would have grave, adverse consequences for all parties.

3.3 The matter of the suitability of the location for establishing the park will have been addressed in the granting of planning permission for the park. As stipulated in the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960, in issuing the site licence, local authorities can control the maximum numbers of caravans permitted, make provisions about the amenity of the park and ensure adequate and appropriate facilities and service provision for customers of the park in the interest of hygiene, health and safety etc.

3.4 Leaving aside the matter of a Fit and Proper Person Test, it is difficult to imagine circumstances in which a decision to approve a site licence would take more than a few weeks at most. To grant planning consent and then deny a site licence after the developer has invested what are usually considerable sums would be unjust. In the process of granting planning permission the local authority will have carried out the usual enquiries as to the appropriateness of the site for the establishment of a park.

3.5 Two months is adequate for the issue of any Site Licence in Scotland. A similar timescale is in place for Local Authorities to deal with applications for planning permission most of which are far more detailed than a site licence application. It is our understanding that the Scottish Government is considering whether penalties should be applied where Local Authorities don’t deal with planning applications in a timely manner. The same arrangements should be put in place for site licensing applications.

3.6 Virtually all deals to purchase a caravan park have a condition stating the purchase is subject to the transfer of the Site Licence. It is therefore critical that there is a sensible practical time limit for dealing with the issue of, or transfer of, a Site Licence. The deal cannot be completed until a licence is issued so time is of the essence.

3.7 We would urge that the Committee recommend a shorter time period within the legislation, say two months maximum, to enable the process of a new site licence being granted, or an existing one being transferred to a new owner, to be completed within a practical time frame in the interests of all stakeholders.

4. Transfer of a site licence on sale of a park/death of a park owner (32E and 32H in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

4.1 The procedure for Local Authorities to transfer a licence on the sale of a park or death of an owner should be simple.
4.2 If the Local Authority is undertaking its responsibilities appropriately, residential parks in their area will be of a good standard and complying with their Site Licence conditions. The Local Authority should therefore be capable of transferring a licence in a short time - certainly within eight weeks.

4.3 On the death of a park owner similar legislation to what currently exists should be in place (the licence automatically transfers). If that is not the case, on a park owners death the person who becomes entitled to the park will be trading without a licence until such time as they receive Fit and Proper status and a transfer of the Licence.

4.4 The existing legislation allows for an automatic transfer of the site licence on the death of a park owner and this should be retained, albeit it is understood that the new licence holder would require Fit and Proper person status. Item 10 (4) of the 1960 Act states:

“Where any person becomes, by operation of law, entitled to an estate or interest in land in respect of which a site licence is in force and is, by virtue of his holding that estate or interest, the occupier of the land within the meaning of this Part of this Act he shall, for the purpose of this Part of this Act, be treated as having become the holder of the licence on the day on which he became the occupier of the land, and the local authority in whose area the land is situated shall, if an application in that behalf is made to them, endorse his name and the said date on the licence”.

Item 11(1) of the 1960 Act states that:

“A local authority who has issued a site licence may at any time require the holder to deliver it up so as to enable them to enter in it any alteration of the conditions or other terms of the licence made in pursuance of the provisions of this Part of this Act”.

This leaves the Local Authority with all the powers they require if they wish to add conditions, etc. to the licence transferred after the death of a park owner.

5. Proposed 3 yearly renewal of site licences (32J in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

5.1 Introducing a 3 yearly renewal system would create uncertainty and destroy confidence in the sector. It would be detrimental in terms of funding for park businesses.

5.2 In Wales, funding has become hugely problematic where, from October 2014, the licences issued to residential parks must be renewed every 5 years. Funding for park business or park home purchase has virtually dried up. Banks are unwilling to finance the purchase of parks, and worryingly, finance companies are also unwilling to finance the purchase of park homes. Estate agents and lawyers are also discouraging people from purchasing park homes as they advise their clients against buying park homes on parks licenced for just five years.

5.3 There is no indication that any economic impact assessment has taken account of this serious matter. Impacts are likely to include a reduction in values of privately owned park homes and a fall in the values of parks themselves with serious danger of a downward spiral in the sector. This would have disastrous consequences for, not only parks, but also the homeowners whose circumstances these measures seek to improve.

5.4 It is noteworthy that the proposed new legislation for holiday parks in Wales begins with the statement that licences for holiday parks should continue to be granted in perpetuity although they will be subject to five yearly reviews (not renewals). Taking such an approach avoids the funding problems arising in the residential park sector in Wales as a direct consequence of the introduction of time limited licences and should be considered for Scotland.

5.5 Moving to 3 yearly licences will impact on the level of confidence and security of consumers in purchasing a home on a park and potentially have a knock on effect on the upkeep/investment on parks. Rather than provide protection to consumers, which is the Scottish Government’s avowed intention, this change could put consumers off a park home purchase with disastrous knock-on impacts for the viability of residential park businesses and their customers’ assets.

5.6 We would strongly recommend a change from the proposed 3 year renewal for licences to a system whereby ‘rolling’ licences are subject to a 5 yearly review with a legal presumption in favour of renewal of the licence unless there have been problems within the 5 year period.

5.7 The significant support for a move to a 3 yearly licence referred to in the ‘Reason for Taking Power’ document issued by the Scottish Government was primarily from local authorities. In that document it says ‘once the new licensing regime becomes established, it may be desirable to review whether 3 years remains the most appropriate licence period.’ Surely it would be more practical to start with a workable system of 5 yearly reviews? Licensing for residential parks is in no way comparable with HMO style licensing or other forms of licensing which don’t involve people investing in the purchase of their own home or ongoing investment by the business owner.

6. Fit and proper person test (32O in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

6.1 BH&HPA Scotland understands the appeal of the proposal to introduce a Fit and Proper Person Test as part of the residential parks’ site licensing regime.
6.2 The Association has long supported the principle of a ‘fit and proper’ licensing regime as measures are necessary to prevent those who abuse park home owners from continuing to purchase and manage parks. However, this support is given with the caveat that a workable solution must be identified that is practical and sufficient to deter the rogues.

6.3 Typically, local authority environmental health departments oversee parks’ site licences; while they have the expertise and proximity to administer a site licence addressing the physical infrastructure of a park, are they best placed to assess the proposed ‘fit and proper person’ criteria?

6.4 There is a need for more clarity on what criteria will apply for a fit and proper person test. The criteria for judging ‘fit and proper person’ status should be:

- objective, fair, transparent and clearly defined
- consistently applied across the industry
- start with the assumption that an individual is ‘fit and proper’ unless there is evidence to the contrary

6.5 There is also a need for clarity on what is required of a potential park purchaser to achieve ‘fit and proper’ status and for reassurance that this process can be undertaken (perhaps in advance) in a sensible timescale to avoid unwarranted delay in the park sales process.

6.6 There is no legal definition within the proposed legislation to enable identification of ‘the holder of the most senior position within the management structure’ and no mention of the role of controlling park owners and/or shareholders and their associates when a ‘fit and proper’ person test is being applied.

6.7 Difficulties will arise in situations where there is a gap between a manager who has been the subject of a fit and proper person test leaving and a new person taking their place. Park managers may come and go and this should not be able to place the park owner in breach of the law.

6.8 The vast majority of parks in Scotland have only one employee, usually a site warden rather than a manager, as the average park size is small. The park owner must therefore, for practical reasons, be in a position to appoint a new employee quickly. They would not be able to do that until the person has been deemed a fit and proper person and could find themselves ‘unlicensed’ and unable to remedy the position despite their best efforts.

6.9 To ensure practicality, we would suggest that the proposed legislation should not preclude continuation of the site licence while the local authority carries out its enquiries.
6.10 We would further recommend that a standard procedure be set-up to establish fit and proper status for applicants so that it can be used across all local authorities in Scotland to ensure consistency throughout the country.

6.11 There are many park managers/wardens already employed in Scotland. The Bill needs to address their employment protections if they are not found to be fit and proper under the new regime.

6.12 We would ask the Committee to consider that:

- The likely success in achieving the goal of ridding the industry of rogue operators, or otherwise, through the application of fit and proper person criteria to owners/managers of residential parks is unknown. Welsh Local Authorities will start to gather experience after October 2014 once they begin to apply the new regime to the managers of 93 residential parks in Wales.

- For English residential parks, the Coalition Government has not introduced a fit and proper person regime. Instead, these powers are held in reserve in case unscrupulous residential park owners ‘choose to remain in the sector without reforming their practices’. This approach would meet the concerns to ensure the industry and local authorities are not overburdened given the volume of changes, whilst creating a ‘Sword of Damocles’ encouraging the industry to ‘shape up’, without the cost and red tape.

6.13 We would recommend the Scottish Government adopt measures akin to those allowing Ministers to make regulations in due course, allowing the measures in the Housing Bill to bed in, also permitting careful reflection on the impacts of the introduction of comprehensive, revised Implied Terms (in all agreements between park owners and park home owners) that took place in September 2013.

7. Fines (32R and 32S in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

7.1 In considering the matter of fines, it should be noted that breach of site licence conditions can occur due to circumstances beyond the park owner’s control. For example, the action of a home owner may put the park owner ‘in breach’; matters may only be able to be resolved through the courts where the determination could find in favour of a home owner leaving the park owner still in breach of their licence conditions. How is this matter to be resolved ‘fairly’ between the park and the local authority?

7.2 The level of fines proposed is exorbitant and disproportionate – a maximum of £50,000 if a park is operating without a site licence or not complying with an improvement notice, or £10,000 if a park is not complying with a site licence condition.

7.3 Fines in Scotland will be imposed at a relatively high level, given the maxima are set so extremely high. It is noteworthy that in Wales the fine applicable for non-compliance with a site licence condition on a holiday park is being set at £500.

7.4 The Association understands that the figure of £50,000 is included in the Housing (Scotland) Bill on the basis of having consistency with the level of fines included in other legislation.

7.5 We question the practicality of having such a high maximum fine for operating without a site licence; we have seen no evidence to support this proposed measure and no justification for consistency with the level of fines included in other legislation.

7.6 Although the likelihood of the vast majority of park owners being in a situation whereby they will be fined is very minimal, the fact remains that a risky situation could arise through a technical oversight which may or may not be of the park owner’s making.

8. Improvement notices (32U in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

8.1 The measures proposed for improvement notices must be set in context; in many areas, local authorities have not proactively monitored site licence conditions for many years. It is not in the interests of park owners or home owners that unrealistic expectations with regard to site licence compliance should exist and overly challenging deadlines set where local authorities have not been proactive in the past in terms of visiting parks. A new regime may bring things to light which have not been brought to the attention of a park owner previously.

We note that on Item 65 (32X) (4) it states:

‘the Local Authority must, as soon as practicable after serving a notice under this section (Improvement Notice) and in such manner as it thinks fit, notify the occupiers of caravans on the site of the existence of the notice’

This will trigger the residents into not making any payments to the park owner.

8.2 It is BH&HPA’s view that payment to the park owner should not be withheld at that point as the park owner has a right of appeal within 28 days. Payments should therefore continue as normal either until any appeal has been determined by the Sheriff or the appeal process has been abandoned. Natural justice dictates that payments to the park owner should not be capable of being stopped on the say so of the local authority before the opportunity to lodge an appeal has expired or an appeal determined.

8.3 If payments were to be withdrawn prior to any appeal and the appeal was subsequently successful, the residents may well not have the funds for back payments of pitch fees, electric, gas, water and sewerage charges, unpaid commission etc. Such a scenario would clearly cause severe difficulties for the park owner. Would he then be faced with seeking reimbursement from the local authority via the Sheriff Court?

We are of the opinion that a Local Authority should not have the power to deprive a park owner of his livelihood. Only a Sheriff should be in the position to take that decision after hearing all the available evidence and only where the park has been put under local authority management.

8.4 Most residential parks in Scotland have between 30 and 40 pitches, are family owned and charge very reasonable pitch fees. Given that this is the case, one of the main reasons that a park owner would not comply with an improvement notice would be because he could not afford to do the work requested. For example, it is not unknown for Local Authorities to impose a condition that older parks upgrade/resurface all the roads in the park. This is a very expensive undertaking. Taking away the income from the park owner in such circumstances would only make matters worse. Other examples of local authority requests that cannot be complied with in the short to medium term include increasing the distance between homes, adjusting the distance from the home to the boundary or increasing the width of the roads on the park. None of these actions can be taken as the homes are privately owned and cannot be moved.

8.5 Under the 1960 Act 1(5) Local Authorities are not constrained in what they are able to request. The Act states that:

‘for the avoidance of doubt, it is hereby declared that a condition attached to a Site Licence shall be valid notwithstanding that it can be complied with only by carrying out works which the holder of the Site Licence is not entitled to carry out as of right’.

This could result in the park owner being deprived of their income, brought to court and fined for not complying with a condition which they are unable to comply with.

8.6 There is also concern about the lack of a level playing field in terms of local authorities’ approach to parks throughout Scotland. There is a need for consistency across the country.

9. Non-payment of pitch fees when a park has no site licence (32X in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)
9.1 The proposal that home owners on a residential park would be entitled to withhold payment of pitch fees, rent and amounts due for gas, electricity, water, sewerage, commission and other services on the park where a penalty notice has been served, causes great concern.

If, for example, no payment is made by the home owners using the gas, electricity etc on the park, how are the bills for these utilities to be paid? The park owner is unlikely to be in a position to settle these accounts if his income has ceased. There is then a risk of these services being cut off by the supplier which would obviously cause great difficulty for the residents on the park.

9.2 If no income is being received by the park, how will any maintenance required for the benefit of the residents be carried out?

9.3 Under the proposed new licensing regime it would be quite possible for a park owner to have to operate without a licence as, on the death of a park owner, the beneficiary will have to apply to be considered a fit and proper person before they can apply for a transfer of licence. This could take some considerable time during which, technically the park will not have a valid licence holder; therefore, no licence will be in place.

10. Ability to appoint an Interim Manager (32Y in the Housing (Scotland) Bill)

10.1 Whilst it is technically correct that the security of tenure of home owners is not affected by the withdrawal of a site licence, there are practical concerns for them - particularly when they want to sell their homes.

10.2 Buyers want to know what they are getting when they buy a park home and that includes who will be managing the park. They are unlikely to be attracted by the prospect of an apparently responsible operator facing a renewal of his licence every 3 years, with failure resulting in the appointment of a local authority nominee, who is unlikely to be versed in the complexities of running a park, to undertake the management role.

10.3 Much more detail is needed about the responsibilities of, and powers available to, any Interim Manager such as:

- who will be responsible for funding the cost of their salary?
- how will any existing loans secured against the park be serviced?
- who will negotiate sales of homes owned by the park?
- who will be empowered to enter into new agreements with new purchasers?
- what will be the legal standing of the interim manager entering into contracts with third party contractors carrying out work on the park?
- where will funding be found to carry out maintenance etc. where this is not covered by pitch fee income?
• compliance with Site Licence conditions is a requirement under the 1960 Act – how will this work in practice during the tenure of an Interim Manager?
• has government identified potential candidates, competent in residential park management which includes matters as diverse as compliance with health and safety obligations, financial management and control, park operation including repairs and maintenance, as well as park home law, to assume such a role?
• will an Interim Manager appointed by the local authority be required to be a fit and proper person?
• given many parks hold Credit Licences to allow them to sell park homes on finance, how would this be accommodated during the tenure of an Interim Manager; without such provision, the park’s income, and in consequence its viability, could be seriously compromised.

10.4 We would urge the committee to recommend that this proposal be subject to further more detailed consideration before being progressed.

British Holiday and Home Parks Association
10 February 2014
Housing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Maureen Watt): Good morning, everyone, and welcome to the fifth meeting in 2014 of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. I remind everybody to switch off their mobile devices, because they affect the broadcasting system. People may see some members consulting tablets because they get their papers in digital format.

The first item on our agenda is the Housing (Scotland) Bill. We will hear evidence from two panels on the provisions that relate to mobile homes. On the first panel, we have witnesses from groups that represent mobile and park home residents. I welcome Brian Doick, who is president of the National Association of Park Home Residents; Barry Plews, chair of the park home legislation action group; and David Tweddle, senior consultant with and membership secretary of the independent park home advisory service.

Adam Ingram will start the questioning.

Adam Ingram (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP): Good morning, gentlemen. The Scottish Government’s vision for housing is “that all people in Scotland live in high quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs”.

To what extent do you think that the bill’s provisions support that vision?

Brian Doick (National Association of Park Home Residents): The bill supports that vision by addressing the need for extra security for the people who live in mobile and park homes. One of the main problems that has occurred over the years concerns security of tenure for those people and the unscrupulous nature of the people who own the land and lease it to the residents for them to make their homes on.

As the committee is probably aware, although those residents have purchased a home, they do not own the land. Consequently, a lot of unscrupulous people treat residents badly, and those residents are given no security. There are all sorts of rules and regulations that suit the owners but do not relate to any legislation.

The fit-and-proper-person test in the bill is one of the most important developments that we have seen for many years. The criteria that someone would have to meet to be considered a fit and proper person cover quite a big area.

The Convener: We will come to that specific issue later on.

Brian Doick: Okay—that is fine. Criteria and security are important factors.

Living in a mobile or park home is a cheaper way of living, apart from the cost of renting the land, which goes up every year and becomes dearer and dearer. People buy a cheap house, but staying on the land can be more expensive.

David Tweddle (Independent Park Home Advisory Service): Our organisation has found that our membership is increasing in Scotland. Living in a park home is a more affordable way of living and is becoming more popular here. The numbers are nowhere near those in England yet, but it is catching on and we anticipate that it will become more prevalent in Scotland. Of course, what we are here for, and what you are trying to do, is to make that way of living secure for the people who choose it.

The work that we have done so far has been okay. We have agreed with park owners the new implied terms, which are better for residents, and we are now discussing site licensing, which is very important.

In England, we have found that local authorities just do not enforce things. That is a massive problem. Some local authorities never visit the parks that they are responsible for and do not do anything about them. People change jobs within the local authorities and do not know what their responsibilities are. The situation is very poor.

The Convener: We will go into enforcement in more detail later.

Barry Plews (Park Home Legislation Action Group): I think that I am probably unique in being the only person in the room who lives in a park home in Scotland. I have been there for the past six or seven years. I have been there for the past six or seven years. Strangely enough, many of the issues that we are discussing today do not exist in the park where I live. I got involved because I started to visit other parks to see what was happening in those places—basically, to see whether we were missing out on anything. I found that lots of the problems that we are discussing exist in Scotland in quite a bad way. I have come across some shocking situations concerning elderly residents in parks across Scotland. Many of them contact us looking for advice, and many of them are at the end of their tether.

If, six or seven years ago, I and my colleague Mike Larkman, who cannot be here today because he has health problems, had known that we were going to have a Scottish bill such as this one, we would have been very happy. We started off with help from Angela Constance, who happens to be Mike’s MSP and managed to get us an interview with Keith Brown, who I think was the housing minister at the time. That is where all of this started. Mike and I have been working on the issue, along with other colleagues, for that length of time. It has been a struggle but, if this is the sort of bill that we are going to put in place in Scotland, we will be well satisfied.

David Tweddle: We are constantly told that some of the English problems are not prevalent in Scotland, but I should say that one of the worst park owners in England, who operates 36 parks, is already in Scotland. Some of the rogues and unscrupulous park owners in England will come up here if they can get in. The problem is one for Scotland as well as England.

Adam Ingram: Are you happy with the way in which the bill was consulted on? Are you happy with the degree of input that you had?

Brian Doick: Yes, I think that we are. I first came to the Parliament in 2005, which was when the process of consultation and evidence taking started. It has taken a long time to get where we are today, but I think that the consultation has been good. Nothing has been left out. We have been given all the information that we have asked for, or have been sent it automatically by Government officials. There has been no problem with it at all.

David Tweddle: I echo that.

Barry Plews: The young people who have been taking us through the process have been extraordinarily helpful and clever in what they have done for us. We are all elderly people and we tend to get a little bit anxious about things and a little bit annoyed at times, but they have carefully taken us through every step of the process. I can give them nothing but praise.

The Convener: Before we go on to look at licensing in particular, can you give us an oversight of how many parks there are in Scotland and how many people live in them?

David Tweddle: I think that we are looking at about a couple of hundred parks.

Barry Plews: I think that we have about 450 parks in Scotland, and there are probably now about 4,500 to 5,000 people living on them. I did a survey some years ago, and the numbers will have changed since then. However, the numbers that I have given are about right, and they are increasing.

The Convener: Are the parks all over Scotland or are they concentrated in particular areas?

Barry Plews: They are basically all over Scotland. The tendency has been for owners of holiday parks to suddenly realise that having a residential park, rather than a holiday park, is a better and more secure way to make money.

Brian Doick: Some of the parks are quite small, with five or six—or even fewer—homes on them. In our last survey, we had to search for the parks. If we do not have members on a park, we do not know where it is. Councils have the same problem. Since our survey, Barry Plews has come up with the 450 figure, which is about right.

The Convener: The Scottish Government says that there is evidence, which I think you have backed up, that there are unscrupulous site owners who exploit vulnerable residents and fail to comply with statutory obligations. How widespread is the problem?

Brian Doick: It is quite widespread.

David Tweddle: That is not so much the case in Scotland but it will happen more, because, as I said, one of the worst park owners in England is now up here. He operates 36 parks throughout the UK—that is his total stock.

In England, such behaviour is fairly widespread. Unscrupulous park owners do not really obey the law. The law is there to stop them doing such things but, as in every area, lawbreakers break laws. They just do it—they do not care. The parks are run by a certain type of person and a certain type of community. It is awful for vulnerable people who have sunk their life savings into their home. The houses are not cheap. In the south of England, they are expensive—they can cost £250,000. People are buying into a way of life but suddenly they find that the guy in the office is an absolute tyrant and rides roughshod over them, and that is their life destroyed. It is important for organisations such as ours to keep on top of that, which is what we do. Brian Doick and I belong to two different organisations but we work together and pursue people’s problems for them on the parks. We have expertise in site licensing and mobile home legislation. We have been doing it for many years.

The Convener: With respect to the 450 parks in Scotland, are there 450 owners or do some people own quite a number of parks?

David Tweddle: There are owners who have multiple parks.

The Convener: How many?

David Tweddle: I have no idea.

The Convener: Okay. We can ask the second panel.
Would you say that the majority regulate themselves pretty well through associations such as the British Holiday & Home Parks Association?

Brian Doick: Quite a few do. BH&HPA membership is not as strong as it could be but quite a lot of owners are regulated through that organisation. I think that there are more park owners in Scotland who do not belong to an organisation because of the way they are and the way they want to be. They are in a fraternity that is, as we have said, unscrupulous.

I have been doing this now for 26 years—helping people wherever possible, because of the type of rogue that we have in Wales, Scotland and England. Although England has been the worst, I would say that there are quite a number of such owners in Scotland. You have to understand that we do not know about all of them. We know about them only when people come to us with problems—that is how we find out. It travels through the system, as it were. I believe that there are quite a few more unscrupulous people out there whom we do not know about. We do not know about them until something serious happens. Over the years, we have found evidence of very serious cases in which people have basically been put out of their house.

Barry Plews: There is a natural tendency for elderly people to keep their heads down. One of the biggest problems that we have is getting people to come out and tell us what is going wrong. The only way that I can do that is by travelling round parks and meeting people.

I live on a park where none of these problems exists, but there are other parks where some of the things that happen are seriously criminal. I have recently tried to involve the police in a specific case but, sadly, the couple who are involved—who both suffer from cancer—have decided that they cannot take any more. They do not want any more hassle or problems and have now decamped to a nearby flat. The park owners have taken their home from them—they have made them sign away their home—although it is probably worth £100,000 or £120,000. That is the sort of criminality that exists in Scotland, and there are a number of people who practise that sort of thing. Unfortunately, the couple decided that they could not take any more and would not make a formal complaint, although the police were absolutely certain that they had a case.

I have met that sort of situation as I have wandered around.

Brian Doick: It comes back to scare tactics. These crooked people put fear into people and, as we have said, people are frightened. We can have as many laws as you like—we are pleased about what you are doing, which is a lot—but until the law is used it is worthless. Unfortunately, because of how these people deal with the elderly, such things happen.

Let me give the example of elderly persons who have had some bricks and mortar to live in but who have realised that their pension is not much good—they are not going to have anything. They think that, if they sell their home and buy a mobile home, they might have £50,000 in change to help them to get through life. Subsequently, an unscrupulous person puts pressure on them and they get frightened because they are threatened with eviction and all sorts of things. They are told by the park owner, “I'm the boss. This is my land. If I say you go, you go.” That frightens them to death. People in their late 70s and 80s who have that fear put into them then look to go somewhere else, but they cannot sell their home because Mr Park Owner stops them in some way or other and the poor souls end up selling their home back to him for about £5,000 or even less. In England, some people have sold their homes for £1, and once someone has taken that £1, it becomes a legal transaction. That is how the park owners work.

There is quite a bit of that going on all over the UK, and it is spreading.

David Tweddle: The fit-and-proper-person test may address some of those problems, one of which is the criminal element. If they were not behaving criminally on mobile home parks, they would be behaving criminally somewhere else. They are criminals and that is how they earn their living. They have decided that they do not need masks and guns because they can strip somebody of £100,000 just through a bit of bullying. It is very lucrative. That is the type of people that we have mostly in the south-east and, as I have said, one of them is already in Scotland.

Barry Plews: They are already emigrating here.

Brian Doick: That is right.

David Tweddle: They are criminals, but the fit-and-proper-person test may address that problem. They will get round it, probably, but there you are.

The Convener: We will come on to that in a minute.

You have addressed the problem of elderly people being placed in fear. What other problems are there that the current legislation does not address? You mentioned that some local authorities do not have a clue about what they should be doing in relation to mobile home parks. What other problems exist beside the one that you mentioned of elderly people being placed in fear?
Brian Doick: There is a particular problem with licensing. Over the years, local authorities put conditions on a site licence, and it becomes a legal requirement to meet those conditions. People should abide by the conditions once they have been put on a licence, but that is never policed because the legislation has never allowed it to be policed—councils have never had a duty to do that.

For example, the minimum spacing distance between homes, as laid down in legislation, is 6m. In local authorities all over the country—I am not just talking about Scotland—the officers who are younger and coming through the ranks work to the secretary of state’s model standards, which are guidelines for councils with regard to fulfilling licence requirements. The model standards have come from the secretary of state at various points. A set came out in England in 2008, and the one before that came out in 1989. The guidelines state that the 6m rule applies but in some of the parks that council officers visit the spacing distance between homes is not 6m but 5.5m, 5m or whatever because the rule was never policed in the first place.

The first model standards were brought into being in 1961 under the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 and, in that legislation, the minimum spacing distance was 20 feet in the old language of measurement. The minimum spacing distance has become 6m, which is not much of a difference. If councils had policed the provision in the 1960s, the majority of the problems that we currently have would not exist—particularly those involving minimum spacing distance. However, because it has not been policed, rogue park owners have just put homes where they have wanted to, without worrying about the 6m rule.

Over the years—in fact, this is happening now—new council officials have found that the distance between homes is wrong and have told people who have lived in their home for 10 or 20 years, “Well, that’s got to be altered because it’s a fire risk under the new fire regulations. It should be 6m and it’s only 5.” However, if there is no room in the park to move the homes around, some of them will have to go. Mr Park Owner, who is the licence holder, has to abide by what the council says because the council issues him with the licence that he needs to run his business. If a home that is owned by, say, an old couple who live in it breaches the park owner’s licence because of the spacing distance, the park owner will tell them, “Your home’s in breach. You’ve got to move out.” That is despite the fact that it is the park owner’s problem. Home owners are not allowed to site their own homes and know nothing about the spacing distance. Mr Park Owner, however, does know about these things.

That is happening today in England and I know that it is happening up here because we have received phone calls about it. People are being threatened with the loss of their home. We have always said that the model standards, which are, as I have said, guidelines for councils, were meant to be flexible. In England, we have asked councils not to write licence conditions; instead, we need to look at the reality of a park and think about whether the approach that I have described will simply cause grief and end up with people losing their homes. We need to take a sensible look at the issue. The time to do something about the situation is when a home’s life is up, when the people who own it pass away or whatever. Such things are creating major problems for people and giving them something else to fear.

The Convener: In my experience, not all the homes on a site are owned; some are rented by the park owner. Mr Plews, do you have any idea of the split between those who own their homes and those who rent?

Barry Plews: In most residential parks, all the homes are owned by residents. There are many places and parks where you can rent properties, but in all the parks that I have visited, the homes have been owned. The thing about residential parks is that they are open 12 months a year. Certainly all the homes on my park are resident-owned.

David Tweddle: You have touched on what is a serious problem in England. When people decide to choose that way of life, they go and look at the park and say, “Yes, this’ll be nice for us. Everybody is about the same age, and they are like-minded people.” People choose a lifestyle. However, many park owners in England—once again, the rogues, mostly—own homes that they have bought from residents for practically nothing. Properties have not sold, so the park owner perhaps could not sell it and therefore rents it out. He will put in people whom the council has probably just thrown out of a council house somewhere. People invest their life savings in a lifestyle and suddenly have a family living next door to them that has been thrown out of four or five other properties. That type of situation exists and is an absolute disgrace; it is destroying people’s lives and what they bought into when they bought the mobile home.

We do not believe that people should be renting out. The residents cannot rent out the homes under the Mobile Homes Act 1983, so why should the park owner be able to? He can, and that is it. That is a serious problem at the moment. About 18 months ago, I wrote a paper on it for my colleagues and predicted that it would be the next serious problem in the industry. I get phone calls from people who say, “We moved on to this park and suddenly there was a family next door with four kids who are up all night shouting.’ That is not what they bought into; they bought into living among like-minded people. That is the attraction of moving on to the parks. Renting will be a serious problem.

Brian Doick: A particular issue is that many unscrupulous people will rent out because there will be a bigger income. They charge people £100 to £150 a week to live in a mobile home, whereas landowners or park people get £150 a month for rent from people who own their own homes.

The difference is that the park owners think that the rules and regulations for the renters do not apply—that they do not come under the Mobile Homes Act 1983, because they are in rented accommodation, and the legal system for them is different from that for the mobile home residents and owners. There is a difference. That is why families move in with children, dogs and everything else. The park rules might say that no one can live there unless they are over the age of 50, 55 or whatever the park owner has laid down, that no children are to live on the site, and that people cannot have any pets. Families with young children and dogs—you name it—are moved in, and the rules and regulations go out the window. As David Tweddle said, poor souls who have bought into the lifestyle find that it is ruined. That issue needs to be seriously addressed.

David Tweddle: I recently went to a tribunal for a case. The park owner rented to somebody who had a dog, and the park had a strict no dogs policy. When I got through to him, he said, “Aye, but this man doesn’t have an agreement under the Mobile Homes Act. I’ve only given him a rental agreement, so none of that applies.” I went to the tribunal and argued, obviously, that the rules had to apply to everybody. I overegged it, of course. I said, “Are you telling me that I have to obey the speed limit in the park and the guy who is renting doesn’t?” and “Are you telling me that I can’t play loud music after such a time, but he can?” I went through all the things, and they said at the end, “Yeah, we take your point.”

It is ridiculous. We have a High Court ruling that the park rules are for everybody, but park owners just ignore them.

The Convener: How prevalent is that in Scotland, Mr Plews? Are some local authorities exemplars in managing mobile homes in their areas?

Barry Plews: To answer your second question first, it is often very difficult for me to get a real feeling of how local authorities are handling things. I have a number of contacts whom I can usually get some help from, but it is fair to say that most of them deal with the parks when they have done everything else. They get to them when they have sorted out all their other problems.

Fortunately, the park that I live on is extremely good. We very seldom see visits from the local authority. It has probably decided that it does not have to visit any more, because nothing goes wrong. I always feel that we should see somebody wandering around, having a look, talking to people, and ensuring that things are still going well, but that does not happen. To be honest, I think that it is thought, “It’s over there. Let’s leave it over there until it causes a problem.”

Brian Doick: The licensing is different as well. Residential sites are licensed differently and council sites appear to work differently. We believe that there should not be a mix on a park; there should be either renters or owners. That would be fair to everyone. We are not against people living in rented accommodation, but if we are going to have rules and regulations to protect everyone, they should be for everyone and not split down the middle.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): We have touched on the fit-and-proper-person test. The test that the bill will introduce will apply to people who own sites and to people who run sites on behalf of someone else. What benefits will the introduction of the test bring to residents of parks?

Barry Plews: It will take away quite a lot of the criminal element because they will not be allowed to run parks. People who have criminal records are running parks in Scotland at the moment. Their whole attitude is governed by the sort of people they are, and that is half the reason why the people who live on parks have the problems and issues that they tend to have. They are being cheated in many ways, or are being frightened off the parks so that they leave their homes behind. Someone can then buy it cheaply and sell it for twice the price a week later. The threats that are made generally come from people who have criminal records, so we hope that the test will clear them out to start with.

David Tweddle: At the moment, under the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960, anyone can apply for a licence and it will be granted. Those who apply for licences to run taxis or off-licences undergo background checks, but a person can run a park without any background checks whatever. Under the 1960 act, even if the local authority knows that the licensee is a criminal, it cannot do anything about it because it is not one of the reasons that can be used to refuse a licence. At the moment, an applicant can be refused a licence only if he has lost a licence or if a prosecution has been brought against him.
twice in the past X years in that locality, so it is almost impossible to refuse a licence application.

We would welcome a fit-and-proper-person test.

Brian Doick: The National Association of Park Home residents welcomes the test.

David Tweddle: We are not getting a fit-and-proper-person test in England. The Government has decided to wait; it has suggested that if the situation does not work out there could be other things such as heavier fines, and then the secretary of state will revisit the issue and consider the fit-and-proper-person test. We are for such tests. We believe that Scotland should have one, and we believe England should have one, although we are not getting one—not yet, anyway.

Brian Doick: The fit and proper test is excellent; it covers everything. The only thing that I would say is that there appear to be some areas where the “fit and proper person” might not be the right person, so someone else can be brought in from the same family. The bill does not state that the park owner must be the main man. The bill talks about a person or an occupier, and the word “occupier” comes into play with other legislation.

The park owner should be the man who is generally responsible for that park; he is the owner of the land. When the legislation comes in, we have to be careful that he does not turn up with someone else because the bill also mentions a fit and proper person who does not have to be the owner; it could be his grandson or his grandmother. Some people work that way; they would put someone else in the position because they fit the requirements of the words in the bill. The provision has to be clarified in order to make the park owner the responsible person. T

The Convener: Are you saying that the owner and the person who manages the site should both be fit and proper persons?

Brian Doick: Exactly—that is what we have been saying. If that was not the case, your Government would have agreed to cover the fit-and-proper-person system, but there would still be people who could move over and let someone else take a position as a manager without being a fit and proper person.

David Tweddle: One of the reasons why that was not pursued in England was that the Government argued that it would be too easy to put somebody else up and to get round the provisions.

The Convener: My understanding is that the bill proposes that both people should be fit and proper persons.

David Tweddle: Yes, and we welcome that.

Brian Doick: That is what we welcome in the bill.

David Tweddle: We did not get that in England.

Brian Doick: We have to ensure that local authorities know that that is what must happen. Elsewhere in the bill, reference is simply made to a person, and we need to ensure that we have got the management bit right, so that the top man is the man who is responsible all round.

Mary Fee: Is the detail around the fit-and-proper-person test comprehensive enough to ensure that the person undergoing the test will meet the residents’ needs, or should there be something else in there?

Brian Doick: Well, we went through—

David Tweddle: On the criteria, we went through—

The Convener: One at a time, folks.

David Tweddle: We think that the criteria are okay.

Brian Doick: There is one thing that needs to be looked at. If somebody is not a fit and proper person, that information needs to be kept in a register. The person who is not a fit and proper person in Aberdeenshire might be deemed to be a fit and proper person if he bought a park in Stirlingshire, or another local authority area. He could go to an interview and say that he is okay, and that he has done this, that and the other, and he could get in. The situation could become as it is in England. I know that you have had this up here, too: a park owner might own 10 parks in different local authority areas and based on the information that it receives about the man, one local authority might say that he is fine while another might say that he is not.

If the man in question has a criminal record, that information needs to be kept on file by somebody who is responsible to local authorities, or in some place where the information can be made available. If a criminal came to a local authority, the local authority could telephone, email or whatever to ask that central body whether he had a criminal record. Otherwise, the council would only have his word to go on. That needs clarifying, and such measures to provide that extra bit of control would make the bill work perfectly.

Believe me, these rogues will do anything to achieve what they want, and lying is one of the greatest assets that they have; they are very good at it. We believe that such measures would improve the bill. That said, and as I said earlier, what you have in the bill is good.

Mary Fee: Mr Plews, do you have any further comments?

Barry Plews: No—the issues have been more than well covered. There should be relationships between local authorities so that they can do additional checks. These people are all over the country—there is no doubt about it, so such relationships would be worth while.

Mary Fee: You are saying that the sharing of information across local authorities would be worth while.

Barry Plews: Yes.

David Tweddle: The introduction of a licence fee should make the local authority more responsible in checking and policing the parks. The fee will have been paid, and that might help with the behaviour of the local authorities.

Mary Fee: The British Holiday and Home Parks Association has suggested that the bill should contain provisions that would allow ministers to make regulations on the fit-and-proper-person provisions at a later date, should unscrupulous owners not reform their practices. To have a fit-and-proper-person test, there has to be some kind of regulation and then remedy. What are your views on that?

David Tweddle: I am not quite sure what you mean. Are you asking what happens if somebody applies for a licence, is subjected to the fit-and-proper-person test but fails?

Mary Fee: If a person applies and passes the fit-and-proper-person test, but at a later date is not complying in respect of how they are managing the site or dealing with residents, what happens?

David Tweddle: A raft of enforcement procedures is open to the local authority.

Brian Doick: The options allow further investigation—that is the important factor.

Mary Fee: Ultimately, I suppose that that would give residents on sites more security and mean that there is a uniform approach for sites across the country.

David Tweddle: Yes.

Brian Doick: As I said, we do not have the fit-and-proper-person test in England, but we have two or three of the nastiest people around running parks, one of whom has been chased and challenged by the local authority. He has been to court three or four times with the local authority, and at present he is hiding from it. He failed to turn up in court last week. He is up for a breach of the site licence conditions. He is claiming all sorts of things and handing things on to his son. That brings me back to what I said earlier about getting the right fit and proper person. The son is as bad as him, but of course he is not the licence holder. They hide and do those sorts of things. He is one of the most crooked men in the world and will do anything to get away with it. He owes £232,000 in unpaid fines. If it was me, I would have been locked up by now, but such people play games— they hide and run away and whatever. Those concerns apply, but I am sure that you have the structure in the bill to deal with that.

Mary Fee: Thank you.

Jim Eadie (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP): Good morning, gentlemen. You have certainly brought to life the issues surrounding mobile homes—in particular the unscrupulous practices that exist, which may have become more prevalent. I think that Mr Tweddle made the point that you know about issues only if they are brought to you, so there could be a lot of activity under the radar.

I have some questions on site licensing and how it might help to address some of the issues. There are divergent views in the variety of written evidence that we have received, but both the National Association of Park Home Residents and the Independent Park Home Advisory Service appear to be against the suggestion that there should be a licence that is renewed every three years, on the basis that that might strengthen the hand of unscrupulous site owners. Will you expand on that?

David Tweddle: You should remember that we deal with complaints day in, day out. We do not have a problem with fixed-term licences as such, but they give the park owner another weapon with which to threaten vulnerable people. It might seem strange to well-educated younger people that people can be threatened in this way, but owners will go around saying, “I’m not going to apply for my licence when it comes up. I’m having too many problems with you people.” People think that, at the end of three years, they will be out of their homes because the owner tells them that. It is all a lie, and we and you know that that cannot happen, but they do not know it. We are against handing such owners another threat that they can use against residents.

Jim Eadie: I understand that point, but surely a system of licences that are renewed every three to five years would provide a statutory weapon against the unscrupulous site owner.

David Tweddle: I appreciate that, but we feel that the enforcement procedures that you have are adequate. Should a park owner misbehave and the local authority act appropriately, it has enough enforcement powers to get rid of him without having to have a fixed licence.

Jim Eadie: I will get the alternative view in a second—I know that there is a range of views—but are you not concerned that you are handing a licence in perpetuity to someone who is, as you have eloquently outlined, unscrupulous and criminal in their behaviour?

David Tweddle: We are not handing him a licence in perpetuity if the council enforces it properly. We are saying that he has his licence for an indefinite period but, should he misbehave, a range of enforcement measures can be used against him. If the local authority behaves properly, it will police the licence. That is our view.

Brian Doick: There is another aspect to that. On the front cover of the majority of agreements between people who live on parks and the park owners it says, “The licence holder’s interest in the land will cease on” and the unscrupulous put a date in there when they have done something that is not right. The proposal to have a three-yearly or five-yearly licence would increase that problem, because the licence holder would write on the front of such agreements that their interest in the land would cease on a date when the licence runs out and would use that against the people.

We have a similar situation in England at the moment, where a park owner has leased off three parts of his site to other persons—the park owner has the licence, but he has leased it to other people—who have formed a little business in which they make charges to the people for various things outside of the pitch-fee review because they are the new managers of that section. The park owner has altered people’s agreements with the date that his interest will cease. There are people living on that park who feel that their agreement will run out in six years’ time. What do they do then? They were told—we have had this before—that, because the interest in the land has ceased, they will have to go. Where can they take their homes? Where will they go?

That is another problem that would arise under the system that you are talking about. That is why we believe that, as David Tweddle said, the licence should run in perpetuity and, if the park owner fails to comply with the conditions of the licence, he should be prosecuted by the local authority. The fit-and-proper-person test would prevent the unscrupulous from going into park ownership in the first place. If we get all that into play, the residents will be more protected and the law will work in their favour because, under the new licensing scheme, the local authority will visit and inspect the park anyway, so it will—we hope—find out if there are problems on the park and deal with them. That is far better than anything that we have ever had.

That is the reason that we are not so keen on splitting up the licence. It opens up another loophole for unscrupulous owners. You have the facility in the bill to go for the park owner whenever you wish; you do not have to wait for a fixed-term licence to end.

David Tweddle: If the owner is not behaving correctly, the local authority should use the range of enforcement orders that it has.

Jim Eadie: So enforcement orders implemented by the local authority and the fit-and-proper-person test are the routes to go down rather than site licensing.

Brian Doick: I would say so.

David Tweddle: That is what we feel.

Jim Eadie: That is clear enough.

Mr Plews, your organisation has a different view.

Barry Plews: I certainly agree with the statements that have been made.

Jim Eadie: I understood that the park home legislation action group Scotland took a different view on site licensing.

Barry Plews: Can you say that again?
Jim Eadie: I understood that your organisation—park home legislation action group Scotland—was in favour of site licensing.

Barry Plews: I am in favour of site licensing. I am in favour of what is proposed in the bill.

Jim Eadie: So your organisation takes a different view from the one that Mr Doick and Mr Tweddle have just expressed.

Barry Plews: No, I do not take a different view. You are confusing me a little.

Jim Eadie: I am sorry; perhaps I am confusing myself. The two organisations that Mr Tweddle and Mr Doick represent are not in favour of site licensing. Is that correct?

Brian Doick: We are not.

David Tweddle: Fixed term.

Brian Doick: We want licensing in perpetuity.

David Tweddle: Our two organisations are not in favour of the suggestion—

Jim Eadie: Sorry—I am not being clear. What I am saying is that you are not in favour of the site-licensing proposals in the bill, which are for a three-year renewal period.

Barry Plews: My understanding has always been that the licence applies to the land—so it is in perpetuity, in a sense—and then there is a licence to actually use it. We are talking about two slightly different things, I think.

Jim Eadie: Mr Plews, am I correct that your organisation is in favour of the proposal in the bill to require a renewal of the licence every three years?

Barry Plews: Yes. I believe that it should be checked every three years.

Jim Eadie: So there is a difference of view between your organisations.

Barry Plews: Yes, there is.

Jim Eadie: Can you explain why you are in favour of the proposal?

Barry Plews: It will keep the owners on their toes, if you like. Owners will have to ensure that they achieve certain things every three years. If they are given any longer, they will wait. Anything that puts pressure on people to do the job properly is worth while, so I am in favour of the renewal being required every three years.

Brian Doick: We do not disagree that there should be inspections on a regular basis. It would be fine if the parks were to be inspected lawfully every three years, but we should not let the licence run out—it should continue. If a council visits a park for an inspection every two, three or four years, that is when it will find the problems. If the licence has to be renewed, the process will have to be similar, but if the licence is there in perpetuity, the council will still be able to inspect a park and serve notices when it wishes to do so, and the park will be controlled. There is no need for the licence to be renewed—it can be the same licence. The only time that it will need to be renewed is if things are so bad on a park that the licence is revoked. When the issues are sorted out, the licence will need renewing, but that is a different bird.

Barry Plews: If we go on the principle that the licence is for the ground rather than for the right to use it, all that we would be doing is checking every three years that the person who currently occupies the land is fulfilling his obligations.

Jim Eadie: The British Holiday and Home Parks Association suggests a change from the proposed three-year period to a system whereby rolling licences are subject to a five-yearly review but with a legal presumption in favour of the renewal of the licence unless there have been problems in the five-year period. Is what you suggest close to that?

Barry Plews: Yes, I think that it is. Our point is that we should have regular inspections by the local authority. However we achieve that—whether it is by having a three-year licence or a three-year renewal period or whatever—we want somebody from the council to have to come at specific times to carry out an examination of whether everything is okay. That does not happen at the moment, which is why we favour the three-year period.

Brian Doick: I will add one final point on that. To have this—

Jim Eadie: Is the specific proposal that the British Holiday and Home Parks Association has made acceptable to your organisation, Mr Doick?

Brian Doick: It appears from what you say that the BH&HPA is asking for a regular relicensing system, which is what we are not in favour of. Another reason why we are not in favour of that is that it cannot be good for the industry itself. We publish advice for people who are considering moving on to a park, which says that they should look into things and check that the licence is in order. We say that people should ensure that the council has licensed the park and think about requirements such as how many homes should be on it and whether the licence is displayed on a noticeboard. If someone who wants to buy a home on a park sees that the licence runs out in 12 months, they will not buy the home, because there will be nobody there to explain to them how the system works. If the licence was there all the time, there would be no such effect on that part of the industry.
I am dealing with a park in Straiton in Edinburgh at the moment. The owner is absolutely atrocious. He is absolutely useless, and he is a criminal. I have had him in the sheriff court twice. However, he still has his licence and nothing seems to happen. He trundles along even though the roads in the park are a disgrace and he gets his electricity turned off because he does not pay his bills. The residents pay him for their electricity, but he does not pay the utility company. When the utility company comes to the park and says that it is going to switch off the electric, I get a phone call and I say, “Well, you are domestic customers. They cannot turn off your electric.” Of course, however, the owner has a business agreement with the utility company and it says that it can turn off the electric, regardless of who else is involved, until the process is stopped.

The local authority is not pursuing that owner. I do not know why, because, obviously, it has the powers that have been outlined. I can only think that there is a lack of interest or a lack of resources.

Barry Plews: We are back at the same situation. Local authorities do not regularly visit parks to ensure that everything is all right. The parks are not some sort of multimechanised system; they are really quite simple. I have never been able to understand why a local authority cannot just take half a day to visit the park, which is all that is required to understand everything that is going on there. People from the council would only have to speak to people in the park, find out what is happening, tick boxes and wander away. However, that does not happen.

I understand that the suggestion is that there should be some way of enforcing the councils’ responsibility to ensure that they visit the parks at certain times. They should be doing that regularly, but they do not do it. If everything is quiet, they stay away. However, the problem is that everything is quiet because we are dealing with a community of elderly people who do not want to rock the boat. That is why these things are happening in the first place. There are people like me and others who rock the boat, and rock it quite firmly, but the majority of people at our age do not. I am 73, and there are people in our parks who are 80, 85 and 90. If you wanted to talk to them about problems, they would say that they would rather not; they would go away, or they would come down and knock on my door if we have any silly little thing going on.

In other parks it is the same, all the time. There are not enough residents of that age, with experience of what happens out in life before they went into parks, to do things about it. I would welcome anything that makes the local authority follow its obligations. Local authorities tend to forget that we are all council tax payers. We are not living in their local authority for free; we pay for it.

That service should be carried out regularly. I can see and understand what is happening in the case that Mr Tweddle mentioned. The council should come in. It would not take more than a day—I could do it in half a day. If the council came and talked to me, it could do it in a quarter of a day. The problem is that the council is just not doing it. There has to be enforcement. If that involves saying that local authorities have to come in and check the licence every two or three years, so be it. Something has to be there to force local authorities to meet their obligations. We are all council tax payers.

Mark Griffin: Mr Tweddle, you raised a couple of points on the impact that lack of enforcement has on residents, around disruptions to power supply and quality of roads. Can you pinpoint any other problems that impact directly on residents because of lack of enforcement?

David Tweddle: Yes. The site owner has a set of conditions, which relate to health and safety, roads and fire safety. Those conditions come from, and are dealt with by, the department of environmental health. Those things are very important for parks, but some park owners breach the conditions. I get many calls, constantly.

I will condense what I am saying, to try to get the message home. In all the years that I have been doing this, two things have caused most of our complaints: unscrupulous park owners and local authorities not doing their job. Local authorities not doing their job is equally as bad as unscrupulous park owners. By not enforcing or inspecting, local authorities cause as many other problems that impact directly on residents because of lack of enforcement.

It is important that local authorities get on board. If they are going to charge a fee from now on, they had better get themselves in gear. In England the situation is a disgrace, because they do not bother.

Brian Doick: The local authorities might well need educating on the matter. We would do anything to help if it was required; we would do the best we could for anybody.

Under the Caravan Sites Act 1968, the council is responsible for harassment, security of tenure and so on. That is in the act, but councils do not do anything. We say to people, “Go to the council. You’re being harassed by the park owner in a bad way. The council has offices to deal with it.” Nine times out of 10, councils turn people away and say that it is not really their problem and that they do not have the resources to deal with it. However, the 1968 act says that they should.

The Convener: We will take evidence from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers, so we will certainly quiz them on that.

Brian Doick: That is great. Thank you.

Mark Griffin: Is the Scottish Government’s proposed range of enforcement tools in the bill wide enough to act as a deterrent to rogue operators and are the tools proportionate? Would you suggest any additional enforcement tools for local authorities?

Brian Doick: We are happy with what is in the bill.

David Tweddle: We agree with the proposals, as long as the enforcement tools are used.

Brian Doick: Yes, that is right—as long as local authorities use the proposed tools, including the heavier fines. No fines have been imposed for three years or, where there has been a fine, it has been only £500 or whatever. However, the bill strengthens all those things, so it will be fine. The bill refers to criminal activity as a jailable offence, so the criminal aspect is covered and the bill refers to the other acts of Parliament that could be used against such people. What is in the bill will cover what is needed.

Barry Plews: I agree. The bill gives local authorities all the ammunition that they need—they will just have to use it.

Mark Griffin: Are you content with the bill’s provisions under which residents are protected from charges that are levied against the operator being passed on to them?

Brian Doick: We do not agree that the charges should be passed on. We do not see why a resident who is paying a pitch fee or a rent to live on a park should pay for the park owner’s licence to run his business. Without the licence, there would be no business.

Mark Griffin: I agree, but are you content that the bill would protect residents from those charges?

Brian Doick: I am sorry—I misunderstood you.

Barry Plews: So did I, for a moment.

Brian Doick: The bill is fine in that regard. The residents must be protected and the bill does that.

Mark Griffin: To wrap up, I ask whether you have any further comments on the proposed enforcement powers and how those would benefit parks across Scotland.
David Tweddle: To return to your earlier question, did you say that the residents are protected from the cost of the fee being passed on to them?

Mark Griffin: Yes. The Scottish Government’s position is that the polluter pays. If the owner or operator is acting unscrupulously and they are fined, they will pay that fine and the residents will be protected from any additional charges being passed on.

David Tweddle: You are talking about the enforcement of fines. We are also against the initial licence fee being passed down to residents. The mobile homes legislation lists what the park owner and the resident can have regard to when reviewing the pitch fee. That includes any change or enactment since the previous review date. Park owners will obviously claim that the introduction of licence fees should be taken into account in the pitch fee review and will pass that cost down to the residents. They have done that in England and got away with it. At the end of the day, the residents in England have ended up somehow paying for the site licence.

At one meeting, a minister said that that fee would be paid only once, but once the licence fee is in the pitch fee it is there forever. Furthermore, the licence fee attracts yearly retail prices index increases. The resident is paying for the owner’s licence, but that should be a business cost to him. That is a disgrace, but owners seem to have got away with it in England. We certainly do not agree with that.

Our consultation response said:

“The agreement allows the owner to have regard to any increased costs which are the result of legislation or enactment at the pitch fee review. Park owners will claim that the introduction of a site licence fee is a new cost to the park and something they are entitled to have regard to at the pitch fee review which will have the effect of residents paying the licence fee. A safeguard would have to be introduced in the pitch fee review procedure similar to the safeguard regarding commission on the sale of the home where the owner cannot have regard to the licence fee at the review.”

You would need to insert something in the bill to ensure that the licence fee cannot be passed down, but I do not know how you would do that. That is what we asked for in England, but we did not get it.

Barry Plews: I had that same misunderstanding when we were talking earlier. The licence fee should be the last thing that we should have to pay. We should not be charged money to support the owner’s licence. There is something not quite kosher about that.

David Tweddle: The UK Government made the argument that, because the residents will have increased input with the local authority, we should be in some way responsible for the licence fee. We do not accept that, but we did not get what we asked for.

Gordon MacDonald (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP): Let us assume that site licensing is introduced and the legislation gives local authorities the ability to charge a fee. It has been suggested that that fee could be around £600 for the three-year licence. What are your views on the possibility of local authorities charging a fee? Should there be a standard licence fee, or should the fee vary according to the size of the park?

David Tweddle: A standard fee would be unfair on very small parks. As Brian Doick said, some parks have only four or five homes, and £600 would be a hefty fee for someone who was running such a small park, whereas it would be nothing for a park with 200 homes on it. We think that the fee should be based on the number of pitches—I think that that is the approach that is being adopted in England.

Gordon MacDonald: Do you know the average fee south of the border?

David Tweddle: No. People are still talking about it. If we talk to individual local authorities, some say that they will not charge and some will charge different amounts.

Brian Doick: The fee is under discussion; a working party is working on what it should be. A lot of suggestions are flying about and various council officers have made recommendations, but no decision has been made on what the fee will be.

Gordon MacDonald: In general, if licensing comes in, do you support a fee being charged, especially if it means increased inspection of sites as a result of the extra funding?

Brian Doick: We do not disagree with that at all.

Barry Plews: As long as the cost is not passed on to residents.

David Tweddle: We think that a licence fee should be a business expense for the owner, rather than being passed down at the pitch fee review.

Gordon MacDonald: I got that point earlier.

The British Holiday and Home Parks Association said that, in general, the bill could create ‘unworkable red tape’, which could result in park owners being forced to "sell their parks to the highest bidder."

Are you concerned that the bill might force owners to sell? If so, what impact might that have on residents?
Mr Plews: I think that it is scare tactics.

Mr Doick: It is a scare tactic that owners are trying to use. They say that a lot—that they are going to sell their parks or do this or that. It will not happen, even if there is a major charge. When owners sell, we are talking about buyers paying not £50,000 any more but hundreds of thousands. There are parks selling down our way for £2 million or £3 million. No one is going to buy a park if the proposition is that bad.

It is just not going to happen that way. I think that that is just something that owners say. It is a nonsense. To some park owners, a £600 fee is peanuts. It is probably three or four months' rent from one house.

Mr Tweddle: The costs of the reform that we are talking about and the reform of the implied terms are not going to impact much on park owners. In our opinion, it is just scare tactics.

Mr Doick: Park owners have had no extra charges against them for years. They all say that this goes up and that goes up, but that is the same for everyone else. Pensioners in England have just had an increase on their pension of 2.5 per cent, which gives them about £1.50 extra a week—or something silly like that.

Mr Tweddle: And let us not forget that there is a built-in RPI rise every year in the agreements.

Mr Doick: That is automatic. As I said, things do not get done on the park, and the council does not enforce things. This business of the cost of a licence to the park owner is minor.

Mr Plews: I agree entirely. The idea of passing on the cost to home owners is a nonsense.

The Convener: We have talked a lot about rogue park owners, and Mr Plews said that he lived on a site that has a good park owner. In between, there are a lot of park owners. On balance, are they good, like Mr Plews's park owner, or are they trying to get away with as much as they can?

Mr Tweddle: There is obviously a percentage—let us say 10 per cent—who are criminals and will do everything that they can do to extort money. They cause a lot of the problems.

Then there is a big percentage in the middle who do things just through ignorance. The park owner does not know the rules, and he goes round saying, "I'm going to do this, and I'm going to do that. Yes, I can do that." Then he gets through to us and I say, "No, you can't do that." However, that is just ignorance; those owners are not criminals or bad people. There is a group of people like that.

If you are looking for percentages and I am put in a corner, I would say that 10 per cent are rogues and that the rest are in the other group. At the other end of the scale, as Barry Plews said, a good 10 per cent of park owners are excellent and run good, happy parks.
That was a sad story. That lady had the life frightened out of her when the former park owner sold the land from under her. She thought that she had had it but, fortunately, we saved her.

I have a very nice park owner and I have met a lot of very nice park owners. I could take members to parks that are absolutely magic and where people are treated in a first-class way, and we cannot knock that. However, I have a list at home of 30 to 35 very bad park owners. Some have moved on, but they are very bad. As I said, however, there are a lot of good park owners, and we praise them.

The Convener: Apart from what is in the bill, does the Scottish Government need to take further action or to make additions to strengthen the protections that people on mobile home sites should enjoy?

Brian Doick: We have covered everything.

David Tweddle: We are happy with the bill.

The Convener: You are happy with what is proposed.

Brian Doick: We are more or less happy with what has been done, although we can always find something. We suggest that the Parliament might want to put in the bill a section to establish a review in two years’ time or something, to see whether the provisions work after they have bedded in. If they are not working, they could be reviewed and looked at in a further two or three years’ time, instead of keeping going with an unworkable thing.

The Convener: Members have no further questions, so I thank the gentlemen for their helpful evidence. If, when you get out of here, you think of something that you should have said, please put it in writing. I suspend the meeting to allow a switchover of panel members.

Brian Doick: Thank you very much for inviting us.

11:19
Meeting suspended.

11:25
On resuming—

The Convener: Okay folks, we continue our first item of business. I welcome the second panel on mobile home issues in the Housing (Scotland) Bill. The panel members are from owners representative groups. I welcome Colin Fraser, who is the chair of the British Holiday and Home Parks Association, and Jeanette Wilson, who is the policy director, Scotland, of the BH&HPA.

Would Adam Ingram like to start the questioning again?

Adam Ingram: Thank you, convener.

The Scottish Government’s vision for housing in Scotland is “that all people in Scotland live in high quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs”.

Can panel members comment on the bill’s provisions as they relate to that vision?

Colin Fraser (British Holiday and Home Parks Association): We agree with that statement exactly. Park homes nowadays are very nice and very comfortable—they are the sort of homes that people want to live in. My views differ from what was said during the previous evidence session, in that it is not actually a growing industry. It grew in the past few years because people managed to find site licences and were able to change holiday parks into residential parks, but the current position in the local plans is that most councils are totally against the establishment or extension of mobile home parks.

Adam Ingram: Why do you think that that is the case?

Colin Fraser: It is because councils do not believe that mobile homes—as good as they are—are the sort of housing that they want.

Adam Ingram: Does Jeannette Wilson have any comment?

Jeanette Wilson (British Holiday and Home Parks Association): Councils essentially do not recognise that mobile homes meet a gap in provision. There are people who want to live in a gated community—I hesitate to say that, because it sounds very American, but they want the comfort of living with people who are of a similar age. A stipulation for residency in the majority of parks is that residents have to be over 50 or 55—no children live there although grandchildren and so on can visit. A lot of people pursue such a lifestyle. They feel comfortable and do not have big responsibilities for maintenance or gardens, or anything like that.

To be honest, it is probably just the result of a pretty historical view that councils have held. Many of them do not realise how well appointed the homes are nowadays. They have greatly improved on what they were 20 or 30 years ago. It is unfortunate that councils do not recognise that mobile homes meet a housing need for certain people.

Adam Ingram: How would you characterise the bill’s provisions as they affect park homes?

Jeanette Wilson: I think that the majority of the bill’s provisions are very welcome, with the obvious caveats in relation to the concerns that we commented on in our submission.

There needs to be a two-pronged public relations exercise. Local authorities throughout Scotland need to take a common approach to mobile home parks and to understand exactly what they are and what they provide. On the other side of the coin, it is obvious from a lot that was said during the previous evidence session that a big education exercise needs to be carried out for consumers, too. It is very worrying that so many of them do not appear to know their rights and exactly where they stand when they buy a mobile home. Our members give out information to people when they make a purchase, but I am aware that many parks are not in our membership and probably do not do that.

When the changes came in on 1 September in relation to implied terms and so on, we encouraged the civil servants who were to deal with the changes here to put something together to alert consumers to exactly what the changes were, what protections they had and so on. Although a little leaflet was produced, a whole lot more could and perhaps should have been said. A big education exercise needs to be done so that consumers do not find themselves in the unfortunate situations that some seem to have found themselves in.

Adam Ingram: Does Mr Fraser want to add anything?

Colin Fraser: No—that is fine, thank you.

The Convener:

Adam Ingram: Were you happy with the Scottish Government’s consultation process for the bill? You obviously engaged in it. Do you have any comments on it?

Colin Fraser: Yes. The consultation process has been very good. The only thing that I would say is that the economic effects were not outlined very well. For example, the effect on a park owner of not being able to get finance for a mobile home was not looked at. There were a lot of things that the consultation did not look into. That could be why only certain circumstances are covered in the bill.

The Convener: You were in the public gallery for the first evidence session. The witnesses in that session said that there are about 450 parks, with about 4,000 to 5,000 residents. However, the policy memorandum states:

“Research by Consumer Focus identified 92 mobile home sites in Scotland, with around 3,314 mobile homes.”

What is your assessment of how many home parks there are and how many residents they might have?

Colin Fraser: I recognise those figures, but we are not very sure how many there are. If someone lives in a mobile home or a caravan all year round to look after the park, the local authority issues a licence for a residential caravan or a residential mobile home, which is classed as being in a park. As a result of that, if Barry Plews asked the local authorities how many licences they issued, he could get a totally wrong number. I have a wee park in Buckie and I have a warden, and I have to apply for a residential site licence for that one home. That happens all over the country—most reasonably sized parks have somebody living in the park. That may be where the previous witnesses got the figure of 400 or so from.

The Convener: How many members do you have in Scotland?

Jeanette Wilson: We have 52 members who have residential parks, covering just under 2,000 residential pitches. I think that when the Scottish Government first got involved in the park home reform process, which was quite a few years ago, somebody—it might have been Mark Bevan from the University of Stirling—did some research for the civil servants to identify the number of residential homes. I am not sure whether that research based its figure on applications to local authorities—as Colin Fraser said, holiday parks with one residential caravan or mobile home may have been listed. I think that that research was carried out in 2007 or thereabouts. I am not aware of a complete study having been done since then.

Colin Fraser: We have 52 mobile home parks—or licensed parks—within the BH&HPA, but of those only 17 are exclusively mobile home parks. The rest are mixed parks, with mobile homes in a holiday park.

The Convener: Yes. I got that impression because what the gentlemen from England said does not really represent the situation up here. We have mixed parks—parks where there are rented homes as well as owned homes. What is the mix here?

Colin Fraser: Between rented homes and owned homes?

The Convener: Yes.

Colin Fraser: I have rented homes in my parks—they are nearly all rented—but the majority of parks do not really go in for renting. In the past few years, homes have not been selling very well. Park owners buy back a home and rent it out until such time as things pick up, when they can sell new homes. They will still rent homes, but they can slip on a new home and sell it because that is far more profitable than renting. That is why parks have quite a number of rented homes dotted around, but there are very few totally rented parks.
The Convener: To what extent would you agree with the Scottish Government that there is evidence that there are—as we heard from the previous witnesses—unscrupulous site owners who exploit vulnerable residents and fail to comply with their statutory obligations?

Colin Fraser: There are very few unscrupulous owners in Scotland. I have been director of the BH&HPA Scotland for 25 years and I have been on the park homes committee for as many years, and I know who most of the rogue park operators in England are. I think that the previous witnesses said that there are 35 very bad park owners. I would say that there is only one in Scotland—the park owner whom they were speaking about is not the best person in the world. The rest are doing okay, although some of them need a wee bit of educating. We have been working with one of them in particular, and he is getting a lot better. There is nothing like the number of rogue park operators in Scotland that there is south of the border.

The previous witnesses also said that rogue operators will come up to Scotland to buy parks, but they will not, because the vast majority of parks are far too small for them. All the bigger ones have been in the hands of the same families for 20 or 30 years. There are 13 parks in Scotland that have more than 50 pitches—I am talking about our membership. Only two of the owners of those parks have been in the business for less than 20 years.

I do not believe that the rogue element comes into it to nearly the same extent in Scotland as it does in England. Most of the rogue operators in England have multiple parks—they have 20 or 30 parks, and the parks that they own are larger than the ones here, so I do not think that we will get them up here. I do not think that it will be a problem.

The Convener: However, you would have to agree that not all site owners are as brilliant as the one whose site Mr Plews lived on. Improvements could definitely be made to many parks.

Colin Fraser: There is no doubt that, as the previous witnesses said, many park owners need to be educated on what they should be doing. People who have been in the business for 20 or 30 years are settled in the way that they do things. In addition, there might be a lot of older homes in their parks. When people have the right to sell on for ever, homes that are really past their sell-by date still sell. That means that it is not possible to have a beautiful-looking park like some of the newly developed parks, which look great. The older parks will never look great, because the old homes pass on from person to person.

The Convener: In your submission, you said: “Decent park owners with businesses where there are no ‘wrongs’ to be ‘righted’ are finding the burden of legislation ... difficult to manage.”

What current legislation is a burden?

Colin Fraser: The latest implied terms came out recently, but they did not come out in the best of ways. For example, they do not say who pays the commission.

The Convener: What are you talking about when you say that “they” do not say who pays the commission?

Colin Fraser: The implied terms. You asked what the problems are at the moment. The park owner does not know from whom he is supposed to get the commission. He has to decide that for himself.

The Convener: Do you mean that a park owner does not know whether he is supposed to get the commission from the seller or the buyer when a home changes hands?

Colin Fraser: Yes. He can get the money from the seller or the buyer. One of the good things is that the commission has to be paid before the deal is completed, so one of the parties has to pay, but there is nothing in the legislation that says which one.

Jeanette Wilson: The lack of clarity has caused confusion. The implied terms changes that were made in September removed the role of the park owner from the sale process—previously, they knew who was coming to live in the park. That has caused a lot of concern.

As we mentioned, people move to a park because they are looking to live in a particular style of community. Now people will not know who is coming to live in the park because the park owner has not met them and cannot say whether they fit the criteria as to how the community lives. The park owners have been getting a lot of hassle from people who currently live in the parks because they are unhappy that they do not have the security of knowing that the person who has bought a home has been not exactly vetted but met and that assurances have been given that they are the sort of person that people were expecting to live with in that community.

The Convener: We heard from the first panel of witnesses that residents have no control because the park owner can sell the homes to whoever he wants.

Jeanette Wilson: The park owner would sell only to people who were going to fit in. Park owners are not looking for hassle—in the main, they want a nice, cohesive community. Nobody sets out to make their business life difficult. They are not going to encourage somebody to come... along just to take their money for the home with no thought given to the potential ramifications.

The Convener: You are saying that the park owner should have the last say in who a person sells their home to, but that could affect the price that they might get.

Jeanette Wilson: Yes, I can see that, but you asked what the concerns are. I am not saying that it is a massive thing, but it is something that has made park owners and residents uncomfortable. That is an unintended consequence; I know exactly what the legislation was intended to do—it was intended to prevent bad people from stopping people selling their homes and sneaking in to buy them. I appreciate that. The difficulty has arisen because of the potential for upset in what was previously a very happy community, which may not be so happy if somebody sells their home second hand to someone who does not really fit in. I was just using that as an example of what park owners are finding difficult, as that has become a bit of a difficulty.

The Convener: We also heard from the first panel that local authorities are failing to understand their roles, responsibilities and duties in terms of park standards. Is that true? Is your organisation finding differences in attitude between local authorities in different areas?

Jeanette Wilson: Local authorities have not been near quite a lot of parks for a very long time. In most cases, that is for the good reason that there has been no problem for them to get involved with. However, there is not a level playing field in Scotland regarding the attitudes to parks. It comes back to the need for an overall education exercise.

Colin Fraser: Local authorities always react if something goes wrong. If a local authority gets a letter of complaint about something, the park will get a visit from the local authority. The fact that local authorities are not attending parks indicates that they are not getting complaints—it is as simple as that.

The Convener: I have to disagree with that. Often, the people on the sites do not know who to complain to and do not know their rights in relation to the park owners. As a constituency member, I find that, rather than there being no complaints at all, the residents do not know their rights or who to complain to.

Jeanette Wilson: That highlights the need that I mentioned for a big public relations exercise to ensure that consumers know that information. They ought to be in possession of the facts, particularly given the amount of money that they hand over for a home. You would not dream of not knowing the details if you were buying a car—you would not hand over lots of money without all the necessary bits and pieces. There is a big gap to be filled.

Colin Fraser: The problem could be that there are so few mobile home parks in Scotland that a lot of councils have only two or three and they do not want to have somebody geared up to look after those two or three parks. I do not know whether there are people in councils to whom park residents can go to discuss their park.

The Convener: Jim Eadie will continue with questions on the theme of licensing.

Jim Eadie: I want to ask about the duration of site licences. You say in your written evidence that a three-yearly renewal system

"would create uncertainty and destroy confidence in the sector."

Given that a three-year period is common to the licensing system for homes in multiple occupancy and there does not appear to be any evidence to suggest that it has destroyed confidence in that sector, what underpins your assertion?

Colin Fraser: On what?

Jim Eadie: You state in your written evidence, which I have just quoted, that the move to a three-yearly renewal system

"would create uncertainty and destroy confidence in the sector."

That has not happened with homes in multiple occupancy, for which a similar system has been introduced. Why do you think that that would happen in your sector?

Colin Fraser: Because it is a different thing altogether. A house in multiple occupation is just one house that is sitting there, and one person owns it. The folk can move on tomorrow—they do not have a problem. Nobody has a problem with that.

11:45

However, the average caravan park in Scotland has 35 pitches, and the people on those pitches would not know what was going to happen. Just as the three fellows who were here earlier said that they did not feel secure, we feel that about a three-year licence. Wales has decided on five-yearly renewals of licences. That does not come in until October, but the finance companies, the banks and all the people who finance mobile homes and parks have withdrawn funding. They are not going to fund things that have a finite time. A rolling licence or a licence in perpetuity, which is the same thing, is what we need. As was said earlier, the licence is not for the person but for the land that the mobile homes sit on. There could be a review of the licence every three or five years, although we would prefer five years. It would be a review rather than a renewal.

Jim Eadie: You are concerned that a three-year licence would put consumers off purchasing a mobile home.

Colin Fraser: Yes. Those who want funds to purchase cannot get them. The banks, lawyers, estate agents and such are putting people off buying. They say “Oh. You’ve only got five years. We don’t know what’s happening then.”

Jim Eadie: Okay. I understand that. You suggested in your written evidence the alternative of a rolling licence.

Colin Fraser: A rolling licence is the same as a licence in perpetuity, as it goes on for ever. Both the British Holiday and Home Parks Association and the people who represent the residents do not want temporary licences.

Jim Eadie: So you would agree with the evidence that we heard earlier this morning from the Independent Park Home Advisory Service and the National Association of Park Home Residents that having a fixed licence period could be used as a weapon against mobile home residents.

Colin Fraser: Of course it can.

Jim Eadie: Can you tell us a bit more about that?

Colin Fraser: If you get rogue operators, they say “Right. The licence finishes on such and such a date, and I don’t know what will happen then.” That is all they say, but it is enough—it is too much.

Jim Eadie: You have said that you are concerned that having the three-year licence period would put consumers off purchasing the homes—or, rather, that banks and other financial institutions would be unwilling to lend to people if they only had a three-year licence period. Do you have any other specific concerns?

Colin Fraser: We do not need any more concerns, because that is really bad enough. There is nothing worse than not being able to buy park homes because you cannot get funding.

The Convener: But that is happening now. Are you saying that even the threat of the legislation is stopping the buying? Banks are not lending to housing associations, for example. They are not lending to a lot of organisations and a lot of people. It is not just because of the proposed legislation.

Colin Fraser: Banks are not lending. They are being far more difficult about lending to people who want to buy a park. If you have a park already and you can put it up for collateral, you will get lending, but if you are buying for the first time, the banks will not be interested. However, people seldom get a bank loan to buy park homes. Banks do not usually finance park homes; it is finance companies that do it. There are only two main finance companies that finance park homes.

In Wales, the Welsh Government has already seen what is happening, and it is making the licensing for holiday homes into licences in perpetuity. It is not going to do three-yearly licences or whatever for holiday homes. It has decided that, because of what has happened on the residential side, that is not a good idea.

Jim Eadie: I would still like to understand the justification for your proposal for rolling licences instead of what is proposed in the legislation.

Jeanette Wilson: It would give more security to consumers—in other words, the people who are purchasing homes. It is quite obvious that people would feel less secure putting their savings or whatever into buying a home if they could not be sure that that was it for however long it is at the moment.

Jim Eadie: What advantage does your proposal have over the status quo, in which site licences run in perpetuity? Are you saying that they would continue to run in perpetuity?

Jeanette Wilson: It would be fine if they continued to run in perpetuity, because that would give everyone the security that they need. At the end of the day, the Scottish Government’s avowed intention is to protect consumers and give them more security. Introducing a three-yearly renewal system would have the opposite effect. In addition, the park owner is constantly investing in and improving the park’s infrastructure.

Jim Eadie: I am sorry, but I am not an expert in this area. It is helpful for the committee to have your expertise because it allows us to better understand the system and how it might operate. At the moment, I am trying to understand the difference between what we have at the moment and your proposal for rolling licences subject to a five-yearly review.

Jeanette Wilson: My proposal was in response to what you were saying. It is obvious from the consultation document that that was the way you were thinking and going, and we presumed from that that you did not want the status quo. We thought, “If that is the direction of travel, how about this suggestion? It might be a bit more workable.”

Colin Fraser: As we understand it, a rolling licence is the same as a licence in perpetuity. It is just another term for it.

Jeanette Wilson: We accept, of course, that people will want to visit parks and check what is happening there, and a review would allow that to happen.
Jim Eadie: And it would not have the kind of disadvantages that you think would arise from the three-yearly renewal system.

Jeanette Wilson: No. A five-yearly review with a legal presumption that all is well unless there has been some incident in the intervening period gives everyone—the park owner and the park home owner—security.

Jim Eadie: And it could not be used as a weapon as has been suggested in respect of the three-yearly renewal.

Jeanette Wilson: No, not if there is a five-yearly review with a legal presumption that all is well unless there has been an incident of some sort.

The Convener: But if you have a licence in perpetuity or a rolling licence, there is no reason why there should not be a three-yearly review.

Jeanette Wilson: That is fine as long as we are talking about a review rather than a renewal process and as long as there is a legal presumption that all is well unless there has been some sort of infringement.

Colin Fraser: I am sure that some of you will recall that many years ago—actually, not that many years ago—pub licences lasted three years. However, people forgot to renew their licence, lost it for a while until the next licensing meeting and so on and the Scottish Parliament in its wisdom then gave personal licences to the owner and those in charge of the bar and a pub licence in perpetuity.

The Convener: Mary Fee has some questions about the fit-and-proper-person test.

Mary Fee: In introducing a fit-and-proper-person test, the bill sets out the factors that local authorities should take into account when determining whether someone is a fit and proper person. Your submission makes a slightly different recommendation, suggesting that “a standard procedure be set up to establish fit and proper status for applicants so that it can be used across all local authorities in Scotland to ensure consistency”.

What are the differences between “a standard procedure” and the factors that local authorities already use to make this determination? What would be the benefit?

Colin Fraser: The benefit would be that every park would be working under the same conditions and the same criteria. Having different areas with different fit-and-proper-person criteria is not going to work because a person might be a fit and proper person in one area but not in another. We would like one application form with questions that had to be filled in, and it would be given out by the Scottish Parliament or whoever and apply to everyone in every area in Scotland. Such an approach would keep things simple. After all, a council will perhaps have only two or three parks in its area. No council has a lot of parks and instead of setting up a system to deal with two or three parks, review them every three years and so on it will be a lot simpler to take a national approach.

Mary Fee: So you do not think that a system in which local authorities get information about the factors that they should take into account in determining fit-and-proper-person status is strong enough. You would like something more formalised.

Jeanette Wilson: If there was a prescribed procedure across the whole of Scotland, it would be beneficial for people who have more than one park, with the parks being in different local authority areas. Such people would have to go through the process only once and then they would be on some sort of central register, however that might be set up. It would be much more beneficial if there was one overall register for all areas in Scotland. We were talking about rogue operators earlier. If somebody is not a fit and proper person in one council area, at the moment there is nothing to stop such a rogue operator from popping up in another area where perhaps they will not be identified as not being fit and proper.

Mary Fee: So if an owner has sites in more than one local authority area, are you suggesting that they go through only one application?

Jeanette Wilson: It seems to make sense—

Mary Fee: Who would deal with the application? At the moment, a local authority would determine the application. Under your proposal, who would determine that application?

Jeanette Wilson: I would have thought that the place where an owner put in their first application would deal with it—the owner would have to detail other parks that they have an interest in at that point.

Mary Fee: Would it then be the responsibility of the initial local authority to inform another local authority? How would that be enforced?

Jeanette Wilson: I would have thought that there could be a central register that they could input the information into. That would seem to be the sensible approach.

Mary Fee: Okay. I am just not sure how that would work in practice.

Jeanette Wilson: There is that tell-us-once system for when members of the public need to register certain information with local authorities—the information shoots off in all sorts of different directions. I imagine that something along those lines could be set up.
Mary Fee: Okay.

Colin Fraser: We would not be averse to the idea that wherever a park is, if the owner puts a warden on it, they apply to the area that the park is in. The owner would just have one application for all his parks, but if there were wardens on the parks, they would apply to each separate local authority area that those parks were in. If that was the case, all the more reason that local authorities should all have the same questionnaire so that everybody is on the same footing.

Mary Fee: I am just not convinced that such a system would not overcomplicate things, but I accept your point.

Colin Fraser: It would be far simpler than every council having a different questionnaire—and they would have.

Jeanette Wilson: It would also be beneficial for each council to have access to information from other areas. If there was a central register and somebody popped up who was going to buy a particular park, it would be quite useful to be able to tap in and say, “Oh, okay, he passed the test in this area in this month.”

Mary Fee: Okay. To move on to another point about the fit-and-proper-person criteria, the BH&HPA submission indicates:

“The likely success in achieving the goal of ridding the industry of rogue operators ... through the application of fit and proper person criteria ... is unknown.”

The submission also suggests that the Scottish Government should adopt measures similar to those in England to allow ministers to make regulations regarding the fit-and-proper-person test in due course. The licensing regime is similar to other licensing regimes so why is it so difficult in your industry to get rid of rogue operators?

Jeanette Wilson: The most delicate way to put it is to say that rogue operators have very complex business arrangements. [Laughter.] Sorry—I could not think of a better way to put it than that.

The Convener: We get the message.

Jeanette Wilson: We have heard about this kind of smoke-and-mirrors situation before. It is one person who owns it; no, it is their cousin; it is their nephew; or it is their son. It is very difficult. Those people do not abide by regulations now so we have concerns, given that that is their mode of operation. What will make them suddenly do everything in an up-front, appropriate manner?

I am not saying that we should not try—of course we should. I have discussed the issue with civil servants, and their view was that if the process caught out a few rogue operators—if a few of them were rumpled—that was good enough. I am not saying that we ought not to be trying to catch them; it is just that we have concerns about the complexity of those business arrangements that would undoubtedly come to the fore.

Colin Fraser: We also have a concern about when people first apply to be made a fit and proper person. There is usually only one person in a mobile home park because of the average size of the parks. What if a long-serving person at a park is found not to be fit and proper? What do you do with them? You cannot sack them; you cannot make them redundant. What do you do?

Mary Fee: What do you suggest we do?

Colin Fraser: I do not know.

Mary Fee: If someone was assessed and found not to be a fit and proper person, should there then be some steps that they can go through that would allow them to become a fit and proper person?

Jeanette Wilson: I guess that it would depend on why they were deemed not to be fit and proper. If it was because they had a criminal record that was not known about, you could not really scrub the record.

Colin Fraser: They could have a criminal record from the past that the world does not know about.

Mary Fee: Okay, so what is the solution?

Colin Fraser: That is what I am asking you.

Mary Fee: I am keen to hear your thoughts on how we would resolve the situation.

Colin Fraser: We have to have a solution. Employment law is very difficult. We certainly cannot pay someone off or sack them because they have been found not to be fit and proper. You cannot make them redundant because they are not fit and proper, because you would be up for unfair dismissal.

Jeanette Wilson: We found that this is a complex area when we thought about how it would work.

Colin Fraser: We have tried to get advice, but we are always told that nothing can be done.

Mary Fee: But do you support the fit-and-proper-person test?

Colin Fraser: If the criteria are right and we get answers to all the questions.

Jeanette Wilson: We also feel that a consistent approach throughout Scotland is very important.

Mary Fee: So if the test criteria were right and were applied consistently, you would be able to deal with someone not being a fit a proper person.
Colin Fraser: No you would not.

Jeanette Wilson: We do not know how we would be able to overcome the problems with employment law.

Colin Fraser: If there is something in the bill that would allow such a person to be sacked or made redundant, that would be fine, but I cannot see how that would come about.

Mary Fee: You have raised a point that we have not previously pondered.

The Convener: If you knew the criteria, presumably you could make sure that the person could be trained to meet them. Also, under employment law, you can deal with a person who has a criminal record.

Mary Fee: If the person does need some sort of training or to go through some sort of programme, and if clear criteria are laid down within employment law and regulations, if the person does not meet those standards and is in breach of what is expected of them, and if they knew what the expected standards were, you would be able to dismiss them.

Jeanette Wilson: It is just the complexity that we had not considered until we got to the stage of putting our ideas together.

The Convener: Mark Griffin wants to ask some questions about enforcement.

Mark Griffin: Can you describe how the existing powers on enforcement and how they have been applied have impacted on residents and site owners?

Colin Fraser: Under the 1960 act, local authorities have the power to take action if a park owner is not complying with the site licence. They have always had the power to move into the park and do the repairs. They have always had the power to take the park owner to court, and to withdraw someone’s licence. They have all those powers at present and they always have had.

Mark Griffin: The Scottish Government feels that giving local authorities a range of robust enforcement tools is crucial to making sure that sites are managed well. What are your views on the new range of tools that are being proposed? Are they wide enough to tackle rogue site operators and act as a deterrent? Do you think that they have a proportionate impact on site owners at present?

Colin Fraser: What has been proposed is all to do with the park owner and the people who work for him. It has nothing to do with a site licence. At the moment, the site licence is all about the structure of the park. It covers site boundaries, spacing, hard standing for caravans, carriageways and footpaths, drainage, water supplies, sanitation, litter and refuse disposal, fire precautions although they have now been taken over by the fire authority, lighting, storage space, and recreational and open space. The site licence is entirely different. We are looking at the person who holds the site licence, not really at the site licence. Most people comply with their site licence—everything that I mentioned—because they have to do that to keep somebody provided with electricity, drainage and water.

Mark Griffin: Is the new range of powers proportionate? Will it have a negative impact on the operators who are exemplars—who are doing a good job?

Jeanette Wilson: Well, they will not end up in court or infringing their licences. The vast majority of park owners are astute, sensible businesspeople and will not end up in that situation.

Mark Griffin: Do you have any issues with the new enforcement powers that are being introduced?

Jeanette Wilson: The power to appoint an interim manager is of concern because it is not clear at the minute exactly what powers interim managers will have. For example, will they be able to undertake sales?

Also, what will happen about utility bills? The bill says that the individuals on the park will not have to pay their pitch fees or electricity bills if various things have happened. We detailed our concerns about that in our submission. If the park owner does not receive any income because people do not have to pay, how will he pay for utilities? We do not want utilities to be cut off because the money has not been paid.

A lot of detail and clarity is needed on how the appointment of an interim manager would work. No revenue would come in if the interim manager was unable to undertake sales on the park—although it is questionable who would want to come along and buy a home if an interim manager from the council was in place—so what would happen about the day-to-day maintenance on the park, for example?

At the moment, it is not clear how that power would work, so that is a concern.

Colin Fraser: Also, if a park owner does not comply with an improvement notice within 28 days, or however many days the set-up says, the local authority has to let the people in the park know and they are supposed to withdraw their pitch fees, their electric money and their gas money—all the payments that they make to the park owner. He gets no profit from sales, commission or anything. If the local authority and the people in the park know as soon as the improvement notice has been breached, that is before any appeal has been made. How can the local authority take someone’s income away from them before there is an appeal or a court case? How can a park owner run the park—it will not be under management at the time—without any funding?

Mark Griffin: I noted the points that you made in your submission. You make further points about the polluter pays principle. How do you feel about the proposals to prevent rogue operators passing on to residents any charges that they incur? How does that balance with the example that you give in your submission of a situation in which a resident might have caused the problem in the first place? Do you have any comments on that?

Colin Fraser: If a park owner does things wrong and the local authority writes to him and charges him fines, the residents should not pay. It is as simple as that. It is the park owner who owes the money.

Mark Griffin: Do you have any other general comments to make about the detail of the proposed enforcement powers? Could there be any further adverse impacts on site owners that we have not touched on so far?

Colin Fraser: One of the main things is that the bill says that, if a person does not carry out the steps on an improvement notice, they can be fined up to £50,000. In Wales, the figure is £500. We worry about £50,000, but we are told that the Scottish Government has set that as the figure for all sorts of things.

We do not believe that, just because that is the figure for all sorts of things, it should be the figure in the bill, because in court, the judge will say, “Oh—£50,000. If I give 25 per cent of that, that’ll be £12,500.” Really big fines will be imposed because the top fine is so high. I do not think that anyone will be fined the top fine. We do not believe that, just because the Scottish Parliament has set a figure of £50,000 for certain things, the figure in the bill should be £50,000.

Gordon MacDonald: What is your view about the proposal that local authorities can introduce a fee of a suggested £600 for a three-year site licence? Should the licence fee be standard for all parks or should it vary according to park size?

Colin Fraser: The figure should definitely vary according to the park size. I did a wee bit of research last night into our smallest parks. There is one park with five pitches, one with six, one with seven, two with 10, one with 12, one with 19, three with 20, one with 21, one with 22, two with 25, one with 28 and three with 30. Of the parks that are members of BH&HPA, 33 per cent have fewer than 30 pitches, and £600 would be a lot of money for wee businesses such as that, so the fee must be set per pitch.

Gordon MacDonald: Do you have a suggestion for the level of fee per pitch?

Colin Fraser: Yes—it should be nothing. [Laughter.]

Gordon MacDonald: We all live in a world in which we wish that our bills were nothing.

The first panel suggested that fees should be considered a business expense. What is your opinion? Should park owners be able to recoup the cost through pitch fees?

Colin Fraser: Park owners have very few ways of increasing pitch fees, which go up only by inflation every year, whatever the inflation rate is. If extraordinary things come in—that could be licensing now but something else that is far more expensive afterwards—the costs should be passed on to residents. A park of 30 pitches should not incur a cost of £600. If the cost was not a lot of money and was set by the number of pitches, I would not expect smaller parks to pass it on, because it would be minimal.

Gordon MacDonald: Most of the other questions that I was going to ask have been covered. You mentioned the possibility that banks and finance companies are unwilling to finance the purchase of parks and park homes in Wales as a result of the requirement to renew licences after five years. Can you point us to where we can obtain more formal evidence on that?

Colin Fraser: We got the information from parks—from BH&HPA. I do not know the name of the relevant person to write to about finance companies.

Jeanette Wilson: Shall I try to get information from BH&HPA head office? It might have something more substantial.

Gordon MacDonald: If you could send us a briefing, that would be helpful.

Colin Fraser: We might be able to get something from the finance companies. All companies that loan money are very much looking into everything at the moment. If the least little thing arises, they say no. That is what has happened.

Jeanette Wilson: It is perhaps pertinent to add that one BH&HPA member who has a residential park in Fife approached a big firm of estate agents and lawyers there to see how knowledgeable it is about park homes and how well placed it would be to advise someone who came in off the street and wanted to buy a park home. It is worrying that that company, which has branches all over Scotland, said that it would show such a person the door... and say, “Don’t do it.” We did not feel that that was particularly positive.

Colin Fraser: On the renewal of a site licence, when a park owner is selling a site, there is always something to state that the purchaser must get agreement on the transfer of the site licence. The bill states that the local authority can have up to 12 months to decide whether to give a site licence, which is absolutely ridiculous. On a sale, the transfer of the licence should be more or less automatic because, if local authorities are doing their job properly, all sites out there should be ready for transfer—it is as simple as that. If the local authorities are looking at sites and keeping them up to date and up to scratch, the transfer should be more or less automatic. Planning departments in Scotland get eight weeks to pass massive plans for office blocks and other such things, so surely a local authority can do a wee thing like a site licence in eight weeks.

A licence is also transferred when someone dies. Under the bill, as soon as a person who has a park in his name dies, the park will not have a licence. The last thing that someone who has just lost her husband, say, will think is, “Oh, I need to renew my licence.” It will be months down the line before they think about transferring the licence. The 1960 act, in its wisdom—there are a lot of good things in it—says that they immediately become the owner of the licence and then have to apply to have that endorsed by the local authority. I cannot see any other way of dealing with the situation when somebody dies and the licence has to be transferred. People cannot go through the whole procedure because, during that time, they will not have a licence. So there has to be something in the legislation that says that they still have the licence during that period or that it transfers automatically. In our submission, we set out the wording from the 1960 act, which allows the transfer to happen automatically, after which the licence has to be endorsed.

Gordon MacDonald: If the proposed timescale was reduced to eight weeks, as in planning, would that give enough time for a fit-and-proper-person check to be carried out? Obviously, we want to ensure that the park is sold to somebody who is a fit and proper person. We heard about rogue owners down south. If we reduced the period to eight weeks, would that timescale give the authorities the opportunity to check people’s background fully?

Colin Fraser: If there is a proper form that goes to all the councils, it will ask questions and that will give the answer. Somebody will need to be looked into only if the form shows that there is something that needs to be looked into. If all the answers on the form are yes or whatever, there should not be a problem.

We have spoken about houses in multiple occupation and landlord registration, and some councils are months behind on that. We cannot have that with the fit-and-proper-person check for somebody who is coming to work on a park. We have the same problem there. In one park, I went through four managers—I call them wardens—in one year because, unfortunately, three of them were no good. They might all have been fit and proper persons, although I do not know. However, when somebody leaves—people often fall out with the park owner and go—you need someone quickly. You cannot wait for weeks and weeks to get someone who is a fit and proper person. However, owners will not be able to employ someone until they get the permission back from the council. Something should be laid down in the legislation about how long the council will have to do the fit-and-proper-person procedure under normal circumstances where there are no inquiries.

The Convener: Your written submission states:

“Close attention should be given to the transitional and commencement arrangements” for the bill. I take it that you were consulted on the bill’s provisions at the outset, so will you expand on what you mean by that?

Colin Fraser: On site licensing, there are a lot of things to be filled in and we do not know what they are. That is what we are speaking about. Until we know what they are, we cannot really answer your question.

The Convener: You will be consulted on what goes into what we call subordinate legislation under the bill.

Jeanette Wilson: One point that we make is that we are concerned as to why existing licence holders will have to reapply for new licences within 24 months of the legislation coming into force. If there has been no problem whatsoever on a park for as long as local authority records go back, why is it necessary to go through the administrative burden of reapplying for the licence? I can understand that entirely if there has been an infringement along the way, but otherwise that seems to be an admin burden for no real reason. If there has been no problem, why would a park have to reapply for its licence within 24 months?

The Convener: To go back to Adam Ingram’s initial question, the bill is trying to improve the standard of homes that people live in. The initial licence might impose fewer burdens than we would want to ensure that the park is of a better standard now. Surely we want to ensure that standards are improving all the time.
Jeanette Wilson: Would that not follow automatically if there was a review every five years of a licence and regular local authority visits? Apart from anything else, if all the parks have to apply for a new licence within 24 months, the workload for councils will probably be substantial if they have not visited the parks for many years. It would probably be better for local authorities to visit or whatever to discuss and negotiate the site licence changes, rather than say that everybody in Scotland has to do it en masse within 24 months. Obviously, the priority would need to be the parks that have had problems.

Colin Fraser: I am aware that Highland Council is reviewing its site licences, and many other councils are looking at them, because it suddenly dawned on councils that they have nothing to do with fire precautions and all that stuff, so it has to come out of the licences. Highland Council is to introduce its new licences imminently. It does not seem very good for the council to put out new licences now and then to have to redo them in two years.

The Convener: As we have no further questions, I thank our witnesses for their evidence, which has been most helpful. If there is anything that you think that you should have said but have not, please put it in writing.

I suspend the meeting briefly to allow the witnesses to leave.

Colin Fraser: Thank you very much for the invitation—the meeting has been useful.
1.0 Introduction

1.1 The Tenants Information Service (TIS) is the national training, support and advice organisation working with tenants and landlord organisations. TIS is a member led organisation, with over 250 tenant and landlord members representing local authorities and Registered Social Landlords throughout Scotland.

1.2 TIS welcomes the opportunity to provide a written statement to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. We support the aims of the Bill and consider that many of the provisions will work towards achieving these.

1.3 We recommend that further consultation is required regarding the exception of the Scottish Housing Regulator to consult with tenants, as set out in Part 7 (section 79) of the Bill.

1.4 During January and February 2014, TIS organised a series of Housing Bill conference and briefing events throughout Scotland to seek tenants’ views on these proposals. TIS have also provided evidence to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee at a meeting held on February 24th 2014.

1.5 This submission sets out our views on the Housing (Scotland) Bill based on tenant feedback collated from our recent Bill consultation events.

Part 1: Right to Buy

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

1. There is a great deal of consensus from tenants’ organisations that the Right to Buy should be abolished to protect the future supply of much needed housing in the social rented sector. We support the rationale provided for the legislative changes as set out in the Housing Bill Policy Memorandum.

Q2. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

2. Tenant representatives have highlighted that a three year notice period is excessive. Concerns were raised that this timeframe might lead to tenants being pressured by companies to purchase homes, even when they are not in a position to maintain the property in the longer term. A period of between 18 months to 2 years was recommended by tenant representatives. Tenant opinion supports the abolition of the Right to Buy for all tenants and that the pressured area status would remain in the period up to the abolition.

3. It is essential that tenants have clear and accessible information about the changes to the Right to Buy. We would therefore recommend that the Scottish Government provides guidance to landlords and an information leaflet to tenants to clarify the Right to Buy position as soon as the Bill is given royal assent.

Part 2: Social Housing

_In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?_

4. We welcome the principles of greater flexibility that underpins the Bill. Landlords will continue to be able to prioritise other groups to reflect local housing needs and circumstances, as long as the “reasonable preference” is given to the three statutory groups.

5. Tenants support the provision to be able to take age into consideration when allocating housing. Tenant representatives have often advocated the value of more sensitive lettings, for example; designating housing for the over 50’s and for families with children to ensure sustainable communities.

6. The definition of what is meant by “unmet housing need” in Section 3 of the Bill is not clear and requires further clarification.

7. We support the new requirement for social landlords to consult tenants on priorities within the allocations policies and to publish a report on the findings. Allocations is a key priority for many tenants. It is important that landlords and tenants meet to agree the type and level of consultation that tenants wish on this issue. This links to good practice being developed through tenant and service user scrutiny of landlord’s performance in relation to the Scottish Social Housing Charter. To participate fully tenants require access to adequate support, training and information.
Q5. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

8. Antisocial behaviour is identified by most tenants groups as a key priority to tackle. Any consideration of antisocial behaviour measures should take into account the impact on the alleged perpetrator’s rights, but also the impact on the rights of people to live in peace and in safety. There is tenant support for the provisions in the Bill which adjust the operation of short Secure tenancies and Scottish Secure tenancies as a tool to support landlords to address antisocial behaviour problems.

9. There is tenant support for landlords to have the power to convert Scottish Secure Tenancies to short tenancies, where there is clear evidence of antisocial behaviour. There is support for the provision to extend short SSTs to 12 to 18 months as long as there is adequate support in place for the tenant(s) to address the issues.

10. Clarity is required from Scottish Ministers to detail the maximum period that a suspension can stay in place.

11. Tenant representatives support the extension of the qualifying period to 12 months for succession, assignation and subletting as long as landlords have the ability to use discretion in individual cases, for example; in cases such as the death of a tenant.

12. The provisions will provide landlords with some flexibility to tackle antisocial behaviour but the Bill alone will not resolve the antisocial problems throughout Scotland. A commitment to funding and a multi-agency approach are pre-requisites to tackle this major problem.

Q6. Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government’s objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

13. Yes there is support for a Right to Appeal.
Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

14. There is tenant support for the introduction of a housing tribunal for the private rented sector as a means to have a less adversarial and more user friendly system in place. Tenants would also like to have an opportunity to discuss the feasibility of having a housing tribunal for the social rented sector.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities' discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

15. We support the provisions that give local authorities more tools to use in tackling poor standards in the private rented and owner occupied sectors. But we consider the Bill should go further to introduce and enforce higher standards and repair standards in the private rented sector and a framework to enforce these standards. The Scottish Housing Regulator (SHR) has expensive statutory powers to enforce standards in the social rented sector, but local authority powers in the private rented sector are more limited and operate under serious financial constraints.

16. In many communities, there are growing problems when improvement and regeneration work is hindered because owners are unable or sometimes unwilling to pay their share of this work. TIS have been involved in a number of initiatives to support the development of Owners Associations to seek to address these issues and to regenerate local communities. This is a model of working that we would encourage tenants, owners, social and private rented landlords to develop throughout Scotland.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

17. We support this in principle, but require further information about how this would operate and how it would be funded before we could give an informed view on this matter. Further consultation is required on this proposal.
Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

18. We support the principle of a statutory registration scheme and a code of conduct with statutory force.

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

19. No further comments.

Part 5: Mobile Home Sites with Permanent Residents

Q12. Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?

Q13. What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

20. The new licensing scheme is welcomed by tenants as a means to improve living conditions to over 3,000 people living in mobile sites.

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

21. These provisions are relatively minor adjustments to existing legislation. They should help those local authorities who take a proactive approach to supporting owners carry out repair works. Concerns were raised during our consultation that this might not be a high priority across all local authority areas.

Part 7: Miscellaneous

Q16. Do you have any comments relation to the range of miscellaneous housing provisions set out in this part of the Bill?

22. The Bill introduces an amendment to the Scottish Housing Regulator’s powers under Section 67 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010. It proposes an exception to the requirement on the SHR to consult with tenants before it directs a transfer of an RSL asset to another RSL, when the RSL is in financial jeopardy. During our consultation, tenants raised serious concerns that this right to be consulted should not be removed. Tenants of an RSL who is facing insolvency should have the right to be informed about the situation and to be consulted on the options that are available. While it is clear that the SHR must be in a position to respond effectively to exceptional circumstances, it is not clear why an RSL would be on the brink of insolvency without the SHR being aware of and intervening to address these issues. This provision has not been previously consulted on. We strongly recommend that tenants right to be consulted as set out in section 67 (4) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 should remain.

23. The Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 requires tenant consultation and ballots to take place where an RSL decides to merge with another landlord. The 2010 Act does not make the same provision for tenants whose landlord joins a group structure. There are many RSLs looking to join group structures and tenants in the social rented sector should have the same right to consultation and ballots as tenants in a merger situation. To ensure parity and consistency tenants should be entitled to be consulted and to participate in a ballot for all proposals involving a merger of an RSL with another RSL or joining a group structure.

Other Issues

Q17. Are there any other comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives or specific provisions?

24. No further comments.

Q18. Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

25. During our tenant consultation consensus was not reached on the subject of Probationary Tenancies. Tenant’s views were very polarised in terms of some supporting this as a means of addressing potential antisocial behaviour issues, while others see this as a direct erosion of tenants’ rights.

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Introduction

TPAS Scotland and TIS were funded by the Scottish Government to undertake consultation events with tenants etc on the principles of the Bill. Using the Government funding and in agreement with the Tenant Priorities Team, TPAS facilitated sessions in Glasgow, Dumfries and Inverness, all were very well attended. We took every opportunity we could to consult and inform on the Bill, for example while in Orkney, Falkirk, Fort William etc we facilitated sessions. All were well attended, we encouraged participants to respond to the call of evidence in their groups or organisations and as individuals. The majority of participants were tenants. TPAS Scotland actively promotes the rights of rural tenants to participate and get involved and would have welcomed additional funding from the Scottish Government to enable us to take the consultation events further afield, in the past we have held well attended consultation events, in Shetland, Western Isles, Skye, Borders etc.

Right to Buy

Q1 – Overall the proposals to abolish the Right to buy were broadly welcomed, a few tenants were concerned around a spike in sales and suggested just letting RTB just die off, but the majority view was supportive of the proposals. There was discussion around lifting pressurised status to enable tenants to buy, but the majority view was that pressurised statues was there for a purpose and should not be lifted.

Q2 – Three years was felt to be too long, popular view was one year. Concerns over longer lead in time would lead to companies offering to buy for tenants and a spike in sales.

Social Housing

Q4 – In the main flexiblity welcomed, in particular for older people, but serious concerns around young people being perceived as less deserving than older people, should be monitored to ensure equalites maintained and upheld.

Agreement around 12 month rule and refusal of assingnations – less queue jumping was a common comment, allowing more houses to be allocated on need basis.

Agreement around owning a property being taken into account and what is being suggested in terms of offering a Short SST in some circumstances.

Adapted homes – agreement but with common sense and sensitivity a key concern.

General agreement over new prefernce categories sensible approach. TPAS disappointed that it has to be restated that any new allocations policy to be consulted on, this should be automatic as part of the obligations of the 2001 Bill on tenant participation, perhaps it’s a timely reminder to landlords of their obligations and will remind tenants of their rights.
Q5 - Generally welcomed, but a few comments around extension to 18 months – “can see the reasons for this, but housing officers don’t have to live next door to anti social behaviour.”
Some concerns expressed over support for tenants on Short SST and system only working with good support – hope landlords can afford the extra costs.
Need definition and clarification of what is anti social behaviour and what convictions would count as evidence to eviction.
Mixed view over probationary tenancies not being in Bill but consulted on in early stages, no consensus. Strong views on both sides of the argument.

Q6 – General agreement on strengthening tenants rights, and the obligation to enable tenants to be given the opportunity to discuss and appeal any decision.

Private Rented housing

Q7 – Strong agreement for First Tier tribunal, deep disappointment not introduced for social housing sector, 100% support for introducing similar system for social housing sector.

Q8/9 – Support for new powers for local authorities but in current financial climate and tight local authority budgets as powers are discretionary, doubts that they will be used to due cost.

Letting agents

Q10/11 – Majority support for a register and a system with “teeth” to deal with bad practice,

Miscellaneous

Q16 – Absolutely no support for the proposals to enhance SHR powers.

1. Highland and Argyll & Bute

Highland and Argyll & Bute is one of the 9 Regional Networks of Registered Tenants Organisations (RTOs) formed in 2008 and cover the local authority areas of Highland and Argyll & Bute. We are a committee of 10, elected annually, and generally represent the views of our tenant and resident members of 33 RTOs across our area.

2. General comments on the Bill

We welcomed being involved in the extensive consultations held on many of the proposals included in the Bill and we particularly welcome the proposals to abolish the Right to Buy and the provisions on social sector allocations and tenancies.

3. Issues not included in the Bill

We are disappointed that the proposal to create a Housing Tribunal for the social rented sector and the introduction of Probationary/Initial Tenancies are not included in the Bill.

4. The Bill

4.1 Right to Buy (RTB), Part 1

We are pleased that the Scottish Government has announced the ending of the Right to Buy and welcome this decision.

However, we believe the proposed transitional period of 3 years is too long and feel that this should be reduced to a period of one year from the date of Royal Assent.

4.2 Social Housing (Part 2)

Allocations

We agree with this measure as it removes an unhelpful barrier to landlords wanting to allocate to particular groups in specific situations and believe the Bill makes it explicit that removing this age bar does not mean that landlords can discriminate against particular age groups or that it contravenes the Equality Act 2010.

Probationary Tenancies (Initial tenancies)

The outcome of the Government’s consultation concluded that the majority of the sector, including tenant responses, were in favour of introducing Probationary tenancies (or Initial Tenancies) and we are disappointed that it was dropped for this Housing Bill.

We strongly support the introduction of initial tenancies and support the introduction of probationary tenancies for all social housing tenants and believe that the benefits of introducing this outweigh any negativity especially when it has the real potential to help deal with tenancy problems, such as anti-social behaviour the cause of which may be identified, sooner.

Short Scottish Secure Tenancies (SSST)

We generally welcome the introduction of this SSST extended power.

4.3 SHR Amendments.

These changes were not the subject of previous consultation.

We strongly disagree with this provision and would like to see this removed from the Bill and that the consultation with tenants clause is retained.

We feel that tenants should always be consulted on issues as important as this and that consultation could be carried out quickly without jeopardising any actions that the SHR takes or requires the RSL to take to protect the interests of tenants and their homes.

4.4 Private Rented Sector, Parts 3 & 6

We are pleased to see the focus on the Private Rented sector and making it fairer and safer for the growing number of tenants relying on the sector. The difficult financial situation and the growing waiting list have made renting in the Private Sector the only housing option for many families and individuals, yet despite this growth there continues to be a lack of protection for tenants in this sector.

The Regional Networks feel that the regulation of the private sector still does not give adequate protection for tenants in this sector.

Letting Agents

We are disappointed that the proposed regulatory framework for letting agents falls far short of proper and full regulation similar to the way the social rented sector is regulated. We would like to see a mandatory set of professional standards for letting agents introduced and monitored. This will ensure proper checks and balances where there are disputes between Agents and Landlords/Tenants.
Tackling poor housing standards in the Private Rented Sector

We believes that the Bill does not go far enough and want effective and transparent mechanisms in place to ensure that Private Landlords adhere to the new legislation and that they will be monitored for compliance with the legislation.

4.5 Housing Tribunal

The decision not to introduce a Housing Panel for the Social Rented Sector in the Housing (Scotland) Bill is disappointing and we believe this has been a missed opportunity.

A Housing Panel for the Social Rented Sector would be more efficient in dealing with complex housing needs and vulnerable people and it would take less time than going through the court system.

Highland and Argyll & Bute
21 February 2014.
The Convener (Maureen Watt): Good morning—I mean good evening, everybody. I am so used to saying good morning.

Good evening and welcome to the sixth meeting in 2014 of the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee. The committee welcomes the opportunity to meet in Dumbarton as part of Parliament day, and we appreciate the hospitality of everyone who has supported us in meeting here in the burgh hall. We have had a positive day and discussed housing issues informally with local tenants and housing associations. We look forward to hearing the issues that will be raised during this formal session tonight, when we will hear from groups that represent tenants from across Scotland.

I thank all the members of the public here for taking the time to come along tonight. We have set aside some time after the meeting for a question-and-answer session, to allow you the opportunity to ask questions. I notice in the audience some people whom we met this morning, but I am sure that there will be more questions this evening. If you think of a question that you would like us to address, please use the paper and pens to jot it down and pass it to the security staff. We will also be able to take some questions from the floor.

Before we start the meeting proper, I remind everyone to switch off their mobile phones, as they affect the broadcasting system. Sometimes some people consult their minutes and committee papers on tablets, but nobody has their tablets today.

Agenda item 1 is the Housing (Scotland) Bill and we will hear evidence from tenants' representatives on the provisions of the bill. I welcome Ilene Campbell, director of the Tenants Information Service; Lesley Baird, the chief executive of the Tenant Participation Advisory Service Scotland; Hugh McClung, chair of the central region tenants network; Jennifer MacLeod, chair of the Highland and Argyll and Bute tenants network; and, last but not least, Kevin Paterson, chair of the Glasgow and Eilean Siar tenants network.

Gil Paterson is going to start off the questioning.

Gil Paterson (Clydebank and Milngavie) (SNP): I am really pleased to start this session, since I am doon the watter from Clydebank, which is in my own constituency. It is good to be down here with my close neighbours and colleagues: people who work closely together, being involved with West Dunbartonshire Council. As I said, being the member for Clydebank and Milngavie means that it is especially good to be here.

I will start off by asking about the Government’s vision for housing in Scotland. The Government’s aim is:

“that all people in Scotland live in high quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs”.

To what extent could the bill’s provisions support that vision?

Hugh McClung (Central Region Tenants Network): Thank you for inviting me to the committee to give evidence. It is something that has been on the cards for quite a while in terms of the work that the regional networks have been doing.

There is much to welcome in what is a wide-ranging bill, including its aspects on sustainability and protection for tenants as well as landlords. There are also provisions on social sector allocation and the private rented sector, which is an aspect that is much needed. We can discuss that later.

The networks have been pleased with the extensive consultations that have been on-going since 2012. My colleague, Jennifer MacLeod, and I were delighted to be part and parcel of one of the working groups that were involved in the bill’s development. We particularly welcome the proposals to abolish the right to buy. That will have a great effect on protecting council stocks and also help tenancies.

The Convener: Do any of the other panellists have any comments on the general provisions or whether the bill meets the Government’s vision?

Ilene Campbell (Tenants Information Service): I, too, thank the committee for the opportunity to give evidence.

The Tenants Information Service is a national training and support organisation. Over the past few months, we have, working with TPASS, organised a number of seminars and events throughout the country to find out tenants’ views. This evening we are hoping to provide feedback on their views, as well as those of our members.

The bill is wide ranging. I agree that its separate aspects have been subject to a lot of consultation. We are pleased to see that there is a lot of support for the abolition of the right to buy. The tenants very much welcome the steps to ensure the supply of the much-needed social rented housing and that houses will not be lost. I think than an estimated 14 houses—

The Convener: I suggest that we keep the detail until later and just cover the general aspects of the bill.

Ilene Campbell: On the whole, we welcome the provisions on the right to buy and the private rented sector and the proposals on how tenancies will be managed with regard to the social rented sector.

Lesley Baird (Tenant Participation Advisory Service Scotland): I also thank the committee for the invite. It is always good to come along to give evidence.

As Ilene Campbell said, TPASS and TIS have been across Scotland gathering tenants’ views. The bill gathers together not only many of the hanging threads but good practice, of which there is a lot in Scotland. There was a lot of misunderstanding about the housing practice. Some parts of the practice were misinterpreted, although better interpretations of that practice were also offered. The bill has done well to pull the strands together to clarify the practice. That will help many tenants to have a better idea of their status and of housing practices.

Jennifer MacLeod (Highland and Argyll and Bute Tenants Network): First, thank you for having me.

When I first read the vision for housing a number of years ago, I thought how wonderful that would be. We are moving towards that vision, and it is indeed a wonderful vision for the people of Scotland to have satisfactory housing and that they should be happy where they are.

The Convener: Gil Paterson has a question. [Interruption.] I am sorry—I see that Kevin Paterson wishes to speak.

Gil Paterson: I am sorry to cut across you Kevin—I thought that you were going to let that question go by.

Kevin Paterson (Glasgow and Eilean Siar Tenants Network): Before we go any further, you should realise that I never let anything go by.

I thank the committee for inviting me to give evidence. I agree that the bill is wide ranging and ties up a lot of loose ends, although a lot of those loose ends should have been tied up a long time ago. The bill falls short in a number of categories and places, which I will come on to later when we discuss the detail. The bill is by no means a fait accompli and a lot of work needs to be done, especially as the aim is to head for that overall housing vision.

Gil Paterson: An issue that the witnesses were quick to raise in their contributions was about the process. I wonder whether the process that was put in place for the organisations was the right way to go about it. Was the process set out in a way that allowed you to engage fully? At this stage, I am interested in hearing about the process; we will question you on the issues that you raised later on.

The Convener: You are asking about the consultation process.

Gil Paterson: That is correct.

Ilene Campbell: There has been a lot of consultation on aspects of the bill. In the past few years, tenants have had the opportunity to be consulted. However, lots of other issues have arisen at the same time, such as welfare reform and the Scottish social housing charter. Our experience is therefore that there has been a lot for tenants and residents organisations to respond to, but consultation has taken place.

A couple of areas in the bill have not been consulted on, including the powers of the Scottish Housing Regulator. All our consultation events have highlighted that this issue requires further consultation.

Hugh McClung: Much consultation has taken place. A number of network representatives have been involved in sounding boards and working groups with the Scottish Government, and they have highlighted issues that should be considered in relation to the bill. Notwithstanding that, the public consultation process—on the right to buy, for example—was a great step forward. It gave local people the opportunity to choose whether they supported the proposals. The Government did well on that, and I commend it for that.

Lesley Baird: There has been extensive consultation. One of the most important things was to try to excite people about the issues, to entice them to come to events, and not to make the bill sound as if it was a done deal about a dry and dusty subject. We have worked hard to let people know that the Parliament is a listening and doing organisation and to give people evidence of how the Parliament has changed its mind after listening to people who receive services such as housing services. By stressing that the bill was not a done deal and that tenants’ views would count, we encouraged a lot of people to come forward who might not have done so in the past.

Kevin Paterson: I agree that the consultation has been good, but the Government consulted only tenants on a bill that will also affect potential tenants. Quite a number of people who are on housing lists and homeless lists have not been consulted, although the bill will affect them. The consultation fell short by not encouraging people who are on those lists to give evidence and get involved in the consultation process. That was a weakness. The bill will affect people who are on housing lists, so they should have been consulted a lot more.

Gil Paterson: I asked about the process. The question that follows is whether you think that you have influenced the bill. Did the Government take account of and react to what you said?

Jennifer MacLeod: I feel that we have been listened to and that changes have been made as a result of what we said, but some issues and suggestions from tenants, which they felt were important, have been missed out completely. There are two ways of looking at the outcome, but we welcomed the consultation.

Hugh McClung: I concur with my colleagues. The process was structured, but the thoughts from the tenant perspective about probationary tenancies and a public sector housing panel, for example, were disregarded and those measures were not included in the bill. A significant number of responses to the consultation exercise on probationary tenancies said that the bill should provide for those tenancies, but that was not taken up.

I commend the processes to initiate thoughts; we were listened to and what we said and suggested was heeded. Some comments fell by the wayside, but the majority were heard.

Kevin Paterson: The involvement goes deeper than that. I was involved in the housing policy advisory group when the issues were discussed with Alex Neil back in 2009 and 2010, so we have been involved from the start. The issues that Hugh McClung raised were discussed by that group and included in the consultation, but there was a great deal of debate—shall we say—about whether putting them in the bill would be appropriate.

The involvement started early. The Government has been very good at involving the tenants movement in its decision making and, most of all, in its planning for future housing projects. As long as that continues, things will go from strength to strength.

Gil Paterson: Thank you for that.

Kevin Paterson: The tenants movement has been against the right to buy since the moment it was first envisioned. It has ripped the heart out of social housing in Scotland right from the Highlands to the Borders, and it has meant a tenfold increase in waiting lists. We are pleased to see it ending—it is about time—but we do not see why we will have to wait for three years. We do not know why that is.

At the moment, the level of right-to-buy purchases is falling off, but as the economic situation gets better it will creep up again. We think that we are missing an opportunity to keep houses that we will lose during the next three years. Those losses could be stopped if we stopped the right to buy straight away.

Lesley Baird: I agree with Kevin Paterson. We feel that three years is too long, although I know that we have to make sure that people who have that right have the time to make up their minds.

At some of our sessions, some people expressed concerns about there being a spike in right-to-buy purchases if the right is going to be taken away, while some thought that it might just die out naturally. However, the majority of people said that they thought that action should be taken now, not in three years. There were also some people who had issues with the idea of unscrupulous companies offering to buy houses for people.

Therefore, one or two people thought that the right to buy could just be left to die out, but the majority of tenants at the sessions we held were absolutely behind stopping it now and not in three years. Someone suggested giving tenants a week to exercise their right to buy, but we thought that that was too short a time. There are certainly very strong feelings about the issue.

Pressured area status is there for a reason, and the majority of tenants felt that, if someone does not have the right to buy now, they should not be given the right to buy. There was some suggestion that that restriction could be lifted, but it was not a popular suggestion.

Hugh McClung: I answer Mark Griffin’s point by reiterating that we welcome the positive measure of ceasing the right to buy. As Kevin Paterson has said, tenants up and down the land have been given a significant boost because landlords have protected stock and, with that, landlords will see a better influx and be able to plan ahead for their financial structures and rent accounts. They will be able to look at how best to preserve that stock.

I cannot answer the point about the difficulty with pressured area status. That is something for your legal representatives to work out. I do not know whether someone will launch a legal challenge once the period has elapsed. I cannot see it, but that is my personal view. The network does not believe that there will be a challenge to pressured area status, but that is not to say that there will not be.

By and large, landlords will see an advantage to the protection of their stock, and tenants will have a better choice of home. I also agree with my colleagues that the three-year grace period is too long. Within the European convention on human rights, there is leeway about lengths of time, although it does not stipulate a length of time. I accept that people who have the right to buy have certain rights, but I cannot agree that it should remain for three years; one year is sufficient.

Jennifer MacLeod: I agree with one year. I was in two minds about the right to buy at the outset. I chose not to buy, but my family members took up the opportunity. In fact, one of them did a swap with somebody and moved to another house because it was more like the type that she wanted to buy.

Although I was happy for them and for many others, in a short time I could see the reduction in the number of houses that were available for rent. We have a right to rent as well as a right to buy. Over the years, the right to buy has done great damage to the amount of housing stock that is available, and I am glad that it is finishing. As Hugh McClung said, one year is enough notice.

Ilene Campbell: There is a great deal of consensus on the issue, and I agree with almost everything that has been said.

The two key points are supply and the impact on people who chose to buy but were not able to afford the maintenance and improvement. We see the massive issues that have resulted from the right. There is therefore real support for the abolition based on the considerations of supply and protection for people who do not want to be in that position, but it should be abolition for everyone at the same time. The critical point about the right to buy is that it is so complex that it must be clear when any change will happen and the right will end.

Most other witnesses are saying that the notice period should be a year, but the feedback that we got in the consultation that we carried out was that it should be 18 months to two years—certainly, shorter than three years. The main concerns are about forward planning for landlords at a time of recession and that people might feel under pressure to seek funding to purchase a property that they cannot actually afford. There is real support among tenants for abolition as long as it is clear for tenants who still have the right to buy what the bill means.

Mark Griffin: You touched on some of the difficulties with removing the right to buy in areas that have been designated as pressured areas. When the bill comes into force, it will not prevent any local authority from applying for pressured area status for any area. It is not inconceivable that the whole of Scotland could be designated as having pressured area status in the three-year period over which people will lose their right to buy. Do you have any thoughts on that measure being available to local authorities while the three-year period runs its course?

Hugh McClung: I would welcome pressured area status across Scotland for 100 years. I do not want one more house to go to the open market. It is a headache for landlords as well as tenants that tenants cannot get a home, to which they have a right, as is the Scottish Government’s stated aim.

Similarly, people who have a preserved right still have the right to buy. They have the right to a court challenge if they so wish. However, I do not think that there will be a big rush to buy in the three years after the bill receives royal assent—it does not matter whether the period is one year or three.

I welcome pressured area status. If every local authority in the land continues it for 100 years, I will be more than happy.

Kevin Paterson: That says it all, really.

Mark Griffin: If the bill goes ahead and the right to buy is ended, what responsibility will the Scottish Government, registered social landlords, local councils and organisations such as yours have to provide tenants with information about that and to advise them on how to exercise their right to buy if they choose to do so in the three-year notice period? What is the best route to make them aware of that?

Jennifer MacLeod: I feel that the houses were built for renting and not built to be sold. If somebody wants to buy a house, they can look for one and buy it. That might be more difficult for them but, as far as I am concerned, there should not be a right to buy—full stop.

Ilene Campbell: We recommend that guidance should be given on the right to buy—on key issues such as when the process will start and end and where people can get information locally. Tenants will have to contact their landlords to ensure that they know what rights they have. As an information organisation, we would like to have guidance, so that we can be clear about the information that we are sharing with tenants and landlords throughout Scotland. I recommend that the Government should issue guidance.

Lesley Baird: There is a responsibility to get information out quickly, before the mythology begins to take on a life of its own and before the insurance companies start knocking on people’s doors to say, “We’ll buy your house from you and we’ll give you a fortnight in Spain. Just send it back to us again.” We really need to have the facts and guidance laid out clearly. At one of our sessions, we were asked how long an application that was lodged within the three-year or one-year period would stay live. For example, if I applied to buy the day before the period stopped, would I still have the right to buy in 10 years’ time?

We need to be absolutely clear with people—with no mythology, but just the straight facts—and that guidance needs to come out quickly. Whoever takes on that responsibility—I imagine that the Scottish Government would do that in the first instance and that it would go down to landlords—we would be happy to give people factual information to stem and scotch some of the rumours.

Kevin Paterson: I agree with Lesley Baird that getting the correct information out quickly is the way forward.

I will expand on Mark Griffin’s question. Many registered social landlords rely on right-to-buy receipts for their business plans. That is another thing that will come back to members when the right to buy is ended, because many RSLs will come screaming for compensation to the Scottish Government and will ask why the Parliament has taken away something that was written into their business plans and agreed when they took over the stock. That is another aspect of the right to buy that members will probably become aware of. Many RSLs will want to get the information out there because they will want to get right-to-buy receipts as part of their business plans. That is a warning shot across the bows.

Information to tenants must be correct and timely and in a form that they can understand. That is imperative. As for timescales, if somebody applies for the right to buy, it surely cannot be the case that they can hold it for longer than three months.

The Convener: On Kevin Paterson’s first point, it is interesting that we have heard RSLs welcome the proposal because it means that, when they go to the banks for finance, they will be more likely to get it, because their housing stock will be stable. Perhaps there are two sides to the argument, but you make an interesting point.

There are no further questions on the right to buy, so we shall move on. Paragraph 42 of the policy memorandum to the bill indicates that the Scottish Government is “committed to supporting home ownership in other ways, including ... the Low-cost Initiative for First-time Buyers”.

Do you have any comments about the range of schemes that the Scottish Government offers to support home ownership? Are they appropriate for tenants who might no longer have the right to buy and might now use those other schemes?

Kevin Paterson: A range of properties must be available to tenants, and there must still be a home ownership aspiration among tenants if we want to free up tenancies further down the line. Shared equity fills a gap in the market for people, but factoring legislation has caught a lot of people out when buying shared-equity flats. We have had a number of tenants who have bought LIFT properties with a 20 per cent share held by the Government and who have suddenly been hit by factoring charges that they do not understand. Sometimes, those factoring charges are as much as their mortgage payments.

There has to be a range of products, which must be the right products to allow people to fulfil their aspirations. We in the tenants movement see nothing wrong with people aspiring to buy houses; we just do not want them to buy social housing. If the Government wants to make proposals that will help them, as long as it does not use money from the housing revenue account or housing receipts that RSLs have brought in, that is fine by us.

The Convener: The point about people not being made aware of factoring costs was brought up in a recent inquiry by the Justice Committee.

Hugh McClung: Funding for assistance with mortgages is broadly to be welcomed, as those who wish to buy in the private sector can get an initial leg-up—forgive the terminology. The trouble is that the private sector housing market is volatile. We have seen boom-and-bust regimes in recent years with regard to house prices and so on, and the much-maligned mortgage-to-rent schemes came into play because people could no longer afford their mortgages. I would welcome any scheme that is brought in to help people to purchase their own homes if they wish to do so.

Ilene Campbell: I agree with the points that have been made. The key thing is that people understand what they are purchasing and buying into. The key lesson of the right to buy was that people must understand fully the responsibilities that go with the option. No one would deny people the right to choose to purchase, but information has to be available about what exactly is meant by terms such as “shared equity” and what the implications are of getting involved in such schemes.

The Convener: Part 2 is about social housing, on which Alex Johnstone has questions.

Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): I will ask about the allocations policy. My first questions will give people an opportunity to express their views. What do you think about how social landlords allocate their housing? Do they need greater flexibility? If so, why?

Kevin Paterson: We in the tenants movement believe that allocations should always be needs driven. Taking into account other aspects of people’s lives is fair enough, but the tenant’s need should always be a paramount concern when it comes to allocations.

Hugh McClung: We have to think about tenants’ aspirations for their lifestyle and their family commitments. A young couple starting out, who might aspire to have a family and who might not be able to afford private ownership or renting, can always look to a social landlord for rented accommodation. The bill goes some way towards ensuring that that can happen and that the social aspect—whether someone is homeless or is living in underoccupied accommodation, for example—is taken into account. If we can take that approach, while ensuring that it operates alongside the support packages that are in place for first-time tenancies, we will go a long way towards doing things right.

Lesley Baird: I agree with flexibility in allocations, as do many of the tenants to whom we speak across Scotland. I do not know whether the committee wants to get into detailed consideration of the issue, but there are concerns about considering age in relation to allocations. The proposal is wonderful. However, people still think that sheltered housing is for old people only, whereas it is for people who have a specific need. There is a worry about young people continuing to be excluded from housing because they are seen as a problem, rather than as part of the solution. Whatever we do, we need to ensure that young people are not excluded from allocations.

We welcome the opportunity to take age into consideration. We used to be able to put together people of a particular age or ability and people who had lifestyles that did not clash. We must be aware of sensitivities around lettings. The more flexibility, without excluding people, the better.

Ilene Campbell: When we ask tenants about the allocations policy, they often tell us that they do not understand the legislation and how it applies in practice. Some of that might be based on people’s experience, if the allocations policy has not resulted in them getting the house that they want. However, we often work with groups that tell us that they find the system to be inflexible. Tenants say that they would welcome more flexibility.

Probably every witness has a different view on the age issue. The tenants whom we spoke to welcomed the ability to take age into consideration, for a number of reasons. People talk about the past, when decisions were taken to avoid lifestyle differences and to put people of certain ages in appropriate and suitable houses. The key thing about flexibility is that it must be clear that it is being used to meet housing need and not to discriminate. Most tenants and residents say that they want an allocations policy that is common sense and flexible and which results in sustainable communities. Creating sustainable communities is at the heart of the issue.

We welcome the new requirement for consultation on any changes to an allocations policy. As a result of the bill, allocations policies will change, so we welcome that as a positive step.

Hugh McClung: We do not see younger people as the ogre. As Lesley Baird said, we need a measure of sensitive letting. We need to work with younger people, particularly on sustainability. The starting point when we work with younger people is how we best integrate them into society or local housing. As often as not, young people have short-lived tenancies, and they tend to move from pillar to post fairly quickly. To help them to sustain tenancies, it is better to have a properly integrated policy, which needs a bit of flexibility. We need to look at that.

Kevin Paterson: I can speak only for Glasgow, where the tenancy sustainability rate for 16 to 25-year-olds is 68 per cent—after a year, 68 per cent are still in their tenancy. That figure is not particularly low, and it is certainly not the case that most young people move on in that period. After the Heriot-Watt University survey in 2006 on how young people should be supported to go into tenancies and how tenancies can be sustained, along with the work of organisations such as Aspire and Ypeople, many young people in Glasgow have been brought into test tenancies and given the chance to have their own tenancy.

In the north of Glasgow, Aspire has test tenancies that allow young people to have their own home but to be supported in it and then to look into getting their own tenancy. Aspire and Ypeople have brought such tenancies on a long way. Ypeople shows young people not only how to keep their tenancy but how to join a community and get involved in decision making. It empowers them to get engaged in the community. Sometimes, young people are demonised, because we hear about the small number who do not keep their tenancies and who are involved in antisocial behaviour. However, we do not hear about the vast number of people who come through organisations such as Aspire and Ypeople and who go on to lead good and fulfilling lives.
The support that those organisations provide can last for between six months and two years, but the young people are not forgotten as they move into tenancies. If we want 16-year-olds to behave like adults, it is vital that we treat them like adults. I hope that the committee has received evidence on the bill from Aspire and Ypeople.

Alex Johnstone: Just to complete that, I have picked up a degree of positive reaction to the increased flexibility. Mr Paterson, are you saying that you are opposed to it?

Kevin Paterson: No, I am not opposed to flexibility in allocations; I am opposed to not meeting the needs of the people who need housing. If someone needs a house and the house is available, they should get it, regardless of their age or anything else. If someone needs support to keep a house, they should get that support.

If we give local authorities and RSLs flexibility and they do not have to give homes to young people, they will take the cheapest option. If they put a young person in a home, they will have to provide a support package, which will cost a lot of money, so they will see if they can use the flexibility in allocations to put in somebody else. I would hate to think that, in the end, the decision will come down to money—it should always be about housing need.

Alex Johnstone: We have talked about the idea of grouping people by age, but could the flexibility be used in any other way? Should we consider putting anything else in the bill to allow greater flexibility when needed?

Kevin Paterson: Grouping people together in sheltered housing is fair enough when people have needs and those needs are met in a sheltered housing unit. However, if we are talking about a mixed community, the flexibility in allocations can be used to keep that mix, but the need for housing should always drive the decision. A single person will not be given a three-bedroom family house and a family with three kids will not be given a single-bedroom tenement flat. There is always that flexibility in housing allocations. Houses are not allocated according to people’s wants; they are allocated according to the needs of families.

Alex Johnstone: Yes, but there has been a certain lack of flexibility in the system over recent years. The bill proposes to bring back a degree of flexibility. Is there anything else that we should consider during the passage of the bill that would give the desired flexibility to allocations policy?

Kevin Paterson: Build more houses.

Alex Johnstone: There is not a section in the bill about that, but we will deal with that in other ways.

Jennifer MacLeod: We need to consider the different needs that people have for housing—we need to consider their family situation as well as their age. We must also consider the fact that it takes a long time for an estate to gel when a number of people move in. It takes a long time for cohesion to build up in how the residents or tenants work together. That does not happen right away.

It is important to be sensitive with letting, which is why I welcome the flexibility aspect. Someone could want a house fairly near an older person in the family. If they do not come right to the top of the list when a house is available near that family member, not just because they like the family member but because they need to help support them, that is a problem.

In other cases, people’s support systems are around them in a particular area. It is unfortunate that some of the larger houses were sold off, because I know of a case in which a couple with seven children waited and waited in their three-bedroom house. They were offered a house quite a distance away but their support system was around them in our area. They eventually moved with their seven children into a four-bedroom house, but they had to wait and wait when there was an urgent need. Okay—maybe they should not have had seven children, but that is not part of the bill.

Alex Johnstone: We know what is in and what is out.

Jennifer MacLeod: When the couple were expecting the fifth and sixth children—twins—they were waiting to get a larger house. They turned down houses that were further away and they had seven children before they got to move. There needs to be more sensitivity, thought and flexibility. I welcome the flexibility aspect because of examples such as that one, in which children were involved and the family needed local support. There are also ill people or older people who need a bit of extra support. Houses are needed for their family members so that they can be close to them.

Hugh McClung: The issue is not what else you could put into the bill; it is how you allocate what you already have. In that respect, the bill is specific about certain categories. It looks at expanding how those categories are channelled into the allocation system. It is true that the allocation system is complicated, but if you can make it a bit more flexible, as the bill proposes, you will go a long way to doing what you need to do to ensure that people are housed correctly and that the community that they are involved in is sustainable. If you get that right, you will be doing fine.
Alex Johnstone: The bill also makes changes to qualifying periods for joint tenancies, subletting, assignations and successions. What are your views on those provisions? Do you agree with the Scottish Government that they will help social landlords to make the best use of their existing housing stock?

Lesley Baird: Absolutely. There have been concerns across communities about perceptions of queue jumping, particularly when it comes to assignations. The guidance will be all, because people have to know that if they begin to cohabit with someone, they have to let the landlord know about their status so that the clock starts ticking, if you like. A lot of information will have to be given out, but we definitely support the proposals to change the qualifying periods for assignation and subletting.

As we have all said, housing is based on need and there have been some inappropriate assignations. It has been suggested that the option of assignation should be taken away from tenants and given to landlords. However, we still want tenants to have the ability to assign, but assignation has to be used a bit better.

Ilene Campbell: I totally agree with Lesley Baird’s comments. The feedback that we have received is that people think that the provisions are fair and clear. However, not everyone is aware that the property has to have been their main residence, so that needs to be made clearer. The landlord must provide information that makes it very clear that the tenancy can be assigned 12 months from the point at which the property became the tenant’s main residence. That issue was raised at almost every consultation event.

There is support for the provision that, if someone wants to assign a property, they would not be able to do so if it would result in underoccupation or they were not in housing need. However, on the whole there is support for the changes.

Kevin Paterson: I agree, too. This is probably one of the most important aspects of the bill as far as the tenants movement is concerned, because one of the complaints that we get as tenants’ representatives is based on the perception that there is queue jumping. There is a perception that people move in with their parents and get the house assigned to them. With the right to buy, in particular, we noticed that older people were having younger people move in with them who would buy the property and move it on. We support the provisions.

Hugh McClung: I sound a note of caution. Although I accept—as do network representatives—that there is broad support for the extension of timescales for assignations and so on, we have to be careful about how the determination is made.

For example, there might be a qualifying need for someone who is extremely ill. There might be mitigating circumstances in which the period of 12 months cannot be reached. Forgive me for suggesting this, but the person might be terminally ill. Do we have the flexibility to look at something else? The Scottish Government might need to give some kind of direction on that. I raise the issue only on the off-chance that such circumstances arise.

Alex Johnstone: We can probably raise that issue with the minister.

The Convener: As there are no more questions on lettings, we will move on to antisocial behaviour.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): I will focus on antisocial behaviour and short Scottish secure tenancies. The bill contains provisions that are aimed at giving social landlords more tools to tackle antisocial behaviour, including allowing landlords to suspend an applicant from receiving an offer of housing, widening the circumstances in which landlords can use short SSTs and simplifying the procedure for evicting tenants. Can you give me a flavour of the impact of antisocial behaviour on the areas that you cover? What difference will the new proposals make compared with the current powers?

Hugh McClung: This has been a long time coming. Antisocial behaviour has been a bone of contention in excellent communities. When, a few years ago, the then Minister for Housing and Communities, Alex Neil, asked network representatives to look at the strategy on antisocial behaviour, a late colleague wrote a document called “Declining Communities” that was presented to Alex Neil and which expressed the view that what was wrong with the system was that it took so long to take up evidence. In respect of antisocial behaviour, there is a catalogue or diary of events, there are witness strategy proposals and there are applications to the courts. All those things take time and take their toll on communities.

I am not saying that everyone is a bad penny, however, or that every community is like that; that is not the issue. With regard to clear, defined antisocial behaviour, the bill takes us a long way from what the provisions used to be for identifying people. We welcome the proposal by which the landlord can suspend a Scottish secure tenancy by converting it to an SSST.

However, it is disappointing that, although tenants had proposed a probationary or initial tenancy to ensure that all new applicants would go through a 12-month period under an SSST, that proposal was unfortunately not included in the bill. Network representatives felt strongly about it, given that, in a consultation exercise that was conducted by the Scottish Government in 2012, 67 per cent of the landlords and tenants who responded supported a probationary tenancy—or an initial tenancy, as the network likes to call it—which would have given landlords the time and wherewithal to identify problem areas. I reiterate that the conclusion was not that everybody would automatically be labelled an antisocial person, but the provision would have given landlords time to identify such people.

It is difficult for local landlords to identify people with antisocial tendencies. A 12-month initial tenancy would have given landlords time to find out whether a person was of that nature. If they turned out not to be of that tendency, they would revert straight to the Scottish secure tenancy, having gone through that 12-month probationary period.

Although I support and welcome the provisions in the bill under which landlords have the exclusive power to suspend a Scottish secure tenancy, I think that it would have been better to have a probationary tenancy.

The Convener: I suspect that we might not get agreement on that.

Kevin Paterson: That was an awful long time to spend on something that is not actually in the bill, but that is fine. However, I have to say that initial or probationary tenancies are unacceptable. They are an erosion of the Scottish secure tenancy and take away tenants’ rights. We will fight to our dying breath to keep the Scottish secure tenancy. From the rent strikes of 1915 in Glasgow right the way through to the centenary of Mary Barbour’s army in 2015, we will fight for the Scottish secure tenancy.

Why should everybody be tarred with the same brush? Why should people be accused of possibly indulging in antisocial behaviour? Would it be right to accuse somebody going into Marks and Spencer of being a possible shoplifter? If staff were to follow someone around all the time or not let them into parts of the shop, saying, “Sorry, you haven’t proved that you’re not a shoplifter, so you can’t come into this part of Marks and Spencer until you have,” that would be unacceptable. In my opinion, and in the opinion of the Glasgow and Western Isles tenants network, it would be totally unacceptable to bring in probationary tenancies, and we were pleased to see that they are not in the bill.

Jennifer MacLeod: There is closed-circuit television in Marks and Spencer, and there are a whole lot of security people watching the customers. With regard to an initial tenancy, if everybody is on a level playing field or in the same boat—whichever way we want to look at it—nobody can point the finger and say that somebody only has a short tenancy because he or she is being watched to see how they behave. If everybody is in that situation, there will be none of that.

I know that people on short-term tenancies face difficulties with getting houses furnished and carpeted or whatever, but I am sure that something could come out of that and that the majority of people would look after their home, be a good tenant and be able to continue to a secure tenancy. I should say that I am very much in favour of initial tenancies, but not probationary ones. There is a lot in the wording.

Ilene Campbell: There is probably no consensus on the issue, and I probably support the point that, by taking people’s rights away like that, you are almost saying that every new tenant could do something antisocial. However, if you asked tenants throughout Scotland, you would not find any consensus. When we checked, we found extreme and polarised views, depending on people’s experiences.

TIS would not advocate probationary tenancies, because we do not think that there is enough evidence at this stage to suggest that they would have a major impact on antisocial behaviour issues. Tenants will welcome anything that strengthens landlords’ powers to deal with antisocial behaviour. Whatever we as a group of people here think, that issue is at the top of the agenda in every single community in Scotland, and is based on people’s perceptions and the reality of what is happening.

The bill will simply tighten up provisions that already exist. However, although everyone will welcome that, I do not think that the measures in the bill in themselves will tackle the issue. The bill will not be the solution to antisocial behaviour in Scotland. Instead, we need the agencies to continue to work together and housing organisations to support agencies, the police and local communities. That is the central issue: people should work together. It is not the Government’s role to resolve the antisocial behaviour issue.

Another critical issue is funding and ensuring that the resource and support services are funded on the ground and at the local level to do this work.

We welcome the provisions, which tighten up what already exists. Antisocial behaviour is a major issue for tenants, but the critical issue is funding to ensure that local initiatives and organisations work together.
Lesley Baird: I agree with just about everything that has been said, which leaves me on the fence. There was no consensus in any of our sessions; instead, there were strong views both for and against probationary tenancies. I think that it was agreed that the word “probationary” was unpleasant and that, if there were to be initial tenancies, that word should be taken out.

It was suggested that SSSTs could be extended. Others said that that was all well and good and although people could understand why the profession might want that, I heard the response, “You don’t have to live next door” a couple of times. We need to ensure that, whatever happens, the support and infrastructure exist and people work together.

There were issues about getting clarity on what antisocial behaviour means and clarity on the part of the bill that mentions convictions. What convictions are we talking about? After all, a person can be convicted of dog fouling. In a lot of these matters, guidance is required on where an SSST would be offered and it is important that there is absolute clarity in those areas.

People were keen for tenants to receive a lot of support throughout their tenancies to help them to sustain them. It was really good that nobody played the youth card or said, “Oh, it’s all young people.” However, tenancies need to be sustained, which will cost a lot of money, and there was a fair bit of scepticism about the funds required to do that. People said that it would simply not happen.

In the main, although there was no consensus on probationary tenancies in any of our sessions, there was absolutely consensus on providing support and helping people stay in their homes.

The Convener: It is interesting that you said that about money, because earlier today we heard that an eviction could cost between £25,000 and £32,000. Preventing evictions and keeping people secure in their homes is a matter of spending to save.

Kevin Paterson: It is indeed about putting in place multi-agency support.

I go back to probationary tenancies, as I want members to understand who would be caught up in them. Anybody who changes or transfers property will get a new tenancy with their landlord, so they would have to go on to a probationary tenancy. They could be somebody who has been in their house for 30 years without a blemish on their character and who may have to move to downsize. If they took on a new tenancy with their landlord, they would have to go on to a probationary tenancy, which does not seem fair. We cannot envisage any point at which a probationary tenancy would work. When there has been antisocial behaviour, the tenant could revert to a short secure tenancy but we cannot see the merit of tarring everybody with the same brush.

Mary Fee: For a person whose application has been suspended, the bill will introduce a right of appeal to a sheriff. Is that the right way to go? Will it be beneficial?

Kevin Paterson: I go back to why we would have liked to see a housing panel for social housing as well as for private rented housing. We believe that there should be a more simplified way of going about things and that there should be a first-tier tribunal that people can go to instead of having to go to the sheriff court all the time. However, there has to be a right of appeal, and if that right of appeal is to the sheriff, so be it.

Mary Fee: We have heard evidence that RSLs should be able to go to the first-tier tribunal, which is something that we will look at.

Are there any other views on that before I move on?

Hugh McClung: I would support appeals going to a first-tier tribunal. The more important point in what Kevin Paterson has just said relates to the long-winded court process, if I may say so. The bill proposes a first-tier tribunal to look at disputes, antisocial behaviour appeals and suchlike. Lord Gill, an eminent member of the judiciary, has suggested that that should not be considered at all and that courts should deal with threats of eviction and suchlike. I would say to Lord Gill, “Sorry, that’s not on. It takes too long, it’s not high on your agenda and it costs local authorities thousands.” Therefore, we welcome that provision. However, if, at the end of the day, appeals have to go to before the sheriff, so be it.

Jennifer MacLeod: When we, along with many others, came up with the idea, our thinking was that it would be something like the tribunal for people who believe that they have been unfairly dismissed. Their peers—people who understood their situation—would deal with their case. As it is, not only money but hours and hours of staff time go into an eviction—time that staff could spend doing other work that would benefit tenants. If a case gets to a sheriff who happens to be very much against evictions, it just gets thrown out. It is one person’s decision.

I am not pro-eviction; I would rather that evictions were avoided. I would prefer something like a panel or tribunal, which would look at all the different aspects, with a multi-agency approach taken to solve the problem, rather than going for eviction. Of course, eviction is such a costly affair that it is usually an action of last resort.
Mary Fee: That certainly mirrors some of the evidence that we have heard today about the length of time that it takes to get to the point of eviction. Quite often, when a case gets to a sheriff, if the sheriff is not supportive of eviction it does not happen and the landlord and the tenant are back to square 1, as are the tenant’s neighbours.

Govan Law Centre told the committee that “Tenants do not want to lose their homes.”—[Official Report, Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, 22 January 2014; c 2464.]

It also said that more support should be available for tenants and that agencies should work more closely with tenants who are involved in antisocial behaviour. Do you have any views on other protections that there should be for tenants who are on an SSST?

Jennifer MacLeod: There should be more support, which I realise would be costly. However, we must also consider the fact some people have mental illnesses that cause them to behave differently from the norm—whatever that is. Nothing is really going to fix the problem for a person who suffers from a mental illness. We need to do a lot more thinking about that, because evicting such people is not the answer. I think that support from different areas is needed.

Mary Fee: Especially given the cost of evictions.

Jennifer MacLeod: Aye, and the fact that the person has to be re-homed. Someone who is seriously mentally ill is not fit for eviction and cannot cope with homelessness. We need to think about that.

Lesley Baird: I agree that, to help people sustain their tenancy, a lot more support is required, and that support should be at the level that they need. Eviction is always a last resort, because landlords want to keep tenants, not throw them out. If there was such a panel, it should be a panel of peers—in that sense, it would be a panel of experts. We have heard of cases in particularly remote rural areas where a visiting sheriff comes from one of the cities, finds the case very trivial and says, “That would never happen in Glasgow,” or wherever, so the person is allowed to stay in the tenancy. A more cohesive approach—one that is understood—is required. It would certainly be very expensive, but we would like to see more support put in to help people sustain their tenancies.

Kevin Paterson: A multi-agency approach is vital, but RSLs must have strategies in place to deal with antisocial behaviour. A lot of the onus is on RSLs to have support agencies on their books so that they know where to go to when such things happen.

I am going to shout about Glasgow again—I can speak only about Glasgow as that is the area that I represent at the moment. Our tenant sustainability strategy has an antisocial behaviour section that shows the sort of support that will be given not only to victims of antisocial behaviour but to people who are behaving in an antisocial way and who sometimes do not even know it. It is about finding out the reasons for the antisocial behaviour. However, the fact is that there are times when, no matter what we do or what support we put in, people will continue their antisocial behaviour until we evict them.

With a housing panel, there would not be the fear factor that there is with the sheriff court. A panel would involve a lower tier of judiciary for both tenants and landlords. A lot of the people with whom I work find the sheriff court letter terrifying. There is nobody there for them when that letter comes through. There should be support available for people when they get a letter saying that they are being evicted or accused of antisocial behaviour. We should support those people, as well as the victims.

Ilene Campbell: There are lots of really good initiatives. You probably heard about them over the past few weeks when you heard from other organisations. Most local authorities and housing associations now have staff whose focus is on being the tenancy sustainment officer. Such officers try to ensure that people are able to stay in their home and are able to afford it. Obviously, given the welfare reform proposals, there are critical issues for the future of social rented housing in Scotland. A lot of work is already taking place. If a tenant is suffering from antisocial behaviour, that is the most critical situation that they can experience. However, the landlord must adhere to the legislation and good practice, so such situations are a real challenge.

However, as I said, a lot of good work is happening out there, and it really just has to be developed. An extended short Scottish secure tenancy of 18 months with support in place could be positive for a tenant who just needs a bit of support to be able to stay in their house. There is always going to be a balance between supporting the person who is the victim of antisocial behaviour and supporting the person who is causing the problem. That is why antisocial behaviour is always such a controversial issue.

Hugh McClung: It is fair to say that it is not really necessary to put something else into the process to reduce an SST to an SSST. Colleagues around the table have already stipulated the support measures that are required.

That said, there is a long process before we get to that stage, which we all know about. Within the support mechanism, we could avoid reaching the stage at which an SST is reduced to an SSST. I know a lot of landlords who do that already. They tell the tenant that if they continue with their behaviour, they will lose their home or the right to a secure tenancy. If we stay with the approach of clearly explaining that and building up support measures, it will be fine.

Mary Fee: So it is about support and intervention.

Hugh McClung: Yes.

Mary Fee: That is fine. Thank you.

The Convener: Does anybody else have questions on antisocial behaviour?

Jim Eadie (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP): I want to return to the theme that Ms Campbell identified, which is the constant challenge of balancing the right of tenants to a secure tenancy—which, as Kevin Paterson said, was hard won over many years—with the need to tackle antisocial behaviour. I think that Hugh McClung made that point effectively when he said that the process often takes its time and takes its toll on the families that are affected. I would like to know from each of the panel members the extent to which the bill has got that balance right. I am referring specifically to section 15, which seeks to simplify the eviction process in very serious cases of antisocial behaviour.

The Convener: Who would like to go first on that?

Hugh McClung: We have already talked about simplifying the process. For example, we could look at having professional witnesses, and some landlords have identified members of staff for that purpose. There is often no corroborative evidence, or perhaps people are unwilling to give evidence. If we could simplify the process by reducing what is required to identify an issue and if we could have a support mechanism, I would agree that we could then go to court—but only as a last resort; nobody wants to support evictions.

Jim Eadie: So you support the bill’s proposals.

Hugh McClung: Yes.

Kevin Paterson: Are you talking about housing allocations?

Jim Eadie: No. I am talking about antisocial behaviour and the proposal to simplify the eviction process, as set out in section 15.

Kevin Paterson: Right.

We agree that antisocial behaviour is a problem for both the victim and the person who is being antisocial. However, we also want to be quite careful about the erosion of rights. In addition, although antisocial behaviour might be prevalent in a household, the whole household might not be involved in it.

Jim Eadie: What conclusion have you come to on the proposals, or have you still to reach one?

Kevin Paterson: I have still to reach one. When flesh is put on the bones at stage 2, it will be a lot easier to see what the direction is in that regard. That is my honest answer.

Ilene Campbell: Our consultation has shown that there is tenant support for simplifying the process. There is support for mandatory eviction and for the process of seeking repossession to be made easier when someone has gone to court and been given a sentence. I think that the right of appeal means that there is a balance. The conversion of a Scottish secure tenancy into a short secure tenancy can also be appealed. Rights of appeal are covered from a human rights perspective.

When I checked the committee’s previous evidence sessions, I saw that, because of people’s right to appeal, the legal profession is very wary of a knee-jerk reaction when it comes to changing the law to make the process easier. Our view is that tenants support making the process simpler and a right of appeal to support people. However, there is a dilemma when there is a mandatory eviction but no reasonableness test, which means that there is no detailed consideration of whether it is reasonable to evict. Although a person would still have a right of appeal, there is a bit of a contradiction there. How would that work out?

However, on the whole, I think that there is support for the bill’s proposals on simplifying the eviction process.

Lesley Baird: We support them, too. On the issue of reasonableness, as I said, we need to be clear about types of conviction. However, I think that that will become clear at stage 2.

Jim Eadie: So you support the proposals, subject to further clarification.

Lesley Baird: Yes.

19:15

Jim Eadie: Would Jennifer MacLeod like to say something?

Jennifer MacLeod: No, I just happened to be looking at you. [Laughter] Gazing in wonder.

Jim Eadie: I do not know whether to be flattered or concerned by that statement.

Do you happen to have a view on the bill?

Jennifer MacLeod: I agree with a lot of what has been said. That is about the best that I can do for you. I can think of instances that we could talk about, but the people would be able to identify themselves, so I would be better not doing so.

The Convener: If there are no more questions on part 2, I will move on.

We have already mentioned private rented sector tribunals, but I think that Alex Johnstone might have a related question.

Alex Johnstone: A short question needs to be asked. There is a proposal for tribunals for the private rented sector. Earlier today, we spoke to someone who is very keen on tribunals being extended to the social rented sector. What do you think of that suggestion?

Hugh McClung: I fully support that suggestion. Tribunals should cover disputes in the social rented sector, impacts on social housing tenants, resolution of disputes, long waiting periods before disputes are heard and so on. Problems arise when people go through the judicial system: the sheriff does not want to know; it is his lunch time; or he is having a hard day with a murder case or something like that and the housing case is not a priority.

The proposal should have been included in the bill. I have it on the authority of the Minister for Housing and Welfare that it might be included in the bill at a later stage. However, regional network representatives would like it to be included now. Further, we would prefer it if there were a team of housing experts and lay people who could deal with the matter in the public sector.

Alex Johnstone: We have got that message loud and clear.

Hugh McClung: Good—thank you.

Ileine Campbell: We came across the same level of support for the proposal, but a lot of tenants do not know what it would cost and what the implications would be. It is essential that there is consultation on the matter in the social rented sector so that people are fully aware of the costs and the benefits.

Jennifer MacLeod: Although there has been no consultation specifically on the matter, I believe that, in the consultation that did take place, landlords and tenants suggested that such a tribunal would be a good idea.

Lesley Baird: We support the idea. There was great disappointment in our consultation responses that it was not in the bill.

Kevin Paterson: I agree. That was the biggest disappointment about the bill, for me. However, I agree that there should be consultation about how the housing panels will work. Tenants need to be clear about how the housing panels will be made up and how they will work.

The Convener: Some of that is in the bill, but I am sure that it will be much more detailed in secondary legislation.

Part 4 of the bill concerns letting agents. Gordon MacDonald has some questions on that.

Gordon MacDonald (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP): Are you aware of any problems in your area arising from rogue letting agents? Do you support the bill’s proposals? What benefits do you think that they will bring to tenants and the wider community if they are introduced?

Hugh McClung: I am aware of problems in my area. I live in Stirling, which is not far from here. I could relate a couple of stories about letting agents who are somewhat cagey in their operations, shall we say.

The bill proposes to legislate for a register of letting agents. It is a common, if misguided, belief that that will allow letting agents to police themselves. For example, in a situation in which there were three letting agents in a town, two of which were registered and were behaving impeccably and one of which was not, the other two would ensure that the one who was not behaving properly came into line. However, that will not happen. There must be clear, proper and full regulation, including compliance with all the legislative processes, and we need to monitor and observe how they are operating. Letting agents should have a set of professional standards or a code of conduct. The bill proposes that, but you must look at the checks and balances of how it will operate.

Kevin Paterson: In the consultation, we said that we were worried about where the resources for enforcement would come from and what shape the enforcement regime would take. We are worried that local government resources will be used to chase private landlords. The bill is a positive step forward, but perhaps it does not go quite far enough.

Gordon MacDonald: How would you strengthen it?

Kevin Paterson: First, I would not only make what is proposed mandatory but set it down in law so that people know exactly what they have to do and what the standard is. I would go as far as to say that we should control the rents in the private sector by making them a certain percentage above social rents within certain areas.

The quality of some of the private rented housing in Glasgow leaves a lot to be desired. We visited houses in Govanhill and in the Gorbals in Govan during our consultation, and the way in which some people are treated is absolutely ridiculous. It should not be happening in a modern Scotland. People wait weeks and weeks for repairs to heating systems, they have water switched off because letting agents want them to move out, and things like that. We have to crack down on some of the letting agents. Whether the bill works will all be in the enforcement.

Ilene Campbell: I totally agree with all the previous points. We whole-heartedly support a statutory code as a minimum standard, which is still to be consulted on. Kevin Paterson raised people’s concern that it is great to have a code, but it has to be enforced, and there are questions about who would have that responsibility. We would welcome a code, but it would be helpful for the advisory groups to have more dialogue and debate with tenant representatives post the bill.

Gordon MacDonald: I have one last question about private letting. Are there any other problems with the existing legislation? Are you aware of any other issues with the private landlord scheme, the deposit scheme or whatever?

Kevin Paterson: The number of illegal evictions that are taking place and the lack of follow-up on them is worrying. Landlords in the private sector seem to think that they can just chuck people out when they want to, or when they want to put the rent up. A negative aspect is that people are left with nowhere to go when those things happen. They do not get their security deposit back and they are more or less forcibly evicted from the property. That is a problem in Glasgow, and we really have to look at bringing criminal charges against some landlords, taking them to court and putting them in prison for illegal evictions and the methods that they use against their tenants.

Hugh McClung: Another issue that I have come across in recent months and years is that, since the introduction of the scheme whereby deposits go to a third party, which we welcomed, there have been suggestions that letting agencies have been charging for the production of a lease or tenancy agreement. That is quite extraordinary. It is really outlandish behaviour.

There are good landlords out there. They may own only one property or they might own 100. They go through a letting agency to do the recruitment process, but the letting agency does not bother its backside other than to sign somebody up. It is not interested in the repairs mechanism or whether the tenant is satisfied with their home—all of that goes by the wayside. The process that is proposed in the bill will go along way towards reducing that problem, but it needs a little bit more.

Ilene Campbell: To reiterate what Hugh McClung said, we get a lot of calls from private rented tenants about things like not being able to get their deposits back. That is a challenge for students and younger people, in particular, who are vulnerable because of that. People also call about the poor quality of repairs. Anything that the Housing (Scotland) Bill can do to ensure a higher standard of repair in the private rented sector would be welcomed by everyone.

Lesley Baird: Most of the codes that are in place for the private rented sector are voluntary. The sector is a huge part of our society because a huge number of people live in private sector properties, so anything that will make those codes statutory and give them teeth is important and would be welcomed by tenants throughout Scotland.

Kevin Paterson: It is about teeth and support, but it is also about the quality of the product. The letting agent is the go-between between the landlord and tenant and it is as much in the landlord's best interests for the letting agent to behave properly as it is in the tenant's. If the enforcement can be given teeth, that will really make a difference.

The Convener: The Scottish Housing Regulator has powers to direct the transfer of RSL assets under the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010. However, before it does so, it must consult, and have regard to the views of, tenants and secured creditors that hold securities over the houses of RSLs. Section 79 of the bill would create a narrow exception to the regulator's duty to consult, and have regard to the views of, tenants and such creditors in cases in which RSLs find themselves in financial jeopardy. Are you content that those proposals are proportionate and in the interests of tenants?

Lesley Baird is champing at the bit to answer that.

Lesley Baird: To say that it is unpopular would be an understatement. What is the regulator doing if we get to the stage at which we have to transfer properties without any consultation? How long does it take? There is absolutely no support at all for that proposal. People were horrified by it.

The Convener: Where do you think that it has come from? Why has the Government come up with it?

I will let you think about that. Perhaps Kevin Paterson has an answer.

Kevin Paterson: If I go back over my housing policy advisory group papers, I see that a number of RSLs were in deep doo-doo, shall we say, with their funders and there was a panic reaction when people looked at the situation and realised that they might not be able to put measures in place with the new housing regulator that was no longer part of the Government.

It has always been a slippery slope to self-regulation. When the Scottish Housing Regulator was made independent, we had worries about that. Section 79 of the bill simply seems to be another erosion of tenants’ powers over the regulator.

When the proposal came to the Western Isles forum of tenants and residents associations, there was absolute horror at it because, when we agreed to transfer, one of the parts of the transfer agreement was that, if anything ever happened that would create a problem with our RSL, the council would step in and take back the houses. That was also a thought for River Clyde Homes and other organisations that undertook a stock transfer. Then, suddenly, the Government has come along and trampled all over transfer agreements. There has been no support whatsoever for the Scottish Housing Regulator to have that power without consultation.

Hugh McClung: I concur totally with the two views given thus far. It would be abhorrent for the power to remove the assets and social aspects of an RSL without consultation with its tenants to be enacted.

Tenants are practically the stakeholders who have prime importance. Each one is encouraged to become a bona fide shareholder, albeit by a £1 membership fee or something like that, which gives them certain rights, such as a right to consultation on rent rises.

I realise that the bill mentions conditions relating to the removal of rights. However, the regulation inspection regime is clear, so it will be easily identifiable whether an RSL has viability problems. In addition, we have the Scottish social housing charter and the annual return on the charter, so it is easy to see at a glance whether there are problems that need further investigation. To say that an overnight removal of assets is warranted is absolutely abhorrent. We do not support that.

Ilene Campbell: Asking why it is proposed that a transfer of assets would take place without consultation is a good question. The issue has been raised not only by tenants but by the CIH. The proposal is completely out of sync with what currently happens.

TIS and TPASS provide independent tenant advice on mergers, stock transfers and constitutional partnerships all over Scotland. I have a scenario for you. At what point would the Scottish Housing Regulator make a decision that it was too late to consult? If the regulator is to make such decisions, we will be on a slippery slope.

Currently, if an organisation is looking to merge with another organisation, tenants have a right to a ballot. However, if the other organisation is subject to insolvency, or if there are other issues or an inquiry is being undertaken, tenants still have a right to be informed and consulted. At most, the bill should say that the consultation process would have to be slightly quicker. However, tenants are due the right to an explanation of the reason for the landlord’s situation and to look at the options, because it is tenants—not you or us—who will, through rents, pay for the decision and the valuation for years to come.

I cannot understand why such a change would be proposed, because it is completely out of sync and would muddy the waters. At what point would tenants not be consulted? With constitutional partnerships and mergers, the position in Scotland is confusing with regard to the point at which people have a right to be consulted and a ballot. The bill now makes proposals relating to insolvencies. If we were advising a group of tenants on the matter, they would ask why they were only being informed about the situation so late on in the day. In such a case, something would have gone wrong in the regulatory process, because there would have been lots of warning signs before the situation arose.

Our concern is that, if you erode tenants’ rights on consultation, what would that say about tenants’ rights in general? Given that the housing association sector across Scotland is looking at its long-term future, there must be consistency. Perhaps the regulator needs to answer the question why the provision is in the bill. I do not think that there are any circumstances in which that erosion of rights would be deemed appropriate.

Jennifer MacLeod: I agree. A housing association cannot just go downhill or down the drain overnight. The returns that are sent to the regulator, if they are put in honestly, are bound to indicate when something is wrong. There must be guidance somewhere along the line that allows people to pick up when something is going wrong, so that whatever help is available can be provided. If an organisation has to be dissolved or passed on to another housing association, the tenants must be consulted. Over the past 10 years, we as tenants have been given rights that we did not dream of having 20 years ago. The proposal is a backward step and, to be honest, I am appalled and amazed by it.

Kevin Paterson: Perhaps we need to look at the matter from a different angle and see it as a failure of self-assessment. Perhaps the Scottish Housing Regulator has seen, through his inspection regime, a weakness in the system that could be exploited because it is all hands off and desk-top inspections.

The Convener: The Scottish Housing Regulator is a she.
Kevin Paterson: Yes, the regime is cheap. That is what you get when you make the Scottish Housing Regulator work to a budget——

The Convener: You misheard. I said that the Scottish Housing Regulator is a she, not cheap. [Laughter.]

Kevin Paterson: I do not think that Michael Cameron is a she. When I met him last week, I am sure that he was a he.

The Convener: Okay—maybe I have got that wrong. I was thinking of Kay Blair, who is the chair of the Scottish Housing Regulator; Michael Cameron is the chief executive.

As members have no more questions, I ask the panellists whether there is an issue that we have not covered in our questioning that you want to raise.

Kevin Paterson: I am surprised that the change to the reasonable preferences has not been brought up. Does no discussion on that issue need to take place?

The Convener: I am not sure that I follow your point.

Hugh McClung: I thought that we had covered that.

The Convener: Are you referring to the allocations?

Kevin Paterson: Yes. I am referring to the changes to the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987. The matter is covered in part 2 and more meat needs to be put on the bones. We are worried about some of the reasonable preferences that are suggested, because the issue is about not only current tenants but future ones and how the bill will affect them. I mentioned earlier that future tenants were left in the dark a little bit in the consultation process.

The Convener: Have you covered the issue in your written evidence?

Kevin Paterson: Yes.

The Convener: We will make sure that we look at that.

I thank all the witnesses for their evidence, which has been very helpful. We had only that one item on our agenda so, after I close the formal part of the meeting, we will move to the informal question-and-answer session with members of the audience.

For information, next week, the committee will hear evidence on the bill from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers. We will also have a progress update from the project team on the building of the Queensferry crossing and we will consider a draft report on the proposed national planning framework 3.

I thank West Dunbartonshire Council staff for looking after us and sustaining us with tea, coffee and food, and for making sure that we had a nice place to hold the meeting. As people will imagine, a huge amount of effort goes in to taking the Parliament out of its normal building, so I also thank the Parliament staff from the official report, broadcasting, security and media relations offices for their efforts. I also thank the clerks, who have undertaken a huge amount of effort in setting up the meeting.

Meeting closed at 19:37.
ALACHO

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

General Observations

As the representative body for Scotland’s senior local government housing professionals, ALACHO (Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers) is pleased to have this opportunity to respond to the Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee’s call for evidence on the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

ALACHO has been fully involved in the various consultations which took place on key aspects of the Bill prior to publication, and would commend the Scottish Government on the inclusive and comprehensive way in which consultation has been undertaken.

In general terms ALACHO welcomes many of the Bill’s provisions. There is much with which we agree, including ending the Right to Buy, increasing flexibility in housing allocations, introducing measures to reduce anti social behaviour, and improving conditions for tenants in the private sector.

Due in large part to earlier consultations, there are no provisions in the Bill to which we are strongly opposed. However, there are some areas where we feel we might have gone further in trying to achieve the Bill’s stated objectives. These relate to a failure to allow consideration in the Bill of

- Initial (or Probationary) Tenancies,
- taking income into account in the allocation of housing, and
- extending the proposed Housing Tribunal system for the private rented sector to the social housing sector

We have highlighted these perceive omissions where relevant, and have grouped our responses under the questions posed by the Committee.

Part 1: Right to Buy

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

1.1 ALACHO is in favour of abolishing the Right to Buy for social housing tenants, and said so in our response to the consultation on this proposal. We accept the legitimate aspirations of many Scottish households to own their own home, but feel that these are outweighed by the pressures resulting from the unprecedented demand for affordable rented housing for those on low to average incomes unable to purchase under current market conditions.
Similarly, we acknowledge the trade-off between the capital receipts accruing from the sale of council housing and the ensuing benefits if this is used for investment, (notwithstanding the significant reduction in income to councils from this source in recent years) and the benefits if the housing stock continues to be available for renting in perpetuity. Given the significant costs of providing new build housing, we are firmly of the view that retaining rented stock in the social rented sector is the most social and economically beneficial option.

Q2. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

2.1 Given that the Right to Buy has been in existence for almost 35 years and availability is well known, ALACHO believes that a three year period before abolition of this provision is too long. We believe that most people wishing to buy will already have done so, and there is no particular merit in a three year time horizon. We would wish to see this replaced with a maximum 18 month time horizon.

Part 2: Social Housing

Q4. In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

4.1 ALACHO has consistently argued for increased flexibility for local authorities in the allocation of council housing, believing that this would facilitate the optimum use of housing and make a significant contribution to stable and sustainable communities. Although they do not go quite as far as would have liked, the provisions will certainly be of some assistance in pursuing this aim. Consequently, we broadly welcome the proposed changes set out in Sections 3-7 of the Bill. This includes the requirement for councils to consult on allocations policy priorities and publish reports on the outcome, which we believe many would do at present.

4.2 We particularly welcome, with appropriate equalities safeguards, removal of the prohibition on taking age into account in allocating property. Many social landlords believe this will permit more effective use of their housing stock e.g. through investing in particular blocks to better facilitate their use for older people.

4.3 We think it helpful that ownership of property can be taken into account in the allocation of council housing. Although not a frequent occurrence, this should address situations where applicants may be allocated scarce council housing, whilst owning and perhaps profiting from the rent on property elsewhere. That said, the provision (under Section 9) to allow the granting in certain situations of a short SST for homeowners is also helpful.

4.4 Under Section 7 we are happy to see clarification proposed on the circumstances in which an applicant may be suspended from receiving an offer, the setting of minimum suspension periods before an applicant in certain situations becomes eligible for the allocation of social housing, and the prescription by Scottish Ministers of maximum periods. We are content too with a new right of appeal for applicants affected by suspension periods.

4.5 We welcome (under Section 13) the change to a 12 month qualifying period before tenants are permitted to request a joint tenancy, assign or sublet tenancies, as some councils believe the existing rules are potentially open to abuse. The proposals to make it a requirement for (non spouse) partners, family members and carers to have live at a property for 12 months prior to succeeding to a tenancy are also welcome, as many types of council advise that this too may have been subject to manipulation.

Q5. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies (SSSTs) and Scottish secure tenancies (SSTs) provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

5.1 Yes, to some degree. The proposals in Sections 8-16 of the Bill propose changes to social housing tenancies and are intended at least in part to assist landlords in tackling anti-social behaviour. In common with local authorities, ALACHO welcomes any measures with the potential to reduce the significant adverse impact that anti-social behaviour has on our communities.

5.2 Under section 8, we welcome the increased flexibility to provide SSSTs (or convert existing SSTs to this form of tenancy) where applicants or existing tenants, or a member of their household, have a history of anti-social behaviour in the previous three years. This is likely to increase the resources needed to gather evidence in support of such action, but will still be broadly welcomed by tenants and landlords alike.

5.3 We welcome both the proposals at Section 10 and 11 of the Bill to extend the minimum period of a SSST granted for anti social behaviour from six to 12 months, and the proposal to allow for a further six months if more consideration is needed. With appropriate support for tenants, as required by the Bill, these proposals should provide landlords with some additional tools with which to tackle anti social behaviour, including additional time to ensure adequate support is given to tenants in the interests of sustaining tenancies.

5.4 We are also pleased to see under Section 15 of the Bill, a new requirement for a court to grant application for a possession order made within 12 months of a tenant’s conviction for using their home for illegal purposes, or for an offence in or near the property punishable by imprisonment. The latter will provide some reassurance to tenants and other residents that anti-social behaviour is being taken seriously by local and national government.
Initial Tenancies- A missed opportunity?

5.5 That said, ALACHO believes that a significant opportunity has been missed by not including in the Bill a provision to introduce initial (or “probationary”) tenancies, and we regret the fact that the Committee have not been given the opportunity to consider this provision. In stating that “opinion was divided around the proposal” the Policy Memorandum (PM) supporting the Bill may be somewhat misleading in its analysis of responses.

5.6 The PM correctly states that “tenants were very supportive” (64 tenants’ groups responded to the consultation, and leaving aside the 14 “don’t knows”, 92% of groups expressing a view were in favour, while only four groups were against the proposal at that stage). Undeniably social landlords have differing views on the proposal, with councils no exception. However, in concluding that there was “less support for such a move amongst landlords” the PM could have pointed out that of the 63 landlords expressing a firm view on the proposal (i.e. excluding 17 “don’t knows”) 76% (48) were in favour.

5.7 Together with the organised tenants’ movement, ALACHO believes that Initial Tenancies offer a good opportunity to help ensure that in the first year of a tenancy, tenants fully understand their rights and obligations under their tenancy agreement and are supported to comply with these. We believe that could help reduce anti-social behaviour, one of the original aims of the Bill. Evidence from elsewhere suggests that this can be achieved with a positive effect on tenancy sustainment and no increase in evictions, (the latter a particular concern voiced by those who successfully lobbied the Minister to remove this proposal from the Bill).

5.8 Tenants and landlords have some difficulty with the arguments presented by those opposed to this initiative, particularly the apparent conclusion that the rights of tenants affected by anti social behaviour are out weighed by those of the perpetrators, but also the assertion made by some that councils and RSLs would use the opportunity presented by ITs to evict tenants subject to Initial Tenancies without regard to due process.

5.9 In common with social housing tenants, we still believe that the proposal has merit, and would wish to see further consideration given to the potential benefits of initial tenancies. Tenants and landlords wish to see not only prevention of anti social behaviour, but speedy resolution when such behaviour does occur. Initial tenancies would enable both objectives to be satisfied, at least in relation to new tenancies.

Q6. Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government’s objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

6.1 ALACHO is content that the provisions in the Bill aimed at protecting tenants’ rights in light of potential tenancy changes are reasonable. Aside from the good practice we would expect councils to demonstrate, the Bill’s provisions will in any event require landlords to take account of relevant guidance and be explicit and transparent on the reasons for their actions in suspending applicants for a period of time, in granting an SSST rather than SST, or indeed seeking repossession of the former on the grounds of anti-social behaviour. Permitting the right of appeal or review for tenants is a fair corollary to these provisions.

6.2 Taken together the provisions should help encourage clear communication between landlords and tenants in such situations, and facilitate the use of appropriate support mechanisms to maximise the potential for tenancy sustainment.

Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

7.1 ALACHO welcomes the proposal to transfer certain matters relating to the private rented sector to a new Tribunal. Indeed, together with CIH and SFHA, we argued strongly that the Tribunal system, and the principles on which it is to be based could usefully be extended to the social rented sector. In particular, the non-adversarial style of Tribunals is also likely to be helpful to the decision making process.

7.2 Having expert practitioners making speedy and effective decisions on occasionally complex issues, which hitherto may have taken considerable time to resolve to the frustration of those concerned, could also be of considerable benefit to the social sector. Nonetheless we welcome the introduction of a Tribunal system for the private sector, and shall watch with interest to see how effective it proves to be in operation, and whether lessons may be learned for importation into the social sector in due course.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

8.1 ALACHO supports the proposed amendments to private rented sector legislation intended to enhance local authority discretionary powers to improve housing conditions in that sector. However our experience is that such powers of enforcement work best when backed with adequate resources, without which any new powers are likely to be of marginal impact. For example, many councils who have indicated their intention to use the new power to take third party applications to the PRHP on behalf of tenants, have said they can only do so subject to sufficient resources being made available.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?
9.1 In broad terms we welcome the provision of discretionary powers to target areas of poor condition in the private sector. However we would also restate the absolute necessity of backing powers with sufficient resources for implementation and enforcement, without which the hopes of local residents seeking much needed improvements to their neighbourhood may be raised in vain. The experience of ALACHO members suggests that effective approached to improvement in the private sector contain a mixture of “carrot and stick” elements i.e. advice information and assistance ( including financial assistance ) on the one hand, backed with firm sanctions for non-compliance on the other. We know that several councils have been lobbying for this measure to be introduced, and look forward to engaging with further consultation on the detail of the proposal in due course.

Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

10.1 ALACHO wholly supports the proposal to create a mandatory Register of Letting Agents in Scotland, together with measures to regulate practice in this area. We acknowledge that, with the growth in private renting, letting agents have come to play a much bigger role in that sector. Some letting agents play an important role in representing landlords and tenants interests through the setting and maintenance of decent quality standards for tenants. Sadly not all do so, and there is a pressing need to ensure that poorly performing agents are compelled to achieve minimum legal standards in letting and property management.

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

11.1 A prerequisite of any disputes resolution scheme is that it should be fair and equitable between both parties, but also have reference to the power distribution between the different parties concerned. It is essential therefore that tenants have access to the necessary information on their rights and responsibilities to hold letting agents (and landlords) accountable for the service they receive.

11.2 With these criteria in mind ALACHO notes that the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes will be based on a new Code of Practice, to be established by regulations following consultation with key industry stakeholders. The CoP will set out practice standards for letting agents, perceived breaches of which can be reported to the First Tier tribunal established - inter alia – to hear such cases, following which one outcome could be the serving of an enforcement notice on the letting agent . We are content that the proposed mechanism has the potential to improve the situation between letting agents and their customers through improving disputes resolution. The prior consultation which is proposed should help ensure fitness for purpose, and ALACHO will respond to this in due course.
Part 5: Mobile Home Sites with Permanent Residents

Q12. Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?

12.1 Within local authorities the main responsibility for dealing with mobile home sites and related matters lies with Environmental Health Officers and we are content to leave response to questions 12 & 13 to colleagues in this area with the relevant expertise. We are aware too that COSLA has responded to this issue in more detail.

Q13. What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

13.1 See response to Q12 above.

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

14.1 As local authorities are well aware, achieving the necessary consents and consensus to facilitate essential repair and improvement to common properties can be notoriously difficult. The recalcitrance of individual owners, landlords or factors can be a cause of frustration for local residents and councils, particularly the former, who are often disadvantaged by the failure to act, despite themselves being committed to carrying out the necessary improvement work. In general terms therefore ALACHO welcomes any measures designed to improve the likelihood of successful outcomes.

14.2 Councils appear to be ambivalent regarding amendments to the tenement management scheme (TMS) to make it easier for local authorities to pay missing shares for necessary repairs and recover costs. Some believe the facility to do this already exists within section 50 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006. However others believe amending the TMS in the manner proposed could, subject to proper owner notification, increase the scope of work for which it is possible to pay shares and recover costs. As outlined in the preceding paragraph, this is likely be welcomed, not least by those residents of a block affected by the refusal of certain parties to participate in improvement works.

14.3 Councils have generally given a cautious welcome to the other proposals in this section of the Bill, including enforcing security and safety improvements through the issue of work notices, and extending the use of repayment charges to include commercial premises with living accommodation above, and are having on-going discussions with counterparts in Scottish Government over the technicalities of implementation.
Part 7: Miscellaneous

Q16. Do you have any comments relation to the range of miscellaneous housing provisions set out in this part of the Bill?

16.1 ALACHO has no specific comments to make on the miscellaneous housing provisions of the Bill. All would seem to be justified on the grounds of increasing the effective operation of those elements of the housing system to which the miscellaneous legislative provisions relate.

Other Issues

Q17. Are there any other comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives or specific provisions?

We have no observations to make further to those articulated above,

Q18. Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

We have set out above three areas where we feel that Scottish Government should have given more consideration to proposals which were consulted upon but did not find their way into the Bill. These are the proposals for Initial Tenancies, the proposal to take income into account in the allocation of social housing, and the establishment of an independent Housing Tribunal for the social sector. Having covered these areas in some detail above we have nothing further to add at this point.

Right to Buy

We welcome the Scottish Government’s proposal to end the right to buy. Our members are very clear that the Right to Buy should end in the shortest possible timeframe.

We believe that the proposed three-year timeframe should be questioned and that the shortest practicable timeframe should be achieved, as an equilibrium between human rights issues and avoiding a spike in sales.

A decision on the timeframe for ending the right to buy should take evidence from previous local government experience, such as from assigning pressurised area status.

Unacceptable practice in the private rented sector and mobile homes parks

We welcome increasing local government powers to intervene where there is unacceptable practice in the private rented sector and mobile homes parks. We have been an active part of the policy development process and are content with the proposals put forward so far.

We believe that a fit and proper person test for mobile homes park owners, similar to the current landlord registration regime, and an improvement of the site licensing regime, is a sensible and proportionate way forward, to protect mobile home owners from unacceptable practice. It is setting new national standards while allowing enough local flexibility to concentrate resources where they are most needed. As always, the success of enforcement is dependent on adequate resources available for enforcement action.

We are aware that the fact that mobile home site legislation does not cover holiday parks and that there is a risk that unscrupulous site owners resort to holiday parks. This needs to be addressed separately.

We welcome a new local government powers to intervene with unscrupulous landlords in the private rented sector, through third party reporting and special area status. We are looking forward to seeing more detailed proposals from the Scottish Government and understand that these will be forthcoming during Stage 2 of the bill process. We have been actively participating in the development of proposals and hope that they will not be watered down, so as to allow local authorities to effectively deal with unscrupulous landlords.

With regard to Third Party Reporting, we welcome this as a dedicated tool to be used by Local Authorities in special circumstances. A widespread expectation that local authorities take forward cases on behalf of tenants would have a considerable impact on resources.
Housing allocation and Initial Tenancies

COSLA is disappointed that provision for initial tenancies was not included in the Bill.

Initial tenancies are seen by many housing professionals as a missed opportunity, and they had considerable extent of tenant support. They are seen not as a means not to ease evictions, but as an effective means of early intervention and prevention, and as a tool for local authorities to establish early contact with problematic tenants. We are very keen that this proposal from the initial Scottish Government Consultation is being explored in the formal political process.

With regard to taking age into consideration when allocating tenancies, local authorities see this as a useful tool to make sensible use of public resources. It is not intended to be in any way discriminatory. Equally, we believe that local authorities should be able to take income into consideration.

It would have been prudent to change the right to assign from being a tenant's right to a landlord's power to allow assignation where this fitted with the best use of stock. The inclusion of stronger grounds for refusal based on the lack of housing need are however welcomed.

With regards to the wider issues of ASB and tenancy allocation, councils are still experiencing considerable problems where convicted persons are not the tenancy holder, where ABS is of a low level nature and in mid market rent.

Dispute resolution and Housing Tribunals

COSLA is disappointed that earlier proposals for more effective arrangements for dispute resolution through a Housing Tribunal for the social rented sector have been dropped by the Scottish Government. As with the initial tenancies, this proposal received support in the Scottish Government’s own consultation and should have been more fully explored. We understand that the Government has decided to ‘test’ this model for the private rented sector, but maintain that a more effective way of dealing with the social rented sector is still badly needed.

Financial considerations

COSLA is clear that any new local government activity needs to be cost neutral to local government, unless new resources are made available. We are aware that the bill is designed in such a way as to ensure cost-neutrality. This will mostly be achieved through a charging regime for licensing etc. It is important that this remains the case, and that we don’t find ourselves with sudden new proposals, which divert resources away from other vital functions, without full and proper consideration of the consequences.

Housing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Item 2 is evidence from representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers on the Housing (Scotland) Bill. This is the last stakeholder evidence session before the committee hears oral evidence from the Minister for Housing and Welfare next week.

I welcome from COSLA Councillor Harry McGuigan, spokesperson for community wellbeing and safety; Silke Isbrand, policy manager from the community resourcing team, housing; and David Brewster, senior environmental health officer. I also welcome Jim Hayton from South Lanarkshire Council and Tony Cain from Stirling Council, who are representing ALACHO. Patrick Harvie, who has joined us for the session, is welcome, too.

Adam Ingram (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP): Good morning, lady and gentlemen. The Scottish Government’s declared vision for housing is

“that all people in Scotland live in high-quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs.”

To what extent does the bill support that vision?

Councillor Harry McGuigan (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): The committee will excuse me if I say a wee introductory piece that might help to clarify where we are coming from. I will then deal with the detail of the question, if that is required.

We are pleased to have and appreciate the opportunity to, we hope, help the committee in its deliberations during stage 1 scrutiny of the bill. The COSLA, ALACHO and environmental health teams that are here this morning are anxious to ensure that local government analysis of the bill is presented with clarity and objectivity.

My executive group at COSLA has followed and engaged in the process of preparing for the bill since early last year. The process that was undertaken before the bill was introduced invited and secured wide consultation from a host of stakeholders on particular issues that are relevant to a broad spectrum of housing matters.

The issues that the bill covers were identified, examined and fleshed out during the consultation process, subsequent to which the bill was drafted. We think that an effective, collegiate and productive way of working has been used. COSLA and other stakeholders have engaged fully and have made formal submissions to the relevant Scottish Government consultation process.
There is much in the bill that we believe to be very positive, but there are some omissions, which we feel should be raised and highlighted rather than becoming missed opportunities to address pertinent issues that are faced with increasing and frustrating regularity by housing stakeholders. Those omissions need to be addressed.

I thank the committee for allowing us to come here today. I believe that this is your penultimate evidence-taking session on the bill, and it allows us to comment on some of the other submissions that have been made.

In response to your question, the provisions in the bill on the general housing issues are sound and are consistent with what we have been working for in local government and COSLA, along with stakeholders, for a long time. We want to continue to make that happen in a productive and useful way.

Do you wish to ask us about any specifics in relation to that?

Adam Ingram: My colleagues will certainly follow up on that. Does anyone else care to comment on how well the bill’s provisions promote the Scottish Government’s vision for housing?

Jim Hayton (Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers): Before answering that question, I say for the record that I no longer work for South Lanarkshire Council. I did until a few years ago; for the past couple of years, I have been fully employed as a policy adviser to the local authority chief housing officers.

I beg your indulgence and ask you to repeat the terms of the vision to which you referred.

Adam Ingram: Surely. It is “that all people in Scotland live in high-quality, sustainable homes that they can afford and that meet their needs.”

Jim Hayton: In common with COSLA, ALACHO, in its response to the consultation, gave a broad welcome to the terms of the bill. In essence, it is about existing houses, the way in which they are allocated and some of the issues that affect the people who live in them—with the possible exception of the proposed abolition of the right to buy. In common with many other organisations, ALACHO has welcomed that as a measure to increase the supply of affordable housing, which we view as the major pressing issue in Scottish housing today.

There is a fair bit in the bill that will help to achieve the vision, not just in the social sector but also in the private sector, particularly the private rented sector, which presents many pressing challenges. The bill helpfully sets out some measures and provisions that will help us to improve the situation in that sector. ALACHO gives the bill a broad welcome.

Tony Cain (Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers): I make a simple observation about the vision: in so far as it goes, nobody would argue with it. The major policy gap at the highest level—at United Kingdom level and Scottish level—seems to be a detailed articulation of what a stable and properly functioning housing system looks like and of what policy actions are required to ensure that it remains stable in the longer term. In particular, that means directly answering the questions of what we mean by the term “affordable” and what an appropriate balance in tenure mix ought to be across the system.

Adam Ingram: I am sure that some of my colleagues will get into more of the detail.

I note from your opening remarks, Councillor McGuigan, that you appear to be content with the consultation process that the Government adopted for the bill. Does anyone have any issues with that consultation, or are you quite happy with it?

Councillor McGuigan: We think that that is the correct way to work, rather than having a situation in which issues emerge in the bill; that could delay the process and cause considerable frustration.

Consultation is the best way to work. We have asked for that approach to be taken with regard to some of our work with the Scottish Government, and the dividends that we are seeing are good.

Jim Hayton: From ALACHO’s point of view, prior to the bill there were several strands of consultation on the right to buy and the options around that. There was a lot of detailed consultation on potential changes to housing allocation systems—a big group of about 15 interested parties looked at the options there. There was detailed consultation on the proposal to have a housing tribunal for dispute resolution. Last but not least, there was detailed consultation on measures for the private rented sector.

It was very helpful to have all that done in the past year and a bit. We did not get everything that we sought out of the consultation. I have set out in our submission areas in which we think that the bill could have gone further. The committee may wish to question us about that later. However, in broad terms, as we point out in our submission, we were pleased with the format of the consultation and its inclusive manner.

The Convener: We move on to specific sections. Alex Johnstone has some questions on the right to buy.

Alex Johnstone (North East Scotland) (Con): You have all made it clear that you are in favour of the abolition of the right to buy. What benefits do you see that bringing to social landlords and their tenants?

Councillor McGuigan: We think that the abolition of the right to buy is absolutely necessary if we are to be able to meet the requirements and demands for housing in our communities. We feel that the timescale for that—the bill proposes three years—can and should be shortened to a more reasonable length. There is some nervousness that the timescale could result in a gallop towards homes being purchased before the deadline. However, there is no evidence that that happened when right to buy was abolished in relation to pressured area status.

We welcome the abolition of the right to buy. We have to find a balance between the European convention on human rights and the desperate need in our communities for affordable social housing.

Jim Hayton: As with almost all aspects of housing policy, the right to buy is a decision about competing priorities. There are some difficult decisions to be made. As we said in our submission, we fully acknowledge that there are trade-offs there. Many people in Scotland—perhaps the majority—still have legitimate aspirations to home ownership, but that has to be balanced against what we see as some fairly pressing needs on the affordable housing side. From memory, I think that Scottish Government statistics record that there are about 140,000 people on waiting lists.

We came to our view by weighing up the pros and cons of retention versus abolition of the right to buy and concluded that, in the current climate, having available in perpetuity a supply of affordable rented housing that would otherwise be lost to the sector outweighed the legitimate aspirations of some people—going by sales in the past few years, a significantly reduced number of people—to owner occupation. We think that that was a rational decision, based on an assessment of the competing priorities.

Tony Cain: In terms of the operation and strategic planning of the provision of housing services, one of the key issues with the right to buy is that it makes it almost impossible in the longer term to be clear about the asset base and the long-term income streams that are available in managing that stock and developing services. In particular, with regard to meeting housing needs in rural communities, if people cannot be certain that the provision that they have put in place today will still be there in 10 years’ time, they cannot be certain that they will be able to meet those needs in the longer term.

There are settlements in my area in which, 20 years ago, I would have argued very clearly that we had met the housing need and that there was a sufficient supply of affordable rented housing. That supply is now almost entirely eroded and it will be difficult to go back into those rural communities and find suitable sites for the provision of additional affordable housing. As long as the right to buy remains in place, there is a substantial issue with regard to long-term strategic planning for investment stock and meeting housing needs.

Alex Johnstone: Jim Hayton said that abolishing the right to buy would increase the supply of affordable housing, but in reality the people who tend to buy their council houses would tend to remain as long-term tenants anyway. For every 100 people who are denied the right to buy when they want to, a very small proportion—perhaps as few as 1 or 2 per cent—would be likely to vacate the property as an alternative to buying it. Abolishing the right to buy would not therefore free up much property in the first instance, would it?

Jim Hayton: Our analysis is a wee bit different: we contend that abolition would free up significantly more than 1 or 2 per cent of properties.

Alex Johnstone: Are you suggesting that people who would wish to buy their properties will, once they are denied that right, vacate the houses that they currently occupy?

Jim Hayton: They may do, depending on the state of the housing market and how strong their aspiration is. Several things are affecting the right to buy, not least the significant change in the past few years in the discount provisions, which has resulted in demand tailing off significantly. We took those factors into account and concluded that in a majority of authorities—although, as with most things, there would be some differences—the advantages would lie in abolishing the right to buy.

Alex Johnstone: You see the effects on the affordable housing supply as long term rather than short term.

Jim Hayton: Yes.

Alex Johnstone: Does anyone else have a view, or a different view, on that point?

Councillor McGuigan: There are many people in our country who opposed the right to buy at the outset because—as we stated clearly and categorically—only certain types of property would be bought. We now find ourselves in a situation in which people who bought their homes through the right to buy are indeed moving into other homes and using the ex-council house for collateral. In our view that creates a situation that is grossly unfair, because stock that would have been available for ordinary people who cannot afford to buy their own home has been lost and is simply being taken over by people who can afford to buy it. That is a dangerous precedent to set in our country.

Alex Johnstone: There is plenty of statistical evidence that suggests that the right-to-buy policy was withering on the vine in Scotland and that the numbers in recent years are a tiny fraction of what they were at their peak. I believe that fewer than 1,000 houses a year are now being bought by their tenants.

The proposal to abolish that right is, ironically, likely to cause a spike in the number of tenants who take up the right to buy. We heard anecdotal evidence from a housing association representative at our meeting in Dumbarton last week that there had been a significant increase in the number of applications and expressions of interest that had been received. Statistical evidence has also appeared in the past week that shows that the number of expressions of interest is already 50 per cent up on what it was at the same stage in recent years.

By proposing the abolition of right to buy, are we making the problem worse rather than better? Will we lose a large section of our available affordable housing stock in the process of ending the right to buy?

Councillor McGuigan: It is interesting that you say that the information is current and has come out just this week. We would say that there is no strong evidence that there is a housing spike and that people are rushing to buy before a particular deadline.

In my opening statement, I mentioned the removal of the right to buy from areas with pressured area status. The spikes did not materialise in that situation as many people thought they would. I can say only that the information that we have does not concur with the information that you have.

Alex Johnstone: So you feel that there is no danger that we will see teams of young men going into council estates, knocking on doors and offering to lend people the money to buy their property while the opportunity is still there, which is what happened in the housing market in the past?

Councillor McGuigan: We would certainly hope that that does not happen.

Alex Johnstone: I, too, would hope that it does not happen. However, I have grave concerns that, by moving to abolish the right to buy, we are accelerating all that is negative about it in an attempt to prevent all that is positive about it.

Councillor McGuigan: No, I do not think that we are. We are sending out a clear message about the priorities that we are addressing in our communities, where there is a desperate need for affordable housing for people to rent. That is what we are aiming to do.

You will have people coming to your surgery who are in dreadful situations, and that misery has to be dealt with. We have to maximise the housing resources that will be available for use. We have to build more houses too, but abolishing the right to buy is an important step in the right direction. I do not think for a minute that we will see teams of people going round housing estates chapping on doors and asking people to buy their houses—that is a dramatisation of the reality.

Alex Johnstone: A dramatisation is potentially what I am talking about. I am looking into the future to see what would happen, and my concern is that, although by ending the right to buy in this way at this time we may be saving 20 or 30 houses throughout Scotland to be re-let in any one year, we may in doing so see 10,000 houses sold to their occupiers.

Councillor McGuigan: No, I do not think so.

Tony Cain: With regard to strategic planning in public sector housing, we manage our stock and investment over a 30-year period, and we are currently planning—or assuming—that we will sell something over 10 per cent of our total stock over that time under the right-to-buy policy at the current levels of sales. It may well be more than that, depending on how the mortgage market and other things change.

It is possible—although we cannot predict what will happen—that there may be a rise in right-to-buy sales in the next 18 months to two years or however long the sunset clause is for the right to buy. However, it is preferable as a way of extracting ourselves from a policy position that has definitely had its day—whatever its relative merits were in 1980—to take the risk and go through that process to get to a place where it is possible for us to plan the provision of housing over the long term.

Alex Johnstone’s point about buyers not necessarily moving on immediately is fair. However, it is clear that something up to a third of all the properties that have been sold under the right to buy are now in the private rented sector and that the right to buy is, in the longer term, driving the growth of lower-quality private renting in many already pressured communities, which is problematic.

Silke Isbrand (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): We are all aware that there has very recently been information in the press about an anticipated 50 per cent spike in sales. However, we have been following the issue for quite a while—Councillor McGuigan has outlined our mechanisms, such as the executive and task groups. Only a couple of days ago I received evidence from Perth and Kinross Council that there is no expected spike or rise in sales, and we also have the evidence from the move to pressured area status. The evidence that we have certainly contradicts what has been in the press only a couple of days ago.

The Convener: Where do you think that the press might have got the idea that there is a spike?

Silke Isbrand: I do not know.

Councillor McGuigan: We do not think that that idea can be substantiated. Alex Johnstone says that it is profitable for gangs to go round chapping on doors and asking people to buy, saying, “We’ll provide the money,” and so on. Of course it is: that happens and will continue to happen right up until the moment that the legislation is approved. However, it is wrong that it should be happening and that there are situations in which a landlord can buy up to three, four or five ex-council houses in North Lanarkshire. There is something seriously flawed in accepting that as good, sensible housing policy. It is an abuse, in capital letters. Tenants are not only buying their own home, but arrangements are made whereby in certain circumstances an individual can buy their auntie’s or mother’s house. We should tackle those things directly, and with fierceness.

Alex Johnstone: One other issue that I need to ask about and which you have not covered is the three-year period, which was mentioned earlier. What is your view on that and on how we could do things differently without contravening the human rights of individuals?

Councillor McGuigan: That has to be looked at in the light of trying to find a balanced position between the rights of an individual and our need to retain and grow an affordable housing stock. As far as pressured area status is concerned, there were no ECHR referrals at all. If we handle the matter properly—and with sensitivity, because some people will face disappointment—and in a sensible timescale that tries to find that balance, we think that it will be manageable. That is the right way to go about it.

David Brewster (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): Councillor McGuigan has highlighted the number of ex-local authority houses that become private rented houses. It would be fair to look at it the other way and say that a lot of the private sector homes are ex-local authority. That brings with it the variable standards of management that we know about in the private rented sector. Where benefits are involved, there is evidence to suggest that we are paying out more in benefits where the same homes are in the private rented sector than we would have been when they were local authority or housing association homes.

The other practical thing that local authorities have to deal with is situations in which parts of buildings have been sold as private homes. In such cases, maintenance becomes considerably more complicated, and that was never considered in the original right to buy.

The Convener: Mary Fee has some questions on social housing.

Mary Fee (West Scotland) (Lab): Provisions in part 2 of the bill are aimed at increasing social landlords’ flexibility in allocating housing. They also make changes to reasonable preferences. Do you think that the changes proposed are the right changes, and what impact do you think they will have?

Jim Hayton: Our response to the consultation states explicitly that we broadly welcome the proposed changes. We are not certain that most of them will make a huge amount of difference, but they are adjustments to the system that should be helpful. That includes amending the reasonable preference category, which is a relatively minor change that adds underoccupying tenants to the existing categories, but it is helpful nonetheless.

Some of the other proposals are also welcome, such as the new duty on local authorities and RSLs to consult applicants and tenants. Being able to take age into account when allocating social housing is something that councils particularly welcome, as they have thought for some time that that is a commonsense change to the current arrangements that will enable councils to make decisions that help to promote sustainable communities. For example, they could designate certain blocks as suitable for older people and invest in the infrastructure and support services required to adapt the block and make it suitable for that group.

We fully accept that change needs to come with some safeguards about people’s rights, and we think that that can be done. We argued strongly that the ownership of property should be taken into account. It is not a frequent occurrence, but it does sometimes happen that people are allocated social housing when they already own a house. In the past there was limited latitude for councils to do anything about that, and the bill helps with that. Equally, there is provision elsewhere that allows us to grant a short tenancy to owners, to tide them over in certain situations where they may be trying to sell a house.

The other provisions relate to suspensions, and we are not at all unhappy about the Government clarifying that. We would be happy to work with Government on the guidance and regulations that may support that. Suspension can happen in situations where applicants may have committed some antisocial behaviour or criminal offence in the past, and councils will want to ensure that there is time for people to reflect on the consequences before they are allocated housing. In broad terms, however, we are content with that too.

I guess that the answer to the question is that, in broad terms, we welcome the provisions and are happy to think about the guidance and regulation that will be needed to bring them into effect.

Councillor McGuigan: Just to add to that, it is very important that local authorities and registered social landlords are able to manage their housing stock in a way that is best suited to and well understood by the local communities. If special types of circumstances arise, it is grossly unfair if they are not recognised and given credence because an allocation policy is riveted in a certain fashion. We believe that subject to special cases, including age and income—that is another matter that we feel should be considered—we should be able to have the flexibility to manage our housing stock in the best possible way for all of the community. It is not about discriminating on the basis of age or anything else.

Jim Hayton: Quite sensibly in our view, a lot of the provisions come with the right of review or appeal for anyone who might feel aggrieved by them. We are more than happy to have such a provision as a safeguard and are content to work with the Government on how it would be implemented in practice.

Tony Cain: I just want to make a simple observation. The provisions strike me as a sensible modernisation of the law as it stands on the issues. The one point that I would make is in relation to taking into account the existing ownership of a property. I have regular conversations with tenants and applicants who do not understand why we would allocate a house to a home owner. They generally assume that we have done so either by mistake or because we have been duped. That impacts on the credibility of our allocation processes.

In any event, the practice results in an inefficient use of the overall stock and resources. We make landlords of tenants. In Stirling, about five or six owners a year, principally older ones, will be allocated a council house and will be left with their own property as well. It might not be a large number, but it is obvious and visible in the communities and it impacts on the credibility of the way in which we manage our stock.

Mary Fee: Mr Hayton raised the issue of age. The bill will allow social landlords to take that into account. We have heard varying views both supporting and opposing that change. For example, Shelter and the Govan Law Centre are not supportive of the change, but the Chartered Institute of Housing thinks that it would be a useful measure. Shelter said in evidence:

“The fundamental principle of social housing allocation should be that it is based on a framework of need and ... circumstances”.—[Official Report, Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, 22 January 2014; c 2436.]

I take it from your comments, Mr Hayton, that you do not agree with that and that you are quite happy with the proposals.

Jim Hayton: Yes, I do not agree with that. Shelter does not manage social housing and does not necessarily have to deal with the fall-out when people perceive that councils have made decisions that are not in the interests of the folk who live in a particular block, for example. Councils would absolutely accept that the principle should be based on need; but that should not involve following a set of rules blindly without regard to the make-up of a community and what is likely to lead to sustainability and peaceful coexistence rather than the creation of friction. It is not social engineering; it is about allowing landlords to make sensible decisions in the interests of a sustainable community life. For that reason I would disagree with Shelter’s view.

Mary Fee: Does anyone else want to comment on that?

Tony Cain: My observation is that, in preparing and approving allocation policies, local authorities are also required to prepare equalities impact assessments. To the extent that we are accountable for the EIAs through the statements and the challenges that can be made around them, the risk of discrimination is minimised.

Mary Fee: And of course social landlords have to justify objectively how they are allocating. Is that quite easy to do? Are there enough safeguards in that for you?

Tony Cain: Yes.

Jim Hayton: Yes.

Councillor McGuigan: Yes.

Mary Fee: Okay. That is a straightforward answer.

Jim Hayton: We would always expect to be accountable. I absolutely accept the right of organisations such as Shelter to hold us accountable. If they thought in future that there were instances when local authorities had been discriminatory, we would expect to be asked about them and to have to justify our decisions on commonsense, sustainable community grounds. We would be happy to do that when the time comes.

Councillor McGuigan: For example, if we allocated to a family with four children a house in, say, a block of flats that had only one stairwell and which already housed 12 children among the families who lived there, that would be problematic. We need to manage the stock in a way that is sensitive to the needs of all the people who live in the estate, and sometimes it makes sense to say, “Look—we can allocate this house in a different fashion.” It is not a matter of discriminating against anyone. Would you agree with that, Jim?

Jim Hayton: Yes.

Mary Fee: At our recent Parliament day event in Dumbarton, tenants and tenants groups told us that they would like to become more involved in the letting process and, indeed, the council’s decision-making processes. Do you think that that would be a good thing? Should they become more involved?

Councillor McGuigan: Yes. I think that people and communities should become more involved in the decision-making processes that affect their lives. We welcome such involvement and try to engage constructively with tenants, residents associations and so on to ensure that their voices and ideas are heard. After all, they are the experts in their own communities. I am therefore 100 per cent behind that suggestion.

However, we also have to be a wee bit careful that we do not simply assume that everyone or every organisation that presents itself as the spokesagency, if you like, for a locality represents that locality. As you will have seen— and as I certainly have seen—it is very often a small clutch of people who purport to represent a whole area. They are well intentioned, but sometimes they, too, miss the point.

That said, I certainly want greater integration between the communities and the decisions that affect their lives. I think that we can work towards that aim—indeed, we are doing so—and that provisions in the bill will assist us in that respect.

Mary Fee: Do you think that the more involved local communities and tenants are, the less likely you are to have problems with flexibility, allocations and the age stuff?

Councillor McGuigan: We run a better chance of making people feel comfortable if they know why things happen and if such information is shared fully with them. We will also create more confident localities and neighbourhoods. That is the kind of subsidiarity that I like and for which I have campaigned all my political career.

Jim Hayton: I broadly agree that tenants and residents should be involved in the formulation of the policy; indeed, as has been pointed out, there is a new duty to consult applicants and tenants when reviewing allocation policies. That is the best place for tenants to be involved. I do not think that anyone is suggesting that we allow panels of tenants to decide who should be allocated housing; there needs to be a balance, but tenants should certainly be involved in decisions on allocation policies and in looking at their area’s local needs and helping to decide priorities very much within the constraints of the existing legislation.

Mary Fee: Thank you.

The Convener: Mark Griffin has some questions on tenancy changes.

Mark Griffin (Central Scotland) (Lab): The bill makes some changes to the qualifying period for joint tenancies, subletting, assignations and successions. In its written submission, COSLA has said that it would prefer the power to assign to be given to the social landlord instead of its remaining a tenant’s right. Do you agree with the changes to the qualifying periods and have you any other comments about the section in question?

Councillor McGuigan: I will answer the question directly and then ask Jim Hayton and Tony Cain to provide some more detail.

We feel strongly that the subletting and assigning of tenancies should be the business of the landlord, not the tenant. In other words, the right of assignation should shift to the landlord. As a member of the same local authority as me, Mr Griffin, you will have seen some very clever abuses of that very situation, with assignations being carried out in a way that is anything but consistent with fairness in the allocation of property.

Jim Hayton: Yes, I broadly agree with that. ALACHO was one of the groups that argued that landlords should have the power to make such decisions rather than assignation being a right of the tenant, but we are happy with the halfway house of extending the qualifying periods—essentially, for the reason that Harry McGuigan outlined and indeed for the reason that Tony Cain mentioned earlier about the credibility of the process.

Every single housing manager could tell stories about perceptions of abuse of the system, where someone has moved into a house and has claimed to have been living there for some time in order to succeed to the tenancy or where tenants decide to assign the tenancy to someone who almost certainly would not have been allocated that house on the basis of housing need.
Although the changes have not perhaps gone entirely the way that ALACHO would have liked, we think that they are a good move in the right direction and we support them.

Mark Griffin: Are you able to talk about any of the problems that councils have had when tackling and trying to solve problems with tenants’ antisocial behaviour, including any problems that councils have had with the use of short Scottish secure tenancies and any court action where councils have sought to evict tenants?

Councillor McGuigan: One of the big disappointments for COSLA in the bill relates to initial tenancies—some people call them probationary tenancies, but they are initial tenancies. Initial tenancies are useful and they should not be interpreted as being an attempt to make it easier to evict tenants for antisocial behaviour or for other reasons. We feel that initial tenancies provide us with a tremendous opportunity to help new tenants to understand what their responsibilities and rights are and to work with us as a group to ensure that we can minimise the likelihood of antisocial behaviour developing.

As far as initial tenancies are concerned, Jim Hayton may come in on the more general point about antisocial behaviour and what tools we have. I think that we have to look more deeply at the tools that we currently have and bring in more innovative means to deal with the issue.

A good approach is being adopted in North Lanarkshire at the moment in areas where the housing stock has unattractive features and there are stories about antisocial behaviour and so on that mean that people do not want to be housed there. Instead of allocating a house to an individual, who moves into such an area and immediately has the perception that they are vulnerable and on their own, there has been a move towards allocating collectively, with maybe four or five families going into a particular block or a particular area at a particular time.

Those four or five families have had the opportunity to meet and talk to one another and to get a feel for the aspirations that they each have for the new houses that they are moving into. That provides a degree of security and confidence as they move in. We find that people are moving into the houses and they are not retreating in the face of some of the bad practices that happen in the area. That is a particular example of what might be a good innovative practice. It is only being experimented with at the moment, but that is the kind of thing that we need to build on.

Jim Hayton: I have spent more than 30 years working in housing, and dealing with antisocial behaviour is probably the most intractable housing management problem that housing managers face. It is a huge issue for tenants. I have not read the Official Report of the committee’s meeting in Dumbarton last week, but I would be very surprised if antisocial behaviour did not figure largely on tenants’ agendas too. I guess that what is behind Mr Griffin’s question is the extent to which the bill will help landlords to deal with that problem.

There are some welcome measures that will help landlords to deal with substantive elements of the behaviour and that will go some way to convince tenants that landlords are not completely without power and therefore credibility in the area. A frequent criticism that councils and RSLs face is that we are unable to deal with such problems when they emerge and that the court system takes far too long to sort out problems for people. Some tenants say that they have lived with serious antisocial behaviour for three years or more.

Therefore, we welcome some of the provisions in the bill. However, on the surface, other provisions look as though they will make our lives a wee bit more difficult. An example is the increase in the minimum term of an SSST that is granted for antisocial behaviour from six to 12 months. If a person has a short tenancy because of previous antisocial behaviour and they persist with that behaviour, neighbours will have to put up with it for 12 months, rather than six. So there are disadvantages, although there are measures to balance that.

We very much welcome the new requirement for courts to grant an application for a possession order that is made within 12 months of a tenant’s conviction. Unfortunately, some people have suggested that that is an open door for councils to evict people willy-nilly for things such as dropping litter or playing football on the street. We are not talking about that, and nothing could be further from the truth; we are talking about serious criminal or antisocial behaviour. It could be someone who has been dealing drugs and causing all kinds of problems for years and has then been convicted. Is anyone seriously suggesting that councils should reinstate that person or allow them to continue to live in the tenancy, and that they just need some support? When that happens, councils lose all credibility with tenants.

With the proper safeguards and the right guidance and regulation, that kind of measure will be helpful to landlords in dealing with antisocial behaviour. To the extent that the bill contains such measures, we welcome it.
Silke Isbrand: The topic of antisocial behaviour always features strongly at meetings of the cross-party elected member task group that, as Councillor McGuigan outlined, we set up specifically to consider the bill. The general feeling of the group is that the proposed changes are a useful addition to the local authority toolkit. However, local authorities are still struggling with a number of issues. There are mixed-tenure blocks where antisocial behaviour arises from private properties, which links to the discussion that we had earlier about the right to buy. There is recurring low-level antisocial behaviour. The problems are different across the spectrum.

The general feeling is that the proposals in the bill are welcome but that the problem will not go away as a result of those proposals, so we need to continue to look at the issue. We need innovative practices as much as other methods. As Councillor McGuigan said, initial tenancies are a key issue. Another key issue is our disappointment, which we expressed in our written submission, about the fact that the bill does not introduce a housing tribunal for the social rented sector.

The Convener: We will come on to that.

Mark Griffin: When the committee has raised the concerns about the increase in the minimum period of short SSTs from six months to 12 months, we have been told that many people who engage in antisocial behaviour have underlying issues, such as mental health issues or learning difficulties, or just living in a highly stressed environment. Alternatively, it could be only one individual in a household who is carrying out antisocial behaviour, rather than the whole household. Does the use of short SSTs sometimes exacerbate the situation and make things worse, which would mean that, actually, the move from six months to 12 months is welcome in those circumstances?

Councillor McGuigan: The short-term tenancy can be used effectively, but I do not know whether the evidence suggests that it would be more helpful to have a 12-month tenancy. We use the arrangements to ensure that people with mental health problems are supported; indeed, it is well understood that support is provided in that regard. However, a worrying issue relates to antisocial behaviour that is caused by other residents in the house as opposed to the tenant. We must make it absolutely clear to the tenant that they have and must accept some responsibility for the conduct of others in the home. I will let Jim Hayton speak to the detail.

Jim Hayton: As I said in response to a previous question, a short-term tenancy can be a mixed blessing. If there are issues that the council or agency can genuinely work with, a longer period could be helpful to make sure that a person gets the necessary support.

We have a particular issue with co-ordinating services for people who might be in need of support, so some of us have high hopes for the new health and social care partnerships that are coming in next year. In our profession, we sometimes feel that housing is left to deal with people’s problems that may have wider roots beyond those related to their housing problems. You mentioned some of those problems, which include substance abuse or health or mental health problems. We have high hopes that better-integrated working with our colleagues in health and social care could ensure that the support that people get is holistic and genuinely helpful in sorting out their problems. However, if the behaviour is intractable and continuing, we must accept the possibility that the extension from six to 12-month tenancies would work against rather than for us.

Mark Griffin: What are your views on the proposals to simplify the eviction process in cases of antisocial behaviour? Is there potential for tenants to be continually moved around the housing stock in a local authority area, leading to cycles of antisocial behaviour in different places, rather than addressing the problem?

Councillor McGuigan: Simplification is not something that we would accept as far as antisocial behaviour is concerned. Antisocial behaviour is a problem that we try very hard to deal with. The idea that any of the proposals that we are arguing for, such as initial tenancies, are being put forward because we feel that we need to be able to evict people more easily is a nonsense. We must continue to work with people in the situation that they are in. If we cannot find solutions to that situation, there must be interventions. Silke Isbrand talked about that with regard to the toolkit. An examination must take place of what other ways there are to enable us to deal with the antisocial behaviour scourge because it destroys lives—you know that and I know that. Jim, do you have anything to say?

Jim Hayton: I have nothing to add to that. Tony, do you want to say anything?

Tony Cain: I will say something about the credibility of the management function. Communities have a reasonable expectation that people will be held accountable for their actions. It is very difficult to remove from a home people who are perpetrating acts of antisocial behaviour, but our failure to deliver a response impacts directly on our credibility as a landlord and people’s view of and willingness to engage in that process. If there are no outcomes and problems are not dealt with, people will simply stop reporting issues and withdraw from being prepared to give evidence and assist in tackling the problems. The ability to remove individuals whose behaviour is, in the end, beyond the pale, make them accountable for that behaviour and demonstrate that to their neighbours is a critical part of the process.

If we then need to engage with that individual in another context to assist them in improving and managing their behaviour—their drinking or their drug abuse—so that they can move on to a more stable environment, we need to do that, too. The answer is not to leave them where they are while you try to come up with solutions to the other problems. In some circumstances the answer must be that you have to remove people and then move on from there. A consequence must be demonstrated.

Councillor McGuigan: You might be going to ask about tribunals, which have been mentioned. We are disappointed that there will be housing tribunals only for the private sector. We think that the bill represents an opportunity to identify a problem early and to start the work that needs to be done to solve that problem at an earlier stage and thereby avoid the long, drawn-out court processes that we have to go through at the moment. We hope that lessons will be learned from the private sector that can be applied to the social sector.

Mark Griffin: I will come on to that but, before I do, is there anything else that could be included in the bill to address antisocial behaviour and its root causes?

Jim Hayton: The point has already been made: in the council sector, in particular, we strongly believe that the bill has missed an opportunity to bring in initial tenancies. I do not know whether the committee was going to come on to that.

The evidence from south of the border suggests that initial tenancies are successful, that they are a valuable tool in the toolkit, that they do not increase evictions and that they allow landlords to engage with tenants in the critical first year of a tenancy to emphasise that a secure tenancy is a valuable currency. At the same time, initial tenancies provide a meaningful sanction; they say to tenants, “This is a valuable commodity, but it involves expectations of behaviour on both sides. The landlord has obligations, but you have obligations, too, both to the dwelling and to your neighbours.”

Although initial tenancies would not have been a panacea or a silver bullet, they would have been a valuable addition to our toolkit. We were very disappointed that the minister decided not to include provisions on initial tenancies in the bill, as that means that we will not have the chance to consider them. We still think that it would be worth having a look at the evidence. Initial tenancies will not solve antisocial behaviour, but they might go some way to helping to prevent it and to mitigating the consequences of it in future.

Councillor McGuigan: It is also worth saying that some of the evidence that was submitted was clearly along the lines that Jim Hayton highlighted, so it is difficult to understand why the Government decided not to proceed with initial tenancies. The evidence—certainly that from tenants organisations—was overwhelmingly in favour of proceeding with them. The issue might need to be looked at again. Questions should be asked about why it was decided not to proceed with initial tenancies on the basis of a minority view from some quarters.

Mark Griffin: The transferring of social rented sector cases to the tribunal, along similar lines to what has been proposed for the private sector, has been raised repeatedly by witnesses. The Scottish Government has said that, because of the court reforms that are going through, increased use will be made of mediation, which will create the potential for improved outcomes for cases that go through the courts. Do you think that that is enough, or do you still support a move to the use of tribunals, as has been proposed for the private sector?

Councillor McGuigan: We do not think that that is enough. We think that we should proceed with tribunals. The agony that some people have to suffer continues, and I do not think that we should delay. It may well be that there are lessons that we can learn from the housing tribunal approach in the private sector, but we would certainly have preferred it to have been extended to the social sector. We are disappointed that it has not been.

Jim Hayton: I agree. There are at least a couple of things that we thought that a tribunal might deliver that the current system does not. We were a wee bit surprised to hear that one of the reasons for not adopting the tribunal approach was that the court review was under way. The Government knew that the court review was under way when it consulted on the proposal, so it might have been an idea not to consult on it at all.

However, it is a good idea. It might have helped to sort out two significant problems. The first is the recurring theme of dealing with matters speedily and not having people suffer, particularly from antisocial behaviour, for undue periods of time. The second is the potential to bring together an expert body of people who could consider the issues and perhaps help to streamline the process, which would result in better-quality, speedier decisions not only on antisocial behaviour but on any other matters that would be under the tribunal's jurisdiction.

Having said all that, ALACHO was happy with the consultation and is happy that the transfer of jurisdiction for private rented sector cases is in the bill. We believe that we have some kind of tentative commitment from the Government to revisit the proposal for the social rented sector and examine it in light of how successful or otherwise the transfer of jurisdiction is for the private sector. As professionals, we would be keen to hold the Government to account on that and come back to it should the Government decide that it should remain outwith the scope of the bill.

The Convener: Jim Eadie will continue questions on the tribunal.

Jim Eadie (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP): Good morning. I am grateful to the witnesses for their evidence and the constructive way in which they have set it out.

Sticking with access to justice for landlords and tenants, I hear your views on the proposal that we transfer certain cases in the private rented sector from the jurisdiction of the court to that of the first-tier tribunal. If I hear you correctly, you are saying that there should be a level playing field for the private rented sector and the social rented sector but, clearly, that is not what the Government proposes at the moment.

I ask you to tease out briefly the benefits of, and the justification for, the change in relation to the private rented sector.

Councillor McGuigan: The benefits in relation to the private rented sector?

Jim Eadie: The benefits for tenants and landlords of the proposal to transfer jurisdiction.

Councillor McGuigan: It means speedy interventions and early intervention. It means that people’s expectations would be fulfilled in a reasonable timescale as opposed to cases dragging on and on through the court system. If we get in early enough, we can certainly change attitudes. It might also avoid more severe measures having to be taken, such as seeking eviction. Once it is known that things will happen more speedily, it will have a transformative effect on what happens in the private sector.

I am absolutely certain that a transfer of jurisdiction would make a very big difference in the public sector. It would have considerable benefits. The elected members who are sitting around the table all know perfectly well that there is no quick and easy remedy for the people who come to their surgeries and are going through the hell of antisocial behaviour. Local authorities follow the processes that are in place, which are too slow, too frustrating and too painful for those who are suffering.

The transfer of jurisdiction will mean that things will happen quickly, will enable us to deal with problems early and will make a big difference. We believe firmly that it should be in the bill.

Jim Eadie: Would it be fair to characterise the benefits as speed, efficiency and nipping some problems in the bud without any diminution in the rights of tenants?

Jim Hayton: There is a big perception that there is a real imbalance of power between landlords and tenants in the private rented sector—one that does not exist to anything like the same extent in the social rented sector—and that the panel should allow that imbalance of power to be redressed in large measure or, at least, in part, not least by allowing third-party application rights. That will not mean landlords taking every single case for every single tenant because the onus will still be on tenants, but one hopes that it will help significantly those tenants who lack confidence about holding their landlords to account or feel vulnerable about it. The tribunal would also hear alleged breaches of the proposed code of practice under the proposals for the regulation of letting agents. I agree with your succinct list, but I would add to it the benefit of redressing the balance of power between landlords and tenants to do no more than get tenants access to their rights to decent quality standards, tenancy conditions and so on.

David Brewster may want to add to that.

David Brewster: There is a recognition that the standard of the management of private rented properties varies enormously. There are some very good private landlords, some amateur private landlords and some people who probably should not be private landlords. At one end of the scale, the very good landlords have some difficulties in dealing with problematic tenants, which is a long and difficult process for them. At the other end of the scale there are tenants with difficult landlords, and the ability for them to go to the tribunal, which is a more informal approach, helps to redress the balance of power in favour of the tenant. The slightly more informal approach, which is more inquisitorial than adversarial, is probably to everyone’s benefit.

Jim Eadie: We have heard evidence from a number of witnesses that there is a lack of awareness among tenants and landlords of their rights and responsibilities. Mr Hayton, you suggest that we need to do more to empower tenants to hold landlords to account. From your perspective as someone who works for a local authority, what steps have you taken locally to empower tenants and to make them aware of their rights? Scottish Borders Council told us that it had been involved in radio campaigns and campaigns in the letting Tony Cain: I think that I count as a practitioner. We are always conscious of the need to ensure that our tenants are properly informed of their rights, including their right to redress. When the council gets it wrong, we remind them of their right to independent advice on a regular basis, we remind them of our complaints procedure and we operate that complaints procedure as consistently as we can. We are also fairly diligent in ensuring that, if they do not like the outcome of the complaints procedure, they have the option of going to the ombudsman. To a greater or lesser extent, those are routine elements of the way in which we engage with tenants to ensure that they are aware of their options and the routes for challenging their landlord when we get it wrong.

I will make a couple of slightly wider points, going back to management in the private rented sector. In most of the management in the private rented sector, there is no culture that bears on issues of service quality—that is not what drives private landlords in managing their property. It is not foremost in their minds when they make decisions about their property and it is not a factor in their attitude and behaviour towards their tenants. Anything that pushes that sector more towards trading standards and a culture that is focused on service quality as opposed to property prices will benefit tenants. However, the power balance, which revolves around the nature of the tenancy regime, will always leave the landlord with the whip hand. The process of removal in the private rented sector is, in essence, arbitrary—tenants feel that acutely—so the third-party reference to tribunals is important in protecting tenants' rights.

You may be surprised to hear that the main beneficiaries of extending that to the public sector will be tenants, as it will provide them with a significant additional option for holding public sector landlords to account for our behaviour. We do not always get it right, and there are occasions when—I need to be careful with my words here—we do not get it right over an extended period. Access to a tribunal will give the tenants confidence that they have somewhere else to go to hold us to account. That will result in a significant improvement in the rights of public sector tenants.

Councillor McGuigan: I would be surprised if any local authority in Scotland was not working to ensure that there is good communication about what services and support tenants can receive when they have difficulties with a private landlord. However, in spite of the campaigns and regardless of what we do to put the information out in the public domain as clearly as possible, people still come to our surgeries and say, “I didn’t know that I could do that.” We must keep working on that.

The Convener: That leads us nicely on to questions that Gordon MacDonald has about letting agents, but Patrick Harvie will come in first.

Patrick Harvie (Glasgow) (Green): I will pick up on comments about issues such as third-party applications to the Private Rented Housing Panel. That is one of two powers that the bill gives local authorities—the other concerns enhanced enforcement areas—to exercise at their own discretion. COSLA’s submission says:

“With regard to Third Party Reporting, we welcome this as a dedicated tool to be used by Local Authorities in special circumstances. A widespread expectation that local authorities take forward cases on behalf of tenants would have a considerable impact on resources.”

At the moment, no additional resources are attached to the provision. Is it fair to say that it would be wrong to expect either of the new mechanisms to be widely used?

Councillor McGuigan: In everything that we have spoken about today and in our submission, we have repeatedly said that the powers must be backed by adequate resourcing. I hear what is said about the bill being cost neutral. There is no point in having powers if the full recipe of needs is not being met, because that will not make a difference or make the changes that we require. A local authority would use the powers sensibly but, if we were snowed under, the service would not be of any great quality as we would want it to be. Resources are at the heart of the issue.

Patrick Harvie: So local authorities might be more likely to use the powers in specific geographic areas. If somebody had a problem in an area that was not being given such attention, they would be unlikely to have the option of asking a local authority to raise something on their behalf.

Tony Cain: I expect the powers to be used as and when appropriate. Resources are always a difficult issue. Most authorities operate with a specific allocation of personnel to an activity, who will deal with all of it and do what they can.

Forgive me for wandering beyond the brief for a moment, but one issue is that landlord registration fees, for example, have not risen in six or seven years. Setting fees is one thing, but the Scottish Government also needs to accept responsibility for raising them, so that we are properly equipped. An increase in fees would increase our ability to deal with issues.

I would expect us to use the powers when they are required and with our capacity rather than to fuss initially about whether the resources are available.
Patrick Harvie: Under the heading of “Alternative approaches”, the policy memorandum says:

“Consideration was given to allow other relevant parties to make an application to the PRHP. This option was rejected”.

The bill gives the discretionary power of third-party application to a local authority or “a person specified by order made by the Scottish Ministers.”

Would your organisations welcome ministers using that provision to extend the power to others, such as non-governmental organisations, student welfare rights advisers and perhaps even elected representatives, who could apply to the panel on their constituents’ behalf?

Councillor McGuigan: We would be keen to talk about and look at the detail of anything that would enable us to improve the situation and to understand better what might work and what certainly would not work.

David Brewster: I will respond to some elements of the issue that Patrick Harvie raises. COSLA’s submission reflects the situation that arises when the public have expectations because a power exists. Local authorities’ experience is that some owner-occupiers still expect local authorities to fix the roof of their home, for example. That suggests that the balance of responsibility must still be the tenants’.

In some circumstances, such as when tenants are particularly vulnerable, the third-party application power will be useful. Sometimes, tenants phone us in the week when they are leaving a property to say, “It’s awful—I’m getting out. Please make sure nobody else goes in there.” By that time, there is no ability to do anything, because only the tenant can report, and the tenant has already left or is leaving. So there are some circumstances in which the ability for a local authority to make an application would be a useful tool but, also from a local authority point of view, we would wish to ensure that the normal expectation remains that it is for the tenant to make such applications.

The Convener: We are rapidly running out of time. I ask Mr Hayton to be as brief as possible.

Jim Hayton: I wish to respond to Mr Harvie’s point about the powers perhaps not being used in a widespread fashion. Nonetheless, I welcome them. Over the past couple of days, I have been reading some other councils’ submissions. Scotland’s biggest city, Glasgow, which has some of the most intractable problems, has been asking for such measures for years. The powers might not be universally used, but they are nonetheless welcome as additional tools in the toolkit.

The Convener: Gordon MacDonald has some questions on letting agents but, if the point has already been answered, do not go over it again—and I ask the witnesses not to repeat themselves if they think that they have already answered the question.

Gordon MacDonald (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP): The bill provides for the regulation of letting agents. Is there a need for the statutory regulation of letting agents? What would the benefits be to the consumers of letting agents’ services?

Jim Hayton: The short answer is yes. Those provisions have been universally welcomed. That seems to be a gaping hole in the current legislation, in the sense that any of us in the room could set ourselves up as a letting agent on Monday morning and could start operating, with all that that entails with regard to health and safety, conditions and so on. A lot of people have been arguing for some time that letting agents should be brought within the ambit of regulation, and we welcome that proposal.

Councillor McGuigan: I would embrace that, too.

David Brewster: It is indeed a substantial gap. One particular factor is that the majority of private sector landlords are small, and own one or two properties. Therefore, the majority are reliant on having a good agent operating on their behalf. We receive inquiries and complaints where landlords are relying on advice provided by agents who simply do not seem to know what they are doing.

Gordon MacDonald: Registration will work and provide a benefit only if it can be enforced properly. In its evidence on 29 January, the Scottish Association of Landlords said:

“tenant registration is not being enforced properly by our local authorities.”—[Official Report, Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee, 29 January 2014; c 2523.]

What are your views on that? Is there anything that we can do to make the legislation more effective with regard to landlord registration or, indeed, letting agent registration?

Tony Cain: The legislation around the private rented sector is shot through with criminal offences to be enforced by Police Scotland. For a variety of practical reasons, the police almost never do so, and they are largely unaware of many of the offences that are set out in the legislation. Transferring the responsibility for prosecution to local authorities is the one single step that you could make to improve the operation of the legislation and the effectiveness of enforcement.
David Brewster: It is worth noting that, in the proposals in the bill, a local authority enforcement power is not envisaged for dealing with unregistered letting agents.

Tony Cain: Forgive me—I know that there is a time pressure—but I wish to mention a practical example. We recently managed to get a prosecution against a landlord both for being unregistered and for unlawful eviction. The unlawful eviction was, if you will forgive the expression, an absolute stick-on—there was no avoiding the fact that it had happened. When the case eventually came to court, after some dispute with the police about whether there had been a criminal offence, the prosecution for unlawful eviction was dropped, and the fine for failing to register was about £200, which is well short of the maximum. The case concerned a professional landlord.

Jim Hayton: We identify a possible anomaly, which we need to address: the locus for enforcing landlord registration is local authorities and the responsibility for maintaining the letting agents register lies with central Government, as I understand it. We absolutely need to join those two things together, so that we get consistent, coherent action when it is needed. I am not quite sure that we have that sorted just yet, but we absolutely need to bear that in mind if the new powers are to be effective.

Gordon MacDonald: On enforcement of the repairing standard, in part 3 of the bill, the committee has heard evidence from stakeholders about the need for stronger legislative requirements around electrical and gas safety in private rented housing. What would be the benefits of expanding access to the Private Rented Housing Panel by enabling third-party applications by local authorities to enforce the repairing standard?

Silke Isbrand: We would look at it together with the other measures.

Jim Hayton: There is perhaps a prior question about the extent to which we extend to the private rented sector some of those provisions, such as installing carbon monoxide alarms and improving electrical safety checks. That has come up in quite a few of the responses and we would broadly support that.

The Convener: We will move on to mobile homes. I am conscious that the subject comes not under ALACHO’s remit but under health enforcement. Most of my remarks will therefore be directed to the COSLA representatives.

From a local authority perspective, what issues need to be addressed around mobile homes? In its evidence to the committee, the British Holiday and Home Parks Association said:

“there is often poor understanding among many local authorities who sometimes fail to understand site licensing and the role of Model Standards.”

Councillor McGuigan: The degree of understanding or lack of understanding will vary from local authority to local authority. We are in tune with the bill’s intentions on licensing, and that means that interventions and enforcement measures can be taken.

I ask David Brewster to come in on that one.

David Brewster: Local authorities are certainly keen to see an improvement in the enforcement and licensing arrangements for residential mobile home sites that are permanently occupied. The current legislation dates back to 1960 and is no longer fit for managing that sector. The residential mobile homes sector did not particularly exist in 1960 and the legislation has not kept pace with its development.

The degree to which local authorities have issues with residential mobile home sites tends to depend on how they are managed. Some sites are managed extremely well and provide useful housing capacity without causing difficulties. When there are difficulties with site management, it causes a disproportionate amount of difficulty for the local authority, and the current legislation simply does not provide sufficient teeth and practicality to allow those matters to be dealt with effectively.

Could you clarify the second part of your question?

The Convener: When we took evidence from the British Holiday and Home Parks Association, it said that there is often poor understanding among many local authorities and they fail to understand site licensing and model standards.

David Brewster: I will start with model standards. The Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 gives them status, but one of the difficulties is that the exact status of model standards is open to a degree of interpretation. When such matters come to court, the exact status of model standards is a subject of considerable debate, and local authorities have raised that with the Scottish Government.

As far as local authority understanding of the licensing process is concerned, unless a local authority has a lot of sites, it will not spend a lot of time on the licensing of caravan sites—and they are legally caravans. There is certainly a lack of training and good knowledge about how to deal with those matters.

Over time, local authority staff move on, which means that the one or two people who have a good working knowledge of the issues can end up going to another authority or retiring. There is a need to keep those knowledge levels up.

The development of residential mobile home sites has changed things somewhat. It would be fair to say that most local authorities in Scotland did not necessarily understand the implications of those sites becoming full-time homes, with requirements for services and so on. Local authorities are much more aware of that now.

Silke Isbrand: The issuing of new, clear legislation around this matter is exactly aimed at addressing those issues and ensuring that there is clarity around the tools that everyone can use. Local authorities, which understand the problems, drove that process. They wanted to have new and clearer tools in their toolkits so that they could address those problems.

We are aware that some residents have voiced fears that the legislation could turn against them. We have clarified those issues. It is the clear policy intent of the legislation to benefit and protect residents, and we are absolutely sure that the legislation can be designed in such a way that residents do not suffer.

The Convener: That brings me to my next point, which is about the three-year licensing term. The representatives of some tenants organisations have told us that they think that that will give unscrupulous park owners a tool to threaten vulnerable people with, as they could say that they were going to close down the park. What is your view on that?

Silke Isbrand: We have heard those concerns and we followed them up immediately with the Scottish Government in terms of the design of the legislation. As I said before, it is no one’s intention to let residents suffer. The reason why we want the legislation is so that we can protect residents. We are clear that the legislation can be designed in such a way that residents will not suffer.

The bill already contains a provision that ensures that if a local authority refuses to issue or renew a licence, that does not affect the right of residents to stay on the site.

What we perhaps cannot legislate for is intentional or accidental mis-statement of what the law is and how it should be applied. However, the issue of the resident’s right to remain living on the site, under the Mobile Homes Act 1983, has been addressed in the draft text of the bill, and we have had further discussions with the Scottish Government about how we can ensure that those assurances are clearly stated.

The Convener: My experience is that some site owners do not like the idea of the three-year licensing period and are therefore putting a bit of fear into the residents on their parks.

There are a few local authorities that manage mobile home parks pretty well and it would be useful to spread that good practice among other local authorities that have mobile homes.

Adam Ingram, do you want to wash up?

Adam Ingram: The bill makes some provisions regarding local authority housing condition discretionary enforcement powers. Is the range of provisions in the bill wide enough to be effective?

Jim Hayton: Do you mean specifically in relation to the private sector?

Adam Ingram: I am asking about local authority housing condition discretionary enforcement powers.

Councillor McGuigan: Are you talking about a situation involving mixed tenure in a single block, and an owner-occupier not being prepared to pay their share of the cost of common repairs?

Adam Ingram: Yes.

Jim Hayton: There are some amendments in the bill to the tenement management scheme to allow local authorities to step in and pay so-called missing shares, where owners are reluctant to carry out works. As with several other provisions in the bill, those are broadly welcomed by local authorities. The scope of works that we could do that for is extended a bit. We still have the thorny problem of paying the money up front and trying to recover it.

Managing and improving mixed tenure estates is one of the most challenging areas that we face and it will get even more so if and when we get to the stage of introducing energy efficiency regulations for the private sector. In that context, we are content with the provisions in the bill. Many authorities have said that they would plan to use them.

David Brewster: The existing tenant management scheme is very useful where title deeds are silent on repair issues. The current difficulty is that although residents can reclaim money from other residents, there is always the risk that they are left out of pocket. That means that sometimes repairs do not get done and we end up having to serve statutory notices, which creates further expectations and work for the local authority.

The amendment to the tenant management scheme is very useful. It means that the local authority can say, “If you, as a majority of residents in a tenement or flats, have agreed that work needs done, you can go ahead and do it and we’ll guarantee to pay the missing share.” That allows them to sort out their issue and deal with matters early, before the disrepair gets worse. It makes a huge amount of sense in all respects.

There is also a provision for specialist or additional powers for specific geographical areas where there are particular problems. That is perhaps where Adam Ingram’s question was coming from. There is a general proposal for that but my understanding is that the detail will probably come through at stage 2 of the bill.

The Convener: Are there any final comments or questions?

Councillor McGuigan: Can I make one observation? It is in relation to Shelter’s proposition that we need to establish acceptable standards in temporary accommodation across local authorities. I am sure that no one in local authorities would accept a situation where we were dealing with indecent standards. However, we have to be clear about the work that is ongoing in order to ensure that we do not trip up before we have examined the matter fully.

In other words, what are the standards that we are talking about? We need to identify definitive standards and establish a benchmarking understanding across local authorities. We are working with the Scottish Government and Shelter on that.

We should be cautious about embracing that request from Shelter. That is why I said at the beginning that I was pleased that we were able to comment on the evidence that has been given. Shelter’s proposition is premature, but we will return to it after the discussions between Shelter, the Scottish Government and local authorities have reached a sensible conclusion as opposed to racing in too early.

The Convener: Are you talking about the private rented sector? Housing standards are set in the public sector, in public sector housing. Everyone sees the challenges and rises to the challenge of meeting the housing standards that are set. We would all agree that we want people who live in private sector houses to have the same standard of housing. That goes back to our first point about the vision for the bill.

Councillor McGuigan: Yes, absolutely.

Jim Eadie: Why would you have a lower standard in the private rented sector? Surely you are not suggesting that.

Councillor McGuigan: No, I did not say that. I was talking about temporary accommodation. The accommodation that we put people into should be of a decent standard. Shelter’s submission made a comment about people being able to challenge the accommodation that they are put into. I think that we should be careful when it comes to providing accommodation that meets what could be defined as an acceptable standard, because Harry McGuigan might have a different view of an acceptable standard than someone else might have.

We are simply saying that we should ensure that we get that right before we go down a road that causes more confusion and irritation for all concerned.

Tony Cain: I have one observation relating to an operational matter that is not covered in the bill. It concerns issues arising in the discharge of our duty to co-operate with Police Scotland in the management of high-risk offenders—principally sex offenders at the moment, but the service is soon to be rolled out to violent offenders—and in the operation of the Scottish secure tenancy regime. There are regularly occasions on which registered offenders need to be removed relatively quickly, and there is a tension between their rights, as Scottish secure tenants, to remain in their home and to be protected from unlawful eviction and harassment and the need to uphold the statutory regime and the operation of civil orders and sexual offences prevention orders. It strikes me that there is a piece of work to be done, probably around the short tenancy regime, to put in place an appropriate tenancy that is consistent with the obligations and objectives of the multi-agency public protection arrangements process.

The Convener: That is a good point.

David Brewster: A question was raised about why we have, or why we would want, separate standards for local authority housing and private sector housing. Private rented housing has to meet the repairing standard enforced by the Private Rented Housing Panel. That is different and has a different scope from the Scottish housing quality standard that applies to local authority and registered social landlord housing.

Jim Eadie: That is a helpful clarification, but I think that Councillor McGuigan was talking specifically about temporary accommodation.

Silke Isbrand: Which can be in the private rented sector.

Jim Eadie: Indeed.

Silke Isbrand: The point that was being made is that an important piece of work is on-going between local government, the Scottish Government and Shelter to find a way to get good, high-quality, acceptable standards in temporary accommodation. There are huge challenges with regard to welfare reform, and all that has been looked at holistically.

Jim Eadie: That all sounds great, and I know that you are going to provide helpful supplementary written evidence, but are we to take it from your representations today that COSLA is not in favour of provisions relating to temporary accommodation being in the bill? Is that the point that you are making?

Councillor McGuigan: Yes, at this moment in time.

The Convener: We shall raise those points with the minister. In the meantime, thank you for your evidence, which has been helpful.
On resuming—

Housing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: The next item of business is the committee’s final evidence-taking session on the Housing (Scotland) Bill. I welcome Margaret Burgess, the Minister for Housing and Welfare, and her supporting officials from the Scottish Government. William Fleming is head of the social housing and strategy unit, Barry Stalker is private rented sector policy team leader, Daniel Couldridge is a senior policy officer in the private housing services team and Colin Brown is a senior principal legal officer. I also welcome Patrick Harvie, who has stayed with us for this session.

I invite the minister to make some opening remarks.

The Minister for Housing and Welfare (Margaret Burgess): Thank you, convener. I am pleased to be here to answer questions about the Housing (Scotland) Bill. As you know, it is a wide-ranging bill, with provisions that affect all types of housing. Its policy objectives are to safeguard the interests of consumers, support improved quality and achieve better outcomes for communities.

I commend the committee for taking extensive evidence from such a wide range of stakeholders. I have been following the evidence-taking sessions closely and I welcome the broad support from stakeholders for the bill’s objectives and many of the policy principles within it. On the private rented sector, there is clear support for measures to improve quality and access to justice through the regulation of letting agents, the strengthening of local authority powers to tackle poor conditions and the introduction of a private rented sector tribunal.

There is consensus on ending the right to buy, although I am aware that there is less consensus on how long the notice period should be before the right is ended. It is clear, too, that views are mixed on the proposed changes to social housing allocations and the tools that are available to landlords to tackle antisocial behaviour.

I want to reflect on the range of the views on the bill and consider them along with the committee’s stage 1 report before I reach decisions about ways in which provisions in the bill could be strengthened. However, I want to make you aware of an issue that I am minded to explore further, which has been set out in written evidence from the Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations. It argues that a housing association that is considering joining another to form a group structure should have to ballot the tenants before it can do so. Officials will be writing to interested stakeholders today to invite them to give their views on that proposal, and I will consider them along with any views that the committee has on the issue.

Many of the stakeholders have acknowledged the extensive consultation that took place before the bill was introduced. I will continue that dialogue when I meet my housing policy advisory group later this month to discuss the bill, and I look forward to receiving the committee’s stage 1 report.

The Convener: Thank you. Adam Ingram will start the questioning.

Adam Ingram (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (SNP): Good morning, minister. I will start with a couple of general questions. First, how will the provisions in the bill meet the national performance framework national outcomes that are listed in the policy memorandum? Those are well-designed, sustainable places; strong, resilient and supportive communities; and public services that are responsive to local people’s needs.

Margaret Burgess: As I said, the majority of stakeholders have acknowledged that the provisions in the bill will support the objectives that we set out in the policy memorandum. The ending of the right to buy, the measures to give social landlords flexibility in the allocation of their stock and the measures to tackle antisocial behaviour will ensure and support strong, resilient communities, so they will meet national outcome 11.

By introducing the private rented sector tribunal and giving local authorities more discretionary powers to tackle disrepair, we aim to improve quality, which will contribute to the outcome of well-designed, sustainable places. By regulating letting agents and modernising mobile home sites, we aim to improve quality and levels of service and professionalism, which also ties in with the national outcomes.

Adam Ingram: Thank you for that response. The committee heard from a lot of the witnesses who have given evidence to us that the consultation on the bill was well received, but we heard some comments that young people could perhaps have been more involved. Can you reassure us that the equality impact assessments for the bill are fully comprehensive?

Margaret Burgess: I think that they are fully comprehensive. We recognised early on that young people had to be consulted and that the provisions on social housing and, in the private rented sector, the regulation of letting agents will have an impact on young people. Officials also recognised that we could not consult young people in the normal ways and that we had to consider other ways of consulting them. We used youth groups and organisations to set up discussion forums, and we also used social media.

The response might not have been as great as we anticipated, but we recognised that we had to look at other ways of consulting young people and that their views are important. We made every effort to consult young people, and we got responses from those who attended the discussion forums.

Adam Ingram: Thank you.

The Convener: As no member appears to have anything else to ask about that, we move on to the right to buy.

Alex Johnstone: I am sure that it will be no surprise to the minister that the right to buy is one of the areas of interest for me. What was the Government’s motivation in moving to end the right to buy at this time?

Margaret Burgess: There are a number of reasons. One is to protect the social housing stock. We have lost more than 450,000 social rented houses since the right to buy was introduced. The right to buy has been amended over time and, in its current format, it is very complex. There are different aspects of the right to buy that depend on the length of tenancy, where someone lives, the type of house, and so on. It was becoming difficult for people to understand. Ending the right to buy will put everyone in the same position.

We now have a number of Government schemes to encourage people to get on to the housing market if they want to. Our LIFT—low-cost initiative for first time buyers—schemes and the MI new home mortgage indemnity guarantee scheme are in place to help and encourage people to go into the market, and we feel that this is the right time to take this step.

Alex Johnstone: Statistical evidence indicates that the right to buy was withering on the vine anyway. The number of houses that were being sold to their tenants had dropped to less than 1,000 a year. In addition to that, the assumption can be made that if the 1,000 tenants a year who were choosing to take up that right were denied that right, very few of them would vacate the property, so not many properties are being saved to be re-let, are they?

Margaret Burgess: It will keep those properties in the social rented sector and the landlords will keep getting the rental income to use. If houses are sold at huge discounts, the landlord’s asset base also diminishes. We therefore think that it is the right step to take. Huge support for ending the right to buy was expressed during the consultation.

Alex Johnstone: Has the Government assessed the impact on demand for right to buy of setting a date for its ending? Is there a serious danger that, by moving to end the right to buy, we might give it a sudden and explosive lease of life at the end?

Margaret Burgess: We certainly considered whether there would be a spike in demand if we announced the end of the right to buy. The most recent figures show that there has been an increase, but we anticipated that that would happen after the announcement. During the last quarter, there has been an increase of 101 house sales under the right to buy. We do not think that that will continue.

There is also going to be stricter regulation in mortgage lending to make affordability in right to buy absolutely clear so that people know what they are getting into. Likewise, the Scottish Government is giving tenants clear guidance so that they realise that buying a house under the right to buy has disadvantages as well as advantages.

We still think that we will save 15,500 homes over the period under the bill.

Alex Johnstone: You do not think that we are going to see a rush of sons and daughters buying their parents’ houses as we have seen occasionally in the past, or teams of young men going down streets and knocking on doors to offer to lend money for people to buy their council houses?

Margaret Burgess: I do not think that we will see that. I repeat what I said about the more stringent mortgage regulations that are coming to ensure that, when people are borrowing to buy a house, they can afford the house. It is called the mortgage market review. We do not anticipate what you describe. We did not get evidence from the consultation that that would happen.

Alex Johnstone: When we spoke to officials at the start of this process, we talked about the three-year period that had been proposed to end the right to buy. We have spoken to a number of witnesses who have talked about shortening that period. Do you have a view about the period that will be allowed at the end of the right to buy and whether it can be changed?

Margaret Burgess: As I think I said in my opening statement, that is something that I will consider when I get the stage 1 report. In evidence I alluded to the fact that three years had not been agreed to be the right period. We are looking at that.

We have to balance the need to protect the housing stock against the tenant’s right to buy. Colin Brown might want to add to that with regard to the European convention on human rights.

Colin Brown (Scottish Government): People who currently have the right to buy have something that would be recognised as a right in ECHR terms, so any interference with that has to be proportionate. There has to be a balance, as the minister said, between the justification for interference with the right and giving people an appropriate period to consider whether they want to exercise rights that they currently have before they lose them. That is not a purely ECHR point. There are wider issues to do with people having an opportunity to consider what is appropriate for their circumstances and to take proper advice on that.

The three-year period was selected not because it was believed to be a minimum period to ensure ECHR compliance but because it was believed to be the right period. Again, as the minister said, any alternative proposals would have to be assessed.

Alex Johnstone: Thank you very much.

The Convener: We move to part 2, which is on social housing.

Mark Griffin (Central Scotland) (Lab): Section 3 proposes that “reasonable preference” in allocations is given to people who are homeless or living in unsatisfactory conditions and who in both cases have “unmet housing needs”. Can you explain what is meant by “unmet housing needs” and how they will be assessed?

Margaret Burgess: It will be for landlords to assess housing needs in line with their framework, as amended by the bill, and with any guidance that we publish. The assessment of any housing needs or “reasonable preference” is for the landlord.

With the bill, we are trying to allow more flexibility and a focus on the need for housing, which can be down to a number of things. People may live in poor housing conditions or overcrowded housing, or they may need to be rehoused because of harassment or a medical condition. It is about having a need for a home. One of the conditions for giving reasonable preference is when someone is living in “unsatisfactory housing conditions”. We are looking at flexibility and focusing on need, as opposed to anything else. In the allocation of housing, it is need that is important.

Mark Griffin: You mentioned housing that is below the tolerable standard. Government statistics show that up to 15,000 socially rented houses are below the tolerable standard. Why is the requirement for giving reasonable preference
Margaret Burgess: It will not be removed, because those people’s situations will be covered by “unsatisfactory housing conditions”. We wanted to widen that. I think that 2.5 per cent of housing is below the tolerable standard. People who live in housing that is below the tolerable standard will still have a housing need under the “unsatisfactory housing conditions” category.

Mark Griffin: A number of witnesses raised concerns about the possibility of age discrimination in the allocation policy. Witnesses have said that age “could be used in a discriminatory way”, and that allocations should be made on the basis of “need and circumstance”. How would you respond to those concerns and how will you monitor use of that provision, to ensure that younger people are not discriminated against?

Margaret Burgess: The first thing to say is that there is no intention to discriminate against anybody. Landlords cannot use discriminatory practices in allocating houses—I think that that is clear. As I said, need is the absolute priority. However, the issue of flexibility for landlords came up during the consultation in that they want to make better use—and sometimes better sense—of how they allocate houses when people have needs.

Age should never take precedence over need, but age could be involved in particular situations of housing need. For example, one of the downstairs flats in a block of four tenanted by young people could become empty and have to be reallocated; if the choice was between an older person or a younger person on the housing list, the council or the landlord could determine that it would be more appropriate to put the young person into the flat than put an older person into a building with young people. Of course, that could work conversely.

It is therefore about being more flexible to make better use of allocations, but that flexibility is certainly not intended in any way to be discriminatory. The Scottish social housing charter states that there must be proper access to housing for everyone. We are very clear in the bill that 16 and 17-year-olds should not be discriminated against on the ground of age. There is no intention whatsoever to discriminate against young people or any other age group. The flexibility is about making good, sensible and appropriate use of housing when people with a similar need or an unmet need satisfy the “reasonable preference” provision. When a house is being allocated, a landlord can consider what the most sensible allocation would be.

We have all heard about cases where someone older has moved in beside groups of young people—or vice versa—and that has caused problems. The flexibility provision is about making sensible use of the housing stock.

The Convener: Mary Fee has some questions on antisocial behaviour.

Mary Fee: Part 2 contains provisions that are aimed at giving social landlords more tools to tackle antisocial behaviour, including the “ability to grant or convert existing SSTs to a short SST”. As part of its evidence taking, the committee heard recently from tenants groups in Dumbarton about the very real antisocial behaviour problems that they face. What evidence is there that the proposed tools in the bill will help landlords to tackle antisocial behaviour?

Margaret Burgess: During the consultation process, landlords, the Chartered Institute of Housing, the Association of Local Authority Chief Housing Officers and the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations welcomed the proposals for tackling antisocial behaviour. However, we recognise that, as they said, the proposals will not be the absolute panacea for antisocial behaviour. We are not suggesting that the bill will sort antisocial behaviour and bring it to an end. However, the provisions will give landlords key tools with which to tackle the antisocial behaviour that you heard about from the tenants in Dumbarton.

We have all heard about the difficulties for tenants who live beside antisocial neighbours and we know that landlords often face difficulties in trying to remove antisocial tenants. We want to give landlords the tools that will enable them to do that and to tackle the problems more quickly. In cases where there is a criminal conviction in relation to the use of a house, landlords would be able to do that without having to go through another process for behaviour that is clearly not acceptable for a community. The bill’s proposals are about getting better outcomes for communities.

Mary Fee: The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has suggested that we need to think about more innovative ways of tackling antisocial behaviour. The Tenants Information Service suggested that partnership working was critical for dealing with antisocial behaviour. We have heard other evidence around the same theme, but the bill does not address those issues directly. How will the bill’s provisions regarding antisocial behaviour help to provide better outcomes for communities?
Margaret Burgess: As I said, I think that the bill will lead to better outcomes for communities. The measures on antisocial behaviour are intended to help landlords to play their part, by giving them the tools to act in circumstances in which they are currently unable to act. That should contribute towards better communities.

On partnership working, I think that we all agree that antisocial behaviour will not be resolved by one sector and that much antisocial behaviour is dealt with by other agencies, such as the police. However, putting that into the bill would not lead to better results. The Scottish social housing charter makes it clear that landlords must work with other agencies to tackle antisocial behaviour, and there is no evidence that landlords are not doing so. Agencies are working together, but we are giving landlords an additional tool, so that they can play their part. That is what we are trying to do in the bill.

Mary Fee: There is evidence that partnership working is quite patchy across the country. Some areas are far better at it than others are. Should there be something in the bill about the necessity of working in partnership, to strengthen and shore up the approach?

Margaret Burgess: The issue did not come up in the consultation—unless I am wrong on that. William Fleming might comment.

William Fleming (Scottish Government): We have not had evidence that we ought to be legislating in that area. I think that the evidence was that we should do more to give landlords the right sort of tools, so that they could play their part, in a partnership. There is a presumption that partnership working is always going on, although it might not be as good everywhere as it might be. The bill focuses on what landlords must do and does not address the wider issue. By giving landlords more tools, we hope that they can be more effective partners, with police and local authorities.

Mary Fee: The committee heard that the removal of the test of reasonableness in certain eviction cases, in section 15, is a fundamental erosion of tenants’ rights. How will the proposals strike an appropriate balance between the rights of landlords and the rights of tenants?

Margaret Burgess: The proposal on the reasonableness test relates to serious cases, in which someone has been convicted of an offence that has caused distress to their neighbours and community—it is not about offences that were committed inside the house and did not impact on other people. In such circumstances, a landlord who is already dealing with the antisocial behaviour aspect will have to go through a separate eviction process, which takes up time—people always complain about the time that it takes for landlords to evict people in serious antisocial behaviour cases.

There is not a mandatory requirement for landlords to evict a tenant who has been convicted of a serious offence. That is not the case, and it is not the intention. A 12-month period is provided for, which gives the tenant an opportunity to amend their behaviour. If that happens, the landlord will not necessarily proceed with eviction. Also, a tenant has the right to challenge the position in court if they think that they have been treated unreasonably or unfairly.

We are talking about serious cases, in which someone has been convicted of behaviour that has adversely impacted on their community and neighbourhood, but it is important that we have built in provision to allow for the tenant to change their behaviour. There is a lot of built-in support, too. A person will not have been convicted of antisocial behaviour automatically; a lot of work will have been done to charge the tenant and get the case to court.

Mary Fee: The Government consulted on the possibility of introducing initial probationary tenancies for all new tenants, although that has not been taken up in the bill. We have heard a mix of evidence, some of which supported initial tenancies while some did not. Why has the proposal for initial probationary tenancies not been taken forward, given that 62 per cent of respondents to the consultation supported the proposal?

Margaret Burgess: I am aware of the response to the consultation, but the initial tenancies were not the only proposal for dealing with antisocial behaviour. I do not think that the time is right to proceed with initial probationary tenancies. There is enough uncertainty just now with the welfare reforms. In other parts of the UK, social tenancies are a short-term thing—people have no right to remain and they are moved around. A tenancy in the social sector is only for a short time in someone’s life, and they have to move on. Given all those uncertainties, it would just not be right to implement the proposal.

We have included enough protections to deal with the antisocial behaviour measures. Furthermore, people who come through the homeless route have the right to support for a tenancy, so they are getting that support built into their tenancy. That is right and proper.

People who have been waiting for ages on a housing list to get a house that they can make into their own home would all of a sudden be on trial as to whether they may remain in their home.

For all those reasons, I do not think that it is right to proceed with that measure. It could be reviewed under a future bill, but I certainly do not think that the time is right. I listened to the evidence that was given on the matter last week, and a lot of it was about antisocial behaviour and tenants and landlords getting to know each other. That can be done in a variety of other ways without putting people on trial.

The Convener: We move to part 3, on private rented housing.

Jim Eadie (Edinburgh Southern) (SNP): The bill makes provision to transfer jurisdiction for civil private rented sector cases from the Scottish courts to a first-tier tribunal. At the moment, if someone is pursuing a case through the courts, they are or may be eligible for legal aid. How do you intend to ensure that tenants, particularly vulnerable tenants, are able to access advocacy services or some other form of representation through the tribunal process?

Margaret Burgess: The tribunal procedures are designed to be accessible, understandable and less formal than the court system. That is how tribunals currently operate, and that is the way in which I would expect the private rented sector housing tribunals to operate. People can represent themselves; they can be represented by family members; or they can be represented by friends. Some people might have legal representation. Many people will be represented by other agencies, advocacy services and advice agencies, as you described.

The intention would be to ensure that the private rented sector tribunal is where people can go for help, advice and representation with regard to the private rented sector. We will certainly be considering that. My intention would be for such assistance to be accessible to everyone. People should be able to go along somewhere to get advice. It does not have to be from a legal representative—there are many other agencies that provide housing advice and other advice. I am sure that they will be involved.

We will have to monitor the case load to see what impact there is on other agencies. In my view, we do not need to specify in the bill how that advice will be provided, but I should make it absolutely clear that I anticipate that such advice will be there for people. The tribunals should be accessible. If people require representation, they should be able to get it.

Jim Eadie: I take the point entirely that the process is less formal. I hear what you say about ensuring that people can access the tribunal system. What specific measures is the Scottish Government taking to ensure that?

Margaret Burgess: I hope that my comments made it clear that we will ensure that that happens and that tribunals are accessible. That does not have to be in the bill; it is something that we will discuss with the agencies that will be involved and the stakeholders. The intention is absolutely clear: the tribunal system will be accessible to people. We know that some people will have difficulty in accessing it, but we need to look at the measures that we can introduce to deal with that and we will monitor the situation. I do not think that we need to put in the bill how we will make it accessible, however, as we have yet to draw up the tribunal procedures.

Jim Eadie: Okay. The policy memorandum makes the point that, under the current dispute resolution system, “cases can take a long time to reach court.” Are you confident that the new tribunal system, which is yet to be established, will be adequately resourced?

Margaret Burgess: We are confident that it will be adequately resourced. The ethos behind the system is to make it more accessible. We hope that that will also speed up the process, but the absolute priority is to provide access to justice for people who do not currently use the system. I do not know whether any of the officials want to comment on the figures that we arrived at.

Daniel Couldridge (Scottish Government): The costings that we developed for the private rented sector tribunal are based on data and best practice from other existing tribunal jurisdictions. We have also costed a range of scenarios based on how many cases the tribunal can hear in a day, which should give a good range for the tribunal to develop properly.

Jim Eadie: The financial memorandum states: “It is expected that there will be no additional costs for local authorities” arising from the proposal to establish the tribunal. Are you able to share with the committee the likely budget and staffing arrangements for the tribunal?

Margaret Burgess: We cannot do that at this stage. Sorry—could you repeat what you said at the start of your question?

Jim Eadie: The financial memorandum states that “there will be no additional costs for local authorities” arising from the establishment of the tribunal. My question is whether you are in a position to share with the committee your current estimates of the staffing arrangements and budget of the new tribunal.
Margaret Burgess: We will come to the staffing arrangements and budget in a minute. Those will come under the tribunal set-up. There should be no additional costs to local authorities from the setting up of the tribunal system. I am not sure why local authorities would feel that there would be an extra cost to them from our setting up the tribunal system.

Jim Eadie: It has been suggested to the committee in evidence that councils might have to train their staff, for example, or that there might be appeals against landlord registration decisions.

Margaret Burgess: My understanding is that only one local authority has suggested that. We will look at that, but we do not expect that there will be any significant cost to local authorities from our setting up the private rented sector tribunal. Colin Brown or Dan Couldridge might be able to address your point about the financial memorandum.

Daniel Couldridge: In the financial memorandum, we set out that the private rented sector tribunal will need up to 63 members to hear the estimated case load and that there will be one-off set-up costs of between £90,000 and £130,000 and annual operating costs of between £585,000 and £880,000 thereafter.

Jim Eadie: The set-up costs will be £130,000, and what will be the annual running costs?

Daniel Couldridge: They will be between £585,000 and £880,000.

Jim Eadie: What about the staffing arrangements?

Daniel Couldridge: Up to 63 tribunal members will be needed to hear the estimated case load. Those will be fee-paid tribunal members who will give around 15 days per year to hearing cases for the tribunal.

Jim Eadie: Am I right in saying that the impact of the change will be a widening of access to justice for people and that there will not necessarily be a resultant saving to the court service?

Margaret Burgess: The intention is to widen access to justice. It is not for us to save money for the court service.

Jim Eadie: Okay. We heard in evidence that the private rented sector will be covered by the new tribunal but the social rented sector will be excluded. Can you explain what the rationale for that decision was and how you intend to monitor and evaluate the situation?

Margaret Burgess: The rationale for that was the evidence that we heard, which was that in the private rented sector, there were fewer tenants—and even landlords—taking forward cases through the court system. It is about balance. Someone put it very well at the committee evidence session last week—in the private sector, there is not a balance of power between the landlord and the tenant; the redress is not there for the tenant. In the social rented sector, tenants have a right to complain, the social housing charter looks at the housing quality standards and there are a number of other areas that go to the ombudsman. Tenants in the social rented sector have a form of redress that tenants do not currently have in the private rented sector. It was felt very strongly that we should start this tribunal in the private rented sector.

As regards the court reforms that are coming in, they are talking about specialist summary cases and sheriffs—perhaps Colin Brown could talk a bit more about the court reforms. We would want to see how those reforms bedded in with regard to the social rented sector before giving consideration to extending the tribunal system into the social rented sector. However, there has clearly been very strong support for the private rented sector tribunal.

Jim Eadie: Can you add anything to that answer on the changes to the court system in relation to the social rented sector as regards the use of mediation services?

Margaret Burgess: We are looking separately at mediation services between landlords and tenants—we do not have to legislate for them. We are taking forward mediation services in any case, so we do not have to put that in the bill. Colin Brown can add a bit more about the court reforms and how they would apply in the social rented sector.

Colin Brown: We will have to watch to see how the court reforms develop. It is for the Lord President to decide how the courts operate, and the indications are that the Lord President is minded to create specialist summary sheriffs in housing cases; when that system is developed, it would be expected to have advantages in how housing cases are handled. However, it is a work in progress and it will have to be watched as it develops to see how it goes and also to see how it impacts on things such as mediation and the choices that parties make on what goes to court.

Jim Eadie: Does the Scottish Government intend to evaluate whether social rented sector cases could or should be transferred to a tribunal system at some future point?

Margaret Burgess: We have said that we will look at how the tribunal system operates in the private rented sector to see whether the system delivers what we intend it to deliver. We will also look at the court reforms when they come in to see whether they have made any changes in the social sector.
rented sector or had any impact on it. The situation will have to be monitored and if at a future date we have to legislate or change things further, that point could be considered but it will not happen in the immediate future. We have to see how the tribunal system works in the private sector first and whether it delivers the outcome that we want it to deliver. Then we will look at the court reforms to see whether further changes need to be made.

Patrick Harvie: Moving on from the tribunal to the other aspects of the bill that relate to the private rented sector, the bill could have gone into a number of other areas. What scope do you see for the bill to develop over stage 2 and stage 3 into addressing other aspects of the private rented sector—in particular cost, given rent levels? We do not have the chronic problem that exists in some parts of the south of England, for example, but in areas such as Glasgow, Edinburgh and, in particular, Aberdeen, costs are spiralling and that is becoming extremely burdensome.

It would seem to be very consistent with the Government’s approach to cost of living issues, which generally fall under the heading of the social wage—trying to address the costs that people face—to consider what measures could be put in place through a bill such as this to address rent levels. What consideration has the Government given to that? Might other issues be addressed in the bill, such as discrimination against people on housing benefit and issues around evictions and harassment?

I will leave it at that. The principal issue that I am asking about is rent levels.

Margaret Burgess: We did not consult on rent levels. The issue was not raised during our consultation on the private rented sector strategy, and nor has it been raised with me, other than by you, Mr Harvie. We have a group that is looking at private rented sector tenure but, again, the issue of rent levels has not been high on the agenda in that group. We do not intend to legislate on rent levels in the bill. We have not consulted on it and the issue has not been raised with us frequently, if at all.

Patrick Harvie: It is possible that organisations such as the National Union of Students will seek to raise the issue. The NUS has certainly already made public arguments about it.

You mentioned security of tenure. From the research that has just been published on that, it is pretty clear that there has not been a proactive attempt to find the views of people who have had negative experiences. I think that 63 tenants were involved in the survey for the research, and that most of those who had moved on had done so for voluntary reasons rather than as a result of being forced to move at short notice because of insecure tenure. Does the Government remain open to the argument on security of tenure? To me, the issue underpins the inequality of arms, or power imbalance, between tenants and landlords. For the growing number of people in Scotland for whom the private rented sector is the only housing that our society provides, that inequality and power imbalance is a serious problem that underpins every aspect of their relationship with their landlord.

Margaret Burgess: I have said from the outset that, for the bill, we were not consulting on security of tenure. I have had discussions about that with Shelter Scotland and other organisations and told them clearly that, if the evidence is there, we will consider legislating on the issue, not in the bill, but during the current session of Parliament. We set up the group that I mentioned to put forward proposals, evidence and suggestions. Mr Harvie has suggested that he does not think that the research is wide enough, and we will look at all that. If a need to change the tenancy regime is demonstrated, I am open to doing that. We will not do it in the bill, but we would certainly do it in the current session.

The Convener: We will move on to part 4, which is on letting agents.

Gordon MacDonald (Edinburgh Pentlands) (SNP): In evidence, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors pointed out that the proposed registration processes for letting agents are largely based on those for property factors. The RICS has suggested that the necessary qualifications for registering as a property factor are "too low and very simplistic", with the result that property factors with "a history of malpractice or misconduct, are now legitimised to practice".

What evidence do you have on the effectiveness of the registration system and its appropriateness for letting agents?

Margaret Burgess: I have listened carefully to what the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors has been saying. We are absolutely clear that any regulation or registration has to be set at a meaningful level. We have looked at the Property Factors (Scotland) Act 2011, and I agree that, in practice, we might need something stronger for letting agents. That is the intention. We have to have something, and it has to be set at a level that is meaningful and can be enforced. It cannot just be about putting names in a register and thinking that that is fine.

Gordon MacDonald: What changes will you introduce?

Margaret Burgess: I want to wait until stage 1 is over and we have looked at all the evidence and the report, but we will certainly look at strengthening what is required of a letting agent. We are not going down the road of thinking that letting agents have to be a member of a professional body, because that is about the industry regulating itself. In effect, it would say who gets into and out of the register. However, we will certainly look at things such as training, qualifications and how letting agents operate their business. We are looking at a number of things. We have received a lot of evidence from letting agents and the sector, and you may see changes at stage 2. We are looking at the matter very closely.

Gordon MacDonald: You said that you are not going down the route of letting agents having to be members of a professional or trade body. What will be the visible policing body for the letting agent sector whose purpose it is to inspect and investigate the industry in a bid to scope out unregistered or substandard practitioners?

Margaret Burgess: First, we are not saying that we will police the agents through a regulatory body such as that for social housing—the Scottish Housing Regulator. That was not costed or consulted on.

We have said that all letting agents will require to be registered with the Scottish Government, which will hold the register of letting agents; they will not be registered with local authorities. The Scottish Government will apply the fit-and-proper-person test, and obviously that will be clear.

On how we will regulate, the first-tier tribunal can look at breaches of the code of practice, which will be the key. Exactly where the standards will be set and what we expect letting agents to be able to do to operate a business will be drawn up with stakeholders. The code will cover things such as the training that we have talked about, and it may cover issues such as how we would expect letting agents to operate in relation to equality and discrimination issues. That is the intention.

We would expect either tenants or other letting agents to report an agent that is not operating under practice. I think that we will find that if agents who are registered and conduct their business in a professional manner as we expect them to do are aware of other agents in their area who are not doing that, that will be brought to the attention of the Scottish ministers very quickly.

We also need to do a lot more to ensure that tenants know what we expect of a letting agent, so that when they go into properties with a tenant information pack and everything else, they are clear about the role of the letting agent and the services that it provides to the landlord and the tenant. If that has not been done, we would take action. The Scottish Government will hold the register.

Gordon MacDonald: Okay. Finally, do you have any views on how the code of practice could help to support the Scottish Government’s aspiration for sustainable homes that help to meet Scotland’s climate change targets?

Margaret Burgess: I do not think that the letting agent code of practice will cover that. It will be more about the quality and standards of professional services; it will not be about climate change or sustainable housing. That would be covered by our sustainable housing strategy, when we look at consulting on standards for the private sector, which includes the private rented sector and home owners. It is not covered in the bill.

The Convener: Does Patrick Harvie have a question on that part of the bill?

Patrick Harvie: Yes. I am grateful to you, convener.

First, the minister said that it is possible that the code of practice will address discrimination issues. I encourage the minister to go a wee bit further on what Parliament can expect in the code. I have raised the specific issue of discrimination against housing benefit or welfare recipients in advertising properties with a clear indication that housing benefit claimants will not be considered and in telling existing tenants that they have to leave if they claim housing benefit.

The second issue is the workarounds that some letting agents are coming up with to get round the deposit protection schemes, by charging advance rents or finding different ways of getting the same money in without calling it a deposit.

Thirdly, can the code of practice address the reasons why a landlord might end a tenancy? In the insecure tenancy regime that we currently have, many tenants are given notice to quit without any justifiable reason.

Will the code of practice address such issues? That would raise standards in the industry as a whole, rather than just weed out a few of the worst apples—we do not weed apples; I am sorry about the mixed metaphor.

Margaret Burgess: The code of practice is about raising standards and ensuring that agents can meet them. Some of the issues that you raised can certainly be addressed in the code of practice—some perhaps more easily than others. For example, I think that we can address the problem of landlords getting round the tenancy deposit scheme in the code of practice. I want to address such issues in that way.

I certainly want to explore the issues that you raised. I agree with you about the “No DSS” approach, whereby landlords say that they do not want tenants who are on benefits. We will want to talk to stakeholders about that as we put together the code of practice.

I think that you had a third point.

Patrick Harvie: It was about giving tenants a reason why they have been given notice to quit, when they have insecure tenure after a period of secure tenure.

Margaret Burgess: That should be happening in any case, I would have thought. The code of practice should say that letting agents should know what the rules are and how and when they can issue a notice to quit—we talked about training. Tenants should know that, too.

I am more than willing to take the matter on. We know that some landlords do not adhere to the rules. In the context of the letting agent code of practice, we will expect agents to follow the rules on notices to quit and everything else that goes with tenancy agreements. It should be clear how such things operate.

Patrick Harvie: Thank you.

The Convener: Why is there no provision in the bill to give bodies—in addition to local authorities—third-party rights to report to the Private Rented Housing Panel? Would not such an approach help to meet the policy aim of expanding access to the panel?

Margaret Burgess: I understand where you are coming from. During the consultation, local authorities asked for such a power, which they thought would help in relation to their strategic approaches. I have sympathy with the suggestion that other people should have reporting rights. Of course, a person can act via the local authority, and a tenant could act with the support of an agency to report their landlord to the local authority.

There is provision in the bill for the Scottish ministers, through secondary legislation, to designate other bodies that have the power to report to the Private Rented Housing Panel. If it is deemed necessary, we will consider doing that. As you rightly said, such an approach would improve access to the panel. Local authorities are given the power in the bill; the question is where to include other bodies and how many bodies to include. However, there is the ability to do that in secondary legislation.

The Convener: Okay. What action is the Scottish Government taking on issues to do with the enforcement of existing private rented sector legislation, such as the private landlord registration scheme? Does the bill present an opportunity to improve the operation of the scheme, or is the scheme working?

Margaret Burgess: There are existing powers for local authorities to take action against landlords who do not abide by the private landlord registration scheme. I accept that the scheme is probably not operating as we hoped that it would do. However, local authorities have the power to take action against bad landlords.

We can all give examples of people who have come to our surgeries telling us about their landlords' behaviour and what they have done to them, and that those landlords are still on the register. If there are continual complaints about a landlord when a house has been allocated or when a new tenant is moving in, although a local authority might not have taken action, the powers are there and it is a question of getting local authorities to use those powers. We will certainly be discussing that as we move forward. I know that local authorities are of the view that they have insufficient resources to do things the way that we would all want them to be done, but we have to remind them of the powers that they currently have and encourage them to use those powers. I do not think that we need to do anything additional in the bill, because the powers are there.

The Convener: Do you agree with some of the suggestions that have been made to us about supplementing the bill’s provision of improvements to the physical standard of private rented housing? In particular, I am referring to the need to be clear about how electrical safety should be achieved, making the provision of smoke alarms mandatory in private rented properties and the installation of carbon monoxide alarms.

Margaret Burgess: Safety in homes is paramount and I am sympathetic to some of the proposals that have been put to the committee. I have followed the debate and I would certainly be interested in the committee’s recommendations.

The Convener: I move on to part 5, on mobile homes. We heard evidence suggesting that site owners could use the three-year licence period as a threat against vulnerable residents. What is the policy intention behind the three-year licence period and what can you do to prevent site owners from using it as a threat to vulnerable tenants?

Margaret Burgess: The intention behind the fixed-term licence was to protect residents on a mobile home site and to ensure that the site owner was operating the site effectively and was a fit and proper person to do that. I know that evidence has suggested that site owners are telling tenants, “If we lose our licence after three years, you’re off the site.” That is simply not the case. We need to do some work on that by talking to both site owners and residents to assure them that that is not the intention. The intention was to protect tenants, and the situation seems to be turning, so we will issue advice and information to residents and to site owners about our views on the matter.

I know that the committee has heard lots of evidence from mobile home owners, and I have spoken to a number of them as well, so there may be some changes to what we are doing for mobile home owners.

The Convener: The park owners have also suggested that a three-year licence term could impact negatively on lenders providing finance to residential park homes in Scotland. Is not there an argument for a five-yearly review and a rolling licence, a bit like the arrangements for Care Inspectorate inspections of care homes that are less likely to meet the standards rather than those that are consistently meeting them, or the arrangements for school inspections?

Margaret Burgess: We heard suggestions that it might prevent lenders from lending to site owners, and it is not our intention that that should happen, but we do not have any concrete evidence at this stage that that is the case. Officials are speaking to colleagues in the Welsh Assembly to determine whether that is an issue in Wales, and we shall keep an eye on that.

Three years were deemed to be an appropriate period. I do not want to say that the licence will roll on, which might mean something else, but the bill says that the licence will be renewed automatically every three years, unless the site owner has breached requirements. As the park owners suggested, they would apply for the licence and, although they would have to apply again three years later, the local authority would automatically renew the licence, unless any breaches had occurred. We are not quite sure how that differs from what the owners propose.

The Convener: The provisions sit in that context, because they cover a number of situations in which local authorities can enforce repairs, which can include measures such as insulation. The provisions are part of keeping houses to a standard that means that people can maintain and live in them. The bill amends existing powers on repairs and maintenance.

Margaret Burgess: The intention is to improve the quality of the stock generally. In that sense, the provisions go towards a more sustainable approach.

William Fleming: We expect licensing to be a small cost that would be passed on to each resident—that will be part of the site owner’s costs—but we will look into whether the impact of what is in effect a fine could be prevented from being passed on to residents.

Margaret Burgess: The intention is certainly not that residents should pay for bad services that landlords have been made to correct. We will look into that.

The Convener: Residents would have paid for a good service, but they would not have got it.

Margaret Burgess: I absolutely take your point. Why should residents pay twice?

The Convener: Adam Ingram has questions on private housing conditions.

Adam Ingram: Part 6 amends local authority powers to enforce repairs and maintenance in private homes. How does that sit in the context of the Scottish Government’s sustainable housing strategy?

Margaret Burgess: The provisions vary among local authorities. Do local authorities have the resources to be able to inspect sites regularly and fully use the proposed site licensing enforcement powers?

Margaret Burgess: The bill gives local authorities an income stream in relation to issuing and enforcing mobile home site licences. It also gives them the ability to claim back from site owners the costs of any enforcement action. We expect the fees to cover the cost of a site inspection at least once in the term of a licence.
Adam Ingram: The missing share proposal will solve one of the problems.

Margaret Burgess: The missing share problem has been a major difficulty in getting houses brought up to quality and standard. I think that the proposal will be of assistance and local authorities tell us that it will assist them considerably.

The Convener: Finally, you mentioned the Scottish Housing Regulator in your opening remarks. Having listened to tenants—especially when we were in Dumbarton on the Parliament day—we know that they are concerned about the removal of the need to consult. Why do you think that the Scottish Housing Regulator might not have to consult tenants? Insolvency or the threat of insolvency does not happen from one day to the next. There is a build-up to it—whatever the reason behind it—so it is not a sudden thing. Why are there proposals in the bill to remove the need to consult? Should we not be genuinely trying to find means to protect tenants?

Margaret Burgess: The bill is seen as a means to protect tenants. I think that I made it clear in my opening remarks how important consulting tenants is for the Scottish Government. This very narrow exception in the bill addresses a circumstance that I hope would never arise, but it came close to happening on one occasion, so we have to address it, and that is why we want to include that exception to the duty in the bill. We envisage it being exercised only if a social landlord is in financial jeopardy that means that they could imminently become insolvent as the lender could call in the debt. In those circumstances, a direction from the Scottish Housing Regulator to transfer the assets to another registered landlord would reduce the likelihood of that happening. In those circumstances, there might not be time to consult. Those four tests would have to be met before the need to consult would be removed.

We have said to all the stakeholders that if we can tighten that regulation any further, we will. We intend it to be an extremely tightly drawn power that is used only in exceptional circumstances. I hope that it would never have to be used, but if that option is there it will provide ultimate protection for tenants. It is not about regulation; it is about protecting tenants to ensure that in those very extreme circumstances they would be protected and they would have a landlord.

The Convener: There is also some concern in the sector about amalgamations of housing associations. Would it still be the case that tenants would have to vote on whether their housing association amalgamates with others? Where is the drive for that coming from?

Margaret Burgess: As I said in my opening remarks, the Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations put forward quite compelling arguments for why, when there is an amalgamation or a merger, tenants should be balloted. Currently, tenants are balloted only if they change their landlord, whereas if a housing association amalgamates with or forms a constitutional partnership with a larger housing association, in effect tenants have the same landlord and they are not required to be balloted.

We are looking at protecting tenants’ rights and some of these mergers can make a difference to tenants. We therefore believe that, for there to be openness and transparency, tenants perhaps should be consulted in those circumstances. That is why I have written today to all stakeholders to say that we are minded to consider that at stage 2.

The Convener: So we will see amendments on that from you at stage 2.

Margaret Burgess: Possibly.

The Convener: As there are no further questions, I thank the minister and her team very much.

Part 1: Right to Buy

This part of the Bill places abolishes the right to buy by making certain repeals. The commencement of the main section on repeals is prohibited for at least 3 years. The Bill will also make some amendments which it is intended will apply before the repeals are commenced.

Q. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

A. This is a welcome provision to tidy up a complex policy and will help protect the stock of affordable rented housing in Scotland. However the loss of capita receipts will be an issue for councils and RSLs which will need to be factored in to the budget setting process.

Q. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

A. This is too long a grace period, it should be reduced to 12 months this should give potential applicants plenty of time to exercise their option.

Part 2: Social Housing

This part makes provisions which relate to social housing. The rules and procedures around the allocation of social housing will be adjusted as will the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies.

Q. In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

A. Landlords currently have a reasonable amount of flexibility, however the provisions clarify and update to some degree Reasonable Preference categories, and we look forward to guidance on what “Unmet Housing Need” means. With regard to age, this flexibility is welcome as it removes a barrier to social housing landlords wishing to allocate to particular age groups in specific situations and locations. This will assist in the better management of housing stock.

The inclusion of ownership as an allocation criteria is also welcome however the practicalities and possible cost involved in landlords being able to verify an applicant’s home ownership status and therefore fully implement this criteria are unclear at present.
Q. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

A. With regard to SSST’s, whilst the bill wishes to protect tenants on this type of lease for ASB, in reality an initial period of 12 months makes it a lengthier and more costly process to evict them should this prove necessary given that landlords will have to lodge court action and also take up court time and may lead to extra costs of providing support due to the longer period involved?

Q6. Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government’s objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

Part 3: Private Rented Housing

This part provides for the transfer of the sheriff’s existing jurisdiction to deal with matters relating to private rented housing to the First-tier Tribunal (which is to be created under the Tribunals Bill, currently before the Parliament). In particular it transfers all non-criminal actions relating to regulated tenancies and some actions relating to the repairing standard, the right to adapt houses and landlord registration. Ministers are given a power to transfer certain actions relating to houses in multiple occupation. Part 3 also contains some further adjustments to private rented housing legislation, making changes to the landlord registration system and creating some third party rights in relation to enforcing the repairing standard.

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

Part 4: Letting Agents

This part establishes a registration system for letting agents. As well as setting up a register, it sets out various offences, provides for the publication of a code of conduct and gives the First-tier Tribunal the power to issue letting agent enforcement orders in relation to breaches of that code. It also confers on Ministers a power to transfer the existing jurisdiction of the sheriff in relation to disputes between letting agents and landlords or tenants.

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?
A. Aberdeen City Council welcomes this provision.

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

Part 5: Mobile Home Sites with Permanent Residents

This part creates a new licensing regime for mobile home sites with permanent residents. It inserts a new Part 1A into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960.

Q12. Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?

Q13. What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

This part includes a number of adjustments to the law as it relates to private housing including conferring on local authorities a power to pay a share of costs arising from the tenement management scheme under the Tenements (Scotland) Act 2004 and modifying provisions relating to work notices, maintenance notices and maintenance orders under the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006.

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

Part 7: Miscellaneous

This part contains some miscellaneous housing provisions, including a power to exempt certain securities from the right to redeem after 20 years contained in section 11 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974, the conferral of a power to delegate on the president of the private rented housing panel and homeowner housing panel, a modification of the Scottish Housing Regulator’s powers and a repeal of certain enactments relating to defective designation.

Q16. Do you have any comments relation to the range of miscellaneous housing provisions set out in this part of the Bill?

Other Issues

Q17. Are there any other comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives or specific provisions?

S19 Right to adapt rented houses

This section is welcomed by Aberdeen City Council as we believe that the growth in the private rented sector will only be effective if this right is enshrined in law. However, the Council believes that the proposed changes to the legislation is in itself not sufficient; in that while the PRHP may find in favour of the tenant, the tenant may not benefit from grant assistance under the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006, s73.

In order for the Council to award grant we are required to seek the owner's approval (2006 Act s75 Determination of applications (4)(a)), and to serve conditions of grant on the Title Deeds which remain in effect for a period of 10 years (s83 & s84). In the event that a landlord fails to sign the grant application form, the Council will be unable to award grant.

In order for the change in legislation to be truly effective, it would be necessary for the appeal process to make direction that the conditions of grant can be appended to the Title Deeds whether the landlord has consented or not.

On a separate issue not covered by the Housing Bill, Disability Adaptations – Mandatory assistance.

When approving grant applications for disability adaptation there is no ability included within the Housing Scotland Act 2006 to permit local authorities to take into consideration any awards of compensation in relation to a disability. This means that as the legislation stands, an applicant who may have received a considerable level of compensation for their disability and which may specifically have taken into consideration their long term housing needs, can apply for and be bound to receive, a minimum 80% grant from the local authority. Therefore, the applicant can receive double funding for the same assessed needs.

It was standard practice under the 1987 Act and the 2001 Act, and indeed the Scottish Government's own prescribed grant application forms, for all types of grant earning works to ask the applicants’ if they had received funding from other sources and in the case of disability applications, asked; “have you or your partner received or applied to receive any compensation or insurance payment as a result of this disability, during the last 3 years?”

Aberdeen City Council are of the opinion that this requirement to declare compensation should be re-instated for current disability grants, but with the limit of “in the past 3 years” dropped so that it simply means any award ever given for this purpose. The thinking behind this is that an award could be made for a child and then some years later an application could be made where that child is now an adult, but the original award may well have made lifelong assessment. It would then be up to the local authority to consider whether or not the original award is still satisfactory or if exceptional circumstances could allow them to disregard the original award.

It is regretted that the Bill does not extend the opportunity for more flexible tenancy arrangements for Local authorities. This would be of particular use in allowing LA's to provide mid-market rent houses on assured tenancies. The extra income derived would fund enhanced standards and would be of particular use in supporting mobility of labour for families moving into an area to take up employment. It is particularly disappointing that no consideration appears to have been given to the role that social landlords, including local authorities housing stock can facilitate mobility of labour.

Q18. Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

It is regrettable that the issue of Initial or Probationary Tenancies was not part of this Bill, so that discussion and debate could have take place around this well supported proposal during this consultation period.

Also taking income into account in the allocation of housing, with the pressure on social housing so acute and the requirement to house those in greatest need, this is an issue that many landlords would have liked an opportunity to advocate for in the passage of this Bill.

A Flat In Town Ltd are letting agents and property managers and wish to make the following observations on the Housing (Scotland) Bill:

In response to questions submitted earlier we wish to respond accordingly

Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

This proposal will simplify and speed up private rented sector cases and make the court process more user friendly and less intimidating for landlords and tenants. This will be particularly beneficial in speeding up the eviction process for landlords who are unfortunate enough to find themselves with a tenant who fails to pay rent or commits other serious breaches of their tenancy agreement. The potential for higher quality and more consistent rulings from more specialised tribunal decision makers is also welcomed.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

The ability for local authorities to apply to the private rented housing panel for a determination on the repairing standard will provide a means of addressing poor standards in individual properties without having to rely on the tenants to take action against their landlord. This will assist in cases where tenants feel too intimidated by the landlord or the application process to take action themselves, or where they feel that direct action on their part may cause the relationship with their landlord to deteriorate and consequently put them at risk of losing their tenancy. It will also help in situations where the tenant has already vacated the property (or been evicted) but the local authority still wishes to take the case to the PRHP.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action in an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

This proposal will not only benefit those tenants who reside in areas characterised by poor conditions in the PRS, but will also improve the overall image of the PRS, which for some time has suffered at the hands of poor landlords and letting agents. It will also assist local authorities who are undertaking regeneration work in particular areas in forcing private landlords to improve their properties in line with other properties in the local area.
Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

This is a welcome proposal as it will drive out poor practice and improve standards. It is essential that the reputation of the industry is improved while at the same time providing landlords and tenants with better recourse in the event that they are dissatisfied with their agent.

We believe there should be a new stand-alone Letting Agent Register operated by the Scottish Government.

The Register should include all businesses which let and manage private rented residential property in Scotland. It may be more appropriate to consider the registration process to be more the issuing of a licence approving the Letting Agent.

A strong Code of Practice is needed. Along with the other representative organisations, we welcome the planned consultation in preparing the Code as secondary legislation.

We believe that any Registration process should be Government operated free of any involvement with professional bodies such as the RICS or ARLA and others.

The impact of these proposals on our industry is to be welcomed. It will however highlight even further the disparity in enforcement that currently exists on compliant letting agents and landlords and those who operate below the required standards. The passing of legislation and implementation of registration of Letting Agents will create an environment where landlords who are self-managing will perceive the enforcement of regulation on them to be far less onerous. It should be important that the whole industry meets a suitable standard. We recommend that at the same time as these regulations are implemented that the Landlord Registration regulations are enforced more robustly. Further to this, we would also comment that private landlords seem to be frequently unaware of any changes in legislation that affect them, particularly if such changes should occur mid-tenancy when they are not actively seeking any information about letting. The landlord and letting agent registration process should therefore also mean that if changes occur, the database of registration information is used to supply landlords/agents with the relevant update.
Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

For landlords of properties in multi-ownership buildings this proposal will be of great benefit in ensuring that essential repairs can be carried out even when some property owners can’t be identified or are unable or unwilling to contribute. It will put an end to the current situation that some landlords can face in having to cover other people’s share of communal repairs in order to comply with the repairing standard for their property and provide a compliant property for their tenants.

ALMOND HOUSING ASSOCIATION

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Part 1: Right to Buy

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

Almond Housing Association has charitable status so it is only our tenants with the Preserved Right To Buy who would be affected by these changes, a total of 355 as at February 2014. There have been many changes to RTB following the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 and the situation throughout Scotland is confused. RTB is no longer equitable, as neighbours can have differing entitlements - from a Preserved Right to Buy with high discounts, to none at all.

Almost half of our tenants with the preserved right are past retirement age and the property is being bought on their behalf by family members. Since 2007 three of the twenty-seven properties we have sold are now in the private rented sector.

Q2. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

Three years is too long. When the 2001 Housing (Scotland) Act was going through the legislative process with the modernised RTB being introduced, there were agencies 'cold calling' and encouraging tenants to exercise their RTB whether they had a right or not. We have no reason to believe that will not be repeated.

Since the proposed change to RTB was announced we have seen an increase in the number of RTB applications from our older tenants. In one case the family were blatant in their intention to purchase the property (extract from e-mail below):

“I am making an enquiry into buying my mothers house, she lives in Manitoba Ave, Howden, and has been in the house for 40 years, she has stayed in Livingston for over 45 years and just want to find out information about this”.

A three years timescale will just give a longer period for families who see RTB as an investment to pressurise tenants to exercise their right to buy, whether it is appropriate for them or not. The intention to end the right to buy has been well publicised in the media. One to two years should be sufficient to give any who wish to purchase time to seek financing. This will also protect rented stock for future applicants.
Part 2: Social Housing

Q4. In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

Reasonable preference
On under occupancy Section C states “tenants of houses held by the social landlord which the social landlord considers to be under occupied”. The statement could be widened to include tenants of houses held by social landlords in general. This would allow priority to be given to the tenants of any social landlord who are under occupying a property and want to move to a smaller home. This could free up larger homes for waiting list applicants.

Age
There may be instances where it will benefit applicants to take into account their age. We appreciate that there may be concerns that this will be used to disadvantage younger applicants. However there will be instances due to location, or other issues such as ongoing antisocial behaviour issues, where it is more appropriate to let a property to a younger applicant.

Ownership of Property
We do not see this as being much of an issue. In order to be considered for housing there would have to be an established housing need which could not be met in the current property. There are safeguards in place for applicants who cannot occupy the property. If the applicant was unwilling to sell their house it could lead to questions being asked as to their needs.

Suspensions
This provision could allow for the greatest flexibility and protection for other residents, but that is tempered by the insertion of the line “a minimum period cannot be placed on a homeless applicant to whom the Local Authority has a duty to provide settled accommodation”.

Unless there is new guidance issued regarding homeless assessments this is going to perpetuate the two tiered system of access to housing that currently exists, where homeless applicants bypass the sanctions placed on non-homeless applicants (see: Tensions between Allocations Policy and Practice, Scottish Government (2007)).

The Association receives requests from the Local Authority to house homeless applicants who we have suspended under the terms of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 from receiving offers. While the homeless assessment will take into account intentionality when assessing a homeless applicant it is only concerned with the reason for the immediate homelessness. We do not think the current system is equitable nor will the new housing bill address the inequalities.
For example, a tenant who is evicted for Anti-Social behaviour or rent arrears and who applies to the LA would likely be assessed as intentionally homeless, but if they go to stay with a relative or friend who later asks them to leave, the assessment takes no note of the earlier anti-social behaviour or tenancy debt, focusing only on the recent relationship breakdown, and this would likely result in an unintentionally homeless decision.

Amended guidance to the 2003 Homelessness etc. (Scotland) Act would allow the LA to look at the housing history over a longer period for intentionality. This would go some way to meet the aims of the Housing (Scotland) Bill to give greater protection to existing communities.

In addition, once the Homelessness assessment is made that decision cannot be revoked until permanent secure move-on accommodation is provided. Homeless applicants evicted by the Local Authority from temporary tenancies for rent arrears or other breaches of tenancy still have to be housed, but this is not equitable with other tenants who lose their home for breaches of tenancy conditions and would be assessed as intentionally homeless.

These are not one-off incidents. There is often a history of failed tenancies and the tenant is also often refusing to engage with support. In these circumstances a different tenancy model needs to be found which will allow for the Homelessness duty to be discharged, protects communities from the cost of tenancy failure and works with the tenant to achieve a sustainable tenancy

Assignation, Sublet
Extending the period to 12 months that a person has to have occupied a property as their only or principal home, and placing a responsibility on the person seeking the property to inform the landlord at least 12 months before making an assignation or sublet request that they were living in the property, should help to protect the rights of waiting list applicants.

Succession
Successions are more emotive. The proposed changes will address the issue we often find where a family member claims to have been living at an address at the point of the tenant’s death.

Q5. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

We cannot see any instance where issuing a tenant with a short Scottish Secure Tenancy would be of advantage.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL
WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Amnesty International works, in conjunction with organisations working directly with Scottish Gypsy Travellers, to monitor and support the implementation of the recommendations as outlined in the Scottish Parliament’s Equal Opportunities Committee (EOC) “Inquiry into Gypsy/Travellers and Public Sector Policies (2001)” and their more recent inquiries; “Gypsy/Travellers and Care (2012)” and “Where Gypsy/Travellers Live (2013)”

The EOC’s thorough research on accommodation issues; based on evidence submitted by various stakeholders, testimony provided by community members and site visits led to the production of comprehensive recommendations. The Government’s response so far demonstrated a lack of understanding and a failure to assume leadership in the implementation of the recommendations.

With regard to site tenancy rights, the EOC recommended:

“Gypsy/Travellers as site tenants should have the same rights and responsibilities as people living in fixed housing. We expect that the Scottish Government will work with Gypsy/Travellers and supporting bodies on the development of a standard Gypsy/Traveller site tenancy agreement.”

Amnesty International calls for strong Governmental leadership in implementing the EOC’s recommendations and establishing a comprehensive legal framework that would provide for effective and efficient actions and accountability at all levels. The focus must shift from further research and discussion towards concrete actions with a clear timeframe as well as robust evaluation and accountability mechanisms. Finally, all action must be considered and undertaken with the active involvement and participation of community members. Comprehensive actions not only within legislation and policy concerning the right to adequate housing were also called for by the UN Special Rapporteur on adequate housing who visited Scottish Gypsy Travellers’ sites during her mission to the United Kingdom in 2013. The Rapporteur recommended that the Government “strengthens efforts to address stigma and discrimination for the Gypsy and Traveller communities in relation to the wider spectrum of rights, starting with the recognition that cultural adequacy in housing is a pillar for inclusion, and that legislation and policy are not enough to overcome local obstacles.”

Therefore we see the current Housing (Scotland) Bill proposal scrutinised by Parliamentary Infrastructure and Capital Investment Committee as a unique opportunity to address housing issues of Scottish Gypsy Travellers community, implement EOC’s and Special Rapporteur’s recommendations regarding accommodation of the community, and ensure equalisation of rights and responsibilities of Scottish Gypsy Travellers as site tenants with those of people living in fixed housing. We suggest that the Committee considers amending the current proposal and includes site tenancy issues relevant to Scottish Gypsy Travellers in Housing (Scotland) Bill.

27 February 2014
1. Introduction

Angus Council welcomes the opportunity to comment as part of the consultation on the infrastructure and capital investment in connection with the Housing (Scotland) Bill. Angus Council is a supporter of more flexibility for landlords and believes that this will help deliver better outcomes for communities.

Part 1: Right to Buy

Q1 – What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

The local authority is supportive of the removal of the right to buy and the provisions to abolish the right to buy entitlements would mean that the right to buy for all social tenants will end by 2017. We agree that the change in this legislation would be a benefit to Angus Council. We have a healthy waiting list for properties and this would help us retain our remaining stock. We have seen a reduction on right to buy receipts and we would continue to reap the benefits from the rental income for all properties and manage our assets effectively.

Q2 – Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

Our view is that 1 year lead in before the provisions come into force would be sufficient time for tenants to complete the right to buy process. However, we understand that there other views from local authorities but this anticipated timetable would allow any tenants who qualify for the right to buy the opportunity to apply. Consideration to reduce the proposed 3 year period to 2 years would allow ample time for anyone to make an application if they were interested in the right to buy scheme.

Part 2: Social Housing

Q4 – In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

Angus Council supports more flexibility and think that Community Based Letting Plans should be the mechanism to meet local needs and the best way for delivering outcomes. It will also allow us to make sensitive lets in areas where necessary to and continue to make best use of our stock.

Q5 – Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of the short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling anti-social behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

Angus Council agrees that landlords should have the flexibility to consider previous anti-social behaviour of applicants and their household. Circumstances are all different which means that guidance will be open to interpretation. Short Scottish secure tenancies should be a tool for landlords in managing anti-social behaviour and increasing the SSST for up to 12 months to allow the appropriate support to be put in place and to monitor the tenants’ behaviour. In particular we think that landlords should be allowed to convert a tenancy to a SSST where misconduct has occurred but eviction can be avoided.

Q6 – Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government’s objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

This gives tenants in a short SST, more protection as when they are allocated the tenancy there must be a housing support package in place. Should the SSST be in place for 12 months, it would give that tenant more security and could help new tenants adopt a more responsible attitude to their tenancy and help create more sustainable communities.

Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Q7 – Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rents sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First tier Tribunal?

Angus Council agrees that it would be beneficial to transfer certain private rent sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First tier Tribunal. It is important that this will take pressure off the civil court system and the new approach will be more cost effective. This forum could also be more accessible to tenants involved and they might not experience the same anxiety if the case was dealt through the court system.

Q8 – Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

The introduction of more discretionary powers in relation to private rented housing will give local authorities more tools to use in tackling poor standards of properties. However, we have concerns that there will be an expectation that we will solve disputes in the private sector that are really not disputes but a general fall out. There are little or no resources at the moment to allow local authorities manage this change. The regulation of letting agents will also be seen to improve standards.

Q9 – Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at the area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

Granting local authorities discretionary powers to apply to the Private Rented Housing Panel to enforce the repair standard or target enforcement action on areas characterised by poor conditions will improve standards across tenures and help people to adopt a more responsible attitude to their properties making communities more sustainable in the longer term. However, although allowing local authorities additional powers in the current financial climate there is not the proper resources available to carry out this task effectively.
Part 4: Letting Agents

Q10 – do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

This will be another step towards better regulation of private landlords. It will benefit landlords and tenants if there is a mandatory register of letting agents introduced in Scotland. However, to allow this is progress effectively additional resources needs to be made available or the system would need to be self financed. We agree that it will promote good standards of service and establish good practice with minimum standards.

Q11 – Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

The introduction of a mandatory register of letting agents is an improvement on regulation of private landlords and includes a code of conduct for all parties concerned. The introduction of the First-tier Tribunal will have the power to make certain decisions and issue enforcement orders to letting agents, this should improve the process for disputes between landlords and tenants.

Part 5: Mobile Home Sites with Permanent Residents

Q12 – Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?

In Angus, we have recognised that there has been an increase in “holiday” sites that are now being used for permanent occupation, which then becomes a breach of the site licence and planning consent. The Bill deals with permanent residential sites only and does not address the issue of “holiday” sites. The boundaries between the two in practical terms are very often blurred as many sites are a mixture of residential and so called holiday lets. Clarity is required as to whether the new legislation will apply to migrant workers sites. At present we don’t have sufficient tools in place to manage, police and enforce breach of conditions. The inclusion of the “fit and proper person” test will assist authorities when granting, managing and reviewing licences. The introduction of site licences being valid for 3 years will be beneficial to the management of the sites as at the moment they have no expiry date.

Q13 – What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

It can be difficult and resource intensive to police licence conditions, and in Angus breaches of planning permission and breaches of site licences are relatively common. We are not convinced that the Bill has sufficient cost efficient tools and penalties to deter misbehaviour until further legislation is introduced to address holiday and migrant worker sites. Again there will be cost implications in terms of administration for local authorities and in the current time when savings are being made there could be inadequate resources. The new licence regime should protect the interests of legitimate site owners also by creating a system which brings greater penalties for poor site managers.
Part 6: Private Housing Conditions

Q14 – Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and secure work, particularly in tenemental properties?

Although in Angus we do not have many tenements in the area, we welcome the additional powers to enforce repairs and maintenance in owner occupied homes and private rented housing. The additional legislative changes including powers to issue a maintenance order will improve the repair standard and encourage a more consistent approach across all tenures. Again the question to ask would be who is going to be responsible for managing this provision as at the present time local authorities are stretched on resources and if they were given more discretionary powers additional resources would be needed.

Part 7: Miscellaneous

Q16 – Do you have any comments relation to the range of miscellaneous housing provisions set out in this Bill?

The amendment of the 20 year rule will benefit and overcome previous hurdles that potential lenders in these tough conditions where they must comply with the Financial Conduct Authority’s Mortgage Market Review Guidance which comes into force in April 2014.

Other Issues

Q17 – Are there any comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives and specific provisions?

Angus Council welcomes the opportunity to work with The Scottish Government to help improve housing in Scotland. We believe that the Bill’s policy objectives will deliver a more effective housing system that gives more structure but a flexible approach with realistic outcomes. We agree that there is a need for decision making to be decentralised and the ability to decide the actions and outcomes. This is a real opportunity to allow housing providers to operate as efficient organisations, create flexibility however; there is a need to identify additional resources in an environment where resources are spread thinly.

Q18 – Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

Angus Council agree we have been consulted on and give the opportunity to comment and the appropriate time to respond in all the areas within the Bill.

ARGYLL & BUTE COUNCIL
WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Part 1: Right to Buy
This part of the Bill places abolishes the right to buy by making certain repeals. The commencement of the main section on repeals is prohibited for at least 3 years. The Bill will also make some amendments which it is intended will apply before the repeals are commenced.

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

We would agree that the Right to Buy should be abolished and fully support the provisions of the Bill which will bring an end to an outmoded and counter-productive policy.

Q2. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

While recognising that a reasonable lead-in period is appropriate when an existing right is being withdrawn, we would nevertheless prefer that the timetable for the abolition of the right to buy is reduced i.e. the provisions should be implemented sooner. This might also help to preclude any unintentional spike occurring in pre-emptive sales prior to abolition.

{NB. Q3 appears to be missing}

Part 2: Social Housing
This part makes provisions which relate to social housing. The rules and procedures around the allocation of social housing will be adjusted as will the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies.

Q4. In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

It is important to emphasise to social landlords that they are still required to give reasonable preference to people who are homeless and who have unmet need which cannot be met by other housing options. As a stock transfer authority, Argyll and Bute Council has some concerns as to how the new powers will be interpreted and that it will mean the most vulnerable people are being disadvantaged. It is acknowledged that social landlords are required to take account of the Local Housing Strategy for the area and we look forward to Scottish Ministers’ guidance on persons who social landlords must include in its rules governing priority of allocations.

The fact that ownership of property can be taken into account will mean that in certain circumstances it is possible to make best use of the social housing. Provisions to enable the short Scottish secure tenancy to be used where an applicant is an owner and requires a short term solution will be useful for landlords. However, in respect of the provisions intended to address anti-social behaviour, we believe that there are appropriate mechanisms through the criminal justice system to deal with anti-social behaviour and criminal activity. Consideration of these factors to limit access to social housing will mean that these persons and their dependents will be excluded from social housing. The right of appeal to the Sheriff court is unlikely to be practical for people who have limited means.

Q5. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

No, people who live chaotic lives still need and have a right to accommodation. We are a stock transfer authority with limited temporary accommodation. There needs to be clear guidance and definitions attached to the legislation and it should set out what constitutes evidence of someone ‘acting in an anti-social manner’.

Q6. Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government’s objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

Yes, it does give tenants more rights and we welcome the fact that there is an option to request a review.

Part 3: Private Rented Housing
This part provides for the transfer of the sheriff’s existing jurisdiction to deal with matters relating to private rented housing to the First-tier Tribunal (which is to be created under the Tribunals Bill, currently before the Parliament). In particular it transfers all non-criminal actions relating to regulated tenancies and some actions relating to the repairing standard, the right to adapt houses and landlord registration. Ministers are given a power to transfer certain actions relating to houses in multiple occupation. Part 3 also contains some further adjustments to private rented housing legislation, making changes to the landlord registration system and creating some third party rights in relation to enforcing the repairing standard.

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

This is welcomed as a positive move as it will hopefully make the process more accessible and resolution should be reached more quickly.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?
This is a major issue but we believe these proposed adjustments will lead to only a marginal change and are not significant. The problem is so widespread and resources to tackle it are so limited that we do not envisage that these adjustments will make much difference overall.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

We would be interested to see the detail of the provisions to be brought forward at stage 2 but suspect that these may not make a difference – there are risks associated with these powers for the local authority if it involves local authority expenditure. There is a need to target owners and encourage them to take responsibility. There is also an issue about how older people are supported to maintain their property and an expansion of care and repair type organisations may be worth exploring.

Part 4: Letting Agents
This part establishes a registration system for letting agents. As well as setting up a register, it sets out various offences, provides for the publication of a code of conduct and gives the First-tier Tribunal the power to issue letting agent enforcement orders in relation to breaches of that code. It also confers on Ministers a power to transfer the existing jurisdiction of the sheriff in relation to disputes between letting agents and landlords or tenants.

Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

In principle this is a good idea but practically it is unlikely to make much difference unless resources are committed to address non-compliance. We would also recommend that local authorities should be exempt from the requirement to register as a letting agent if they are letting property to discharge their obligations in terms of the homeless legislation.

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?

We would support the proposals.

Part 5: Mobile Home Sites with Permanent Residents
This part creates a new licensing regime for mobile home sites with permanent residents. It inserts a new Part 1A into the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960.
Q12. Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?

This Council is generally supportive of the proposed scheme but we have some concern about the availability of resources to implement the proposals effectively.

Q13. What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

There will be more regulation and control over how they operate their business and it may mean that there is some investment required so that they can comply with the necessary standards. Operators will also have to ensure that the staff they employ to manage the site meet the ‘fit and proper person criteria’. As this authority appears to have a significant number of residents on such sites, we would welcome any moves to improve and safeguard their position.

Part 6: Private Housing Conditions
This part includes a number of adjustments to the law as it relates to private housing including conferring on local authorities a power to pay a share of costs arising from the tenement management scheme under the Tenements (Scotland) Act 2004 and modifying provisions relating to work notices, maintenance notices and maintenance orders under the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006.

Q14. Do you have any comments on the various provisions which relate to local authority enforcement powers for tackling poor maintenance, safety and security work, particularly in tenemental properties?

There are problems associated with the use of existing default powers and we do not believe that these provisions will make much difference.

{NB. Q15 appears to be missing}

Part 7: Miscellaneous
This part contains some miscellaneous housing provisions, including a power to exempt certain securities from the right to redeem after 20 years contained in section 11 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974, the conferral of a power to delegate on the president of the private rented housing panel and homeowner housing panel, a modification of the Scottish Housing Regulator’s powers and a repeal of certain enactments relating to defective designation.

Q16. Do you have any comments relation to the range of miscellaneous housing provisions set out in this part of the Bill?

No comment.
Other Issues

Q17. Are there any other comments you would like to make on the Bill’s policy objectives or specific provisions?

None

Q18. Are there any other issues that the Scottish Government consulted on that you think should be in the Bill?

None

Argyll & Bute Council
15 January 2014
A recurring theme in the comprehensive and on-going research of Article 12 in Scotland and others (see for example, The UN Special Rapporteur on Adequate Housing, MECOPP and Amnesty International) on accommodation needs of the Gypsy/Traveller community is the absence of a standardised Site Tenancy Agreement (STA).

Currently, the content and context of STAs varies from Local Authority to Local Authority: a practice that leads to confusion, conflict and dispute and a belief that Gypsy/Travellers do not enjoy the same accommodation rights as members of the sedentary community.

Cognisant of this, the Scottish Parliament’s Equal Opportunities Committee 1st Report, 2013 (Session 4) Where Gypsy/Travellers Live made the following recommendations:

It is essential that Gypsy/Travellers, as site tenants, have the same rights and responsibilities as people living in fixed housing. We welcome the Minister’s agreement on this, and expect that the Scottish Government will, as a priority, work with Gypsy/Travellers, local authorities, ACHA and Amnesty International on the development and implementation of a standard Gypsy/Traveller site tenancy agreement, containing as a minimum rights and responsibilities for all parties comparable to the Scottish Secure Tenancy Agreement (p.21).

Article 12 in Scotland views the Housing (Scotland) Bill as an opportunity to address the lack of a standardised STA and equality of accommodation rights. This can, in our opinion, best be achieved by the inclusion of an explicit reference to STAs in the proposals for Scottish Secure Tenancy Agreements section of the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

1. BEEM (Borders, East Lothian, Edinburgh, Midlothian)
   BEEM is one of the 9 Regional Networks of Registered Tenants Organisations (RTOs) formed in 2008 and cover the local authority areas of Borders, East Lothian, Edinburgh and Midlothian. We are a committee of 9, elected annually, and generally represent the views of our tenant and resident members of the 90 RTOs across our area.

2. General comments on the Bill
   BEEM welcomed being involved in the extensive consultations held on many of the proposals included in the Bill and we particularly welcome the proposals to abolish the Right to Buy and the provisions on social sector allocations and tenancies.

3. Issues not included in the Bill
   We are disappointed that the proposal to create a Housing Tribunal for the social rented sector and the introduction of Probationary Tenancies are not included in the Bill.

   4.1 Right to Buy (RTB), Part 1
   BEEM is pleased that the Scottish Government has announced the ending of Right to Buy and welcomes this decision. However, we believe the proposed transitional period of 3 years is too long and feel that this should be reduced to a period of one year from the date of Royal Assent.

   4.2 Social Housing (Part 2)
   Allocations
   We agree with this measure as it removes an unhelpful barrier to landlords wanting to allocate to particular groups in specific situations and believe the Bill makes it explicit that removing this age bar does not mean that landlords can discriminate against particular age groups or that it contravenes the Equality Act 2010.

   Probationary Tenancies (Initial tenancies)
   The outcome of the Governments consultation concluded that the majority of the sector, including tenant responses, were in favour of introducing Probationary tenancies (or Initial Tenancies) and BEEM were disappointed that it was dropped for this Housing Bill. BEEM strongly support the introduction of initial tenancies and support the introduction of probationary tenancies for all social housing tenants and believe that the benefits of introducing this outweigh any negativity especially when it has the real potential to help deal with tenancy problems, such as anti-social behaviour, sooner.

   Short Scottish Secure Tenancies (SSST)
   BEEM generally welcomes the introduction of this SSST extended power.
4.3 SHR Amendments.
These changes were not the subject of previous consultation. BEEM strongly disagree with this provision and would like to see this removed from the Bill and that the consultation with tenants’ clause is retained. We feel that tenants should always be consulted on issues as important as this and that consultation could be carried out quickly without jeopardising any actions that the SHR takes or requires the RSL to take to protect the interests of tenants and their homes.

4.4 Private Rented Sector, Parts 3 & 6
BEEM is pleased to see the focus on the Private Rented sector and making it fairer and safer for the growing number of tenants relying on the sector. The difficult financial situation and the growing waiting list have made renting in the Private Sector the only housing option for many families and individuals, yet despite this growth there continue to be a lack of protection for tenants in this sector.

The Regional Networks feel that the regulation of the private sector still does not give adequate protection for tenants in this sector.

Letting Agents
BEEM is disappointed that the proposed regulatory framework for letting agents falls far short of proper and full regulation similar to the way the social rented sector is regulated. We would like to see a mandatory set of professional standards for letting agents introduced and monitored. This will ensure proper checks and balances where there are disputes between Agents and Landlords/Tenants.

Tackling poor housing standards in the Private Rented Sector
BEEM believes that the Bill does not go far enough and want effective and transparent mechanisms in place to ensure that Private Landlords adhere to the new legislation and that they will be monitored for compliance with the legislation.

4.5 Housing Tribunal
The decision not to introduce a Housing Panel for the Social Rented Sector in the Housing (Scotland) Bill is disappointing and BEEM believe this has been a missed opportunity. A Housing Panel for the Social Rented Sector would be more efficient in dealing with complex housing needs and vulnerable people and it would take less time than going through the court system.

We welcome the opportunity to respond to the Call for Views on the Housing (Scotland) Bill. We do not have comments to make on the Bill as currently drafted but would suggest that the opportunity should be taken to revisit the 20 year restriction on leases of dwelling houses which currently applies in Scotland.

We appreciate that others before us have petitioned for the removal of student accommodation from the properties affected by the 20 year lease restriction but felt compelled to raise the issue once more. With the welcome upturn in the property market and the increased demand for student accommodation, we are increasingly finding that the 20 year restriction on leases of residential property is causing difficulties in connection with the investment in and funding of such accommodation.

The Private Rented Housing (Scotland) Act 2011 provided the Scottish Ministers with the power to prescribe other bodies or types of body who would be free to enter a lease of residential property for more than 20 years. We would suggest that, when the Ministers consider the terms of the Housing (Scotland) Bill, they should at the same time exercise the power provided by the 2011 Act and remove providers of student accommodation from the 20 year restriction.

Background

Section 8 of the Land Tenure Reform (Scotland) Act 1974 restricts the length of any lease of property used as a private dwelling house to 20 years. Section 138 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2010 removed the 20 year restriction for leases granted after 1 March 2011 to social landlords, bodies connected to social landlords, rural housing bodies and to lessees who are “a body prescribed, or of a type prescribed, by the Scottish Ministers by order made by statutory instrument.”

Should student accommodation be treated as private dwelling houses?

We have canvassed some opinions and the consensus has been that, whilst it may not have been the intention of the legislators, certain types of student accommodation are affected by Section 8 of the 1974 Act.

Student accommodation comes in different forms. In the case of buildings with a number of rooms which share kitchen, bath and living facilities, we would strongly argue that such buildings should be treated as institutions and should not be treated as residential dwelling houses. However, there is no definitive commentary or guidance to say that this should be the case for the purposes of the 1974 Act. It is harder to argue that buildings containing self-contained student apartments / bedsits should not be treated as buildings containing residential dwelling houses. Indeed, for VAT purposes, HMRC confirms in their VAT Information Sheet 02/14, that ‘cluster flats’ which have their own front door and en suite facilities but share kitchen and living facilities will be treated as dwellings. The potential for the restriction in the 1974 Act to apply is therefore clear and therein lies the problem for long term investment in such an asset class.

Funding the development of student accommodation

There are several transactional structures for the development, funding and leasing of student accommodation. One example would be where a developer constructs student accommodation and then leases it on a long lease to a university which will enter short term letting arrangements with the students. Another would be where the university grants a long lease to the developer, the developer then constructs the accommodation and either undertakes the management of the short term lettings itself or, employs another company to do so. Whatever transactional structure is chosen, the common denominator in most is the long lease which is an asset which can be sold for investment purposes. The long lease is employed to ensure that control over the use and maintenance of the property is retained and the investment is protected. It is also favoured by the student accommodation operators such as the university or the developer referred to in the examples above. The basic funding model for investment in student accommodation will involve a lender providing the funding for the lease of the building as a whole in return for a standard security over that lease. For it to be possible to grant such a standard security over a lease, the lease must last for at least 20 years and one day (a “long lease”). In terms of Section 8 of the 1974 Act, there is an implied condition that no part of a property subject to a long lease may be used as a private dwelling house.

The effect of breaching Section 8 of the Land Tenure (Reform) (Scotland) Act 1974
Section 9 of the 1974 Act provides that if the condition prohibiting the use of the property or part as a private dwelling-house is breached (the condition implied by Section 8), the lease will not become void or unenforceable. However, the landlord is then entitled to serve notice asking the tenant to cease the use of the property for residential purposes. If the tenant fails to do so, the landlord may take action to remove the tenant. If during that action it is proved that the landlord approved of the residential use, the court will limit the remaining term of the lease to 20 years or the remainder, whatever is the shorter.

Notwithstanding Sections 8 and 9 of the 1974 Act, long leases of student accommodation most certainly have been granted. However, various agreements such as purchase options and buy backs are often entered into between parties to mitigate the effects of the 1974 Act. None of these additional agreements is entirely satisfactory as they are binding on the parties to them and are not binding on successors. This leaves tenants exposed in situations where the property is sold by the original landlord to a third party who is not party to the agreements which were put in place to protect a tenant from the effects of the 1974 Act.

The threat of Section 9 of the 1974 Act being invoked by a landlord, such as the university or the developer mentioned in the examples above or, more likely, a successor purchaser of the university or the developer, is a threat which makes long term investment in student accommodation less attractive and more complicated than it need be. This in turn can also severely limit the ability to invest capital in the development of the necessary infrastructure at a point when such investment is so badly needed.

Conclusion

Student accommodation is a popular and in demand form of investment across the UK. The Scottish Government has expressed its desire to lift barriers on residential leasing in order to make this a more attractive option and encourage institutional and larger-scale investment. In the interests of removing one such barrier, we would urge the Scottish Ministers to exercise their power under Section 8 3(A)(d) and prescribe student accommodation providers as bodies which will be permitted to take long leases of accommodation to be occupied by students. Should the Ministers decide to proceed with the necessary statutory instrument, we would be happy to assist and share our experience of advising clients in connection with the developing, funding and leasing of student accommodation.

WRITTEN SUBMISSION

Q 1 Should have been done long ago.

Q 2 3 years is far too long – many more houses could be sold in that time. One year is ample.
Will the date stipulated relate to completed house sales, or can tenants wait to the last minute before applying? So it could be 4 years in reality

Q 4 It is to be hoped that it will

Q 5 Again, I would hope so. There should be initial (probationary) Scottish Short Secure Tenancies which automatically convert to a full tenancy when conditions have been met satisfactorily. There are far too many instances of anti-social behaviour blighting other people’s lives and these families flit from area to area creating havoc and this must be stopped

Q 7 No, but the new measures must be enforced. This must also apply to all Council and HA houses. Court proceedings are far too long and often Sheriffs are not supportive of the landlords and innocent Tenants suffer far too long.

Q 8 Anything that can be done to enforce better conditions is welcome. Enforcement is essential

Q 9 Anything that can be done to make landlords accountable is good. What is the point of them being registered, if no sanctions can be taken against them?

Q 10 Mandatory registers are fine, but there must be “some clout” to force landlords to improve their properties. What is the point of registration and “no clout”?

Q 11 No point in registering, and then nothing else is done

Q 12 Yes, a good idea.

Q 13 Sites and caravans must be kept up to a good standard.

Q 14 It is high time that there was far more power for local authorities to enforce good living conditions

Q 16 No. HA Houses should be transferred without consulting Tenants. It the SHR and others are doing their job properly, this should not happen.

Part 1: Right to Buy
This part of the Bill abolishes the right to buy by making certain repeals. The commencement of the main section on repeals is prohibited for at least 3 years. The Bill will also make some amendments which it is intended will apply before the repeals are commenced.

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

We understand the rationale behind proposals to maximise supply in the social rented sector by ending the Right to Buy. We are pertinently aware that disabled people are over-represented in social housing and are therefore disproportionately disadvantaged by the shortage of available stock in the social rented sector in Scotland. The SHCS found in 2009 that 52% of disabled people live in their own home and 48% in rented accommodation, compared to 69% and 31% respectively for non-disabled people. This shortage often leads to disabled people living in completely inappropriate homes, sometimes unable to use the toilet, go outside or spend quality time with their family.

However we do not believe that this shortage, caused by the inability of housing providers to engage with the housing needs of disabled people, should be used to justify further limitations to disabled peoples' ability to secure suitable housing. It should instead be tackled head-on by building more accessible social rented accommodation suitable for disabled tenants of all ages, and maximising the current supply by improving the system for adaptations.

We have no firm position on proposals to end the Right To Buy, our central concern is that disabled people should not be singled out and disadvantaged by such measures. 52% of adults in social rented accommodation with an illness or disability have a preserved RTB compared to 40% of adults with no self-reported illness or disability and we have concerns that these proposals will create another barrier to disabled people who want to become homeowners. Disabled people, who are more likely to be living in poverty¹, face numerous barriers to homeownership including the lack of suitable financial products, limited employment opportunities and a lack of suitable housing supply².

The Scottish Government must also appreciate that the ability of disabled people to become and remain homeowners has come under further pressure as a result of changes to Support for Mortgage Interest Payments (SMI)³.

² PRECiS (2004) A summary series of recent research from Communities Scotland No 51 Mind the gap: evaluation of owner occupation for disabled people in Scotland
³
Thus, in limiting the Right to Buy, the Scottish Government is closing off an important avenue to home ownership for disabled people on lower incomes. It is essential that the Scottish Government takes steps to mitigate this effect and ensure that disabled people have alternative means of becoming homeowners.

Abolishing the Right to Buy will increase the supply of temporary accommodation available to those classified as homeless. This is of particular importance to disabled people given that the Scottish Government’s own statistics show that in 2012-13, of 30,583 social housing applicants assessed as being in priority need, 4,165 required mental health support, 633 had a learning disability, 1,019 a physical impairment, and 2,240 a medical condition.

Q2. Do you have any views on the proposed 3 year timetable before these provisions come into force?

We are unclear about the rationale behind a 3 year delay with these proposals and have concerns that this will simply complicate an already complicated system.

Part 2: Social Housing
This part makes provisions which relate to social housing. The rules and procedures around the allocation of social housing will be adjusted as will the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies.

Q4. In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

Disabled people awaiting adaptations in housing that does not meet their assessed needs constitute the ‘hidden homeless’. Whilst they have a place to live it is recognised within housing law that ‘it is not reasonable for them to continue to occupy this accommodation’. This cohort of people have the right to present as homeless but in general do not, either because they are unaware of homelessness legislation or have legitimate concerns that they might end up in unsuitable temporary accommodation.

Combined data from the 2005/06, 2007 and 2008 SCHS suggests that 137,000 dwellings in Scotland require adaptations and that “one in five disabled people requiring an adapted house live in a house that is ‘not at all’ or ‘not very suitable’ to their needs.”

Capability Scotland’s advice service has received hundreds of calls from disabled people who have been told their landlord does not have the money to carry out the adaptation which would allow them to use the toilet, wash, cook or spend time with their family. In one case an individual was told that it was unlikely that she would be given a wet room in the next three years as there was already a huge backlog for funding for adaptations in the Register Social Landlord sector.

The right to adaptations and sufficient grant funding for adaptations is critical in addressing this problem. The Scottish Government and local authorities need to pool resources from health, housing and social care budgets to ensure that funding is made available for all housing providers to adapt properties to meet assessed needs.

Where houses cannot be adapted to meet the assessed needs of disabled tenants we would like to see landlords taking the opportunity provided by provisions to prioritise allocations to those living under ‘unsatisfactory housing conditions’ to provide support for disabled people whose assessed housing needs are not being meet.

Part 3: Private Rented Housing
This part provides for the transfer of the sheriff’s existing jurisdiction to deal with matters relating to private rented housing to the First-tier Tribunal (which is to be created under the Tribunals Bill, currently before the Parliament). In particular it transfers all non-criminal actions relating to regulated tenancies and some actions relating to the repairing standard, the right to adapt houses and landlord registration. Ministers are given a power to transfer certain actions relating to houses in multiple occupation. Part 3 also contains some further adjustments to private rented housing legislation, making changes to the landlord registration system and creating some third party rights in relation to enforcing the repairing standard.

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

Section 52 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 gives private sector tenants the right to carry out work to adapt their homes to meet the needs of a disabled occupant. This right is subject to the landlord's consent, which cannot be withheld unreasonably, and may be subject to reasonable conditions. At present the tenant can appeal to the sheriff against the landlord’s refusal of consent or their response of unreasonable conditions.

Capability Scotland generally welcomes proposals to transfer cases involving adaptations to let property from the Sheriff Courts to the new First-tier Tribunal subject to this transfer enabling quick and responsive treatment of these cases. Given the implications to disabled people of unreasonable refusal to consent for an adaptation we would expect Tribunal Panels to be well trained in disability equality from a Human Rights perspective.

Call for views on the Housing (Scotland) Bill

The national carer organisations welcome the opportunity to provide written evidence on the Housing (Scotland) Bill. Whilst the Bill in its entirety is of interest, we have confined our response to the questions surrounding Part 2: Social Housing as this is the part of the Bill where we have significant concerns over its potential impact on unpaid carers.

Introduction

There are almost 660,000 carers in Scotland, of whom 115,000 provide care of over 50 hours each week. Below, we outline some key statistics on carers which highlight the significant disadvantage they already face, just because they provide care. This information is intended to outline the profound impact of caring and the concerns we have that, an unintended consequence of changes to succession rights, will have a direct and detrimental impacts on carers who are already struggling.

Carers face significant levels of poverty. Almost half (47%) are in debt as a result of caring. 1 in 6 carers in debt over £10,000. A fifth relying on overdraft or credit card simply to make ends meet. As a result of the financial impact of caring almost half cutting back on essentials like food (44%) and heating (46%) and 59% are in fuel poverty. Few carers have any savings to fall back on, with 1 in 10 having these totally drained by basic bills and everyday living costs.

"The “cutting back on essentials” happened last year. I’m NOT coping now."

Carers are less likely to be in work than non-carers. 170,112 people in Scotland had given up work to care at some point. Half of working-age carers in a household with no-one in paid work – almost triple the percentage of UK households without paid income. 41% cannot work because of their caring responsibilities or because of their own illness or disabilities. People from lower socio-economic backgrounds and in areas of multiple deprivation are more likely to need and to provide care.

6 Caring Together – The Carers Strategy for Scotland (2010) and Scottish Household Survey, Scottish Government & CoSLA,
Unpaid carers are more likely to suffer poor physical and mental health, particularly those who are providing intensive levels of care.\textsuperscript{7}

The role of carers is significant in the delivery of care and support. Currently the cost to replace the care provided by carers would be more than £10 billion each year\textsuperscript{8}. Carers are critical in enabling older and disabled people to live safely in their own homes and communities.

Proposals Section 14 (b)

We have concerns about the proposals outlined under Section 14(b) to extend the qualifying period for succession on the death of a tenant for unpaid carers (where this has been the carer’s only or principal home), from 6 months to 12 months. We are have even greater concerns that this qualifying period will only begin once the carer has informed the landlord that this is their only or principal home.

We believe that this proposal will disadvantage carers and see little reason for increasing qualifying periods for succession for carers or for this qualifying period to begin only when a tenant or carer informs the housing provider. We are deeply concerned that carers, having given up their own home to provide care (on the death of the person they care for) may find themselves not only bereaved but faced with homelessness.

Without detailed research by social housing providers, it is difficult to estimate how many carers have given up their own home to care but research\textsuperscript{9} shows us that the majority of carers, some 80%, live with the person they care for. We also know that 41% of carers care for someone with dementia or because of illness or frailty associated with older age. This cohort of carers may be those most likely to have moved in to provide care to a parent or other older relative. In addition, carers who have given up their home to care for someone who has a terminal or life limiting illness will also be affected. These carers may find, despite giving up their homes, their careers and financial security to care, they are unable to meet the new qualifying criteria for succession.

\textit{“I am unable to leave the house to work. I have used my modest savings in supporting my household and paying my bills in order to care for my mother. We are dependent on her income and savings. I have no independence but I am responsible for all bills, financial decisions and outgoings. I worry constantly and sleep poorly”}\textsuperscript{10}

Caring often involves providing high levels of care which can leave carers with little time for seeking out information and support, much less finding out that they must inform landlords. Indeed the most recent Census showed an increase in the intensity of caring, with the percentage of carers caring for at least 35 hours each week increasing.

Moreover, carers often simply do not recognise themselves as carers, instead identifying themselves as, for example, a daughter, a son, a parent. We know from our research that carers repeatedly say that they did not know that support and assistance are available. For example, our research\textsuperscript{11} found that 16% of carers say they have did not know about help or financial support for 10 years or more. 62% did not find out for between 1 and 10 years. Only 22% knew about their rights within a 12 month period. This lack of awareness of rights and entitlements within the given period proposed for informing landlords is deeply worrying.

Furthermore, in a recent survey by Carers Scotland\textsuperscript{12}, 51% of carers said that they had not been given any advice on what was available. We are concerned that this lack of availability of appropriate advice to carers will include the provision of information on the right to succeed a tenancy.

Furthermore, the proposals do not provide details on the Scottish Government's intentions for supporting those carers who have already given up their own home to live with and provide care to a family member. It is unclear whether the policy will be applied retrospectively and what steps housing providers should be required to undertake to inform these carers of the new qualifying period for succession.

Conclusion

The Scottish Government and its partners in health and social care have clearly stated policy intentions to deliver improved outcomes to older and disabled people, including enabling older people to live safely in their own homes and communities. Carers are key partners in delivering this and, as such, should be supported effectively. This includes ensuring that they do not face uncertainty and homelessness simply because they have given up their own home to care.

The national carer organisations urge the Scottish Government to reconsider their proposals around increasing qualifying periods for succession for carers and related requirements to inform landlords.

Introduction
Citizens Advice Scotland (CAS) and its member bureaux form Scotland’s largest independent advice network. CAB advice services are delivered using service points throughout Scotland, from the islands to city centres. Citizens advice bureaux in Scotland helped clients with over 500,000 new issues in 2012/13 – more than 1,400 new issues for every day of the year. Nearly 200,000 clients brought new issues to a bureau over the year.

CAS welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the Committee on the Housing (Scotland) Bill. Citizens advice bureaux in Scotland advised on 35,228 new housing issues in 2012/13 – around 140 per working day.

Citizens Advice Scotland broadly supports the Bill as introduced, but has some recommendations for areas where it could be strengthened or clarified.

Key Points

- Citizens Advice Scotland agrees that the provisions will increase the flexibility that social landlords have in their allocations policies, which has the potential to benefit tenants. However we recommend proposals to allow an applicant’s age to be taken into account should be removed from the Bill.

- CAS supports the proposals to make it easier for social landlords to change an SST to a short SST if a tenant’s anti-social behaviour causes a negative impact on their neighbours. However we recommend that social landlords conduct an assessment of a tenant’s support needs when a tenancy is changed.

- CAS recommends that a simplified eviction process where a tenant has been convicted of a relevant crime by another court should only be used if the offence is serious, and has been proven to have a directly negative effect on their neighbours or local community.

- Citizens Advice Scotland (CAS) welcomes the movement of private rented sector (PRS) housing cases from the civil court to the new first-tier tribunal.

- CAS believes that social rented housing cases should also be dealt with by the first-tier tribunal.

- It is crucial to ensure readiness of the PRHP to absorb the business – in terms of recruitment and training of new tribunal members and also ensuring the availability of mediators.
There should be a clear policy outlined for providing support to users in the form of advice and, where needed, representation.

CAS strongly supports Local Authorities being given the power to report to the PRHP regarding repairs.

CAS would like to see the addition of mandatory electrical safety checks in private rented housing.

CAS unconditionally supports the introduction of a letting agent register with a mandatory code of practice to be developed.

CAS is extremely supportive of the move to license permanent mobile homes sites in Scotland.

Part 1: Right to Buy

Q1. What are your views on the provisions which abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants?

Demand for social housing in Scotland far outstrips the supply of available stock. As the Policy Memorandum to the Bill points out, in March 2013, the waiting list for social housing in Scotland stood at almost 185,000 households. The social housing sector plays a crucial role in providing a suitable and affordable home for people who need one, particularly vulnerable tenants who require additional support. For instance, people with a disability or a long-term illness are more than twice as likely to choose social rented accommodation compared with the rest of the population\(^1\) and almost half of specially adapted housing is in the social rented sector\(^2\). Social housing also has a pivotal role in ensuring that temporary accommodation can be provided for people who become homeless through no fault of their own, in line with Scotland’s homelessness legislation.

Social housing should remain a viable option for those who need or want it, and there is a need to increase the supply of available stock to ensure it remains so. In that light, Citizens Advice Scotland supports the proposal to abolish the right to buy for social housing tenants in order to safeguard remaining supply.

The abolition of right to buy will not solve the shortage of social housing by itself however, so it is vital that it is complemented by a clear strategy to ensure the building of new social sector stock. It is also important that routes into home ownership previously offered by right to buy are not lost and as such we recommend that funding is made available to continue LIFT (the Low-cost Initiative for First Time Buyers) and the Help to Buy scheme.

Part 2: Social Housing

Q4. In your view, will the provisions which are proposed to increase the flexibility that landlords have when allocating housing, allow them to make best use of social housing?

Citizens Advice Scotland agrees in principle that the provisions in the Bill will increase the flexibility that social landlords have in their allocations policies which have the potential to benefit tenants.

In particular, CAS welcomes the addition of tenants who are deemed to be under-occupying their housing to the list of groups who should be given reasonable preference in allocating social housing. Since the introduction of the reduction in housing benefit entitlement for people deemed to be under-occupying their home – dubbed the ‘Bedroom Tax’ – citizens advice bureaux have advised a number of clients who are willing to move to smaller accommodation to avoid deductions to their housing benefit, but have been thwarted by the lack of smaller properties available.

CASE STUDY: Under-occupation

- An East of Scotland CAB reports of a client who has fallen behind with council tax payments (about £32) and is having his current payments and arrears being deducted directly from his benefit. Additionally, he has been unable to make payments towards his TV licence and owes about £40-50. His income after council tax deductions is just £45.90 per week, yet he has also recently been presented with a ‘bedroom tax’ of £7.70 per week, which he can’t afford to pay. He went to the council to ask about a one bedroomed property, but was told that it would probably never happen as they are so in demand due to the recent changes to Housing Benefit rules.

Giving reasonable preference to under-occupying tenants will not in itself create vacant properties for the almost 76,000 households who have been affected by the ‘Bedroom Tax’ in Scotland, according to the latest official figures. There are also a number of types of households, such as people living in significantly adapted housing, for whom moving to alternative accommodation to avoid under-occupancy charges is unrealistic. Nonetheless, requiring social landlords to give reasonable preference to households who require to move to a smaller property, should result in an increase in the number of those who are able to do so.

CAS agrees with the rationale behind effectively merging the existing categories of ‘currently in houses which do not meet the tolerable standard’, ‘occupying overcrowded houses’ and ‘large families’ into a single reasonable preference category of ‘households living under unsatisfactory housing conditions’. Overcrowded houses and those in a poor state of repair could reasonably be described as unsatisfactory, and the simplifying of the

---

3 ‘Number of Housing Benefit claimants and average weekly spare room subsidy amount withdrawal’ Department of Work and Pensions, November 2013 categories will give landlords more discretion to assist tenants whose housing conditions have become unsatisfactory.

We would however recommend that clear guidance to social landlords is published, giving examples of the types of situations where they might consider that a household is ‘living under unsatisfactory conditions’ to ensure the flexibility is used appropriately. Houses below the tolerable standard and overcrowding should feature in these examples.

CAS welcomes changes to allow landlords to take possession of adapted accommodation where no-one in the household requires it. This should ensure that the supply of adapted housing to those who require it is increased, whilst at the same time ending the policy of removing adaptations from properties, which are likely to have cost a considerable amount to install. It is important however that the sitting tenants are not disadvantaged and are moved to accommodation that is suitable for their needs.

CASE STUDY: Adapted Housing

> An East of Scotland CAB reports of a client who suffers from osteoarthritis and pernicious anaemia. He has undergone 52 knee operations and walks with an aid. Until recently he has been living with his mother as her carer in a two bedroom Council property. His mother has now been admitted to a care home and he is being charged for the extra bedroom under the ‘under-occupancy’ rules. Currently the property contains a stair lift which was originally installed for his mother’s care needs. As the client struggles to use the stairs he has asked to keep the lift but his request has been declined and the stair lift is due to be removed.

Citizens Advice Scotland is concerned about proposals in the Bill to allow an applicant’s age to be taken into account by a social landlord when making decisions on allocations. Whilst discrimination based on age is unlawful under the Equality Act, allowing landlords to take age into account could result in particular age groups being placed together in undesirable areas, or those on the waiting list finding themselves overlooked when properties become available. With suggestions that a future government may seek to restrict or remove housing benefit from those aged 16 – 24, there is a clear possibility of this group being disadvantaged by this change to the allocation policy. CAS recommends these proposals are removed from the Bill.

Q5. Will the proposals which will adjust the operation of short Scottish secure tenancies and Scottish secure tenancies provide landlords with tools that will assist them in tackling antisocial behaviour in an appropriate and proportionate manner?

4 ‘Housing Benefit: withdrawing entitlement from the under 25s’ House of Commons Library, December 2013
Antisocial behaviour by tenants can cause considerable difficulty for their neighbours and communities. Having ‘neighbours from hell’ can cause misery and distress to tenants who are affected and efforts to reduce antisocial behaviour are to be welcomed.

CASE STUDY: Impact of anti-social behaviour on neighbours

➢ An East of Scotland CAB reports of a client in local authority housing who was concerned about her living conditions. She lives in a third floor flat, with her husband and grandchild and while her home is well maintained and furnished, she feels that the stairs and other public areas are not safe, with a high level of drug dealing and misuse in evidence. She was concerned that the local authority did not appear to view her request for rehousing as a priority.

However, care must be taken to ensure that those who have engaged in antisocial behaviour, or been accused of doing so in the past do not find themselves in a situation where they are left homeless, or are restricted from finding housing. Tenants who behave in an anti-social manner are often in vulnerable circumstances, and may require support rather than punishment.

CASE STUDY: Difficulty finding accommodation

➢ A North of Scotland CAB reports of a client who was homeless. His mother put him out after he was beaten by his father at the weekend and will not take him back. The council will not house him, temporarily or otherwise. A phone call to his probation officer revealed that he had been evicted more than once, failed to keep up housing payments and had been aggressive towards other tenants. The client was looking for help to get somewhere to sleep tonight.

On balance, CAS supports the proposals in the Bill designed to make it easier for social landlords to change a Scottish Secure Tenancy (SST) to a short SST if a tenant’s anti-social behaviour causes a negative impact on their neighbours. It is important however that the support needs of the tenants are considered and catered for, and we recommend that social landlords conduct an assessment of this when a tenancy is changed to a short SST. It should also be considered to what extent the anti-social conduct is being carried out by visitors to the property, rather than the tenants themselves when a change to a short SST is considered.

CAS has concerns about the potential scope of the proposed power to introduce a simplified eviction process when a tenant has already been convicted of a relevant crime by another court. The Bill as introduced proposes that the current requirement to prove anti social behaviour has occurred would be removed for convictions for using the house for immoral or illegal purposes or of an offence punishable by imprisonment, committed in, or in the locality of, the house. This opens up the possibility that social landlords could seek to evict for a crime which has no impact on their neighbours or direct community, but was simply committed there. In order to prevent homelessness and minimise additional housing issues for offenders, CAS recommends that this power should only be used if the offence is serious, and has been proven to have a directly negative effect on their neighbours or local community.

Q6. Will this part of the Bill meet the Scottish Government’s objective of providing further protection for tenants, particularly tenants with short SSTs, by strengthening their rights?

CAS has some concerns about the list of circumstances in which tenants can be made ineligible for an offer of housing by a social landlord for an unspecified period of time. As outlined in the above response to Q5, we would caution use of the power by social landlords in relation to anti-social behaviour and criminal convictions. Decisions to make applicants ineligible for social housing should be made proportionately and should not result in people being ‘locked out’ of housing for extended periods to prevent homelessness.

As the list appears to override the ‘reasonable preference’ categories, the presence of rent arrears on the list of circumstances could have the effect of exacerbating a situation that citizens advice bureaux have reported since the advent of the ‘Bedroom Tax’ – under-occupying tenants being unable to downsize to a smaller property due to rent arrears caused by the under-occupancy charge.

CASE STUDY: Downsizing and rent arrears

- A South of Scotland CAB reports of a client who has a £9.41 under-occupancy charge and £10.80 housing benefit overpayment. She has outstanding rent arrears with the local housing partnership. She has informed the housing partnership that she would be happy to downsize, but has been told she cannot downsize when she has rent arrears.

This has the potential to undermine the welcome addition of under-occupying tenants to the ‘reasonable preference’ allocation category, and runs the risk of encouraging the counter-productive practice above. If outstanding rent arrears is to be included on the list of circumstances in which applicants can be barred from offers of social housing, CAS recommends it is accompanied by guidance to ensure under-occupying tenants who wish to move to a smaller property are not prevented from doing so by arrears caused by the Bedroom Tax.

In line with our recommendation in Q7, we would support the tenant’s right of appeal being considered by the new first-tier Tribunal rather than in court.

CAS agrees with the proposal in the Bill to extend the period where tenants who have a history of anti-social behaviour can be placed on a short SST from 6 months to 12 months, with the potential for a further 6 month extension. We agree that this has the potential to give communities greater protection from anti-social behaviour, whilst giving tenants more time to receive support to change their behaviour. As in our response to Q5, it is important however that social landlords conduct an assessment of this when a tenancy is changed to a short SST to ensure that the support provided is as effective as it can be.

Part 3: Private Rented Housing

Q7. Do you have any comments on the proposals for transferring certain private rented sector cases from the sheriff courts to the new First-tier Tribunal?

Citizens Advice Scotland (CAS) welcomes the movement of private rented sector (PRS) cases from the civil court to the new first-tier tribunal which will be formed from the Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP). Business before civil courts can present many barriers to users:
- the length of time taken for a case to reach court
- frequent delays
- low priority of housing cases within the court system
- difficulty understanding/following process and procedure made worse by lack of representation
- inconsistent and unpredictable decisions

This is compounded by the variety of proceedings under which cases may be brought. Summary Cause, Small Claims and Summary Application processes are all applicable in different situations. Each presents a different set of procedures to be followed, requires different forms to be completed and different fees to be paid (some require no fee and some can require a significant fee).

Together these elements can present marked difficulty in accessibility for users which the move to tribunal-administered proceedings seeks to redress. The explicit aim put forward by the Scottish Government is “to provide more efficient, accessible and specialist access to justice for both landlords and tenants in that sector” [the PRS].

Characterised by their specialist, interventionist and less formal nature, tribunals create a level of accessibility which courts do not offer users. CAS believe that the new specialist tribunal jurisdiction for housing is a positive development for users: by offering a single gateway for claims, the complexity and confusion of multiple processes is lessened; hallmarked by expeditors

5 Paragraph 123 of the Policy Memorandum which accompanies the Bill
6 In cases where a landlord has not paid a deposit into the Tenancy Deposit Scheme and a tenant seeks to recover their deposit, the case is brought under Summary Application procedure. Lodging the initial writ to commence a summary application with the court costs £85.00. The writ must then be served on the landlord by way of a solicitor or a sheriff officer. A sheriff officer will charge £25.35 for this service, plus the recorded delivery cost. A solicitor is likely to charge even more. If the landlord disputes the action and a proof hearing is required, then there is a further cost of £48.00 to fix a date for the hearing, and the hearing itself will cost £201.00 for each day or part of a day needed to run it. This means that a tenant could have to pay up to £359.35 just to have their case heard by a sheriff. and user-focused procedures, delays are lessened and proceedings themselves are more accessible; and by encouraging a specialist and interventionist approach parties are less likely to require representation as tribunal members (judges) know the questions to ask to get to the root of issues using plain English.

While CAS welcome the creation of a new tribunal jurisdiction in PRS cases, we are disappointed that social rented business is not to be migrated as well. Tenants within the social rented sector (SRS) face the same barriers as those within the PRS. Accessibility is no less of a problem and so the decision to keep SRS cases within the court system creates a disparity which disadvantages those with a social landlord.

Changes to the civil court system which may help to improve the situation of SRS tenants – specifically the introduction of Summary Sheriffs – are planned as part of a wide programme of court reform but there is no guarantee that this reform will improve accessibility to the same level as offered by a tribunal. There is also no published timeframe for these changes. Some discussion has suggested that the induction programme for Summary Sheriffs (recruitment and training) will be staged and will take 10 years to roll out across all courts. This means that there will be a period of time where the type of justice forum will depend on where you live.

The vast majority of the current housing caseload is social rented business meaning that the majority of users will not benefit from the new jurisdiction and will continue to face barriers to accessibility. By moving SRS cases to the new specialist jurisdiction, access to justice would be improved more quickly and would afford all consistency.

Absorbing Business into the PRHP

The new first-tier tribunal will be formed from the current Private Rented Housing Panel (PRHP). Citizens Advice Scotland believes it is crucial to ensure the readiness of this body to absorb the PRS business.

The caseload of the PRHP is currently around 300 cases per year and has a clear jurisdiction for cases relating to the repairing standard and rent. Overall, the number of cases which transfer from the civil court will not be large – on current predictions the numbers should not exceed 1000. In absolute terms the number may seem low, however this is over triple the caseload volume of the current PRHP and the cases will introduce new and complex jurisdictions such as actions for possession.

It is therefore key that there is a planned recruitment and training programme which precedes the movement of business to the tribunal. This recruitment and training programme should also extend to ensure the availability of mediators. Currently the PRHP encourages mediation as an alternative dispute resolution mechanism and this positive work in the field of ADR should be supported as part of any planned recruitment and training programme.
Ensuring users receive effective support

Although tribunal processes are designed to be more accessible and user-friendly, it is still hugely important that users have access to advice and representation to support them through their case. There is much evidence to support the benefit which access to representation (both legal and lay) offers\(^7\) but there is also recent research to suggest that pre-hearing advice is crucial to self-represented applicants\(^8\). Those who have not had the benefit of advice or representation have lower success rates than those who have access to such resources.

CAS strongly recommends that there should be a clear strategy for the funded provision of advice and representation. ‘Advice’ should be understood as a spectrum of resources from accessible online resources and toolkits to the provision of telephone or face-to-face advice. Representation should also be available in complement to this when necessary.

Q8. Do you have any views on the adjustments to private rented housing legislation, which are intended to enhance local authorities’ discretionary powers to tackle poor conditions in the private rented sector?

CAS is strongly in favour of the proposals regarding Local Authorities being given the power to report to the PRHP. We believe this will be a key move in ensuring that properties meet the repairing standard and help in cases where tenants fail to report due to fear of eviction. Tenants often report to CAB that they feel unable to take action against poor standard of repair as they fear, rightly or wrongly, eviction in retaliation for taking action to secure their rights. The new system of reporting by local authorities must be sensitive to this and keep tenants secure in their property while a case is being decided by the PRHP. We would therefore support no eviction action being taken against a tenant while a case is being considered to ensure that tenant security is protected while directly, or indirectly, making an application to the PRHP.

On consultation with advisers in CAB there was suggestion that this could be opened up further with a neighbour being able to report to the PRHP as some tenants may not be willing to even speak to their local authority. CAB advisers also reported their frustration at the length of time the PRHP currently takes to consider cases and there was a suggestion that localised panels at council level may prove more effective.

\(^8\) M. Adler, ‘Tribunals Ain’t What they Used to Be’, available at: http://ajtc.justice.gov.uk/adjust/articles/AdlerTribunalsUsedToBe.pdf
A West of Scotland CAB reports of a client who lives in a flat which is currently suffering from a rodent infestation. The rodents are able to enter the property due to the fact that the floor has sunk in level, which has left gaps and entry ways for the rodents. This has created unsanitary conditions. Furthermore the controlled entry of the property has broken allowing anyone to enter the stairway and this has led to antisocial behaviour. The landlord has refused to rectify any of these defects but the tenant doesn’t want to put the tenancy at risk by making a report.

CAS would support the addition of mandatory electrical safety checks in all private rented property in a similar way that gas safety checks are currently required. Good practice in the sector already sees landlords instructing safety checks by registered electricians and we would envisage such a check could be carried out on a mandatory basis. We are also aware that other respondents have suggested that in addition to smoke alarms, carbon monoxide alarms should be included as part of a minimum standard. CAS would support this for properties that are main gas supplied. However we are not aware of a need for properties that are electric powered only to be supplied with one.

CASE STUDY: Electrical safety

A West of Scotland CAB reports of a client who has problems with his landlord in respect of repairs and standard of accommodation. He advised that he has already written and spoken to his landlord who is ignoring his requests for repairs. The bathroom is in bad disrepair and his kitchen is in a similar condition. This includes an electric shower which is sparking when switched on. He is worried that he will be victimised if he makes too much fuss with the landlord. He advises that other tenants of the same landlord are having similar problems but are afraid to say anything.

Q9. Do you have any comments on the Scottish Government’s intention to bring forward provisions at Stage 2 to provide additional discretionary powers for local authorities to target enforcement action at an area characterised by poor conditions in the private rented sector?

Advisers from the CAB network consulted were concerned that this would lead to an inconsistent approach to enforcing repairs and were not clear as to how such an area would be defined. They supported the powers but there was a lack of understanding as to why these had to be linked to specific geographical areas. CAS looks forward to more detail on this proposal in the future.
Q10. Do you have any comments on the proposal to create a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland, and the introduction of statutory provisions regarding letting agents’ practice?

CAS fully supports the introduction of a mandatory register of letting agents in Scotland. This is being supported by the industry itself who are keen to cut out any rogue agents and promote good practice across the sector. We are made aware by CAB advisers across the country of problems between both tenants and landlords and their letting agents.

While the Scottish Government has gone a long way to make unequivocally clear that they are illegal, charges and fees still exist in the sector for tenants. In Quarter 2 of 2013/2014 (July to September 2013) CAB were approached by 102 clients regarding additional letting agent fees, representing a 76% increase on the previous quarter. In addition cases involving problems with letting agents has increased from 161 in Q1 to 293 in Q2, an 82% increase. We continue to support tenants reclaiming these fees where they seek advice from us and many clients report using Shelter’s ‘Reclaim Your Fees’ support pack.

CASE STUDY: Letting fees

- An East of Scotland CAB reports of a client that rents a house as one person in a HMO with four other people. When a new letting agency took over they imposed new terms when one person moves out and another moves in. They are charging £125+vat charge to the new person taking up the tenancy. The letting agent have said in correspondence they need to make this charge for things like "dealing with the initial request for changeover", "contacting the landlord to gain their approval for the process", etc.

As part of this consultation we surveyed CAB advisers on the proposals and of those who responded there was unconditional support for a code of practice. Advisers were keen to see a scheme where those who breached the code would be removed from the register and therefore unable to continue trading as a letting agent.

We would be extremely interested in helping inform the writing of a code of practice, which we understand will be introduced through secondary legislation, by providing evidence that tenants and landlords have given to use in case evidence with regard to the common issues faced when dealing with agents.

Q11. Do you have any views on the proposed mechanism for resolving disputes between letting agents and their customers (landlords and tenants)?
We agree that there needs to be a better form of dispute resolution between letting agents and their customers that does not rely immediately on the court system. We therefore support the referral to first-tier tribunal for such cases. We would however stress that costs for accessing such a method must be kept low, especially in relation to cases that deal with illegal fees from letting agents. If the cost of accessing the tribunal is more than these fees many landlords and tenants will not take action as the additional cost will be a major barrier to redress. We would support free access to the tribunal for those on low incomes.

CASE STUDY: Letting agent

- A West of Scotland CAB reports of a client who is a student and found a flat through a letting agent. The client paid £100 'key money' and was given a receipt with few details. He was emailed a blank tenancy agreement and was sent in a filled-in copy by post. The client checked and discovered that the property was not registered. The client and his father asked 3 times which deposit scheme they were using but the agent did not give this information. A meeting was scheduled for 29th June to sign the tenancy. The client emailed the agent to say he would not be attending as he did not have all the relevant information. The agent replied on June 28th to say he would be charged with the cancelled viewings and all the new marketing costs.

CAS would also propose that where a case is being considered, or is due to be considered by a tribunal that no letting agent may take additional fees or charges from landlords nor commence eviction proceedings against tenants.

Part 5: Mobile Home Sites with Permanent Residents

Q12. Do you have any views on the proposed new licensing scheme?

Q13. What implications might this new scheme have for both mobile home site operators and permanent residents of sites?

Citizens Advice Scotland have, following the UK Government’s consumer reforms, followed on from work carried out by our partner organisation, Consumer Focus Scotland, on this subject. We are pleased to note that many of the recommendations that were identified by Consumer Focus in their 2012 Scottish park homes report have been taken up by the Scottish Government either in the Mobile Homes SSI (2013/219) or in this Bill.

Citizens Advice Scotland are extremely supportive of the introduction of a new licensing system for permanent mobile home sites in Scotland. We believe that the terms of the new scheme are appropriate to tackle issues that have persisted in this area of housing. We believe the new system will act to drive

---

9 'Stories to be told – A snapshot of the lives of park home residents in Scotland’, Consumer Focus Scotland, May 2012 out rogue site owners who have a detrimental impact on the lives of the residents who live there while providing a suitable environment for the responsible owners to operate in.

We support the introduction of statutory minimum application criteria for licences. During the Consumer Focus investigation they found examples of where licences had been issued in the name of one business but the management of the site had been carried out by another business in practice. The minimum application criteria should provide local authorities with the information that they require to know who to contact regarding a site if necessary. We are also supportive of section 57 which makes a duty on licence holders to inform a local authority if changes have been made to the information they previously provided. Not only will this seek to ensure records are accurate but it will also bring to light any reason to reconsider a licence holder under the Fit and Proper Person test (FPPT) if necessary (i.e. a new conviction).

We agree with the proposal to introduce a FPPT as is used in other regulatory regimes. We especially support part (d) of the proposed FPPT (Anti-social behaviour) as Consumer Focus research found that 18% of the permanent mobile home residents surveyed reported problems regarding intimidation, abusive behaviour, vandalism, violence or damage to property by site owners and/or managers. In addition to the material considered as part of the FPPT that is presently in the Bill we would support a proposal that the profit making on resale of utilities is added. Currently the maximum price that can be charged by a site owner for electricity or gas (but not LPG) under the Ofgem resale price provisions is the same as they have themselves paid for it. A similar rule (with the addition of a small capped administration charge) is in place regarding charges for water under Scottish Water's reselling guidance. Despite this Consumer Futures found extensive suspicion on the parts of residents that site owners were profiteering from the resale of utilities and we believe that if profiteering is proven this should be considered as part of a FPPT.

CASE STUDY: Mobile Home Energy Costs

- An East of Scotland CAB reports of a client who came in for help regarding an outstanding debt on his energy bill. His bill is to the park manager of the mobile home site in which he lives. The adviser helped devise a repayment plan on the debt but was worried as the energy bills seemed high; the client reports he spends a lot more on energy than he did in his old home despite thinking moving to a caravan would help him cut down on monthly bills.
