Passage of the

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill 2014

SPPB 215
Passage of the
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill 2014
SP Bill 52 (Session 4), subsequently 2015 asp 6

SPPB 215
For information in languages other than English or in alternative formats (for example Braille, large print, audio tape or various computer formats), please send your enquiry to Public Information, The Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh, EH99 1SP.

You can also contact us by email sp.info@parliament.scot

We welcome written correspondence in any language.
Contents

Foreword

Introduction of the Bill

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bill (As Introduced) (SP Bill 52 (Session 4))</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Explanatory Notes (and other accompanying documents) (SP Bill 52-EN)</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Policy Memorandum (SP Bill 52-PM)</td>
<td>167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delegated Powers Memorandum (SP Bill 52-DPM)</td>
<td>190</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Stage 1

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Local Government and Regeneration Committee Stage 1 Report, 26 January 2015</td>
<td>239</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local Government and Regeneration Committee Correspondence on Policy Memorandum to Minister for Local Government and Planning, 25 June 2014</td>
<td>492</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Minister for Local Government and Planning response to Local Government and Regeneration Committee on Policy Memorandum, 1 August 2014</td>
<td>506</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 25 June 2014</td>
<td>546</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 20 August 2014</td>
<td>547</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 24 September 2014</td>
<td>548</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 24 September 2014</td>
<td>550</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 1 October 2014</td>
<td>569</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 1 October 2014</td>
<td>570</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 8 October 2014</td>
<td>591</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 8 October 2014</td>
<td>592</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 27 October 2014</td>
<td>624</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 27 October 2014</td>
<td>625</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 5 November 2014</td>
<td>644</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 5 November 2014</td>
<td>645</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extract from the Minutes of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 12 November 2014</td>
<td>672</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, 12 November 2014</td>
<td>673</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Letter from Convener of Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee to Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Constitution and Economy regarding disposal of local authority assets, 18 February 2015

Letter from Convener of Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee to Cabinet Secretary for Social Justice, Communities and Pensioners’ Rights regarding disposal of local authority assets, 18 February 2015

Response from Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Constitution and Economy to Convener of Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee regarding disposal of local authority assets, 27 February 2015

Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee Report at Stage 1, 5 November 2014

Extract from the Minutes of Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee meeting, 30 September 2014

Official Report, Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, 30 September 2014

Response from Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment to Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee Report, 19 December 2014

Letter from Convener of Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee to Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment, 20 January 2015

Finance Committee report on the Financial Memorandum of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Extract from the Minutes of Finance Committee meeting, 8 October 2014

Official Report, Finance Committee, 8 October 2014

Extract from the Minutes of the Parliament, 3 February 2015

After Stage 1

Response from Scottish Government to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee Stage 1 Report

Before Stage 2

Extract from the Minutes of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, 18 February 2015

Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, 18 February 2015

Extract from the Minutes of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, 25 February 2015

Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, 25 February 2015

Scottish Government explanatory note regarding Stage 2 amendments to Part 4 of the Bill

Index of Written Submissions at Stage 2 to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee

Written Submissions at Stage 2 to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee
Correspondence from Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform to Rural Affairs and Environment Committee, 6 February 2015

Stage 2

1st Marshalled List of amendments for Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 1), 4 March 2015
1st Groupings of amendments for Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 1), 4 March 2015
Extract from the Minute of Local Government and Regeneration Committee Stage 2 (Day 1) meeting, 4 March 2015
Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Stage 2 (Day 1), 4 March 2015

2nd Marshalled List of amendments for Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 2), 11 March 2015
2nd Groupings of amendments for Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 2), 11 March 2015
Extract from the Minute of Local Government and regeneration Committee Stage 2 (Day 2) meeting, 11 March 2015
Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Stage 2 (Day 2), 11 March 2015

3rd Marshalled List of amendments for Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 3), 18 March 2015
3rd Groupings of amendments for Local Government and Regeneration Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 3), 18 March 2015
Extract from the Minute of Local Government and regeneration Committee Stage 2 (Day 3) meeting, 18 March 2015

1st Marshalled List of amendments for Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 1), 4 March 2015
1st Groupings of amendments for Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 1), 4 March 2015
Extract from the Minute of Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee Stage 2 (Day 1) meeting, 4 March 2015
Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, Stage 2 (Day 1), 4 March 2015

Correspondence from Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform to Rural Affairs and Environment Committee, 10 March 2015

2nd Marshalled List of amendments for Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 2), 11 March 2015
2nd Groupings of amendments for Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee meeting, Stage 2 (Day 2), 11 March 2015
Extract from the Minute of Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee Stage 2 (Day 2) meeting, 11 March 2015
Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, 2307
Stage 2 (Day 2), 11 March 2015
Correspondence from Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform to Rural Affairs and Environment Committee, 26 March 2015 2334

Bill (As Amended) (SP Bill 52A) (Revised) 2337
Revised Explanatory Notes (SP Bill 52A-EN) 2465
Supplementary Financial Memorandum (SP Bill 52A-FM) 2527
Supplementary Delegated Powers Memorandum SP Bill 52A (Revised)-DPM 2535
Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee report on Bill as Amended at Stage 2 2571

Stage 3
Marshalled List of amendments selected for Stage 3 proceedings, 17 June 2015 2586
Correction slip to the Marshalled list of Amendments selected for Stage 3 2630
Groupings of amendments selected for Stage 3, 17 June 2015 2631
Extract from the Minutes of the Parliament, 17 June 2015 2634

Bill as Passed (SP Bill 52B) 2733
Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and “As Passed”);
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
• Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;
• Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;
• Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;
• Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.parliament.scot).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee was the lead committee at Stage 1. Relevant extracts from the Official Report and minutes, and all written submissions received (all originally published separately from the Stage 1 Report on the Parliament’s website) are included in this volume, after the Stage 1 Report.

The Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee took evidence on the issue of Community Right to Buy in Part 4 of the Bill at Stage 1. Relevant Official Report and minute extracts, along with written submissions received, are included at the appropriate point. No formal report was issued by the Committee in relation to this evidence.

The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee and the Finance Committee also reported on the Bill as a whole at this stage. Again, any additional material relating to each Committee’s consideration of the Bill is included after the relevant committee report.

Various additional pieces of relevant correspondence are also included throughout.
CONTENTS

Section

PART 1
NATIONAL OUTCOMES

1 National outcomes
2 Review of national outcomes
3 Reports

PART 2
COMMUNITY PLANNING

4 Community planning
5 Local outcomes improvement plan
6 Local outcomes improvement plan: review
7 Local outcomes improvement plan: progress report
8 Governance
9 Community planning partners: duties
10 Guidance
11 Duty to promote community planning
12 Establishment of corporate bodies
13 Interpretation of Part 2

PART 3
PARTICIPATION REQUESTS

Key definitions

14 Meaning of “community-controlled body”
15 Meaning of “community participation body”
16 Meaning of “public service authority”

Participation requests

17 Participation requests
18 Regulations

Decisions about participation requests

19 Participation requests: decisions
20 Decision notice: information about outcome improvement process
21 Proposed outcome improvement process
22 Power to decline certain participation requests
Outcome improvement processes
23 Duty to establish and maintain outcome improvement process
24 Modification of outcome improvement process

Reporting
25 Reporting

Interpretation of Part 3
26 Interpretation of Part 3

PART 4
COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY LAND

Modifications of Part 2 of Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003
27 Nature of land in which community interest may be registered
28 Meaning of “community”
29 Modification of memorandum, articles of association or constitution
30 Period for indicating approval under section 38 of 2003 Act
31 Procedure for late applications
32 Evidence and notification of concluded missives or option agreements
33 Notification of transfer
34 Changes to information relating to registered interests
35 Notification under section 50 of 2003 Act
36 Approval of members of community to buy land
37 Appointment of person to conduct ballot on proposal to buy land
38 Consent under section 51 of 2003 Act: prescribed information
39 Representations etc. regarding circumstances affecting ballot result
40 Ballot not conducted as prescribed
41 Period in which ballot results and valuations are to be notified
42 Exercise of right to buy: date of entry and payment of price
43 Views on representations under section 60 of 2003 Act
44 Expenses of valuation of land
45 Creditors in standard security with right to sell land: appeals
46 Calculation of time periods in Part 2 of 2003 Act
47 Duty to provide information about community right to buy

Abandoned and neglected land
48 Abandoned and neglected land

Meaning of “the 2003 Act”
49 Meaning of “the 2003 Act” in Part 4

PART 5
ASSET TRANSFER REQUESTS

Key definitions
50 Meaning of “community transfer body”
51 Meaning of “relevant authority”

Requests
52 Asset transfer requests
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

53 Community transfer bodies that may request transfer of ownership of land
54 Asset transfer requests: regulations

Decisions

55 Asset transfer requests: decisions
56 Agreement to asset transfer request
57 Prohibition on disposal of land

Appeals and reviews

58 Appeals
59 Review by local authority

Disapplication of certain lease restrictions

60 Disapplication of restrictions in lease of land to relevant authority

Power to decline subsequent requests

61 Power to decline certain asset transfer requests

Interpretation of Part 5

62 Interpretation of Part 5

PART 6
COMMON GOOD PROPERTY

Registers

63 Common good registers
64 Guidance about common good registers

Disposal and use

65 Disposal and use of common good property: consultation
66 Disposal etc. of common good property: guidance

Interpretation of Part 6

67 Interpretation of Part 6

PART 7
ALLOTMENTS

Key definitions

68 Meaning of “allotment”
69 Meaning of “allotment site”

Request to lease allotment

70 Request to lease allotment

Local authority functions

71 Duty to maintain list
72 Duty to provide allotments
73 Allotment site regulations
74 Allotment site regulations: further provision
75 Disposal etc. of allotments and allotment sites owned by local authority
76 Disposal etc. of allotments and allotment sites leased by local authority
77 Duty to prepare food-growing strategy
78 Duty to review food-growing strategy
79 Annual allotments report
80 Power to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites
81 Delegation of management of allotment sites
82 Promotion and use of allotments: expenditure

Termination of lease

83 Termination of lease of allotment or allotment site
84 Resumption of allotment or allotment site by local authority

Notice of termination: sublease

85 Notice of termination: sublease
86 Notice of termination: sublease by allotment association

Tenants’ rights

87 Sale of surplus produce
88 Removal of items from allotment by tenant

Compensation

89 Compensation for disturbance
90 Compensation for deterioration of allotment
91 Compensation for loss of crops
92 Set-off of compensation etc.

Interpretation of Part 7

93 Interpretation of Part 7

PART 8

NON-DOMESTIC RATES

94 Schemes for reduction and remission of non-domestic rates

PART 9

GENERAL

95 Guidance under Parts 2 and 6: publication
96 Subordinate legislation
97 Ancillary provision
98 Minor and consequential amendments and repeals
99 Commencement
100 Short title

Schedule 1—Community planning partners
Schedule 2—Public service authorities
Schedule 3—Relevant authorities
Schedule 4—Minor and consequential amendments
Schedule 5—Repeals
An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about national outcomes; to confer functions on certain persons in relation to services provided by, and assets of, certain public bodies; to amend Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003; to enable certain bodies to buy abandoned or neglected land; to make provision for registers of common good property and about disposal and use of such property; to restate and amend the law on allotments; to enable local authorities to reduce or remit non-domestic rates; and for connected purposes.

PART 1

NATIONAL OUTCOMES

1 National outcomes

(1) The Scottish Ministers must determine outcomes for Scotland (referred to in this Part as “the national outcomes”) that result from, or are contributed to by, the carrying out of functions by—

(a) a Scottish public authority which is not a cross-border public authority, but only in relation to functions carried out by the authority that do not relate to reserved matters,

(b) a cross-border public authority, but only in relation to functions carried out by the authority—

(i) that are exercisable in or as regards Scotland, and

(ii) that do not relate to reserved matters, and

(c) any other person carrying out functions of a public nature, but only in relation to such functions—

(i) that are exercisable in or as regards Scotland, and

(ii) that do not relate to reserved matters.

(2) Before determining the national outcomes, the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must publish the national outcomes.
(4) A Scottish public authority which is not a cross-border public authority must have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out any function of the authority that does not relate to reserved matters.

(5) A cross-border public authority must have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out any function of the authority that—
   (a) is exercisable in or as regards Scotland, and
   (b) does not relate to reserved matters.

(6) Any other person carrying out functions of a public nature must have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out such functions, but only in so far as such functions—
   (a) are exercisable in or as regards Scotland, and
   (b) do not relate to reserved matters.

(7) In this section—
   “cross-border public authority” has the meaning given by section 88(5) of the Scotland Act 1998, “reserved matters” is to be construed in accordance with the Scotland Act 1998.

2 Review of national outcomes

(1) The Scottish Ministers may review the national outcomes at any time (but subject to subsections (2) and (3)).

(2) The Scottish Ministers must begin a review of the national outcomes before the expiry of the period of 5 years beginning with the date on which the national outcomes were published under section 1(3).

(3) The Scottish Ministers must begin further reviews of the national outcomes before the expiry of each 5 year period.

(4) Following a review, the Scottish Ministers—
   (a) may revise the national outcomes, and
   (b) must—
      (i) where the national outcomes are revised, publish the outcomes as revised,
      (ii) where the national outcomes are not revised, republish the outcomes.

(5) Before making any revisions to the national outcomes under subsection (4)(a), the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate.

(6) References to the national outcomes in subsections (4) to (6) of section 1 and in section 3 include references to the national outcomes revised under subsection (4)(a) of this section.

(7) In subsection (3), “5 year period” means the period of 5 years beginning with the date on which the national outcomes were published under sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph (b) of subsection (4) or, as the case may be, republished under sub-paragraph (ii) of that paragraph.

3 Reports

(1) The Scottish Ministers must prepare and publish reports about the extent to which the national outcomes have been achieved.
(2) The Scottish Ministers must include in reports published under subsection (1) information about any change in the extent to which the national outcomes have been achieved since the publication of the previous report under that subsection.

(3) Reports must be prepared and published at such times as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

PART 2

COMMUNITY PLANNING

4 Community planning

(1) Each local authority, the persons listed in schedule 1 and any community bodies (as mentioned in paragraph (c) of subsection (5) and to the extent mentioned in that paragraph) must participate with each other in community planning.

(2) In subsection (1), “community planning” means planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes in relation to the area of the local authority resulting from, or contributed to by, the provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the local authority or the persons listed in schedule 1 (“community planning”).

(3) Outcomes of the type mentioned in subsection (2) (“local outcomes”) must be consistent with the national outcomes determined under section 1(1) or revised under section 2(4)(a).

(4) In relation to the area of each local authority—

(a) the local authority and the persons listed in schedule 1 when participating in community planning are collectively referred to in this Part as a “community planning partnership”, and

(b) the authority and each such person is referred to in this Part as a “community planning partner”.

(5) A community planning partnership must—

(a) consider which community bodies are likely to be able to contribute to community planning,

(b) make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of such community bodies in community planning, and

(c) to the extent (if any) that such community bodies wish to participate in community planning, take such steps as are reasonable to enable the community bodies to participate in community planning to that extent.

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify schedule 1 so as to—

(a) add a person or a description of person,

(b) remove an entry listed in it,

(c) amend an entry listed in it.

(7) Regulations under subsection (6) may provide that a person or a description of person listed in schedule 1 is to participate in community planning for a specific purpose.
(8) In this section, “community bodies”, in relation to a community planning partnership, means bodies, whether or not formally constituted, established for purposes which consist of or include that of promoting or improving the interests of any communities (however described) resident or otherwise present in the area of the local authority for which the community planning partnership is carrying out community planning.

5  Local outcomes improvement plan

(1) Each community planning partnership must prepare and publish a local outcomes improvement plan.

(2) A local outcomes improvement plan is a plan setting out—

(a) each local outcome to which the community planning partnership is to give priority with a view to improving the achievement of the outcome,

(b) a description of the proposed improvement in the achievement of the outcome, and

(c) the period within which the proposed improvement is to be achieved.

(3) In preparing a local outcomes improvement plan, a community planning partnership must consult—

(a) such community bodies as it considers appropriate, and

(b) such other persons as it considers appropriate.

(4) Before publishing a local outcomes improvement plan, the community planning partnership must take account of—

(a) any representations received by it by virtue of subsection (3), and

(b) the needs and circumstances of persons residing in the area of the local authority to which the plan relates.

6  Local outcomes improvement plan: review

(1) Each community planning partnership must keep under review the question of whether it is making progress in improving the achievement of each local outcome referred to in section 5(2)(a).

(2) Each community planning partnership—

(a) must from time to time review the local outcomes improvement plan published by it under section 5,

(b) may, following such a review, revise the plan.

(3) Subsections (3) and (4) of section 5 apply in relation to a local outcomes improvement plan revised under subsection (2)(b) as they apply in relation to a local outcomes improvement plan prepared and published under subsection (1) of that section (but subject to the modification in subsection (4)).

(4) The modification is that the reference in subsection (4)(a) of section 5 to representations received by virtue of subsection (3) of that section is to be read as if it were a reference to representations received by virtue of that subsection as applied by subsection (3) of this section.

(5) Where a community planning partnership revises a local outcomes improvement plan under subsection (2)(b), it must publish a revised plan.
(6) Subsection (2) applies in relation to a revised local outcomes improvement plan published under subsection (5) as it applies in relation to a local outcomes improvement plan published under section 5; and the duty in subsection (5) applies accordingly.

7 Local outcomes improvement plan: progress report

(1) Each community planning partnership must prepare a progress report for each reporting year.

(2) A progress report is a report setting out the community planning partnership’s assessment of whether there has been any improvement in the achievement of each local outcome referred to in section 5(2)(a) during the reporting year to which the report relates.

(3) In this section, “reporting year” means—
   (a) a period of one year beginning on 1 April, or
   (b) in relation to a particular community planning partnership, a period of one year beginning on such other date as may be specified in a direction given by the Scottish Ministers to the community planning partnership.

8 Governance

(1) For the area of each local authority, each community planning partner mentioned in subsection (2) must—
   (a) facilitate community planning,
   (b) take reasonable steps to ensure that the community planning partnership carries out its functions under this Part efficiently and effectively.

(2) The persons are—
   (a) the local authority,
   (b) the Health Board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 whose area includes, or is the same as, the area of the local authority,
   (c) Highlands and Islands Enterprise where the area within which, or in relation to which, it exercises functions in accordance with section 21(1) of the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Act 1990 includes the whole or part of the area of the local authority,
   (d) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
   (e) the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service,
   (f) Scottish Enterprise.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations modify subsection (2) so as to—
   (a) add a person or a description of person,
   (b) remove an entry listed in it,
   (c) amend an entry listed in it.
9 Community planning partners: duties

(1) Despite the duties imposed on community planning partners by this Part, a community planning partnership may agree—

(a) that a particular community planning partner need not comply with a duty in relation to a particular local outcome, or

(b) that a particular community planning partner need comply with a duty in relation to a particular local outcome only to such extent as may be so agreed.

(2) Each community planning partner must co-operate with the other community planning partners in carrying out community planning.

(3) Each community planning partner must, in relation to a community planning partnership, contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the community planning partnership considers appropriate—

(a) with a view to improving, or contributing to an improvement in, the achievement of each local outcome referred to in section 5(2)(a), and

(b) for the purpose of securing the participation of the community bodies mentioned in section 4(5)(a) in community planning.

(4) Each community planning partner must provide such information to the community planning partnership about the local outcomes referred to in section 5(2)(a) as the community planning partnership may request.

(5) Each community planning partner must, in carrying out its functions, take account of the local outcomes improvement plan published under section 5 or, as the case may be, section 6(5).

10 Guidance

(1) Each community planning partnership must comply with any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the carrying out of functions conferred on the partnership by this Part.

(2) Each community planning partner must comply with any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the carrying out of functions conferred on the partner by this Part.

(3) Before issuing guidance of the type mentioned in subsection (1) or (2), the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they think fit.

11 Duty to promote community planning

The Scottish Ministers must promote community planning when carrying out any of their functions which might affect—

(a) community planning,

(b) a community planning partner.
12 Establishment of corporate bodies

(1) Following an application by a local authority and at least one other community planning partner for the area of the authority, the Scottish Ministers may by regulations establish a body corporate with such constitution and functions about community planning (including in particular its conduct and co-ordination) as may be specified in the regulations.

(2) The application referred to in subsection (1) must include information about the following matters—

(a) any consultation about the question of whether to make the application,

(b) representations received in response to any such consultation,

(c) the functions to be specified in regulations made under subsection (1),

(d) such other matters as may be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by regulations.

(3) Regulations under subsection (1) may include provision about—

(a) the membership of the body established by the regulations,

(b) the proceedings of the body,

(c) the transfer of property and other rights and liabilities to and from the body,

(d) the appointment and employment of staff by the body,

(e) the supply by other persons of services to the body,

(f) the audit of accounts by the body,

(g) the dissolution of the body, and

(h) such other matters as the Scottish Ministers think fit.

(4) A function may be specified in regulations under subsection (1) even if another enactment or rule of law—

(a) provides that the function is to be carried out by a person other than the body established by virtue of subsection (1), or

(b) prevents the carrying out of the function by that body.

13 Interpretation of Part 2

In this Part—

“community bodies” has the meaning given by section 4(8),

“community planning” has the meaning given by section 4(2),

“community planning partner” has the meaning given by section 4(4),

“community planning partnership” has the meaning given by section 4(4), “local outcomes” has the meaning given by section 4(3).

PART 3
PARTICIPATION REQUESTS

Key definitions

14 Meaning of “community-controlled body”
In this Part, a “community-controlled body” means a body (whether corporate or unincorporated) having a written constitution that includes the following—

(a) a definition of the community to which the body relates,
(b) provision that the majority of the members of the body is to consist of members of that community,
(c) provision that the members of the body who consist of members of that community have control of the body,
(d) provision that membership of the body is open to any member of that community,
(e) a statement of the body’s aims and purposes, including the promotion of a benefit for that community, and
(f) provision that any surplus funds or assets of the body are to be applied for the benefit of that community.

15 Meaning of “community participation body”
(1) In this Part, “community participation body” means—

(a) a community-controlled body,
(b) a community council established in accordance with Part 4 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, or
(c) a body mentioned in subsection (2).

(2) The body is a body (whether corporate or unincorporated)—

(a) that is designated as a community participation body by an order made by the Scottish Ministers for the purposes of this Part, or
(b) that falls within a class of bodies designated as community participation bodies by such an order for the purposes of this Part.

(3) Where the power to make an order under subsection (2)(a) is exercised in relation to a trust, the community participation body is to be the trustees of the trust.

16 Meaning of “public service authority”
(1) In this Part, “public service authority” means—

(a) a person listed, or of a description listed, in schedule 2, or
(b) a person mentioned in subsection (3).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 2 so as to—

(a) remove an entry listed in it,
(b) amend an entry listed in it.

(3) The person is a person—
(a) that is designated as a public service authority by an order made by the Scottish Ministers for the purposes of this Part, or
(b) that falls within a class of persons designated as public service authorities by such an order for the purposes of this Part.

(4) An order under subsection (3) may designate a person, or class of persons, only if the person, or (as the case may be) each of the persons falling within the class, is—
(a) a part of the Scottish Administration,
(b) a Scottish public authority with mixed functions or no reserved functions (within the meaning of the Scotland Act 1998), or
(c) a publicly-owned company.

(5) In subsection (4)(c), “publicly-owned company” means a company that is wholly owned by one or more public service authorities.

(6) For that purpose, a company is wholly owned by one or more public service authorities if it has no members other than—
(a) the public service authority or (as the case may be) authorities,
(b) other companies that are wholly owned by the public service authority or (as the case may be) authorities, or
(c) persons acting on behalf of—
(i) the public service authority or (as the case may be) authorities, or
(ii) such other companies.

(7) In this section, “company” includes any body corporate.

(8) Subsection (9) applies where the Scottish Ministers make an order under subsection (3).

(9) The Scottish Ministers may specify in the order a public service that is or may be provided by or on behalf of the person designated, or (as the case may be) a person falling within the class designated, in respect of which a specified outcome may not be specified in a participation request.

Participation requests

17 Participation requests

(1) A community participation body may make a request to a public service authority to permit the body to participate in an outcome improvement process.

(2) In making such a request, the community participation body must—
(a) specify an outcome that results from, or is contributed to by virtue of, the provision of a service provided to the public by or on behalf of the authority,
(b) set out the reasons why the community participation body considers it should participate in the outcome improvement process,
(c) provide details of any knowledge, expertise and experience the community participation body has in relation to the specified outcome, and
(d) provide an explanation of the improvement in the specified outcome which the community participation body anticipates may arise as a result of its participation in the process.
(3) A participation request may be made jointly by two or more community participation bodies.

(4) In this Part—

“outcome improvement process”, in relation to a public service authority, means a process established or to be established by the authority with a view to improving an outcome that results from, or is contributed to by virtue of, the provision of a public service,

“participation request” means a request made under subsection (1),

“public service” means a service provided to the public by or on behalf of a public service authority, “specified outcome” means an outcome of the type mentioned in subsection (2)(a).

18 Regulations

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision about participation requests.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may in particular make provision for or in connection with specifying—

(a) the manner in which requests are to be made,

(b) the procedure to be followed by public service authorities in relation to requests,

(c) the information to be provided in connection with requests (in addition to that required under section 17(2)).

Decisions about participation requests

19 Participation requests: decisions

(1) This section applies where a participation request is made by a community participation body to a public service authority.

(2) The authority must decide whether to agree to or refuse the participation request.

(3) In reaching its decision under subsection (2), the authority must take into consideration the following matters—

(a) the reasons set out in the request under section 17(2)(b),

(b) any other information provided in support of the request (whether such other information is contained in the request or otherwise provided),

(c) whether agreeing to the request mentioned in subsection (2) would be likely to promote or improve—

(i) economic development,

(ii) regeneration,

(iii) public health,

(iv) social wellbeing, or

(v) environmental wellbeing,
(d) any other benefits that might arise if the request were agreed to, and
(e) any other matter (whether or not included in or arising out of the request) that the authority considers relevant.

(4) The authority must exercise the function under subsection (2) in a manner which encourages equal opportunities and in particular the observance of the equal opportunity requirements.

(5) The authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it.

(6) The authority must, before the end of the period mentioned in subsection (7), give notice
(in this Part, a “decision notice”) to the community participation body of—
(a) its decision to agree to or refuse the request, and
(b) if its decision is to refuse the request, the reasons for the decision.

(7) The period is—
(a) a period prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers, or
(b) such longer period as may be agreed between the authority and the community participation body.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision about—
(a) the information (in addition to that required under this Part) that a decision notice is to contain, and
(b) the manner in which a decision notice is to be given.

20 Decision notice: information about outcome improvement process

(1) This section applies where a public service authority gives a decision notice agreeing to a participation request by a community participation body.

(2) Where the authority at the time of giving the notice has established an outcome improvement process, the decision notice must—
(a) describe the operation of the outcome improvement process,
(b) specify what stage in the process has been reached,
(c) explain how and to what extent the community participation body is expected to participate in the process, and
(d) if any other person participates in the process, describe how the person participates.

(3) Where the authority at the time of giving the notice has not established an outcome improvement process, the decision notice must—
(a) describe how the proposed process is intended to operate,
(b) explain how and to what extent the community participation body which made the participation request is expected to participate in the proposed process, and
(c) if any other person is expected to participate in the proposed process, describe how the person is expected to participate.
Proposed outcome improvement process

(1) This section applies where a public service authority gives a community participation body a decision notice as mentioned in section 20(3).

(2) The community participation body may make written representations in relation to the proposed outcome improvement process.

(3) Any representations under subsection (2) must be made before the end of the period of 28 days beginning with the day on which the notice is given.

(4) Before giving notice under subsection (5), the authority must take into consideration any representations made under subsection (2).

(5) The authority must, before the end of the period of 28 days beginning with the day after the expiry of the period mentioned in subsection (3), give a notice to the community participation body containing details of the outcome improvement process that is to be established.

(6) The authority must publish such information about the process as may be specified in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

(7) The authority must publish the information mentioned in subsection (6) on a website or by other electronic means.

Power to decline certain participation requests

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a participation request (a “new request”) is made to a public service authority,

(b) the new request relates to matters that are the same, or substantially the same, as matters contained in a previous participation request (a “previous request”), and

(c) the previous request was made in the period of two years ending with the date on which the new request is made.

(2) The public service authority may decline to consider the new request.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b), a new request relates to matters that are the same, or substantially the same, as matters contained in a previous request only if both requests relate to—

(a) the same public service, and

(b) the same, or substantially the same, outcome that results from, or is contributed to by virtue of, the provision of the public service.

(4) For the purposes of this section, it is irrelevant whether the body making a new request is the same body as, or a different body from, that which made the previous request.

Outcome improvement processes

Duty to establish and maintain outcome improvement process

A public service authority that gives notice under section 21(5) must—

(a) before the end of the period of 90 days beginning with the day on which the notice is given, establish the outcome improvement process in respect of which the notice is given by taking whatever steps are necessary to initiate the process, and

(b) maintain that process.
24 Modification of outcome improvement process

(1) This section applies where a public service authority establishes an outcome improvement process under section 23(a) following a participation request by a community participation body.

(2) Following consultation with the community participation body, the authority may modify the outcome improvement process.

(3) Where the outcome improvement process is modified under subsection (2), the authority must publish such information about the modification as may be specified in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

---

25 Reporting

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a participation request has been made, and

(b) the outcome improvement process relating to that request is complete.

(2) The public service authority that established the process must publish a report—

(a) summarising the outcomes of the process, including whether (and, if so, how and to what extent) the specified outcome to which the process related has been improved,

(b) describing how and to what extent the participation of the community participation body that made the participation request to which the process related influenced the process and the outcomes, and

(c) explaining how the authority intends to keep the community participation body and any other persons informed about—

(i) changes in the outcomes of the process, and

(ii) any other matters relating to the outcomes.

(3) The authority must publish the report mentioned in subsection (2) on a website or by other electronic means.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision about reports published under subsection (2), including the information (in addition to that required under that subsection) that reports are to contain.

---

26 Interpretation of Part 3

In this Part—

“community-controlled body” has the meaning given by section 14,

“community participation body” has the meaning given by section 15(1),

“constitution”, in relation to a company, means the memorandum and articles of association of the company,

“decision notice” is to be construed in accordance with section 19(6),
“equal opportunities” and “equal opportunity requirements” have the same meanings as in Section L2 (equal opportunities) of Part 2 of Schedule 5 to the Scotland Act 1998,

“outcome improvement process” has the meaning given by section 17(4),

“participation request” has the meaning given by section 17(4),

“public service” has the meaning given by section 17(4),

“public service authority” has the meaning given by section 16, “specified outcome” has the meaning given by section 17(4).

PART 4

COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY LAND

Modifications of Part 2 of Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003

27 Nature of land in which community interest may be registered

(1) In section 33 of the 2003 Act (registrable land)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) the words “The land in which” are repealed,

(ii) for the words “(registrable land)” is” substitute “in”,

(b) in subsection (2), for the words “described as such in an order made by Ministers” substitute “consisting of mineral rights to oil, coal, gas, gold or silver which are owned separately from the land in respect of which they are exigible”,

(c) after subsection (2), insert—

“(2A) Subject to subsections (1) and (2), land in which a community interest may be registered under this Part includes land consisting of—

(a) salmon fishings, or

(b) mineral rights, which are owned separately from the land in respect of which they are exigible.”, and

(d) subsections (3) to (7) are repealed.

(2) The title to section 33 of the 2003 Act becomes “Land in respect of which community interest may be registered”.

28 Meaning of “community”

(1) Section 34 of the 2003 Act (definition of “community”) is amended as follows.

(2) Before subsection (1), insert—

“(A1) A community body is, subject to subsection (4)—

(a) a body falling within subsection (1) or (1A), or

(b) a body of such other description as may be prescribed which complies with prescribed requirements.”.
(3) In subsection (1)—

(a) for the words “community body is, subject to subsection (4) below” substitute “body falls within this subsection if it is”;

(b) in paragraph (f), the words “and the auditing of its accounts” are repealed,

(c) after paragraph (f) insert—

“(fa) provision that, on the request of any person for a copy of the minutes of a meeting of the company, the company must, if the request is reasonable, give the person within 28 days of the request a copy of those minutes,

(fb) provision that, where a request of the type mentioned in paragraph (fa) is made, the company—

(i) may withhold information contained in the minutes, and

(ii) if it does so, must inform the person requesting a copy of the minutes of its reasons for doing so,”, and

(d) in paragraph (h)—

(i) in sub-paragraph (i), for “or crofting community body” substitute “, crofting community body or Part 3A community body (as defined in section 97D)”, and

(ii) in sub-paragraph (ii), for “or crofting community body” substitute “, crofting community body or Part 3A community body (as so defined)”.

(4) After subsection (1), insert—

“(1A) A body falls within this subsection if it is a Scottish charitable incorporated organisation (a “SCIO”) the constitution of which includes the following—

(a) a definition of the community to which the SCIO relates,

(b) provision enabling the SCIO to exercise the right to buy land under this Part,

(c) provision that the SCIO must have not fewer than 20 members,

(d) provision that the majority of the members of the SCIO is to consist of members of the community,

(e) provision under which the members of the SCIO who consist of members of the community have control of the SCIO,

(f) provision ensuring proper arrangements for the financial management of the SCIO,

(g) provision that, on the request of any person for a copy of the minutes of a meeting of the SCIO, the SCIO must, if the request is reasonable, give the person within 28 days of the request a copy of those minutes,

(h) provision that, where a request of the type mentioned in paragraph (g) is made, the SCIO—

(i) may withhold information contained in the minutes, and

(ii) if it does so, must inform the person requesting a copy of the minutes of its reasons for doing so, and

(i) provision that any surplus funds or assets of the SCIO are to be applied for the benefit of the community.”.
(5) In subsection (2), after “(1)(c)” insert “or (1A)(c)”.

(6) After subsection (4), insert—

“(4A) Ministers may by regulations from time to time amend subsections (1) and (1A).

(4B) If provision is made under subsection (A1)(b), Ministers may by regulations make such amendment of section 35(A1) and (1) in consequence of that provision as they consider necessary or expedient.”.

(7) In subsection (5)—

(a) the words “Unless Ministers otherwise direct” are repealed,

(b) in paragraph (a), at the end, insert “or a prescribed type of area (or both such unit and type of area)”;

(c) in paragraph (b)(i), at the end, insert “or in that prescribed type of area”, and

(d) in paragraph (b)(ii), after “units” insert “or that prescribed type of area”.

(8) In subsection (8)—

(a) after “section” insert “—”, and

(b) at the end insert—

“Scottish charitable incorporated organisation” has the meaning given by section 49 of the Charities and Trustee Investment (Scotland) Act 2005.”.

29 Modification of memorandum, articles of association or constitution

(1) Section 35 of the 2003 Act (provisions supplementary to section 34) is amended as follows.

(2) Before subsection (1) insert—

“(A1) During the relevant period, a community body may not modify its memorandum, articles of association or constitution without Ministers’ consent in writing.

(A2) In subsection (A1), “relevant period” means the period—

(a) beginning on the day on which the community body submits an application under section 37(1) for registration of a community interest in land, and

(b) ending with—

(i) registration of the community interest in land,

(ii) a decision by Ministers that the community interest in land should not be registered,

(iii) Ministers declining, by virtue of section 39(5), to consider the application, or

(iv) withdrawal of the application.”.

(3) In subsection (1), for “or articles of association” substitute “, articles of association or constitution”.

22
30 Period for indicating approval under section 38 of 2003 Act

In section 38 of the 2003 Act (criteria for registration)—

(a) in subsection (2), at the beginning insert “Subject to subsection (2A) below,”,

(b) after that subsection, insert—

“(2A) Ministers may not take into account, for the purposes of subsection (2), the approval of a member of the community if the approval was indicated earlier than 6 months before the date on which the application to register the community interest in land to which the approval relates was made.”.

31 Procedure for late applications

(1) Section 39 of the 2003 Act (procedure for late applications) is amended in accordance with this section.

(2) For subsection (1), substitute—

“(1) This section (other than subsections (4A) and (5)) applies in relation to an application to register a community interest in land which satisfies—

(a) the conditions mentioned in subsection (1A), or

(b) the condition mentioned in subsection (1B).

(1A) The conditions are that—

(a) before the date on which the application is received by Ministers, the owner of the land or, as the case may be, a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land has taken action which, if a community interest had been registered, would be prohibited under section 40(1), and

(b) on the date on which the application is received by Ministers—

(i) missives for the sale and purchase of the land in pursuance of that action have not been concluded, or

(ii) an option to acquire the land in pursuance of that action has not been conferred.

(1B) The condition is that, where another community body has registered an interest in the land, the application is received by Ministers—

(a) after the date on which the owner of the land or, as the case may be, a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land has, under section 48(1), notified that community body that a transfer is proposed, and

(b) before Ministers have consented, under section 51(1), to a transfer to that community body.”.

(3) In subsection (2)—

(a) after paragraph (a), insert—

“(aa) Ministers may, before the end of the period of 7 days following receipt of the views of the owner of the land or, as the case may be, such a creditor under that section, request—
(i) the owner, such a creditor or the community body making the application to provide such further information as they consider necessary in connection with their being informed as mentioned in paragraph (a), and

(ii) that the further information be supplied within 7 days of the request,”,

(b) in paragraph (b)(ii), after ““30”” insert “or (in a case where further information is requested under paragraph (aa)) “44””.

(4) In subsection (3), for paragraph (a) substitute—

“(a) that—

(i) such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out by a person, or

(ii) such relevant steps as Ministers consider reasonable were taken by a person,

(aa) that the relevant work was carried out or the relevant steps were taken—

(i) at a time which, in the opinion of Ministers, was sufficiently in advance of the owner of the land or, as the case may be, the creditor taking the action such as is mentioned in subsection (1A), or giving notice such as is mentioned in subsection (1B),

(ii) in respect of land with a view to the land being used for purposes that are the same as those proposed for the land in relation to which the application relates, and

(iii) by the community body making the application or by another person with a view to the application being made by the community body,”.

(5) After subsection (3), insert—

“(3A) Ministers may, before the end of the period of 7 days following receipt under section 37(5) of the views of the owner of the land or, as the case may be, a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land, request—

(a) any person they believe may be able to provide them with such further information as they consider necessary in connection with the matters mentioned in subsection (3) to provide the information, and

(b) that the information be supplied within 7 days of the request.”.

(6) In subsection (4)(c), after ““59(1)” insert “, 60A(1)”.

(7) After subsection (4), insert—

“(4A) Subsection (5) applies in relation to an application to register a community interest in land where the application is received by Ministers after the following have occurred—

(a) the owner of the land or, as the case may be, a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land has taken action which, if a community interest in land had been registered, would be prohibited under section 40(1), and

(b) either—
(i) missives for the sale and purchase of the land are concluded, or
(ii) an option to acquire the land is conferred.”.

(8) In subsection (5), the words from “Where” to “land” are repealed.

(9) After subsection (5), insert—

“(6) In subsection (3)—

“relevant work” means anything done by way of preparation of an application to register a community interest in land, “relevant steps” means any steps towards securing ownership of land by a community body.

(7) In subsection (6), “land” means any land whether or not it is land in respect of which an application in relation to which this section applies is made.”.

32  Evidence and notification of concluded missives or option agreements

After section 39 of the 2003 Act, insert—

“39A  Evidence and notification of concluded missives or option agreements

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) an application to register a community interest in land is made,
(b) on the date on which the application is received by Ministers—
   (i) missives for the sale and purchase of the land have been concluded, or
   (ii) an agreement conferring an option to acquire the land exists, and
(c) the application does not disclose that such missives have been concluded or such an agreement has been conferred.

(2) The owner of the land or, as the case may be, a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land must, within 21 days of receiving a copy of the application under section 37(5)(a)—

(a) provide Ministers with evidence of the concluded missives or (as the case may be) the agreement,
(b) where there is an agreement such as is mentioned in subsection (1)(b)(ii) which contains a date on which it will expire—
   (i) notify Ministers of that date, and
   (ii) provide Ministers with information about whether, and if so how, the agreement is capable of being extended.

(3) Subsection (4) applies where—

(a) an application to register a community interest in land is made,
(b) on the date on which the application is received by Ministers—
   (i) missives for the sale and purchase of the land have been concluded, or
   (ii) an agreement conferring an option to acquire the land exists, the application discloses that such missives have been concluded or such an agreement has been conferred, and accordingly, by virtue of section 39(4A) and (5), no copy of the application is sent to the owner of the land or, as the case may be, a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land.

(4) Ministers must—

(a) send a copy of the application and the accompanying information to the owner of the land or, as the case may be, the creditor,

(b) notify the owner of the land or, as the case may be, the creditor that Ministers must decline to consider the application by virtue of section 39(5), and

(c) require the owner of the land or, as the case may be, the creditor to provide Ministers with the information mentioned in subsection (5) within 21 days of receipt of the copy of the application sent under paragraph (a).

(5) The information is—

(a) evidence of the concluded missives or, as the case may be, the agreement, and

(b) where there is an agreement such as is mentioned in subsection (3)(b)(ii) which contains a date on which it will expire—

(i) that date, and

(ii) information about whether, and if so how, the agreement is capable of being extended.”.

Notification of transfer

In section 41 of the 2003 Act (provisions supplementary to and explanatory of section 40), after subsection (2), insert—

“(3) Where an owner of land or a creditor in a standard security having a right to sell land makes a transfer of land as mentioned in any of paragraphs (a) to (h) of subsection (4) of section 40, the owner of the land or, as the case may be, the creditor must within 28 days of the transfer—

(a) notify Ministers of—

(i) the transfer,

(ii) the name and address of the person to whom the land was transferred, and

(iii) the date of the transfer, and

(b) provide Ministers with a description of the land transferred, including maps, plans or other drawings prepared to such specifications as may be prescribed.”.

Changes to information relating to registered interests

After section 44 of the 2003 Act, insert—
“44A  Duty to notify changes to information relating to registered interest

(1) This section applies where a community interest in land is registered in pursuance of an application under section 37.

(2) Where—

(a) the application contains information enabling Ministers to contact the community body which made the application, and

(b) there is a change in that information, the community body must, as soon as reasonably practicable after the change, notify Ministers of the change.

(3) Where—

(a) the application contains information enabling Ministers to contact the owner of the land to which the application relates, and the owner must, as soon as reasonably practicable after the change, notify Ministers of the change.

(b) there is a change in that information,

(4) Where—

(a) the application contains information relating to a creditor in a standard security over an interest in the land, and the owner of the land to which the application relates must, as soon as reasonably practicable after the change, notify Ministers of the change.

(b) there is a change in that information,

(5) Subsection (6) applies where—

(a) there is a creditor in a standard security over an interest in the land to which the application relates, but

(b) the application does not disclose the existence of the creditor (whether because the standard security did not exist at the time the application was made or otherwise).

(6) The owner of the land to which the application relates must, as soon as reasonably practicable after the interest in land is registered—

(a) notify Ministers of the existence of the creditor, and

(b) provide Ministers with such information relating to the creditor as would enable Ministers to contact the creditor.

(7) Subsection (8) applies where there is a change in information provided by a community body or an owner of land in pursuance of the duty under subsection (2), (3), (4) or (6).

(8) The community body or, as the case may be, the owner of the land must as soon as reasonably practicable after the change notify Ministers of the change.”.

Notification under section 50 of 2003 Act

In section 50 of the 2003 Act (power to activate right to buy land where breach of Part 2)—
(a) in subsection (3)(b), after “land”, insert “, to any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land”, and

(b) after subsection (5), insert—

“(6) For the purposes of subsection (2)(c), the circumstances in which a community interest in land remains in effect include that—

(a) the community body that applied under subsection (1) has, in accordance with subsection (2) of section 44, applied to re-register the interest, and

(b) the Keeper has, by virtue of a direction under subsection (3) of that section, re-entered the interest in the Register.”.

36 Approval of members of community to buy land

In section 51 of the 2003 Act (exercise of right to buy: approval of community and consent of Ministers), in subsection (2)(a)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (i)—

(i) for the words “at least half” substitute “the proportion”,

(ii) after “above,” insert “who”, and

(iii) after “land” insert “is, in the circumstances, sufficient to justify the community body’s proceeding to buy the land;”,

(b) the word “; or” immediately following sub-paragraph (i) is repealed, and

(c) sub-paragraph (ii) is repealed.

37 Appointment of person to conduct ballot on proposal to buy land

After section 51 of the 2003 Act, insert—

“51A Ballots under section 51: appointment of ballotter, etc.

(1) The ballot is to be conducted by a person (the “ballotter”) appointed by Ministers who appears to them to be independent and to have knowledge and experience of conducting ballots.

(2) Ministers must, within the period mentioned in subsection (3), provide the ballotter with—

(a) a copy of the application made by the community body under section 37 to register an interest in the land in relation to which the body has confirmed it will exercise the right to buy, and

(b) such other information as may be prescribed.

(3) The period is the period of 28 days beginning with the date on which a valuer is appointed under section 59(1) in respect of the land in relation to which the community body has confirmed it will exercise the right to buy.

(4) Ministers must provide the community body with such details of the ballotter as will enable the community body to contact the ballotter.

(5) The community body must, before the end of the period of 7 days following receipt of notification under section 60(2) of the valuation of the land, provide the ballotter with wording for the proposition mentioned in section 51(2)(b); and the ballotter must conduct the ballot on the basis of such wording.
(6) At the same time as providing that wording, the community body must also provide the ballotter, in such form as may be prescribed, with such information as may be prescribed relating to—

(a) the community body,

(b) its proposals for use of the land in relation to which it has confirmed it will exercise its right to buy,

(c) the valuation, and

(d) any other matters.

(7) The expense of conducting the ballot is to be met by Ministers.”.

38 Consent under section 51 of 2003 Act: prescribed information

After section 51A of the 2003 Act (inserted by section 37), insert—

“51B Consent under section 51: duty to provide information

(1) For the purposes of deciding whether they are satisfied as mentioned in section 51(3) in relation to a community body, Ministers must take into account—

(a) the information mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) any other information they consider relevant.

(2) The information referred to in subsection (1)(a) is information—

(a) provided by the community body, and

(b) that is of such a kind as may be prescribed.

(3) Information mentioned in subsection (2) must be provided in the prescribed form.

(4) Information that may be prescribed under subsection (2)(b) includes, in particular—

(a) information relating to the matters mentioned in section 51(3), and

(b) additional information relating to such information.

(5) Ministers may, no later than 7 days after receiving the information mentioned in subsection (2), request the community body to provide such further information as they consider necessary.

(6) The community body must, no later than 7 days after receiving any such request, provide Ministers with the further information requested.”.

39 Representations etc. regarding circumstances affecting ballot result

After section 51B of the 2003 Act (inserted by section 38), insert—

“51C Circumstances affecting result of ballot

(1) Within 7 days of receipt by the community body of notification under section 52(3) of the result of the ballot, the body may make representations to Ministers in writing about any circumstances that the body considers have affected the result of the ballot.

(2) Where the community body makes such representations it must, when making them—
(a) provide Ministers with such evidence as is reasonably necessary to establish the existence and effect of the circumstances to which the representations relate, and

(b) send a copy of the representations and the evidence to the owner of the land to which the ballot relates.

(3) Within 7 days of receipt of any representations under subsection (1), Ministers may request the community body to provide such further information relating to the representations or related evidence as they think fit.

(4) Within 7 days of receiving such a request, the community body must respond to it.

(5) Within 7 days of receipt of a copy of the representations and evidence under subsection (2)(b), the owner of the land may provide Ministers with comments on the representations and evidence.

(6) Where the owner of the land provides comments under subsection (5) the owner must, when providing them, send a copy of the comments to the community body.

(7) Within 7 days of receipt of a copy of comments under subsection (6), the community body may give Ministers views on the comments.

(8) Within 7 days of receiving such views under subsection (7), Ministers may request the community body to provide such further information relating to the views as they think fit.

(9) Within 7 days of receiving such a request, the community body must respond to it.

(10) In deciding whether they are satisfied as mentioned in section 51(2)(a), Ministers must take account of any—

(a) representations made under subsection (1),

(b) evidence provided under subsection (2)(a),

(c) further information provided under subsection (4) or (9),

(d) comments under subsection (5), and

(e) views under subsection (7).”.

(2) In section 51 of the 2003 Act (exercise of right to buy: approval of community and consent of Ministers), after subsection (6), insert—

“(6A) Where a community body makes representations under section 51C(1), the references to 21 days in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (6) are to be read as references to 35 days.”.

---

40 Ballot not conducted as prescribed

In section 52 of the 2003 Act (ballot procedure), after subsection (6) (inserted by schedule 4), insert—

“(7) Provision may be prescribed for or in connection with—

(a) reviewing whether a ballot was conducted in accordance with provision prescribed under subsection (1),
(b) providing notification to such persons, or description of persons, as may be prescribed that a ballot has not been so conducted,

c) in a case where a ballot has not been so conducted, requiring a further ballot to be conducted on such a basis, and by such persons or description of persons, as may be prescribed,

(d) requiring any such further ballot to be conducted—

(i) in compliance with such conditions as may be prescribed (including conditions that the ballot be conducted in accordance with provision prescribed under subsection (1)),

(ii) within such timescales as may be prescribed,

(e) specifying persons, or descriptions of persons, who are to meet the expenses of conducting any such further ballot,

(f) specifying that any review mentioned in paragraph (a) be carried out by—

(i) such persons,

(ii) such description of persons, or

(iii) such a court or tribunal,

as may be prescribed,

(g) specifying the action that may be taken by such persons, persons of such description or such a court or tribunal following such a review.”.

41 Period in which ballot results and valuations are to be notified

(1) In section 52 of the 2003 Act (ballot procedure), in subsection (4), for the words from “28 days” to the end of the subsection, substitute “12 weeks beginning with—

(a) the date on which a valuer is appointed under section 59(1) in respect of the land in relation to which the community body has confirmed it will exercise its right to buy, or

(b) where—

(i) the ballotter receives notification under subsection (3C) of section 60, and

(ii) the date notified under paragraph (c) of that subsection is after the end of the 12 week period beginning with the date on which a valuer is appointed as mentioned in paragraph (a) above, the day following the date notified to the ballotter under paragraph (c) of that subsection.”.

(2) In section 60 of the 2003 Act (procedure for valuation), after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) An application under subsection (3) must be made within the period of 21 days beginning with the date of appointment of the valuer.

(3B) Any longer period as mentioned in that subsection must be fixed under that subsection within the period of 7 days beginning with the day on which the application was received.
(3C) Where such a longer period is fixed, Ministers must notify the persons mentioned in subsection (3D) of—

(a) the fact that a longer period has been so fixed,
(b) the length of the period, and
(c) the date on which the period ends.

(3D) The persons are—

(a) the community body which is exercising its right to buy the land,
(b) the person appointed to conduct the ballot in relation to the land, and
(c) the owner of the land.”.

42 Exercise of right to buy: date of entry and payment of price

In section 56 of the 2003 Act (procedure for buying)—

(a) in subsection (3)(a), for the word “6” substitute “8”, and
(b) after subsection (6), insert—

“(7) Where a later date is agreed as mentioned in subsection (3)(c), the community body must, within 7 days of the agreement—

(a) notify Ministers in writing of the agreement,
(b) inform Ministers—

(i) of the date on which the agreement was made, and
(ii) what the later date is, and
(c) provide evidence to Ministers of the matters mentioned in paragraph (b).”.

43 Views on representations under section 60 of 2003 Act

In section 60 of the 2003 Act (procedure for valuation)—

(a) after subsection (1), insert—

“(1A) Where written representations under subsection (1) are received—

(a) from the owner of the land, the valuer must invite the community body which is exercising its right to buy the land to send its views on the representations in writing,
(b) from the community body which is exercising its right to buy the land, the valuer must invite the owner of the land to send the owner’s views on the representations in writing.

(1B) In carrying out a valuation under section 59, the valuer must consider any views sent under subsection (1A).”, and
(b) in subsection (3), for the word “6” substitute “8”.

44 Expenses of valuation of land

After section 60 of the 2003 Act, insert—
“60A Liability of owner of land for valuation expenses

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) Ministers have received a confirmation sought by them under section 49(2)(a) that a community body will exercise its right to buy land in which it has a registered interest, and

(b) after Ministers have appointed a valuer under section 59(1) to assess the value of the land, the owner of the land gives notice under section 54(5) of the owner’s decision not to proceed further with the proposed transfer.

(2) Ministers may require the owner of the land to pay any expense incurred by them in connection with the valuation of the land under section 59 by sending the owner a demand for payment of the expense.

(3) Where Ministers are considering sending a demand under subsection (2), they may request the owner of the land to provide such information as they consider necessary for the purposes of enabling Ministers to determine whether or not to send the demand.

(4) The owner of the land may, within 21 days of the receipt of a demand under subsection (2), appeal to the sheriff against the demand.

(5) The decision of the sheriff in an appeal under subsection (4) is final.

(6) The owner of the land must pay the amount specified in a demand under subsection (2)—

(a) within 28 days of receipt, or

(b) where an appeal against the demand is made under subsection (4) and not upheld, within 28 days of the determination of the appeal.”.

45 Creditors in standard security with right to sell land: appeals

In section 61 of the 2003 Act (appeals)—

(a) after subsection (3), insert—

“(3A) A creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land may appeal to the sheriff against—

(a) a decision by Ministers that a community interest in the land is to be entered in the Register, or

(b) a decision by Ministers to give consent to the exercise by a community body of its right to buy the land.”,

(b) in subsection (4), for the words “or (3)” substitute “, (3) or (3A)”, and

(c) in subsection (6)—

(i) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (a)(i) is repealed,

(ii) in paragraph (a), after sub-paragraph (ii), insert “and

(iii) any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land to which the appeal relates;”,

(iii) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (b)(i) is repealed,

(iv) for the word “or” immediately following paragraph (b)(ii) substitute “and
(iii) any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land to which the appeal relates;”;

(v) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (c)(ii) is repealed,

(vi) in paragraph (c), after sub-paragraph (iii), insert “and

(iv) any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land to which the appeal relates;”;

(vii) after paragraph (c), insert “or

(d) under subsection (3A) above, the creditor must intimate that fact to—

(i) the community body,

(ii) the owner, and

(iii) Ministers.”.

46 Calculation of time periods in Part 2 of 2003 Act

After section 67 of the 2003 Act, insert—

“67A Calculation of time periods

(1) In calculating for the purposes of this Part any period of time within which an act requires to be or may be done, no account is to be taken of any public or local holidays in the place where the act is to be done.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to a period of time specified in—

(a) section 56(3)(a) or (b),

(b) section 60(3), or

(c) Chapter 6 of this Part.”.

47 Duty to provide information about community right to buy

After section 67A of the 2003 Act (inserted by section 46), insert—

“67B Duty to provide information about community right to buy

(1) Ministers may, for the purpose of monitoring or evaluating any impact that the right to buy land conferred by this Part has had or may have, request a person mentioned in subsection (2) to provide them with the information mentioned in subsection (3).

(2) The persons are—

(a) a community body,

(b) the owner or former owner of land in respect of which an application to register a community interest under section 37 was made.

(3) The information is such information as Ministers may reasonably require for the purpose mentioned in subsection (1) relating to the effects that the operation of the provisions of this Part have had, or may be expected to have, on such matters as may be specified in the request.

(4) A person to whom a request under subsection (1) is made must, to the extent that the person is able to do so, provide Ministers with the information requested.”.
Abandoned and neglected land

48 Abandoned and neglected land

After section 97A of the 2003 Act, insert—

“PART 3A

COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY ABANDONED OR NEGLECTED LAND

97B Meaning of “land”

In this Part, “land” includes—

(a) bridges and other structures built on or over land,
(b) inland waters,
(c) canals, and
(d) the foreshore, that is to say, the land between the high and low water marks of ordinary spring tides.

97C Eligible land

(1) Land is eligible for the purposes of this Part if in the opinion of Ministers it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

(2) In determining whether land is eligible, Ministers must have regard to prescribed matters.

(3) Eligible land does not include—

(a) land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual’s home unless the building or structure falls within such class or classes as may be prescribed,
(b) such land pertaining to land of the type mentioned in paragraph (a) as may be prescribed,
(c) eligible croft land (as defined in section 68(2)),
(d) any croft occupied or worked by its owner or a member of its owner’s family,
(e) land which is owned or occupied by the Crown by virtue of its having vested as bona vacantia in the Crown, or its having fallen to the Crown as ultimus haeres,
(f) land of such other descriptions or classes as may be prescribed.

(4) Ministers may prescribe descriptions or classes of building or structure which are to be treated as being an individual’s home for the purposes of subsection (3)(a).

(5) In subsection (3)(d), the reference to a croft being occupied includes—

(a) a reference to its being occupied otherwise than permanently, and
(b) a reference to its being occupied by way of the occupation by its owner of any dwelling-house on or pertaining to it.
97D Part 3A community bodies

(1) A Part 3A community body is, subject to subsection (4) below, a company limited by guarantee the articles of association of which include the following—

(a) a definition of the community to which the company relates,
(b) provision enabling the company to exercise the right to buy land under this Part,
(c) provision that the company must have not fewer than 20 members,
(d) provision that the majority of the members of the company is to consist of members of the community,
(e) provision whereby the members of the company who consist of members of the community have control of the company,
(f) provision ensuring proper arrangements for the financial management of the company,
(g) provision that any surplus funds or assets of the company are to be applied for the benefit of the community, and
(h) provision that, on the winding up of the company and after satisfaction of its liabilities, its property (including any land acquired by it under this Part) passes—

(i) to such other community body or crofting community body as may be approved by Ministers, or
(ii) if no other community body or crofting community body is so approved, to Ministers or to such charity as Ministers may direct.

(2) Ministers may, if they think it in the public interest to do so, disapply the requirement specified in subsection (1)(c) in relation to any body they may specify.

(3) In subsection (1), “company limited by guarantee” has the meaning given by section 3(3) of the Companies Act 2006.

(4) A body is not a Part 3A community body unless Ministers have given it written confirmation that they are satisfied that the main purpose of the body is consistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

(5) A community—

(a) is defined for the purposes of subsection (1)(a) by reference to a postcode unit or postcode units or a prescribed type of area (or both such unit and type of area), and
(b) comprises the persons from time to time—

(i) resident in that postcode unit or in one of those postcode units or in that prescribed type of area, and
(ii) entitled to vote, at a local government election, in a polling district which includes that postcode unit or those postcode units or that prescribed type of area (or part of it or them).
(6) In subsection (5), “postcode unit” means an area in relation to which a single postcode is used to facilitate the identification of postal service delivery points within the area.

(7) The articles of association of a company which is a Part 3A community body may, notwithstanding the generality of paragraph (h) of subsection (1), provide that its property may, in the circumstances mentioned in that paragraph, pass to another person only if that person is a charity.

(8) In this section, “charity” means a body entered in the Scottish Charity Register.

97E Provisions supplementary to section 97D

(1) A Part 3A community body which has bought land under this Part may not, for as long as the land or any part of it remains in its ownership, modify its memorandum or articles of association without Ministers’ consent in writing.

(2) If Ministers are satisfied that a Part 3A community body which has, under this Part, bought land would, had it not so bought that land, no longer be entitled to do so, they may acquire the land compulsorily.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply if the Part 3A community would no longer be entitled to buy the land because the land is not eligible for the purposes of this Part.

(4) Where the power conferred by subsection (2) is (or is to be) exercised in relation to land, Ministers may make an order relating to, or to matters connected with, the acquisition of the land.

(5) An order under subsection (4) may—

(a) apply, modify or exclude any enactment which relates to any matter as to which an order could be made under that subsection,

(b) make such modifications of enactments as appear to Ministers to be necessary or expedient in consequence of any provision of the order or otherwise in connection with the order.

97F Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

(1) The Keeper must set up and keep a register, to be known as the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land (the “Part 3A Register”).

(2) The Part 3A Register must be set up and kept so as to contain, in a manner and form convenient for public inspection, the following information and documents relating to each application to exercise the right to buy under this Part registered in it—

(a) the name and address of the registered office of the company which constitutes the Part 3A community body which has submitted the application,

(b) a copy of the application to exercise the right to buy under this Part,

(c) a copy of any notification given under section 97K(4)(b),

(d) a copy of the notice given under section 97M(1),

(e) a copy of any notice under section 97P(1),
(f) a copy of any notice under section 97P(2)(a),
(g) a copy of any notice under section 97P(2)(b),
(h) a copy of any acknowledgement sent under section 97P(3),
(i) such other information as Ministers consider appropriate.

(3) If the Part 3A community body registering an application requires that any such information or document relating to that application and falling within subsection (4) as is specified in the requirement be withheld from public inspection, that information or document is to be kept by or on behalf of Ministers separately from and not entered in the Register.

(4) Information or a document falls within this subsection if it relates to arrangements for the raising or expenditure of money to enable the land to which the application relates to be put to a particular use.

(5) Nothing in subsection (3) or (4) obliges an applicant Part 3A community body, or empowers Ministers to require such a body, to submit to Ministers any information or document within subsection (4).

(6) Ministers may by regulations modify—
(a) paragraphs (a) to (h) of subsection (2),
(b) subsection (3),
(c) subsection (4).

(7) The Keeper must ensure—
(a) that the Part 3A Register is, at all reasonable times, available for public inspection free of charge,
(b) that members of the public are given facilities for getting copies of entries in the Part 3A Register on payment of such charges as may be prescribed, and
(c) that any person requesting it is, on payment of such a charge, supplied with an extract entry certified to be a true copy of the original.

(8) An extract so certified is sufficient evidence of the original.

(9) In this Part, “the Keeper” means—
(a) the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland, or
(b) such other person as Ministers may appoint to carry out the Keeper’s functions under this Part.

(10) Different persons may be so appointed for different purposes.

97G Right to buy: application for consent

(1) The right to buy under this Part may be exercised only by a Part 3A community body.

(2) That right may be so exercised only with the consent of Ministers given on the written application of the Part 3A community body.

(3) That right may be exercised in relation to more than one holding of land but in order so to exercise the right an application must be made in respect of each such holding and applications so made may be differently disposed of.
(4) In subsection (3), a “holding” of land is land in the ownership of one person or in common or joint ownership.

(5) An application under this section—
   (a) must be made in the prescribed form,
   (b) must specify—
      (i) the owner of the land, and
      (ii) any creditor in a standard security over the land or any part of it, and
   (c) must include or be accompanied by information of the prescribed kind including information (provided, where appropriate, by or by reference to maps or drawings) about the matters mentioned in subsection (6).

(6) The matters are—
   (a) the reasons the Part 3A community body considers that its proposals for the land are—
      (i) in the public interest, and
      (ii) compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land,
   (b) the reasons the Part 3A community body considers that the land is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected,
   (c) the location and boundaries of the land in respect of which the right to buy is sought to be exercised,
   (d) all—
      (i) rights and interests in the land,
      (ii) sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits and fences, dykes, ditches or other boundaries in or on the land, known to the applicant body or the existence of which it is, on reasonably diligent inquiry, capable of ascertaining,
   (e) the proposed use, development and management of the land, and
   (f) whether and how the matters referred to in paragraph (e) would affect any of the facilities referred to in paragraph (d)(ii) in so far as those facilities connect with similar facilities on other land or also serve other land.

(7) A Part 3A community body applying under this section must, at the same time as it applies—
   (a) send a copy of its application and the accompanying information to the owner of the land to which the application relates, and
   (b) where there is a standard security in relation to the land or any part of it, send a copy of the application and the accompanying information to the creditor who holds the standard security and invite the creditor—
(i) to notify the Part 3A community body and Ministers, within 60 days of receipt of the invitation, if any of the circumstances set out in subsection (8) has arisen (or arises within 60 days of receipt of the invitation), and

(ii) if such notice is given, to provide Ministers, within that time, with the creditor’s views in writing on the application.

(8) Those circumstances are that—

(a) a calling-up notice has been served by the creditor under section 19 of the Conveyancing and Feudal Reform (Scotland) Act 1970 in relation to the land which the Part 3A community body is seeking to exercise its right to buy or any part of the land and that notice has not been complied with,

(b) a notice of default served by the creditor under section 21 of that Act in relation to the land or any part of the land has not been complied with and the person on whom the notice was served has not, within the period specified in section 22 of that Act, objected to the notice by way of application to the court,

(c) where that person has so objected, the court has upheld or varied the notice of default,

(d) the court has granted the creditor a warrant under section 24 of that Act in relation to the land or any part of the land.

(9) On receipt of an application under this section, Ministers must—

(a) invite—

(i) the owner of the land,

(ii) any creditor in a standard security over the land or any part of it, and

(iii) any other person whom Ministers consider to have an interest in the application, to send them, so as to be received not later than 60 days after the sending of the invitation, views in writing on the application,

(b) take reasonable steps to invite the owners of all land contiguous to the land to which the application relates to send them, so as to be received not later than 60 days after the sending of the invitation, views in writing on the application, and

(c) send copies of invitations given under paragraphs (a) and (b) to the Part 3A community body.

(10) An invitation given under subsection (9)(a)(i) must also invite the owner to give Ministers information about—

(a) whether the owner considers that it would be in the public interest for Ministers to consent to the application and, if not, the reasons the owner considers that it would not be in the public interest for such consent to be given,
(b) whether the owner’s continuing to own the land would be compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land,

(c) whether the owner considers the land to be wholly or mainly neglected or abandoned and the reasons for the owner’s view,

(d) any proposals that the owner has for the land,

(e) any rights or interests in the land of which the owner is aware that are not mentioned in the application, and

(f) any other matter that the owner considers is relevant to the application.

(11) Ministers must, as soon as practicable after receiving an application, give public notice of it and of the date by which, under subsection (9)(a), views are to be received by them and, in that notice, invite persons to send to Ministers, so as to be received by them not later than 60 days after the publication of the notice, views in writing on the application.

(12) That public notice is to be given by advertisement in such manner as may be prescribed.

(13) Ministers must—

(a) send copies of any views they receive under this section to the Part 3A community body, and

(b) invite it to send them, so as to be received by them not later than 60 days after the sending of that invitation, its responses to these views.

(14) Ministers must, when considering whether to consent to an application under this section, have regard to all views on it and responses to the views which they have received in answer to invitations under this section.

(15) Ministers must decline to consider an application which—

(a) does not comply with the requirements of or imposed under this section,

(b) is otherwise incomplete, or

(c) otherwise indicates that it is one which Ministers would be bound to reject; and Ministers are not required to comply with subsections (9) to (14) in relation to such an application.

(16) Ministers must not reach a decision on an application before—

(a) the date which is 60 days after the last date on which the Part 3A community body may provide Ministers with a response to the invitation given under subsection (13), or

(b) if by that date the Lands Tribunal has not advised Ministers of its finding on any question referred to it under section 97X in relation to the application, the date on which the Lands Tribunal provides Ministers with that finding.
(17) A Part 3A community body may require Ministers to treat as confidential any information or document relating to arrangements for the raising or expenditure of money to enable the land to be put to a particular use, being information or a document made available to Ministers for the purposes of this section.

97H Criteria for consent

Ministers must not consent to an application made under section 97G unless they are satisfied—

(a) that the land to which the application relates is eligible land,

(b) that the exercise by the Part 3A community body of the right to buy under this Part is—

(i) in the public interest, and

(ii) compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land,

(c) that, if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land,

(d) that the owner of the land is accurately identified in the application,

(e) that any creditor in a standard security over the land or any part of it is accurately identified in the application,

(f) that the owner is not—

(i) prevented from selling the land, or

(ii) subject to any enforceable personal obligation (other than an obligation arising by virtue of any right suspended by regulations under section 97N(3)) to sell the land otherwise than to the Part 3A community body,

(g) that the Part 3A community body complies with the provisions of section 97D,

(h) that—

(i) a significant number of the members of the community defined under section 97D to which the application relates have a connection with the land, or

(ii) the land is sufficiently near to land with which those members of that community have a connection,

(i) that the community so defined have approved the proposal to exercise the right to buy, and

(j) that, otherwise than by virtue of this Part, the Part 3A community body has tried and failed to buy the land.
Part 4—Community right to buy land

97J  Ballot to indicate approval for purposes of section 97H

(1) The community, defined in pursuance of section 97D in relation to a Part 3A community body which has applied to buy land, are to be taken for the purposes of section 97H(i) as having approved a proposal to buy if—

(a) a ballot of the members of the community so defined has, during the period of six months which immediately preceded the date on which the application was made, been conducted by the Part 3A community body on the question whether the Part 3A community body should buy the land,

(b) in the ballot—

(i) at least half of the members of the community so defined have voted, or

(ii) fewer than half of the members of the community so defined have voted but the proportion which voted is sufficient to justify the Part 3A community body’s proceeding to buy the land, and

(c) the majority of those voting have voted in favour of the proposition that the Part 3A community body buy the land.

(2) The ballot is to be conducted as prescribed.

(3) The provisions prescribed must in particular include provision for—

(a) the ascertainment and publication of the number of persons eligible to vote in the ballot,

(b) the number who did vote,

(c) the numbers of valid votes respectively cast for and against the proposition mentioned in subsection (1)(c), and

(d) the form and manner in which the result of the ballot is to be published.

(4) The Part 3A community body which conducts a ballot must, within 21 days of the ballot (or, if its application under section 97G is made before the expiry of that period, together with the application), and in the prescribed form of return, notify Ministers of—

(a) the result,

(b) the number of persons eligible to vote,

(c) the number of persons who voted, and

(d) the number of persons who voted in favour of the proposition mentioned in subsection (1)(c).

(5) Ministers may require the Part 3A community body—

(a) to provide such information relating to the ballot as they think fit, and

(b) to provide such information relating to any consultation with those eligible to vote in the ballot undertaken during the period in which the ballot was carried out as Ministers think fit.

(6) The expense of conducting a ballot under this section is to be met by the Part 3A community body.
(7) If the ballot is not conducted as prescribed, the Part 3A community body’s right to buy the land to which the body’s application relates is, so far as proceeding on that application, extinguished.

97K Right to buy same land exercisable by only one Part 3A community body

(1) Only one Part 3A community body may exercise the right under this Part to buy the same land.

(2) Where two or more such bodies have applied to buy the same land, it is for Ministers to decide which application is to proceed.

(3) Ministers may not make such a decision unless they have had regard to all views on each of the applications, and responses to the views, which they have received in answer to invitations under section 97G.

(4) On Ministers so deciding—
   (a) the other body’s right to buy the land which is the subject of the body’s application is, so far as proceeding on that application, extinguished, and
   (b) they must notify the bodies and each person invited, under section 97G(9)(a), to send them views on the application of that fact.

97L Consent conditions

Ministers may make their consent to an application made under section 97G subject to conditions.

97M Notification of Ministers’ decision on application

(1) Ministers must give written notice, in prescribed form, of their decision on an application made under section 97G, and their reasons for it, to—
   (a) the applicant Part 3A community body,
   (b) the owner of the land to which the application relates,
   (c) every other person who was invited, under section 97G(9)(a), to send them views on the application, and
   (d) the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland.

(2) The form of notice is to be prescribed so as to secure that the notice includes a full description of—
   (a) the land to which the application relates (provided, where appropriate, by or by reference to maps and drawings), and
   (b) where their decision is to consent to the application, any conditions imposed under section 97L.

(3) The notice given under subsection (1) must—
   (a) contain information about the consequences of the decision notified and of the rights of appeal against it given by this Part, and
   (b) state the date on which consent is given or refused.
97N Effect of Ministers’ decision on right to buy

(1) Ministers may by regulations make provision for or in connection with prohibiting, during the prescribed period, prescribed persons from transferring or otherwise dealing with land in respect of which a Part 3A community body has made an application under section 97G.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may in particular include provision—
(a) prescribing transfers or dealings which are not prohibited by the regulations,
(b) requiring or enabling prescribed persons in prescribed circumstances to register prescribed notices in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land,
(c) in prescribed circumstances, requiring prescribed information to be incorporated into prescribed deeds relating to the land.

(3) Ministers may by regulations make provision for or in connection with suspending, during the prescribed period, such rights in or over land in respect of which a Part 3A community body has made an application under section 97G as may be prescribed.

(4) Regulations under subsection (3) may in particular include provision specifying—
(a) rights to which the regulations do not apply,
(b) rights to which the regulations do not apply in prescribed circumstances.

(5) Nothing in this Part—
(a) affects the operation of an inhibition on the sale of the land,
(b) prevents an action of adjudication from proceeding, or
(c) affects the commencement, execution or operation of any other diligence.

97P Confirmation of intention to proceed with purchase and withdrawal

(1) A Part 3A community body’s right to buy land under this Act is exercisable only if, within 21 days of the date of notification under section 97S(10), it sends notice in writing confirming its intention to proceed to buy the land to—
(a) Ministers, and
(b) the owner of the land.

(2) A Part 3A community body may, at any time after—
(a) making an application under section 97G, withdraw the application, or
(b) confirming its intention to proceed under subsection (1), withdraw that confirmation, by notice in writing to that effect sent to Ministers.

(3) Ministers must, within 7 days of receipt of notice under subsection (1) or (2), acknowledge receipt and send a copy of that acknowledgement to the owner of the land.
97Q Completion of purchase

(1) It is for the Part 3A community body to secure the expeditious exercise of its right to buy and, in particular—

(a) to prepare the documents necessary to—

(i) effect the transfer to it of the land, and

(ii) impose any conditions (including any real burdens or servitudes) which Ministers, under section 97L, require to be imposed upon the title to land, and

(b) in so doing, to ensure—

(i) that the land in the application to which Ministers have consented is the same as that to be transferred, and

(ii) that the transfer is to be effected in accordance with any other conditions imposed by Ministers under section 97L.

(2) Where the Part 3A community body is unable to fulfil the duty imposed by subsection (1)(b) because the land or part of the land in respect of which Ministers’ consent was given is not owned by the person named as its owner in the application made under section 97G, it must refer that matter to Ministers.

(3) On a reference under subsection (2), Ministers must direct that the Part 3A community body’s right to buy the land is, so far as proceeding on that application, extinguished.

(4) The owner of the land being bought is obliged—

(a) to make available to the Part 3A community body such deeds and other documents as are sufficient to enable the body to proceed to complete its title to the land, and

(b) to transfer title accordingly.

(5) If, within 6 weeks of the date on which Ministers consent to an application to buy land, the owner of the land refuses or fails to make those deeds and other documents available, or they cannot be found, the Lands Tribunal may, on the application of the Part 3A community body, order the owner or any other person appearing to the Lands Tribunal to have those deeds and documents to produce them.

(6) If the owner of the land refuses or fails to effect such sufficient transfer as is mentioned in subsection (4), the Lands Tribunal may, on the application of the Part 3A community body, authorise its clerk to adjust, execute and deliver such deeds or other documents as will complete such transfer to the like force and effect as if done by the owner or person entitled.

97R Completion of transfer

(1) The consideration for the transfer of the land is its value as assessed under section 97S.

(2) Subject to subsections (3) and (4), that consideration must be paid not later than the “final settlement date”, being the date on which expires a 6 month period beginning with the date (the “consent date”) when Ministers consented to the application made under section 97G to buy the land.
(3) Where—

(a) the Part 3A community body and the owner so agree, the consideration may be paid on a date later than the final settlement date,

(b) the assessment of the valuation of the land has not been completed by a date 4 months after the consent date, the consideration must be paid not later than 2 months after the date when that assessment is completed,

(c) that valuation is the subject of an appeal which has not been determined within 4 months of the consent date, the consideration must be paid not later than 2 months after the date of that determination.

(4) If, on the date the consideration is to be paid, the owner is not able to effect the grant of a good and marketable title to the Part 3A community body—

(a) the consideration, or

(b) if, for any reason, the consideration has not been ascertained, such sum as may be fixed by the valuer appointed under section 97S as a fair estimate of what the consideration might be, must be consigned into the Lands Tribunal until that title is granted or the Part 3A community body gives notice to the Tribunal of its decision not to proceed to complete the transaction.

(5) Except where subsection (4) applies, if the consideration remains unpaid after the date not later than which it is to be paid, the Part 3A community body’s application made under section 97G in relation to the land is to be treated as withdrawn.

(6) Any heritable security which burdened the land immediately before title is granted to the Part 3A community body in pursuance of this section ceases to do so on the recording of that title in the Register of Sasines or registration in the Land Register of Scotland of the body’s interest in the land.

(7) Where such a security also burdens land other than the land in respect of which title is granted to the Part 3A community body, the security does not, by virtue of subsection (6), cease to burden that other land.

(8) Unless the creditors in right of any such security otherwise agree, the Part 3A community body must pay to them according to their respective rights and preferences any sum which would, but for this subsection, be paid to the owner by the Part 3A community body as consideration for the land.

(9) Any sum paid by a Part 3A community body under subsection (8) must be deducted from the sum which the body is to pay to the owner as consideration for the land.

97S Assessment of value of land etc.

(1) Where Ministers consent to an application made under section 97G, they must, subject to subsection (2), within 7 days of doing so appoint a valuer, being a person who appears to Ministers to be suitably qualified, independent and to have knowledge and experience of valuing land of a kind which is similar to the land being bought, to assess the value of the land to which the application relates.
(2) The validity of anything done under this section is not affected by any failure by Ministers to comply with the time limit specified in subsection (1).

(3) In assessing the value of land in pursuance of an appointment under subsection (1), a valuer—

(a) does not act on behalf of the owner of the land or of the Part 3A community body which is exercising its right to buy the land under this Part, and

(b) is to act as an expert and not as an arbiter.

(4) The value to be assessed is the market value of the land as at the date when Ministers consented to the application made under section 97G relating to the land.

(5) The “market value” of land is the aggregate of—

(a) the value it would have on the open market as between a seller and a buyer both of whom are, as respects the transaction, willing,

(b) any depreciation in the value of other land or interests belonging to the seller which may result from the transfer of land, including depreciation caused by division of the land by the transfer of land to the Part 3A community body, and

(c) the amount attributable to any disturbance to the seller which may arise in connection with the transfer of the land to the Part 3A community body.

(6) In arriving, for the purposes of this section, at the value which land would have on the open market in the circumstances mentioned in subsection (5)(a)—

(a) account may be taken, in so far as a seller and buyer such as are mentioned in subsection (5) would do so, of any factor attributable to the known existence of a person who (not being the Part 3A community body which is exercising its right to buy the land) would be willing to buy the land at a price higher than others would because of a characteristic of the land which relates peculiarly to that person’s interest in buying it,

(b) no account is to be taken of—

(i) any depreciation of the type mentioned in subsection (5)(b),

(ii) any disturbance of the type mentioned in subsection (5)(c),

(iii) the absence of the period of time during which the land would, on the open market, be likely to be advertised and exposed for sale.

(7) The expense of a valuation under this section is to be met by Ministers.

(8) In carrying out a valuation under this section, the valuer must—

(a) invite—

(i) the owner of the land, and

(ii) the Part 3A community body which is exercising its right to buy the land, the owner of the land, and

(b) consider any representations made accordingly.

(9) Where the Part 3A community body and the owner of the land have agreed the valuation of the land they must notify the valuer in writing of that valuation.

(10) The valuer must, within the period set out in subsection (11), notify Ministers, the Part 3A community body and the owner of the land of the assessed value of the land.

(11) The period referred to in subsection (10) is the period of 8 weeks beginning with the date of appointment of the valuer or such longer period as Ministers may, on an application by the valuer, fix.

(12) The validity of anything done under this Part is not affected by any failure by a valuer to comply with the time limit specified in subsection (11).

97T Compensation

(1) Any person, including an owner or former owner of land, who has incurred loss or expense—

(a) in complying with the requirements of this Part following the making of an application under section 97G by a Part 3A community body,

(b) as a result of the withdrawal by the Part 3A community body of its confirmation under section 97P or its failure otherwise to complete the purchase after having so confirmed its intention under that section, or

(c) as a result of the failure of the Part 3A community body which made that application to complete the purchase, is entitled to recover the amount of that loss or expense from the Part 3A community body.

(2) There is no such entitlement where the application made under section 97G is refused.

(3) Where such an application has been refused, the owner of the land who has incurred loss or expense as mentioned in subsection (1)(a) is entitled to recover the amount of that loss or expense from Ministers.

(4) Ministers may, by order, make provision for or in connection with specifying—

(a) amounts payable in respect of loss or expense incurred as mentioned in subsection (1),

(b) amounts payable in respect of loss or expense incurred by virtue of this Part by a person of such other description as may be specified,

(c) the person who is liable to pay those amounts,

(d) the procedure under which claims for compensation under this section are to be made.

(5) Where, at the expiry of such period of time as may be fixed for the purposes of this subsection by an order under subsection (4)(d), any question as to whether compensation is payable or as to the amount of any compensation payable has not been settled as between the parties, either of them may refer the question to the Lands Tribunal.
97U Grants towards Part 3A community bodies’ liabilities to pay compensation

(1) Ministers may, in the circumstances set out in subsection (2), pay a grant to a Part 3A community body.

(2) Those circumstances are—

(a) that after settlement of its other liabilities connected with the exercise of its right to buy land under this Part, the Part 3A community body has insufficient money to pay, or to pay in full, the amount of compensation it has to pay under section 97T,

(b) that the Part 3A community body has taken all reasonable steps to obtain money in order to pay, or to pay in full, that amount (other than applying for a grant under this section) but has been unable to obtain the money, and

(c) that it is in the public interest that Ministers pay the grant.

(3) The fact that all the circumstances set out in subsection (2) are applicable in a particular case does not prevent Ministers from refusing to pay a grant in that case.

(4) A grant under this section may be made subject to conditions which may stipulate repayment in the event of breach.

(5) Ministers may pay a grant under this section only on the application of a Part 3A community body.

(6) An application for such a grant must be made in such form and in accordance with such procedure as may be prescribed.

(7) Ministers must issue their decision on an application under this section in writing accompanied by, in the case of a refusal, a statement of the reasons for it.

(8) Ministers’ decision on an application under this section is final.

97V Appeals

(1) An owner of land may appeal to the sheriff against a decision by Ministers to give consent to the exercise by a Part 3A community body of its right to buy the land.

(2) A Part 3A community body may appeal to the sheriff against a decision by Ministers not to give consent to the exercise by the Part 3A community body of its right to buy.

(3) Subsection (2) does not extend to Ministers’ decision under section 97K on which of two or more applications to buy the same land is to proceed.

(4) A person who is a member of a community as defined for the purposes of section 97D in relation to a Part 3A community body may appeal to the sheriff against a decision by Ministers to consent to the exercise by the Part 3A community body of its right to buy land.

(5) A creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land may appeal to the sheriff against a decision by Ministers to give consent to the exercise by a Part 3A community body of its right to buy the land.
An appeal under subsection (1), (2), (4) or (5) must be lodged within 28 days of the date on which Ministers decided to consent to the exercise of the right to buy land or refuse such consent.

The sheriff in whose sheriffdom the land or any part of it is situated has jurisdiction to hear an appeal under this section.

Where an appeal is made—

(a) under subsection (1) the owner must intimate that fact to—
   (i) the Part 3A community body,
   (ii) Ministers, and
   (iii) any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land to which the appeal relates,

(b) under subsection (2) the Part 3A community body must intimate that fact to—
   (i) the owner,
   (ii) Ministers, and
   (iii) any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land to which the appeal relates,

(c) under subsection (4) the member of the community must intimate that fact to—
   (i) the Part 3A community body,
   (ii) the owner,
   (iii) Ministers, and
   (iv) any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land to which the appeal relates, or

(d) under subsection (5), the creditor must intimate that fact to—
   (i) the Part 3A community body,
   (ii) the owner, and
   (iii) Ministers.

The decision of the sheriff in an appeal under this section—

(a) may require rectification of the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land,

(b) may impose conditions upon the appellant,

(c) is final.

Appeals to Lands Tribunal: valuation

The owner of the land and the Part 3A community body which is exercising its right to buy the land may appeal to the Lands Tribunal against the valuation carried out under section 97S.
(2) An appeal under this section must state the grounds on which it is being made and must be lodged within 21 days of the date of notification under section 97S(10).

(3) In an appeal under this section, the Lands Tribunal may reassess the value of the land.

(4) The valuer whose valuation is appealed against may be a witness in the appeal proceedings.

(5) The Lands Tribunal must give reasons for its decision on an appeal under this section.

(6) Ministers are not competent parties to any appeal under this section by reason only that they appointed the valuer whose valuation is the subject of the appeal.

(7) Ministers’ powers under the Lands Tribunal Act 1949 to make rules as respects that Tribunal extend to such rules as may be necessary or expedient to give full effect to this section.

97X Reference to Lands Tribunal of questions on applications

(1) At any time before Ministers reach a decision on an application which has been made under section 97G—

(a) Ministers,

(b) any person who is a member of the community defined in relation to the applicant Part 3A community body in pursuance of section 97D,

(c) the owner of the land which is the subject of the application,

(d) any person who has any interest in the land giving rise to a right which is legally enforceable by that person, or

(e) any person who is invited, under section 97G(9)(a)(iii), to send views to Ministers on the application, may refer to the Lands Tribunal any question relating to the application.

(2) In considering any question referred to it under subsection (1), the Lands Tribunal may have regard to any representations made to it by—

(a) the applicant Part 3A community body,

(b) the owner of the land which is the subject of the application, or

(c) any other person who, in the opinion of the Lands Tribunal, appears to have an interest.

(3) The Lands Tribunal—

(a) must advise Ministers of its finding on any question so referred, and

(b) may, by order, provide that Ministers may consent to the application only if they impose, under section 97L, such conditions as the Tribunal may specify.

(4) If the Lands Tribunal considers any question referred to it under this section to be irrelevant to Ministers’ decision on the application to which it relates, it may decide to give no further consideration to the question and find accordingly.
97Y Agreement as to matters referred or appealed

An appeal under section 97V or 97W does not prevent the parties from settling or otherwise agreeing the matter in respect of which the appeal was made between or among them.

97Z Interpretation of Part 3A

(1) Any reference in this Part to a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land is a reference to a creditor who has such a right under—
   (a) section 20(2) or 23(2) of the Conveyancing and Feudal Reform (Scotland) Act 1970, or
   (b) a warrant granted under section 24(1) of that Act.

(2) In calculating for the purposes of this Part any period of time within which an act requires to be or may be done, no account is to be taken of any public or local holidays in the place where the act is to be done.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply to a period of time specified in section 97R(2), 97V(6), or 97W(2).”.

Meaning of “the 2003 Act”

49 Meaning of “the 2003 Act” in Part 4

In this Part, “the 2003 Act” means the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003.

PART 5

ASSET TRANSFER REQUESTS

Key definitions

50 Meaning of “community transfer body”

(1) In this Part, “community transfer body” means—
   (a) a community-controlled body, or
   (b) a body mentioned in subsection (2).

(2) The body is a body (whether corporate or unincorporated)—
   (a) that is designated as a community transfer body by an order made by the Scottish Ministers for the purposes of this Part, or
   (b) that falls within a class of bodies designated as community transfer bodies by such an order for the purposes of this Part.

(3) Where the power to make an order under subsection (2)(a) is exercised in relation to a trust, the community transfer body is to be the trustees of the trust.

51 Meaning of “relevant authority”

(1) In this Part, a “relevant authority” means—
   (a) a person listed, or of a description listed, in schedule 3, or
(b) a person mentioned in subsection (3).

(2) The Scottish Ministers may by order modify schedule 3 so as to—
   (a) remove an entry listed in it,
   (b) amend an entry listed in it.

(3) The person is a person—
   (a) that is designated as a relevant authority by an order made by the Scottish Ministers for the purposes of this Part, or
   (b) that falls within a class of persons designated as relevant authorities by such an order for the purposes of this Part.

(4) An order under subsection (3) may designate a person, or a class of persons, only if the person or (as the case may be) each of the persons falling within the class is—
   (a) a part of the Scottish Administration,
   (b) a Scottish public authority with mixed functions or no reserved functions (within the meaning of the Scotland Act 1998), or
   (c) a publicly-owned company.

(5) In subsection (4)(c), “publicly-owned company” means a company that is wholly owned by one or more relevant authorities.

(6) For that purpose, a company is wholly owned by one or more relevant authorities if it has no members other than—
   (a) the relevant authority or (as the case may be) authorities,
   (b) other companies that are wholly owned by the relevant authority or (as the case may be) authorities, or
   (c) persons acting on behalf of—
      (i) the relevant authority or (as the case may be) authorities, or
      (ii) such other companies.

(7) In this section, “company” includes any body corporate.

Requests

52 Asset transfer requests

(1) A community transfer body may make a request in accordance with this section (in this Part, an “asset transfer request”) to a relevant authority.

(2) An asset transfer request is a request—
   (a) in relation to land owned by the relevant authority, for ownership of the land to be transferred to the community transfer body, or
   (b) in relation to land owned or leased by the relevant authority—
      (i) for the land to be leased to the community transfer body, or
      (ii) for the authority to confer rights in respect of the land on the community transfer body (including, for example, rights to manage or occupy the land or use it for a purpose specified in the request).
(3) An asset transfer request of the type mentioned in subsection (2)(a) may be made only by a community transfer body falling within section 53; and references in the remainder of this Part to the making of an asset transfer request by a community transfer body are to be read accordingly.

(4) A community transfer body making an asset transfer request must specify in the request—

(a) the land to which the request relates,
(b) whether the request falls within paragraph (a), (b)(i) or (b)(ii) of subsection (2),
(c) the reasons for making the request,
(d) the benefits which the community transfer body considers will arise if the authority were to agree to the request,
(e) where the request falls within subsection (2)(a), the price that the community transfer body would be prepared to pay for the transfer of ownership of the land,
(f) where the request falls within subsection (2)(b)(i)—

(i) the amount of rent that the community transfer body would be prepared to pay in respect of any lease resulting from the request,
(ii) the duration of any such lease, and
(iii) any other terms and conditions that the community transfer body considers should be included in any such lease,
(g) where the request falls within subsection (2)(b)(ii), the nature and extent of the rights sought, and
(h) any other terms or conditions applicable to the request.

53 Community transfer bodies that may request transfer of ownership of land

(1) A community transfer body falls within this section if—

(a) it is a company the articles of association of which include provision such as is mentioned in subsection (2),
(b) it is a Scottish charitable incorporated organisation the constitution of which includes provision that the organisation must have not fewer than 20 members,
(c) in the case of a body designated by an order under paragraph (a) of subsection (2) of section 50, the order includes provision that the body may make an asset transfer request of the type mentioned in section 52(2)(a), or
(d) in the case of a body falling within a class of bodies designated in an order made under paragraph (b) of that subsection, the order includes provision that bodies falling within the class may make an asset transfer request of that type.

(2) The provision mentioned in subsection (1)(a) is provision that—

(a) the company must have not fewer than 20 members, and
(b) on the winding up of the company and after satisfaction of its liabilities, its property (including any land, and any rights in relation to land, acquired by it as a result of an asset transfer request under this Part) passes—

(i) to another community transfer body,
(ii) to a charity,
(iii) to such community body (within the meaning of section 34 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003) as may be approved by the Scottish Ministers,

(iv) to such crofting community body (within the meaning of section 71 of that Act) as may be so approved, or

(v) if no such community body or crofting community body is so approved, to the Scottish Ministers or to such charity as the Scottish Ministers may direct.

54 Asset transfer requests: regulations

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision about asset transfer requests.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may in particular make provision for or in connection with—

(a) specifying the manner in which requests are to be made,

(b) specifying the procedure to be followed by a relevant authority in relation to requests,

(c) specifying the information to be included in requests (in addition to that required under section 52(4)),

(d) requiring publication, by such method as may be prescribed in the regulations, of the fact that a request is being made,

(e) requiring notification of the making of a request to be given to such persons or descriptions of persons, and in such circumstances, as may be prescribed in the regulations.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may make regulations for or in connection with—

(a) enabling a community transfer body to request information from a relevant authority about land in respect of which it proposes to make an asset transfer request,

(b) specifying how the authority is to respond to the request for information,

(c) specifying the circumstances in which the authority must provide information,

(d) specifying the type of information the authority must provide in circumstances specified under paragraph (c),

(e) specifying the circumstances in which the authority need not provide information.

Decisions

55 Asset transfer requests: decisions

(1) This section applies where an asset transfer request is made by a community transfer body to a relevant authority.

(2) The authority must decide whether to agree to or refuse the request.

(3) In reaching its decision, the authority must take into consideration the following matters—

(a) the reasons for the request,
(b) any other information provided in support of the request (whether such other information is contained in the request or otherwise provided),

(c) whether agreeing to the request would be likely to promote or improve—
   (i) economic development,
   (ii) regeneration,
   (iii) public health,
   (iv) social wellbeing, or
   (v) environmental wellbeing,

(d) any other benefits that might arise if the request were agreed to,

(e) any benefits that might arise if the authority were to agree to or otherwise adopt an alternative proposal in respect of the land to which the request relates,

(f) how such benefits would compare to any benefits such as are mentioned in paragraphs (c) and (d),

(g) how any benefits such as are mentioned in paragraph (e) relate to other matters the authority considers relevant (including, in particular, the functions and purposes of the authority),

(h) any obligations imposed on the authority, by or under any enactment or otherwise, that may prevent, restrict or otherwise affect its ability to agree to the request, and

(i) such other matters (whether or not included in or arising out of the request) as the authority considers relevant.

(4) The authority must exercise the function under subsection (2) in a manner which encourages equal opportunities and in particular the observance of the equal opportunity requirements.

(5) The authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it.

(6) In subsection (3)(e), an “alternative proposal” includes—
   (a) another asset transfer request,
   (b) a proposal made by the authority or any other person.

(7) The authority must, within the period mentioned in subsection (8), give notice (in this Part, a “decision notice”) to the community transfer body of—
   (a) its decision to agree to or refuse the request, and
   (b) the reasons for its decision.

(8) The period is—
   (a) a period prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers, or
   (b) such longer period as may be agreed between the authority and the community transfer body.

(9) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision about—
   (a) the information (in addition to that required under this Part) that a decision notice is to contain, and
   (b) the manner in which a decision notice is to be given.
Agreement to asset transfer request

(1) This section applies where a relevant authority decides to agree to an asset transfer request made by a community transfer body.

(2) The decision notice relating to the request must—

(a) specify the terms on which, and any conditions subject to which, the authority would be prepared to transfer ownership of the land, lease the land or (as the case may be) confer rights in respect of the land to which the request relates (whether or not such terms and conditions were specified in the request),

(b) state that, if the community transfer body wishes to proceed, it must submit to the authority an offer to acquire ownership of the land, lease the land or (as the case may be) assume rights in respect of the land, and

(c) specify the period within which such an offer is to be submitted.

(3) The period specified under subsection (2)(c) must be a period of at least 6 months beginning with the date on which the decision notice is given.

(4) An offer such as is mentioned in subsection (2)(b)—

(a) must reflect any terms and conditions specified in the decision notice,

(b) may include such other reasonable terms and conditions as are necessary or expedient to secure—

(i) the transfer of ownership, the lease or (as the case may be) the conferral of rights, and

(ii) that such a transfer, lease or (as the case may be) conferral of rights takes place within a reasonable time,

(c) must be made before the end of the period specified in the decision notice under subsection (2)(c).

(5) Where no contract is concluded on the basis of such an offer before the end of the period mentioned in subsection (7), the decision to agree to the request is of no effect.

(6) Where a decision to agree to a request is of no effect under subsection (5), that is not to be treated as a refusal of the request for the purposes of an appeal under section 58.

(7) The period is—

(a) the period of 6 months beginning with the date of the offer, or

(b) such longer period—

(i) as may be agreed between the authority and the community transfer body, or

(ii) in the absence of any such agreement, as may be specified in a direction by the Scottish Ministers.

(8) A direction under subsection (7)(b)(ii) may be made only on the application of the community transfer body.

(9) An application under subsection (8) may be made on more than one occasion.

(10) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision about—

(a) the form of, and procedure for making, an application such as is mentioned in subsection (8),
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Part 5— Asset transfer requests

(b) the manner in which a direction under subsection (7)(b)(ii) is to be given,

(c) the information that such a direction is to contain.

57 Prohibition on disposal of land

(1) Subsection (2) applies where a relevant authority decides to agree to an asset transfer request made by a community transfer body.

(2) During the relevant period, the authority must not sell, lease or otherwise dispose of the land to which the request relates to any person other than the community transfer body.

(3) In subsection (2), the “relevant period” is the period beginning on the day on which the decision notice relating to the request is given and ending—

(a) if no offer such as is mentioned in paragraph (b) of subsection (2) of section 56 is made by the final day of the period specified in the decision notice under paragraph (c) of that subsection, on the day after that final day, or

(b) if such an offer is made by that final day, on one of the days mentioned in subsection (4).

(4) The days are—

(a) the day on which the authority concludes a contract with the community transfer body on the basis of the offer,

(b) the day on which the period mentioned in paragraph (a) or (where applicable) paragraph (b) of subsection (7) of section 56 expires with no such contract having been concluded.

(5) Where, by virtue of subsection (2), a relevant authority is prevented from selling, leasing or otherwise disposing of any land, any contract by virtue of which the authority is obliged to sell, lease or otherwise dispose of the land to a person other than the community transfer body referred to in that subsection is void.

Appeals and reviews

58 Appeals

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) an asset transfer request is refused by a relevant authority,

(b) an asset transfer request is agreed to by a relevant authority but the decision notice relating to the request specifies material terms or conditions which differ to a significant extent from those specified in the request, or

(c) a relevant authority does not give a decision notice relating to an asset transfer request to the community transfer body making the request within the period mentioned in paragraph (a) or (where applicable) paragraph (b) of section 55(8).

(2) The community transfer body making the request may appeal to the Scottish Ministers unless the relevant authority is—

(a) the Scottish Ministers, or

(b) a local authority.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe—

(a) the procedure to be followed in connection with appeals under subsection (2),
(b) the manner in which such appeals are to be conducted, and
(c) the time limits within which such appeals must be brought.

(4) The provision that may be made by virtue of subsection (3) includes provision that the manner in which an appeal, or any stage of an appeal, is to be conducted is to be at the discretion of the Scottish Ministers.

(5) On an appeal under subsection (2), the Scottish Ministers—
(a) may allow or dismiss the appeal,
(b) may reverse or vary any part of the decision of the relevant authority (whether the appeal relates to that part of it or not),
(c) must, in the circumstances mentioned in either paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (6), issue a direction to the authority requiring the authority to take such steps, or achieve such outcomes, as are specified in the direction within such time periods as are so specified,
(d) may, in any other circumstances, issue such a direction, including a direction relating to any aspects of the asset transfer request to which the appeal relates (whether or not the authority’s decision relates to those aspects).

(6) The circumstances are—
(a) that the appeal is allowed,
(b) that any part of the decision of the relevant authority is reversed or varied to the effect that the authority is required to—
   (i) transfer ownership of any land, lease any land or confer rights in respect of any land, or
   (ii) agree to the asset transfer request subject to such terms and conditions as may be specified in the direction.

(7) The references in subsections (5)(b) and (6)(b) to any part of the decision includes any terms and conditions specified in the decision notice relating to the asset transfer request.

(8) A direction issued under subsection (5)(c) must require the relevant authority to issue a further decision notice—
(a) specifying the terms on which, and any conditions subject to which, the authority would be prepared to transfer ownership of the land, lease the land or (as the case may be) confer rights in respect of the land, including any terms and conditions required to be included by virtue of the direction,
(b) stating that, if the community transfer body wishes to proceed, it must submit to the authority an offer to acquire ownership of the land, lease the land or (as the case may be) assume rights in respect of the land, and
(c) specifying the period within which such an offer is to be submitted (which must be at least 6 months beginning with the date on which the further decision notice was issued).

(9) A further decision notice issued by virtue of a direction mentioned in subsection (8) replaces any decision notice relating to the asset transfer request in respect of which the appeal was made.
(10) Subsections (4) to (10) of section 56 apply in relation to a further decision notice issued by virtue of a direction mentioned in subsection (8) as they apply in relation to a decision notice referred to in that section; but as if in subsection (4) of that section—

(a) the reference to an offer such as is mentioned in subsection (2)(b) of that section were a reference to an offer such as is mentioned in subsection (8)(b) of this section, and

(b) the reference to the period specified in the decision notice under subsection (2)(c) of that section were a reference to the period specified in a further decision notice by virtue of subsection (8)(c) of this section.

59 Review by local authority

(1) Subsection (2) applies in a case where—

(a) an asset transfer request is made to a local authority by a community transfer body, and

(b) the authority—

(i) refuses the request,

(ii) agrees to the request but the decision notice relating to the request specifies material terms or conditions which differ to a significant extent from those specified in the request, or

(iii) does not give a decision notice relating to the request to the community transfer body within the period mentioned in paragraph (a) or (where applicable) paragraph (b) of section 55(8).

(2) On an application made by the community transfer body, the local authority must carry out a review of the case.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe—

(a) the procedure to be followed in connection with reviews under subsection (2),

(b) the manner in which such reviews are to be carried out, and

(c) the time limits within which applications for reviews must be brought.

(4) The provision that may be made by virtue of subsection (3) includes provision that the manner in which a review, or any stage of a review, is to be carried out by a local authority is to be at the discretion of the authority.

(5) A local authority may, in relation to a decision reviewed under subsection (2)—

(a) confirm its decision,

(b) modify its decision, or any part of its decision (including any terms and conditions specified in the decision notice to which the asset transfer request relates), or

(c) substitute a different decision for its decision.

(6) Following a review under subsection (2), the local authority must—

(a) issue a decision notice as respects the asset transfer request to which the review relates, and

(b) provide in the decision notice the reasons for its decision.

(7) A decision notice issued under subsection (6) replaces any decision notice relating to the asset transfer request in respect of which the review was carried out.
(8) Subsections (3) to (5) of section 55 apply in relation to a decision relating to an asset transfer request in a review under subsection (2) of this section as they apply in relation to a decision relating to the request under subsection (2) of that section.

(9) Section 56 applies in relation to a decision to agree to an asset transfer request (including a decision to confirm such an agreement) following a review under subsection (2) as it applies in relation to a decision mentioned in subsection (1) of that section.

Disapplication of certain lease restrictions

60 Disapplication of restrictions in lease of land to relevant authority

(1) This section applies where—

(a) land is leased to a relevant authority,

(b) an asset transfer request is made to the authority by a community transfer body for the authority to—

(i) lease the land to the body, or

(ii) confer a right of occupancy on the body in respect of the land,

(c) the land is leased to the relevant authority by another relevant authority or by a company that is wholly owned by another relevant authority, and

(d) no other person is entitled to occupy the land to which the request relates (whether by virtue of a sub-lease by the authority or otherwise).

(2) Any restrictions in the lease of the land to which the request relates such as are mentioned in subsection (3) do not apply as between the relevant authority and the person from whom the authority leases the land.

(3) The restrictions are any restrictions—

(a) on the power of the relevant authority to sub-let the land,

(b) on the power of the authority to share occupancy of the land,

(c) relating to how the land may be used by the authority or any other occupier of the land.

(4) Nothing in this section affects any restrictions in the lease of the land to the relevant authority on the power of the authority to assign or transfer rights and liabilities under the lease.

(5) If the relevant authority leases the land to, or confers a right of occupancy in respect of the land on, a community transfer body, the authority continues to be subject to any obligations under the lease of the land to the authority.

Power to decline subsequent requests

61 Power to decline certain asset transfer requests

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) an asset transfer request (a “new request”) relating to land is made to a relevant authority,
(b) the new request relates to matters that are the same, or substantially the same, as matters contained in a previous asset transfer request (a “previous request”) made in relation to the land,

(c) the previous request was made in the period of two years ending with the date on which the new request is made, and

(d) the authority refused the previous request (whether following an appeal or not).

(2) The relevant authority may decline to consider the new request.

(3) Where a new request is declined to be considered under subsection (2), that is not to be treated as a refusal of the new request for the purposes of—

(a) an appeal under section 58, or

(b) a review under section 59.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b), a new request relates to matters that are the same, or substantially the same, as matters contained in a previous request only if both requests, in relation to the land to which they relate, seek (or sought)—

(a) transfer of ownership of the land,

(b) lease of the land, or

(c) the same or substantially the same rights in respect of the land.

(5) For the purposes of this section, it is irrelevant whether the body making a new request is the same body as, or a different body from, that which made the previous request.

Interpretation of Part 5

62 Interpretation of Part 5

(1) In this Part—

“asset transfer request” has the meaning given by section 52(2),

“community-controlled body” has the meaning given by section 14,

“community transfer body” has the meaning given by section 50(1),

“charity” means a body entered in the Scottish Charity Register,

“decision notice” is to be construed in accordance with section 55(7),

“equal opportunities” and “equal opportunity requirements” have the same meanings as in Section L2 (equal opportunities) of Part 2 of Schedule 5 to the Scotland Act 1998,

“relevant authority” has the meaning given by section 51,

“Scottish charitable incorporated organisation” has the meaning given by section 49 of the Charities and Trustee Investment (Scotland) Act 2005.

(2) References in this Part to land include references to part of the land.
PART 6

COMMON GOOD PROPERTY

Registers

63 Common good registers

(1) Each local authority must establish and maintain a register of property which is held by the authority as part of the common good (a “common good register”).

(2) Before establishing a common good register, a local authority must publish a list of property that it proposes to include in the register.

(3) The list may be published in such a way as the local authority may determine.

(4) On publishing a list under subsection (2), the local authority must—

(a) notify the bodies mentioned in subsection (5) of the publication, and

(b) invite those bodies to make representations in respect of the list.

(5) The bodies are—

(a) any community council established for the local authority’s area, and

(b) any community body of which the authority is aware.

(6) In establishing a common good register, a local authority must have regard to—

(a) any representations made under subsection (4)(b) by a body mentioned in subsection (5), and

(b) any representations made by other persons in respect of the list published under subsection (2).

(7) Representations as mentioned in subsection (6) may in particular be made in relation to—

(a) whether property proposed to be included in the register is part of the common good,

(b) the identification of other property which, in the opinion of the body or person making the representation, is part of the common good.

(8) A local authority must—

(a) make arrangements to enable members of the public to inspect, free of charge, its common good register at reasonable times and at such places as the authority may determine, and

(b) make its common good register available on a website, or by other electronic means, to members of the public.

64 Guidance about common good registers

(1) In carrying out any of the duties imposed on it by section 63, a local authority must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers in relation to the duties.

(2) Before issuing any such guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) local authorities,

(b) community councils, and
(c) such community bodies as the Scottish Ministers think fit.

Disposal and use

65 Disposal and use of common good property: consultation

(1) Subsection (2) applies where a local authority is considering—

(a) disposing of any property which is held by the authority as part of the common good, or

(b) changing the use to which any such property is put.

(2) Before taking any decision to dispose of, or change the use of, such property the local authority must publish details about the proposed disposal or, as the case may be, the use to which the authority proposes to put the property.

(3) The details may be published in such a way as the local authority may determine.

(4) On publishing details about its proposals under subsection (2), the local authority must—

(a) notify the bodies mentioned in subsection (5) of the publication, and

(b) invite those bodies to make representations in respect of the proposals.

(5) The bodies are—

(a) any community council established for the local authority’s area, and

(b) any community body that is known by the authority to have an interest in the property.

(6) In deciding whether or not to dispose of any property held by a local authority as part of the common good, or to change the use to which any such property is put, the authority must have regard to—

(a) any representations made under subsection (4)(b) by a body mentioned in subsection (5), and

(b) any representations made by other persons in respect of its proposals published under subsection (2).

66 Disposal etc. of common good property: guidance

(1) In carrying out any of the duties imposed on it by section 65, a local authority must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers in relation to the duties.

(2) A local authority must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers in relation to the management and use of property that forms part of the common good.

(3) Before issuing any guidance as mentioned in subsection (1) or (2), the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) local authorities,

(b) community councils, and

(c) such community bodies as the Scottish Ministers think fit.
Interpretation of Part 6

Interpretation of Part 6

In this Part—

“community bodies”, in relation to a local authority, means bodies, whether or not formally constituted, established for purposes which consist of or include that of promoting or improving the interests of any communities (however described) resident or otherwise present in the area of the local authority, “community council” means a community council established by a local authority under Part 4 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973.

PART 7

ALLOTMENTS

Key definitions

Meaning of “allotment”

In this Part, “allotment” means land that is—

(a) owned or leased by a local authority,
(b) leased or intended for lease by a person from the authority,
(c) used or intended for use—

(i) wholly or mainly for the cultivation of vegetables, fruit, herbs or flowers, and
(ii) otherwise than with a view to making a profit, and
(d) of such size as may be prescribed.

Meaning of “allotment site”

In this Part, “allotment site”—

(a) means land consisting wholly or partly of allotments, and
(b) includes other land owned or leased by a local authority that may be used by tenants of allotments in connection with their use of allotments.

Request to lease allotment

(1) Any person may make a request to the local authority in whose area the person resides to lease an allotment from the authority.

(2) A request must be made in writing and include—

(a) the name and address of the person making the request, and
(b) such other information as may be prescribed.

(3) Where the person making the request is a disabled person who has a physical impairment, the request may include information about the person’s needs on the grounds of disability relating to—
(a) access to an allotment site or an allotment,
(b) possible adjustments to an allotment.

(4) A request may be made to a local authority even if the authority does not own or lease any allotments.

(5) A request may be made jointly by two or more persons if each person resides in the area of the local authority to which the request is made.

(6) The local authority must give written notice to a person who made a request under subsection (1) confirming receipt of the request before the expiry of the period of 28 days beginning with the date on which the request is received by the authority.

(7) Before making regulations under subsection (2)(b), the Scottish Ministers must consult—
(a) each local authority, and
(b) any other person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest.

Local authority functions

71 Duty to maintain list

(1) Each local authority must establish and maintain a list of persons who make a request to it under section 70(1).

(2) The list may be established and maintained by the local authority in such form as the authority thinks fit.

(3) The duty to maintain a list under subsection (1) includes a duty to remove from the list—
(a) the name of any person—
   (i) whose request under section 70(1) is agreed to, or
   (ii) who withdraws such a request before it is agreed to, and
(b) any other information relating to any such person.

72 Duty to provide allotments

(1) Where subsection (2) or (3) applies, each local authority must take reasonable steps to ensure that the number of persons entered in the list maintained under section 71(1) is no more than one half of the total number of allotments owned and leased by the authority.

(2) This subsection applies where—
(a) on the commencement date, a local authority does not own or lease any allotments, and
(b) at any time after that date, the number of persons entered in the list mentioned in subsection (1) is 15 or more.

(3) This subsection applies where—
(a) on the commencement date, a local authority owns or leases allotments, and
(b) at any time after that date, the number of persons entered in the list mentioned in subsection (1) is one or more.
(4) The Scottish Ministers may by order amend subsection (1) by substituting for the proportion for the time being specified there such other proportion as they think fit.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order amend subsection (2) or (3) by substituting for the number of persons for the time being specified there such other number of persons as they think fit.

(6) Where a request under section 70(1) is made jointly by two or more persons, the persons making the request are to be treated as one person for the purposes of calculating the number of persons referred to in—

(a) subsection (1),

(b) subsection (2) (including that subsection as amended by an order under subsection (5)),

(c) subsection (3) (including that subsection as amended by an order under subsection (5)),

(d) section 79(2)(g) or (l).

(7) In this section, “commencement date” means the date on which this section comes into force.

73 Allotment site regulations

(1) Each local authority must make regulations about allotment sites in its area.

(2) The first regulations under subsection (1) must be made before the expiry of the period of two years beginning with the date on which this section comes into force.

(3) Regulations under subsection (1) must in particular include provision for or in connection with—

(a) allocation of allotments,

(b) rent,

(c) cultivation of allotments,

(d) maintenance of allotments,

(e) maintenance of allotment sites,

(f) buildings or other structures that may be erected on allotments, the modifications that may be made to such structures and the materials that may or may not be used in connection with such structures,

(g) the keeping of livestock (including poultry), and

(h) landlord inspections.

(4) Regulations under subsection (1) may in particular include provision for or in connection with—

(a) buildings or other structures that are permitted,

(b) buildings or other structures that may be erected on land mentioned in paragraph (b) of the definition of “allotment site” in section 69, the modifications that may be made to such structures and the materials that may or may not be used in connection with such structures,

(c) access by persons (other than allotment tenants) and domestic animals,
(d) liability for loss of or damage to property,
(e) acceptable use of allotments and allotment sites,
(f) sale of surplus produce (in addition to the provisions of any regulations made under section 87(1)).

(5) Regulations under subsection (1) may make different provision for different areas or different types of allotment site.

74 Allotment site regulations: further provision

(1) Before making regulations under section 73(1), a local authority must consult persons appearing to the local authority to have an interest.

(2) At least one month before making regulations under section 73(1), a local authority must—

(a) place an advertisement in at least one newspaper circulating in its area giving notice of—

(i) the authority’s intention to make the regulations,
(ii) the general purpose of the proposed regulations,
(iii) the place where a copy of the proposed regulations may be inspected,
(iv) the fact that any person may make written representations in relation to the proposed regulations,
(v) the time within which a person may make representations, and
(vi) the address to which any representations must be sent, and

(b) make copies of the proposed regulations available for inspection by the public without payment—

(i) at its offices, and
(ii) if it considers it practicable, at the allotment site to which the regulations are to apply.

(3) Any person may make a representation in writing in relation to the proposed regulations no later than one month after the last date on which notice under subsection (2)(a) is given.

(4) Before making the regulations, the authority must—

(a) offer any person who makes a representation under subsection (3) the opportunity to make further representations in person, and

(b) take account of any representations received by it by virtue of subsection (3) and paragraph (a).

(5) The regulations are executed by being signed by the proper officer of the authority.

(6) The regulations—

(a) come into force on the day after the day on which they are executed or such later date specified in the regulations, and

(b) continue in force unless revoked.

(7) Subsections (1) to (4) apply in relation to—
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Part 7—Allotments

(a) a proposed amendment,
(b) a proposed revocation,
(c) an amendment, or
(d) a revocation, of regulations under section 73(1) as they apply in relation to proposed regulations, or (as the case may be) the making of proposed regulations, under that section.

(8) Subsections (5) and (6) apply in relation to an amendment, or a revocation, of regulations under section 73(1) as they apply in relation to regulations under that section (but subsection (6)(b) does not apply in relation to such a revocation).

(9) A copy of the regulations must be displayed at the entrance to an allotment site to which they apply.

(10) A local authority must provide a copy of the regulations without charge to any person following a request.

(11) In the case where an allotment site is leased by a local authority, the regulations are subject to any provision of such a lease which is contrary to, or otherwise inconsistent with, the regulations.

Disposal etc. of allotments and allotment sites owned by local authority

(1) This section applies where a local authority owns an allotment site.

(2) A local authority may not dispose of the allotment site or change the use of the allotment site without the consent of the Scottish Ministers.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may make the granting of consent subject to such conditions as they think fit.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may not grant consent unless they are satisfied that—
(a) the tenant of each allotment on the allotment site is to be offered a lease of another allotment in the area of the local authority within a reasonable distance of the allotment site, or
(b) the provision of another allotment for the tenant is unnecessary or not reasonably practicable.

Disposal etc. of allotments and allotment sites leased by local authority

(1) This section applies where a local authority leases an allotment site.

(2) A local authority may not renounce its lease of the allotment site without the consent of the Scottish Ministers.

(3) In the case where a change of use of the allotment site proposed by the local authority is permitted by the lease, the local authority may not change the use of the allotment site without the consent of the Scottish Ministers.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may make the granting of consent mentioned in subsection (2) or
(3) subject to such conditions as they think fit.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may not grant consent mentioned in subsection (2) or (3) unless they are satisfied that—
(a) the tenant of each allotment on the allotment site is to be offered a lease of another allotment in the area of the local authority within a reasonable distance of the allotment site, or

(b) the provision of another allotment for the tenant is unnecessary or not reasonably practicable.

77 Duty to prepare food-growing strategy

(1) Each local authority must prepare a food-growing strategy for its area.

(2) A local authority must publish the food-growing strategy before the expiry of the period of two years beginning with the day on which this section comes into force.

(3) A food-growing strategy is a document—

(a) identifying land in its area that the local authority considers may be used as allotment sites,

(b) identifying other areas of land in its area that could be used by a community for the cultivation of vegetables, fruit, herbs or flowers,

(c) describing how, where the authority is required to take reasonable steps under section 72(1), the authority intends to increase the provision in its area of—

(i) allotments, or

(ii) other areas of land for use by a community for the cultivation of vegetables, fruit, herbs or flowers, and

(d) containing such other information as may be prescribed.

(4) The authority must publish the food-growing strategy on a website or by other electronic means.

78 Duty to review food-growing strategy

(1) Each local authority must review its food-growing strategy before the end of—

(a) the period of 5 years beginning with the day on which the strategy is first published under section 77(2), and

(b) each subsequent period of 5 years.

(2) If, following a review under subsection (1), the authority decides that changes to its food-growing strategy are necessary or desirable, the authority must publish a revised food-growing strategy on a website or by other electronic means.

79 Annual allotments report

(1) As soon as reasonably practicable after the end of each reporting year, each local authority must prepare and publish an annual allotments report for its area.

(2) An annual allotments report is a report setting out in respect of the reporting year to which it relates—

(a) the location and size of each allotment site,

(b) the number of allotments on each allotment site,
(c) the proportion of land on each allotment site (excluding any land falling within paragraph (b) of the definition of “allotment site” in section 69) that is not leased from the authority,

(d) where an allotment site is leased by the local authority—
   (i) the period of the lease of each allotment site, and
   (ii) the rent payable under the lease by the authority,

(e) the period of any lease between the authority and the tenant of an allotment site,

(f) the rent payable under any lease between the authority and the tenant of an allotment site,

(g) the number of persons entered in the list maintained under section 71(1) on the final day of the reporting year to which the report relates,

(h) the steps taken by the authority to comply with the duty imposed by section 72(1),

(i) reasons for any failure to comply with that duty,

(j) the number of allotments on each allotment site that are accessible by a disabled person who has a physical impairment,

(k) the number of allotments on each allotment site adjusted by the authority during the reporting year to meet the needs of a tenant who is a disabled person who has a physical impairment,

(l) the number of persons entered in the list maintained under section 71(1) during the reporting year whose request under subsection (1) of section 70 included information under subsection (3) of that section,

(m) the income received, and expenditure incurred, by the authority in connection with allotment sites, and

(n) such other information as may be prescribed.

(3) The authority must publish the annual allotments report on a website or by other electronic means.

(4) In this section, “reporting year” means—
   (a) the period of a year beginning with any day occurring during the period of a year after the day on which this section comes into force, and
   (b) each subsequent period of a year.

80 Power to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites

(1) This section applies where—
   (a) a building or other structure that is not permitted by, or does not comply with, a provision of regulations made under section 73(1) is erected on an allotment site, and
   (b) at the time the building or other structure was erected or, as the case may be modified, regulations made under section 73(1) prohibited such erection or modification.

(2) The local authority within whose area the allotment site is situated may—
   (a) remove the building or other structure from the allotment site,
(b) dispose of the materials that formed the building or other structure as it thinks fit, and
(c) recover the cost of the removal, and the disposal of the materials, of the building or other structure from a liable tenant.

(3) “Liable tenant” means, where the building or other structure was erected by or on behalf of a tenant—

(a) on the tenant’s allotment, that tenant, or

(b) on other land as mentioned in paragraph (b) of the definition of “allotment site” in section 69, and the building or other structure on that other land was erected—

(i) without the consent of the tenants of other allotments on the allotment site of which that other land forms part, that tenant, or

(ii) with the consent of any tenants of such other allotments, that tenant and any other tenant who consented.

(4) A liable tenant mentioned in subsection (3)(b)(ii) is jointly and severally liable with other liable tenants mentioned in that subsection.

(5) Where a local authority proposes to take any action in exercise of a power conferred by subsection (2), it must—

(a) no later than one month before taking such action, give notice in writing of the authority’s proposed action to each tenant who would be affected by such action,

(b) allow each such tenant the opportunity to make representations to the authority in relation to the proposed action,

(c) take account of any representations received by it by virtue of paragraph (b), and

(d) give notice in writing to each tenant mentioned in paragraph (a) to inform them of the authority’s decision in relation to the proposed action and, if applicable, the date on which the proposed action is to take place.

(6) If the authority decides to take the proposed action, any tenant who was notified under subsection (5)(a) may appeal to the sheriff against the decision of the authority before the expiry of the period of 21 days beginning with the day on which the notice mentioned in subsection (5)(d) is given.

(7) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision for or in connection with the procedure to be followed in relation to the exercise of the powers conferred by subsection (2).

(8) In the case where an allotment site is leased by a local authority, the authority may not exercise a power conferred by subsection (2) if such exercise would contravene a provision of the lease.

81 Delegation of management of allotment sites

(1) A person who represents the interests of the tenants of each allotment on an allotment site may make a request to the local authority that owns or leases the site that the authority delegate to the person any of the authority’s functions mentioned in subsection (2) in relation to the allotment site.

(2) The functions are—

(a) the functions under—
(i) section 70(6) (request to lease allotment),
(ii) section 71(1) (duty to maintain list),
(iii) section 74(9) and (10) (display and copies of allotment site regulations),
(iv) section 82 (promotion and use of allotments: expenditure),

(b) the giving of notice under—
   (i) section 83(1) (notice of termination of lease of allotment or allotment site),
   (ii) section 84(2)(c) (notice of resumption),
   (iii) section 85(2) (notice of termination: sublease by local authority).

(3) A request under subsection (1) must—

(a) be made in writing, and

(b) include—
   (i) the name and address of the person making the request, and
   (ii) such other information as may be prescribed.

(4) The authority may within 14 days of receiving the request, ask—

(a) the person making the request for such further information as it considers necessary in connection with the request, and

(b) that the information be supplied within 14 days of the authority’s request.

(5) The authority must give notice to the person making the request of its decision to agree to or refuse the request—

(a) where further information is requested by the authority under subsection (4), before the expiry of 56 days beginning with the date on which the request is received by the authority, or

(b) in any other case, before the expiry of 28 days beginning with the date on which the request is received by the authority.

(6) If the decision is to refuse the request, the notice referred to in subsection (5) must include reasons for the authority’s decision.

(7) If the decision is to agree to the request, the authority must decide—

(a) which of its functions that are mentioned in subsection (2) are to be delegated to the person making the request, and

(b) the timing of any review of the delegation of those functions by the authority.

(8) Before making a decision under subsection (7), the authority must consult the person who made the request.

(9) The authority may recall the delegation of any of its functions delegated under this section if—

(a) it considers that the person to whom the functions are delegated is not satisfactorily carrying out a function, or

(b) there is a material disagreement between the authority and the person to whom the functions are delegated about the carrying out of the functions.
(10) In the case where an allotment site is leased by a local authority, the authority must not delegate any functions under this section to the person making the request where the delegation would contravene a provision of the lease.

82 Promotion and use of allotments: expenditure
A local authority may incur expenditure for the purpose of—

(a) the promotion of allotments in its area, and

(b) the provision of training by or on behalf of the authority to tenants, or potential tenants, of allotments about the use of allotments.

Termination of lease

83 Termination of lease of allotment or allotment site
(1) A local authority may terminate the lease of the whole or part of an allotment or an allotment site on a specified date if the authority has given the tenant of the allotment or the allotment site notice of the termination in accordance with subsection (2).

(2) Notice is given in accordance with this subsection if—

(a) it is in writing, and

(b) it is given—

(i) if subsection (3) applies, at least one month before the specified date,

(ii) if subsection (4) applies, at least one year before the specified date.

(3) This subsection applies if, following the expiry of the period of 3 months beginning with the date on which the lease commenced, the tenant has failed to a material extent to comply with any provision of the regulations made under section 73(1).

(4) This subsection applies if the Scottish Ministers have consented to—

(a) the disposal of the allotment site subject to the lease or, as the case may be, the allotment site on which the allotment is situated under section 75,

(b) the change of use of the allotment site subject to the lease or, as the case may be, the allotment site on which the allotment is situated under section 75 or 76,

(c) to the renunciation by the local authority of its lease of the allotment site subject to the lease or, as the case may be, the allotment site on which the allotment is situated under section 76.

(5) Before sending any notice under subsection (1), a local authority must—

(a) no later than one month before giving any notice under that subsection, write to the tenant to inform the tenant that the authority is proposing to give notice of termination under that subsection and give reasons for the authority’s proposal,

(b) allow the tenant the opportunity to make representations to the authority in relation to the authority’s proposal,

(c) take account of any representations received by it by virtue of paragraph (b), and

(d) either—
(i) write to the tenant to inform the tenant that the authority no longer proposes to give notice under subsection (1) for the reasons referred to in paragraph (a), or
(ii) give notice under subsection (1) for those reasons.

(6) A tenant who is aggrieved by a notice given under subsection (1) may appeal to the sheriff within 21 days of the date of the notice.

(7) If subsection (4) applies, an appeal under subsection (6) may be made on a point of law only.

(8) A notice under subsection (1) has no effect until—

(a) the period within which an appeal may be made under subsection (6) has elapsed without an appeal being made, or
(b) where such an appeal is made, the appeal is withdrawn or finally determined.

(9) The decision of the sheriff on appeal under this section is final.

(10) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provisions as to the procedure to be applied in connection with the exercise of the power conferred by subsection (1).

(11) Where, under subsection (2) of section 85, a local authority sends a copy of the notice mentioned in that subsection to a person, the authority need not also send a notice under subsection (1) of this section.

(12) In this section, “specified” means specified in the notice under subsection (1).

84 Resumption of allotment or allotment site by local authority

(1) This section applies where a person leases an allotment or an allotment site from a local authority.

(2) Despite any provision of the lease, the authority may resume possession of the whole or part of the allotment or the allotment site if—

(a) the resumption is required for building, mining or any other industrial purpose or for the construction, maintenance or repair of any roads or sewers necessary in connection with any such purpose,
(b) the Scottish Ministers have consented to the resumption, and
(c) the authority has given the tenant notice of the resumption in accordance with subsection (3).

(3) Notice is given in accordance with this subsection if—

(a) it is in writing,
(b) it is given at least three months before the date on which the resumption is to take place, and
(c) it specifies that date.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may make the granting of consent mentioned in subsection (2)(b) subject to such conditions as they think fit.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may not grant consent unless they are satisfied that—
(a) the tenant of the allotment, or (as the case may be) the tenant of each allotment on the allotment site, is to be offered a lease of another allotment in the area of the local authority within a reasonable distance of the allotment site or the allotment site on which the allotment is situated, or

(b) the provision of the same or another allotment for the tenant is unnecessary or not reasonably practicable.

Notice of termination: sublease

85 Notice of termination: sublease

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a local authority leases an allotment site from another person,

(b) the authority has granted a sublease of the allotment site or an allotment on the allotment site to a person, and

(c) the authority receives notice of termination of the lease of the allotment site.

(2) The authority must—

(a) send a copy of the notice to—

(i) the subtenant of the allotment site, or

(ii) the subtenant of each allotment on the allotment site, and

(b) inform each subtenant to whom a copy of the notice is sent under paragraph (a) that the effect of the notice is that the subtenant’s sublease is terminated on the date specified in the notice as the date on which the lease of the allotment site is terminated.

86 Notice of termination: sublease by allotment association

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) the local authority gives a notice under section 83(1), 84(2) or 85(2)(a)(i) to the tenant of an allotment site,

(b) allotments on the allotment site are sublet to another person (“subtenant”) by the tenant, and

(c) the tenant of the allotment site represents the interests of each subtenant.

(2) The tenant must—

(a) send a copy of the notice to each subtenant, and

(b) inform each subtenant that the effect of the notice is that the subtenant’s sublease is terminated on the date specified in the notice as the date on which the lease of the allotment site is terminated or, as the case may be, the date on which the allotment site is resumed.

Tenants’ rights

87 Sale of surplus produce

(1) A tenant of an allotment may sell (other than with a view to making a profit) produce grown by the tenant on the allotment if the produce falls within a prescribed description.
(2) Before making regulations under subsection (1), the Scottish Ministers must consult each local authority and any other person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest.

88 Removal of items from allotment by tenant

5 (1) A tenant of an allotment may remove from the allotment any of the items mentioned in subsection (2) before the expiry or termination of the tenant’s lease.

(2) The items are—
(a) any buildings (or other structures) erected by or on behalf of the tenant,
(b) any produce, trees or bushes—
   (i) planted by or on behalf of the tenant, or
   (ii) acquired by the tenant.

Compensation

89 Compensation for disturbance

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—
(a) the lease of the whole or part of an allotment is terminated—
   (i) by notice under section 83(2)(b)(ii),
   (ii) as a result of a notice of termination of the lease of the allotment site on which the allotment is situated under section 83(2)(b)(ii),
   (iii) as a result of resumption of the allotment, or the allotment site on which the allotment is situated, under section 84(2), or
   (iv) as a result of a notice mentioned in section 85(1)(c), and
(b) the tenant of the allotment suffers damage caused by disturbance of the enjoyment of the tenant’s allotment as a result of the termination of the lease.

(2) The local authority in whose area the allotment is situated is liable to compensate a person referred to in subsection (1)(b).

(3) The minimum amount of compensation payable under subsection (2) is—
(a) where the termination of the lease relates to the whole of an allotment, an amount equal to one year’s rent of the allotment payable immediately before the termination of the lease,
(b) where the termination of the lease relates to part of an allotment, a proportion of the amount mentioned in paragraph (a) that is in the same proportion that the part of the allotment bears to the whole of the allotment.

(4) The Scottish Ministers must by regulations make further provision for or in connection with compensation payable under subsection (2).

(5) Regulations under subsection (4) must include, in particular, provision about the procedure to be followed in—
(a) determining whether the local authority is liable to pay compensation under subsection (2), and
(b) subject to subsection (3), assessing the amount of compensation for which the local authority is liable in cases where the lease does not make such provision.

(6) Before making regulations under subsection (4), the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) each local authority, and

(b) any other person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest.

(7) A person referred to in subsection (1)(b) who is aggrieved about any decision by the local authority in connection with the duty imposed by subsection (2) may appeal to the sheriff within 21 days of receiving notice of the authority’s decision.

90 Compensation for deterioration of allotment

(1) This section applies where—

(a) the lease of a person (“the tenant”) of an allotment has expired or been terminated, and

(b) it appears to the local authority that leased the allotment to the tenant that—

(i) the allotment deteriorated during the tenant’s lease of the allotment, and

(ii) the deterioration was caused by the fault or negligence of the tenant.

(2) The tenant is liable to pay compensation for the deterioration to the local authority.

(3) The amount of compensation payable is the cost of remedying the deterioration.

(4) The Scottish Ministers must by regulations make further provision for or in connection with compensation payable under subsection (2).

(5) Regulations under subsection (4) must include, in particular, provision about the procedure to be followed—

(a) in determining whether the tenant is liable to pay compensation under subsection (2), and

(b) in accordance with subsection (3), assessing the amount of compensation for which the tenant is liable in cases where the lease does not make such provision.

(6) Before making regulations under subsection (3), the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) each local authority, and

(b) any other person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest.

(7) A tenant who is aggrieved about any decision by the local authority in connection with the duty imposed by subsection (2) may appeal to the sheriff within 21 days of receiving notice of the authority’s decision.

91 Compensation for loss of crops

(1) This section applies where—

(a) the whole or part of an allotment is resumed under section 84(2), and

(b) the tenant of the allotment suffers loss of any crop as a result of the resumption.

(2) The local authority that resumed the allotment under section 84(2) is liable to compensate the tenant.
(3) The Scottish Ministers must by regulations make further provision for or in connection with compensation payable under subsection (2).

(4) Regulations under subsection (3) must include, in particular, provision about the procedure to be followed in—

(a) determining whether the local authority is liable to pay compensation under subsection (2), and

(b) assessing the amount of compensation for which the local authority is liable in cases where the lease does not make such provision.

(5) Before making regulations under subsection (3), the Scottish Ministers must consult—

(a) each local authority, and

(b) any other person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest.

(6) A tenant who is aggrieved about any decision by the local authority in connection with the duty imposed by subsection (2) may appeal to the sheriff within 21 days of receiving notice of the authority’s decision.

92 Set-off of compensation etc.

(1) Where a local authority is liable to pay compensation to a former tenant under section 89(2) or 91(2), the local authority may deduct from the compensation any sum that the former tenant is liable to pay to the local authority in connection with the lease that was terminated.

(2) Where a tenant is liable to pay any sum to the local authority in connection with a lease of an allotment, the tenant may deduct from the sum any compensation that the local authority is liable to pay to the tenant under section 89(2) or 91(2).

Interpretation of Part 7

93 Interpretation of Part 7

In this Part—

“allotment” has the meaning given by section 68,

“allotment site” has the meaning given by section 69,

“disabled person” means a person who is disabled for the purposes of the Equality Act 2010,

“food-growing strategy” has the meaning given by section 77(3),

“lease” and “leased” include “sublease” and “subleased”,

“prescribed” means prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by regulations, “tenant” includes “subtenant”.

[72x795]74

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Part 7—Allotments
Schemes for reduction and remission of non-domestic rates

(1) After section 3 of the Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962, insert—

“3A Schemes for reduction and remission of rates

(1) This section applies in relation to rates leviable for the year 2015-16 and any subsequent year.

(2) A rating authority may, in accordance with a scheme made by it for the purposes of this section, reduce or remit any rate leviable by it in respect of lands and heritages.

(3) Any reduction or remission under subsection (2) ceases to have effect at such time as may be determined by the rating authority.

(4) A scheme under subsection (2) may make provision for the rate to be reduced or remitted by reference to—

(a) such categories of lands and heritages as may be specified in the scheme,
(b) such areas as may be so specified,
(c) such activities as may be so specified,
(d) such other matters as may be so specified.

(5) Any reduction or remission under subsection (2) ceases to have effect on a change in the occupation of the lands and heritages in respect of which it was granted.

(6) Before exercising the power conferred by subsection (2), or amending a scheme made under that subsection, the rating authority must have regard to the interests of persons liable to pay council tax set by the authority.”.

(2) In Schedule 12 to the Local Government Finance Act 1992 (payments to local authorities by the Scottish Ministers), in paragraph 10(3)(a)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (iii), after “Provisions” insert “etc.”, and
(b) after that sub-paragraph insert—

“(iiiia)section 3A (schemes for reduction and remission of rates) of that Act;”.

(3) In paragraph 2 of Schedule 1 (rules for the calculation of non-domestic rating contributions) to the Non-Domestic Rating Contributions (Scotland) Regulations 1996 (S.I. 1996/3070), in sub-paragraph (c), after “section” insert “3A or”.

(4) Paragraph 10(4) of Schedule 12 to the Local Government Finance Act 1992 does not apply in relation to the amendment made by subsection (3).
PART 9
GENERAL

95 Guidance under Parts 2 and 6: publication
The Scottish Ministers must publish, in such manner as they think fit, any guidance issued by them relating to Part 2 or Part 6.

96 Subordinate legislation
(1) Any power of the Scottish Ministers to make an order or regulations under this Act includes a power to make—
   (a) different provision for different purposes,
   (b) incidental, supplementary, consequential, transitional or transitory provision or savings.
(2) An order under—
   (a) section 72(4) or (5), or
   (b) section 97(1) containing provisions which add to, replace or omit any part of the text of an Act, is subject to the affirmative procedure.
(3) Regulations under section 12(1) are subject to the affirmative procedure.
(4) Any other orders and regulations under this Act are subject to the negative procedure.
(5) This section does not apply to—
   (a) regulations under section 73(1), or
   (b) orders under section 99(2).

97 Ancillary provision
(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order make such incidental, supplementary, consequential, transitional or transitory provision or savings as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of, in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision of this Act.
(2) An order under this section may modify any enactment (including this Act), instrument or document.

98 Minor and consequential amendments and repeals
(1) Schedule 4 contains minor amendments and amendments consequential on the provisions of this Act.
(2) The enactments mentioned in the first column of schedule 5 (which include enactments that are spent) are repealed to the extent set out in the second column.

99 Commencement
(1) This section, sections 95 to 97 and section 100 come into force on the day after Royal Assent.
(2) The remaining provisions of this Act come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

(3) An order under subsection (2) may include transitional or transitory provision or savings.

5 100 Short title

The short title of this Act is the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Act 2015.
SCHEDULE 1
(introduced by section 4(1))

COMMUNITY PLANNING PARTNERS

The board of management of a regional college designated by order under section 7A of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 2005 which is situated in the area of the local authority

The chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland

The Health Board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 whose area includes, or is the same as, the area of the local authority

Highlands and Islands Enterprise where the area within which, or in relation to which, it exercises functions in accordance with section 21(1) of the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Act 1990 includes the whole or part of the area of the local authority

Any integration joint board established by virtue of section 9 of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 to which functions of the local authority and the Health Board are delegated

A National Park authority, established by virtue of a designation order under section 6 of the National Parks (Scotland) Act 2000, for a Park whose area includes the whole or part of the area of the local authority

A regional strategic body specified in schedule 2A to the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 2005 which is situated in the area of the local authority

Scottish Enterprise

The Scottish Environment Protection Agency

The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

Scottish Natural Heritage

The Scottish Sports Council

The Skills Development Scotland Co. Limited

A regional Transport Partnership established by virtue of section 1(1)(b) of the Transport (Scotland) Act 2005 whose region includes, or is the same as, the area of the local authority

VisitScotland

SCHEDULE 2
(introduced by section 16(1))

PUBLIC SERVICE AUTHORITIES

The board of management of a college of further education (those expressions having the same meanings as in section 36(1) of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 1992)

A Health Board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978

Highlands and Islands Enterprise
A local authority

A National Park authority established by virtue of a designation order under section 6 of the National Parks (Scotland) Act 2000

The Police Service of Scotland

Scottish Enterprise

The Scottish Environment Protection Agency

The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

Scottish Natural Heritage

A regional Transport Partnership established by virtue of section 1(1)(b) of the Transport (Scotland) Act 2005

SCHEDULE 3
(introduced by section 51(1))

RELEVANT AUTHORITIES

The board of management of a college of further education (those expressions having the same meanings as in section 36(1) of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 1992)

The British Waterways Board

The Crofting Commission

A Health Board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978

Highlands and Islands Enterprise

A local authority

A National Park authority established by virtue of a designation order under section 6 of the National Parks (Scotland) Act 2000

The Scottish Court Service

Scottish Enterprise

The Scottish Environment Protection Agency

The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service

The Scottish Ministers

Scottish Natural Heritage

The Scottish Police Authority

Scottish Water

A Special Health Board constituted under section 2(1)(b) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978

A regional Transport Partnership established by virtue of section 1(1)(b) of the Transport (Scotland) Act 2005
Local Government Act 1992

1 In section 1 of the Local Government Act 1992 (publication of information as to standards of performance), in subsection (1)(b), for the words “Part 2 (community planning) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 (asp 1)” substitute “Part 2 (community planning) of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Act 2015”.

Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003

2 (1) The Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 is amended in accordance with this paragraph.

(2) In section 37 (registration of interest in land)—

(a) after subsection (7)(b) insert “and

(c) any notice sent under section 44A,”,

(b) in subsection (11)(c), for the words “not registrable land” substitute “excluded land as defined in section 33(2) above”,

(c) in subsection (18), after paragraph (a), insert—

“(aa) where the decision is that such an interest is to be entered in the Register, contain information about the duties imposed under section 44A,”,

(d) in subsection (19), after “above” insert “, including that subsection as modified by section 39(2)(b) below,”.

(3) In section 51 (exercise of right to buy: approval of community and consent of Ministers)—

(a) in subsection (2)(a)(i), the words “conducted by the community body” are repealed, and

(b) in subsection (6)—

(i) in paragraph (a), after “receipt” insert “by Ministers”,

(ii) in that paragraph, the words “conducted by the body” are repealed, and

(iii) in paragraph (b), the words “conducted by those bodies” are repealed.

(4) In section 52 (ballot procedure)

(a) in subsection (3)—

(i) for the words “community body which conducts a ballot” substitute “ballotter appointed under section 51A”,

(ii) after “notify” insert “Ministers, the community body, the owner of the land to which the ballot relates and any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land of”,

(iii) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (c) is repealed,

(iv) after paragraph (d) insert—

“(e) the wording of that proposition, and...
(f) any information provided by the ballotter to persons eligible to vote in the ballot.”.

(v) the words “to Ministers” are repealed, and

(b) after subsection (4) insert—

“(5) Within 7 days of receiving notification under subsection (3) above, Ministers may—

(a) require the ballotter to provide such information relating to the ballot as they think fit,

(b) require the community body to provide such information relating to any consultation with those eligible to vote in the ballot undertaken during the period in which the ballot was carried out as Ministers think fit.

(6) The validity of anything done under this Part of this Act is not affected by any failure by a ballotter to comply with the time limit specified in subsection (4).”.

(5) In section 98 (general and supplementary provisions)—

(a) in subsection (5)—

(i) for “or 94” substitute “94 or 97E(4)”, and

(ii) after “above” insert “or regulations made under section 34(A1)(b) or (4A), 97C(2), (3) or (4), 97F(6) or 97N(1) or (3) above”, and

(b) in subsection (8), for “and 52(3)” substitute “, 52(3), 97G(7) and (9) and 97J(4)”.

20 SCHEDULE 5
(introduced by section 98(2))

REPEALS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Enactment</th>
<th>Extent of repeal</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Allotments (Scotland) Act 1892</td>
<td>The whole Act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919</td>
<td>Part 3 and paragraph 6 of the First Schedule.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Allotments (Scotland) Act 1922</td>
<td>The whole Act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Allotments (Scotland) Act 1950</td>
<td>The whole Act.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973</td>
<td>Section 73(2) and (3).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003</td>
<td>In section 38(1), paragraph (a) and, in paragraph (b), the word “substantial” where it appears in each of sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Section 40(4)(g)(iv).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Enactment</td>
<td>Extent of repeal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------</td>
<td>-----------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In section 50, subsection (2)(b).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In section 51, subsection (3)(a).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In section 52, subsection (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In section 61(3), the words from “or” to “person”.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In section 62, subsections (5), (6) and (8) and, in subsection (7), the words “within 4 weeks of the hearing of the appeal”.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>In section 98(5), the word “33”.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about national outcomes; to confer functions on certain persons in relation to services provided by, and assets of, certain public bodies; to amend Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003; to enable certain bodies to buy abandoned or neglected land; to make provision for registers of common good property and about disposal and use of such property; to restate and amend the law on allotments; to enable local authorities to reduce or remit non-domestic rates; and for connected purposes.

Introduced by: John Swinney
Supported by: Derek Mackay, Paul Wheelhouse
On: 11 June 2014
Bill type: Government Bill
COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

EXPLANATORY NOTES

(AND OTHER ACCOMPANYING DOCUMENTS)

CONTENTS

As required under Rule 9.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, the following documents are published to accompany the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014:

- Explanatory Notes;
- a Financial Memorandum;
- a Scottish Government statement on legislative competence; and
- the Presiding Officer’s statement on legislative competence.

A Policy Memorandum is printed separately as SP Bill 52–PM.
EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

1. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament.

2. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

OVERVIEW

3. The Bill reflects the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a framework which will:
   - empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and
   - support an increase in the pace and scale of public service reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.

4. The Bill comprises 9 Parts with 5 schedules:
   - Part 1 places a duty on Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which builds on the “Scotland Performs” framework.
   - Part 2 places community planning partnerships on a statutory footing and imposes duties on them around the planning and delivery of local outcomes. Schedule 1 lists the bodies which are to be community planning partners. This Part replaces provision in Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, which is repealed by schedule 5.
   - Part 3 provides a mechanism for communities to have a more proactive role in having their voices heard in how services are planned and delivered. Schedule 2 lists “public service authorities” to whom participation requests can be made.
   - Part 4 amends Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, extending the community right to buy to all of Scotland, and introduces a new Part 3A to that Act to make provision for community bodies to purchase neglected and abandoned land where the owner is not willing to sell that land.
   - Part 5 provides community bodies a right to request to purchase, lease, manage or use land and buildings belonging to local authorities, certain Scottish public bodies or Scottish Ministers. The list of “relevant authorities” affected is given in schedule 3.
   - Part 6 places a statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good. It also requires local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

- Part 7 updates and simplifies legislation on allotments. It requires local authorities to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if waiting lists exceed certain trigger points and ensures appropriate protection for local authorities and plotholders. This replaces the provisions of the Allotments (Scotland) Acts 1892, 1922 and 1950, which are repealed in their entirety by schedule 5, and some provisions of the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919.

- Part 8 provides for a new power which will allow councils to create and fund their own localised business rate relief schemes to better reflect local needs and support communities. It does this by inserting a new section into the Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962.

- Part 9 makes general provisions in relation to the Bill, including provision about subordinate legislation, ancillary provision and commencement. Schedule 4 makes minor and consequential amendments to other legislation, and schedule 5 provides for repeals.

COMMENTARY ON SECTIONS

Part 1: National outcomes

5. The Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland. They must also regularly and publicly report progress towards those outcomes. These duties do not require governments to use a particular model of purpose, targets, outcomes and indicators. They require national outcomes to be determined, but there is flexibility as to how these may be presented and measured.

National outcomes

6. Subsection (1) of section 1 provides that the Scottish Ministers must determine national outcomes. National outcomes are outcomes for Scotland that result from or are contributed to by the devolved functions carried out by the persons set out in subsection (1)(a) to (c). The definitions are wide to allow the inclusion of all organisations that could be considered as “public bodies”, and other organisations that carry out public functions, such as private or third sector bodies who are contracted to deliver public services. The persons included in the category “Scottish public authority” include the Scottish Ministers and local authorities.

7. Subsection (2) requires the Scottish Ministers to consult “such persons as they consider appropriate” before determining the national outcomes. No list is specified, but since the national outcomes will have an impact on the devolved functions of all public bodies, it is expected that Ministers will want to consult widely.

8. Subsections (4) to (6) impose a duty on those persons set out in subsection (1)(a) to (c) to “have regard to” the national outcomes in carrying out their devolved functions. “Have regard to” means that all of these bodies should be consistent with the national outcomes in what they are trying to achieve in carrying out their devolved functions.
Review of national outcomes

9. Subsection (1) of section 2 provides that the Scottish Ministers may review the national outcomes at any time. This is subject to subsection (2) which requires that, once the Scottish Ministers have published national outcomes, they must begin to review them before the expiry of 5 years from publication at a minimum. It will be for the Scottish Ministers to decide how frequently within that 5 year period they wish to review the national outcomes.

10. Subsection (1) is also subject to subsection (3) which provides that the Scottish Ministers must begin further reviews of the national outcomes every 5 years at a minimum from the date of publication of revised national outcomes or republished national outcomes. Subsection (4) provides that the Scottish Ministers may revise the national outcomes following a review. The national outcomes must then either be published as revised or, where no changes are made, they must be republished. In either case, this will mark the beginning of the 5 year period under subsection (3).

11. Subsection (5) requires that the Scottish Ministers consult with “such persons as they consider appropriate” when reviewing the national outcomes and that any changes made must be published.

Reports

12. Section 3 requires that the Scottish Ministers must publicly report on progress towards achieving the national outcomes, whether that is positive or negative progress.

13. This does not necessarily require a written report, although it may do. The format of the reporting will be for the Scottish Ministers to decide. The current system, “Scotland Performs”, uses a website showing upward and downward arrows to indicate positive or negative progress: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Performance/scotPerforms/indicator.

Part 2: Community planning

14. This Part replaces provisions on community planning in Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. It provides a statutory basis for community planning partnerships, and places duties on them around the planning and achievement of local outcomes. It also focuses responsibilities on community planning partners to support each partnership to fulfil its duties.

Community planning

15. Section 4 defines “community planning”, “community planning partners” and “community planning partnerships”. Community planning is planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes in relation to the area of a local authority resulting from, or contributed to by, the provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the community planning partners. Subsection (3) states that these local outcomes must be consistent with national outcomes which Scottish Ministers determine under section 1(1), or as revised under section 2(4)(a). The persons listed in schedule 1, together with local authorities, are the community planning partners. The community planning partnership comprises these partners when they participate together in community planning. Subsection (5) requires a community planning partnership to make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of appropriate community bodies in community planning, and to take steps to enable them to participate to the extent they wish to.

16. Subsection (6) enables Scottish Ministers to amend the list of community planning partners in schedule 1 by regulations. Subsection (7) states that the regulations may provide that a community planning partner may participate in community planning for a specific purpose, where participation is required in relation to some of that partner’s functions but not others.

Local outcomes improvement plan

17. Under section 5 each community planning partnership must prepare a local outcomes improvement plan. To that end the community planning partnership must identify the local outcomes to which it is to give priority with a view to improving the achievement of the outcome. The plan will provide a description of the improvement in local outcomes that is sought and the timeframe for achieving the improvement (subsection (2)). Subsection (3) requires the partnership to consult such community bodies and other persons as it considers appropriate when it prepares its plan. Subsection (4) sets out what a partnership must take account of before it publishes its final plan. This includes representations it receives as a result of the consultations with community bodies and other persons carried out in accordance with subsection (3). The partnership must also take account of the needs and circumstances of people and communities in the area.

18. Section 6 requires that the community planning partnership must monitor progress in improving the achievement of local outcomes referred to in its local outcome improvement plan. It must keep the plan under review to determine whether the plan itself is still appropriate and must publish any revised plan which results from such a review.

19. Each partnership must prepare and publish an annual report of the progress made in improving the achievement of local outcomes referred to in its local outcome improvement plan, in accordance with section 7. The period which these reports must cover is the year beginning on 1 April, unless Ministers specify another date for the year to start in a direction to the partnership.

Governance

20. Section 8 places governance responsibilities on specified community planning partners for the purpose of effective community planning. Under subsection (1)(a) the specified partners must facilitate community planning and under subsection (1)(b) the specified partners must take reasonable steps to ensure that the partnership operates efficiently and effectively. Subsection (2) lists the persons to whom these governance duties apply. Subsection (3) enables Ministers to modify this list by regulations.

Duties on community planning partners

21. Subsections (2) to (5) of section 9 describe how the community planning partners, listed in schedule 1, must participate in community planning. These responsibilities include cooperating with other community planning partners in carrying out community planning
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

(subsection (2)) and taking account of the published local outcomes improvement plan as part of its work (subsection (5)). They also include committing appropriate resources to the achievement of local outcomes set out in that plan and for the purpose of securing the participation of relevant community bodies in community planning (subsection (3)). Each community planning partner must provide the partnership with such information about the local outcomes in the plan which the partnership may request (subsection (4)). Section 9(1) enables a partnership to agree with a partner a reduction in the extent to which that partner is expected to comply with its duties to that partnership.

Guidance by Scottish Ministers

22. Section 10 provides that community planning partnerships and partners must carry out their functions in relation to community planning in accordance with any relevant guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they think fit before they issue any such guidance.

Duty to promote community planning

23. Section 11 requires the Scottish Ministers to promote community planning when discharging any function which might affect community planning, or a community planning partner. It reproduces a provision previously in section 16(8) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003.

Establishment of corporate bodies

24. Section 19 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 gives Scottish Ministers a power to establish corporate bodies to co-ordinate community planning. As a body corporate, a community planning partnership could, for example, hold its own budgets and assets and employ its own staff.

25. Section 12 of the Bill retains the option of incorporation in appropriate cases, by replacing the provisions of section 19 of the 2003 Act. Subsection (1) allows Scottish Ministers to establish a body corporate by regulations, following an application made by a local authority and at least one other community planning partner in the area. Any application must include information about the matters which are listed in subsection (2). Subsection (3) lists matters about the body corporate which Scottish Ministers can specify in any regulations they make. Subsection (4) allows the regulations to provide that the corporate body may discharge a function, even where another enactment specifies that as the function of another body or prevents the carrying out of that function by the corporate body.

Part 3: Participation requests

26. This Part sets out how a “community participation body” can make a request to a “public service authority” to participate in a process with a view to improving an outcome of a public service, and how public service authorities are to deal with such requests. The Bill provides the main structure of the approach, and there are powers for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations adding more detail about procedures to be followed, timescales, and information to be provided or published.
Community controlled body

27. Section 14 defines a “community-controlled body”. This can be a corporate body or unincorporated, but it must have a written constitution which:

- defines the community to which the body relates;
- provides membership rules which ensure the body is open to and controlled by members of that community, and that the majority of the members of the body are members of that community;
- sets out aims and purposes which include the promotion of a benefit for that community; and
- provides that any surplus funds or assets are to be used for the benefit of that community.

There are no restrictions on how a community may be defined for this purpose: it may be based, for example, on geographical boundaries, common interests, or shared characteristics of its members (such as ethnic background, disability, religion, etc.).

Community participation body

28. Section 15 defines a “community participation body”, which is the type of body which can make a participation request under section 17. A community participation body may be a community-controlled body, a community council, or a body designated by the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Ministers may designate individual bodies as community participation bodies, or may designate a whole class of bodies, so that any body of that type will qualify as a community participation body. Subsection (3) states that where a trust is designated, the designated body will be the trustees, since a trust is not incorporated.

Public service authority

29. Schedule 2, introduced by section 16, lists the bodies to which a participation request can be made, to be known as “public service authorities”. This includes local authorities, Health Boards, and certain other Scottish public bodies. The public bodies selected are involved in providing or supporting local services. The list does not include, for example, boards which advise Ministers or which regulate certain professions.

30. The remainder of section 16 gives the Scottish Ministers a power to remove or amend any entry on the list, or to make an order designating other bodies or classes of bodies as public service authorities. Subsection (4) provides that persons may only be designated if they fall into the following categories:

- part of the Scottish Administration (which has the meaning given in sections 126(6) to (8) of the Scotland Act 1998);
- “Scottish public authorities with mixed functions or no reserved functions under the Scotland Act 1998” – this means that UK Government Departments and public bodies that deal with matters reserved to the UK Government cannot be included;
- companies wholly-owned by public service authorities.
Under subsection (9), when adding a person to the list, Scottish Ministers may exclude some of the services they provide from being subject to participation requests.

Participation requests and the outcome improvement process

31. Section 17 provides that a community participation body, or two or more bodies jointly, may make a participation request to a public service authority. This is a request to take part in a process established by the authority with a view to improving an outcome of a public service. Subsection (2) says that the request must focus on an outcome relating to a service provided by that authority, and the community participation body must explain why it considers it should be involved, what it can bring to the process (for example, members’ experience as users of the service), and what improvement it expects might be achieved as a result.

32. Section 18 gives the Scottish Ministers powers to make regulations setting out further detail on participation requests. Regulations can, in particular, cover how requests are to be made, how public service authorities should deal with them, and additional information to be provided in connection with requests.

33. Section 19 requires a public service authority to agree to or refuse any participation request it receives, and sets out in subsections (3) to (5) how the authority must make that decision. In addition to the reasons provided in the request, the authority must consider whether agreeing to the request would be likely to promote or improve economic development, regeneration, public health, social or environmental wellbeing, and any other benefits or matters the authority considers relevant. The authority must also take into account its responsibilities in relation to equal opportunities. It must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusal. Subsection (6) requires the authority to give notice of its decision to the community participation body within a prescribed period, and if it refuses the request, it must give reasons for that refusal.

34. When a public service authority agrees to a participation request, the decision notice sent to the community participation body must, under section 20, describe how the outcome improvement process will work, how the body is expected to take part in the process, and whether and how any other person (including another body or another authority) will be involved. The authority may already have established a process with which the community participation body can join in, in which case the authority must say what stage the process has reached. If a new process is to be established as a result of the request, the community participation body has 28 days to comment on that new process, under section 21(2) and (3). The public service authority has a further 28 days to provide final details of that process, taking those representations into account, and must then (under section 23) establish the outcome improvement process within 90 days, and maintain it. The authority must publish information about the process if required to do so by regulations made under section 21(6). Section 24 provides that the public service authority may modify the process, following consultation with the community participation body. If it does so, it must publish information about the modification, if required to do so by regulations.

35. When an outcome improvement process has been completed, section 25 requires the public service authority to publish a report on the process. The report must summarise the outcome of the process, including whether the outcome to which it related has been improved, and describe how the community participation body that made the request influenced the process and the outcomes. It must also explain how the authority will keep the community participation body and others informed about changes in the outcomes of the process and any other matters relating to the outcomes. Subsection (4) gives the Scottish Ministers power to make regulations setting out further detail about these reports and the information they are to contain.

36. Section 22 allows a public service authority to decline to consider a participation request, if a new request is made within 2 years about the same outcome relating to the same service. The new request may be declined whether it is made by the same community participation body as the previous request or by a different body.

Part 4: Community right to buy land (sections 27 to 47 – modifications of Part 2 of Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003

Introduction

38. Part 2 of the 2003 Act provides bodies representing rural communities with rights to register an interest in land with which the community has a connection. These bodies have a right to purchase that land if the owner is willing to sell it. Part 2 of the 2003 Act sets out the land in respect of which an interest can be registered, and the procedure for registering an interest. It also sets out the circumstances in which the right to buy the land in respect of which an interest is registered arises and the procedures for exercising it (including procedures for valuation of the land, for appeals and for compensation).

Nature of land in which community interest may be registered

39. Section 27 of the Bill amends section 33 of the 2003 Act. Section 33 of the 2003 Act sets out the land in which a community body may register an interest. It provides that an interest can be registered in “registrable land”, which is anything other than “excluded land”. “Excluded land” is designated in the Community Right to Buy (Definition of Excluded Land) (Scotland) Order 2009 as land comprising the settlements listed in the order (which are all settlements of over 10,000 people). In this way, the community right to buy under the 2003 Act applies to community bodies representing rural communities.

40. Section 27(1)(a) of the Bill removes references to “registrable land” in section 33(1) of the 2003 Act which means that an interest can be registered in any land other than “excluded land”. As a result, community bodies will be able to register an interest in respect of land across Scotland, irrespective of the size of settlement.

41. Section 27(1)(b) of the Bill removes the power of the Scottish Ministers to define “excluded land” by order. It amends the definition of “excluded land” in section 33(2) of the 2003 Act to make reference to land consisting of the mineral rights to oil, coal, gas, gold or silver in which an interest cannot be registered if these rights are owned independently of the land.
42. Section 27(1)(d) of the Bill repeals subsections (3) to (7) of section 33 of the 2003 Act. Section 27(1)(c) inserts new subsection (2A) into section 33 of the 2003 Act which reflects the terms of the repealed subsection (6) to provide that a community interest may be registered in salmon fishings and mineral rights which are owned separately from the land to which those interests relate.

Meaning of “community”

43. Section 28 of the Bill modifies section 34 of the 2003 Act which defines a community body eligible to register an interest in land. Section 34 of the 2003 Act provides that a community body is a company limited by guarantee that meets certain criteria.

44. Section 28(2) of the Bill inserts subsection (A1) into section 34 of the 2003 Act. This extends the types of body which may be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (“SCIOs”) and any other type of body which Ministers specify in regulations. Section 28(2) also confers a power on Ministers to specify in regulations, and subsequently modify, any requirements which must be met by any such type of body.

45. Section 28(3)(c) of the Bill provides an additional requirement that must be satisfied for a company limited by guarantee to be a community body. The company’s articles of association must make provision for the minutes of meetings to be given to a person on request within 28 days of the request being made if that request is reasonable. The articles of association must also allow the community body to withhold information, provided that reasons are given for doing so.

46. Section 28(3)(d) of the Bill amends section 34(1)(h) of the 2003 Act to include reference to “Part 3A community bodies” which are provided for in the new Part 3A of the 2003 Act (inserted by section 48 of the Bill). This means that community bodies eligible to apply to purchase land under the new Part 3A of the 2003 Act are among the alternative bodies to which community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act may pass their assets upon winding up in terms of their articles of association.

47. Section 28(4) of the Bill inserts new subsection (1A) into section 34 of the 2003 Act which sets out the provisions that a SCIO must include in its constitution for it to be a community body and so eligible to apply to register an interest in land under Part 2 of the 2003 Act.

48. Section 28(6) of the Bill inserts subsection (4A) into section 34 of the 2003 Act. This subsection gives Ministers the power to modify, by way of regulations, the criteria which must be met by companies limited by guarantee and SCIOs in order to be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act.

49. Section 28(6) of the Bill also inserts subsection (4B) into section 34 of the 2003 Act. This subsection gives Ministers the power to amend, by way of regulations, subsection (1) and the new subsection (A1) of section 35 of the 2003 Act (inserted by section 29 of the Bill) where Ministers have exercised the power contained in the new subsection (A1)(b) of section 34 of the 2003 Act to extend, by way of regulation, the types of bodies which may be eligible to be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act. The power contained in subsection (4B) means that the prohibition on a community body modifying its articles of association, memorandum or constitution without the written consent of the Scottish Ministers can be amended to extend to any other kind of constitutive document which may apply to new types of body which may be community bodies as a result of the regulations made by Ministers under the new subsection (A1)(b) of section 34 of the 2003 Act.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

50. Section 28(7) of the Bill amends subsection (5) of section 34 of the 2003 Act which provides for the use of postcode units in order to define the community that the community body represents. Section 28(7) of the Bill confers a power on Ministers to make regulations which prescribe other types of area with which a community may define itself.

Modification of memorandum, articles of association or constitution

51. Section 29 of the Bill amends section 35 of the 2003 Act which provides that a community body may not modify its memorandum or articles of association without Ministers’ consent whilst they hold a registered interest or own land purchased under Part 2 of the 2003 Act.

52. Section 29(2) of the Bill inserts subsection (A1) into section 35 of the 2003 Act which prohibits a community body from modifying its memorandum, articles of association or constitution without the consent of Ministers during a specified period prior to registration of an interest. Section 29(2) of the Bill also inserts subsection (A2) into section 35 of the 2003 Act which provides that the specified period starts with the day a community body submits an application for a registered interest in land and ends with the registration of interest in land, rejection of the application to register land, Ministers declining to consider the application under section 39(5) of the 2003 Act or withdrawal of the application by the community body. This means that the existing prohibition which applies whilst the interest is registered and throughout the time they own land purchased under Part 2 of the 2003 Act (in terms of subsection (1) of section 35 of the 2003 Act) is extended to the period prior to registration.

53. Section 29(3) of the Bill amends subsection (1) of section 35 of the 2003 Act to make reference to the “constitution” of a community body. This amendment takes account of the inclusion of SCIOs as bodies which may be community bodies.

Period for indicating approval under section 38 of the 2003 Act

54. Section 30 of the Bill amends section 38 of the 2003 Act which sets out the criteria which must be met before an application to register a community interest in land is approved by Ministers. Subsection (1)(d) of section 38 of the 2003 Act provides that there must be sufficient community support to justify the registration.

55. The word “substantial” is repealed in section 38(1) of the 2003 Act and so the requirement concerning community members having a substantial connection with the land that the community body is seeking to register an interest in will be amended to just refer to a connection with that land.
56. Section 30 of the Bill inserts new subsection (2A) into section 38 of the 2003 Act to preclude Ministers considering any community support that is dated earlier than 6 months before the date an application to register a community interest in land is received by Ministers.

Procedure for late applications

57. Section 31 of the Bill amends section 39 of the 2003 Act relating to the procedure for late applications. An application is deemed to be “late” when it is received by Ministers after the owner of the land to which an application relates has taken action to transfer the land but before missives are concluded, or an option to acquire is granted, in pursuance of that action.

58. Section 31(2) of the Bill rewords subsection (1) of section 39 of the 2003 Act which sets out the conditions which must be met in order for section 39 to apply.

59. Section 31(3) of the Bill inserts a new paragraph (aa) into section 39(2) of the 2003 Act. The new paragraph allows Ministers to request further information from the owner of the land or a creditor in a standard security with the right to sell the land before the end of the 7-day period following the landowner or the creditor giving their views on the application under section 37(5) of the 2003 Act. The owner of the land or the creditor must provide the information within 7 days of receipt of the request. This information is requested to ensure that Ministers have the necessary evidence on which to decide whether the application is “late”.

60. Section 31(3)(b) of the Bill modifies subsection (2)(b)(ii) of section 39 of the 2003 Act to extend the time in which Ministers have to make a decision on whether the interest should be registered in the case of a “late” application where further information is requested. Where Ministers request further information, this period will be 44 days instead of 30 days.

61. Section 31(4) of the Bill amends subsection (3) of section 39 of the 2003 Act which sets out matters on which Ministers must be satisfied, in addition to the matters set out in section 38, before approving a “late” application. Section 31(4) of the Bill removes the requirement to show “good reasons” why an application was not submitted prior to the land coming on the market and replaces it with a requirement that such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out by a person or such relevant steps as Ministers consider reasonable were taken by a person. Section 31(9) of the Bill inserts a new subsection (6) into section 39 of the 2003 Act to define “relevant work” and “relevant steps”.

62. Section 31(4) of the Bill also inserts paragraph (aa) into section 39(3). This sets out the timescales in which the relevant work or steps must have been taken. It is for Ministers to determine whether the relevant work or steps were carried out sufficiently in advance of the landowner taking action with a view to selling the land or giving notice that a transfer was proposed under section 48(1). The new paragraph (aa) also provides that the relevant work or steps undertaken must be in relation to the land to which the application relates or other land being used for the same purposes as the land to which the application relates. The relevant work or steps are to have been carried out by the community body or by another person with a view to the application being made by the community body. The definitions of “relevant work” and “relevant steps” are inserted as new subsection (6) of section 39 of the 2003 Act by section 31(9) of the Bill.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

63. Section 31(5) of the Bill inserts a new subsection (3A) into section 39 of the 2003 Act. The new subsection (3A) allows Ministers to request further information about an application from any relevant party they deem necessary in connection with the criteria on which Ministers must be satisfied under section 39(3) of the 2003 Act. Ministers can request such information until the end of the 7-day period following receipt of the landowner’s views (or the views of a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land) under section 37(5) of the 2003 Act.

64. Section 31(6) of the Bill amends section 39(4)(c) which sets out the impact of an application being “late” on the community right to buy process. For the purposes of the provisions listed, the community body is deemed to have confirmed their intention to proceed with the purchase on the date on which the interest is registered. The amendment inserts a reference to the new section 60A(1) of the 2003 Act.

65. Section 31(7) of the Bill inserts a new subsection (4A) into section 39 of the 2003 Act and section 31(8) amends subsection (5) of the same. These provisions provide that where missives have been concluded in respect of the sale of land or an option conferred in respect of that land, Ministers must decline to consider the application. These amendments simplify the wording in the 2003 Act.

66. Section 31(9) of the Bill provides for a new subsection (7) of section 39 of the 2003 Act which makes it clear that the land in respect of which the relevant work or steps have been carried out does not need to be the same land as that to which the application relates.

Evidence and notification of concluded missives or option agreements

67. Section 32 of the Bill inserts a new section 39A into the 2003 Act in relation to evidence and notification of concluded missives or option agreements. The new subsection (4A) and amended subsection (5) of section 39 of the 2003 Act (under section 31(7) and (8) of the Bill) provide that where an application is received after missives have been concluded in respect of the land or an option conferred, Ministers must decline to consider the application. If the application did not disclose that missives have been concluded or an option conferred then the owner of the land (or a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell) must provide evidence of concluded missives or an option agreement to Ministers within 21 days of receiving a copy of the application under section 37(5)(a). Additional information on option agreements must also be provided, namely, the date of the option agreement and whether or not and how it may be extended. If the application does disclose that missives have been concluded or an option conferred and by virtue of section 39(4A) and (5) of the 2003 Act Ministers are not required to send a copy of the application to the land owner or a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell, then section 39A(4) will apply. This requires Ministers to send a copy of the application to the land owner and any such creditor and require them to provide evidence of the concluded missives or option conferred. The land owner and creditor will also be required to provide further information about the option conferred.

Notification of transfer

68. Section 33 of the Bill amends section 41 of the 2003 Act which is supplementary to and explanatory of section 40 of the 2003 Act. Section 40 of the 2003 Act prohibits owners and certain creditors from transferring land or taking action with a view to transferring land that is subject to a registered interest for so long as the interest is registered, other than in accordance with section 40(4) of the 2003 Act, which provides for “exempt” transfers.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

69. Section 33 of the Bill inserts subsection (3) into section 41 of the 2003 Act. It requires that where an owner or a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land makes a transfer in terms of section 40(4) of the 2003 Act, they must inform Ministers within 28 days of this taking place. The new subsection (3) of section 41 of the 2003 Act also sets out the information which the owner or creditor must provide.

Changes to information relating to registered interests

70. Section 34 of the Bill inserts a new section 44A into the 2003 Act, which applies where a community interest in land is registered.

71. Subsection (2) of the new section 44A of the 2003 Act requires that where any change has been made in the contact information of a community body provided in its application to register an interest, that community body must inform Ministers of that change as soon as is reasonably practicable.

72. Subsection (3) of the new section 44A of the 2003 Act requires that where any change has been made in the contact information of an owner provided in an application by a community body, the owner must inform Ministers of any changes to their contact information as soon as is reasonably practicable.

73. Subsection (4) of the new section 44A of the 2003 Act requires that the owner of the land must in certain circumstances notify Ministers of any changes to the information in an application relating to a creditor in a standard security as soon as is reasonably practicable.

74. Subsections (5) and (6) of the new section 44A of the 2003 Act require that where there is a creditor in a standard security over an interest in land to which an application relates and the application does not disclose the existence of such a creditor (either because the existence of the creditor was omitted or because it did not exist at the time the application was made), the owner must notify Ministers of the existence of the creditor and its contact details as soon as is practicable after the registration of the interest.

75. Subsections (7) and (8) of the new section 44A of the 2003 Act require that a community body or owner of land must, as soon as is reasonably practicable, make Ministers aware of any subsequent changes to any information submitted under subsections (2), (3), (4) or (6) of the new section 44A of the 2003 Act.

Notification under section 50 of the 2003 Act

76. Section 35 of the Bill amends section 50 of the 2003 Act. Section 50(1) sets out the circumstances in which the Lands Tribunal must notify Ministers that a landowner or creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land has acted in breach of a prohibition notice under section 37(5)(e) or section 40(1) of the 2003 Act.
77. Section 35(a) of the Bill amends subsection (3)(b) of section 50 of the 2003 Act. It inserts reference to any creditor with a right to sell the land. This requires Ministers to send a copy of the notice from the Lands Tribunal under section 50(1) to such a creditor as well as to the owner of the land.

78. Section 35(b) of the Bill provides for a new subsection (6) to be inserted in section 50 of the 2003 Act. This sets out that a community interest in land remains in effect for the purposes of section 50(2)(c) where a community body has applied to re-register an interest under section 44(2) of the 2003 Act and the Keeper has re-entered the interest on the Register accordingly. Where a registered interest in land under consideration by the Lands Tribunal is due to expire, the relevant community body should ensure that it re-registers their interest in terms of section 44(2) of the 2003 Act. Section 50(2)(b) of the 2003 Act is repealed.

Approval of members of community to buy land

79. Section 36 of the Bill amends section 51(2)(a) of the 2003 Act which relates to the community’s approval of the exercise of the right to buy. Section 51(2)(a) provides that at least half of the members of the community must have voted or, if half of the members have not voted, the proportion which voted is sufficient in the circumstances to justify the community body buying the land.

80. Section 36 of the Bill removes the reference to at least half of the members of the community voting and provides that the requirement in section 51(2)(a) of the 2003 Act is met if the proportion of the members of the community who voted is sufficient to justify the community body proceeding to buy the land. Section 51(3)(a) of the 2003 Act is repealed.

Appointment of person to conduct ballot on proposal to buy land 81. Section 37 of the Bill inserts a new section 51A into the 2003 Act. It provides for an independent ballotter to undertake the community ballot as required under section 51(1)(a) of the 2003 Act.

82. Sections 51 and 52 of the 2003 Act provide for a ballot to be carried out by the community body. Section 37 of the Bill amends the procedure of the ballot and provides that it is to be carried out by an independent ballotter. The responsibility for appointing a ballotter and the expense of conducting the ballot are with Ministers.

83. Subsections (2) to (6) of the new section 51A of the 2003 Act set out the procedure for the conduct of the ballot. So that the ballotter has all the necessary information in order to undertake the ballot, Ministers are obliged under subsection (2) to provide the ballotter with a copy of the application under section 37 of the 2003 Act and such other information as Ministers may prescribe in regulations. Subsection (3) provides that Ministers must do this within 28 days of the valuer being appointed under section 59 of the 2003 Act. Ministers must also provide the community body with the contact details of the ballotter under subsection (4).

84. Subsections (5) and (6) of the new section 51A of the 2003 Act require that the community body must, within 7 days of receiving notification of the value of the land under section 60(2) of the 2003 Act, provide the ballotter with wording for the proposition that the community body buy the land, together with other information as set out in regulations. The other information to be set out in regulations may relate to the community body, its proposals, the valuation and other matters. The form of the notification of the other information referred to may also be set out in regulations. Section 52(2) of the 2003 Act is repealed.

Consent under section 51 of the 2003 Act: prescribed information

85. Section 38 of the Bill inserts a new section 51B into the 2003 Act. This section sets out the information which Ministers must take account of when deciding whether to approve a community body’s exercise of the right to buy.

86. The new section 51B of the 2003 Act confers a power on Ministers to specify the type of information which a community body must provide in regulations, including, in particular, information relating to the matters referred to in subsection (3) of section 51 of the 2003 Act. Subsection (3) of the new section 51B of the 2003 Act requires that the information must be provided in a form set out by Ministers in regulations. Ministers can also take account of any information which they consider to be relevant, regardless of whether it is of the type specified in regulations.

87. Subsection (5) of the new section 51B of the 2003 Act provides that Ministers have 7 days from receipt of information to request further information. Furthermore, in terms of subsection (6) of the new section 51B of the 2003 Act, the community body has 7 days from the receipt of such a request to provide Ministers with the information.

Representations etc. regarding circumstances affecting ballot results

88. Section 39 of the Bill inserts a new section 51C into the 2003 Act which sets out a process for where a community body considers that circumstances have affected the ballot result.

89. Subsection (1) of the new section 51C allows the community body, within 7 days of receiving notification of the result of the ballot, to make representations to Ministers on circumstances that the community body considers impacted the ballot result.

90. Subsection (2) requires the community body to provide Ministers with such evidence as is reasonably necessary to establish the existence and effect of the circumstances that affected the ballot result. A copy of the evidence and representations must be sent to the owner of the land by the community body. Subsection (3) allows Ministers to request further information if required and the community body must respond within 7 days under subsection (4).

91. Subsection (5) provides that the owner of the land may provide comments in connection with the representations and evidence provided by the community body within 7 days of receiving copies of such representations and evidence. The owner of the land must send copies of any comments to the community body (subsection (6)). The community body may give their views to Ministers on the owner of the land’s comments (subsection (7)).
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

92. Subsection (8) provides that Ministers may request further information from the community body and, in terms of subsection (9), the community body must respond within 7 days.

93. Subsection (10) provides that Ministers must take account of any of the representations, evidence, information, comments or views which have been provided in this process when considering whether the ballot turnout requirement under section 51(2)(a) of the 2003 Act has been met.

94. Due to the administrative steps which have been provided for, section 39(2) of the Bill amends section 51 of the 2003 Act to extend the length of the period in which Ministers must decide whether to consent to the exercise of the right to buy from 21 days to 35 days in cases where representations have been made under section 51C(1).

Ballot not conducted as prescribed

95. Section 40 of the Bill amends section 52 of the 2003 Act. Section 52(1) of the 2003 Act provides that a ballot should be conducted as prescribed in regulations. Furthermore, in terms of section 52(2), if a ballot is deemed to be flawed, the community’s right to buy is extinguished.

96. Section 40 of the Bill provides that section 52 of the 2003 Act is amended to include a new subsection (7). The new subsection (7) provides Ministers with the powers to make regulations in connection with reviewing whether a ballot has been properly conducted and other matters relating to ballots not conducted as prescribed.

Period in which ballot results and valuations are to be notified

97. Section 41 of the Bill amends section 52(4) of the 2003 Act which provides the timescale for the conduct of the ballot and section 60 which provides the timescale for notification of the valuation figure.

98. Section 52(4) of the 2003 Act provides that the ballot is to take place within 28 days of the notification of the value of the land under section 60(2) and the ballot date is determined by the date of that notification. Section 41(1) of the Bill amends section 52(4) of the 2003 Act to provide that the ballot takes place within the 12 week period beginning on the date the valuer is appointed under section 59(1) of the 2003 Act. Alternatively, in cases where the valuation period has been extended on application by the valuer under section 60(3) of the 2003 Act and the date to which the valuation period has been extended to is after the 12-week period following the appointment of the valuer, the 12-week period begins on the day following the notification of the date under section 60(3C) of the 2003 Act. This means that the ballotter will in all cases have a minimum of 12 weeks to conduct the ballot and notify Ministers of the results.

99. Section 41(2) of the Bill provides that section 60 of the 2003 Act is amended to insert new subsections (3A) to (3D). These provisions detail the procedure of when and how the valuer is able to seek an extension to the timings for reporting the value of the land to parties set out in section 60(2). The community body, the landowner and the ballotter must be informed of the existence of any extension, the length of any extension and the end period for the extension.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Exercise of right to buy: date of entry and payment of price

100. Section 42 of the Bill amends section 56 of the 2003 Act which sets out the time limits which apply to a community body in respect of payment of the price for the land.

101. Subsection (3) of section 56 of the 2003 Act provides that where the valuation figure is not being appealed under section 62 of the 2003 Act and where the time limit has not been extended by agreement, the price must be paid within 6 months of the date on which the community body confirmed its intention to proceed with the community right to buy in response to a notice under section 49(2)(a) of the 2003 Act or, in the case of a late application, within 6 months of the date of Ministers decision to register that interest in land. Section 42(a) of the Bill extends this time period from 6 months to 8 months.

102. Section 42(b) of the Bill provides for a new subsection (7) in section 56 of the 2003 Act. Where an extension to the 8-month period provided for in the amended section 56(3)(a) of the 2003 Act is required (such extension being permitted by section 56(3)(c) of the 2003 Act), the extension must be agreed, by both parties (landowner and community body), before the 8-month period ends. The community body must notify Ministers of any extension within 7 days of that agreement being made, including when that agreement was made and what that later extended date is. Evidence of such an agreement will be required by Ministers.

Views on representations under section 60 of the 2003 Act

103. Section 43 of the Bill amends section 60 of the 2003 Act, subsection (1) of which requires the valuer to invite the landowner and the community body to comment on issues that may have an impact on the valuation.

104. Section 43 of the Bill inserts a new subsection (1A) into section 60 of the 2003 Act which imposes an obligation on the valuer to pass on any written representations about the value of the land, whether by the landowner or the community body, to the other party and invite counter-representations from that party. The valuer must consider any views made by both or either party while undertaking the valuation under section 59 of the 2003 Act.

Circumstances where expenses of valuation to be met by owner of the land

105. Section 44 of the Bill inserts a new section 60A into the 2003 Act. The new section 60A provides that, in certain circumstances, Ministers may require the landowner to pay the expenses of Ministers in connection with the valuation.

106. Subsection (1) of the new section 60A sets out the circumstances in which Ministers may exercise their discretion and require the landowner to pay the expenses incurred by Ministers in connection with the valuation.

107. Subsection (2) sets out that Ministers have a discretion to require the landowner to meet the costs associated with the valuation where the circumstances in subsection (1) are met. Where Ministers exercise their discretion, a demand for payment will be sent to the landowner.
108. Subsection (3) allows Ministers to request information from the landowner before deciding whether to exercise their discretion.

109. Subsection (4) provides that the landowner may appeal Ministers’ decision to exercise their discretion to the sheriff within 21 days of the Ministers’ decision. In terms of subsection (5), the sheriff’s decision is final.

110. Subsection (6) provides that, where the landowner has not appealed the Ministers’ decision, the landowner must pay the amount specified within 28 days of receiving the demand. Where the landowner appeals the Ministers’ decision and the appeal is not successful, the landowner must pay the amount within 28 days of the determination of the appeal.

Creditors in standard security with right to sell land: appeals

111. Section 45 of the Bill amends section 61 of the 2003 Act. Section 61 provides a right of appeal to the sheriff for the landowner, the community body and other interested parties in respect of certain decisions by Ministers. In terms of section 48(4) of the 2003 Act, where there is a creditor with a right to sell the land and that creditor gives notice of a proposal to sell the land under section 48(1), the creditor would also have a right of appeal.

112. Section 45(a) of the Bill expands the interested parties to include a “creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land” in all cases (including where the creditor has not given notice of a proposal to sell the land under section 48(1) of the 2003 Act). Section 45(b) and (c) of the Bill amend the remaining sections of section 61 of the 2003 Act to take account of the creditor’s right of appeal. The words “or” to “person” in section 61(3) of the 2003 Act are repealed.

Calculation of time periods in Part 2 of 2003 Act

113. Section 46(1) of the Bill inserts a new section 67A into the 2003 Act which provides that public or local holidays are not to be taken into account when calculating time periods in Part 2 of the 2003 Act.

114. New section 67A(2) of the 2003 Act provides a number of exceptions to the rule provided in new section 67A(1) – statutory periods for the date of entry, the valuation process and any appeals are not to be extended if a public or local holiday falls during the time when these steps are active.

Duty to provide information about community right to buy

115. Section 47 of the Bill inserts a new section 67B into the 2003 Act concerning the monitoring of community right to buy.

116. Inserted section 67B(1) and (2) of the 2003 Act provide that a community body, owner or former owner of land in respect of which an application to register an interest was made may be requested by Ministers to provide information, for the purposes of monitoring or evaluating any impacts that the right to buy land conferred by Part 2 of the 2003 Act has had or may have.
117. Inserted section 67B(3) of the 2003 Act sets out the type of information that may be requested by Ministers. It provides that it is any information which Ministers may reasonably require for the purpose of monitoring or evaluating the impact of the right to buy under Part 2 of the 2003 Act. Where a request has been made by Ministers, the recipient must comply to the extent that they are able to do so (inserted section 67B(4)).

Part 4: Community right to buy land (section 48 – abandoned and neglected land)

Introduction

118. Section 48 of the Bill inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act to give communities a right to buy land that is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected, for the purposes of the sustainable development of that land, where there is no willing seller.

Meaning of land

119. The new section 97B of the 2003 Act provides that land for the purposes of Part 3A of the 2003 Act includes bridges and other structures built on or over land, inland waters, canals, and the foreshore (which is the land between the high and low water marks of ordinary spring tides).

Eligible land

120. The new section 97C of the 2003 Act defines land which is to be classed as eligible for the purposes of Part 3A of the 2003 Act. Subsection (1) provides that eligible land is land which is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected in the opinion of Ministers.

121. Subsection (2) requires Ministers to make regulations setting out what factors they must have regard to when deciding whether land is, in their opinion, wholly or mainly neglected or abandoned.

122. Subsection (3) provides that eligible land does not include certain land. Land which is not eligible includes land on which there is an individual’s home (exceptions may be set out in regulations by Ministers); land pertaining to an individual’s home as may be set out in regulations, eligible croft land (as defined in section 68 of the 2003 Act) or croft land which is occupied or worked by its owner or members of their family; land which is owned by the Crown by virtue of it having vested as bona vacantia (because no owner exists or can be identified) or it having fallen to the Crown as ultimus haeres (because no heir to the previous owner exists or can be identified); and land of such other descriptions that Ministers may set out in regulations.

Part 3A community bodies

123. The new section 97D of the 2003 Act outlines the requirements which must be met by a body so that it is eligible to purchase land under Part 3A of the 2003 Act.

124. Subsection (1) specifies that a Part 3A community body must be a company limited by guarantee. It also lists the requirements which must be included in the company’s articles of association. If a body does not meet the conditions imposed by subsection (1), it will not be a Part 3A community body and so will not be eligible to purchase land under Part 3A of the 2003 Act. However, in terms of subsection (2), Ministers have discretion over the minimum number of members a Part 3A community body must have.

125. Subsection (3) defines a “company limited by guarantee” by reference to section 3(3) of the Companies Act 2006 as being a company having the liability of its members limited to such amount as the members undertake to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of it being wound up.

126. Subsection (4) provides that a Part 3A community body is not defined as such until Ministers give their written consent that they are satisfied that the body’s main purpose is consistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

127. Subsection (5)(a) sets out that the articles of association of the company must define the community to which it relates by reference to a postcode unit (or units) or a type of area which Ministers set out in regulation. A community may also be defined with reference to both of these things. Subsection (5)(b) provides that the community includes people who are resident in that postcode unit or in one of the postcode units or other areas set out by Ministers in regulations. In addition to being resident, members of the community must also be entitled to vote at local government elections in a polling district that encompasses that postcode unit or postcode units or the alternative areas set out by Ministers in regulations.

128. Subsection (7) specifies that the articles of association of a Part 3A community body may provide that its property may, in circumstances outlined in subsection (1)(h), pass to another person only if that person is a charity. Subsection (8) defines a charity for the purposes of this section as a body which is entered in the Scottish Charity Register.

Provisions supplementary to section 97D

129. The new section 97D of the 2003 Act sets out the constraints which apply to a Part 3A community body after it has acquired land under Part 3A of the 2003 Act.

130. Subsection (1) provides that a Part 3A community body cannot change its memorandum or articles of association without prior consent from Ministers in writing, while the land bought under Part 3A of the 2003 Act remains in its ownership.

131. Subsection (2) allows Ministers to acquire the land compulsorily if a Part 3A community body, which has bought land under Part 3A of the 2003 Act, would no longer be entitled to buy the land.

132. Subsection (3) provides that Ministers cannot exercise their powers under subsection (2) to acquire the land compulsorily if the land is no longer considered to be eligible. This means that Ministers will not be able to exercise their powers on the basis that a Part 3A community body has purchased the land and the land is no longer considered by Ministers to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.
133. Subsection (4) provides that where Ministers exercise the power conferred by subsection (2), they may make an order in relation to acquiring the land. Subsection (4) sets out the scope of any such order.

Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

134. The new section 97F of the 2003 Act provides for the creation of a Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land.

135. Subsection (1) requires the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland (“the Keeper”) to set up and maintain a Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land (“the Register”).

136. Subsection (2) specifies information and documents which must be kept in the Register and provides that these must be kept in a form convenient for public inspection.

137. Subsections (3) and (4) allow a Part 3A community body to require that information or documentation which relates to the raising or expenditure of money to allow land to which the application relates to be used should be withheld from public inspection. Such information or documentation will not be entered in the Register. However, in terms of subsection (5), Ministers cannot require a Part 3A community body to provide such information or documentation.

138. Subsection (6) confers powers on Ministers to make regulations to amend the information that is to be made publicly available in the Register, to amend the provision about the Part 3A community body requesting that certain information can be withheld from the Register and amending the type of information that may be withheld.

139. Subsection (7) sets out the duties which are imposed on the Keeper. The Keeper must make the Register available at all reasonable times for inspection free of charge, ensure that members of the public are able to request copies of the entries on payment of a charge as may be set out by Ministers in regulations, and that if anyone requests a true copy of the original document this will be supplied on payment of such a charge.

140. Subsection (9) provides that the Keeper means the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland or such person as Ministers appoint to carry out the Keeper’s functions under Part 3A of the 2003 Act (and under subsection (10) different persons may be appointed in place of the Keeper for different purposes under Part 3A of the 2003 Act).

Right to buy: application for consent

141. The new section 97G of the 2003 Act deals with the process of applying to exercise the right to buy land under Part 3A of the 2003 Act.

142. Subsection (1) provides that the right to buy abandoned or neglected land can only be exercised by a Part 3A community body. Subsection (2) specifies that the right can only be exercised with Ministers’ consent on the written application of the Part 3A community body.
143. Subsection (3) provides that a right to buy land can be exercised on multiple holdings, but separate applications must have been made for each holding of land. A holding of land is defined in subsection (4) as being a plot of land owned by one person or in common or joint ownership. Ministers may consider and make a decision on these applications separately from one another.

144. Subsection (5) specifies that an application must set out who the owner of the land is and any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land or any part of it. Ministers must set out the required form of the application in regulations. The application must also include or be accompanied by information of the kind specified by Ministers in regulations.

145. Subsection (6) lists the matters which the Part 3A community body must include in the application or which must accompany the application. These include why a Part 3A community body’s proposed purchase is in the public interest, how it is compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development, and the reasons why it considers the land to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

146. Subsection (7) specifies that at the same time as the Part 3A community body applies to Ministers, it must send a copy of its application form (including the associated material) to the owner of the land. It also requires the Part 3A community body to send a copy of the application to any known creditor in a standard security over the land with a right to sell and invite them to give notice, within 60 days, to the Part 3A community body and Ministers if the creditor has taken the steps mentioned in subsection (8) to enforce the security. If such notice is given, creditors must provide any views or comments they may have about the application to Ministers in writing within the 60-day period.

147. Subsection (9) provides that upon receiving the application under section 97G, Ministers must invite the owner of the land, any creditor in a standard security and any other person that may have an interest in the application to send back written comments on the application within 60 days of the Ministers’ invitation. Ministers must also take reasonable steps to invite comments from owners of land adjacent to the land to which the application relates. The community body must be sent copies of such invitations.

148. Subsection (10) specifies the additional matters which the invitation must invite the landowner to provide comment on.

149. Subsection (11) provides that Ministers must give public notice of receipt of the application as soon as practicably possible and invite views within 60 days of the publication of the notice. Subsection (12) confers a power on Ministers to make regulations to specify the form of the advertisement giving public notice of the application.

150. Subsection (13) provides that Ministers must pass all views received on to the Part 3A community body for further comment. The community body’s comments must be received within 60 days of Ministers sending the invitation to comment.
151. Subsection (14) provides that when considering whether or not to give consent to the application, Ministers must have regard to all views received with regard to the application.

152. Subsection (15) provides that Ministers must decline to consider an application that does not comply with the requirements of the new section 97G, is incomplete or where Ministers are otherwise bound to reject it. If such is the case, then Ministers are not bound to follow the steps laid out in subsection (9) to (14).

153. Subsection (16) sets constraints on the timing of the Ministers’ decision on an application. It provides that Ministers must not make any decision on the application before the end of the 60-day period within which a community may respond to a landowner’s comments, under subsection (13). Alternatively, if by the date of 60 days after the date on which the Part 3A community body may provide Ministers with a response to an invitation sent under subsection (13), the Lands Tribunal has not notified Ministers of any finding under new section 97X of the 2003 Act, Ministers must not make a decision until the date on which the Lands Tribunal provides Ministers with that finding.

Criteria for consent

154. The new section 97H of the 2003 Act sets out that Ministers must not consent to a Part 3A community right to buy unless they are satisfied about the matters listed in the section.

155. Paragraph (a) requires Ministers to be satisfied that the land a Part 3A community body is proposing to buy is land which is eligible under the new section 97C of the 2003 Act.

156. Paragraph (b) requires Ministers to be satisfied that the exercise of the right to buy by a Part 3A community body is in the public interest and its plans for the land are compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

157. Paragraph (c) requires Ministers to be satisfied that if the owner of the eligible land was to remain the owner, it would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of the land.

158. Paragraph (f) requires Ministers to be satisfied that the owner of the land is not prevented from selling the land or is not under an obligation to sell the land to someone other than the Part 3A community body (other than an obligation which is suspended by the regulations which are to be made by Ministers under the new section 97N(3)).

159. Paragraph (g) requires Ministers to be satisfied that a Part 3A community body meets the requirements in section 97D.

160. Paragraph (h) requires Ministers to be satisfied that a significant number of the members of the community which the Part 3A community body represents have a connection with the land or the land is sufficiently near to land to which those members of the community have a connection.
161. Paragraph (i) requires Ministers to be satisfied that the community which the Part 3A community body represents has approved the proposal to exercise the right to buy under Part 3A. The new section 97J of the 2003 Act provides that the community is taken as having approved the proposal if a ballot is conducted as set out in that section.

162. Paragraph (j) requires Ministers to be satisfied that the Part 3A community body has tried and failed to buy the land, other than by making an application under Part 3A.

Ballot to indicate approval for purposes of section 97H

163. The new section 97J of the 2003 Act sets out the requirements for a ballot to establish that a right to buy application by a Part 3A community body has the support of its community.

164. Subsection (1) provides that a proposal by a Part 3A community body to exercise a community right to buy will be deemed to have been approved by the relevant community, if, firstly, the ballot takes place within the six-month period immediately preceding the date of the right to buy application; secondly, that at least half of the community voted in the ballot or where fewer than half of the members of the community voted, the proportion that voted is sufficient to justify the community body proceeding to purchase the land; and finally, that the majority of the votes cast were in favour of making the application.

165. Subsection (2) provides that the ballot must be conducted as prescribed by Ministers in regulations. Subsection (3) sets out the matters which must be prescribed in those regulations.

166. Subsection (4) specifies that the Part 3A community body must notify Ministers of the result within 21 days of the ballot or, where the application is made before the expiry of that 21-day period, at the same time as the application is submitted. This subsection also sets out what information about the ballot the community body must provide to Ministers.

167. Subsection (5) provides that Ministers may require a Part 3A community body to provide further information about the ballot or any consultation that the community body may have held with the wider community about their application.

168. Subsection (6) provides that the Part 3A community body is responsible for the expense of conducting the ballot.

169. Subsection (7) provides that where a ballot is not conducted in accordance with the regulations made by Ministers, the Part 3A community body’s right to buy will be extinguished.

Right to buy same land exercisable by only one Part 3A community body

170. The new section 97K of the 2003 Act deals with the situation where there is more than one Part 3A community body interested in buying the same land.

171. Subsection (1) provides that only one Part 3A community body may exercise the right to buy that land.
172. Subsection (2) provides where more than one Part 3A community body submits an application seeking to buy the same land, Ministers will decide which application should be allowed to proceed.

173. Subsection (3) provides that Ministers must not take any decision on any of the applications before they have considered all views and responses related to each application.

174. Subsection (4) provides that once Ministers have decided which Part 3A community body’s right to buy application shall be allowed to proceed, the other community body’s right to buy shall be extinguished. It also specifies who must be notified of Ministers’ decision.

Consent conditions

175. The new section 97L of the 2003 Act provides that Ministers may impose conditions to their consent to an application to exercise the Part 3A community right to buy. These conditions may, for example, require that certain actions or steps must be taken by the Part 3A community body.

Notification of Ministers’ decision on application

176. The new section 97M of the 2003 Act sets out how Ministers must notify the relevant parties of their decision to consent to or refuse an application.

177. Subsection (1) provides that Ministers must give notice in writing of their decision to consent to or refuse an application under section 97G to exercise the Part 3A community right to buy, and identifies the persons to whom such notice must be given. The form of the notice is to be set out in regulations.

178. Subsection (2) provides that regulations made by Ministers must require that the notice includes a full description of the land covered by the Ministers’ decision and, where consent is given, any conditions imposed by Ministers.

179. Subsection (3) specifies that the notice must contain information about the consequences of the decision and the rights of appeal against it and state the date on which the consent is given.

Effect of Ministers’ decision on right to buy

180. The new section 97N(1) of the 2003 Act gives Ministers powers to make regulations prohibiting certain persons from transferring or otherwise dealing with the land in respect of which an application under section 97G has been made.

181. Subsection (2) sets out matters that the regulations under subsection (1) may include.

182. Subsection (3) provides that Ministers may make regulations to suspend rights over land in respect of which a Part 3A application has been made. Subsection (4) sets out that these regulations may provide for rights which will not be suspended, as well as rights which will not be suspended in certain circumstances.
183. Subsection (5) provides that nothing in Part 3A of the 2003 Act prejudices the position of creditors seeking to prevent the disposal of heritable property by a debtor by means of inhibition, action of adjudication or any other diligence.

Confirmation of intention to proceed with purchase and withdrawal

184. The new section 97P of the 2003 Act sets out the procedure which follows Ministers consenting to the exercise of a right to buy by a Part 3A community body, depending on whether or not the community body wishes to proceed with the purchase.

185. Subsection (1) provides that a Part 3A community body may exercise its right to buy only if, within 21 days of the valuer notifying Ministers, the Part 3A community body and the owner of the assessed value of the land under 97S(10), the Part 3A community body sends written notice to Ministers and the owner confirming its intention to proceed to buy the land.

186. Subsection (2) provides that, by notice in writing to Ministers, the Part 3A community body may withdraw its right to buy application or its confirmation of its intention to proceed with the purchase at any time.

187. Subsection (3) specifies the action to be taken by Ministers on receipt of such notices.

Completion of purchase

188. The new section 97Q of the 2003 Act deals with conveyancing practicalities relevant to the transfer of land following Ministers giving consent to a Part 3A community right to buy application.

189. Subsection (1) provides that the Part 3A community body will be responsible for preparing the documents necessary to effect the conveyance of the land and for ensuring that the subjects to be conveyed are the same as those specified in the consent given by Ministers. It places an obligation on the Part 3A community body to ensure that in preparing the documents it takes account of all conditions imposed by Ministers.

190. Subsection (2) provides that where the Part 3A community body cannot comply with its duty regarding the property to be conveyed, due to the fact that all or part of the land covered by the consent to the Part 3A community right to buy is not owned by the person named as owner in the application, then it must refer this matter to Ministers.

191. Subsection (3) provides that where such a reference is made to Ministers under subsection (2) then Ministers must direct that the right to buy is extinguished.

192. Subsection (4) requires the owner of the land subject to the Part 3A right to buy to make title deeds and other documents available to and transfer title to the Part 3A community body.

193. Subsection (5) provides that if, within 6 weeks of Ministers consenting to the application to buy the land, the owner refuses or fails to make these deeds available, or if they cannot be found, the Part 3A community body can apply to the Lands Tribunal for an order requiring the production of those documents.

194. Subsection (6) provides that the Part 3A community body may apply to the Lands Tribunal to authorise its clerk to effect the transfer of title where the owner refuses, or for other reasons fails, to do so. Where the clerk to the Tribunal does so the effect will be the same as if it were done by the owner.

Completion of transfer

195. The new section 97R of the 2003 Act sets out the process for completing the transfer.

196. Subsection (1) provides that the consideration payable for the land in respect of which the Part 3A community right to buy is exercised shall be the value of that land as assessed under section 97S by the valuer appointed by Ministers.

197. Subsection (2) provides that, subject to subsections (3) and (4), the consideration should be paid not later than 6 months after the date on which Ministers consented to the right to buy application.

198. Subsection (3) specifies circumstances where either this payment deadline will not apply or where an alternative deadline will apply. In particular, it allows the landowner and the Part 3A community body to agree an alternative payment date and provides for deferral of payment when the valuation has not been completed or has been subject to an appeal.

199. Subsection (4) specifies that where the owner is unable to grant a good and marketable title to the Part 3A community body by the date of payment, then payment shall be made to and held by the Lands Tribunal pending either completion of the conveyance or notification to the Lands Tribunal by the Part 3A community body that it has decided not to complete the transaction.

200. Subsection (5) specifies that if the consideration is not paid by the Part 3A community body by the due date, the right to buy application will be deemed to have been withdrawn by the Part 3A community body (this subsection does not apply where subsection (4) applies).

201. Subsection (6) provides that when the Part 3A community body records or registers its title, the land acquired is disburdened of any heritable security.

202. Subsection (7) provides that a security that related to the land acquired through the Part 3A community right to buy and to other land continues to apply to that other land.

203. Subsection (8) provides that where land is disburdened of a heritable security on purchase, unless the creditors otherwise agree, the Part 3A community body must pay the creditors under that heritable security whatever sums are due to them.
204. Subsection (9) provides that the Part 3A community body must deduct any sums paid to a heritable creditor under the provisions of subsection (8) from the amount that the body is due to pay the owner for the land. In effect, the landowner will receive a sum for the land which will take account of the sum required to clear any securities.

Assessment of value of land etc.

205. The new section 97S of the 2003 Act sets out the procedure for valuation of the land in respect of which a Part 3A community body is exercising its right to buy.

206. Subsection (1) requires that Ministers, where they have consented to a Part 3A community right to buy application, must appoint a valuer to assess the value of that land within 7 days of that consent.

207. Subsection (2) provides that the validity of anything done under the new section 97S will not be affected by Ministers’ failure to comply with the time limit specified in subsection (1).

208. Subsection (3) sets out the role of the valuer.

209. Subsection (4) specifies that the value to be ascertained is the market value at the date Ministers consented to the application to exercise the right to buy.

210. Subsection (5) defines market value as the sum of the open market value if the sale were between a willing seller and willing buyer, compensation for any depreciation in the value of other land and interests belonging to the seller as a result of the forced sale, and compensation for any disturbance to the seller resulting from the forced sale.

211. Subsection (6) specifies that in arriving at the open market value for the purposes of subsection (5)(a), account may be taken of the known existence of a potential purchaser with a special interest in the property (other than the Part 3A community body). It also specifies that no account shall be taken of the fact that no time was allowed for marketing the property or of the depreciation of other land or disturbance (since compensation for these latter two items will be added to the open market value by virtue of subsection (5)(b) and (c)).

212. Subsection (7) states that Ministers shall pay for the valuation under this section.

213. Subsection (8) requires the valuer to ask both the owner and the Part 3A community body for their views in writing on the value of the land and to take these representations into account in arriving at the valuation.

214. Subsection (9) specifies that where the Part 3A community body and the owner have agreed the valuation, they must notify the valuer in writing of that valuation.

215. Subsections (10) and (11) require the appointed valuer to notify Ministers, the landowner and the Part 3A community body of the valuation. This must be done within 8 weeks of being appointed or within a longer period set by Ministers, as requested by the valuer.
216. Subsection (12) sets out that the validity of the transfer is not affected by a failure by the valuer to comply with the time limit.

Compensation

217. The new section 97T of the 2003 Act provides for payment of compensation in connection with an application to exercise the Part 3A community right to buy. It provides that the compensation will be payable by the Part 3A community body except where Ministers have refused the application, in which case the compensation due to the owner of the land will be paid by Ministers.

218. Subsection (1) specifies the circumstances in which eligibility for compensation will arise.

219. Subsection (2) provides that the Part 3A community body will not be liable to pay compensation when a Part 3A community right to buy application is made but is not approved by Ministers.

220. Subsection (3) specifies that, in the circumstances covered by subsection (2), compensation for certain losses and expenses can be recovered from Ministers.

221. Subsection (4) provides that Ministers may make an order specifying the amounts payable in respect of loss or expense, who is liable to pay those amounts, and how any compensation is to be claimed under the new section 97T.

222. Subsection (5) provides that if the parties cannot agree whether compensation is payable or the amount of such compensation within the timescale specified in the order, then either party may refer the matter to the Lands Tribunal.

Grants towards Part 3A community bodies’ liabilities to pay compensation

223. The new section 97U provides that Ministers may, in certain limited circumstances, pay a grant to a Part 3A community body to assist it in meeting the compensation it has to pay in connection with its exercise of a right to buy.

224. Subsection (2) specifies the circumstances in which payment of such a grant would be permitted and subsection (3) makes it clear that Ministers are not bound to pay a grant even when all the circumstances specified arise.

225. Subsection (4) provides that payment of a grant may be subject to conditions including conditions relating to repayment in the event of a breach.

226. Subsection (5) provides that a grant may be paid only if the Part 3A community body applies for it, and subsection (6) provides that the form of the application and the application procedure shall be as Ministers specify in regulations.
227. Subsection (7) provides that Ministers must issue their decision on an application for a grant in writing and, where that decision is to refuse to pay a grant, include the reasons for that refusal. Subsection (8) provides that Ministers’ decision on whether to pay a grant or not is final.

Appeals

229. Subsections (1), (4) and (5) provide that the landowner, a person who is a member of the community to which a Part 3A community body relates and a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land to which an application relates may appeal against the Ministers’ decision to consent to the application, while subsection (2) allows the Part 3A community body to appeal against a decision to refuse an application. Where there is more than one Part 3A community body wishing to purchase the land, subsection (3) provides that Ministers’ decision on which community body’s application will proceed is final and cannot be appealed to the sheriff.

230. Subsection (6) specifies the timeframe within which an appeal may be made.

231. Subsection (7) specifies that the sheriff court with the jurisdiction to hear an appeal is the sheriff court where the land subject to an appeal is located.

232. Subsection (8) specifies who each appellant must inform when an appeal is made.

233. Subsection (9) provides that the sheriff’s decision is final and may require rectification of the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land and may impose conditions on the appellant.

Appeals to Lands Tribunal: valuation

234. The new section 97W of the 2003 Act sets out the rights of appeal to the Lands Tribunal in connection with the valuation which is carried out under the new section 97S.

235. Subsection (1) provides that the owner of the land and the Part 3A community body exercising its right to buy may appeal the valuation to the Lands Tribunal.

236. Subsection (2) requires such an appeal to state the grounds of the appeal and that it be lodged within 21 days of valuation being notified under section 97S(10).

237. Subsection (3) provides that the Lands Tribunal may reassess the valuation of the land.

238. Subsection (4) provides that the valuer may be a witness in the appeal proceedings.

239. Subsection (5) requires the Lands Tribunal to give reasons for its decision on an appeal.
240. Subsection (6) provides that Ministers are not competent parties to any appeal by reason only that they appointed the valuer.

241. Subsection (7) provides that Ministers’ powers under the Lands Tribunal Act 1949 to make rules are extended so that Ministers can make any rules necessary or expedient in connection with Part 3A.

Reference to Lands Tribunal of questions on applications

242. The new section 97X sets out rights of appeal to the Lands Tribunal on a question relating to the Part 3A application.

243. Subsection (1) provides that at any time before Ministers make a decision on an application, any question relating to the application may be referred to the Lands Tribunal by Ministers, the landowner, a person who is a member of the community to which the Part 3A community body relates, any person with an interest in the land giving rise to a legally enforceable right (e.g. a creditor in a standard security with the right to sell land) or any other such person invited to send views on a Part 3A application (under section 97G(9)(a)(iii)).

244. Subsection (2) provides that the Lands Tribunal may consider the views of the Part 3A community body, the owner of the land subject to the Part 3A application and any other person that the Lands Tribunal determines have an interest in the case.

245. Subsection (3) provides that the Lands Tribunal must inform Ministers of its findings on any of the questions referred to it and may, by order, provide for Ministers to consent to an application under the new section 97L only if they impose certain conditions, as directed by the Lands Tribunal.

246. Subsection (4) provides that if the Lands Tribunal finds that the question on the application is not relevant to the Ministers’ decision, the Lands Tribunal may decide not to consider the question further and find accordingly.

Agreement as to matters referred or appealed

247. The new section 97Y of the 2003 Act provides that parties to the Part 3A application are not prevented from settling or agreeing on the matter which is subject to an appeal under sections 97V or 97W between them.

Interpretation of Part 3A

248. The new section 97Z sets out some matters of interpretation.

249. Subsection (1) provides that any reference to a creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land is a reference to a creditor who has such rights under section 20(2) or 23(2) of the Conveyancing and Feudal Reform (Scotland) Act 1970, or a warrant granted under section 24(1) of that Act.
250. Subsections (2) and (3) provide that public or local holidays should not be taken into account when calculating time periods in Part 3A, except for the 6 month period of completion for the right to buy, the 28-day period for a right of appeal to the sheriff and the 21-day period for a right of appeal to the Lands Tribunal on the valuation.

Part 5: Asset transfer requests

251. This Part sets out how a “community transfer body” can request to buy, lease, manage, occupy or use land or buildings belonging to a “relevant authority”, how the authority is to decide whether to agree to or refuse the request, and the procedures to be followed if the request is agreed.

252. Throughout this Bill (except where it amends other legislation) “land” has the meaning set out in the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, which is that ““land” includes buildings and other structures, land covered with water, and any right or interest in or over land”.

Community transfer body

253. Section 50 defines a “community transfer body”. This is either a community-controlled body, as defined in section 14, or a body designated as a community transfer body by the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Ministers may designate individual bodies to be community transfer bodies or may designate a whole class of bodies, so that any body of that type will qualify as a community transfer body. Subsection (3) states that where a trust is designated, the designated body will be the trustees, since a trust is not incorporated.

Relevant authority

254. A “relevant authority” is defined by section 51. This may be a person (or organisation) listed in schedule 3, or one designated as a relevant authority by the Scottish Ministers. Schedule 3 includes local authorities, the Scottish Ministers, Health Boards, and certain other Scottish public bodies, which have been selected because they own significant amounts of land and buildings.

255. The remainder of section 51 gives the Scottish Ministers a power to remove or amend any entry on the list, or to make an order designating other bodies or classes of bodies as public service authorities. Subsection (4) provides that persons may only be designated if they fall into the following categories:

- part of the Scottish Administration, which has the meaning given in section 126(6) to (8) of the Scotland Act 1998;
- “Scottish public authorities with mixed functions or no reserved functions under the Scotland Act 1998” – this means that UK Government Departments and public bodies that deal with matters reserved to the UK Government cannot be included;
- companies wholly-owned by relevant authorities.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Asset transfer requests

256. Section 52 sets out how an asset transfer request can be made. It must relate to land (which includes buildings) owned or leased by a relevant authority. The community transfer body may ask to have ownership of the land transferred to it, if the land is owned by the relevant authority; it may ask to lease the land from the relevant authority; or to obtain other rights in respect of the land, for example to manage or use it for a specified purpose.

257. Subsection (4) sets out the information which must be included in the request. In addition to specifying the land (or building) to which the request relates, and whether the request is for ownership, lease or other rights, the community transfer body must describe the reasons for making the request and the benefits which it considers will arise if the request is agreed to. It must also state how much the body would be prepared to pay, either to buy the land or in rent, and any other terms and conditions that would apply to the request.

258. Section 52(3) provides that a request for transfer of ownership of land may only be made by a community transfer body which meets the criteria set out in section 53, in addition to being covered by section 50. This means it must be a company, or a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation (SCIO), or a body designated as a community transfer body under section 50, where the designation states that the body may make a request for transfer of ownership. Classes of bodies may also be designated as eligible to make a request for transfer of ownership.

259. If a company is to meet the criteria to request transfer of ownership, section 53(2) requires that it must have at least 20 members, and provision in its articles of association to ensure that, on winding up, any remaining property remains within either the community sector or the charitable sector. If the company has registered an interest in or has acquired land under the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, its winding up provisions will need to satisfy the requirements of that Act. Subsection (2)(b)(iii), (iv) and (v) replicate those requirements, so that a company can be both a community transfer body and a community body under Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 or a crofting community body under Part 3 of that Act. If the company is registered as a Scottish charity, the requirements for registration mean that any surplus property must be applied for charitable purposes, as in subsection (2)(b)(ii), so a charitable company can also be a community transfer body. If the company does not need to meet either of those requirements, it may choose to use any of the options in paragraph (b).

260. In order to be registered as a SCIO, a body is required to have appropriate provision in its constitution for surplus property to be distributed for charitable purposes. Therefore, the only additional requirement for a SCIO to be able to make an asset transfer request for ownership of land is that it has at least 20 members, which is provided for in section 53(1)(b).

Regulations

261. A community transfer body may need more information about the property before determining the purchase price, level of rent or other terms and conditions to be proposed. The Scottish Ministers may make regulations under section 54 about asset transfer requests. These may include, under subsection (3), details of how a community transfer body can request such information and how a relevant authority is to respond. Regulations under subsection (2) may also specify how asset transfer requests are to be made, additional information to be included in them, and the procedure to be followed by a relevant authority in relation to requests. They may also include requirements to publish the fact that a request is being made, and to notify specified people about them.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Decisions

262. A relevant authority must decide whether to agree to or refuse an asset transfer request in accordance with section 55. It must compare the benefits that might arise if the request is agreed to with those that might arise from any other proposal for the land, whether made through another asset transfer request, by the authority, or by any other person (subsection (3)(e) and (6)). In doing so it must consider whether the proposals will promote or improve economic development, regeneration, public health, social wellbeing or environmental wellbeing and any other benefits, and the decision must be reached in a manner which encourages equal opportunities and the observance of the equal opportunity requirements. The relevant authority must also consider other matters it considers relevant, including the functions and purposes of the authority, and any obligations that may affect its ability to agree to the request. Subsection (5) requires that the authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it.

263. Subsection (7) requires the relevant authority to give notice to the community transfer body of its decision, and the reasons for that decision, within a specified period, as described in subsection (8). Subsection (9) gives the Scottish Ministers power to make regulations about the information to be included in this decision notice and how it is to be given.

264. Section 56 sets out the procedure to be followed when an asset transfer request is agreed to. The decision notice given by the relevant authority must specify the terms and conditions on which the authority is prepared to carry out the transfer. These terms and conditions may or may not reflect those included in the asset transfer request. The community transfer body must in turn submit an offer, within a period specified in the decision notice, reflecting the terms and conditions set out in the decision notice, and any other terms and conditions needed to make sure the transfer can take place, and that it takes place within a reasonable time. After this the community transfer body and the relevant authority will make arrangements to conclude a contract, as would happen with any sale or lease of property.

265. Subsection (5) provides that if a contract is not concluded within the period set out in subsections (7) to (9), the arrangement ends and is treated as if the asset transfer request had not been agreed. However, this is not treated as a refusal of the request, so no appeal can be made. The period for concluding a contract is normally a minimum of 6 months from the date of the offer. A longer period can be agreed between the relevant authority and the community transfer body. If the relevant authority does not agree to extend the period, the community transfer body may apply to the Scottish Ministers under subsection (8) to direct that the period should be extended. This can be done more than once. Scottish Ministers may make regulations under subsection (10) about these directions and how to apply for them.

266. When a relevant authority has agreed to transfer land in response to an asset transfer request, section 57 prevents the authority from disposing of that land to anyone other than the body that made the request. This applies from the day the decision notice is given to the day when the transfer process ends. The process ends when a contract is concluded (subsection...
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

(4)(a)), or when no offer has been made within the specified period (subsection (3)(a)), or when no contract has been concluded within the specified period (subsection (4)(b)). If the relevant authority enters into a contract with another person, during this period, to sell or lease the land to them, subsection (5) makes that contract unenforceable.

Appeals and reviews

267. Section 58 sets out the circumstances when a community transfer body can appeal in relation to an asset transfer request. This may be because:

- the request has been refused;
- the request has been agreed but the relevant authority has required terms and conditions which are significantly different to those proposed in the request; or
- no decision has been made within the required period.

268. The community transfer body can appeal to the Scottish Ministers, unless the relevant authority is the Scottish Ministers or a local authority. (If the relevant authority is a local authority, section 59 applies instead.) Regulations made under subsection (3) may set out how appeals are to be carried out.

269. The Scottish Ministers may allow the appeal or may dismiss it and may reverse or vary (change) any part of the decision of the relevant authority, including changing any terms and conditions that were imposed. The Scottish Ministers may reverse or vary part of the decision of the relevant authority even if the appeal does not relate to that part. If the Scottish Ministers decide the relevant authority must transfer ownership, lease or confer rights in relation to land, or agree to certain terms and conditions, they must issue a direction requiring the relevant authority to issue a new decision notice in line with the appeal decision. That notice will replace the original decision notice.

270. If a community transfer body has made an asset transfer request to a local authority, instead of an appeal to the Scottish Ministers, the body can ask the local authority to review the case, under section 59. This can be done in the same circumstances as when an appeal can be brought, that is if:

- the request has been refused;
- the request has been agreed but the local authority has required terms and conditions which are significantly different to those proposed in the request; or
- no decision has been made within the required period.

The Scottish Ministers may make regulations prescribing how such reviews are to be carried out, and time limits for reviews to be requested. Regulations may allow local authorities to decide how certain stages of a review are carried out.

271. Subsection (8) means that the local authority must consider the same issues when reviewing a decision as it would in making an initial decision on an asset transfer request, and must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusal. Subsection (5) provides that, having carried out a review, the local authority may confirm or change its decision, including altering any terms and conditions set out in the original decision notice. It must then provide a new decision notice, providing the reasons for the decision made on review. This notice replaces the original decision notice.

272. When an appeal or review results in an asset transfer request being agreed (with or without amended terms or conditions), the process then continues under the provisions of section 56, with the community transfer body making an offer and the two parties proceeding to conclude a contract.

Land leased to a relevant authority

273. Section 60 applies where all the criteria set out in paragraphs (a) to (d) of subsection (1) are met. It deals with the situation where an asset transfer request is made to lease or otherwise occupy land (including a building) which is leased to a relevant authority by another relevant authority, or by a company wholly owned by another relevant authority. Subsections (2) and (3) mean that any conditions in that lease which restrict the relevant authority’s ability to sub-let or share occupancy of the land, or restrict how the land may be used, do not prevent the relevant authority agreeing to lease the land to the community transfer body or to allow the body to occupy the land.

274. This does not apply if any other person is entitled to occupy the land (subsection (1)(d)). Subsections (4) and (5) also provide that it does not affect any restrictions on the power of the relevant authority to assign or transfer rights and liabilities under the lease, and the relevant authority continues to be subject to any obligations under the lease, even if it leases the land to the community transfer body or allows the body to occupy it. For example, the relevant authority would still be responsible to the landlord for any maintenance requirements included in the lease between them.

Repeated requests

275. Section 61 is intended to help relevant authorities deal with repeated, vexatious requests. It means that if a second request relating to the same land or building is made within two years of a previous request, which was refused, the relevant authority may choose not to consider that second request. Subsections (4) and (5) provide that this only applies if the new request seeks the same type of transfer, but it does not matter whether the new request is made by the same body or a different one. For example, if one community transfer body requests to lease a particular building, and is refused, and another body requests to lease the same building within two years, the relevant authority may decline to consider that second request. On the other hand, if the second request was for transfer of ownership instead of a lease, the relevant authority would have to consider it. Declining to consider a request under these circumstances does not count as a refusal of the request and therefore is not eligible for appeal or review.

Part 6: Common good property

276. Common good property is property owned by local authorities for the common good of the inhabitants in their areas which has been passed down, through local government reorganisation, from the former burghs. Those burghs would have received it as a gift or purchased it. It includes land and buildings, moveable items such as furniture and art, and cash funds. It is sometimes difficult to know whether property is part of the common good, and there may be restrictions on how certain items of common good property are allowed to be used and whether the local authority can dispose of them. In some cases this has to be decided by the courts.

277. This Part of the Bill increases transparency about common good assets and community involvement in decisions taken about their identification, use and disposal. It does not define or redefine common good or remove or alter any restrictions on the use or disposal of common good property.

Common good registers

278. Section 63 requires each local authority to establish and maintain a register of its common good property. Before establishing this register it must publish a list of what it proposes to include, and notify any community councils and other community bodies in its area. In this Part, “community bodies” are defined as any group set up to promote or improve the interests of any communities which exist in the area. Community councils and community bodies must be invited to comment on the proposed register, and the local authority must take account of any comments made by those bodies or anyone else. This gives everyone the opportunity to say whether they think the local authority has missed any common good property from the list, or included anything which is not part of the common good.

279. Subsection (8) requires the local authority to make its completed common good register available for the public to inspect in person, and to make it available on a website or by other electronic means.

280. Section 64 requires local authorities to have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about common good registers. Before issuing any guidance, the Scottish Ministers must consult local authorities, community councils, and appropriate community bodies.

Disposal and use of common good property

281. Section 65 ensures that communities are consulted before a local authority disposes of any common good property or changes its use. As with establishing the common good register, the local authority must publish its proposals, notify community councils and community bodies, and take account of any comments made by them or anyone else. In this case the local authority only needs to consult community bodies which it knows have an interest in that particular property. Common good property is usually of most interest to people in the immediate neighbourhood, and it would not be appropriate to consult community bodies from other parts of the local authority area.

282. Section 66 requires local authorities to have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about disposal or change of use of common good property and about the management and use of common good property.
Part 7: Allotments

Meaning of “allotment”

283. Earlier legislation on allotments does not provide a clear definition of “allotment”. Section 68 of the Bill defines “allotment” for the purpose of this Part. Paragraph (a) provides that an allotment is land that is either owned or leased by a local authority. Privately leased or owned allotments are not covered by the Bill. Additional requirements for land being an allotment under Part 7 of the Bill are that the land is leased, or intended to be leased, by a person resident in the local authority area and that the land is used wholly or mainly for the non-commercial cultivation of vegetables, fruit, herbs or flowers.

284. Land may also only be an allotment if it is of such size as may be set out by the Scottish Ministers in regulations under paragraph (d).

Meaning of “allotment site”

285. No specific definition of “allotment site” has been included in earlier allotment legislation. Section 69 defines “allotment site” for the purpose of Part 7 as an area of land consisting wholly or partly of “allotments”, as defined in section 68. An “allotment site” also includes other local authority land that allotment tenants use in connection with their allotments, such as communal buildings, and environmental areas.

Request to lease allotment

286. Section 70 provides for requests to lease allotments from a local authority. Subsection (1) provides that any resident in a local authority area may request to lease an allotment from that local authority.

287. Subsection (2) provides that this request must be in writing and include the name and address of the applicant. Regulations may also set out further information that must be included in the request.

288. Subsection (3) makes provision for requests for allotments by disabled persons and allows details of any additional requirements regarding access to and adaptation of the allotment to be provided in the request. For example a need for adaptations such as raised beds and wider paths should be specified.

289. Subsection (4) provides that a request for an allotment may be made even if the local authority does not currently provide allotments in their area. A joint request for an allotment may also be made by two or more persons, so long as the applicants are all resident in the relevant local authority area (subsection (5)).

290. Once a request is received, the local authority is under a duty to acknowledge the request in writing within 28 days (subsection (6)).
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Duty to maintain list

291. Section 71 imposes an obligation on local authorities to establish and maintain a waiting list of residents who have requested an allotment.

292. Subsection (2) clarifies that there is no set format for such lists and local authorities may manage them as they see fit. They may, for example, wish to split the list into applicants’ preferred geographical areas. Subsection (3) provides that a person’s details must be removed from the list when they are offered an allotment or withdraw their request.

Duty to provide allotments

293. Section 72 imposes a duty on local authorities to take reasonable steps to provide sufficient allotments to keep the list referred to in section 71 at no more than half the authority’s current number of allotments.

294. Where a local authority does not on the date that section 72 comes into force own or lease allotments, subsection (2) sets out that this duty is triggered when there are 15 people on the local authority waiting list maintained under section 71(1). However, where a local authority already owns or leases allotments, subsection (3) sets out that the duty arises after only one person is on the waiting list.

295. The Scottish Ministers may by order amend the number of people on the waiting list that triggers the requirement on the local authority to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments, or the proportion of current allotments below which the waiting list is to be kept (subsections (4) and (5)).

Allotment site regulations

296. An obligation is placed on each local authority under section 73(1) to make allotment site regulations for their area within two years of this section coming into force.

297. The matters set out in subsection (3) must be included in the regulations.

298. In addition to the mandatory requirements under subsection (3), subsection (4) sets out other matters local authorities may include in the regulations.

299. Local authorities are permitted to vary the regulations for different areas or different types of allotment sites in order to take account of local circumstances (subsection (5)).

Allotment site regulations: further provision

300. Section 74 sets out the process that local authorities must undertake to make allotment site regulations, or to vary or revoke them. Subsection (2) provides that local authorities must at least one month before making regulations advertise their intention to do so, the purpose of the regulations, where they may be inspected and details about making representations. They must also make copies of the proposed regulations available. A person who objects to the regulations may make representations to the local authority and must be allowed an opportunity to be heard and his or her representations taken account of before the local authority makes its final decision (subsections (3) and (4)). Where regulations contravene the local authority’s lease of the site, the provision in the lease is to prevail (subsection (11)).
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Disposal etc. of allotments and allotment sites owned by local authority

301. Section 75 applies where an allotment site is owned by a local authority.

302. If a local authority wishes to change the use of or dispose of an allotment site it owns, it requires to obtain the consent of the Scottish Ministers before doing so (subsection (2)). The Scottish Ministers may consent subject to conditions (subsection (3)), and in particular may only grant consent if they are satisfied that each of the allotment tenants from the site has been offered an alternative allotment within a reasonable distance, or that the provision of an alternative allotment is not necessary or reasonably practical in the circumstances (subsection (4)).

Disposal etc. of allotments and allotment sites leased by local authority

303. Section 76 applies where a local authority leases an allotment site and sub-leases either the site (e.g. to an allotment association), or allotments within the site, to tenants.

304. Subsection (2) sets out that the local authority may not renounce (terminate voluntarily) the lease of an allotment site without the consent of the Scottish Ministers. In addition, even where a change of use is permitted by the head lease, the local authority may not change the use of the allotment site unless the Scottish Ministers consent (subsection (3)).

305. As with section 75 above, the consent of the Scottish Ministers may be subject to conditions (subsection (4)), and the Scottish Ministers may not grant consent unless they are satisfied that the allotment tenants have been offered a suitable alternative allotment within a reasonable distance of the allotment site which is closing, or that the provision of an alternative is not necessary or reasonably practical in the circumstances (subsection (5)).

Duty to prepare food-growing strategy

306. Section 77 places a duty on every local authority to prepare a food-growing strategy which must be published within two years of this section coming into force. Subsection (3) provides that the food-growing strategy must identify land in the local authority area which could be used by a community to grow vegetables, fruit, herbs or flowers, as well as land that could be used for allotments, and must describe how the authority intends to increase the provision of allotments or other land for community growing, should there be an identified need. The Scottish Ministers may also prescribe other information to be included in a food growing strategy.

307. Once complete, the local authority must publish the food growing strategy on a website or by other electronic means (subsection (4)).
Duty to review food-growing strategy

308. Each local authority is under a duty to review its food-growing strategy, under section 78. This must be done 5 years after the date of initial publication and every 5 years thereafter (subsection (1)). Where the local authority makes changes to its food growing strategy following a review, the revised strategy must be published on a website or by other electronic means (subsection (2)).

Annual allotments report

309. Under section 79, every local authority is under a duty to prepare and publish an annual allotments report. This requires to be done as soon as is reasonably practicable after the end of each reporting year (as defined in subsection (4)). Publication must be on a website or by other electronic means (subsection (3)).

310. Subsection (2) sets out the matters which require to be detailed in the annual allotments report and allows other information to be required in the report by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Power to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites

311. The regulations regarding allotment sites to be made under section 73 must include provision for buildings and structures that are permitted on allotments, including modifications that may be made and the materials that may or may not be used in connection with such structures. The regulations may also include provision for buildings or structures that are permitted on land mentioned in paragraph (b) of the definition of “allotment site”, being communal areas within the site, including permitted modifications and materials. If a building or structure is not permitted under regulations made under section 73(1), and at the time it was erected or modified, that erection or modification was prohibited by such regulations, section 80 gives a local authority the power to remove the building or other structure.

312. Subsection (2) provides that a local authority may:
   - remove the building or other structure from the site;
   - dispose of the materials that formed the building or other structure; and
   - recover the cost of the removal and/or disposal of the materials from a “liable tenant”, being the tenant from whose allotment it is removed or, if on a part of the site that is not an allotment, from the tenant or tenants responsible for its erection (subsection (3)).

313. In cases where more than one tenant has consented to the erection of an unauthorised building or structure, each such tenant shall be jointly and severally liable for the recoverable costs (subsection (4)).

314. Prior to exercising this power to remove unauthorised buildings, a local authority must follow the procedure set down in subsection (5). Firstly, notice must be given to every tenant who may be affected by the removal of the building or structure. Secondly, the tenant(s) must be given the opportunity to make representations about the proposed action and there is a duty placed on the local authority to give appropriate consideration to these representations. Once a decision is reached, the local authority must notify this decision to the affected tenant(s) in writing, specifying the date on which the action is to take place, if applicable. Upon receipt of a notice under subsection (5)(d) a tenant has 21 days to appeal to a sheriff against the decision of the local authority.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

315. A limitation placed on this power is that where a local authority leases an allotment site, it cannot remove buildings or other structures if this removal is in breach of a provision of the lease (subsection (8)).

316. Subsection (7) allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations regarding the procedure to be followed in relation to the exercise of the power to remove buildings or structures, dispose of the materials and recover the costs of removal and disposal.

Delegation of management of allotment sites

317. Part 7 of the Bill imposes certain management functions on local authorities in relation to allotment sites. Section 81 allows a local authority to delegate certain functions to a person who represents the interests of the tenants of each of the allotments on a particular site. Usually, this “person” will be an allotment association.

318. Only the functions set out in subsection (2) may be delegated by the local authority.

319. In order for functions to be delegated, a written application must be made by the person wishing to take over the functions of the local authority. The application must include the name and address of the applicant, in addition to such information as the Scottish Ministers set out in regulations (subsection (3)).

320. Upon receipt of an application the local authority has 14 days in which to request from the applicant such further information as it requires in order to make a decision as to whether to agree or refuse the request. The applicant must provide this information within 14 days of it being requested (subsection (4)).

321. There are time limits by which the local authority must make and notify a decision on an application and these are set out in subsection (5). Where no further information has been requested from the applicant, the decision must be notified to the applicant within 28 days of receipt of the application. Where further information has been requested, this time limit is increased to 56 days.

322. If the request is refused, the local authority must send the applicant a decision notice which sets out the reasons for the refusal of the application (subsection (6)).

323. If the request is agreed, the local authority must decide which of its functions it is delegating to the applicant and when the delegation will be reviewed. Prior to the decision on which functions to delegate, the local authority is under an obligation to consult with the person who has made the request (subsection (8)).

324. In cases where the local authority considers that the person to whom they have delegated functions is not carrying out these functions satisfactorily, or where there is a disagreement between this person and the local authority, the local authority has the power to recall any of the functions it has delegated under this section (subsection (9)).

325. It is also set out in subsection (10) that where the local authority is leasing an allotment site from another person, any delegation of its functions must not contravene the head-lease.

Promotion and use of allotments: expenditure

326. Section 82 permits a local authority to incur expenditure for the purpose of promoting allotments in its area and providing training by or on behalf of the local authority to tenants and potential tenants about the use of allotments.

Termination of lease of allotment or allotment site

327. Section 83 confers a power on a local authority to terminate the lease of whole or part of an allotment or allotment site.

328. Where a tenant has been complying with allotment site regulations made under section 73, the minimum notice of termination the local authority is required to give is one year (subsection (2)). This applies where the Scottish Ministers have consented to disposal of the site, change of its use, or renunciation of the lease of the site under section 75 or 76. Where there has been a breach of allotment site regulations by a tenant, the notice period is reduced to 1 month (subsection (2)).

329. A local authority must write to any tenant to inform them of its intention to give notice to terminate a lease no later than one month in advance of serving such a notice (subsection (5)). The local authority is also required to allow the tenant any opportunity to make representations to the authority in relation to the proposed termination and must take account of such representations. After considering these representations the local authority must write to the tenant to inform them of their intention to no longer proceed or to give notice (subsection (5)(d)). A tenant who is aggrieved by a notice may appeal to the sheriff within 21 days of the date of the notice (subsection (6)). A notice served under this section does not take effect until the appeal period has expired or, where there is an appeal, the appeal has been withdrawn or finally determined (subsection (8)).

330. The written notice must specify the termination date of the lease (subsection (1)). If, however, the local authority has given notice under section 85 where its lease of the site has been terminated by its landlord, it does not require to also give notice under this section (subsection (11)).
Resumption of land by local authority

331. If allotment land is required by the local authority for building, mining or other industrial purpose (or for the construction, maintenance or repair of roads or sewers necessary in connection with these purposes), the local authority can, in certain circumstances, resume the whole or part of an allotment or allotment site, under section 84. This power can only be exercised with the consent of the Scottish Ministers and where the tenant has been given notice in accordance with subsection (3). The Scottish Ministers may grant consent subject to such conditions as they think fit (subsection (4)) and may only grant consent if they are satisfied that each of the allotment tenants from the site has been offered an alternative allotment within a reasonable distance, or that the provision of an alternative allotment is not necessary or reasonably practical in the circumstances (subsection (5)).

332. Subsection (3) provides that written notice of the resumption must be given to allotment tenants and this notice must specify the date on which the resumption is to take place. The minimum notice period is 3 months and the notice must therefore be served in accordance with this prescribed time limit.

Notice of termination: sublease

333. Where a local authority leases an allotment site from another person and then sub-leases either the site or particular allotments to tenants, it is possible that the local authority’s landlord may terminate the head-lease to the local authority. Section 85 provides that the effect of this is that the sub-lease(s) granted by the local authority will come to an end on the date that the head-lease between the landlord and the local authority comes to an end.

334. Section 85(2) places an obligation on the local authority to send a copy of the notice of termination of the head-lease to each subtenant and inform them that the effect of the termination of the head-lease will be the termination of the sub-leases.

Notice of termination: sublease by allotment association

335. Where a person, such as an allotment association, leases an allotment site from a local authority and is given notice by the local authority, section 86 provides that that person must give notice to each subtenant informing them that the effect of termination of the head-lease will be termination of the sub-leases.

Sale of surplus produce

336. Section 87 sets out that allotment tenants may sell produce grown on their allotments provided this is not with a view to making a profit (e.g. it may be sold for charity) if the produce falls within a description set out in regulations. Under subsection (1), the Scottish Ministers are given the power to make regulations which describe the produce which may be sold.

337. Before the Scottish Ministers make regulations under subsection (1) they must consult with each local authority and any other interested persons (subsection (2)).
Removal of items from allotment by tenant

338. Section 88 provides that before the expiry or termination of a tenant’s allotment lease a tenant may remove certain items from their allotment. These items are any buildings or other structures erected by or on behalf of the tenant, or any produce, trees or bushes acquired by the tenant or planted by or on behalf of the tenant.

Compensation for disturbance

339. Where an allotment lease is terminated by way of one year’s notice, termination of the head lease of the site by the local authority’s landlord, or resumption, section 89 provides tenants with a right to be compensated for damage caused by the disturbance of the enjoyment of the allotment (subsections (1) and (2)). A formula sets out how the minimum amount of compensation is to be calculated (subsection (3)). Subsections (4) and (5) require the Scottish Ministers to make further provision in regulations about the process involved in determining liability for, and the amount of, compensation. There is a right of appeal to the Sheriff against a local authority’s decision in respect of compensation (subsection (7)).

Compensation for deterioration of allotment

340. Under section 90, where a lease of an allotment from a local authority has ended and the allotment has deteriorated during the tenant’s tenancy due to the tenant’s fault or negligence, the sum required to remedy the deterioration is due in compensation from the tenant to the local authority. Subsections (4) and (5) require the Scottish Ministers to make further provision in regulations about determining liability for, and the amount of, compensation. A tenant has a right of appeal to the sheriff against a decision of a local authority under this (subsection (7)).

Compensation for loss of crops

341. Section 91 provides that where an allotment lease is terminated by way of resumption and the tenant loses crops due to the resumption, the local authority is liable to compensate the tenant for the loss of crops (subsections (1) and (2)). This compensation is only due to the tenant of an allotment; not to a tenant of an allotment site, such as an allotment association. The Scottish Ministers are required to make regulations about determining liability for, and the amount of, compensation (subsection (3) and (4)). A tenant has a right of appeal to the sheriff against a local authority decision under this section (subsection (6)).

Set-off compensation etc.

342. Where a lease is terminated, section 92(1) allows local authorities who are liable to compensate a tenant or subtenant for disturbance or loss of crops to deduct from the sum due any sum due by the tenant in connection with the lease.

343. Subsection (2) provides that where a tenant is liable to pay a sum to the local authority in connection with the lease, the tenant can deduct any sum due to them by the local authority by way of compensation for disturbance or loss of crops.
Part 8: Non-domestic rates

Schemes for reduction and remission of rates

344. The Bill provides for reduction or remission of rates for non-domestic properties (usually referred to as “land and heritages”) in Scotland. It creates a power to allow rating authorities (which are the local authorities) to reduce or remit non-domestic rates (often referred to as business rates) within their areas, in any financial year from 2015-16 onwards. This power will allow any rating authority to create, if it wishes, local relief schemes for any lands and heritages from which it collects rates.

345. The power is created by an amendment to the Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962. Section 94(1) of the Bill inserts section 3A into that Act to provide the power. Section 3A(4) allows reliefs to apply in schemes defined by categories of property, areas, activities, or any other matter. Any relief awarded ceases to apply when there is a change in the occupation of the premises, under subsection (5) of section 3A. Subsection (6) requires the rating authority to have regard to the interests of people who pay council tax set by the authority before creating or amending a relief scheme. This is because any loss of income from non-domestic rates incurred by the scheme must be offset from other income raised by the local authority.

346. Section 94(2) amends Schedule 12 to the Local Government Finance Act 1992 (payments to local authorities) to ensure that the arrangements for pooling of income from non-domestic rates and funding of rating authorities will accommodate and remain unaffected by the power to create relief schemes. Subsections (3) and (4) make consequential amendments to allow these changes to take effect.

Part 9: General

347. Part 9 provides general information which relates to all Parts of the Bill.

348. Section 95 requires the Scottish Ministers to publish any guidance they issue under Part 2 or Part 6 of the Bill. (These are the only Parts that require people to have regard to guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers.)

349. Section 96 regulates how the Scottish Ministers can make orders or regulations under the Bill, including the procedure (“affirmative” or “negative”) by which they are to be scrutinised by the Scottish Parliament.

350. Section 97 gives Ministers powers to make additional provision that is necessary or expedient to make sure the provisions of the Bill work properly. Section 96(2) provides that any order under section 97 which amends the text of an Act must be scrutinised in the Scottish Parliament by the stronger “affirmative” procedure.

351. Section 99 sets out when the provisions of the Bill come into force. Part 9 comes into force the day after the Bill receives Royal Assent. The rest of the Bill will come into force on dates decided by the Scottish Ministers, which will be set out in commencement orders. Different parts of the Bill may be brought into force at different times.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014.

FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government, to satisfy Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament.

OVERVIEW

2. The Bill reflects the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a framework which will:

   • empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and
   • support an increase in the pace and scale of public service reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.

3. In doing so, this Bill aims to support approaches that can contribute to improving outcomes in all aspects of people’s lives. The memorandum summarises the cost implications of the Bill, drawing on consultation responses and information from, and conversations with, a range of organisations including: COSLA, Development Trusts Association Scotland, and Forestry Commission Scotland.

CONTENTS

4. This Financial Memorandum sets out the costs associated with the following parts to the Bill:

   • Part 1 places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which builds on the Government’s internationally acclaimed “Scotland Performs” framework.
   • Part 2 places community planning partnerships (CPPs) on a statutory footing and imposes duties on them around the planning and delivery of local outcomes.
   • Part 3 provides a mechanism for communities to have a more proactive role in having their voices heard in how services are planned and delivered.
   • Part 4 amends Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, extending the community right to buy to all of Scotland, and introduces a new Part 3A to that Act to make provision for community bodies to purchase neglected and abandoned land where the owner is not willing to sell that land.
   • Part 5 provides community bodies a right to request to purchase, lease, manage or use land and buildings belonging to local authorities, Scottish public bodies or the Scottish Ministers.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

- Part 6 places a statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good and requires local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.

- Part 7 updates and simplifies legislation on allotments. It requires local authorities to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if waiting lists exceed certain trigger points and ensures appropriate protection for local authorities and plot holders.

- Part 8 provides for a new power which will allow councils to create and fund their own localised business rate relief schemes to better reflect local needs and support communities.

5. There are likely to be some additional, mainly administrative, costs to the Scottish Government, public bodies, local authorities, community bodies and others as a result of the Bill. As set out below, in relation to the parts of the Bill concerned with participation requests, the community right to buy and asset transfer requests the costs will be driven by the demand to use the provisions at a local level and will often depend on the circumstances of the request or application. Increased demand may lead to increasing costs in these areas, in particular for asset transfer requests where public authorities decide to transfer an asset at below market value this will have a financial consequence for the organisation. In these cases an assessment of the costs and benefits associated with an asset transfer would be made to demonstrate that the transfer represents public value. The Financial Memorandum assumes that the Bill provisions will take effect from the financial year 2015-16 onwards, subject to necessary consultation, guidance, secondary legislation and other practical implementation elements having been carried out. Table 1 provides a summary of the additional costs expected as a result of the Bill provisions being introduced.

Table 1: Summary table of additional costs expected as a result of provisions being introduced

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Financial Memo Paras</th>
<th>Costs on Scottish Administration</th>
<th>Costs on local authorities</th>
<th>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>National outcomes</td>
<td>6 to 9</td>
<td>The Scottish Government expects any costs to be minimal and absorbed within existing budgets.</td>
<td>Nil</td>
<td>Nil</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Community planning</td>
<td>10 to 17</td>
<td>Nil</td>
<td>It is anticipated that the provisions will impose minor additional costs on local authorities due to the local action that is already underway</td>
<td>It is anticipated that the provisions will impose minor additional costs on public bodies involved due to the local action</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Financial Memo Paras</th>
<th>Costs on Scottish Administration</th>
<th>Costs on local authorities</th>
<th>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Participation requests</td>
<td>18 to 24</td>
<td>Demand driven</td>
<td>Demand driven</td>
<td>Nil</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Costs will be contingent on how often community participation bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland.</td>
<td>Costs will be contingent on how often community participation bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland.</td>
<td>that is already underway to strengthen community planning.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Community right to buy: modifications of Part 2 of Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003</td>
<td>25 to 48</td>
<td>Demand driven</td>
<td>Nil</td>
<td>Demand driven</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>It is anticipated that the provisions are likely to impose additional administrative costs on the Scottish Government.</td>
<td>Demand driven Costs will be contingent on decisions made by individual community bodies and landowners.</td>
<td>Costs will be contingent on decisions made by individual community bodies and landowners.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Costs in 2012-13 for maintenance</td>
<td>Communities – legal entities: We do not anticipate there to be any significant additional costs in setting up a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation.</td>
<td>Costs in 2012-13 for maintenance</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Landowners withdrawing land from sale: landowners may be asked to pay back Ministers for the costs of the independent valuation if they</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Topic</td>
<td>Financial Memo Paras</td>
<td>Costs on Scottish Administration</td>
<td>Costs on local authorities</td>
<td>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------</td>
<td>----------------------</td>
<td>--------------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------</td>
<td>-------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>and upkeep of Register of Community Interests in Land were £7,410. Additional costs likely to arise with extension of community right to buy to urban Scotland. Community – legal entities: £10,000 to develop a model for Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations. Valuation of land: Average cost is £2,382 so between 5 and 10 valuations per year would lead to an average cost of between £11,910 and £23,820. Monitoring: limited additional costs in collecting, assessing and presenting the results of monitoring exercises. Late applications: Potential for increased requests for compensation from landowners.</td>
<td></td>
<td>with draw the land from sale, average cost for valuation is £2,382. “Exempt” transfer of land: Landowners may incur legal representation costs if they chose to engage a solicitor. Appeals: The provisions allow for a number of appeals. In some circumstances costs may have to be borne by a landowner or community body. Costs will vary from case to case.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Financial Memo

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Financial Memo Paras</th>
<th>Costs on Scottish Administration</th>
<th>Costs on local authorities</th>
<th>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Assuming 5 to 10 ballots per year the average yearly cost could vary between £5,200 and £53,530 based on the model used and the size of the community being balloted.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Appeals: The provisions allow for a number of appeals. In some circumstances costs may have to be borne by the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Government’s legal costs for 2012-13 were £21,225 and will vary from year to year and case to case.

Summary

Annual costs:

Valuations and ballots:
£17,110 to £77,350.

Other administrative and legal costs will be dependent on any increase in demand.

One off costs:
£10,000 to develop
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Financial Memo Paras</th>
<th>Costs on Scottish Administration</th>
<th>Costs on local authorities</th>
<th>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Community right to buy: neglected and abandoned land</td>
<td>49 to 69</td>
<td>Demand driven It is anticipated that the provisions will impose additional administrative costs on the Scottish Government dependent on the level of demand. Community – legal entities: £10,000 to develop a model for the right to buy neglected and abandoned land. Valuation of land: Average cost is £2,382 so between 5 and 10 valuations per year would lead to an average cost of between £11,910 and £23,820. The right for a landowner to make counter-representations may increase the costs associated with valuation. Compensation costs: There is provision for those who have incurred a loss or expense under the</td>
<td>Nil</td>
<td>Demand driven Costs will be contingent on decisions made by individual community bodies and landowners. Communities – legal entities: We anticipate there to be minimal additional costs in setting up a company limited by guarantee. Balloting: The average cost of each ballot for a community body would be between £1,040 and £5,353 Compensation costs: There is provision for those who has incurred a loss or expense under the provisions to be entitled to compensation. It is expected that costs will vary from case to case. Appeals: The</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Topic</td>
<td>Financial Memo Paras</td>
<td>Costs on Scottish Administration</td>
<td>Costs on local authorities</td>
<td>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------------------------------</td>
<td>----------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------</td>
<td>--------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>provisions to be entitled to compensation. It is expected that costs will vary from case to case.</td>
<td></td>
<td>provisions allow for appeals at different stages. In some circumstances costs may have to be borne by a landowner, community body or third party. Costs will vary from case to case.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Register of applications: set up costs of £10,000 and on-going maintenance and update costs of £10,000.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appeals: The provisions allow for a number of appeals. In some circumstances costs may have to be borne by the Scottish Ministers. Costs will vary from case to case.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Summary</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Annual costs:</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Valuation of land: average cost of between £11,910 and £23,820.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Register of applications: on-going maintenance and update costs of £10,000.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Set-up costs:</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Community – legal</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Financial Memo Paras</th>
<th>Costs on Scottish Administration</th>
<th>Costs on local authorities</th>
<th>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>entities: £10,000 to develop a model for the right to buy neglected and abandoned land. Register of applications: set up costs of £10,000</td>
<td>Demand driven Additional costs will be contingent on how often community bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland. Scottish Government may decide to transfer assets at less than market value, which will have a financial consequence depending on the value of the asset. Asset transfers, including those undertaken at less than market value, will be done on the basis of a full assessment of the costs and benefits, including predicted savings in the delivery of services and improved local outcomes to demonstrate that a</td>
<td>Demand driven Additional costs will be contingent on how often community bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland. Local authorities may decide to transfer assets at less than market value, which will have a financial consequence depending on the value of the asset. Asset transfers, including those undertaken at less than market value, will be done on the basis of a full assessment of the costs and benefits, including predicted savings in the delivery of services and improved local outcomes to demonstrate that a</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Financial Memo Paras</th>
<th>Costs on Scottish Administration</th>
<th>Costs on local authorities</th>
<th>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Common good property</td>
<td>83 to 91</td>
<td>Nil</td>
<td>It is anticipated that the provisions will impose some additional costs on local authorities.</td>
<td>Nil</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Allotments</td>
<td>92 to 100</td>
<td>Nil</td>
<td>Duty to provide allotments: costs will be dependent on how much provision is required to meet individual local authority targets and how much provision is actually possible.</td>
<td>Nil</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Local authority estimates on recent cost ranged from £1,900 to £6,250 per plot, and from £21,000 to £150,000 for a whole site.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Duty for local authorities to hold and maintain waiting lists: Local authority estimates of maintaining a waiting list varied from £100 to £9,000 per year.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Duty for local authorities to publish an annual report and produce a food growing strategy: Local</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Financial Memo Paras</th>
<th>Costs on Scottish Administration</th>
<th>Costs on local authorities</th>
<th>Costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>authority estimate to produce an annual report is between £500 and £1,000. Estimates on the costs of producing a strategy are between £5,000 and £9,350.</td>
<td>Nil</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Non-domestic rates: schemes for reduction and remission of rates</td>
<td>101 to 106</td>
<td>Nil</td>
<td>The power for local authorities to award rate relief is discretionary and will be met by the local authority.</td>
<td>Nil</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

PART 1: NATIONAL OUTCOMES

Introduction

6. The Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland. They must also regularly and publicly report progress towards those outcomes. It requires national outcomes to be determined, but there is flexibility as to how these may be presented and measured.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

7. It is anticipated that the provisions will impose minor additional administrative costs on the Scottish Government. All costs associated with this provision would be met from existing Scottish Government resources. The Bill’s proposed requirements to develop, consult and report on national outcomes would be considered a core part of Scottish Government business.

Costs on local authorities

8. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on local authorities. Local authorities routinely respond to Scottish Government consultations as part of their core business.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

9. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.
PART 2: COMMUNITY PLANNING

Introduction

10. The measures in the Bill seek to strengthen the roles and responsibilities of community planning partnerships (CPPs) and place new duties on public sector partners to play a full and active role in community planning and the resourcing and delivery of local priority outcomes. In doing so they complement and reinforce the significant national and local action that is already underway to strengthen community planning. These include action by CPPs to implement new Single Outcome Agreements (SOA) which the Scottish Ministers and Council Leaders signed off in July and August 2013; and action by key public sector partners in community planning (including local authorities, NHS bodies and enterprise bodies) to work within CPPs to ensure that collective resources are more closely aligned towards shared priority outcomes in their SOA.

Costs on the Scottish Administration and public bodies

11. Schedule 1 to the Bill sets out a list of public sector bodies which will be required to participate in community planning. Some of these bodies (including NHS bodies, Scottish Enterprise and Highland and Islands Enterprise) are already statutory community planning partners. Others (including Skills Development Scotland, Scottish Natural Heritage and the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency) are not statutory partners at present but as a matter of practice frequently participate in community planning.

12. For those public sector bodies which are complying with national and local action already underway at policy level to strengthen community planning, it is anticipated that the provisions will impose either no or minor additional costs. Any direct costs are most likely to relate to additional travel and related costs to participate in meetings with the CPP and partners. Any indirect costs are most likely to relate to additional commitment by senior officers and elected members.

13. More broadly, the provisions in the Bill will reinforce national and local policy expectations about how these public sector bodies allocate their resources, so they are more closely targeted towards improving outcomes, especially on themes which a CPP has prioritised in its local outcomes improvement plan.

Costs on local authorities

14. Local authorities currently incur modest costs for facilitating community planning in their area, by servicing and co-ordinating the work of the CPP. These are principally staff costs for community planning officers. We understand from one medium-sized local authority that expenditure for servicing its CPP (including its thematic sub-groups) is approximately £210,000 per annum. A small local authority estimates it spends approximately £70,000 for this purpose. These figures exclude indirect costs for senior officers and elected members (e.g. time spent attending meetings, preparing papers and initiating follow-up work).

15. The provisions in the Bill do not place any specific additional requirements about how the CPP must operate which would result in additional direct servicing costs for the local authority. For those local authorities which are complying with national and local action already underway at policy level to strengthen community planning, it is anticipated that the provisions will impose either no or minor additional indirect costs, in terms of commitment by senior officers and elected members.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

16. More broadly, the provisions in the Bill will reinforce national and local policy expectations about how local authorities allocate their resources, so they are more closely targeted towards improving outcomes, especially on themes which a CPP has prioritised in its local outcomes improvement plan.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

17. Part 2 of the Bill does not place duties on other bodies, individuals and businesses. It is therefore not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

PART 3: PARTICIPATION REQUESTS

Introduction

18. The Scottish Government sets clear expectations that all public sector organisations must engage with communities and support their participation in setting priorities and in the design and delivery of services. The provisions in this Part of the Bill are not intended to replace that activity, but they give community bodies an additional power to initiate that dialogue on their own terms, and a right to have their views properly considered.

19. Where an appropriate community body, or a group of bodies, believes it could help to improve the outcome of a service, it will be able to make a request to the public body or bodies that deliver that service, asking to take part in a process to improve that outcome. The public body must agree to the request for dialogue unless there are reasonable grounds for refusal. At the end of the process the public body must publish a report on whether the outcomes were improved and how the community body contributed to that improvement.

Costs on the Scottish Administration and public bodies

20. These provisions will apply in relation to public services provided by listed public bodies. There are likely to be costs associated in responding to participation requests. However, the costs will depend on how often community participation bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland. The Bill explicitly allows public service authorities to invite community bodies to join existing processes, therefore limiting the need for additional costs.

21. The costs to a public body of providing an outcome improvement process will vary according to circumstances. An example for a local authority is provided below in paragraph 23 and shows costs associated with a number of different community engagement events they undertook.
Costs on local authorities

22. There are likely to be costs associated in responding to participation requests. However, the costs will depend on how often community participation bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland. The Bill explicitly allows public service authorities to invite community bodies to join existing processes, therefore limiting the need for additional costs.

23. The costs to a local authority of providing an outcome improvement process will vary according to circumstances. For example, a local authority provided some costs associated with a number of community engagement events they undertook. The costs ranged from £1,100 for a series of events aimed at involving local older people in identifying key priorities and concerns up to £41,000 for a series of engagement events to tackle health inequalities. The majority of the costs in each case were staffing costs.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

24. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

PART 4: COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY LAND

Introduction

25. Based on the experience of those using the legislation over the first decade of community right to buy, the Bill makes a number of changes to the detailed procedures and requirements. These provisions are intended to make the process easier and more flexible for communities, while continuing to strike a fair balance between the rights of communities and landowners.

26. The Bill also extends the right to buy to all of Scotland, removing the power of the Scottish Ministers to designate “excluded land”, which currently excludes all settlements over 10,000 population. This, and the streamlining of procedures, may be expected to lead to more communities registering interest in land and taking up the right to buy. However, it is not possible at this stage to accurately estimate the demand and how many new applications may be received.

Sections 27 to 47: modifications of Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003

Costs on the Scottish Administration

27. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government. The elements of the Bill which may lead to an increase in costs on the Scottish Government are identified below. All additional costs would be met from existing resources.

Community – appropriate legal entities

28. We propose that there will be model constitutions available to communities wishing to use the community right to buy provisions under the Bill. The Scottish Government currently has a model Articles of Association for companies limited by guarantee, which was developed in partnership with Highlands and Islands Enterprise and commercial solicitors.

29. A model for any other forms of community organisations would need to be developed and made compliant with the legislation. This will also need to be updated as necessary. We anticipate that it will cost in the region of £10,000 for the Scottish Government to develop a model for Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations in the first instance.

Valuation of the land

30. The Scottish Ministers currently pay for an independently conducted valuation once the community right to buy is triggered. These costs will continue under the Bill. The average cost of the 38 valuations since 2005 has been £2,382 which at an average of 4 per year is £9,528.

31. As noted above, as the Bill is extending the community right to buy all of Scotland and is making the process easier and more flexible we would expect that the average number of times that community right to buy is used to increase. It is difficult to forecast the number but an increase to between 5 and 10 per year would lead to an average cost of the valuation of land of between £11,910 and £23,820 per year.

32. The Bill introduces a right for the landowner to make counter-representations in relation to the valuation. A valuation currently takes six weeks to complete. With counter-representations, it is expected that the valuation will take up to eight weeks to complete. There will therefore be increased costs associated with valuation as additional work is required to be undertaken, in particular in the exchange of views on the valuation, and consideration of these views. We do not anticipate that this increase in cost will be significant.

Monitoring the community right to buy

33. There will be cost implications for the Scottish Government in collecting, assessing or presenting the findings of monitoring exercises. The costs of this requirement will depend on the arrangements put in place. We anticipate that any additional cost will be minor.

Late applications

34. Landowners are entitled to request compensation from the Scottish Ministers for the costs of maintaining their land and assets while a community body is seeking to use the community right to buy provisions. The period of the right to buy will be extended from 6 months to 8 months; this could therefore lead to increased requests for compensation. Requests for compensation under this provision have generally been limited.

Balloting

35. Community bodies currently make their own arrangements to ballot their community. In some cases the costs of the ballot were incurred by the community body, while in others they were borne by a local authority or another party. Section 37 provides that the Scottish Ministers will make arrangements for all ballots, and will bear the costs of these.
36. Over the period when the community right to buy has been used, there have been 40 ballots, in which 67,063 persons have been balloted (table 2). The average number of persons being balloted in a single ballot is 1,677 persons; the smallest ballot involved 43 persons (at Silverburn); the largest is 6,634 persons (Seton Fields).

37. The costs of this provision to the Scottish Ministers will depend on the number of applications made, the size of the community to be balloted in each case, and the approach adopted to the ballot.

38. As shown in table 2 below we have identified three models for costing the ballot: one is based on an estimated figure of a £2,000 standing charge and £2 per head administrative charge; a second one is based on the costs as applied to crofting elections; a third one is based on a ballot undertaken by a local authority. Using these possible models had the Scottish Government paid for the administration of the ballot, they would have spent between £41,579 and £214,126 on balloting costs since 2005. The average cost of each ballot would have been between £1,040 and £5,353.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>No. registered interests (approved)</th>
<th>No. rights to buy “triggered” and no. ballots</th>
<th>No. people balloted</th>
<th>Costs based on estimated figure*</th>
<th>Costs based on crofting elections ballots</th>
<th>Costs based on a Local Authority example</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2005</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>2,343</td>
<td>£14,686</td>
<td>£5,108</td>
<td>£1,453</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2006</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>8,187</td>
<td>£22,374</td>
<td>£17,848</td>
<td>£5,076</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2007</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>16,046</td>
<td>£52,092</td>
<td>£34,980</td>
<td>£9,949</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2008</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>1,109</td>
<td>£6,218</td>
<td>£2,418</td>
<td>£688</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2009</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>152</td>
<td>£2,304</td>
<td>£331</td>
<td>£94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2010</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>21,948</td>
<td>£57,896</td>
<td>£47,847</td>
<td>£13,608</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2011</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>406</td>
<td>£6,812</td>
<td>£885</td>
<td>£252</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2012</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>12,921</td>
<td>£35,842</td>
<td>£28,168</td>
<td>£8,011</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2013</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3951</td>
<td>£15,902</td>
<td>£8,613</td>
<td>£2,450</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2014</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>-</td>
<td>-</td>
<td>-</td>
<td>-</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>166</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>1,677</td>
<td>£214,126</td>
<td>£146,198</td>
<td>£41,581</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Average</td>
<td>16.6</td>
<td>4</td>
<td></td>
<td>£5,353</td>
<td>£3,655</td>
<td>£1,040</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

*Estimated figure of £2,000 for standing charge, £1.50 printing and postage per ballot paper, and 50p counting charge.
Costs from Seton Fields ballot conducted by East Lothian Council.

39. As noted above, as the Bill is extending the community right to buy to all of Scotland and is making the process easier and more flexible. We would expect the average number of times that community right to buy is used to increase.

40. Assuming that there is an average of between 5 and 10 right to buy applications each year, and an average of 1,667 persons being balloted, then average yearly costs could vary between £5,200 and £53,530. This figure may be higher or lower, depending on the number of ballots and the number of people to be balloted. We might also expect that the number of people to be balloted in urban areas is at the higher end of the scale, given that population concentration will be higher in any given defined community area.

41. In exceptional circumstances where a ballot is flawed, a re-ballot will be required, which will incur further costs at an average cost of between £1,040 and £5,353.

Appeals

42. As we expect that there will be greater use made of the community right to buy provisions, we anticipate that there may be an increased number of appeals to the sheriff courts and to the Lands Tribunal for Scotland (LTS). The Scottish Government’s legal costs for 2012-13 were £21,225 and will vary from year to year and case to case. The Scottish Tribunals Service
(STS) provides administrative support to the LTS. Arrangements for providing funding to the STS for cases to the LTS will be provided on a case-by-case basis. It is envisaged that funds will be reimbursed as cases progress through the LTS. At this stage it is not possible to accurately estimate how many cases will progress to the LTS and the time needed for each case will vary on the complexity of the case in question. The last recorded cases that the lead policy team has for appeals that went to the Sheriff Court were in 2009. In total, since 2004 there have been six cases brought against decisions by the Scottish Ministers pertaining to various things in the application process. Where the Scottish Ministers won an appeal costs were covered by the appellant. In certain cases, where the appellant was unable to pay, this was taken under consideration by the Scottish Ministers. Where the Scottish Ministers lost an appeal, the costs were borne by them. Costs are entirely dependent on level of legal representation required and a case’s complexity and have varied between £3,000 and £20,000.

Costs on local authorities

43. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on local authorities.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

44. The elements of the provisions on community right to buy which may lead to an increase in costs on other bodies, individual and businesses are identified below. However, there is a large degree of uncertainty on the level of costs that may be incurred as it will be up to individual community bodies and landowners in how to use and respond to the provisions, including the need for appropriate legal advice.

Communities – appropriate legal entities

45. Model constitution documents allow communities to set up a legal entity as easily and cheaply as possible. Whether communities need to engage a solicitor or other expertise in this process is entirely up to them. The current costs of setting up a company limited by guarantee are negligible, with the Scottish Government’s solicitors checking over drafts before incorporation to ensure compliance with the requirements of the 2003 Act.
46. We do not anticipate there to be any significant additional costs on community bodies in setting up a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation.

Landowner withdrawing land from sale

47. If landowners withdraw the land from sale after the right to buy has been triggered they may be asked to pay for the costs of the independent valuation. As stated above the average cost of land valuations since 2005 has been £2,382.

“Exempt” transfer of land

48. Under specific circumstances a landowner may transfer land while there is a registered interest in their land. Landowners are to inform the Scottish Ministers of such a transfer. It is up to a landowner to decide how to respond. There could be legal representation costs incurred by a landowner, whose solicitor will write to the Scottish Government to inform them that there has been an exempt transfer of land. The landowner alternatively may wish to make the representation themselves.

Section 48: neglected and abandoned land (new Part 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003)

Costs on the Scottish Administration

49. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government. The elements of the Bill which may lead to an increase in costs on the Scottish Government are identified below. All additional costs would be met from existing resources.

Community – appropriate legal entities

50. As indicated in paragraph 45 above, we propose that there will be a model constitution available to communities wishing to use the provisions under the Bill. The Scottish Government currently has a model Articles of Association for companies limited by guarantee, which was developed in partnership with Highlands and Islands Enterprise and commercial solicitors.

51. A model for the right to buy neglected and abandoned land will be developed and made compliant with the legislation. This will also need to be updated as necessary. We anticipate that it will cost less than £10,000 for the Scottish Government to develop a model, as the existing model for community companies for Part 2 of the Act provides a starting point.

Valuation of the land

52. The Scottish Ministers currently pay for an independently conducted valuation under Part 2 and Part 3 of the community right to buy and crofting community right to buy provisions. These costs will also be met by the Scottish Ministers under these provisions. As indicated above in paragraph 30 the average cost of the 38 valuations since 2005 has been £2,382.

53. The use of the provisions inserted by section 48 is difficult to forecast at this stage but there will be a cost associated with an increased number of valuations. A range of between 5 and 10 per year would lead to an average cost of the valuation of land of between £11,910 and £23,820.

54. The Bill introduces a right for the landowner to make counter-representations in relation to the valuation. This mirrors changes to the valuation procedures under Part 2 of the 2003 Act as indicated above in paragraph 32. With counter-representations, it is expected that the valuation will take up to eight weeks to complete. There will therefore be increased costs associated with valuation as additional work is required to be undertaken, in particular in the exchange of views on the valuation, and consideration of these views. We do not anticipate that this increase in cost will be significant.

Compensation costs

55. Any person who has incurred loss or expense under the provisions may, in certain circumstances, be entitled to compensation. This includes an owner or a former owner of land. Under certain circumstances the community body is to pay for the compensation, under others the Scottish Ministers pay for it. Community bodies can apply to the Scottish Ministers for a grant towards their liability to pay compensation under certain circumstances. Compensation costs will vary from case to case.

Register of applications by communities of neglected and abandoned land

56. It is proposed that all applications by communities to buy neglected and abandoned land will be lodged on a register. It is expected that a register will cost £10,000 to set up, similar to the original costs by the Registers of Scotland in setting up the Register of Community Interests of Land (RCIL) for Part 2 of the 2003 Act. Thereafter, there will be on-going site maintenance and update costs anticipated to be up to £10,000 per year. This figure is based on current Registers of Scotland invoicing to the Scottish Ministers.

Costs arising from appeals

57. There are a number of appeals that can be made by the landowner, community body or another party throughout the provisions, including the appeal of the Scottish Ministers decision on an application, and appeal of the independent valuation. These appeals are made either to the sheriff court in the area where the land to be acquired is located or to the Lands Tribunal of Scotland, as set out in the provisions.

58. The Scottish Tribunals Service (STS) provides administrative support to the LTS. Arrangements for providing funding to the STS for cases to the LTS will be provided on a case-by-case basis. It is envisaged that funds will be reimbursed as cases progress through the LTS.

59. It is difficult to assess at this stage the number of appeal cases that will be heard and it is of course expected that the Scottish Ministers will make robust decisions that stand up to appeal. Costs may have to be borne the person who brings the appeal or by the person who made the decision being appealed. Costs will vary depending on the case and its complexity.

60. The Scottish Ministers will keep the number of appeals under review and remain in close contact with the courts and Lands Tribunal to assess any significant changes in work load.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Costs on local authorities

61. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on local authorities.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

62. The elements of the provisions on community right to buy neglected and abandoned land which may lead to an increase in costs on other bodies, individual and businesses are identified below. However, there is a large degree of uncertainty on the level of costs that may be incurred as it will be up to individual community bodies and landowners in how to use and respond to the provisions, including the need for appropriate legal advice.

Communities – company limited by guarantee

63. Model constitution documents allow communities to set up a legal entity as easily and cheaply as possible. Whether communities need to engage a solicitor or other expertise in this process is entirely up to them. The current costs of setting up a company limited by guarantee are negligible, with the Scottish Government’s solicitors checking over drafts before incorporation to ensure compliance.

64. We do not anticipate there to be any significant additional costs on community bodies in setting up a company limited by guarantee.

Balloting

65. When making an application to buy abandoned or neglected land community bodies will be required to make their own arrangements to ballot their community and to pay for that ballot to be undertaken.

66. The costs outlined for balloting in paragraphs 35 to 41 above will also apply to community bodies under these provisions. The costs to be met by an individual community body will depend on the size of the community to be balloted and the approach adopted to the ballot. Using the possible models outlined in table 2 above the average cost of each ballot for a community body would be between £1,040 and £5,353.

Compensation costs

67. Any person who has incurred loss or expense under the provisions may, in certain circumstances, be entitled to compensation. This includes an owner or a former owner of land. Under certain circumstances the community body is to pay for the compensation, under others the Scottish Ministers pay for it. Community bodies can apply to the Scottish Ministers for a grant towards their liability to pay compensation under certain circumstances. Compensation costs to community bodies will vary from case to case.

Costs arising from appeals

68. As indicated in paragraphs 57 to 60 there are a number of appeals that can be made by the landowner, community body or another party throughout the provisions, including the appeal of the Scottish Ministers decision on an application, and appeal of the independent valuation. These appeals are made either to the sheriff court in the area where the land to be acquired is located or to the Lands Tribunal of Scotland, as set out in the provisions.

69. Costs may have to be borne by a landowner, community body and third parties. Costs will vary depending on the case and its complexity.

PART 5: ASSET TRANSFER REQUESTS

Introduction

70. The public sector owns a wide range of land and buildings throughout Scotland, ranging from forests to schools, hospitals to waterworks. Many communities may wish to take control of assets in their area, enabling them to address local needs and deliver community benefit. This will also contribute to achieving the outcomes set by public sector bodies, and can lead to reduced demand for public services.

71. The Bill seeks to build on existing good practice to ensure that there is consistency in asset transfer processes across the country, while allowing for the very wide range of individual circumstances that will occur on a case by case basis.

72. By making the process more consistent and ensuring public bodies provide a reasoned response to requests, it is hoped the provisions will result in an increasing numbers of asset transfers. To give an indication of the current level of demand, the Community Ownership Support Service, funded by the Scottish Government, works with community groups and local authorities to facilitate asset transfers and has been involved in 38 asset transfers from 2011 to 2014.

73. A core purpose of the legislation is to allow community bodies to identify for themselves which assets would help them develop their communities. It is founded on the principle that the transfer process should be initiated by a community body with an interest in an asset, rather than by public bodies looking to dispose of an asset. We cannot predict how many community bodies may be in that position and it is not possible at this stage to accurately estimate how many asset transfers will take place each year.

74. Subject to an assessment of the overall benefit of a transfer, public bodies, including the Scottish Government and local authorities, may decide to transfer assets at less than market value, which will have a financial consequence for the organisation. This will be done on the basis of a full assessment of the costs and benefits, including predicted savings in the delivery of services and improved local outcomes. The provisions encourage a wide consideration of the value of benefits to the communities which may be enhanced by asset transfer.

Costs on the Scottish Administration and public bodies

75. The costs of these provisions will depend on the arrangements put in place and any additional costs would be met from existing resources.
76. The process for the Scottish Government and other public bodies taking a decision on whether to agree to a request involves an assessment of whether the request would be likely to promote or improve: economic development; regeneration; public health; social wellbeing; or environmental wellbeing, and must take equal opportunities into account. Considering the relevant costs and savings associated with such benefits will be central to the assessment process.

Costs on local authorities

77. During the consultation on the Bill local authorities were not able to provide monetary estimates for any costs or savings that may arise as a result of the Bill. This in part reflects the difficulty in predicting how many requests will be made, the wide variety in the types of request that could be made, for example from the use of a small patch of derelict land to the purchase of a large community centre, and the complexity in predicting savings associated with better service provision.

78. As for public bodies above in paragraph 76 the process for a local authority taking a decision on whether to agree to a request involves an assessment of whether the request would be likely to promote or improve: economic development; regeneration; public health; social wellbeing; or environmental wellbeing, and must take equal opportunities into account. Considering the relevant costs and savings associated with such benefits will be central to the assessment process.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

79. The Bill will require a community body making a request to outline the public benefit that would follow from a transfer. Details of what is to be included in a request will be set out in regulations. These are yet to be drafted, but it is expected that they will include the need to demonstrate that any transfer would be financially sustainable in the long term, providing confidence that the proposed benefits can realistically be achieved.

80. It is not possible to accurately predict the cost for individual community bodies that may arise over the next few years as it will be dependent on the type, value and condition of the asset the community body is seeking to own, lease or manage. In addition there will be other costs such as refurbishment or re-development costs, administrative costs, legal fees and specialist advice that will vary from case to case.

81. Recent examples provided by the Community Ownership Support Service highlight the variation in asset transfer costs (not including other administrative etc. costs):
    - Argyll and Bute, outward bound centre, cost £220,000, transferred December 2013
    - Western Isles, old primary school building, cost £10,000, transferred March 2014
    - Highland, old primary school building, cost £50,000, transferred May 2014
82. Forestry Commission Scotland under their National Forest Land Scheme have given a number of communities the opportunity to buy or lease National Forest land. The value of these asset transfers ranges from £5,000 to £1.55 million, as shown in the following table:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Asset / forest name</th>
<th>Community organisation</th>
<th>Main future use</th>
<th>Area (ha)</th>
<th>Value (£)</th>
<th>Financial year sold</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>West Ardhu and Langa mull forests</td>
<td>North West Mull Community Woodland Company</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>691.0</td>
<td>£340,000</td>
<td>2006-07</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slewdrum Forest</td>
<td>Birse Community Trust</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>167.0</td>
<td>£160,000</td>
<td>2006-07</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Strathmasie Forest</td>
<td>Laggan Forest Trust</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>19.0</td>
<td>£75,000</td>
<td>2006-07</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ford</td>
<td>Ford Community Project Ltd</td>
<td>Community centre</td>
<td>2.6</td>
<td>£170,000</td>
<td>2007-08</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burghead</td>
<td>Burghead Thistle Junior Football Club</td>
<td>Football pitch</td>
<td>1.4</td>
<td>£20,000</td>
<td>2008-09</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Badluarach and Durnamuck</td>
<td>Badluarach and Durnamuck Community Woodland</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>8.5</td>
<td>£7,000</td>
<td>2009-10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Acharossan Forest</td>
<td>Kilfinan Community Forest Company</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>125.0</td>
<td>£130,000</td>
<td>2009-10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gaudiedale strip</td>
<td>Bennachie Access Group</td>
<td>Access</td>
<td>0.1</td>
<td>£5,000</td>
<td>2009-10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balfour Wood</td>
<td>Birse Community Trust</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>241.0</td>
<td>£291,000</td>
<td>2010-11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rumster Forest</td>
<td>Latheron, Lybster &amp; Clyth Community Development Company</td>
<td>Renewable Energy Scheme</td>
<td>40.0</td>
<td>£80,000</td>
<td>2010-11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tormore Forest</td>
<td>Sleat Community Trust</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>440.0</td>
<td>£330,000</td>
<td>2011-12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Broadford Wood</td>
<td>Broadford and Strath Community Company</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>20.0</td>
<td>£35,000</td>
<td>2011-12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ardentinny Wall Garden</td>
<td>Ardentinny Community Trust</td>
<td>Visitor attraction</td>
<td>1.4</td>
<td>£10,000</td>
<td>2012-13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stronafian</td>
<td>Glendaruel and Colintraive Community Development Trust</td>
<td>Community woodland</td>
<td>615.0</td>
<td>£1,550,000</td>
<td>2012-13</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
PART 6: COMMON GOOD PROPERTY

Introduction

83. “Common good”, in Scotland, refers to certain assets which were originally acquired by former burghs, and to which title has been passed down to local authorities through successive rounds of local government re-organisation. They include both moveable items (furniture, paintings, regalia etc.) and heritable ones (land and buildings), as well as cash funds which may have been derived from the use or sale of common good property.

84. Audit Scotland stated that at 31 March 2011, councils managed common good assets valued at £219 million. Due to the special status of common good, it has to be accounted for in a particular way, separate from other local authority assets, and there are special rules about its disposal. There is a long history of common law decisions clarifying whether particular items form part of the common good and how they can be used or disposed of.

85. While local authorities should already have details of their common good assets, in line with accounting good practice, this is not always readily available to the public, and there may be disputes about what is included. The aim of this part of the Bill is to increase transparency about the existence, use and disposal of common good assets, and to increase community involvement in decisions taken about their identification, use and disposal.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

86. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on the Scottish Government.

Costs on local authorities

87. The Bill places a new statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good. When establishing the register, a proposed list must be published and community councils and other community bodies must be invited to comment on it. The completed register must be made available for inspection and online.

88. Further provisions require local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community councils and other community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.

89. These new statutory duties will have costs associated with them. In the consultation, local authorities expressed some concern about the potential resources involved in establishing registers. However, none placed an estimate of monetary value on the process. As local authorities are currently required to account for Common Good assets separately, we can assume that any process required to establish an accessible register will be starting from a very firm foundation.
These documents relate to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

90. The Bill is not prescriptive about how local authorities should consult on their Common Good registers, and as such it would be for each local authority to decide the method that offers best value for money, while ensuring it is inclusive of everyone who may wish to comment. For example, it may be possible to include common good in existing consultation or engagement processes.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

91. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

PART 7: ALLOTMENTS

Introduction

92. The Bill replaces the existing legislation relating to allotments, updating and clarifying the requirements on local authorities. The Scottish Government’s National Food and Drink Policy made a clear commitment to strategically support allotments and community growing spaces. These can increase the production of cheap, healthy, locally grown and nutritious food, provide savings in household budgets and increase local self-reliance.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

93. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on the Scottish Government.

Costs on local authorities

Duty to provide allotments

94. Section 72 of the Bill replaces the existing duty to provide allotments “where the local authority considers there to be a demand” with a requirement to “take reasonable steps” to provide more allotments if the waiting list exceeds a trigger point – when the number of persons who have made a request to lease an allotment is more than half the number of allotments owned or leased by the authority. This will encourage more proactive allotment provision by local authorities.

95. Local authority costs will be dependent on how much provision is required to meet their targets, how much provision is actually possible due to land availability and costs, and factors such as the local cost of land and whether road access, toilets etc. need to be created.

96. Of the 15 local authorities that provided information on costs, 8 have opened new allotment sites in the last 5 years. Estimates on how much this allotment provision had cost ranged from £1,900 to £6,250 per plot, and from £21,000 to £150,000 for a whole site. Seven of the respondents needed no more plots to meet the target that the waiting list should be no more than half of the current number of allotment plots, while others were facing substantial demand.
Duty for local authorities to establish and maintain waiting lists

97. Section 71 requires each local authority to compile and maintain an allotments waiting list. Of the 15 local authorities that responded 11 already hold and maintain waiting lists, suggesting that this requirement will not incur significant increased costs. The estimated costs of maintaining the waiting list varied from £100 to £9,000 a year.

Duty for local authorities to publish an annual report and produce a food growing strategy

98. Local authorities will also be required to publish an annual report and produce a food growing strategy. Much of the information required for this strategy will already have been collected within the Open Space Strategy and Local Development Plan and no significant additional costs are anticipated.

99. Only one of the local authority respondents to the consultation currently produces an annual report with another reporting on accounts only. They estimate their costs in producing the report to be £500 and £1,000.

100. 7 of the 15 local authorities who responded already have or are in the process of producing an Allotments Strategy. Two local authorities estimated the costs of producing their strategy to be £5,000 and £9,350.

PART 8: NON-DOMESTIC RATES

Introduction

101. The Bill includes a power to allow local authorities the discretion to reduce or remit the amount of non-domestic (business) rates leviable by it, in effect this allows them to create localised relief schemes to respond to local needs and demands. Such schemes are to be administered and funded locally and will operate in addition to the current national rates reliefs schemes and centrally set national poundage rate. The poundage is the pence in the pound tax rate used to calculate all business rates bills in Scotland. The total non-domestic rates collected (net of any national mandatory rates reliefs) by local authorities is paid into the Scottish Government non-domestic rates pool and then re-distributed back to local authorities as part of their guaranteed annual local government financial settlement. Any discretionary reliefs awarded by a local authority must be funded from within that authority’s existing resources and not at the expense of the pool.

102. There is no equivalent power for a local authority to levy additional rates on any property or ratepayer.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

103. It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any additional costs on the Scottish Government.
Costs on local authorities

104. The costs of any locally awarded rates relief scheme are to be met by the Local Authority. Before exercising the power to offer local rates relief, the Local Authority must have regard to the interests of persons liable to pay council tax set by the authority.

105. As the power for local authorities to award rates relief is discretionary the cost to local authorities cannot be estimated given that individual local authority may, or may not choose to use this discretionary power. Local authorities will notify the Scottish Government in the regular non-domestic rates returns which will allow any uptake to be monitored and costed.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

106. The provisions should not impose any additional costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses as the relief which can be awarded is at the discretion of local authorities and will be funded from within their existing resources.
SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 11 June 2014, the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth (John Swinney MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”

PRESIDING OFFICER’S STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 11 June 2014, the Presiding Officer (Rt Hon Tricia Marwick MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”
COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

POLICY MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory Notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 52–EN.

POLICY AIM OF THE BILL

2. The core purpose of the Scottish Government is to focus government and public services on creating a more successful country, with opportunities for all of Scotland to flourish, through increasing sustainable economic growth. This will only be achieved by making the most of all the resources available in Scotland, especially the collective talents, creativity and determination of Scotland’s people.

3. The Scottish Government believes that Scotland’s people are its greatest asset: they are best placed to make decisions about our future, and to know what is needed to deliver sustainable and resilient communities. A key aim underpinning the Scottish Government’s core purpose is to create the conditions for community empowerment, as reflected in Empowering Scotland: The Government’s Programme for Scotland 2013-14 (2013)\(^1\).

4. In line with trusting the people who live and work in Scotland to make decisions about the nation’s future, the essence of self-determination, the Scottish Government is also committed to supporting subsidiarity and local decision-making. The Scottish Government and local government have a strong partnership approach, which has built on the Concordat signed in 2007. Local authorities have a key role to play in providing leadership, and in promoting and supporting community empowerment. They have a strong understanding of the needs and aspirations of local communities, together with a democratic mandate to make decisions which balance the needs and aspirations of people across the local authority area. The proposals in this Bill reflect and build on that role.

\(^1\)http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/09/8177
5. The Bill reflects these policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a strategic framework which will:

- Empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and
- Support an increase in the pace and scale of Public Service Reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.

In doing so, this Bill aims to support approaches that can contribute to improving outcomes in all aspects of people’s lives.

6. Empowerment is a core pillar of the human rights approach. The Bill will help to ensure people can meaningfully participate in decisions that affect their lives. In carrying out their duties and making decisions under the Bill, public authorities will also be bound by equalities legislation and the Public Sector Equality Duty\(^2\) under Part 11 of the Equality Act 2010.

BACKGROUND

Community Empowerment

7. When people feel they can influence what happens in their community and can contribute to delivering change, there can be many benefits. Communities can often achieve significant improvements by doing things for themselves, because they know what will work for them. They become more confident and resilient; there are often opportunities for people to gain new skills and for increased employment as well as improved access to services and support. These in turn can lead to improvements in a wide range of areas such as crime, health, and reducing inequalities. Community empowerment can therefore have an important impact on a range of outcomes in the Government’s National Performance Framework: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Performance/purposestratobjs

8. Scotland has a long and proud tradition of people coming together to use their energy and creativity to make a difference for their communities. A wide range of groups often play an anchor role within communities, including Community Controlled Housing Associations, Community Development Trusts, and more informal associations. There is now a strong network of community groups across Scotland, supporting one another, exchanging ideas and encouraging more communities to become involved.

9. The Scottish Community Empowerment Action Plan: Celebrating Success: Inspiring Change\(^3\), published jointly in 2009 by the Scottish Government and COSLA, defined community empowerment as “a process where people work together to make change happen in their communities by having more power and influence over what matters to them”.

10. Community empowerment means different things for different communities. Some communities will want to take on the ownership or management of land or buildings, or delivery

---

\(^1\) [http://www.crer.org.uk/public-sector-equality-duty]

\(^2\) [http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/People/engage/empowerment]

---

2

---
of services to members of their community. Others may be more interested in engaging with the public sector to have more say in how services are delivered or how assets are used.

11. All public service providers have a responsibility to create the conditions that encourage and support strong, independent and resilient communities, and ensuring a focus on supporting community empowerment is a key plank of public service reform. Communities are often best placed to determine outcomes for local services, and public service providers should facilitate processes which fully engage communities in the decisions that are taken about the design and delivery of services to achieve those outcomes. The Scottish Government is clear that it is important that community voices are heard in public sector processes, but that this engagement differs from community empowerment, where communities lead change for themselves.

Democratic Engagement

12. Local government and other public service providers increasingly use a range of community engagement and participatory activities to seek views on their service delivery. This recognises that representative democracy needs to be complemented by other ways in which people can express their views and influence decisions which affect them. Such activities can in turn inspire increased engagement with local and national government. When people are actively engaged in tackling issues in their communities, have direct contact with elected representatives and feel that they can influence decisions, they are more likely to become involved in the electoral process themselves, whether at Community Council, local authority or national level. This enhances the relationship between elected members and the communities they represent and can lead to better-informed decision making all round.

Public service reform

13. Scotland’s public sector organisations provide high quality services which people value. They play an important role in creating a stronger economy and a fairer society. However, in order to ensure they maintain that quality and remain financially viable, further reform is needed. The *Report of the Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services (2011)*⁴, chaired by Campbell Christie (“the Christie Commission”) made clear that public sector organisations must work more effectively together and in partnership with communities, with a focus on achieving outcomes.

14. The Scottish Government’s response to the Christie Commission’s report (*Renewing Scotland’s Public Services: Priorities for Reform in Response to the Christie Commission (2011)*⁵) is founded on four pillars: People; Partnership; Prevention; and Performance. These four pillars were drawn together to help focus on achieving success and meeting the ambitions of the Christie Commission. There was also a clear recognition in the report and in the Government’s response, of the need to work with people rather than doing things to them, and in the importance of “place”.

---

⁴ http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/06/27154527/0
Community Planning

15. At local level, Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) have a key role to play in shaping and delivering change. Community planning is the process by which key public service providers work together and with communities to plan and provide services within a local authority area. The key strategy document for each CPP is the Single Outcome Agreement (SOA) which provides a shared ‘plan for place’ aimed at reducing inequalities and delivering better outcomes for communities.

16. The Statement of Ambition for Community Planning and SOAs⁶, issued by the Scottish Government and COSLA in March 2012, says that—

   “Effective community planning arrangements will be at the core of public service reform. They will drive the pace of service integration, increase the focus on prevention and secure continuous improvement in public service delivery, in order to achieve better outcomes for communities.”

17. Work is already underway to strengthen community planning. For example, the National Community Planning Group brings together public and third sector leaders including from COSLA, the NHS and the Scottish Government. It is providing national leadership for efforts to strengthen community planning, with a focus on making public sector budgets work better together, preventing problems before they happen, working more effectively with communities, governance, accountability and improving performance. The Bill will underpin these developments by strengthening the legal base for community planning.

Role of legislation

18. Ultimately, community empowerment cannot be delivered by legislation alone, although creating a supportive legal framework will enhance the process. The availability of appropriate support, guidance and a culture of nurturing community action are also key. As communities become more empowered they are likely to seek partnerships with organisations in the public private and voluntary sector to achieve their goals. Supporting such approaches is increasingly becoming a priority in the context of re-shaping public services.

19. Empowering communities is not a new process. There are already many examples of community empowerment in action throughout Scotland. Where communities want to do something for themselves this has often been facilitated by good practice guidance, funding being available and the attitudes, skills and commitment of many people working in many different organisations.

20. However, it is clear from a range of sources, for example the report of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Delivery of Regeneration in Scotland Inquiry (published 24 February 2014), that experience across the country has been mixed. It is also the case that in many areas of community empowerment, different public sector organisations have different levels of involvement. For example, local authorities often have greater experience than many other public authorities. A key reason for bringing forward this legislation is to address this inconsistency and promote best practice throughout Scotland.

---

⁶ http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Government/local-government/CP/soa
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

21. The purpose of the Bill is to remove barriers and make it easier for communities to achieve their goals, by giving communities clear rights to play a more pro-active role, and placing clear duties on public sector bodies to engage with communities and to respond to their requests.

22. Many of the issues in the Bill build on existing guidance and the experience of communities themselves in becoming more empowered, as well as those who have been working over the years to support communities. As such, it does not seek to introduce any completely new or novel concepts. Rather, it puts in place a consistent and transparent framework and processes which will underpin, extend and improve good current practice to make it universal and enduring.

CONSULTATION

23. The Scottish National Party’s 2011 manifesto\(^7\) proposed a Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill which would “give local people a greater say in their area, enabling them to deal more easily with derelict and eyesore properties and take over underused or unused public buildings for the benefit of their community”. The Christie Commission report also recommended that the Bill should “promote significantly improved community participation in the design and delivery of services” (paragraph 4.41).

24. An exploratory Consultation on the proposed Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill\(^8\) was held between June and September 2012, setting out a wide range of actions which, it had been suggested, could strengthen participation, unlock enterprising community development and renew communities. During the consultation period, Scottish Government officials took part in a series of conferences and local meetings with a range of people from the public and voluntary sectors and with community volunteers. A series of road-shows was also organised with the assistance of COSLA to meet local government officials and representatives. 447 responses to the consultation were received from a mix of individuals, community and voluntary groups, community councils, and the public and private sectors. An independent analysis of the responses was published in January 2013\(^9\).

25. The results of the exploratory consultation showed that some issues needed to be addressed through legislation. On other issues, it was felt that other approaches might be more effective. Proposals from the exploratory consultation not taken forward in this Bill include:

- Duty on public services to publish and communicate community engagement plans
- Duty for public service authorities to have a named community engagement officer

\(^8\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/06/7786
\(^9\) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/01/9545
It was felt that much effort could be expended on producing a plan, rather than actually engaging with communities. Similarly, having a single named officer might result in a perception that other officers were not responsible for community engagement. A requirement to engage with communities is included in the Bill in relation to community planning, and is expressed with a focus on the outcome, rather than the process.

- Improving procurement processes to increase access for community groups to public service delivery contracts

Measures in the Procurement Reform (Scotland) Bill are designed to make it simpler to access and bid for public sector contracts. These measures will help tackle unnecessary inconsistencies for suppliers doing business with the public sector and will help ensure that doing business with the public sector can be simple, transparent and more accessible to suppliers.

- Right for communities to be consulted on local budgets

The Bill will strengthen requirements for communities to be involved in setting priorities for public services, which has a significant impact on how budgets are spent. The Scottish Government also supports Participatory Budgeting (PB), which directly involves local people in decisions on a specific budget. A number of small PB projects have taken place across Scotland in recent years. The Scottish Government is funding consultancy support to help more local authorities develop PB in their areas.

- Power to enforce the sale or lease of long-term empty property

There are already a range of powers available to local authorities to bring long term empty property back into use, and it was not clear that new legislation would be more effective than the current powers. The Government is continuing the work of the Empty Homes Partnership and monitoring the use of other powers, such as compulsory purchase for immediate re-sale and the Local Government Finance (Unoccupied Properties etc) (Scotland) Act 2012.

- Community Councils

Community Councils are elected bodies established by local authorities under the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973. They have a statutory role in representing the views of the community to the local authority and other public bodies. Community Council activity is very variable across Scotland; some are seen almost as community anchor organisations, with good connections to all the groups within their community, others play a largely formal role and a local development trust or Tenants and Residents Association may be more active.

There was no clear support for legislative change to the status of Community Councils in the exploratory consultation, or in the recommendations of the Community Councils Short Life Working Group which reported in October 2012. The Scottish Government is taking forward work to strengthen the role of Community Councils and increase the diversity of members.
While the Bill does not amend the legislative status of Community Councils, it does recognise their interest in shaping local services, and gives them a specific role in relation to common good assets.

26. A second, more detailed Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill\textsuperscript{10} was held between November 2013 and January 2014 on a set of 10 topics which had been identified for possible inclusion in the Bill, including draft legislative provisions on 4 topics and detailed questions about the proposed content of legislation on a further 3. This consultation included new issues which had been suggested for inclusion since the earlier consultation. The Minister for Local Government and Planning and Scottish Government officials attended over 30 events and meetings to provide information about the Bill to stakeholders to help them in preparing their responses. The Government is grateful to all those organisations that arranged events for their members to discuss the proposals, and to those local authorities that hosted regional events for local government.

27. 424 responses were received from a wide range of public sector, community, third sector and private organisations, and from individuals. Non-confidential consultation responses were published on 28 February on the Scottish Government website\textsuperscript{11}. The Scottish Government commissioned the independent consultancy organisation, The Research Shop, to undertake a formal analysis of consultation responses, which was published on 12 June 2014.

28. Overall, there was general support for the topics proposed to be included in the Bill, and helpful suggestions were made to improve the proposals. There was concern that people might have difficulty in understanding the language of the draft legislation and that many communities would need support to be able to take the opportunities offered by the Bill. As noted earlier in this document, the Scottish Government expects all public service providers to support communities in using these processes and in becoming more empowered generally. Full guidance on the procedures established by the Bill will be developed in partnership with stakeholders.

29. Further detail on the responses to individual sections of the consultation is provided in relation to each Part of the Bill below.

SPECIFIC PROVISIONS

Part 1: National Outcomes

30. In 2007, the Scottish Ministers introduced “Scotland Performs”\textsuperscript{12}, to provide a clear vision for the kind of Scotland they want to see. This was refreshed in 2011. It sets out the Government’s core Purpose, supported by 5 Strategic Objectives and 16 National Outcomes. There are also detailed Purpose Targets and National Indicators which track progress towards the Purpose and National Outcomes. All devolved public services in Scotland are now aligning their work to this single framework. It is part of a new way of making policy, and is helping to change the way public services are delivered. The outcomes approach means that different

\textsuperscript{10} http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/11/5740
\textsuperscript{11} http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2014/02/2073
\textsuperscript{12} http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Performance organisations are working towards shared goals, defined in terms of the impact they make for individuals and communities, rather than just how efficiently the service is delivered.

31. Scotland Performs has been recognised both in the UK and internationally as an innovative and useful approach to defining strategic outcomes for government, and demonstrating progress towards them. It provides a description of what contributes to National Wellbeing, and ways of measuring that. The Carnegie UK Trust recommended in its report Shifting the Dial in Scotland (2013) that the outcomes approach should be embedded in legislation, to ensure it continues to be used in the long term.

32. In consultation, almost all those who responded to this issue supported placing the outcomes approach in legislation. The Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which must be reviewed at least once every 5 years. They must also regularly and publicly report progress towards those outcomes. These duties are not intended to require future governments to use the same model of purpose, targets, outcomes and indicators as currently used in Scotland Performs. It requires national outcomes to be determined, but there is flexibility as to how these may be presented and measured.

Alternative approaches

33. The alternative would be to continue the national outcomes based approach on a non-statutory basis. It is considered that, whilst this has worked well up until now, putting the outcomes on a statutory footing is necessary to demonstrate a long-term commitment to the approach, strengthen the prominence of the outcomes approach and enhance accountability.

Part 2: Community Planning

34. Community planning is currently established in Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. This places a duty on local authorities to initiate, maintain and facilitate a process by which public services are planned and provided in the local authority area. Core partners are under a duty to participate in the process. There is no statutory requirement to establish Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs), although it is an expectation in supporting statutory guidance. There are 32 CPPs in Scotland, one for each local authority area.

35. Current guidance makes clear that CPPs should be engaging with their communities in identifying and prioritising the outcomes that are to be delivered, and working with communities to develop their capacity to contribute to community planning and to their achievement of better outcomes. However, this is not currently a clear statutory requirement.

36. Legislative changes to community planning are an important element of a series of reforms which give effect to the Statement of Ambition (see paragraph 16). The Scottish

---

13 Core partners under the 2003 Act are local authorities, health boards, police and fire services, Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise, and Regional Transport Partnerships.
Government therefore expects CPPs to drive public service reform effectively at local level. This is needed to achieve an overarching purpose of sustainable economic growth, better outcomes and reduced inequalities for local communities in Scotland through delivery of high quality public services.

37. The measures in the Bill seek to support this ambition by putting CPPs on a statutory basis with defined roles and responsibilities, and placing new duties on public sector partners to play a full and active role in community planning and the resourcing and delivery of local priority outcomes. In doing so they complement and reinforce the significant national and local action that is already underway to strengthen community planning. For example, CPPs have developed and are delivering new Single Outcome Agreements, which are their strategic plans for improving local outcomes (the equivalent of local outcome improvement plans as described in the Bill). These should provide a clear “plan for place”, focused on prevention and reducing inequalities. The Accounts Commission and Auditor General have led the introduction of new external audits which provide assurance for the performance of CPPs and help them to deliver better outcomes. A National Community Planning Group has been established to provide political and strategic leadership and guidance. And, the Scottish Government and Economic and Social Research Council are investing £3 million in What Works Scotland, an independent centre which will support effective practice, for communities and CPPs, by evaluating evidence from emerging approaches to public service delivery and reform.

38. The consultation paper sought views on what changes to legislation would help to improve community planning. There was general support for the direction of change. Many constructive comments were made which have shaped the provisions in the Bill and will continue to be taken into account in providing guidance.

39. As outlined above, the 2003 Act frames community planning as a process by which the planning and provision of public services in an area takes place. The Bill amends this legislative basis so that community planning is the process by which public bodies work together and with community bodies to plan for, resource and provide services which improve local outcomes in the local authority area. This clearly sets out how the Scottish Government intends community planning to operate, and the presence of communities in the core of the process.

40. The Bill requires the community planning partners to come together in each local authority area to form a CPP. The role of a CPP is to prepare a plan for improving local outcomes, in consultation with community bodies and others. These outcomes are to be consistent with the national outcomes determined by the Scottish Ministers under Part 1 of the Bill. The CPP must publish the plan, monitor progress being made and report annually on progress.

41. The Bill also extends the list of key partners to include a wider range of public bodies that may have a role in influencing local outcomes, including Scottish Natural Heritage, Skills Development Scotland, and the new integration joint boards formed under the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014. Individual partners have a duty to work collaboratively and to take into account the plan for local outcomes when setting their individual priorities. These partners are also expected to commit resources to delivery of the plan and report to the CPP on their contribution.
42. The 2003 Act provides that local authorities should maintain and facilitate the community planning process. The predominant view of responses to the second consultation was that it is important the CPP should not be perceived as an extension of the local authority, and that a more robust accountability framework is needed for CPPs. The Bill therefore places additional duties on a defined set of public sector partner bodies (including local authorities, NHS bodies and Police Scotland) to ensure that the CPP carries out its functions efficiently and effectively, and its partners work collaboratively.

Alternative approaches

43. As noted above, a range of significant national and local action is currently underway to strengthen community planning. Nevertheless, the Scottish Government and COSLA agreed that, to give full effect to the Statement of Ambition, it would be necessary to place formal requirements on CPPs to plan for outcomes in their SOA and ensure that appropriate action is taken to collaborate in the delivery of local priority outcomes. They also agreed that partner bodies should be under a duty to work together to improve outcomes for local communities through participation in CPPs and the provision of resources to deliver the SOA. These proposals require changes to the existing legislation, in particular so that duties can be placed on CPPs rather than only on the partners, to place the focus on the delivery of improved outcomes rather than on process, and to update the duties on partners. No alternative approaches could achieve this.

Part 3: Participation requests

44. The Christie Commission recommended that this Bill should seek to strengthen communities’ voices in shaping the services which affect them. Evidence shows that involving people more regularly and more effectively in the decisions that affect them leads to better outcomes, making the most of the knowledge and talent that lies in communities. It also increases confidence and fosters more positive relationships between communities and the public sector.

45. There is a strong history of the public sector engaging with communities across Scotland. In particular, local authorities have used a variety of engagement methods over the years and have promoted the use of tools like the National Standards for Community Engagement (Communities Scotland, 2005 – now available, with support materials, from the Scottish Community Development Centre). The Scottish Government sets clear expectations that all public sector organisations must engage with communities and support their participation in setting priorities and in the design and delivery of services. The provisions in Part 3 of the Bill are not intended to replace that activity, but they give community bodies an additional power to initiate that dialogue on their own terms, and a right to have their views properly considered.

46. A concern of respondents to the consultations, from all sectors, was how to ensure community bodies are open, inclusive, and truly represent their communities. Section 14 identifies the key features of a body which meets these requirements, ensuring that it is open to all members of the community and controlled by those members. It is for the body to define the community it represents, whether that is by geographical boundaries or by common interests or characteristics of its members.

16 http://www.scdc.org.uk/what/national-standards/

47. Where an appropriate community body, or a group of bodies, believes it could help to improve the outcome of a service, it will be able to make a request to the public body or bodies that deliver that service, asking to take part in a process to improve that outcome. The community body will need to explain what experience it has of the service and how it could contribute to its improvement; this could be as simple as showing that its members are users of the service and outlining their ideas. The public body must agree to the request for dialogue unless there are reasonable grounds for refusal. If it refuses the request, it must explain the reasons. At the end of the process the public body must publish a report on whether the outcomes were improved and how the community body contributed to that improvement.

48. Community bodies might use these provisions to discuss with service providers how they could better meet the needs of users, to offer volunteers to support a service, or even to propose that they take on the delivery of a service themselves. It will be for the public body to decide whether to make any changes to existing service delivery arrangements. If the community body proposes to deliver services itself, the public body will need to decide whether the community body has an appropriate corporate structure and the capacity to take on that role.

49. The public body does not need to set up a separate outcome improvement process for each community body that makes a request. If it has a number of requests relating to the same service, or already has a participation process in place, it may invite other community bodies to join in the existing process. Community bodies may also choose to come together to make a request jointly.

Alternative approaches

50. As noted in the Consultation section, the Scottish Government sought views on a range of approaches which could potentially widen participation and contribute to empowering communities. The Bill builds on the consultation responses and provides an enabling legislative framework to support community participation in setting priorities and in the design and delivery of local services. The Bill will work alongside actions being taken by other means, as described in the Background and Consultation sections.

51. The first consultation showed significant support for a right for communities to challenge service provision if they were not satisfied. Such a right can only be implemented through legislation, therefore non-legislative approaches were not considered. This right complements community engagement and participation activities which are taken forward on the basis of guidance, as described in paragraph 45 above.

52. An alternative approach which might have been taken in legislation is that of the “Community Right to Challenge” contained in the Localism Act 2011 which affects England and Wales. That right enables a community body to require a local authority to put a service out to tender, at which point the community body may bid to run the service. Responses to the Scottish Government’s consultation considered that model did not necessarily give the community body any new influence over the service, and could result in the tender being awarded to a commercial provider who was less responsive to community needs. In the second consultation on the draft
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Bill, respondents were generally in favour of the outcome improvement process approach. A range of comments were provided which are either addressed in the Bill or will be addressed in guidance.

Parts 4 and 5: Community control of land and buildings

53. In many cases, the key to effective community led action may be ownership or control of land or buildings. This can be about protecting or enhancing local facilities, creating new spaces and new uses, generating income for community activity or providing alternative stewardship for heritage and environmental assets. It can increase community confidence and cohesion, allowing communities to realise their aspirations and control their destinies. Whether it is retaining the local shop, renovating a derelict site or providing a hub for community activities, control of assets can be a key factor in making a community more attractive to live in, supporting economic regeneration and sustainable development.

54. The community right to buy, introduced by Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (the 2003 Act), came into effect in June 2004. Alongside this legislation, the Scottish Government and other bodies have put in place a range of funding and advice to help communities take control of assets which will help them achieve economic, social and environmental benefits. Some of this support is targeted to particular areas while other projects work throughout Scotland. Support includes, for example, the Scottish Land Fund, worth £9 million over 2012-16, the BIG Lottery Fund’s Growing Community Assets programme, and advice available from Highlands and Islands Enterprise and the Community Ownership Support Service provided by the Development Trusts Association Scotland. There is also a flourishing network of community bodies ready to offer their experience and encouragement to others seeking to take on assets.

55. In the past 20 years, nearly half a million acres of land have transferred into community ownership, either through the community right to buy or by negotiation. The Scottish Government has set a target of increasing this to one million acres by 2020.

Part 4: Community Right to Buy

56. The Bill makes amendments to the community right to buy provided for under Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”). These changes build on the experience gained over 10 years of working with the legislation, extensive post-legislative scrutiny of the 2003 Act, the submissions made to the Land Reform Review Group and the interim views of that Group.

57. The Bill also inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act which provides a framework for community bodies representing communities across Scotland to purchase abandoned or neglected land without a willing seller, in order to further the achievement of sustainable development of land.

Extension of community right to buy to the whole of Scotland

58. Under Part 2 of the 2003 Act, the Scottish Ministers can define what is “registrable land” and “excluded land” for the purposes of the Act. “Registrable land” must be land that appears to Ministers to be rural. To meet that requirement, “excluded land” has been defined, in the Community Right to Buy (Definition of Excluded Land) (Scotland) Order 2009, by reference to settlements of over 10,000 population. Only land outwith those settlements is currently covered by the community right to buy regime.

59. While there can be particular issues in relation to the ownership and use of land in rural areas, existing community activity has demonstrated that there is also substantial public benefit to be gained from community ownership of land and buildings in urban areas. The same issues of community confidence and cohesion, sustainability and improvements to the built and natural environment apply wherever communities are empowered to take control of assets. In the consultation, 93% of those who responded to the question supported the extension of the community right to buy to urban areas. A key reason given was to provide people living in urban areas with the same rights as those in rural areas.

60. Section 27 of the Bill therefore repeals the wording in the 2003 Act relating to the definition of “registrable land” and the power of the Scottish Ministers to define “excluded land”. The effect of this will be that the community right to buy will apply throughout Scotland.

Changes to procedures, including streamlining and increasing flexibility

61. Based on the experience of those using the legislation over the first decade of the community right to buy, the Bill makes a number of changes to the detailed procedures and requirements of the process under Part 2 of the 2003 Act. These changes will help to give communities greater flexibility in how they use aspects of the provisions (such as the way they define their “community” and broadening the scope of legal entities that can use them), allow communities to focus on the development of their plans and to clarify them. It will allow communities to use the legislation in circumstances where they could not do so before. The streamlined provisions will also strengthen and clarify aspects of the legislation and improve administration of the provisions for all parties using them. The provisions will help to bring more land into community ownership, while continuing to strike a fair balance between the rights of communities and landowners.

62. There was substantial support for the changes which were set out in the consultation. In many cases over 80% of those who responded to each question agreed with the proposal. A number of other changes have been made which were not consulted on, but which address issues experienced by parties using the provisions.

63. The amendments made by sections 28 to 47 of the Bill include:

- Making it easier for communities to define their “community” in a greater variety of ways, not just by postcode;
- Extending the legal entities that can use the community right to buy provisions to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs), and allowing for other legal entities to be added by subordinate legislation;
- In relation to the ballot required after the right to buy has been triggered, providing for the Scottish Ministers to arrange for this to be conducted by an independent third party, and for Ministers to meet the cost of this, making the community right to buy process easier for community bodies;

- Extending the period available to complete the right to buy;
- Replacing the “good reasons” test for “late” applications with one which sets out clear requirements to be met by community bodies when submitting a “late” application;
- Making the valuation process more robust by allowing for counter-representations between the landowner and the community body;
- Giving Ministers discretion to allow them to recover the cost of the independent valuation from the landowner where the landowner has withdrawn the land from sale after the valuer has been appointed, thus deterring landowners from allowing the process to proceed where the land is not genuinely being offered for sale.

“Compulsory” community right to buy for abandoned and neglected land

64. While the existing community right to buy under Part 2 of the 2003 Act allows a community to register an interest in land at any time, it can only buy the land if the owner decides to sell: it requires a willing seller.

65. Land that is neglected or abandoned can be a barrier to the sustainable development of land. In some cases it may prevent the community from developing or improving facilities. There are also cases where derelict or neglected sites become a blight on the surrounding area, and the community could bring the land back into productive use. The Scottish Government considers that in such circumstances, where all other options fail to achieve improvement, communities should be able to acquire the land without having to wait for it to be put on the market. Section 48 inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act providing for community bodies to acquire land in certain circumstances, without a willing seller. Where Ministers approve the community’s application, the owner will be required to transfer the land to the community body, which will be required to pay market value for the land.

66. In consultation, 83% of those who responded to the question on whether there should be a compulsory power for communities to buy neglected or abandoned land in certain circumstances supported this proposal. However, there was a clear difference between sectors. In particular, many local government respondents felt that such complex issues could be better resolved by powers vested in local authorities.

67. The Scottish Government considers that there is a general public interest in removing barriers to sustainable development of land by enabling community bodies to purchase neglected and abandoned land. Before approving an application Ministers will have to be satisfied, amongst other things, that it is in the public interest for the right to buy to be exercised in that case, that the right to buy is compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land and that the continued ownership of the land by the owner is inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land.

68. Section 97C of the new Part 3A provides that land is eligible to be bought under that Part if in the opinion of Ministers it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. In making that decision, Ministers must have regard to matters that will be prescribed in secondary legislation.
These will be subject to further consultation. However, it is suggested that the matters to be considered could include: the physical condition of the land or building; its current use (or non-use); any detrimental economic or environmental impact on the local area; and any failure by the landowner to comply with regulatory requirements. Ministers would also need to consider any environmental, planning or historic designations affecting the land or buildings, for example if there are any restrictions on its use or development relating to conservation purposes.

69. Section 97C also sets out land that is not eligible land and so Part 3A will not apply to it.
This includes land which is eligible for the crofting community right to buy under Part 3 of the 2003 Act and certain land on which a person’s home is situated. Other types of land may be excluded by subordinate legislation.

70. In terms of procedure, the crofting community right to buy in Part 3 of the 2003 Act already provides a right to buy without a willing seller for crofting communities wishing to buy their croft land. The procedure for Part 3A is based on the procedure in Part 3 of the 2003 Act.
This includes a requirement for Ministers to invite the owner and others affected by the application to give their views on the application. Ministers must have regard to any views submitted in making their decisions. The procedure also makes provision for valuation of the land, for payment by the community body of the market value of the land, for the payment of compensation in certain circumstances, and for appeals against the Minister’s decision or against the valuation.

Alternative approaches

71. Consultation clearly showed support for extending the community right to buy to all of Scotland, and for a compulsory community right to buy in appropriate circumstances. These proposals can only be addressed through legislation.

72. Some stakeholders have proposed broader rights for the community purchase of land without a willing seller. The Scottish Government considers that the approach taken in the Bill is appropriate in order to further the achievement of sustainable development of the land.

73. There was also a desire to address promptly a range of improvements which have been suggested to the procedures for community right to buy under Part 2 of the 2003 Act. Given these are statutory procedures, legislation is required to amend them. An overall review of the system was carried out to determine whether it continued to be fit for purpose, in the light of ten years’ experience. This concluded that fundamental change was not required, and helped to identify or confirm those areas where adjustments would be helpful.

Part 5: Asset Transfer Requests

74. The public sector owns a wide range of land and buildings throughout Scotland, ranging from forests to schools, hospitals to waterworks. Many communities may wish to take control of assets in their area, enabling them to address local needs and deliver community benefit. In many cases this will also contribute to achieving the outcomes set by public sector bodies, and can lead to reduced demand for public services.
It is always important for community bodies to consider what assets would be appropriate for their needs and what form of control is best for them. The focus should not be just on buildings or land that a public authority is closing or has deemed to be “surplus”, but on what the community seeks to achieve and what property would help them achieve that. Similarly, ownership is not always the best answer; leasing, or managing a site on behalf of the owner, may be a better solution which allows for a division of responsibilities and costs. This may also be a stepping-stone to ownership in the future.

An increasing number of public authorities have established asset transfer schemes and are working with communities as part of their wider asset management strategies. This is a welcome development. The Bill goes further, giving the initiative to communities to identify property they are interested in, and placing a duty on public authorities to agree to the request unless they can show reasonable grounds for refusal.

Community bodies will be able to approach public authorities for detailed information about a property they are interested in, before making a formal request. Details of what information is to be provided will be set out in secondary legislation. It may include, for example, information about maintenance costs and energy efficiency.

When a community body makes a request for a public sector asset, the relevant authority will be required to assess the community body’s proposals against the current use or any other proposal. The decision will be based on the economic, social and environmental benefits of different proposals, and other factors that may be relevant including the functions and purposes of the authority. The authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusal.

If a request is refused by a relevant authority other than the Scottish Ministers or a local authority, the community body may appeal to the Scottish Ministers. Local authorities, which are democratically accountable in their own right, are required to make separate arrangements for review of their decisions. Ministers may make regulations about the form those arrangements must take.

Consultation and alternative approaches

Promoting community asset transfer was a core element in original proposals for the Bill. This attracted substantial support in consultation, and the detailed provisions have been strongly informed by suggestions made by respondents.

Many local authorities, and some other parts of the public sector in Scotland, already have asset transfer schemes in place. The Scottish Government encourages this through a range of policies, and funds the Community Ownership Support Service, which provides advice and support on the process to both community groups and public sector organisations. However, there are still cases where requests for asset transfer are dismissed, or where the process is not clear or takes too long. It was therefore felt that a legislative solution was necessary to achieve consistent good practice across the public sector, rather than the alternative of continuing with further guidance and support.
82. One alternative approach which could have been taken is to limit asset transfer to land and buildings which were considered “unused or underused”, or to those which had been identified as surplus by the current owner. However, this would not meet the aim of empowering communities to identify for themselves which sites are important to them and best suit their needs.

83. Another alternative would have been to change who has the power to take decisions on asset transfer. Some respondents to the consultation suggested a new Commission, that the Scottish Ministers should have oversight of all decisions, or that community bodies should have an automatic right to purchase. The Scottish Government considers that it is most appropriate for these decisions to be taken by the current public sector owners of the land or building. Local authorities are democratically accountable for their decisions; for land owned by public bodies there is a right of appeal to the Scottish Ministers.

Part 6: Common Good Property

84. “Common good”, in Scotland, refers to certain assets which were originally acquired by former burghs, and to which title has been passed down to local authorities through successive rounds of local government re-organisation. They include both moveable items (furniture, paintings, regalia etc) and heritable ones (land and buildings), as well as cash funds which may have been derived from the use or sale of common good property. CIPFA’s guidance on Accounting for the Common Good\(^\text{17}\) provides a useful description of how common good arises.

85. Audit Scotland stated that at 31 March 2011, councils managed common good assets valued at £219 million\(^\text{18}\). While this is less than 1% of the estimated total value of council owned property assets (then valued at £35 billion), common good assets often have strong historical and emotional value to local communities, as well as being of practical use to them.

86. Due to the special status of common good, it has to be accounted for in a particular way, separate from other local authority assets, and there are special rules about its disposal. There is a long history of common law decisions clarifying whether particular items form part of the common good and how they can be used or disposed of.

87. While local authorities should already have details of their common good assets, in line with accounting good practice, this is not always readily available to the public, and there may be disputes about what is included. The aim of Part 6 of the Bill is to increase transparency about the existence, use and disposal of common good assets, and to increase community involvement in decisions taken about their identification, use and disposal. 75% of respondents to this consultation question agreed that the proposals would achieve this.

88. Part 6 places a new statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good. When establishing the register, a proposed list must be published and community councils and other community bodies must be invited to comment on it. The completed register must be made available for inspection and online.

89. Further provisions require local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community councils and other community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.

90. The Scottish Ministers may issue guidance about these duties and about the management and use of common good property, to which local authorities must have regard. Such guidance is expected to include details of the information to be included in the register and appropriate arrangements for consultation.

91. These provisions do not seek to provide a new definition of common good. Inclusion on the register, or exclusion from it, will not determine whether property is in fact common good. Given the complexity of the subject, there is a high risk that any such approach might not cover all existing assets which are considered to be common good, and might cover things which are currently excluded. Rather, the intention is to provide an opportunity for community councils, other community bodies and individuals to see what the local authority considers to be common good property, and to highlight any items they believe should be included (or omitted). It is not intended that local authorities will be expected to legally verify the status of every item on the register or proposed during the consultation; this will normally only be necessary if there is significant dispute.

92. The requirement for consultation before common good property is disposed of or its use is changed will similarly increase transparency about common good assets, and fits with the general aim of ensuring that communities are fully involved in decisions that matter to them. In relation to land and buildings, this will also be in line with good practice in asset management and asset transfer strategies.

Alternative approaches

93. There is a strong demand from stakeholders for greater transparency about common good property, and for communities to have more say in its management. One option to achieve this could have been the production of further guidance and encouragement. However, it was felt that a stronger approach was required, and therefore the Bill proposes statutory duties on local authorities to ensure transparency and consultation with communities.

Part 7: Allotments

94. In recent years interest in local food has grown, along with a desire to know where our food comes from. More and more people are interested in growing their own food. It is also increasingly recognised that gardening and working with the environment can bring a range of health and social benefits. Many community bodies include community growing among their activities, and the community right to buy and asset transfer (including lease or use) may be used to provide space for this. Another key way to provide suitable land for people to grow their own food is by the provision of allotments.
95. In 2009 the Scottish Government published its first National Food and Drink Policy – Recipe for Success. This Policy made a clear commitment to strategically support allotments and community growing spaces. To help the Scottish Government meet this end the Grow Your Own Working Group was established. One of its recommendations was to amend the legislation governing allotments, and specifically to review the duties placed on Local Authorities. The SNP Manifesto in 2011 reflected this recommendation by making a commitment to update the legislation.

96. The existing legislative framework for allotments is complex, and consultation has shown strong agreement that it needs to be updated. The principal legislation is the Allotments (Scotland) Act 1892 as amended by the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919 and the Allotment (Scotland) Acts of 1922 and 1950. In addition to the two consultations on the Bill, a separate consultation on the allotments legislation was held in April-May 2013, which has informed the detail of the provisions in the Bill. The Bill repeals the existing legislation and makes new, simplified provision. Where appropriate, this includes restatement of provisions of the old legislation.

97. Part 7 of the Bill provides a new, clear definition of an allotment and an allotment site, reflecting current usage. It places a duty on local authorities to hold and maintain waiting lists for allotments, and to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if the waiting list exceeds certain trigger points. This addresses a key concern about the level of demand for allotments and the length of time people may be on a waiting list. The Bill also prevents local authorities from disposing of or changing the use of an allotment site without the consent of the Scottish Ministers, thereby providing a level of protection to allotment sites.

98. Local authorities must publish an Annual Allotments Report and a food-growing strategy, setting out land that has been identified for allotments or other community growing in the local authority’s area and how it will meet demand. They are required to make regulations about allotments (which was previously optional). These will cover issues such as allocations, rent, maintenance, and whether tenants are allowed to keep livestock or sell surplus produce. The Bill also clarifies arrangements relating to the management of allotments and the rights of allotment tenants.

Alternative approaches

99. As set out above, the proposal for revision of the legislation on allotments arose from the recommendations of the Grow Your Own Working Group. This group set out a wide range of recommendations to support allotments and community growing spaces, requiring varying approaches to implement them. The Working Group continues to meet and is making good progress on the recommendations; further information can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Business-Industry/Food-Industry/own.

100. Amending the legislation governing allotments was identified as a specific task within the wider aim of supporting people to grow their own food. It was recognised that the existing legislation needed to be updated, simplified and clarified. Given the complex legislative framework governing allotments, creating new provisions was considered to be a more straightforward approach than seeking to amend the previous legislation. Detailed consultation has resulted in a balanced framework that places appropriate duties on local authorities, while allowing flexibility to reflect local circumstances.
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014.

Part 8: Non-domestic rates

101. Supporting businesses to flourish is a key strand in promoting resilient communities and sustainable places. One element of that is ensuring that non-domestic rates are set appropriately and reflect the needs of businesses and the local economy.

102. There is a wide range of business rate relief schemes set nationally, which benefit small businesses or those in particular sectors or geographic areas. Local authorities currently have very little scope to vary the reliefs locally. The Bill introduces a new power to allow councils to create localised relief schemes to better reflect local needs and support communities. There will be no restrictions on this power; local authorities will be able to grant the relief to any type of ratepayer or for any reason, as they see fit.

103. Any local reliefs introduced by a local authority will need to be fully funded by that authority, so it will need to balance the interests of taxpayers across its area. Local authorities will not be able to change the poundage rate or introduce local supplements.

Alternative approaches

104. This power was consulted on as part of a wider consultation on business rates reform, “Supporting Business, Promoting Growth”, carried out between November 2012 and February 2013, in which a range of options were explored for how the rating system can help stimulate sustainable economic growth and how to improve transparency and streamline the operation of the rating system, including the appeals process. The option of allowing local authorities flexibility to introduce and fund relief schemes to reflect local circumstances and priorities received strong support, which has been echoed in ongoing stakeholder engagement since.

105. Legislation is the only way of implementing this new power. Given the level of support for this option, the alternative of doing nothing was rejected.

EFFECTS ON EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES, HUMAN RIGHTS, ISLAND COMMUNITIES, LOCAL GOVERNMENT, SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT ETC.

Equal Opportunities

106. An Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) has been carried out and will be published shortly on the Scottish Government website at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/Recent.

107. The EQIA concludes that the Bill’s provisions are neither directly or indirectly discriminatory on the basis of age, disability, race, religion or belief, sex, sexual orientation or gender reassignment.

108. The provisions of the Bill are largely enabling, giving powers and duties to the Scottish Ministers, local authorities and public bodies to make decisions that meet local needs, either in response to community proposals or demand, or resulting from engagement and consultation with the community. All these bodies are subject to the public sector equality duty under the Equality Act 2010. In making decisions under the provisions of the Bill they will need to have that equality duty in mind. In response to suggestions from stakeholders, this has been included as an issue which public authorities are explicitly required to consider when making decisions on asset transfer requests or participation requests. It may also be appropriate for public authorities to carry out an EQIA when developing policies in relation to the provisions of the Bill, for example on provision of allotments or asset transfer.

Human Rights

109. The Scottish Government is satisfied that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights.

Amendments to Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (sections 27 to 47)

110. The Scottish Government acknowledges that the community right to buy provided for by Part 2 of the 2003 Act engages Article 1 of Protocol 1 as it constitutes a “control of use” of property. The rights under Article 1 of Protocol 1 are not absolute and the use of property can be controlled where it is in accordance with law, justified in the public interest and is proportionate.

111. The extension of the community right to buy to urban areas provided for by section 27 will engage Article 1 of Protocol 1 as it extends the “control of use” to urban land. However, this can be justified by reference to the public interest, as the benefits of community ownership have been shown to apply to urban as well as rural land. The process which is provided for in Part 2 strikes a fair balance between the public interest in community ownership and the rights of the landowner. The amendments made by sections 28 to 47 to Part 2 do not interfere with this balance and we therefore consider them to be compliant with Article 1 of Protocol 1.

112. Article 6 provides a right to a fair hearing. It applies to proceedings which constitute a determination of civil rights and obligations of the parties to the proceedings and any criminal charges. Part 2 of the 2003 Act provides sufficient safeguards and procedures to protect the Article 6 rights of the individual. The amendments made by sections 28 to 47 to Part 2 provide safeguards where appropriate.

Abandoned and neglected land (section 48)

113. The Scottish Government acknowledges that the ability of a community body to purchase land without the agreement of the owner of that land, provided for by section 48, will engage Article 1 of Protocol 1 as this will constitute a deprivation of property. However, the rights under Article 1 of Protocol 1 are not absolute and may be interfered with if this can be justified in the public interest, is proportionate and is in accordance with the law. Section 48 does not deprive any person of property but provides a process whereby Ministers may consent to an application by a community body which would result in a land owner being required to transfer land to the community body. Section 48 makes provisions pursuing the legitimate aim of sustainable development of land, and the process provided for this right to buy pursues this aim proportionally and strikes a fair balance between the general community interest and the protection of land owners’ fundamental rights. The provisions are, therefore, either compatible with Article 1 of Protocol 1 or capable of being exercised in a manner that is so compatible.
114. Article 6 concerns the right to a fair hearing. This provides that in the determination of a person’s civil rights and obligations, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Section 48 provides for adequate and appropriate rights of appeal in relation to the community right to buy neglected and abandoned land.

Allotments (Part 7)

115. The Scottish Government acknowledges that certain provisions within Part 7 of the Bill engage Article 1 of Protocol 1. In particular, the power of local authorities to remove unauthorised buildings and structures from allotments and allotment sites at section 80 amounts to a deprivation of property. However the rights under Article 1 of Protocol 1 are not absolute and may be interfered with if such interference is justified in the public interest, proportionate and in accordance with law. Section 80 does not of itself deprive any person of property. It provides a process for local authorities to follow where a building or structure contravenes regulations, including notice to the tenant and an opportunity to be heard, the removal of the property being the final step in the process where resolution is not reached. This interference can be justified in the public interest in keeping land available for community growing, including allotments. It strikes a fair balance between this public interest and the rights of tenants. The Scottish Government therefore considers this provision to be compatible with Article 1 of Protocol 1.

116. Article 6 provides that in the determination of a person’s civil rights and obligations, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Section 80 provides adequate and appropriate rights of appeal against any decision of a local authority to remove a building or structure.

117. Sections 83 and 84, providing for termination of a tenant’s lease of an allotment and resumption of land by local authorities, and section 90, providing for compensation for deterioration of allotments payable by a tenant, also engage Article 1 of Protocol 1 as deprivation of property. However, these can also be justified in the public interest and the provisions strike a fair balance between the rights of the tenant and the public interest. The Scottish Government considers these provisions to be compatible with Article 1 of Protocol 1. The provisions also provide sufficient safeguards and procedures to protect the Article 6 rights of the individual. Sections 89 and 91, which provide for compensation to allotment tenants in certain circumstances, also engage Article 6 and those provisions also provide sufficient safeguards and procedures to protect Article 6 rights.

118. Section 73 provides that local authorities must make regulations about the running of allotment sites in its area. This engages Article 1 of Protocol 1 as it will constitute a control of use of property. However, this is justified in the public interest in making land available for community growing, including allotments. The process set out in section 73 for making regulations strikes a fair balance between this public interest and tenants’ rights. Section 73 provides sufficient safeguards and procedures to protect the Article 6 rights of the individual.
Island Communities

119. The Bill will apply to all communities across Scotland, including island communities. No differential impact on island communities is anticipated for the majority of the Bill provisions.

120. Some responses to the consultation highlighted that there can be a shortage of land available to local authorities for allotments in crofting areas, which include the three Islands authorities. A possible solution, suggested by one of those authorities, is for local authorities to work with other landowners and public service providers to discuss the possibility of allotment provision on their land.

Local Government

121. The Bill will directly impact on local authorities in carrying out their functions, and particularly in the planning, design and delivery of services. These impacts are set out in this Policy Memorandum and the other Accompanying Documents to the Bill.

122. The Bill has been developed in partnership with COSLA. A Reference Group on the Bill is co-chaired by the Minister for Local Government and Planning and Councillor Harry McGuigan, COSLA spokesperson on Community Wellbeing. COSLA also co-ordinated the arrangement of consultation events for local government officials and representatives during both consultations on the Bill. 36 local government bodies responded formally to the consultation on the Bill proposals.

Sustainable Development

123. A pre-screening report on the environmental impact of the Bill has been completed. This confirmed that the Bill will have minimal or no impact on the environment and, as such, is exempt for the purposes of section 7 of the Environmental Assessment (Scotland) Act 2005.

124. Individual proposals brought forward under the provisions of the Bill may have an impact on the environment. Whether proposals promote or improve “environmental wellbeing” is an issue which relevant authorities must consider in taking decisions on asset transfer or participation requests. When the Scottish Ministers consider an application for a right to buy under Part 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 they must be satisfied that that approval is necessary for the sustainable development of the land. Where public authorities bring forward plans of their own they must consider whether a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required for those plans.
COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE

1. This memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, in relation to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. It describes the purpose of each of the subordinate legislation provisions in the Bill and outlines the reasons for seeking the proposed powers. This memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

2. The contents of this Memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Scottish Parliament.

Outline of Bill provisions

3. The Bill reflects the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a framework which will:
   • Empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and
   • Support an increase in the pace and scale of Public Service Reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.

4. The Bill comprises 9 Parts with 5 Schedules:
   • Part 1 places a duty on Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which builds on the Government’s internationally acclaimed “Scotland Performs” framework.
   • Part 2 places community planning partnerships on a statutory footing and imposes duties on them around the planning and delivery of local outcomes. Schedule 1 lists the bodies which are to be community planning partners. This Part replaces provision in Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, which is repealed by Schedule 5.
   • Part 3 provides a mechanism for communities to have a more proactive role in having their voices heard in how services are planned and delivered. Schedule 2 lists “public service authorities” to whom participation requests can be made.
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

- Part 4 amends Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, extending the community right to buy to all of Scotland, and introduces a new Part 3A to the 2003 Act to make provision for community bodies to purchase neglected and abandoned land where the owner is not willing to sell that land.

- Part 5 provides community bodies a right to request to purchase, lease, manage or use land and buildings belonging to local authorities, Scottish public bodies or Scottish Ministers. The list of “relevant authorities” affected is given in Schedule 3.

- Part 6 places a statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good. It also requires local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.

- Part 7 updates and simplifies legislation on allotments. It requires local authorities to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if waiting lists exceed certain trigger points and ensures appropriate protection for local authorities and plotholders. This replaces the provisions of the Allotments (Scotland) Acts 1892, 1922 and 1950, which are repealed in their entirety by Schedule 5, and some provisions of the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919.

- Part 8 provides for a new power which will allow councils to create and fund their own localised business rate relief schemes to better reflect local needs and support communities. It does this by inserting a new section into the Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962.

- Part 9 makes general provisions in relation to the Bill, including provision about subordinate legislation, ancillary provision and commencement. Schedule 4 makes minor and consequential amendments to other legislation, and Schedule 5 provides for repeals.

Rationale for subordinate legislation

5. In deciding whether provision should be set out in subordinate legislation rather than on the face of the Bill, the Scottish Government has considered the need to:

- Strike the right balance between the importance of the issue and providing sufficient flexibility to respond to changing circumstances without the need for primary legislation;

- Anticipate the unexpected, which might otherwise frustrate the purpose of the provision in primary legislation approved by the Parliament;

- Make proper use of valuable parliamentary time;

- Allow detailed administrative arrangements to be kept up to date within the basic structures set out in the Bill; and

- Take account of the likely frequency of amendment.

6. The relevant provisions are described in detail below. For each provision, the memorandum sets out:
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

- The person upon whom the power to make subordinate legislation is conferred and the form in which the power is to be exercised;
- Why it is considered appropriate to delegate the power to subordinate legislation and the purpose of each such provision; and
- The parliamentary procedure to which the exercise of the power to make subordinate legislation is to be subject, if any.

Delegated powers

Part 2 – Community Planning

Section 4(5) – Power to modify schedule 1 community planning partners

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

7. Section 4 defines “community planning”, “community planning partners” and “community planning partnerships”. Community planning is planning that is carried out in the area of a local authority so that public services improve the achievement of local outcomes. Schedule 1 lists the bodies who are community planning partners.

8. Subsection (5) enables the Scottish Ministers to amend the list of community planning partners in schedule 1 by regulation. Subsection (6) further states that the regulations may provide that a community planning partner may participate in community planning for a specific purpose, where participation is required in relation to some of that partner’s responsibilities but not others.

Reason for taking power

9. Schedule 1 contains a list of bodies who are partners in the community planning partnership and includes a wide range of public bodies that may have a role in influencing local outcomes. The power in subsection (5) is to provide flexibility in future should changes be required to the list of bodies in schedule 1. As the bodies listed in schedule 1 have a range of functions and duties it may be necessary to be more specific about the purpose for which a community planning partner is to be involved in community planning so as to provide any necessary clarity as to their role, which is the reason for the power in subsection (6).

Reason for choice of procedure

10. It is not considered that the inclusion or removal of particular bodies in the list of community planning partners is sufficiently significant to merit affirmative procedure. Negative procedure will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the purpose of the regulations on the other.
Section 8(3) – Power to modify list of community planning partners with a governance role

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision
11. Section 8 places governance responsibilities on specified community planning partners for the purpose of achieving effective community planning. The partners specified in subsection (2) must facilitate community planning and take reasonable steps to ensure that the partnership operates efficiently and effectively.

12. Subsection (3) enables Ministers to modify by regulation the list of community planning partners set out in subsection (2) to whom the governance duties apply, either by adding a new partner, removing a partner or amending an entry.

Reason for taking power
13. The community planning partners set out in subsection (2) are those most directly involved in community planning and they therefore have a critical role to play in ensuring that the process runs as efficiently and effectively as possible. The power in subsection (3) is to provide flexibility in future should changes be required to the list of bodies in subsection (2).

Reason for choice of procedure
14. The power relates to making changes that may be required as the nature and practice of community planning evolves and the provisions of this part of the Bill take effect. It is not considered that the placing governance responsibilities on bodies which are community planning partners is sufficiently significant to merit affirmative procedure. Negative procedure will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the purpose of the regulations on the other.

Section 12(1) – Power to establish a body corporate for community planning purposes

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision
15. Section 12 of the Bill replaces the provisions of section 19 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 and gives the Scottish Ministers a power to establish corporate bodies to co-ordinate community planning and to say what their constitution and functions are. As a body corporate, a community planning partnership could, for example, hold its own budgets and assets and employ its own staff.
16. Subsection (1) allows the Scottish Ministers to establish such a body corporate by regulations, following an application made by a local authority and at least one other community planning partner in the area.

17. Further detail is provided in subsections (2) to (4), including the information to be included in the application and the type of provision which the regulations made under subsection (1) may include. Subsection (4) provides that a corporate body established under subsection (1) may discharge a function, even where another enactment specifies that as the function of another body or prevents the carrying out of that function by the new corporate body.

Reason for taking power

18. The power is required to retain the option of establishing corporate bodies as was provided under section 19 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. With Community Planning Partnerships now having a statutory basis, it is considered appropriate to translate these powers to the Bill. The Scottish Government does not want to limit the options that are available to community planning partners should the need arise in the future.

Reason for choice of procedure

19. The Scottish Government considers affirmative procedure is appropriate as the establishment of a corporate body can be a significant step and may include functions about community planning that override another enactment or rule of law.

Section 12(2)(d) – Power to prescribe other matters to be addressed in an application for incorporation

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>Negative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

20. As stated above, section 12 of the Bill replaces section 19 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 and gives the Scottish Ministers a power to establish corporate bodies with community planning functions.

21. Subsection (2) provides that an application to establish a corporate body must include certain information, including information on consultation undertaken, representations received and the proposed functions of the body. Subsection (2)(d) provides a power to make regulations setting out other matters that the Scottish Ministers may want to be included in an application.

Reason for taking power

22. The power allows flexibility when developing the detail of the content of the application to establish a corporate body. It is be important that the application contains all the relevant information that the Scottish Ministers require. Subsection (2)(a) to (c) requires that certain information be provided but as the detail of what should go in the application is developed it may be appropriate to require additional information. Provision regarding additional information is likely to be fairly detailed. Further, from time to time in the light of practical experience the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the additional information that an application is to contain.

Reason for choice of procedure

23. The question of what additional information should be contained in an application is an administrative matter. It is therefore considered appropriate that regulations made under subsection (2)(d) should be subject to negative procedure, which will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the content of the regulations on the other.

Part 3 – Participation Requests

Section 15(2)(a) – Designation of a community participation body

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Order</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>Negative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

24. Section 15 defines a “community participation body”, which is the type of body which can make a participation request under section 17 to participate in an outcome improvement process. A community participation body may be a community-controlled body, a community council or a body, or a body of a class of bodies, designated by the Scottish Ministers.

25. Subsection (2)(a) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order designate individual bodies as community participation bodies.

Reason for taking power

26. Community bodies come in many different forms. The intention of the policy is that as wide a range of community bodies as possible should be able to act as a community participation body and make a request to a public service authority to participate in an outcome improvement process. It is important that community participation bodies are open, inclusive and represent their community, and in most cases this should be demonstrated by meeting the criteria for a community-controlled body. However, there may be bodies which are established in a different way, especially those established before current approaches became standard, which Ministers still consider should be able to act as community participation bodies. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate additional community bodies for this purpose. Further, it will allow the Scottish Ministers to de-designate bodies if needed, for example, if the body has disbanded or are no longer in existence for whatever reason.

Reason for choice of procedure

27. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate. The power will allow particular bodies of bodies to be a community-controlled body for the purposes of the Act. The nature of the power is that it may involve the addition, from time to time, of individual bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure.

Section 15(2)(b) – Designation of a class of bodies as community participation bodies

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

28. As stated above, section 15 defines a “community participation body”, which is the type of body which can make a participation request under section 17, and it may be a community-controlled body, a community council or a body, or body of a class of bodies, designated by the Scottish Ministers.

29. Subsection (2)(b) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order designate a whole class of bodies so that any body of that type will qualify as a community participation body.

Reason for taking power

30. As detailed above under section 15(2)(a), the intention of the policy is that as wide a range of community bodies as possible should be able to act as a community participation body and make a request to a public service authority to participate in an outcome improvement process, provided that they are open, inclusive and representative. If it appears that the characteristics of a type of body meet those requirements, the power will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate that class of bodies as community participation bodies for this purpose. Further, it will allow the Scottish Ministers to de-designate that class of bodies if needed.

Reason for choice of procedure

31. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate. The nature of the power is that it may involve the addition, from time to time, of classes of bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure.

Section 16(2) – Power to modify schedule 2 public service authorities

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

32. Schedule 2, introduced by section 16, lists public service authorities to which a participation request can be made. This includes local authorities, the Scottish Ministers, Health Boards, and other Scottish public bodies. The public bodies selected are involved in providing or supporting local services.
33. Subsection (2) enables the Scottish Ministers to remove or amend an entry on the list of public service authorities in schedule 2 by order.

Reason for taking power

34. Schedule 2 provides a list of public bodies to which a participation request can be made. The bodies listed in schedule 2 may change over time and the power in subsection (2) is to provide flexibility in future should changes be required, either by removing the body from the list or making any necessary amendments to an entry.

Reason for choice of procedure

35. The power relates to modifications that may be required based on future changes to the bodies listed in schedule 2. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used. The power enables modifications, from time to time, of individual bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure and that negative procedure provides the appropriate balance required between scrutiny and the use of parliamentary resource.

Section 16(3)(a) – Power to designate a public service authority

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

36. In addition to the bodies listed in schedule 2, participation requests can also be made by a person that is designated as a public service authority or that falls within a class of persons designated as public service authorities.

37. Subsection (3) allows the Scottish Ministers to designate a public service authority by order. Subsections (4) to (9) provide more detail on who may be designated as a public service authority and also provide that in making an order the Scottish Ministers may exclude some services from being subject to participation requests.

Reason for taking power

38. The public bodies listed in schedule 2 are involved in providing or supporting local services. Once participation requests are in operation and their use and impact have been determined it may be appropriate to designate other public bodies that provide or support local services as a public service authority. Further, should new public bodies that provide or support local services be created in future it may be considered appropriate to designate the public body as a public service authority.

Reason for choice of procedure

39. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate. The power allows a particular body to be a public service authority to which a participation request can be made. This may involve the addition, from time to time, of individual bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used to provide the balance required between scrutiny and the use of parliamentary resource.
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Section 16(3)(b) – Power to designate a class of public service authorities

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

40. In addition to the bodies listed in schedule 2 and to persons designated as public service authorities under section 16(3)(a) participation requests can also be made by a person that falls within a class of persons designated as public service authorities.

41. Subsection (3)(b) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order designate a class of persons so that any person of that class will qualify as a public service authority. Subsections (4) to (7) provide more detail on who may be designated as a public service authority.

Reason for taking power

42. As detailed above under section 16(3)(a), it may be appropriate to designate other persons that provide or support local services as a public service authority. In addition, it may be that a person of a class of body should be treated as a public service authority, and section 16(3)(b) will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate that class of persons for this purpose.

Reason for choice of procedure

43. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate. The nature of the power is that it may involve the addition, from time to time, of classes of bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used to provide the balance required between scrutiny and the use of parliamentary resource.

Section 18(1) – Power to make further provision regarding participation requests

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

44. Section 18(1) gives the Scottish Ministers a power to make regulations with provision about participation requests in addition to that contained in section 17. Subsection (2) provides that the regulations can, in particular, cover how requests are to be made, how public service authorities should deal with them, and which information is to be provided in connection with requests (in addition to the information required under section 17(2)).
Reason for taking power

45. Under section 17(1) participation requests allow a community participation body to make a request to a public service authority to permit the body to participate in an outcome improvement process, which is a process established by the authority with a view to improving an outcome that results from, or is contributed to by virtue of, the provision of a public service. Section 17(2) describes the information which must accompany the request.

46. The Scottish Government considers that section 18(1) is necessary to require that further information is provided and to make provision on the procedure for making requests and for handling them.

Reason for choice of procedure

47. Any further provision that is required regarding participation requests and the process and procedure to be used is a largely administrative matter. The regulations may also need to change over time to reflect practical experience in the use of participation requests. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 19(7)(a) – Power to prescribe a time for a decision notice to be given

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>Negative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

48. Section 19 provides that a public service authority must decide whether to agree to or refuse any participation request it receives and sets out the matters which must be taken into consideration. Subsection (6) requires the authority to give notice of its decision to the community participation body before the end of the period mentioned in subsection (7) and if it refuses the request, it must give reasons for that refusal.

49. Under subsection (7) the period referred to in subsection (6) is either a period prescribed in regulations under subsection (7)(a) or such longer period as may be agreed between the authority and the community participation body.

Reason for taking power

50. The Bill provides the legislative framework around which decisions on participation requests will be made and following enactment of the Bill the Scottish Government will consult on what is a reasonable time period for a decision to be made by public service authorities.

Reason for choice of procedure

51. The period of time for a public service authority to respond to a participation request is an administrative matter and will be informed by a short and focussed consultation. It is also possible that the time period may change in future. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 19(8) – Power to make provisions regarding the information contained in a decision notice and the manner in which it is to be given

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

52. Section 20 describes the information which must go in a decision notice when a public service authority decides to agree to a participation request.

53. Section 19(8) allows the Scottish Ministers to set out in regulations other information that a decision notice is to contain and also the manner in which a decision notice is to be given.

Reason for taking power

54. The power allows flexibility when developing the detail of the decision notice procedure. It will be important that the decision notice will contain relevant information, and that it is given in an appropriate manner which is accessible to members of the community participation body. Section 20 provides for a certain amount of information to be provided about the outcome improvement process, when a participation request is successful. However, as the detail of the decision notice procedure is developed it may be considered appropriate to include other information. Further, from time to time in the light of practical experience and other developments the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the information that a decision notice is to contain and also the manner in which a decision notice is to be given.

Reason for choice of procedure

55. The information that a decision notice is to contain and the manner in which a decision notice is to be given are administrative matters. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 21(6) – Power to specify information to be published about the outcome improvement process

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

56. Section 21 applies when a decision notice agreeing to participation has been sent but the outcome improvement process has not yet been established. It provides that the community participation body may, within 28 days, make representations in relation to the proposed process.
The public service authority must within 28 days of the expiry of the 28 day period for making representations give a notice containing details of the outcome improvement process that is to be established.

57. Subsection (6) is a power to make regulations specifying information about the outcome improvement process which must be published.

Reason for taking power

58. The power in subsection (6) will enable Ministers to ensure that appropriate information about the outcome improvement process is published on a website or electronically.

Reason for choice of procedure

59. The specification of information about the outcome improvement process that must be published is a largely procedural and administrative matter. The regulations may also change over time to reflect experience and practice. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 24(3) – Power to specify information about the modification of an outcome improvement process

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

60. Section 24 provides that the public service authority may modify the outcome improvement process, following consultation with the community participation body.

61. Subsection (3) provides that, if the public service authority does modify the outcome improvement process, it must publish such information about the modification as may be specified in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Reason for taking power

62. The Scottish Ministers may require authorities to publish relevant information regarding an outcome improvement process, by regulations made under section 21(6) as outlined above. This additional power is required to ensure that where changes to established outcome improvement processes have been made, then the modifications will also be published.

Reason for choice of procedure

63. The specification of information about modifications to an outcome improvement process that must be published is a largely procedural and administrative matter. The regulations may also change over time to reflect experience and practice. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 25(4) – Power to make provision about reports that are made as a result of a participation request

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

64. Where a participation request has been made and an outcome improvement process has been completed, section 25 requires the public service authority to publish a report on the process and describes the information to go in the report.

65. Subsection (4) gives the Scottish Ministers power to make regulations about reports, including additional information they must contain.

Reason for taking power

66. Section 25(2) describes information about the outcome improvement process to be contained within a report. The subsection (4) power to make additional provision about reports allows for flexibility when developing the detail of the reporting process. It will be important that the report contains relevant information on the results of the outcome improvement process.

Reason for choice of procedure

67. The publication of a report on an outcome improvement process is a largely procedural and administrative matter and are likely to be fairly detailed. The regulations may also change over time to reflect experience and practice. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Part 4 – Community Right to Buy

Part 4 of the Bill makes amendments to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”).

BODIES THAT MAY COMPRISE A “COMMUNITY BODY” FOR THE PURPOSES OF THE COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY

Section 28(2) – inserting section 34(A1)(b) into the 2003 Act - Power to prescribe bodies that are “community bodies”

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Provision

68. Section 28 of the Bill amends section 34 of the 2003 Act to extend the types of body which may be eligible to become community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (“SCIOs”) and any other type of body that Ministers may specify in regulations. These regulations may also specify the requirements that such a body must satisfy in order to be a community body.

Reason for taking this power

69. Since the 2003 Act came into operation, new legal structures have been developed which enable communities to be able to undertake a range of activities for their community, including owning land. The Scottish Government anticipates that further legal bodies could emerge that would be suitable community bodies for the purpose of Part 2 of the 2003 Act. Being able to make regulations providing for such bodies to be community bodies would allow Ministers to be able to respond quickly to such developments.

Choice of procedure

70. It is considered appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament to give a high level of scrutiny to such provision. Only specific types of legal entities are able to be community bodies for the purposes of the 2003 Act. Any extension of the bodies that can be a community body may have a significant impact of who can make use of the right to buy in Part 2 of the 2003 Act. Use of this power could therefore have a significant impact on the scope of the legislation and so the affirmative procedure is appropriate.

REQUIREMENTS FOR A COMMUNITY BODY

Section 28(6) – insertion of section 34(4A) and (4B) into the 2003 Act - Power to make regulations to amend the requirements for a body to be a community body.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power Exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary Procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

71. Section 28(6) of the Bill inserts a new section 34(4A) into the 2003 Act. Section 34(4A) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make regulations modifying the criteria which must be met by companies limited by guarantee and SCIOs in order to be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act.

72. Section 28(6) also inserts a new section 34(4B) into the 2003 Act. Section 34(4B) provides that if the Scottish Ministers make regulations under section 34(A1)(b) then they can also amend section 35(A1) and (1) of the 2003 Act by regulations.

73. Any regulations made under section 34(A1)(b) would set out the bodies, other than companies limited by guarantee and SCIOs, which may be classed as “community bodies” for the purposes of the 2003 Act. Section 35(A1) prohibits the alteration (without consent of Ministers) of the memorandum, articles of association or constitution of a community body.
during the relevant period (as defined in section 35(A2) of the 2003 Act). The Scottish Ministers can make regulations using the power inserted in section 34(4B) to amend section 35(A1) and (1) of the 2003 Act to extend the prohibition to any different kinds of constitutive document which may apply to the new types of body which are eligible to become community bodies.

Reasons for taking power

74. Ministers already have powers to disapply the requirement at section 34(1)(c) of the 2003 Act. It is appropriate that Ministers also have power to vary the requirements for a community body in section 34(1) and (1A) of the 2003 Act. The power to make regulations gives Ministers flexibility to make these changes.

75. Where Ministers make regulations extending the bodies that may comprise a “community body”, Ministers will also need to be able to set out the requirements that these bodies need to satisfy to be a community body. The power to make regulations gives Ministers flexibility to set out these provisions and to make any changes to them in the future.

Choice of procedure

76. It is considered appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament a high level of scrutiny to the detail of any changes to primary legislation. Regulations made under section 34(4A) and (4B) of the 2003 will amend primary legislation.

DEFINITION OF A “COMMUNITY”

Section 28(7) – amendments to section 34(5) of the 2003 Act – Power to define a “community”

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

77. For the purposes of the community right to buy in Part 2 of the 2003 Act, section 34(5) of the 2003 Act provides that a “community” is defined by reference to a geographical area. The geographical area is currently defined by reference to a postcode unit or units, unless otherwise directed by Ministers. Section 28(7) amends section 34(5) of the 2003 Act so the provision that allows the Scottish Ministers to direct that a “community” can be defined other than by reference to postcode units is removed and the Scottish Ministers are given a power to make regulations which may set out a specific type or types of area, in addition to postcode unit or units, which can be used to define a “community”.

Reason for taking this power

78. There have been comments that postcodes do not provide community bodies with the greatest flexibility in describing their “community”. In particular, some communities comprise a large number of postcodes which may also change frequently, making it cumbersome to describe their “community”. There are a number of building blocks which could be used in addition to postcodes and postcode areas, such as settlement areas and wards. To list these in the primary legislation would be cumbersome and regulations provides flexibility in making any changes to the list of criteria to describe a “community”.
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Choice of procedure

79. It is considered that the use of this power can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. The power does not define what amounts to a community in any particular case but sets out another method which may be used to define a particular community, such as settlement areas or wards. This is therefore essentially an administrative matter.

DESCRIPTION OF LAND TRANSFERRED BY A LANDOWNER OR HERITABLE CREDITOR AS AN “EXEMPT” TRANSFER

Section 33 – insertion of section 41(3)(b) into the 2003 Act – power to specify the description of land

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

80. Landowners and creditors in a standard security with a right to sell the land are prohibited from transferring land or taking action with a view to transferring land that is subject to a registered interest for so long as the interest is registered, other than to a community body which has a registered interest in that land or in accordance with section 40(4) of the 2003 Act which provides for “exempt transfers”. Section 33 of the Bill inserts subsection (3) into section 41 of the 2003 Act and sets out that where a landowner or a heritable creditor transfers land by means of exempt transfer they must provide Ministers with certain information including a description of the land being transferred, including maps, plans or other drawings. Section 41(3)(b) of the 2003 Act enables Ministers to make regulations setting out the specifications that maps, plans and drawings describing the land transferred must be prepared in accordance with.

Reason for taking this power

81. Ministers are currently not required to be informed if a landowner or creditor in a standard security with a right to sell land makes a transfer of land which is exempt from the prohibition on transfers (by virtue of section 40(4) of the 2003 Act). In some cases landowners or creditors have transferred all of the land which has a registered interest in it, while in other cases they have transferred only part of the land, or have transferred it to more than one owner. This power enables Ministers to make regulations setting out how the land that has been subject to an exempt transfer should be described when Ministers are notified of the transfer. It is considered that the level of procedural detail which is to be set out is more appropriately left to regulations.
Choice of procedure

82. It is considered appropriate that this power is subject to negative procedure. This provision is required to set out in detail how land is to be described in informing Ministers about the transfer of that land. This is therefore an administrative matter.

BALLOT PROCEDURE

Section 37 – insertion of section 51A(2)(b) into the 2003 Act - Power to prescribe information to be provided to the ballotter

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

83. Section 37 of the Bill inserts a new section 51A into the 2003 Act to provide for an independent ballotter to undertake the community ballot under section 51(1)(a) of the 2003 Act.

84. Section 51A(2)(a) of the 2003 Act sets out that Ministers must provide the ballotter with a copy of the of the application to register an interest in land made by the community body. Section 51A(2)(b) allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations which specify other information which must be provided by the Scottish Ministers to the ballotter within the timeframe set out in section 51A(3).

Reason for taking these powers

85. It is important that an independent ballotter is provided with the appropriate information by Ministers so that the ballot is conducted in an appropriate manner. It is considered that the level of procedural detail which is to be set out is more appropriately left to regulations.

Choice of procedure

86. It is considered that the use of these powers can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. The matters to be detailed in regulations are details of procedure. For example, these matters could relate to the contact details of the community body, the statutory timescales when the ballot is to be completed and the ballot return made to the Scottish Ministers, the community body and other specified persons. The current ballot procedures under the 2003 Act are set out in regulations subject to the negative procedure.

BALLOT PROCEDURE

Section 37 – insertion of section 51A(6) into the 2003 Act - Power to prescribe information to be provided to the ballotter by a community body

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Provision

87. Section 37 of the Bill inserts a new section 51A into the 2003 Act to provide for an independent ballotter to undertake the community ballot under section 51(1)(a) of the 2003 Act.

88. New section 51A(6) requires the community body to provide the ballotter with certain information. The Scottish Ministers may make regulations setting out the specific information required and the form in which this information should be provided.

Reason for taking these powers

89. It is important that an independent ballotter is provided with the appropriate information by the community body so that the ballot is conducted in an appropriate manner. It is considered that the level of procedural detail which is to be set out is more appropriately left to regulations.

Choice of procedure

90. It is considered that the use of these powers can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. The matters to be detailed in regulations are details of procedure. For example, this could include requiring the community body to provide the ballotter with the ballot question on which the community is to be balloted. The current ballot procedures under the 2003 Act are set out in regulations subject to the negative procedure.

REQUIREMENT FOR A COMMUNITY BODY TO PROVIDE CERTAIN INFORMATION TO SCOTTISH MINISTERS

Section 38 – insertion of section 51B(2)(b) and (3) - Power to make regulations which set out the information a community body must provide to Scottish Ministers

Powers conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

91. Section 38 of the Bill inserts a new section 51B into the 2003 Act which supplements section 51 of the 2003 Act. Section 51 of the 2003 Act sets out that before a community body can exercise its right to buy (after the right to buy has been activated), both the approval of the community and the consent of the Scottish Ministers are required. The Scottish Ministers are not able to grant consent unless they are satisfied that the conditions set out in subsections 51(3)(a)-(e) are met. In making this decision, new section 51B of the 2003 Act requires Ministers to take into account the information provided by the community body and any other information they consider relevant. New section 51B(2)(b) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make regulations set out in regulations what form this information should be provided in.
Reason for taking these powers

92. In the past community bodies have provided Ministers with a wide range of information in relation to their right to buy, and in particular as to why their proposal for the land is compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development. Sometimes this information is extensive, and other times it is succinct; sometimes it can include all the information that Ministers need to take a decision, while sometimes points are not included or require to be clarified. This provision allows Ministers to set out the information that they need to consider when making a decision. It also provides greater transparency in the assessment process and for the streamlining of information to be provided by a community body. It is considered that the level of procedural detail and detail required to be set out is more appropriately left to regulations.

Choice of procedure

93. It is considered that the use of this power can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. The information that a community body will be required to provide include matters such as evidence as to why the proposals for land will further sustainable development and the detail as to the information which is to be provided is not appropriate for primary legislation. This level of procedural detail is best dealt with by way of the negative procedure.

BALLOT NOT CONDUCTED AS PRESCRIBED

Section 40 – insertion of section 52(7) into the 2003 Act - Ballot not conducted as prescribed

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

94. A ballot must be conducted in accordance with the requirements set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers under section 52(1) of the 2003 Act. A new subsection 52(7) is being inserted into the 2003 Act by section 40 of the Bill. Section 52(7) allows the Scottish Ministers to make further regulations in respect of: reviewing how the ballot was conducted; notifying specific persons that the ballot was not conducted correctly; requiring a further ballot to be conducted and specifying the persons who are to undertake this; and how that further ballot is to be conducted, and that timescales for undertaking that further ballot. In addition, these regulations under section 57(7) may state who is to conduct the review of the first ballot and the action which can be taken by such person following the review.

Reason for taking this power

95. While most of the ballots undertaken by the community right to buy have been undertaken in accordance with the 2003 Act and the regulations made under it, there have been a small number of cases where the ballot has not been so conducted. Clarity is needed as to what happens when there is a flawed ballot and also the administrative procedures to deal with such a ballot. It is considered that the level of procedural detail which is to be set out is more appropriately left to regulations.
Choice of procedure

96. It is appropriate that this power is subject to negative procedure because it will be used to set details of procedure. This is also essentially an administrative matter.

Section 48 of the Bill

Section 48 of the Bill inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act to give communities a right to buy land that is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected, for the purposes of the sustainable development of that land, where there is no willing seller.

ELIGIBLE LAND

Section 48 – inserted section 97C(2) of the 2003 Act - power to prescribe whether land is eligible for the purposes of Part 3A

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

97. This provision requires Ministers to have regard to matters set out in regulations in determining whether land is, in their opinion, eligible for the purposes of Part 3A of the 2003 Act.

Reason for taking this power

98. The Bill does not define what is abandoned or neglected land for the purposes of Part 3A of the 2003 Act. It is considered that as Ministers will need to have regard to a number of matters which are too detailed to include in the primary legislation and are more appropriately set out in regulations.

Choice of procedure

99. It is appropriate that this power is subject to affirmative procedure to allow Parliament a high level of scrutiny, given that what constitutes “eligible land” is fundamental to the scope and application of Part 3A.

Section 48 – inserted section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act - power to prescribe that eligible land does not include certain land for the purposes of Part 3A

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

100. Section 97C(1) provides that land is eligible for the purposes of Part 3A if in the opinion of Ministers it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. Section 97C(3)(a) provides that eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or structure that is an individual’s home, other than buildings or structures that may be set out in regulations by Ministers.

Reason for taking this power

101. The intention is that eligible land should not include an individual’s home. The regulation making power will enable there to be flexibility as to exactly what buildings or structures constitute an individual’s home.

Choice of procedure

102. It is appropriate that this power is subject to affirmative procedure to allow Parliament a high level of scrutiny, given that what constitutes “eligible land” is fundamental to the scope and application of Part 3A.

Section 48 – inserted section 97C(3)(b) of the 2003 Act - power to prescribe that eligible land does not include certain land for the purposes of Part 3A

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

103. Section 97C(1) provides that land is eligible for the purposes of Part 3A if in the opinion of Ministers it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. Section 97C(3)(a) provides that eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or structure that is an individual’s home, other than buildings or structures that may be set out in regulations by Ministers. Section 97C(3)(b) provides that eligible land does not include land set out in regulations that pertains to an individual’s home that is excluded from being eligible land by section 97C(3)(a).

Reason for taking this power

104. The regulation making power will give the Ministers the ability to ensure that land pertaining to a person’s home, such as a private garden (to the extent that this does not fall within section 97C(3)(a)) is excluded from being eligible land. The description of the type of land that could be excluded from the definition of “eligible land” by this power is expected to be detailed and therefore is better suited for secondary legislation.

Choice of procedure

105. It is appropriate that this power is subject to affirmative procedure to allow Parliament a high level of scrutiny, given that what constitutes “eligible land” is fundamental to the scope and application of Part 3A.
Section 48 – inserted section 97C(3)(f) of the 2003 Act - power to prescribe that eligible land does not include certain land for the purposes of Part 3A

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision
106. Section 97C(1) provides that land is eligible for the purposes of Part 3A if in the opinion of Ministers it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. Section 97C(3)(f) sets out that Ministers may set out in regulations other descriptions of land that is not eligible land.

Reason for taking this power
107. This power will enable Ministers to set out other classes of land that are not “eligible land”. This is important in setting out what land is outwith the scope of Part 3A as it will enable Ministers to exclude certain types of land from Part 3A should in the future this be considered to be appropriate. This land may need to be described in detail, and therefore it is appropriate that this is set out in secondary legislation.

Choice of procedure
108. It is appropriate that this power is subject to affirmative procedure to allow Parliament a high level of scrutiny, given that what constitutes “eligible land” is fundamental to the scope and application of Part 3A.

Section 48 – inserted section 97C(4) of the 2003 Act - power to prescribe buildings or structures that are to be treated as an individual’s home for the purposes of section 97C(3)(a)

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision
109. Section 97C(1) provides that land is eligible for the purposes of Part 3A if in the opinion of Ministers it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. Section 97C(3)(a) provides that eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or structure that is an individual’s home, other than buildings or structures that may be set out in regulations by Ministers. Section 97C(4) enables Ministers to make regulations setting out descriptions or classes of buildings that are to be treated as an individual’s home for the purposes of section 97C(3)(a) and so the land on which these are on will not be eligible land.

Reason for taking power
110. An individual’s home can include a range of buildings with varying extents of land around it. This power will give Ministers flexibility to ensure that any buildings or structures which do constitute an individual’s home but which Ministers consider should be treated as if they were such a home can be treated as such. These buildings or structures may need to be described in detail, and it is therefore appropriate for secondary legislation.

Choice of procedure

111. It is appropriate that this power is subject to affirmative procedure to allow Parliament a high level of scrutiny, given that what constitutes “eligible land” is fundamental to the scope and application of Part 3A.

DEFINITION OF “COMMUNITY”

Section 48 – inserted section 97D(5)(a) of the 2003 Act – Power to set out the definition of a “community”

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

112. Section 97D sets out the requirements for a company limited by guarantee to be a Part 3A community body. One of the requirements is that the articles of association of the company define the community to which the company relates. Section 97D(5)(a) provides that a community is defined by reference to postcode unit or units or type of area set out in regulations. This provision allows Ministers to set out in regulations the areas that can be used to describe a “community”.

Reason for taking this power

113. Community bodies that have used the community right to buy provisions in Part 2 of the 2003 Act, together with stakeholders, such as Community Land Scotland, have commented that postcodes do not provide community bodies with the greatest flexibility in describing their “community”. In particular, some communities comprise a large number of postcodes which may also change frequently, making it cumbersome to use these to describe their “community”. There are a number of building blocks which could be used in addition to postcodes and postcode areas, including settlement areas and wards. To list these in the primary legislation would be cumbersome.

Choice of procedure

114. It is considered that the use of this power can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. The power does not define what amounts to a community in any particular case but sets out another method which may be used to define a particular community, such as settlement areas or wards. This is therefore essentially an administrative matter.
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

PROVISIONS SUPPLEMENTARY TO SECTION 97D

Section 48 – inserted section 97E(4) of the 2003 Act – provision to make an order relating to matters connected with the acquisition of the land

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

115. Section 97E sets out circumstances in which the Scottish Ministers may compulsorily acquire land that has been purchased by a Part 3A community body under Part 3A of the 2003 Act. Section 97E(4) confers power on the Scottish Ministers to make provision by order in connection with the compulsory purchase of such land.

Reason for taking this power

116. There may be cases where the Scottish Ministers consider it appropriate to exercise their power to compulsorily acquire land under section 97E and further provision would be of assistance in setting out how this is to operate, by way of an order.

Choice of procedure

117. It is appropriate, that this power is subject to affirmative power, for Parliament to give a high level of scrutiny given that this power can be used to modify primary legislation.

REGISTER OF COMMUNITY INTERESTS IN ABANDONED OR NEGLECTED LAND

Section 48 – inserted section 97F(6) – power to modify the information and documents that are to be contained in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

118. Section 97F requires the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland to set up and keep a Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land. Section 97F(2) sets out the information and documents that must be kept on the Register, including copies of applications made by Part 3A community bodies to exercise the right to buy under Part 3A. Section 97F(6)(a) enables the Scottish Ministers to make regulations modifying the information and documents that must be kept on the Register.

119. Section 97F(3) and (4) allows a Part 3A community body to require that information or documentation, which relates to the raising or expenditure of money to allow land to which the application relates to be used, should be withheld from public inspection. Such information or documentation will not be entered on the Register. However, section 97F(5) provides that Ministers cannot require a Part 3A community body to provide such information or documentation. Section 97F(6)(b) and (c) allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations modifying section 97F(3) and (4). Ministers require these powers to ensure that they can modify the information or documents relating to the raising or expenditure of money.
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Reasons for taking this power

120. These powers are required to ensure that Ministers can vary the information and documents that are to be kept in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land. It is important that Ministers can respond to the need to make changes to the information that is contained in the Register.

Choice of procedure

121. These powers are subject to the affirmative procedure. It is considered that it is appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament to give a high level of scrutiny as these regulations will be amending primary legislation.

REGISTER OF COMMUNITY INTERESTS IN ABANDONED OR NEGLECTED LAND – PAYMENT OF CHARGES

Section 48 – inserted section 97F(7)(b) – Payment of charges for copies of entries in the Part 3A Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

122. By virtue of section 97F(7) the Keeper of the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land must ensure that members of the public are given facilities for obtaining copies of entries in the Register. Section 97F(7)(b) enables the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting charges for such copies.

Reason for taking this power

123. The Keeper should be able to recover costs where they have provided members of the public with copies of entries in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land. This allows Ministers to keep charges under review.

Choice of procedure

124. It is appropriate that this power is subject to negative procedure because it will be used to set details of costs. This is essentially an administrative matter.
APPLICATION FORM FOR CONSENT TO A RIGHT TO BUY

Section 48 – inserted section 97G(5)(a) – Power to prescribe the application form for Ministers to consent to a Part 3A community body’s right to buy

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision
125. Section 97G(5)(a) provides that the application form that must be submitted to the Scottish Ministers by a Part 3A community body in order to exercise the right to buy under Part 3A is to be in the form set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Reason for taking this power
126. A prescribed application form allows Ministers to set out information that they need to consider when making a decision. It also provides greater transparency in the assessment process and for the streamlining of information to be provided by a community body. It is considered that the level of procedural detail and detail required to be set out is more appropriately left to regulations.

Choice of procedure
127. It is considered that the use of this power can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. This level of procedural detail is best dealt with through regulations. It also allows for flexibility in making changes to the application form where this is appropriate.

Section 48 – inserted section 97G(5)(c) – power to prescribe information in an application form for Ministers to consent to a Part 3A community body’s right to buy

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision
128. Section 97G(5)(a) provides that the application form that must be submitted to the Scottish Ministers by a Part 3A community body in order to exercise the right to buy under Part 3A is to be in the form set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Reason for taking this power
129. A prescribed application form allows Ministers to set out information that they need to consider when making a decision. It also provides greater transparency in the assessment process and for the streamlining of information to be provided by a community body. It is considered that the level of procedural detail and detail required to be set out is more appropriately left to regulations.
Choice of procedure
130. It is considered that the use of this power can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. This level of procedural detail is best dealt with through regulations. It also allows for flexibility in making changes to the application form where this is appropriate.

ADVERTISEMENT OF A PUBLIC NOTICE OF AN APPLICATION

Section 48 – inserted section 97G(12) – power to prescribe the manner in which an application under Part 3A is given public notice

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision
131. Section 97G(12) enables the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out how an application to exercise the right to buy made under Part 3A is to be given public notice.

Reason for taking this power
132. This provision provides Ministers with flexibility in setting out how such an application is to be given public notice. This allows Ministers to take account of changing means of conveying technology, such as the use of electronic means and social media and developments with such technologies.

Choice of procedure
133. The setting out of how a public notice is to be given by advertisement is an administrative matter. It is considered that negative procedure will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the purpose of the regulations on the other.

CONDUCT OF BALLOT TO INDICATE COMMUNITY SUPPORT OF PROPOSALS

Section 48 - inserted sections 97J(2) and (4) – powers to prescribe how the ballot of the community is undertaken and the form of the ballot return to Ministers

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision
134. Section 97J(2) requires the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out how a ballot of the community is to be conducted. Such a ballot is undertaken in order to show whether a community has approved a proposal by a Part 3A community body to buy land. The regulations must include provision for certain matters including ascertaining the number of people who voted and the number of valid votes that were cast for and against the ballot question. Section 97J(4) gives Ministers power to set out how the ballot result and others details about the ballot are to be notified to Ministers.

Reason for taking these powers

135. The requirements that the ballot must comply with includes a number of detailed processes and steps. It is important that these are set out so that the ballot can be properly and fairly conducted. Detailed matters relating to the procedure to undertake a ballot are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. It is important that the ballot results are notified in a standard format so that they are clear and there is no ambiguity. The reporting of these results is an administrative matter and is best dealt with in regulations.

Choice of procedure

136. It is considered that the use of this power can be left to the level of Parliamentary scrutiny attached to the negative procedure. The use of negative procedure is appropriate for such administrative procedural matters as the conduct of a ballot and the reporting of the results of that ballot.

MINISTERS’ DECISION ON AN APPLICATION

Section 48 – inserted section 97M(1) and (2) – Ministers’ notification of their decision on an application under Part 3A

Powers conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

137. Section 97M(1) requires the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out the form for their decision as to whether to consent to an application to exercise the right to buy under Part 3A. Section 97M(2) requires the regulations setting out the form of notice to include certain information.

Reason for taking these powers

138. It is important that the Ministers’ decision on an application is clearly set out and includes all the information that all parties involved in an application need to know as to how Ministers came to their decision. A written notice in a form set out in regulations ensures that the Scottish Ministers set out the same information in each case. As this information is of a detailed nature, it is appropriate that it is included in secondary legislation.

Choice of procedure

139. As the form of notice as to the Ministers’ decision on an application made under section 97G and the particular information to be included in that notice is an administrative matter, it is considered that the negative procedure is appropriate for these powers.
EFFECT OF AN APPLICATION TO EXERCISE THE RIGHT TO BUY ON TRANSFERS OR DEALINGS IN LAND

Section 48 – inserted section 97N(1) – effect of the Ministers’ decision on rights to buy

- Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Regulations
- Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

140. Section 97N(1) enables Ministers to make regulations setting out persons who are prohibited from undertaking certain transfers or dealings in respect of land which a Part 3A community body has made an application to buy under Part 3A. The regulations may include provisions as to the types of transfers or dealings which are not permitted, the persons who are not permitted to undertake these transfers or dealings and the period for which these transfers or dealings may not be undertaken.

Reason for taking this power

141. When a Part 3A application is received by Ministers it is important that the owner or certain creditors with a right to sell the land should not be able to sell the land until Ministers have made a decision on the application. This is so that the Ministers can properly undertake the administration of the provisions before coming to a decision on an application. However, there may be circumstances when it would be appropriate to allow the transfer of the land. To deal with this, Ministers require flexibility to set out the persons that are prohibited from undertaking certain transfers or dealings in relation to that land which is the subject to a Part 3A application and the consequences of this, such as provision that is to be made in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land.

Choice of procedure

142. It is considered appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament to give a high level of scrutiny to the detail of such a prohibition given that this will impact on how a land owner can deal with their land.

EFFECT OF AN APPLICATION EXERCISING THE RIGHT TO BUY ON RIGHTS IN OR OVER LAND

Section 48 – inserted section 97N(3) – power to suspend the rights in or over land

- Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Regulations
- Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

143. Section 97N(3) allows Ministers to make regulations suspending rights over land where a Part 3A community body has applied to exercise the right to buy in respect of that land.
regulations may set out the rights which are to be suspended and the period for which the rights are to be suspended.

Reason for taking this power
144. The power may be used to make regulations providing that at a certain point in the application process for the right to buy, then certain rights of pre-emption, redemption or option to purchase are suspended until the transfer of the land is completed or it has been determined that the transfer is not to be completed. Ministers require flexibility to set out how these rights will be affected.

Choice of procedure
145. It is considered appropriate to allow the Scottish Parliament to give a high level of scrutiny given that the regulations will be capable of effecting existing rights in land.

COMPENSATION

Section 48 – inserted section 97T(4) – power to make provision in relation to compensation

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision
146. This power allows Ministers to make regulations setting out details in relation to the entitlement to compensation arising under section 97T(1) including amounts payable in respect of loss or expenditure, the person who is liable to pay these amounts, and how any compensation is to be claimed under this section.

Reason for taking this power
147. The provision needed for compensation will include a number of detailed matters. For example, the regulations will need to set out the evidence to be submitted to support the claim for compensation. It is important that these are clearly set out with the appropriate level of detail. Detailed matters relating to the payment and procedures and to apply for compensation are considered appropriate matters to be dealt in regulations.

Choice of procedure
148. Matters relating to the entitlement of compensation are likely to be detailed and administrative in nature and may require to be amended periodically. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of parliamentary time on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.
COMPENSATION – APPLICATION BY A PART 3A COMMUNITY BODY FOR A GRANT

Section 48 – inserted section 97U(6) – power to make grants towards Part 3A community bodies’ liabilities to pay compensation

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulation
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

149. Under certain limited circumstances, a Part 3A community body can apply to the Scottish Ministers for a grant to assist it in meeting the compensation it has to pay in connection with its exercise of the right to buy. Section 97U(6) provides that Ministers can make regulations setting out the form of the application and the application procedure to be used.

Reason for taking this power

150. Making provision for an application form and application procedure for Part 3A community bodies seeking to apply for a grant to assist in connection with their right to buy will ensure that Ministers receive the information they need to deal with the application and providing an application procedure will ensure that applicants are informed of the process to submit an application. As this is an administrative matter it is best dealt with in regulations.

Choice of procedure

151. The matters to be detailed in regulations are details of procedure for a Part 3A community body applying for a grant from the Scottish Ministers to assist in meeting the compensation it has to pay in connection with its exercise of a right to buy and also the information that is to be specified in this application process. For example, the Ministers may make regulations setting out the application form to be used by the Part 3A community body or evidence that a Part 3A community body must provide in its application. As these matters are administrative ones, they are best dealt with by negative procedure.

APPEALS TO LANDS TRIBUNAL: VALUATION

Section 48 – inserted section 97W(7) – Rules affected by Ministers in relation to the Lands Tribunal Act 1949

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Rules
Parliamentary procedure: as provided for rules made under the Lands Tribunal Act 1949

Provision

152. Section 97W(1) provides that the owner of the land and the Part 3A community body exercising its right to buy may appeal to the Lands Tribunal against the valuation carried out under section 97S. Section 97W(7) provides that Ministers’ powers to make rules under the Lands Tribunal Act 1949 are extended to the extent that it is necessary to give full effect to section 97W. For example, under section 3(6) of the Lands Tribunal Act 1949 rules can be made regulating proceedings before the Lands Tribunal. Rules under section 3(6) are not subject to any Parliamentary procedure. A similar provision is included in section 62(10) of the 2003 Act in relation to the community right to buy in Part 2 of the 2003 Act.

Reasons for taking this power

153. This power is needed to ensure that the Scottish Ministers have the same powers in relation to the Lands Tribunal’s role under Part 3A as they do in relation to other aspects of the Lands Tribunal’s role. This will ensure that section 97W operate effectively.

Choice of procedure

154. Ministers require flexibility to ensure that procedure for the Lands Tribunal in relation to Part 3A of the Act works effectively. This is an administrative matter and can be dealt with in the same way as rules under the Lands Tribunal Act 1949.

Part 5 – Asset Transfer Requests

Section 50(2)(a) – Designation of a community transfer body

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

155. Section 50 defines a “community transfer body”. This is a community-controlled body (as defined in section 14), a body designated as a community transfer body by the Scottish Ministers or a body of a class of bodies designated as community transfer bodies. Community transfer bodies can make an asset transfer request to have rights in land held by relevant authorities transferred to them.

156. Subsection (2)(a) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order designate individual bodies to be community transfer bodies.

Reason for taking power

157. Community bodies come in many different forms. The intention of the policy is that as wide a range of community bodies as possible should be able to act as a community transfer body and make an asset transfer request. It is important that community transfer bodies are open, inclusive and represent their community, and in most cases this should be demonstrated by meeting the criteria for a community-controlled body. However, there may be bodies which are established in a different way, especially those established before current approaches became standard, which Ministers still consider should be able to act as community transfer bodies. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate additional community bodies for this purpose.
Reason for choice of procedure

158. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate. The power will allow particular bodies of bodies to be a community-controlled body for the purposes of the Act. The nature of the power is that it may involve the addition, from time to time, of individual bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure.

Section 50(2)(b) – Designation of a class of bodies as community transfer bodies

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

159. As stated, section 50 defines a “community transfer body”. This is either a community-controlled body (as defined in section 14), a body designated as a community transfer body or a body of a class of bodies designated as community transfer bodies.

160. Section 50(2)(b) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order designate a class of bodies as community transfer bodies, so that any body of that type will qualify as a community transfer body.

Reason for taking power

161. As detailed above under section 50(2)(a), the intention of the policy is that as wide a range of community bodies as possible should be able to act as a community transfer body and make an asset transfer request, provided that they are open, inclusive and representative. If it appears that the characteristics of a type of body meet those requirements, the power will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate that class of bodies as community transfer bodies for this purpose.

Reason for choice of procedure

162. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate. The nature of the power is that it may involve the addition, from time to time, of classes of bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure.

Section 51(2) – Power to modify Schedule 3 relevant authorities

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

163. Schedule 3, introduced by section 51, lists some of the persons to which an asset transfer request can be made (“relevant authorities”). Schedule 3 includes local authorities, the Scottish...
Ministers, Health Boards, and other Scottish public bodies, which have been selected because they own significant amounts of land and buildings.

164. Subsection (2) gives the Scottish Ministers a power, by order, to remove or amend an entry on the list of relevant authorities in schedule 3.

Reason for taking power

165. Schedule 3 provides a list of persons to which an asset transfer request can be made. The bodies listed in schedule 3 may change over time and the power in subsection (2) is to provide flexibility in future should changes be required, either by removing a body from the list or making any necessary amendments to an entry.

Reason for choice of procedure

166. The power relates to modifications that may be required based on future changes to the bodies listed in schedule 3. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used. The power enables modifications, from time to time, of individual bodies and it is considered that this sort of modification is not of such significance as to require affirmative procedure and that negative procedure provides the appropriate balance required between scrutiny and the use of parliamentary resource.

Section 51(3)(a) – Power to designate a relevant authority

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Order</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>Negative procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

167. In addition to the persons listed in schedule 3, under section 51(1)(b) and (3) a person designated as a community transfer body or of a class of bodies designated as community transfer bodies is also a relevant authority to whom an asset transfer request can be made.

168. Section 51(3)(a) gives the Scottish Ministers power to designate a relevant authority by order. Subsections (4) to (7) provide more detail on who may be designated as a relevant authority.

Reason for taking power

169. As stated above, the public bodies listed in schedule 3 have been selected because they own significant amounts of land and buildings. It may be appropriate to designate other public bodies that own land and buildings in future. Further, should new public bodies be created in future that own significant amounts of land and buildings, it may be considered appropriate to designate the public body as a relevant authority.
Reason for choice of procedure

170. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate as it relates to the potential designation of relevant authorities to which an asset transfer request can be made in the future. It is not considered that the inclusion of particular bodies as a relevant authority is sufficiently significant to merit affirmative procedure and therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used to provide the balance required between scrutiny and the use of parliamentary resource.

Section 51(3)(b) – Power to designate a class of relevant authorities

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

171. In addition to the persons listed in schedule 3, under section 51(1)(b) and (3) a person designated as a community transfer body or of a class of bodies designated as community transfer bodies is also a relevant authority to whom an asset transfer request can be made.

172. Subsection (3)(b) provides that the Scottish Ministers may by Order designate a whole class of persons as community transfer bodies so that any person of that type will qualify as a relevant authority. Subsections (4) to (7) provide more detail on designating classes of persons.

Reason for taking power

173. As detailed above under section 51(3)(a), it may be appropriate to designate persons of a class of persons that own land and buildings in future as relevant authorities. It may be that a class of person should be treated as a relevant authority, and the power will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate that class of persons as relevant authorities for this purpose.

Reason for choice of procedure

174. The Scottish Government considers negative procedure is appropriate as it relates to the potential designation of a class of relevant authorities to which an asset transfer request can be made in the future. It is considered that nature of the provision is not sufficiently significant to merit affirmative procedure and therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used to provide the balance required between scrutiny and the use of parliamentary resource.

Section 54(1) – Power to make further provision about asset transfer requests

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

175. Section 54(1) gives the Scottish Ministers a power by regulations to make further provision about asset transfer requests.
176. Subsection (2) provides that the regulations can, in particular, specify how asset transfer requests are to be made, information to be included in them (in addition to that required under section 52(4)) and the procedure to be followed by a relevant authority in relation to requests. They may also include requirements to publish the fact that a request is being made, and to notify specified people about them.

Reason for taking power

177. The Scottish Government considers that section 54(1) and (2) is necessary to enable further detail to be provided on the asset transfer request process. It is appropriate for this to be done by regulations, due to the level of detail required and to allow the regulations to be amended from time to time to reflect the experience of both community transfer bodies and relevant authorities.

Reason for choice of procedure

178. Further provision that may be required regarding asset transfer requests and the process and procedure is a largely administrative matter and likely to be fairly detailed. The regulations may also need to evolve over time to reflect practical experience in the use of asset transfer requests. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 54(3) – Power to make provision about information relating to land in respect of which an asset transfer request is proposed

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

179. Section 54(3) provides that that the Scottish Ministers may make regulations in connection with enabling a community transfer body to request information from a relevant authority about land in respect of which it proposes to make an asset transfer request, how a relevant authority is to respond to the request for information, the circumstances in which the authority must provide the information, the type of information that the authority must provide and the circumstances in when the authority need not provide the information requested.

Reason for taking power

180. A community transfer body may need more information about the property before making an asset transfer request and determining such matters as the purchase price, maintenance costs, energy efficiency, level of rent or other terms and conditions to be proposed.

181. The Scottish Government considers that subsection (3) is necessary as further detail on the pre-transfer requirements and the process and procedure may be required. It may also be necessary from time to time to update the regulations to reflect the experience of both... community transfer bodies and relevant authorities and ensure that the procedure is as effective and efficient as possible.

Reason for choice of procedure

182. Provision that may be required regarding information about land which is the subject of a proposed asset transfer request is a largely administrative matter and likely to be fairly detailed. The regulations may also need to evolve over time to reflect practical experience in the use of asset transfer requests. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 55(8) – Power to prescribe a time for a decision notice to be given

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

183. Under section 55(2) a relevant authority must decide whether to agree to or refuse an asset transfer request. Subsection (3) sets out the matters to be taken into consideration when reaching a decision. Under subsection (7) the authority must within the period mentioned in subsection (8) give a decision notice. Under subsection (8) the period is a period prescribed by the Scottish Ministers or such longer period as may be agreed between the authority and the community transfer body.

Reason for taking power

184. The Bill provides the legislative framework around which decisions on asset transfer requests will be made and following enactment of the Bill the Scottish Government will consult on what is a reasonable time period for a decision to be made by relevant authorities. Once the Bill is enacted and in the light of experience and greater understanding a change to the time period may be deemed advisable and the power will allow that to be done straightforwardly.

Reason for choice of procedure

185. The period of time for a relevant authority to respond to an asset transfer request is an administrative matter and will be informed by a short and focussed consultation. It is also possible that the time period may change in future. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 55(9) – Power to make provisions regarding the information contained in a decision notice and the manner in which it is to be given

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Provision

186. Under section 55(7) the relevant authority must give a decision notice to the community transfer body with its decision with regard to the asset transfer request and the reasons for it.

187. Section 55(9) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make regulations with provision about information that a decision notice is to contain (in addition to the information required under Part 5) and also the manner in which a decision notice is to be given.

Reason for taking power

188. The power is to enable the development of the decision notice procedure. It will be important that the decision notice will contain relevant information and is given in an appropriate manner which is accessible to members of the community transfer body. Section 56(2) describes information to be contained within a decision notice that relates to a successful asset transfer request. However, as the detail of the decision notice procedure is developed it may be considered appropriate to include other information. Further, from time to time in the light of practical experience and other developments the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the information that a decision notice is to contain and also the manner in which a decision notice is to be given.

Reason for choice of procedure

189. The information that a decision notice is to contain and the manner in which a decision notice is given are administrative matters, and will change from time to time. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 56(10) – Power to make provision about a direction to extend the period within which a contract is to be concluded

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

190. Section 56 sets out the procedure to be followed when an asset transfer request is agreed to. Subsection (5) provides that if a contract is not concluded within the period set out in subsection (7), the decision to agree to the request is of no effect. Under subsection (7) the period for concluding a contract is 6 months from the date of the offer or such longer period as agreed between the relevant authority and the community transfer body. If the relevant authority does not agree to extend the period, the community transfer body may apply to the Scottish Ministers under subsection (8) for a direction that the period should be extended.

191. Subsection (10) gives the Scottish Ministers power to make regulations with provision about the form and procedure for making an application for a direction under subsection (8), the manner in which a direction is to be given and the information which a direction is to contain.
Reason for taking power

192. The power is to enable the development of the direction procedure. It will be important that the form and procedure for making an application is effective and efficient, that the direction contains relevant information and is given in an appropriate manner which is accessible to the relevant authority and the community transfer body. Further, from time to time in the light of practical experience and other developments the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the form and procedure for making an application, the information that a direction is to contain and also the manner in which a direction is to be given.

Reason for choice of procedure

193. The form and procedure for making an application, the information that a direction is to contain and also the manner in which a direction is to be given are administrative matters, and may change from time to time. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 58(3) – Power to prescribe asset transfer request appeal procedure, time limits and the manner in which appeals are to be conducted

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

194. Section 58 sets out the circumstances when a community transfer body can appeal in relation to an asset transfer request. The community transfer body can appeal to the Scottish Ministers, unless the relevant authority is the Scottish Ministers or a local authority.

195. Subsection (3) enables the Scottish Ministers by regulations to prescribe the appeal procedure, the manner in which appeals are to be conducted and the time limits within which appeals must be brought.

Reason for taking power

196. The power is to enable the development of the asset transfer request appeal process and procedure. It will be important that the process and procedure for appeals is transparent, effective and efficient. Further, from time to time in the light of practical experience and understanding the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the process and procedure for appeals.

Reason for choice of procedure

197. The asset transfer appeal process and procedure are administrative matters, and may change from time to time. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.
Section 59(3) – Power to prescribe procedure, time limits and the manner in which local authority reviews of asset transfer requests are to be conducted

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

198. Under section 59(1), if a community transfer body has made an asset transfer request to a local authority and the authority has refused the request, agreed to it but attached material terms and conditions different to those in the request or has not given a decision notice the body can apply to the local authority to review the case and if an application is made the authority must carry out a review.

199. Subsection (3) enables the Scottish Ministers by regulations to prescribe the procedure to be followed in connection with reviews, the manner in which such reviews are to be carried out and the time limits within which applications for review must be made. Under subsection (4) the regulations may also provide that the manner in which a review, or any stage of a review, is to be carried out is at the discretion of the authority.

Reason for taking power

200. The power is to enable the development of the process and procedure for local authority reviews of asset transfer requests. It will be important that the process and procedure for reviews is transparent, effective and efficient. Further, from time to time and in the light of practical experience the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the procedure for local authority reviews, for example, to highlight best practice and ensure consistency in procedure across Scotland.

Reason for choice of procedure

201. The process and procedure for asset transfer reviews by local authorities are administrative matters, and may change from time to time. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the order/regulations on the other.

Part 7 – Allotments

Section 68(d) – Meaning of “allotment”

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

202. Section 68 defines “allotment” for the purpose of Part 7 of the Bill. The definition does not include size parameters and so land that meets the criteria set out in section 68(a) to (c) will be an allotment regardless of the size of the land. The power in section 68(d) will allow the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out the size of land that is to constitute an allotment for the purposes of Part 7 of the Bill.

Reason For Taking Power

203. This power will enable Scottish Ministers to make provision on the specific size of an allotment should this be required. Currently, allotment sizes vary both within and between allotment sites. This variability is a reflection of individual tenants’ needs and abilities to maintain and grow on an area. The Bill enables this variability to continue. Should there however, be a need to specify a prescriptive size for an allotment the Scottish Ministers have been provided with the relevant powers.

Choice of Procedure

204. It is not considered that detailed Parliamentary scrutiny is required for this provision since it will define the size an allotment should it be required. Negative procedure will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the purpose of the regulations on the other.

Section 70(2)(c) – Request to lease allotment

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

205. A request to lease an allotment must be made in writing and include the name and address of the person making the request, information about the needs of a disabled applicant and such other information as the Scottish Ministers may set out in regulations.

206. Before making regulations the Scottish Ministers must consult each local authority and any other person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest.

Reason For Taking Power

207. This power will allow the Scottish Ministers flexibility to extend the information provided by any person making a request for an allotment should the need arise. For example, a situation may arise whereby there is great demand in a local area for allotments and a local authority may wish to know, within any request made, whether the applicants are already tenants on an allotment so that allotment provision may be prioritised.

Choice of Procedure

208. The negative procedure is considered appropriate because this is an administrative matter. Additionally, before the Scottish Ministers make regulations under this power section 70(6) of the Bill requires that local authorities and any other person, with an interest, has to be consulted and therefore it is considered unnecessary for further Parliamentary scrutiny.
Section 72(4) and (5) – Duty to provide allotments

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure

Provision

209. Section 72(1) provides that, where section 72(2) or (3) applies, a local authority must take reasonable steps to ensure the number of people on its waiting list for an allotment is no more than half the number of allotments owned and leased by the authority. Section 72(4) allows the Scottish Ministers to amend the proportion referred to section 72(1). Where a local authority already owns or leases allotments, the duty under section 72(1) is triggered as soon as there is one person on the waiting list. Where an authority does not own or lease allotments, the duty is triggered when there are 15 people on the waiting list. Section 72(5) provides the Scottish Ministers with power to amend the specified number of people recorded on a waiting list referred to in section 72(2) and (3) which triggers the duty.

Reason For Taking Powers

210. Current legislation places a duty on local authorities to provide an allotment if there is an identified need. The consultation on the potential content of a Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill (September 2012) and stakeholder events highlighted that demand for allotments in Scotland is currently high and that the waiting times to gain an allotment are long.

211. These powers will enable the Scottish Ministers to vary the trigger point at which a local authority has to take reasonable steps to provide an allotment in response to changes in demand.

Choice of Procedure

212. These powers are subject to the affirmative procedure allowing for detailed Parliamentary scrutiny. This is considered appropriate since these powers would result in amendment of primary legislation.

Section 73(1) – Allotment site regulations: additional provision

Power conferred on: Local Authority
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary Procedure: None

Provision

213. Local authorities must make regulations about allotment sites in their area and these must be made before the expiry of the period of two years beginning with the date on which this section comes into force. This power allows for different provisions for different areas or types of allotment sites.
Reason For Taking Power

214. It is considered to be appropriate for local authorities to have power to make regulations for the allotment sites in its area. This will give local authorities flexibility to manage allotment sites as they consider fit. The power allows local authorities to make different provision for different areas or different types of allotment site as there is a wide variety of allotment site-types with respect to their layout and management.

Choice of Procedure

215. Since this provision is delegating powers to local authorities to regulate allotment sites in their local area it was viewed that Parliamentary scrutiny was not appropriate. Section 74 makes provision for the consultation that local authorities must undertake before making regulations under section 73(1) and provides that the regulation are executed by being signed by the proper officer of the local authority.

Section 77(3)(d) – Duty to prepare food-growing strategy

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

216. Section 77(1) requires each local authority to prepare a food-growing strategy for its area. A food-growing strategy is a document that identifies land in the local authorities’ areas that may be used for allotments and identifies other land that could be used by communities for growing vegetables, fruit, herbs or flowers, describing how the local authority intends to increase the provision in its area of allotments and containing such other information that may be set out in regulations. Section 77(3) makes further provision about the food-growing strategy and section 77(3)(d) allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out additional information that is to be included in a food-growing strategy.

Reason For Taking Power

217. This provision enables the Scottish Ministers to prescribe any additional information required for inclusion in a local authority food-growing strategy so enabling the ‘type’ of information to vary depending on what is considered to be appropriate at that time.

Choice of Procedure

218. This provision will result in additional information being required to be included in a local authority food-growing strategy and is likely to change over time in the light of experience and best practice. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.
Section 79(2)(n) – Annual allotments report

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

219. Section 79 requires each local authority to prepare and publish an annual allotments report. Section 79(2) sets out the information to be included in an annual allotments report and section 79(2)(n) allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out additional information that is to be included within the annual report.

Reason For Taking Power

220. By enabling the Scottish Ministers to make regulations requiring additional information to be provided in an annual report this allows the reporting process to be more responsive to future information needs. For example, in the future it may be appropriate to require information about the number of organic allotment sites.

Choice of Procedure

221. This provision will result in additional information being required to be included in a local authority annual allotments report and is likely to change over time in the light of experience and best practice. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure is to be used so as to achieve the best balance of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.

Section 80(7) – Power to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

222. Section 80 makes provision enabling local authorities to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites in certain circumstances. Section 80(7) gives the Scottish Ministers power to make regulations making further provision as to the procedure to be applied in connection with the exercise of the powers of a local authority in section 80(2) to remove an unauthorised building from an allotment site.

Reason For Taking Power

223. The power allows flexibility when developing the detail of the procedure to remove an unauthorised building from an allotment site. Further, from time to time in the light of practical experience and other developments the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the procedure. Detailed matters relating to procedure are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation.
This document relates to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 52) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014

Choice of Procedure

224. The procedure to remove an unauthorised building from an allotment site is an administrative matter and the regulations may also need to change over time to reflect practical experience. Negative procedure will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the purpose of the regulations on the other.

Section 81(3)(b)(ii) – Delegation of management of allotment sites

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

225. Section 81(1) allows a person representing the interests of certain tenants on an allotment site to make a request to the local authority that owns or leases the allotment site that the local authority delegates certain functions relating to the allotment site to that person. Section 81(3) provides that the request must be made in writing and include the name and address of the person making the request. Section 81(3)(b)(ii) enables the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out other information that must be included in the request.

Reason For Taking Power

226. Allotments and allotment sites are managed in different ways both within and between local authorities and this variability is likely to continue in the future. Given this variability the power allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations requiring further information about the person requesting to take over management of certain functions in relation to an allotment site should the need arise.

Choice of Procedure

227. The requirement for further information regarding the delegation of management of allotment sites is an administrative matter. Negative procedure will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the purpose of the regulations on the other.

Section 83(10) – termination of lease of allotment or allotment site

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

228. Section 83(1) allows a local authority to terminate the whole or part of a lease of an allotment by giving written notice to the tenant. Section 83 sets out the process that a local authority must comply with to terminate the lease and provides a tenant of an allotment with a right of appeal to the sheriff against the notice of termination. Section 83(10) enables Ministers to make regulations make further provision about the procedure to be applied when a local authority terminates a lease under section 83.

Reason For Taking Power

229. The power allows flexibility when developing the detail of the procedure that a local authority must comply with to terminate the lease and the level of detail that may be required is best set out in regulations. Further, from time to time in the light of practical experience and other developments the Scottish Ministers may wish to make changes to the procedure.

Choice of Procedure

230. The procedure that a local authority must comply with to terminate the lease under section 83 is an administrative matter and the regulations may also need to change over time to reflect practical experience. Negative procedure will achieve the best balance between use of Parliamentary time and resource on the one hand and the purpose of the regulations on the other.

Section 87(1) – Sale of surplus produce

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

231. Section 87(1) provides that a tenant of an allotment may only sell (other than with a view to making a profit) produce grown on the allotment if the produce falls within a description set out in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers.

Reason For Taking Power

232. During the consultation process this area was raised by stakeholders as an area of concern and it is now being addressed through the Bill. The power will provide Ministers with flexibility in setting out the description of produce grown on an allotment that may be sold, including the ability to respond swiftly if required.

Choice of Procedure

233. Before the Scottish Ministers make regulations under this power section 87(2) of the Bill requires that local authorities and any other person, with an interest, has to be consulted. Given this and the type of detail to be included in the regulations it is not considered that a more detailed level of parliamentary scrutiny is required and so the negative procedure is appropriate.

Section 89(4) – Compensation for disturbance

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

SP Bill 52–DPM 46 Session 4 (2014)
Provision

234. Section 89 makes provision for the payment by local authorities of compensation to tenants of allotments for disturbance in certain circumstances. Section 89(4) requires the Scottish Ministers to make regulations making further provisions in relation to the payment of compensation for disturbance. Section 89(6) requires the Scottish Ministers to consult each local authority and other interested persons before making the regulations.

Reason For Taking Power

235. This provision requires the Scottish Ministers to make provision about matters such as the determination of the amount of compensation and the process through which compensation would be claimed. This provision is likely to be fairly detailed and more suited to inclusion within regulations.

Choice of Procedure

236. Before the Scottish Ministers make regulations under this power section 89(6) of the Bill requires that local authorities and any other person, with an interest, has to be consulted. Given this and the type of detail to be included in the regulations it is not considered that a more detailed level of parliamentary scrutiny is required and so the negative procedure is appropriate.

Section: 90(4) – Compensation for deterioration of allotment

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

237. Section 90 makes provision for tenants to be required to pay compensation for deterioration of an allotment to the landlord in certain circumstances. Section 90(4) requires Scottish Ministers to make regulations making further provision in connection with such compensation.

Reason For Taking Power

238. This provision requires Scottish Ministers to make regulations about matters such as the liability for and the determination of the amount of compensation. This provision is likely to be fairly detailed and more suited to inclusion within regulations.

Choice of Procedure

239. Since this provision requires the Scottish Ministers to consult each local authority and any other person with an interest before making regulations (section 90(6)) and the type of detail to be included in the regulations it is considered that detailed Parliamentary scrutiny is unnecessary and as such a negative procedure is considered appropriate.
Section: 91(3) – Compensation for loss of crops

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Negative procedure

Provision

240. Section 91 makes provision for the payment of compensation by a local authority to a tenant for loss of crops following resumption of the allotment in certain circumstances. Section 91(3) requires the Scottish Ministers to make regulations making further provisions in connection with such compensation.

Reason For Taking Power

241. This provision requires the Scottish Ministers to make regulations and this must include provision about the determination of the amount of compensation and the process through which compensation would be claimed. This provision is likely to be fairly detailed and more suited to inclusion within regulations.

Choice of Procedure

242. Given that this provision requires the Scottish Ministers to consult each local authority and any other person with an interest before making regulations (section 91(5)) and the type of detail to be included in the regulations it is considered that detailed Parliamentary scrutiny is unnecessary and the negative procedure is considered appropriate.

Part 9 - General

Section 97(1) – Ancillary provision

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure – where regulations amend primary legislation. Negative procedure – where the regulations do not amend primary legislation

Provision

243. Section 97 confers on the Scottish Ministers a power to make incidental, supplementary, consequential, transitional or transitory provision or savings as they consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision of the Act or any provision made under it. Under subsection (2) an order under section 97 may modify any enactment (including the Act), instrument or document.

Reason for taking power

244. Any body of new law may give rise to a need for a range of ancillary provisions. Without the power to make incidental, supplementary and consequential provision it may be necessary to return to the Parliament, through subsequent primary legislation, to deal with minor matters.
which require to be dealt with to give full effect to the original Bill. That would not be an effective use of either the Parliament’s or the Government’s resources. The power itself is circumscribed by being entirely ancillary to the provisions of the Bill and any such provision must be for the purposes of the Bill or in consequence of it or for giving full effect to it. It is appropriate for significant transitional, transitory or saving provision (as opposed to routine provision connected to commencement) to be subject to parliamentary procedure.

Reason for choice of procedure

245. Under section 96(2) any regulations made under section 97(1) will be subject to affirmative procedure if they contain provisions which make textual changes to an Act. Otherwise, they will be subject to negative procedure. This provides the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny for the textual amendment of primary legislation while ensuring that other ancillary provision is still subject to appropriate scrutiny by Parliament.

Section 99 – Commencement

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>Regulations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>No parliamentary procedure</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Provision

246. Section 99 provides that the provisions of the Bill (other than Part 9 which comes into force the day after Royal Assent) come into force on such day as the Scottish Ministers may by order appoint.

Reason for taking power

247. In a Bill of this nature which makes a number of improvements and reforms, the decision on when and to what extent the Bill is commenced is best determined by the Scottish Ministers, particularly as Ministers may wish (or find it appropriate) to commence provisions at different times. Transitional, transitory and saving provision may be made by a commencement order and the Scottish Government considers that those ancillary powers are required to ensure that, for example, pre-existing situations may be dealt with appropriately when Bill provisions are commenced.

Reason for choice of procedure

248. Section 99 has the effect that any such commencement order will not be subject to parliamentary procedure. This is typical of commencement powers and is justified having regard to the administrative nature of commencement of the Bill provisions which have been agreed to by the Scottish Parliament.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee
2nd Report, 2015 (Session 4)

CONTENTS

Remit and membership

Report 1

Introduction 2
  Introductory Chapter 2
  Policy underpinning the Bill 3
  Christie Commission principles and Committee scrutiny of the Bill 4
  Engagement 6
  Empowering only the empowered 8
  Supporting communities 9
  Petitions referred to us 10
  Equality Impact Assessment 10
  Accompanying Documents 11
  General Principles of the Bill and Accompanying Documents 14

Part 1: National Outcomes 15
  Background 15
  Bill proposals 15
  Committee submissions 16
  Committee recommendations on Part 1 18

Part 2: Community Planning 20
  Background 20
  Bill proposals 21
  Committee submissions 22
  Committee Recommendations on Part 2 33

Part 3: Participation Requests 36
  Background 36
  Committee submissions 38
  Recommendations on Part 3 49

Part 4: Community Right to buy 52

Part 5: Asset transfer requests 52
  Background 52
  Committee submissions 54
  Committee Recommendations on Part 5 65

Part 6: Common Good 67
Annexe C: Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee Report on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Annexe D: Evidence Received Via Social Media and Online Videos
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Remit and membership

Remit:
To consider and report on a) the financing and delivery of local government and local services, and b) planning, and c) matters relating to regeneration falling within the responsibility of the Cabinet Secretary for Infrastructure and Capital Investment.

Membership:
Clare Adamson (from 3rd December 2014)
Cameron Buchanan
Willie Coffey (from 3rd December 2014)
Cara Hilton (from 14th January 2015)
Mark McDonald (until 27th November 2014)
Stuart McMillan (until 27th November 2014)
Anne McTaggart (until 8th January 2015)
Alex Rowley
Kevin Stewart (Convener)
John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Committee Clerking Team:

Clerk to the Committee
David Cullum

Senior Assistant Clerk
Claire Menzies Smith

Assistant Clerk
Seán Wixted

Committee Assistant
Ross Fairbarin
The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

INTRODUCTION

Introductory Chapter

1. This report covers the scrutiny of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill by the Local Government and Regeneration Committee (LGR) Committee.

2. Prior to introduction to the Parliament on 11 June 2014 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill the Scottish Government undertook two separate consultations on aspects of the Bill. The first commenced in June 2012. The second began in November 2013 and was accompanied by draft legislation covering asset transfer, (what has become) participation requests and Common Good proposals.\(^1\) In addition the latter consultation sought views on community right to buy land, measures to strengthen community planning and on allotments. Finally views were sought on including a provision that places a duty on Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of outcomes that describe their long term, strategic objectives for Scotland, and include a complementary duty to report regularly and publicly on progress towards these outcomes (what has become Part 1 of the bill).

3. In between the consultations a Parliamentary debate was held on 12 September 2013 giving members the opportunity to “help to inform the future debate and work”\(^2\).

4. Following each consultation we took evidence from a wide variety of interested parties, including community groups, third sector organisations, local authorities, Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs), public sector organisations,

---

\(^1\) In addition the draft contained proposals on Defective and Dangerous Buildings which have since been covered by separate legislation: http://www.legislation.gov.uk/asp/2014/13/contents/enacted

Audit Scotland and the former Minister.\(^3\) This allowed us to follow closely the evolution of proposals and hear the aims of those affected and aspirations of Government as the legislation developed.

5. Other work we undertook during this period is closely linked to aspects of what is now the Bill in particular our three part inquiry into Public Services Reform\(^4\), our inquiry into Regeneration in Scotland\(^5\) and the work we undertook in considering the National Planning Framework and review of Scottish Planning Policy. All had a close community focus and assisted in our consideration of this Bill. We also understand from the Scottish Government this work was taken account of and assisted in relation to the eventual formulation of the Bill.\(^6\)

6. Once the Bill was introduced we were designated as lead committee for stage 1 consideration. On introduction the Bill had 8 substantive Parts as follows:

- Part 1 National Outcomes
- Part 2 Community Planning
- Part 3 Participation Requests
- Part 4 Community Right to Buy Land
- Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests
- Part 6 Common Good Property
- Part 7 Allotments and
- Part 8 Non-Domestic Rates.

7. Each part could have been a Bill in its own right and accordingly we resolved to look at each part individually whilst also being mindful of the overlaps that did exist and common themes underpinning the Bill. As a consequence this report is divided into Parts corresponding to each part of the Bill with an introductory chapter pulling together some of the common themes as well as our overall conclusion on the general principles of the Bill. Each part of the report looking at the individual Bill parts (with the exception of Part 4) follows a similar format,

- setting out the background to and an overview of that Part of the Bill,
- summarising key aspects of the submissions received by the committee (from whatever source and timeframe), and

---

Strand 3, developing new ways of delivering services: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/56442.aspx

8. We are indebted to the Rural Affairs and Climate Change Committee (RACCE) who, given their earlier experiences and interest in land reform, agreed to consider Part 4 of the Bill. We have included their report and findings at Annex A of our Report. We anticipate RACCE will continue to be involved at stage 2 at which time the Government have indicated an intention to bring forward amendments to make changes to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 on crofting right to buy.\(^7\)

9. We also received reports from the Finance and Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committees. Both are annexed (Annexes B and C respectively) to this report. We questioned the Minister on the reports and our views, conclusions and recommendations are contained later in this introductory chapter.

Policy underpinning the Bill

10. The various debates and hearings gave us an expectation of what the Bill and the underlying policy were intended to deliver. For example in the debate on 12 September 2013 the Minister stated he was talking about more than legislation or regulation “We are talking about culture, leadership, and the practical support that can be provided to deliver community empowerment” and that he wanted to “set the people free.” Noting the proposed Bill represented “the biggest potential transfer of powers to local communities since devolution.”\(^8\)

11. In evidence to us on 5 March the Minister suggested:-

“The driving force behind the bill is the view that we can unlock much of Scotland’s potential through community empowerment, and we believe that the various components of the bill can make a difference in doing that. Specifically, the bill will make it easier for communities to take on public sector assets and make better use of them; give communities a right to be listened to when they have proposals to improve services in their area”

12. He added: “Legislation will not fix everything, but it can help with the creation of a culture in which community empowerment is the right thing to do.”\(^9\)

13. Following the Government reshuffle the new Minister Marco Biagi stated empowering communities is at the heart of everything we do.\(^10\)

14. The Scottish Government’s states on its website the benefits of community empowerment,

\(^7\) Letter from Minister Mackay preceding his appearance before the Committee in November 2014: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/Kevin_Stewart_MSP_Letter_-_6_November_2014.pdf

\(^8\) Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 12 September 2013, closing speech

\(^10\) Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, Chamber 11 December, column 44
“Where communities are empowered we would expect to see a range of benefits: local democratic participation boosted; increased confidence and skills among local people; higher numbers of people volunteering in their communities; and more satisfaction with quality of life in a local neighbourhood. Better community engagement and participation leads to the delivery of better, more responsive services and better outcomes for communities.”

15. The Bill will, according to the Policy Memorandum, help to ensure people can meaningfully participate in decisions that affect their lives. It reflects policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a strategic framework which will:

- Empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and

- Support an increase in the pace and scale of Public Service Reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.

16. As well as considering the policy detail underpinning the Bill, throughout our consideration we have given consideration to looking closely at the extent to which it will alter the balance between the state in all its manifestations and the people. In particular the extent to which the Bill succeeds in its intentions of empowering communities.

17. The recent substantial turnout in the referendum on Scottish independence showed us people are motivated to become involved in the decision making process when the decision directly affects their lives.

Christie Commission principles and Committee scrutiny of the Bill

18. From all of our work this session it is clear to us much of the Bill, particularly those parts giving rights to communities and groups, has become necessary as a consequence of the failure of public authorities and agencies to listen and to act on communities’ priorities and to embrace the principles espoused by the Christie Commission. Some of the key relevant ones being:

- Recognising that effective services must be designed with and for people and communities - not delivered ‘top down’ for administrative convenience

- Maximising scarce resources by utilising all available resources from the public, private and third sectors, individuals, groups and communities

- Working closely with individuals and communities to understand their needs, maximise talents and resources, support self reliance, and build resilience

---

11 The Scottish Government, Community Empowerment. Available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/People/engage
• Making provision in the proposed Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill to embed community participation in the design and delivery of services

• Implementing new inter-agency training to reduce silo mentalities, drive forward service integration and build a common public service ethos\textsuperscript{12}

19. The Minister on 5 March 2014 noted—

“The committee’s work has assisted [in the development of the Bill]. The four pillars of the Christie commission’s report around prevention, integration, people and the workforce, and improvement are absolutely what this work is about. The bill is principally about prevention and people. For example, if people have the tools to do the job, they will be able to help to set their own destiny by creating community projects that deliver for them. That is very empowering and very much fits in with the preventative and the people agendas, so the bill will be absolutely in tune with the Christie commission recommendations on empowerment. The bill will also be about decentralisation because it is about taking away bureaucracy in order to support that agenda.”\textsuperscript{13}

20. The Accounts Commission for Scotland and Auditor General have noted a need for fundamentally different ways of working to be adopted in the redesign and delivery of public services including a need to address ways of working.\textsuperscript{14} Kay Gilmour (East Ayrshire Council) told us public bodies need to go on a journey of cultural improvement and only then will they avoid getting anxious if they receive suggestions about doing things differently and better or other innovations are suggested.\textsuperscript{15}

21. To succeed, the Bill must be a catalyst for change including significant cultural change across our public services. We return to this aspect at various parts of this report.

22. In the words of the Minister—

“We are removing barriers, creating consistency and giving people access to resources that are, in essence, already theirs through public ownership.”\textsuperscript{16}

23. To commence our scrutiny we wrote to the Scottish Government seeking clarification of a number of issues relating to the information supplied in the Policy Memorandum. In total we posed 147 questions, answers to which we considered would assist our scrutiny and assist those responding to our call for evidence. We

\textsuperscript{12} The Scottish Government, Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/06/27154527/2

\textsuperscript{13} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report, 5 March 2014}, column 3181

\textsuperscript{14} Accounts Commission for Scotland & Auditor General for Scotland. Written submission.

\textsuperscript{15} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report 27, October 2014}, column 40 are extremely grateful to the Scottish Government for responding timeously to this request which we were told assisted those responding to us, and may well have restricted the need for other comment. References to the additional information supplied is made throughout our report, which highlights the value attached to its production.

24. We heard from a wide range of witnesses at six meetings including meeting in Dumfries and Fort William. At both of these external meetings we also heard informally from a range of people mainly from the local communities. In addition members visited a number of allotment sites in Glasgow. We are grateful to all those who wrote to us or gave their time to speak to us directly. All the information received has been considered by us and it is only through the input of such a range of people that we are able to complete this task and report as required. Official Reports from each meeting and notes taken at the informal meetings are all available on-line.

25. In a change to the usual order of events we heard from the Minister on the Bill prior to taking evidence in Fort William and we are grateful to the Minister and his officials for their flexibility in this matter.

26. While we took discrete evidence at our sessions directed at individual parts of the Bill, some common themes apply across the entire bill and these are covered in the following paragraphs.

Engagement

27. The Bill in a number of places requires public bodies and others including the Scottish Government to undertake consultation and engagement with communities before actions are taken. Some issues were raised around a lack of specification as to how this should be conducted.

28. Councillor McGuigan made the point that engagement can happen in all sorts of ways, sometimes hollow sometimes fruitful. He further noted a need to get into

---

18 Local Government and Regeneration Committee. Note of roundtable discussion held in Dumfries on 27 October 2014. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/Dumfries_roundtable_notes.pdf

19 Note of roundtable discussion held in Fort William on 24 October 2014. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/Fort_William_roundtable_notes.pdf

Elma Murray, representing the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers (SOLACE) said:

―The communities that we work with tell us what they want and we listen to that. We work with them to make decisions about what we prioritise.‖

29. However Ms Murray later admitted some communities are disempowered by the structures and processes determined largely by authorities. Adding that communities tend to be organised by the authorities to suit the convenience of the authority. 23 Councillor O’Neill President of COSLA added that a poll undertaken for the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy found “government is remote from communities”. 24

30. A number of respondents called for the National Standards for Community Engagement to be included in the Bill to act as a code of conduct for engagement, albeit an updated list of standards that has co-production embedded within them.

31. Children in Scotland made the point—

32. “there are groups and individuals who are detached and disengaged from effective engagement with community structures and that they are likely also to be those who experience marginalisation in other aspects of their lives. It is should not be a case of ‘training’ such people to fit in with structures largely devised and driven by large bureaucratic bodies, but ensuring that systems are accessible, enabling and, critically, can show that community participation is not a tokenistic compliance with a statutory duty but can bring about positive change.”

33. During our meeting on 24 September we were reminded by Councillor McGuigan about what happens when only “experts” are consulted—

“although we had consulted all the experts and some of the influential community groups that operated in the area, we had not consulted the real experts, who were the people who lived in the community and who were experiencing what life was really like there. There were people who had skills, understanding, knowledge and a desire to make a change in their community, but we had forgotten—I had forgotten—to include that important voice. That is what the empowerment bill should be about.” 25

34. We were pleased to hear the Minister go some way to meeting these concerns when he indicated he will lodge an amendment at stage 2 to strengthen accountability in community planning partnerships by making reference to the

---

21 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 24 September, column 14
22 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 24 September, column 20
23 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 24 September, column 11
24 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 24 September, column 12 national standards of engagement. We will expect that amendment to apply widely and cover all instances of engagement under the Bill.

Empowering only the empowered

35. At the Committee meeting on 5 March the Minister noted a concern that if the (draft) Bill was applied equally it would make inequality worse. He indicated it required to be framed to give support in such a way as to present a level playing field. He added “the bill must swing the pendulum of power from the state to communities”\(^{26}\) In the earlier debate on 12 September 2013 concerns were noted about the bill “inadvertently widening the inequalities gap by favouring those who already have the capacity to take action to be successful”\(^{27}\)

36. The Scottish Community Alliance summed up the view of many third sector respondents, stating—

“This Bill contains new opportunities that communities can take advantage of and, if they do, these communities are likely to become more empowered than they otherwise would be. It has often been said during the course of the consultations for this Bill, that legislation cannot empower communities - only local people can empower themselves.”\(^{28}\)

37. A note of caution was also expressed by The Poverty Alliance who stated: “the most important aspect of this Bill is around empowering Scotland’s most disadvantaged communities, and narrowing inequalities between those communities which are already empowered and those which will require more support.” They added—

38. “There is a danger that the Bill, in its current form, will most benefit those communities which are already empowered and able to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill.”\(^{29}\)

39. Oxfam for example noted that participation requests “risk becoming the privilege of already empowered communities with greater capacity to access, navigate and resource such a process.”\(^{30}\)

40. A number of other submissions and witnesses also referred to the prospect of the Bill only strengthening the reach and influence of articulate and organised groups and individuals. As a consequence it was suggested empowerment would be for the few with the many left further disempowered. Those communities with ‘sharp elbows’ would end up with the lion’s share of what is available, with perhaps outcomes being improved for one community at the expense of another.

---

\(^{26}\) Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 5 March 2014 column 3171

\(^{27}\) Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 12 September 2013 [Sarah Boyack opening]

\(^{28}\) Scottish Community Alliance. Written submission.

\(^{29}\) Poverty Alliance. Written submission.

\(^{30}\) Oxfam Scotland. Written submission.
41. During questioning on 1 October a number of witnesses agreed with the idea of moving towards “postcode priorities” focussing on the areas of greatest need and the areas where the greatest inequalities are in communities.

Supporting communities

42. Submissions to us highlighted a mixed picture across the country in terms of support currently available to community groups generally and also specifically for those who wished to take control of existing public sector assets. We heard some excellent examples of how local authorities support communities particularly in Dundee in relation to their regeneration forums which are supported by community officers who are designated specific areas as well as being themselves empowered—

“All the officers meet—monthly, I think—and they meet the chief executive regularly, too. They meet regularly together and with the chief executive and take forward the needs and wants of the volunteers whom they speak to in the area.”

43. While other local authorities, including East Ayrshire and Dumfries and Galloway told us about similar types of officers in place to assist with asset transfer requests the picture was far from universal even across local authorities, let alone the other bodies subject to the provisions of the Bill.

44. Many respondents were concerned about resourcing issues, while most were looking inward at requirements for their own organisations. Aberdeenshire CPP noted it is important there is sufficient support in place for communities to get what they need out of the bill. The support required relates to specific applications, such as participation requests and asset transfer applications but more generally across communities to assist in building capacity to take full advantage of the bill.

45. There was general agreement more needs to be done “to support individuals and communities to participate and tackle inactivity.” This issue was raised with us during our evidence on 5 March when witnesses agreed on the need for community capacity building.

46. Another concern raised by several witnesses from the public sector was around conflicts of interest in assisting applicants and a fear of being blamed if applications were ultimately refused. We were therefore pleased when the Minister stated—

“It sounds like an excuse to me if a local authority thinks that it cannot support a community group in compiling a solid and robust business plan for the benefit of a community that leads to an asset transfer. Conflicts of interests arise when a local authority could be compromised, but I see no reason why a local authority cannot support local groups to produce such a case. Local authorities and other public sector authorities might frustrate community groups by not providing the information that is required, which is why there will be a requirement in legislation to produce the information that is needed to understand the nature of the assets and buildings.”

31 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014 column 52
32 Volunteer Scotland. Written submission.

47. We consider the same position should apply to all parts of the Bill and to all the public bodies subject to provisions. We recommend the Bill, or regulations or guidance should set out requirements in this regard on such bodies to provide upfront support with the necessary expertise to support applicants.

48. We acknowledge the strengthening communities programme as well as the work of the Development Trusts Association (“DTA”) and other third sector bodies. Strengthening communities is however a fundamental area, unless measures are in place and adequately resourced the aims of the bill in relation to empowering communities are bound to fail. We look forward to the views of the Government in relation to the funding of capacity building, recognising the long term aim must be to build capacity directly into communities. We expect the Government to state the current amount spent on community capacity building and the extent to which that will increase as the bill is implemented.

49. The Minister acknowledged concerns when indicating the Government was “tooling up groups that will support the agenda nationally.” We agree with the submission of South Lanarkshire Council who suggested there should be a specific duty on CPP partners to reduce inequality and focus on early intervention and prevention. We look forward to the Scottish Government stating how this will be taken forward.

Petitions referred to us

50. During our scrutiny at stage 1 we have considered petitions PE1433 and PE1497, both of which were referred to us as being relevant to this work. We have used these petitions throughout our scrutiny including taking additional oral evidence from the petitioner Mr Hancox.

51. There are references later in the report to each petition and we are grateful to both petitioners for the information supplied throughout the whole process. Having now concluded our stage 1 consideration of the Bill there is no further action we would wish to take on either petition and accordingly we close them both.

Equality Impact Assessment

52. The Scottish Government’s Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA), contains information central to the general principles of the Bill. The importance of such an exercise is particularly high for this bill given its aims. We have heard concerns throughout stage 1 about the risk to “marginalised communities, such as disabled people if recognition of community groups is granted to professional or already well-resourced groups at the expense of groups representing disadvantaged or equalities groups.”

33 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 12 November, column 15

53. A number of written submissions observed concerns around particular areas, these covered children, the islands, disabled interests and others. We agree the EQIA should be “a fundamental part of the policy development process not an add-on once the main work has been done”.

54. A sizable proportion of respondents to our call for evidence raised concerns about the Bill’s (EQIA) not being available in advance of our call for evidence to help inform their submissions. We asked, in our letter to the Scottish Government Officials on 25 June 2014, when the EQIA would be available and were advised on 1 August it “will be published very shortly. We will inform the Committee and stakeholders when it is available.” The EQIA was finally published on the Government’s website on 4 November, without any reason for the delay being provided.

55. It is unacceptable that equality information was not available until a very late stage in the Committee’s Stage 1 scrutiny, particularly given it clearly indicates that those communities who stand to benefit most from the Bill, might be unable to take advantage of it. This delay in publication had a direct impact on our ability to scrutinise the participation requests provisions in the Bill. We will ask the Scottish Parliament’s Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee to look at this aspect with a view to considering whether lodging of an EQIA document should be mandatory with a bill at introduction.

Accompanying Documents

Financial Memorandum

56. Standing Orders Rule 9.6, require us, as the lead committee at Stage 1, to consider and report on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum (“FM”). In doing so, we are required to consider any views submitted to us by the Finance Committee. That Committee reported to us on 31 October 2014. A copy of their report is at Annexe B.

57. The FM states that it sets out the costs associated with each part of the Bill and on pages 52 to 60 includes a table summarising the additional costs expected to arise as a result of the Bill’s provisions.

58. The Finance Committee came to a number of conclusions throughout their report, and invited us to seek responses, clarification, elaboration and detail from the Minister on various aspects of the FM and costs arising therefrom. In respect of the comments directly referring to Part 4 of the Bill we requested the RACCE Committee consider these as part of their scrutiny of that Part of the Bill.

59. Paragraphs 38 and 54 of the Finance Committee report both specified concerns held by them in relation to the FM. We note from their report these concerns persisted after hearing from officials and receiving supplementary written 35 Inclusion Scotland. Written submission.

36 Unison Scotland Written submission.
37 Q&A paragraph 138
submission dated 24 October from the Minister. In each case the Finance Committee comments suggest difficulties, if not resolved, in reaching the levels of information the Scottish Parliament requires under Standing Orders. These paragraphs are in the following terms:

“38. The Committee acknowledges the difficulties faced in quantifying potential future costs arising from services that will be demand driven. However, the Committee remains concerned that, despite the requirements of Standing Orders, best estimates have not been fully provided.

“54. The Committee acknowledges the difficulty in providing concrete estimates of services that will be demand driven but emphasises that Standing Orders require FMs to provide best estimates of costs, their timescales and margins of uncertainty.”

60. We asked the Minister for further information on the costs provided at our evidence session with him on 12 November.

61. In response the Minister, while recognising the requirements of Standing Orders and “understanding the rules of the Parliament”, made clear he was not going to “make up a figure” for activities he could not quantify as that would be misleading. He added that if the bill was successful, empowering, and well used the Scottish Government would have to consider the financial consequences on public bodies.

62. The Minister further indicated he had provided best estimates by suggesting the costs of the bureaucracy arising from the bill could be absorbed. Adding it was not possible to provide a range of figures because he could not predict demand for the measures in the Bill although he would continue to monitor the situation.

63. Finally the Minister added he would produce a figure if so recommended but “it would be utterly false”.

64. The difficulty here is the requirements set out by Standing Orders. These require the provision of best estimates of all costs coupled with a margin of uncertainty. This information is required to allow Parliament to consider the costs of legislation put before it and to enable a reasoned judgment to be made on whether these costs should be approved.

65. Approval of any such additional costs is provided by way of a financial resolution which must, when the Presiding Officer has, as she has done here, determined costs are relevant. The financial resolution must be approved by Parliament before any bill can proceed past stage 1. Such a decision is separate to the decision on the general principles of a bill at stage 1 and without approval of a financial resolution a bill will fall.

38 Standing Orders rule 9.3.2
66. While we have a degree of sympathy with the reasons expressed by the Minister we do not consider the circumstances of this Bill to be so different from other pieces of legislation, which in the face of similar difficulties in estimating demand, take up and costs, satisfied the requirements of Standing Orders. The Finance Committee, who scrutinise all Financial Memoranda, have not sought to make an exception for this Bill and their report makes their position clear.\footnote{40}

67. We therefore draw to Parliament’s attention when considering the financial resolution on this Bill the concerns of the Finance Committee that, despite the requirements of Standing Orders, best estimates have not been provided.\footnote{41}

Delegated Powers Memorandum

68. The remit of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee (DPLRC Committee) includes to consider and report on proposed powers to make subordinate powers in legislation including whether any proposed powers are appropriate. They considered the proposed powers in the Bill and reported to us on 5 November 2014. A copy of their report is at Annexe C. The parts of the report relevant to Part 4 of the Bill have been considered by the RACCE committee and are covered in their report to us (see part 4 of this report).

69. Before considering the detailed comment on three specific powers we draw to the attention of Parliament the general comments the DPLRC committee made at paragraph 17 of their report in relation to the deficiencies in the material presented to them both initially and during their scrutiny.

70. In relation to the powers being sought in the Bill the DPLR Committee report noted 3 areas of concern relevant to aspects of the Bill we considered.

71. The first (at paragraph 34) relates to Part 1 of the Bill when the Committee notes an absence of a role for the Scottish Parliament in the setting and review of the national outcomes (see Part 1 of the Bill). Adding—

> “a more active scrutiny role for the Parliament appears to be justified having regard to the significance of the national outcomes, the discretion afforded to the Scottish Ministers in deciding how the outcomes are presented and measured, and the fact that all public bodies and other persons carrying out functions of a public nature as described in section 1(1) would require to have regard to the outcomes.”

72. We look more closely at this aspect in Part 1 of our report as well as the DPLR’s comments regarding minimum levels of consultation required.

73. The second concern of the DPLR asks the Scottish Government to amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to make the powers in sections 4(6) and 8(3) (re bodies to be part of CPP’s) subject to the affirmative procedure when exercised so as to add bodies to the lists in schedule 1 or section 8(2) respectively. The Committee also recommended that the powers in sections 16(3) and 51(3) be made subject to the affirmative procedure.

\footnote{40 See Footnote 39.}

\footnote{41 Paragraphs 66 and 67 were agreed to, by division: For 4 (Cameron Buchanan; Cara Hilton; Alex Rowley; John Wilson), Against 3 (Clare Adamson; Willie Coffey; Kevin Stewart), Abstentions 0.}

74. We were pleased to learn both these recommendations will be taken forward by the Scottish Government.42

75. The third concern of the DPLR relates to section 10 powers to issue guidance. The Committee had a number of concerns, in principle, noting also that such a power is unusual. The Committee noted reasons for taking such a power were not clear from evidence to the Committee nor was it clear how it could be exercised. Other aspects regarding how it would be differentiated, which parts of guidance would be binding and which would not allowing local discretion and innovation were equally unclear and not provided for in section 10. Finally the DPLR Committee commented on the absence of any mechanism to enforce compliance or sanction for failure to comply with guidance issued.

76. Again here we were pleased to learn these concerns will be addressed by the Scottish Government at stage 2.43

General Principles of the Bill and Accompanying Documents

77. The Committee report to Parliament they are content with the general principles of the Bill although ask Parliament to note the comment made throughout this report on the detail.

78. The Committee also draws to the attention of Parliament a general concern around the accompanying documents. We have noted the concerns of the Finance Committee and the DPLR Committee. And also those of the RACCE Committee in their report to us.

79. For our part we found it necessary to seek substantial additional detail to supplement that supplied in the Policy Memorandum. We observe the legislative requirements of Parliament are made for a purpose, not only to inform members but also, crucially, to allow the wider public to meaningfully contribute. We have also commented in this regard on the delay in publishing the EQIA until a point in time when the majority of our evidence had been taken.

80. Compliance with Standing Orders should embrace the spirit of openness and the provision of full information. We regret in this instance that may only have been achieved belatedly and to the extent it was achieved only after significant persuasion by the committees undertaking scrutiny. We regret this, not least given the purpose of this Bill.

81. Having given this overview the remainder of this report consider each Part of the Bill in turn.

PART 1 NATIONAL OUTCOMES

Background

82. In 2007, the Scottish Government introduced a new outcomes-based National Performance Framework (NPF). In June 2008, the Government launched Scotland Performs, a website designed to present information on how Scotland is performing against the range of indicators outlined in the NPF. The Framework sets out the Government's core Purpose, supported by 5 Strategic Objectives and 16 National Outcomes.

83. Underpinning the Framework are detailed Purpose Targets and National Indicators which track progress towards the Purpose and National Outcomes.

84. The overall aim of this part of the Bill is to support approaches that can contribute to improving outcomes in all aspects of people's lives such as crime, health, and reducing inequalities. Community empowerment can therefore have an important impact on a range of outcomes in the NPF.\(^{44}\)

85. The proposals in the Bill apply to all devolved public services in Scotland all of whom are aligning their work to this single framework. The Bill also covers private or third sector bodies contracted to deliver public services.

Bill proposals

86. Part 1 of the Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which must be reviewed at least once every 5 years.

87. The Bill also requires Scottish Ministers to publish regular reports on progress on the National Outcomes, although it does not specify a timescale for these reports.

88. The Bill does not prescribe what the National Outcomes should be, nor the structure of any future NPF, leaving decisions on these matters to future governments. There was a high degree of support for this proposal in the Government's second consultation. We note also the proposal was welcomed in the Finance Committee's final report on the 2014-15 Draft Budget (Finance Committee 2013).

89. The Policy Memorandum suggests the Bill reflects policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a strategic framework which with particular reference to Part 1 will—

"Support an increase in the pace and scale of Public Service Reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning."

\(^{44}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 7
90. The Policy Memorandum says Scotland Performs has been recognised both in the UK and internationally as an innovative and useful approach to defining strategic outcomes for government, and demonstrating progress towards them. In particular we noted the Carnegie UK Trust recommended in its report Shifting the Dial in Scotland (2013) that the outcomes approach should be embedded in legislation, to ensure it continues to be used in the long term.

91. Overall the Scottish Government suggested that—

“by aligning the whole public sector around a common set of goals, we can deliver real collaboration and lasting partnership working. Different organisations are now working towards shared goals defined in terms of benefits to citizens, rather than simply efficient service delivery.”

92. The Bill, in keeping with normal practice of not binding successive governments, does not require future governments to use the same model of purpose, targets, outcomes and indicators as currently used in Scotland Performs. It does however require national outcomes to be determined and seeks to provide flexibility as to how these may be presented and measured.

Committee submissions

93. From our call for evidence we received a number of comments and suggestions on this Part of the Bill. A number of respondents commented on the need for the Scottish Government to undertake a widespread consultation exercise when revising the NPF.

94. In answer to our written question on who would be involved and consulted on a review of national outcomes, the Scottish Government explained—

“We would anticipate that all governments would want to consult widely and inclusively on the national outcomes as a whole. However, if a review related only to individual outcomes on particular topics, it might be more appropriate to have a more focused consultation.”

95. Voluntary Action Scotland in their response echoed the response of a number of other bodies including SEPA, Health and Social Care Alliance Scotland, Highland Council officials, Barnardo’s Scotland Inverclyde Council, Co-Cheangal Innse Gall, Glasgow City Council, Oxfam Scotland, North Lanarkshire Council and COSLA. They stated Part 1—

“needs to be strengthened further to ensure that meaningful consultation is undertaken on the outcomes with a broad range of stakeholders, allowing for civic society and communities to voice their opinion and help set the outcomes. This will help empower communities rather than the process being driven and set by the centre.”

45 Q&A 22
46 Section 2(5)
47 Q&A 27
48 Voluntary Action Scotland. Written submission.
96. The Minister in relation to a role for communities stated—

“We expect to consult widely and to publish and review that set of outcomes. If something is about the people of Scotland, we should engage with them. I would not want to specify in primary legislation how that should be done, but it absolutely should be done.”

97. UNISON Scotland expressed hope for the development of the Scotland Performs Website, comparing it to the Virginia system—

“Scotland Performs has surface similarities to Virginia Performs but is nowhere near as extensive in terms of data or analysis. The Virginia site offers both easy to read graphics for a range of geographical and subject areas for those looking for snapshots as well as explanations/discussions of issues and extensive data for those seeking wider information or wishing to do their own analysis. Scotland Performs is not the “go to” place for data on Scotland or the delivery of its services nor has it become a source of debate or discussion.”

98. We were interested in understanding whether there is any role for the Scottish Parliament in the NPF, either as a consultee or in scrutinising results as neither is provided under the Bill. The Government in response to our written questions on the Policy Memorandum explained that the Parliament will be able to use the published information to hold Ministers to account.

“I am not sure that the committee and the Parliament should have a specific role in probing individual community planning partnerships, because it would feel slightly centralist if we were to pick on a community planning partnership. We should understand the national strategy, the national themes and the legislative framework, and the committee should hold the Government, ministers and local authorities to account collectively on our performance.”

99. We were advised Scottish Ministers are ultimately accountable for delivery of the national outcomes. Further it was suggested—

“Accountability will be enhanced due to the prominence of the national outcomes approach. There will be a clear line of sight between delivery and the national outcomes.”

100. We note in this regard the recurring themes of Parliament’s annual budget scrutiny on the need to focus on outcomes. Successive Finance Committees have expressed reservations about the extent to which the Executive is subject to 50 Unison Scotland. Written submission.

51 Q&A 32
53 Q&A 29 and 30
robust performance scrutiny. This was also a finding of the Christie Commission who noted an outcomes based approach had not been fully embraced.

101. The Christie Commission also recommended “tightening the oversight and accountability of public services including consistent data-gathering and performance comparators and the introduction of a new set of statutory powers and duties for all public service bodies, focused on improving outcomes.”

102. The Independent Budget Review (IBR) established by the Scottish Government came to a similar conclusion. The IBR report recommended the—“need to move towards a more outcomes-based approach to public service management and to improve the quality, availability and application of evaluation, monitoring and reporting data and information in relation to outcomes across the public sector in order to ensure that resources are applied to full benefit. This is vital if the Scottish Parliament is to exercise an effective monitoring and scrutiny role.” 54

103. The Accounts Commission and Auditor General also made a number of comments on Part 1, including—

“if the commitment to set national outcomes is intended to provide greater clarity about trends in national performance, it is important to recognise that national outcomes can mask significant local variation in performance. Given this, it would be important that any national indicators that are set help assess how reductions in the wide inequalities of outcomes (health, life expectancy, educational attainment, etc.) that persist across Scotland are being addressed.” 55

Committee recommendations on Part 1

104. Having considered the responses received on this Part of the Bill we make the following observations and recommendations.

105. We consider Part 1 of the Bill will be extremely valuable in allowing the Scottish Parliament, as well as Ministers, to hold the public sector bodies to account.

106. We consider it one of the duties of the Parliament to not only hold Ministers to account, but also to follow the public pound and hold spending bodies to account. Given the amounts of monies they control we specifically include in this scrutiny the spending of and outcomes achieved by CPPs and those bodies falling within our remit who contribute to them.

107. We agree with the Minister that communities must be empowered. Given this fundamental principle we expect to see the Scottish Government leading by example. In relation to consultation and engagement with those who are affected, i.e. communities, provision should be enshrined in this Part of the Bill by means of a suitable amendment to Part 1.

108. Given the focus placed on scrutiny of outcomes we consider the Scottish Government, not least to inform budget scrutiny by the Scottish Parliament, should report annually on the extent to which national outcomes have been achieved. The report should be available before the annual draft Scottish budget is published.
PART 2 COMMUNITY PLANNING

Background

109. Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 places a duty on local authorities to initiate, facilitate and maintain a process called community planning by which public services are provided, after consultation with such community bodies and other bodies or persons as is appropriate. This is undertaken by Community Planning Partnership’s (CPPs) of which there are currently 32 in Scotland, one for each local authority area.

110. Currently guidance expands on the statutory requirements, by focusing the purpose of community planning (including engagement with community bodies) around the planning and achievement of better outcomes on local priority themes. Part 2 of the Bill reflects these expectations in legislation for the first time and proposes a number of reforms to the system of community planning. These replace provisions in the 2003 Act and provide for the first time a statutory basis for CPPs, placing duties on them around the planning and achievement of local outcomes. They also focus responsibilities on community planning partners to support each partnership to fulfil its duties.

111. Part 2 also includes scope to produce guidance to add detail to the new framework provided for. We understand from the Scottish Government that guidance may include the purpose and content of new generation local outcomes improvement plans (under section 5) and how governance duties (section 8) should be applied.

112. A range of reports have criticised the development of community planning since its introduction, including the Christie Commission in 2011. In March 2013, Audit Scotland published a report on Improving Community Planning in Scotland (Audit Scotland 2013), which concluded that—“Partnership working is now generally well established and many examples of joint working are making a difference for specific communities and groups across Scotland. But overall, and ten years after community planning was given a statutory basis, CPPs are not able to show that they have had a significant impact in delivering improved outcomes across Scotland.

“Our audit work in recent years has found shortcomings in how CPPs have performed. These are widespread and go beyond individual CPPs. Community planning was intended as an effective vehicle for public bodies to work together improve local services and make best use of scarce public money and other resources. Barriers have stood in the way of this happening. All community planning partners needs to work together to overcome the barriers that have stood in the way of this happening. For example, shifting the perception that community planning is a council-driven exercise, and not a core part of the day job for other partners.”

56 Q&A 52

113. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee has returned to the topic of community planning regularly in Session 4, most notably in our 2013 report on Public Services Reform which concluded that—

“… we share the view of the AC/AGS that 10 years of community planning has yielded little significant evidence of major improvements in public services. Like the AC/AGS, we also found major differences in perceptions about CPPs in terms of their impacts, outcomes, rates of progress, and above all levels of community engagement. We also note that this lack of progress has had its greatest impact on some of the most disadvantaged communities in Scotland.”

114. Putting community planning on a statutory basis, and requiring participation from all partners, not just local authorities, has long been considered a way in which community planning could be improved. In our above report on public service reform, we commented that—“COSLA argued in its written submission and in oral evidence that an overall statutory duty on other public sector partners to participate in community planning would strengthen the ability to deliver public services in new ways, through greater partnership working. COSLA called this a “paradigm shift”. We consider this term to be misguided. We do not believe that a proposed statutory duty will be enough in itself to ensure that all public bodies participate effectively in community planning, and deliver the public services communities want to see.”

Bill proposals

Community Planning
115. Section 4 of the bill defines community planning as “planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes in relation to the area of the local authority resulting from, or contributed by, the provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the local authority or the persons listed in schedule 1.” These outcomes must be consistent with the National Outcomes set out by Scottish Ministers. Schedule 1 lists the bodies the bill proposes should be considered to be “community planning partners”. These include Police Scotland, Health Boards, Integration Joint Boards, SEPA, SNH and SDS.

Local outcomes improvement plan
116. Sections 5, 6 and 7 of the Bill require each CPP to produce a local outcomes improvement plan. These are plans which—

60 See footnote 57 – paragraph 12 set out each local outcome to which the community planning partnership is to give priority with a view to improving the achievement of the outcome; contain a description of the proposed improvement in the achievement of the outcome; and specify the period within which the proposed improvement is to be achieved.

117. The plan must be reviewed “from time to time” and the CPP must publish an annual report on progress towards achieving the stated outcomes.

118. The Policy Memorandum confirms local outcomes improvement plans are the equivalent of Single Outcome Agreements, currently used by all CPPs. But, it does not explain why new terminology has been used in the Bill.

Governance, funding and other provisions
119. The remainder of Part 2 contains a number of other provisions on community planning. Notably requirements for partners to participate in the community planning process, co-operate with the other partners, and also provision on sharing resources. Each partner must contribute “such funds, staff and other resources” as required by the CPP.

Committee submissions
120. Part 2 received a range of detailed comments from across all sectors. Comments, written and oral, fell into 3 broad categories covering—

- community involvement;
- governance and accountability; and
- partner bodies.

121. Many highlighted problems with the current system of community planning, especially in relation to community involvement. Others sought clarity regarding how the new provisions would work with other existing legislation, including the status of existing community planning partners.

Community Involvement
122. As well as public bodies, the Bill requires CPPs to “make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation” of those community bodies it considers are “likely to be able to contribute to community planning”. The Government confirmed the Bill—

“does not prescribe a process which CPPs should adopt for engaging with community bodies. These are decisions for CPPs and partner bodies to take locally, as they are best placed to determine which approach is most suitable for the particular circumstances of each occasion.”

123. The Bill also makes specific non-prescriptive provision for community bodies to be consulted in the preparation of the local outcomes improvement plan.

---

61 Q&A 43
124. The involvement of communities and community bodies in the process of community planning has been a key thread running through our work both on public service reform and on regeneration. In our report on Strand 3 of the public service reform inquiry, we stated—

“We have not found evidence that successes are being collated and replicated systematically. We have found some apparent contradictions amongst our witnesses, especially in terms of perceptions on the rate, scale, nature, direction and levels of community engagement in decisions on PSR, particularly within and across CPPs. Ten years on, there is a consensus that insufficient progress has been made by CPPs. We found varying degrees of community engagement in partnerships generally, and CPPs in particular. We emphasise that there are also significant differences in perception about the levels and effectiveness of community engagement.” 62

125. Similarly, concerns were also raised in responses to the Government’s 2013 consultation. These suggested that providing statutory underpinning could actually marginalise communities even further, as it would reinforce the public sector partners as principal partners, and others as less important.

126. Another dominant theme in that consultation was the need for investment in community capacity building if all communities were to take full advantage of the opportunities in the Bill.

127. We asked the Scottish Government to elaborate on the detail in the Policy Memorandum suggesting communities would be placed at the core 63 and not simply restricted to being consultees. The Scottish Government indicated—

“The role of communities goes well beyond that of consultees. The duties which sections 4, 5 and 9 of the Bill place on CPPs and partner bodies collectively provide a basis within which community bodies can engage closely in community planning.

“Sections 4 and 5 include duties on CPPs around engaging communities. Section 4(5) places a general duty on CPPs to participate with community bodies in community planning – that is, planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes. In complying with this duty, a CPP must make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of whichever community bodies it considers can contribute to community planning. It should then take all reasonable steps to enable a community body which wishes to participate to do so. This provides community bodies with a role at the core of community planning activity, which can include understanding needs and circumstances, identifying priority outcomes, deciding how to respond to these priorities and reviewing progress made. Section 5(3) places an additional specific requirement on

63 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 39
CPPs, to consult community bodies and such other persons as it considers appropriate in preparing a local outcomes improvement plan.

“Section 9(3) places complementary duties on community planning partners. In particular, it requires partner bodies to contribute funds, staff and resources as the partnership consider appropriate to secure the participation of community bodies. This may therefore support community capacity building activity. Community planning partners may also resource community bodies to deliver services, as part of their related duty to provide resources to support the improvement of a local outcome.”

128. Given our earlier interest and the comments received from our call for evidence we are particularly interested in the consultation required by CPPs both in preparing local improvement plans and the more general involvement of local bodies and communities in the process. Given this part of the Bill is in response to failures by CPPs over the last 10 years we wondered why the legislation had not set out to be more prescriptive in relation to local involvement. We were also concerned to understand how the Bill would ensure the necessary “paradigm shift” from a top down approach to one that involved people at its core.

129. We asked the Scottish Government a series of questions on the above designed to supplement the information about how the Bill will operate. We were told—

“Section 4 of the Bill does not prescribe a process which CPPs should adopt for engaging with community bodies. These are decisions for CPPs and partner bodies to take locally, as they are best placed to determine which approach is most suitable for the particular circumstances of each occasion.”

“Section 4(5) imposes a general duty to involve community bodies in community planning. In complying with this duty, CPPs will decide for themselves which community bodies to involve because they are likely to be able to contribute to community planning, and how to do so.

“Section 5(3) applies specifically to the preparation of a local outcomes improvement plan. The scope of this consultation may encompass community bodies and persons who are otherwise unable or do not wish to contribute to community planning.

“CPPs use a range of sources to understand the needs and circumstances of people and communities in the CPP. This includes statistical information and feedback which partners receive from their own engagement with communities. The consultation with community bodies which a CPP will be required to conduct under section 5(3) will add to this understanding. A CPP may in addition undertake a public consultation if it considers this would be valuable for obtaining this understanding of local needs and circumstances. We consider it should be for CPPs to decide for themselves which methods they adopt to acquire this understanding.”

130. Overall the most common written comment was to express disquiet as to the extent to which and indeed whether the provisions in this part of the bill empowered communities. There were two main strands of concern covering the role of the community, namely the extent to which consultation with communities was undertaken meaningfully as well as the timing of their involvement.

131. On the latter point the Accounts Commission for Scotland and the Auditor General in their report Improving Community Planning in Scotland stated—

> “many CPPs were rethinking how they consult with local communities with the aim of tailoring services around a clear understanding of local need by involving local communities in identifying local issues and deciding how best to respond to them. However, much of the focus was still on consultation and getting people involved. Therefore there is a long way to go before services are truly designed around communities and the potential of local people to participate in, shape and improve local services is realised”

132. That was a theme echoed by others including COSLA who talked about levelling the playing field between communities and authorities.

133. Others were more critical, Leslie Howson summarised the position when he suggested--

> “I am not convinced that the process will be sufficiently inclusive at any level. The community planning partnership decides what are the priorities as regards outcomes and then also decides whom they will or will not consult.”

134. The SCVO quoting the Royal Society of Edinburgh, noted concerns at the continuation of a top-down approach with “agenda design” remaining with the relevant public body. They went on to suggest—

> “community action is only sought when the implementation phase is reached. However, this approach falls short of genuine empowerment. The ‘bottom-up’ approach, which sees the identification of local agendas and desired outcomes taking place at the grassroots level, requires that a much larger degree of power and trust be handed to communities. By this approach, it truly is the community which identifies the societal challenges it wishes to see addressed, and it is the community which designs the processes to address these and to deliver the changes it wants. If

---

67 Q&A 46
69 Leslie Howson. Written submission.
empowerment is to be an aim of public policy, taking a bottom-up approach will be necessary and inevitable.”\textsuperscript{70}

135. Others expressed concerns about who would be consulted. Midlothian Voluntary Action expressing a concern that CPPs chose who to consult—

“We believe that it is important that communities, including voluntary organisations, have some say in who represents them as it is important that community bodies involved in the community planning process engage with other organisations in order to feed into/and from the process.”\textsuperscript{71}

136. Some thought there should be a duty on CPPs to consult. A number, including Scottish Community Development Centre and East Ayrshire Council, stated engagement should be in line with the definition of community engagement embodied within the National Standards for Community Engagement.

137. We were pleased to learn from the Minister that he intends to bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 to strengthen accountability in community planning partnerships by extending and expanding their duties to consult people by reference to the national standards on engagement.\textsuperscript{72}

138. Others noted the need to develop capacity within communities suggesting CPPs should have an explicit duty to undertake this task. We cover this in our introduction and throughout this report.

139. There was confusion at times between the meaning of engagement and empowerment and Alex Rowley summarised the difference by highlighting an example of (lack of) empowerment with the following example from his constituency—

“In Rosyth, in my constituency, there is a housing estate where trees were planted in the grass panels when it was built. The wrong trees were probably put in, because they are now massive. That means that, in the summer, no light comes in people’s windows and, in the winter and on wet days of the kind that we have had this week, the wet leaves make walking dangerous for people, as they might slip.

“The majority of people tell me that the issue needs to be dealt with. That seems to be common sense, but the tree surgeon says that the trees are perfectly healthy and council policy is that such trees are not cut down. For the life of me, I do not understand why that is the case. If we were truly empowering the people on that estate, we would enable them to deal with the issue”.\textsuperscript{73}

\textsuperscript{70} Scottish Council Voluntary Organisations. Written submission.
\textsuperscript{71} Midlothian Voluntary Action. Written submission.
\textsuperscript{72} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 2 November 2014, column 35
\textsuperscript{73} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 24 September 2014, column 13
140. Out of 160+ submissions sadly only one highlighted the benefits to be gained by public bodies from meaningful consultation with and involvement of the community. The Scottish Council for Development and Industry, correctly in our estimation, observed—

“Communities can be considered experts in their own needs and by enabling greater input into service planning and delivery, the public sector may uncover innovative delivery mechanisms which more effectively meet their service users’ requirements.”

141. We show this specifically to highlight why the legislation has become necessary following the widespread failure of public bodies to engage, consult and empower communities. It is agreed only legislation can bring about the critical cultural change towards “An organisational mindset which sees communities as often best placed to develop local solutions to local issues.”

142. During our first oral evidence session on this aspect of the Bill we noted all the witnesses, with the exception of the police, were exclusively focussed on a top down approach with at best discussion between CPP partners to determine priorities, activities and the allocation of resources. We did not detect any indication of any role, never mind meaningful involvement, at community level. Frequent references to planning at the strategic level suggest to us the size of the cultural change required if involvement, never mind empowerment, is to happen.

143. When in Dumfries we put the quote at 138 above to witnesses with a mixed response. While acknowledging “ideas could come forward that might result in more savings and efficiencies” witnesses were concerned that complexities and conflicts would arise. Kay Gilmour from East Ayrshire Council was perhaps more hopeful saying—

“Public bodies need to go on a journey that is all about a culture of improvement. I am by no manner of means saying that that culture is not there at the moment, but this is a journey and some are further along it than others. If we have a culture of improvement, we do not get anxious if communities, individuals in the community or community groups make suggestions about how to innovate or do things differently and better.”

144. The police had a different viewpoint from other witnesses noting “different communities want and expect different things from public services.” Before adding—

“As soon as we start engaging with and consulting communities, it drives services in a different way. The challenge is in how the consultation and engagement drive the single outcome agreement. I have seen good examples in which a lot of the outcomes that have been identified in single

---

74 Scottish Council for Development and Industry. Written submission.
75 Perth and Kinross Council. Written submission.
76 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October 2014, column 40
77 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October 2014, column 40 outcome agreements were driven by consultation. On the other hand, others have simply been driven by a set of strategic priorities that organisations have put on the table. We need to make sure that that is the right way round and that the outcomes are community driven.”

145. While we recognise Scottish Enterprise’s wider role we were disappointed to hear about their focus being solely on the business community. It is clear to us the views of the community are of no consequence to them. This lack of community focus is all the more surprising given the comments of the then Economy Enterprise and Tourism Committee in 2011 when they recommended in their report “A fundamental review of the purpose of an enterprise agency and the success of the recent reforms” the following—

“The Committee believes that interventions in rural economic development should enable rural communities to imagine the future of its local area and build its capacity to realise that vision. The Committee has heard evidence of and seen for itself the types of project which have had success through such capacity building, or place-shaping approaches, particularly as a result of HIE’s Strengthening Communities remit. The Committee believes that the same approach could successfully be applied to communities outside the HIE area.”

146. We consider Scottish Enterprise are an example of an organisation doing things to people as opposed to with people. Neither Skills Development Scotland nor North Lanarkshire Health Partnership were much better in their outlook.

Governance and Accountability

147. Comments on this aspect were largely from public bodies and considered issues around joint partnership working including leadership, budgets and general governance issues. Comments were also received on the section 12 powers to create corporate bodies.

148. Glasgow City Council highlighted core duties of CPP partners in section 9 in relation to communities and indicated—

“it is not clear what steps will be taken to make it easier for partners to meet them in particular how they will be assisted to commit “appropriate resources to the achievement of local outcomes set out in … [the Local Outcomes]… plan”

“Whilst the change in duties addresses perceived problem of lack of accountability of other public bodies for their contribution to Community Planning, the question arises as to whether this new formulation alters the role of local authorities in Community Planning. On one reading the new duties offer a shared leadership model. However, how will this work in

---

78 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 1 October 2014, column 16
http://archive.scottish.parliament.uk/s3committees/eet/reports-11/eer11-02-01.htm practice, if partners don’t agree roles and responsibilities. In addition does it meet the test of accountability?\textsuperscript{80}

149. We agree with Superintendent Irvine who summarised the need for and benefit of leadership in the CPP—

\begin{quote}
"Without leadership, there is no governance, and without governance, there is no activity. Leadership is a critical part of what we need to strengthen at local level."
\end{quote}

150. West Dunbartonshire Council indicated they were content with the proposed changes to governance and structure and North Lanarkshire Council had some queries about how the new arrangements will sit with existing accountability and audit mechanisms. The Accounts Commission for Scotland and the Auditor General wondered about the existing statutory leadership role on CPPs exercised by local authorities as well as: "the extent to which the resourcing of the administration of the community planning process should be seen as a partnership task."\textsuperscript{82}

151. The Accounts Commission for Scotland and the Auditor General were also concerned about how the performance of CPPs as partnerships will be assessed. How governance and accountability arrangements will work and how CPPs will be held to account for the discharge of the duties set out in the Bill, including their progress against outcomes. They also saw the absence of provision in section 8 as a significant gap.

152. COSLA, while welcoming the duties being placed on CPP partners, indicated "it is difficult to see how this can be effectively enforced."\textsuperscript{83}

153. We asked the Scottish Government to comment on this area and they responded as follows—

"Like Part 2 of the 2003 Act, the Bill does not specify sanctions on CPPs and partner bodies for non-compliance. Partners can expect to be held to account for how they fulfil community planning duties as part of their existing formal lines of accountability (e.g. those of NHS Boards to Scottish Ministers, or a council to its electorate).

"In addition, external CPP audit reports are recent additions to the scrutiny landscape. They have been valuable in identifying strengths and areas for improvement in CPP and partner performance, supporting ongoing improvement and providing assurance that expected progress is being made. Themes covered by these audits include clarity of vision leadership, governance, operational structures, performance management, how \textsuperscript{80} Glasgow City Council. Written submission.

\textsuperscript{81} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report, 1 October 2014, column 24}
\textsuperscript{82} Accounts Commission for Scotland & Auditor General for Scotland. Written submission.
\textsuperscript{83} COSLA. Written submission.
partners engage with local communities, how partners hold each other to account and the quality of public reporting.\textsuperscript{84}

154. The Minister did not consider there was any role for Government or Parliament in probing individual CPPs, suggesting Government Ministers and local authorities should be held to account collectively on their performance.\textsuperscript{85} Adding this was a role for communities to hold individual CPPs to account.

155. The commitment of resources to the CPP by CPP partners raised a number of questions. NHS Tayside\textsuperscript{86} and Angus Community Planning Partnership\textsuperscript{87} both felt this was “a step too far”. Inverclyde Council noted some practical concerns around community planning partners committing resources towards both delivery of actions and securing participation of community bodies. Inverclyde Council also noted the absence of “freedom in budget setting that would facilitate the easy commitment of resources to particular projects.”\textsuperscript{88}

156. Police (Scotland) indicated potential difficulties under their current centralised budgeting system which sees the spending of all monies determined centrally by the Scottish Police Authority. While there are good examples of local planning by the police involving communities this is restricted to the allocation of people as opposed to monetary resource.

157. South Lanarkshire Council\textsuperscript{89} thought duties around collective accountability were vague and SEPA saw—

“real challenges around the practicalities of dovetailing SEPA’s own priorities with those identified in the LOIP [Local Outcome Improvement Plan]. SEPA’s priorities set out in our Corporate Plan and Annual Operating Plan tend to be strategic and usually non-locational specific.”\textsuperscript{90}

158. In relation to sharing resources the Scottish Government said the duties in section 9(2) to (5) applying to community planning partners will vary from one CPP to another, depending on the particular needs, circumstances and priorities of the area. An example of where the restrictions on applying duties to a CPP partner (section 9(1)) might apply is a scenario where a partner and CPP agree the duties

\textsuperscript{84} Q&A 50
\textsuperscript{85} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 12 November 2014, column 35-36
\textsuperscript{86} Written submission from NHS Tayside. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/45._NHS_Tayside.pdf
\textsuperscript{87} Written submission from the Angus Community Planning Partnership. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/122._Angus_Community_Planning_Partnership.pdf
\textsuperscript{88} Written submission from Inverclyde Council. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/91._Inverclyde_Council.pdf
\textsuperscript{89} Written submission from South Lanarkshire Council. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/73._South_Lanarkshire_Council.pdf
\textsuperscript{90} Written submission from the Scottish Environment Protection Agency. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/60._SEPA.pdf

30 on the partner in that area can be waived because the duties on that partner under the rest of section 9 would contribute only modestly to the work of the CPP.\footnote{Q&A 51}

159. Both Highlands and Islands Enterprise and Skills Development Scotland were concerned about possible conflicts should a CPP determine to utilise the provisions in section 12 to establish the CPP as a corporate body. We earlier asked the Scottish Government about these provisions. They did not expect it would be used to establish a corporate body that substantially delivered services by itself.\footnote{Q&A 54}

160. In their recent report “Community Planning” Audit Scotland note “although aspects of community planning are improving, leadership, scrutiny and challenge are still inconsistent.” Adding: “There is little evidence that CPP boards are yet demonstrating the levels of leadership and challenge set out in the Statement of Ambition”\footnote{Audit Scotland. Community planning Turning ambition into action - paragraph 1. Available at:
http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2014/nr_141127_community_planning.pdf}

Partner bodies

161. A number of responses commented on the proposed membership of CPPs.
sportscotland argued they should not be included whereas a number made suggestions for others to be included. The Third Sector Interface were suggested by Community Learning and Development Managers, Orkney Islands Council and by Children 1\textsuperscript{st} although the TSI representative in Dumfries was clear they did not desire a formal role, rather wishing to retain their independence.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27
October, column 9}

162. Some made pleas for enhanced roles to be given to Community Councils.
We heard from a number of community councillors as well as receiving submissions from councils themselves. We recognise the enthusiasm and willingness to be involved that we heard which, as we observed in our earlier report,\footnote{Local Government and Regeneration Committee, 8th Report, 2014 (Session 4): Flexibility and Autonomy in Local Government. Available at:
http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/Reports/lgR-14-08w.pdf} is not unique to community councils. We are also aware some are truly representative of their communities having been duly elected. Others, perhaps the majority, are not. The Minister commented on the variability of community councils—

“although some are very good and provide services or run things, others are more mid-range, some are talking shops and some are, frankly, barely legitimate. That is why we will not pick one group over another as a key community anchor organisation and say that that group is more important than another. The situation will differ from one community to another. The \footnote{Q&A 51}{Q&A 54}{Audit Scotland. Community planning Turning ambition into action - paragraph 1. Available at:

October, column 9}{Local Government and Regeneration Committee, 8th Report, 2014 (Session 4): Flexibility and Autonomy in Local Government. Available at:
http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/Reports/lgR-14-08w.pdf}
key organisation might be the housing association, the community council or the parent and toddler group.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 12 November 2014, column 16}

163. COSLA questioned whether the legislation included all the relevant partners that should be at the table noting an absence of key justice partners.

164. Regional Transport Partnerships made a request to be included, while SEPA noted significant issues around their own involvement particularly relating to resourcing and outcome conflicts.

165. While in Fort William we heard a plea for local flexibility in the composition of the CPP board with partners having the ability to identify the most appropriate composition.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 24 November 2014, column 5}

166. While the focus of the Bill and witnesses is on the role of public bodies we were also interested in what, if anything, the private sector could input and in what ways they could assist the operation of CPPs.

167. Some responses highlighted a need for more business participation with Scottish Enterprise drawing to attention, both in their oral and written submissions, the importance of involving the business community. The Federation of Small Businesses reminded us small businesses are a key part of their communities with skills and expertise that can assist communities.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 24 September 2014, column 10} The Minister agreed, indicating participation needs to go deeper than “just a seat at the table”.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 12 November 2014, column 33}

168. In relation to Scottish Enterprise we note the differences in remit between them and Highlands and Island Enterprise and have concerns as to how Scottish Enterprise can properly undertake partner duties under their current remit which does not include community support. We reached this view despite the evidence from the Minister that they are mindful of their obligations to community planning and his laying out of the support they can provide.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 12 November 2014, column 17-18} The Minister was clear Scottish Enterprise would not be bringing their budget “to the table” which leaves us unable to reconcile their partnership role with the budgetary requirements under the Bill. If one partner is able to choose the extent of their involvement we cannot understand how others can be encouraged to fully participate.

169. The point was made that the DWP (albeit it was suggested for issuing communications as opposed to receiving input) expends significant local resources and is in partnership with other bodies.\footnote{Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 1 October 2014, columns 10 & 25}
170. Finally in this section we note the comments of the Deputy First Minister and Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Constitution and Economy when discussing the approach to health and social care integration with us. After expressing frustration around internal disputes between partners over budgeting and support to individuals, and lamenting the consequential consumption of resources that causes he stated: “Adult health and social care integration must lance that, and do so ferociously.” He then this linked to the role of CPPs in taking forward the wider public service reform agenda particularly relating to prevention, adding—

“We look to community planning partnerships to break down the barriers, boundaries or silos …to make sure that we have a much more integrated and focused approach to the delivery of public services. That is crucial to ensuring that we guarantee that the resources that we have at our disposal have the maximum impact and that individuals are able to secure the support that they require.”

Committee Recommendations on Part 2

171. Having considered the responses we have received on this Part of the Bill we make the following recommendations:

Community Involvement

172. There is a considerable difference between engagement and empowerment. We would like to see some of the various engagement requirements under this Part translated into empowerment. It is important that powers are exercised at the lowest possible level. We look forward to seeing the promised amendments from the Government at stage 2.

173. We remain concerned local communities are not sufficiently and directly involved with CPPs. The Bill should require CPPs to seek involvement and input from a level below that of community representatives. It is for the Scottish Government to suggest how this be done, and as importantly, how it will be assessed.

174. There should be an explicit requirement on all CPPs to include community capacity building in local plans and to report on progress along with setting out future plans in every annual report.

175. As a minimum we would expect the Bill to require annual reports from CPPs to comment on community involvement across the area, including setting out the steps taken to consult with and involve individual communities, and to report on successes in this area. CPPs should also be required to report on how they have developed contacts with local communities over the previous year and the steps they are planning to take to extend and increase involvement of local communities in the coming period.

---

176. Overall we are not convinced this Bill goes far enough to move CPPs from their current top-down approach and recommend further statutory provision is made to ensure this is both clearer and measurable.

Governance and Accountability

177. The Bill should be clearer as to the expectations in relation to leadership, governance and audit arrangements that apply to CPPs.

178. We remain unclear how the Scottish Government, who supply most of the funding spent by CPPs, intend to measure and hold to account each CPP on their achievement of outcomes and value for money. We consider the Bill must explicitly include this, building on The Statement of Ambition.

179. The above applies equally to individual CPP partners on their involvement, the Bill should be clear about their accountability for the performance of the CPP.

180. The Committee will seek to hold CPPs to account alongside their partners for their individual actions as part of our ongoing scrutiny functions. We would anticipate other committees will do likewise as appropriate.

181. We do not consider the Bill, as currently drafted, makes it clear that priority must be given to CPP initiatives over those of individual partner organisations. This Bill requires to be clearer around the provisions requiring the sharing of budgets by all CPP partners.

182. Annual reports should be both backward and forward looking. As well as reporting under section 7(2), on whether there has been any improvement in the achievement of each local outcome set out in the local outcomes improvement plan, CPPs should be statutorily required to report intended actions and activities.

183. A deadline for reporting should be specified. We recommend no later than 6 months after the end of the period in question.

Partner Bodies

184. If Scottish Enterprise are to be included as partners their remit requires to be amended to include community support along the lines of that of Highland and Island Enterprise. Equally they must be required to comply with all requirements, including budget sharing, to avoid any perception that engagement by partners is optional.

185. The third sector and housing bodies should be given a more prominent role, short of becoming a partner at the partnership board of CPPs.

186. The bill should explicitly encourage the involvement and participation of the private sector and local business with CPPs.

187. We do not consider sportscotland should be included as partners in CPPs.

188. Provision should be made in the Bill for other public bodies to be full CPP partners as appropriate, based on local circumstances and need. We have in mind for example DWP and transport partnerships.
Other
189. We retain concerns about the terminology and language used throughout the Bill and ask the Scottish Government to amend accordingly to ensure the language used is not a barrier to community involvement.

190. The Bill must make clear the linkage between local improvement plans and single outcome agreements.
PART 3: PARTICIPATION REQUESTS

Background

191. Part 3 sets out how a “community participation body” (a community council or another community group with a constitution) can make a request to a “public service authority” (a public service authority listed in Schedule 2, e.g. local authorities, health boards or the police) to participate in a process to improve an outcome of a public service. It also provides how the public sector should deal with these requests. Part 3 is similar to Part 5 on Asset Transfer Requests in that it creates a process for requests and is intended to promote consistency of experience to encourage communities to become involved.

192. The Policy Memorandum states—

“There is a strong history of the public sector engaging with communities across Scotland. In particular, local authorities have used a variety of engagement methods over the years and have promoted the use of tools like the National Standards for Community Engagement […] The Scottish Government sets clear expectations that all public sector organisations must engage with communities and support their participation in setting priorities and in the design and delivery of services.”

193. An example of the type of opportunity which might be explored through a participation request would be a request to improve outcomes related to the upkeep of open spaces owned by public service authorities, for example, a community group could request to take over maintenance of a space from the public body’s private sector maintenance contractors.103

194. Also, the new participation requests process could be used by communities, who have identified a need for a service currently not being delivered, to design a new service with the public service authority to meet their needs. This could be transport to hospitals, childcare, employment skills, whatever communities’ aspirations are.

195. The Commission on the Future of Public Service Delivery (“the Christie Commission) was clear our system of public service delivery was in need of significant transformation. Design and delivery of services had to include people rather than forcing them into pre-determined systems.104

196. Our recent report into the Flexibility and Autonomy of Local Government has shown how community participation and local democracy are tightly linked and can be an indicator of active, resilient and democratic communities. One of our key

---

103 Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens (Scotland). Written submission.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee, 2nd Report, 2015 (Session 4) findings was “adequate powers to devolve responsibilities currently exist which local authorities must begin to exercise.”

197. Ideally, further legislation should not be needed to empower communities, but we also appreciate it is a sizable and complex task to shift power from public service authorities into the hands of the community and to move from a controlling model to one which is more listening and reactive to communities setting the agenda. It has been a few years since the Christie Commission reported, and since then the pace and scale of change has been slower than expected, therefore legislation to create the conditions for further empowerment and consistency of change, at a faster pace, is welcomed.

198. Part 3 builds on Part 2 which establishes local outcomes improvement plans. Participation requests are provided for under sections 14 to 26, and Schedule 2, of the Bill. These sections provide the structure of the process and some of the detail of the procedure. How information is to be provided and published is left to the Scottish Ministers to set out in subordinate legislation.

199. Section 15 defines a “community participation body” which can make a request under section 17 of the Bill. In this section of the Report they are referred to as ‘community groups’. Community groups can be a more formal grouping such as a community council or a less formal group as long as it has a written constitution (section 14 lists the requirements of a constitution). The Scottish Ministers can designate other groups. Requests to participate are made to a “public service authority as listed in Schedule 2, for example, a local authority or a Regional Transport Partnership.

Participation Requests Process

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>The process for participation requests is set out in sections 17 to 25 of the Bill. In summary, the process will run as follows:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. When a community participation body (or more than one body jointly) believes it can improve the outcome of a public service, it can make a participation request to the body (or bodies) that run that service.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. In doing so, the community participation body will need to set out the outcomes it expects to achieve and its experience of the public service.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. It is then for the public service authority to make a decision on whether to agree to the request – but the authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds not to do so.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Following a decision agreeing to the request, the public service authority must issue a decision notice outlining how the outcome improvement process will work.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

200. It will be for the public service authority to decide whether to make any changes to existing service delivery arrangements. If the community group proposes to deliver services itself, the public service authority will need to decide whether the community group has an appropriate corporate structure and the capacity to take on that role. A public service authority, after agreeing a participation request must establish an outcome improvement process. At the end of an outcome improvement process the public service authority must publish a report on whether the outcomes were improved and how the community group collected to that improvement.

---

201. A public service authority may decline a participation request in certain circumstances, e.g. if a new request is made within two years about the same outcome relating to the same service, whether it is from the same community group or a different community group. There is no appeal process unlike Part 5, Asset Transfer Requests.

Committee submissions

202. A great many of those who responded to our call for evidence took the opportunity to comment on this part of the Bill, although we had very few responses from individuals who might seek to use these powers. We undertook an extensive public engagement programme to seek the views of individuals and communities from across Scotland on the issues surrounding participation requests for example, are participation requests the best way of getting people’s ideas in front of the decision makers; whether it is easier to participate as a group or individual; as well as what help is needed to encourage participation.

203. As part of this process we undertook fact-finding visits, produced a short internet video and made use of social media to engage with people and communities.

204. The engagement greatly added to our scrutiny of Part 3 of the Bill, and Annexe D sets out the extent of this in more detail, as well as containing responses we received via social media.

205. The matters which arose are summarised under the following headings—

- effectiveness of legislating for participation requests
- public service authorities’ willingness to allow community participation
- a community officer
- role of community engagement in enabling participation
- capacity of community groups to participate
- building community capacity and empowering the disempowered
- operation of the participation request process
- requirement for a written constitution
- refusal of a request
- publicity and guidance to encourage participation

Effectiveness of legislating for Participation Requests

206. Martin Doherty of Volunteer Scotland told us—
“If communities and individuals are not involved at the beginning, you might as well not bother. If the aim is to design a participation request, my advice is that it be designed around the people who need it.”

207. A few respondents wondered why there was a need to legislate to provide for a formal participation process. The Scottish Community Alliance (SCA) believed the debate around community empowerment was heavily shaped by the extent to which communities have been able to engage with the current system of local government. SCA considered “the current level of interest in how communities can be empowered correlates directly with the level of concern about this democratic deficit”. Social Enterprise Scotland also contributed to this discussion, it stated “democracy is not just about elected representatives or local authorities but is also about direct community democracy and community organisations i.e. social enterprises.”

208. The Scottish Government in its response to the Committee’s letter on the Policy Memorandum pointed us to research undertaken by the Electoral Commission which showed social exclusion is strongly correlated with low turnout in elections and limited participation in other forms of democracy.

209. A number of submissions were in favour of legislating, but considered public service authorities should be subject to more directive powers to make supporting participation a priority for public service authorities. This perhaps highlights that without such a specific duty there is a fear, within the third sector and communities, not enough is being done by public bodies to engage with them in a meaningfully way.

210. Others considered the Bill had missed additional opportunities to strengthen communities’ participation. Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisation (SCVO) was “disappointed that this single mechanism is the only concrete proposal for increasing participation in the decision making and the design and delivery of public services” for example SCVO suggested the Scottish Government could have legislated for “10% of the total budget for the public sector in each local authority area could be allocated for participatory budgeting processes.”

211. When the Minister was asked to respond to criticism voiced by Lesley Riddoch that the Bill was ‘toothless’ and ‘a missed opportunity’, he replied

“the bill is about swinging the balance of power towards communities. It does that through participation requests, which will empower groups and communities to initiate decisions and consultations that affect them on their terms.”

---

106 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 34
107 Scottish Community Alliance. Written submission.
108 Social Enterprise Scotland. Written submission.
109 Q&A 11
110 Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations. Written submission.
Public service authorities’ willingness to allow community participation

212. The Christie Commission believed “front-line staff, along with people and communities are best placed to identify how to make things work better. It is critical that managers at all levels support staff in empowering users and communities, and to give fresh meaning to their own work”.112

213. The Scottish Government’s Response to the Christie Commission Report, Renewing Scotland’s Public Services: Priorities for Reform in Response to the Christie Commission 2011, reiterated the importance of this point “Reshaping public services to deliver better outcomes for the people of Scotland must be an inclusive and collaborative endeavour involving the workforce at all levels.”113

214. Some of those who wrote or spoke to us, although welcoming a participation process, felt using the process should be a last resort and that a culture of participation needed to be embedded within public service authorities. Orkney Council considered legislation should be there if the simpler route to participation were to be blocked, rather than being obligatory on every occasion.114 Steve Rolfe, an academic responding in a personal capacity, said—

“Whilst it is important for communities to have the new right to request participation, one of the aims of this legislation should be to ensure that it rarely needs to be used, as public sector agencies incorporate community participation and support for community action into their everyday operations.”115

215. Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations took a slightly different view of the impact of the participation request process. It believed the process “seems designed to introduce a confrontational, ‘stick rather than carrot’ approach between the community and the public body rather than a partnership or co-productive approach”.116

216. Some public service authorities also recognised the need to change their mindset. South Lanarkshire Council cautioned that without significant change in public bodies’ culture and the resulting ways of working, they are likely to face a growing disconnection from the communities they exist to serve.117

217. SCVO suggested the focus should be on developing staff working in public service authorities—

“Effectiveness will still be dependent on the culture and attitudes within the relevant public body. Improving the understanding of participative approaches within public bodies through training or demonstrations of

112 Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services, Services Built Around People and Communities, paragraph 4.46. Available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/06/27154527/6
113 Renewing Scotland’s Public Services: Priorities for Reform in Response to the Christie Commission 2011, Workforce and Leadership, Available at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/09/21104740/6
114 Orkney Islands Council. Written submission.
115 Steve Rolfe. Written submission.
116 Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations. Written submission.
117 South Lanarkshire Council. Written submission.
good practice is more likely to achieve success than bringing forward legislation that could be ignored or regarded as a nuisance by these bodies.”

218. A further concern for SCVO of legislating was that a formal process “might disrupt positive interactions which already take place if it becomes the main route for engaging the sector in improving services.”

219. We heard from public service authorities at our meeting on 8 October there is a tension between their overarching priorities and those set by communities, however Dundee City Council had worked at finding an approach which meshed these priorities. John Hosie from the Council told us it had developed an impact assessment for their local community plans. These plans are based on community engagement and do not contain top-down actions; there are around 900 actions based on consultation with local people, which allows the Council to measure how effective it is in meeting these objectives and outcomes.

220. Whilst acknowledging there was good practice around, Robin Parker from Barnardo’s Scotland considered participation requests strengthened the community’s hand by enabling communities to say—

“No, it’s our right to be involved in this decision. We think we’ve got something to bring to it, and we want to be involved in the decision-making process.”

221. Legislation can be an aid to cultural change, but public service authorities need to ensure all staff members are knowledgeable about the ethos of community empowerment, are trained to respond to participation requests and feel enabled to adopt best practice and suggest improvements.

A community officer
222. A common theme which arose in our enquiries into both Parts 3 and 5 of the Bill was the difficulty communities encountered when trying to find a staff member who had the requisite knowledge to address their questions.

223. Heather Hall from the Inspired Community Enterprise Trust explained during our stakeholder roundtable event held in Dumfries she had had to speak to 17 people to get information on a single matter. Earlier the Trust had provided us with a presentation about ‘The Usual Place’, a community café to help deliver training services to young people with additional needs to help them gain skills to find employment. Amy Duffy, a potential beneficiary of the project, shared her experience of trying to find employment and told us what it meant to her to have an opportunity to learn new skills. Heather Hall and Linda Whitelaw said the process was very time intensive; so much so they had had to give up their jobs for the sake of pursuing the social enterprise.

---

118 Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations. Written submission.
119 As footnote 116 above.
120 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 12
121 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 25
224. Other community representatives at the event talked about how the process to acquire a community hall was stalled by a series of council staff changes and a particular individual’s interpretation of the asset transfer process. A participant described their experience of engaging with a local authority while trying to get a decision on a community project as “like wading through treacle”, while another labelled council processes as “lethargic”.

225. When asked about the effect of centralisation of power in the Highlands to Inverness, Rachael McCormack from Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE) explained how HIE combat this issue—

“We recognise that, across the region, we have diverse local economies and communities with wide-ranging ambitions and aspirations, and it is imperative that we are close to them and accessible. In addition to our area teams, we have other locally based teams, so, wherever someone is in the Highlands and Islands, they are not terribly far from HIE staff.”

226. In response to the suggestion there should be an officer responsible for assisting communities, the Minister said—

“We want to ensure that there is a shared understanding of community participation. Having clarity on who community groups go to is a good thing, but we are not passing all the responsibility for community engagement or communication in a full public authority to one named person. It might be good practice for that person to be a co-ordinator who can oversee the sharing of information, but that is a matter for that authority”.

Role of community engagement in enabling participation

227. The Scottish Government states in its Policy Memorandum, “it is important that community voices are heard in public sector processes, but that this engagement differs from community empowerment, where communities lead change for themselves.”

It sees participation requests as complementary to public authorities’ existing community engagement and participation activities “The provisions in this Part of the Bill are not intended to replace that activity, but they give community bodies an additional power to initiate that dialogue on their own terms, and a right to have their views properly considered.”

228. Poverty Alliance, however, pointed to the varied implementation of the Standards for community engagement across Scotland. Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations shared this view. In terms of improving the current patchy implementation of the Standards, Poverty Alliance, Voluntary Action Scotland, and other third sector organisations, considered the Bill was an opportunity to require public service authorities to adhere to an updated set of Standards.
National Standards for Community Engagement. Inverclyde Council concurred with this view and described it as "a missed opportunity to build on the Standards of Community Engagement". Robin Parker of Barnardo’s Scotland said “putting the national standards on a statutory basis would make it clear that high-quality and genuine involvement should always take place”.

229. National Standards of Community Engagement are an important method in unlocking a community’s ability to participate. Implementation of the National Standards varies across Scotland, which is not satisfactory given the aim of the Bill is to create the conditions for community empowerment and provide a consistent route to influence services. Although we are not attracted in this part of the Bill to enshrining the National Standards in legislation because we believe these should be reactive to developments in engagement techniques and updated regularly to reflect best practice, we are clear a high standard of engagement is integral to building communities’ trust and confidence in public service authorities’ ability to handle participation requests in a fair manner.

Capacity of community groups to participate

230. Many considered it would be the more affluent communities who would benefit from these powers because they already possess the skills necessary to engage with the process. A few responses went further suggesting there was a risk that these new rights could in fact “exacerbate inequality”.

231. Professor Annette Hastings described this trend as “‘middle class capture’ of public services”. She advised that research suggests “a key part of the work undertaken by those working at a range of levels within public services involves ‘managing the middle classes’: that is, resisting or accommodating the demands of an often vociferous, articulate and well-connected social group.”

232. Robin Parker’s comment to us further illustrated this point, “there are groups that are often described as ‘hard to reach’, but Barnardo’s much prefers the term ‘easy to ignore’.

233. Scottish Community Development Centre suggested a legislative approach taken to rebalance power in favour of the least powerful was more important than

---

128 Voluntary Action Scotland. Written Submission.
129 Inverclyde Council. Written Submission.
130 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 33
131 Steve Rolfe. Written Submission.
132 The Poverty Alliance. Written Submission.
133 Oxfam Scotland. Written Submission.
134 Professor Annette Hastings. Written Submission.
135 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 42
a “broad-brush intention to empower”. Leslie Howson, an individual responding to the Committee, further illustrated this concern—

“Power to the people is meaningless if the people whilst been shown the route, do not have the wherewithal for the journey, let alone reaching the outcome stage set for them.”

234. Various other reasons were given as to why communities lacked the capacity to participate. Midlothian Voluntary Action considered the main barriers to be: “less education; transient populations; no access to professionals to join Boards; less confidence; and less relevant skills” noting these communities could potentially need considerable support.

235. Inclusion Scotland considered marginalised communities, such as disabled people, may become even more disempowered by the Bill and referred to its recent survey of 138 disabled people, which found that—

“a third felt that they rarely have adequate opportunities to be included in their community. Cuts to disability benefits & care services and rising living costs, including community care charges, are all reducing disabled people’s ability to meet the access costs of participation”.

236. An attendee at our stakeholder event in Dumfries talked about high levels of fatigue among those who choose to participate in community activities. Capacity to support community empowerment policy initiatives was also highlighted by Volunteer Scotland who drew our attention to the decline in volunteering rates during the past decade across Scotland. Martin Doherty said—

“If there is not at least some stabilisation or increase in the number of people identifying as volunteers, we will not have an empowered community. For us, that rings alarm bells for not only this bill but a range of policy agendas, including the integration of health and social care, areas of which rely heavily on volunteering activity.”

237. He was also keen to point out despite there being a link between low levels of volunteering and deprivation, there were a lot of skilled people in communities of high deprivation, “but, what is lacking are the opportunities to use that skill and to be listened to.”

Building community capacity and empowering the disempowered

238. Our discussions over the past 18 months with individuals, community groups, third sector organisations, and the information gathered from the call for evidence on the Bill, shows there is some concern Parts 3 and 5 (Asset Transfer Requests)

---

136 Scottish Community Development Centre. Written Submission.
137 Leslie Howson. Written submission.
138 Midlothian Voluntary Action. Written Submission.
139 Inclusion Scotland. Written Submission.
141 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 28 of the Bill will only serve to reinforce the position of already empowered communities. Not all communities are the same – many have different needs and different aspirations. Those commonly termed ‘disadvantaged communities’ does not necessarily mean the people within these communities have less ability to effect change, but often instead have less opportunity. We were keen to explore this further with our witnesses.

239. Building capacity in those less able community groups was seen as critical to the success of the participation request process. Angus Hardie from Scottish Community Alliance said—

“The Government has invested a lot in capacity building in the past and, frankly, it has not worked. We have to look at how we can change our approach to building capacity in the most disadvantaged communities so that it makes an impact and changes the normal pattern of those communities being the last to benefit.”¹⁴²

240. Community Learning and Development Managers described capacity building as “a long-term, purposeful process that builds cohesion and confidence and establishes a social and organisational infrastructure.”¹⁴³ They explained that sharing practice to support the implementation of legislation was their core purpose with their current focus being on “identifying communities' needs for community learning and development” under the Requirements for Community Learning and Development (Scotland) Regulations 2013.¹⁴⁴

241. John Hosie, Dundee City Council, explained his Council’s approach to building capacity, “our resources are deployed in areas of greatest need to plug the inequalities gap”. He recognised this was a long-term aspiration and went on to say—

“It is our core business to build capacity among groups of people who happen to reside in the areas of greatest deprivation. That is negotiated, and sometimes it involves a balance between challenge and support. Sometimes we have to challenge groups to see things slightly differently, while supporting them on their journey”.¹⁴⁵

242. John Hosie further explained the Council’s wider framework to support this work, advising there were regeneration forums in six of the eight most deprived wards in Dundee. These forums elect 15 local people to make decisions about funding allocations with the chairs meeting each month. Beyond this the Dundee

¹⁴² Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 24 September, column 5
¹⁴³ Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland. Written Submission.
¹⁴⁴ Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 30
¹⁴⁵ Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 18
Partnership runs a community conference every six months for people who sit on community groups and the people set the conference agenda.\textsuperscript{146}

243. The Minister drew our attention to funding dedicated to building capacity—

“through a £3 million strengthening communities programme, we will support 150 community-led organisations to build their capacity. That will have a great multiplier effect at local level.”\textsuperscript{147}

244. In terms of spreading best practice Douglas Sinclair, Accounts Commission wondered whether there was a greater role for scrutiny bodies to identify good practice or share lessons learned from approaches which have not worked so well. He recognised the difficulty in spreading good practice and referred to a report on public services in Wales which said “good practice is a bad traveller” which encapsulated the challenge of sharing best practice.\textsuperscript{148}

Requirement for a written constitution

245. The Policy Memorandum states the main reason for requiring those wishing to make participation requests to have a written constitution was “to ensure community bodies are open, inclusive and truly represent their communities.”\textsuperscript{149}

246. Participation requests formalise the process of community involvement in shaping services and their delivery. A number of respondents challenged the need for a group to have a written constitution, particularly where a loose grouping of individuals is campaigning on a single issue. Also not all community groups will wish to deliver services, many may just want to suggest a minor change to an existing service or discuss the level of service without contributing to an outcome improvement process. Voluntary Action Scotland, thought it was “overly prescriptive”\textsuperscript{150} and Highland Council commented “it still appeared overly complex.”\textsuperscript{151}

247. We heard concerns that individuals or loose groupings of individuals, might face increased difficulty in engaging with public service authorities about services more generally. Children in Scotland considered the—

“formality and organisation required of groups before they can apply to participate may deter or disqualify less formal and ad hoc groupings, or single-issue topical campaigns. Specifically we are concerned that those in less advantaged communities and groups may find these requirements a barrier to access.” The organisation believed individuals and groups, formally constituted or not, should feel able to be involved in issues that

\textsuperscript{149} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 46
\textsuperscript{150} Voluntary Action Scotland. Written Submission.
\textsuperscript{151} Highland Council. Written Submission. affect them directly, such as litter in their street or about standards in their local school.\textsuperscript{152}

248. This need for flexibility was supported by Barnardo’s Scotland \textsuperscript{153} a view also supported by some who came to our stakeholder events, who considered public service authorities may become less responsive to individuals’ calls to improve services and considered that as an individual they should have a right to ‘lobby’. Jeannie Mackenzie who responded to our video on participation request said—

“Sometimes an individual has a very good idea for improving public services, but lacks the time or opportunity to find others and form a constituted group. Therefore, there should also be a place for individual ideas to be presented”\textsuperscript{154}

249. In making the process more accessible, Development Trust Association Scotland (DTAS) suggested it was first necessary to separate influence of service delivery from communities delivering public services. DTAS believed—

“While there is a relationship between both aspects, it would appear to us that a more light touch process would be applicable to the former activity, which should also arguably be available to a wider range of community organisations.”\textsuperscript{155}

250. Scottish Government officials told us this was an area they had simplified following consultation. They had responded to concerns by simplifying the definition of a constitution and by using the same definition across different parts of the Bill. Also the definition was refined so it could include communities of interests leaving it to the community to define itself. Given it was a legislative process they suggested some sort of structure was required. They suggested not a huge amount was required to get involved; a written constitution being the minimum requirement.\textsuperscript{156}

Publicity and guidance to encourage participation
251. Many people highlighted the need for a concerted publicity campaign with plain language guidance to encourage the use of the participation process and support effective implementation more generally. Highland Council made the point “simple guidance will be critical to ensure that groups are not only enabled legislatively, but are able to understand what they have been empowered to participate in” for example the Council suggested the meaning of ‘participation’ in an ‘outcome improvement process’ needed to be clarified.\textsuperscript{157} Maggie Paterson, Community Learning and Development Manager Scotland, said “we need to ensure the processes are clear enough and that the jargon is translated so that \textsuperscript{152} Children in Scotland. Written Submission.

\textsuperscript{153} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 26
\textsuperscript{154} Response to Podcast on Participation Requests \textsuperscript{155} Development Trusts Association Scotland. Written Submission.
\textsuperscript{156} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, Scottish Government officials, 24 September, column 40
\textsuperscript{157} Highland Council. Written Submission.
people know what the bill means for them”.

A delegate at the Scottish Older Persons Assembly, when discussing the Bill, advised older people find ‘official’ language very hard to understand and confusing.

252. Some questioned whether the right to participate extended to arm’s length external organisations (ALEOs) and suggested specific guidance would be needed on this aspect. In order to clarify the position, John Glover, Community Land Advisory Service, suggested Parts 3 and 5 should automatically apply to publically owned companies with those excepted being prescribed in regulations, thus making it easier for communities to identify who is subject to the Bill.

253. Scottish Government officials explained there is no single definition of an ALEO and this can take a range of legal forms and carry out a range of functions. It would be possible to designate an ALEO as a public service authority if it was a body corporate and wholly owned by one or more public service authorities. They also clarified “no ALEOs are currently listed in Schedule 2 to the Bill” and Urban Regeneration Companies could also be designated if they were wholly publically owned.

Refusal of a request

254. Further clarity was sought by us about the grounds to be considered by public service authorities when coming to a decision about either a participation request, under Part 3, or an asset transfer request, under Part 5 of the Bill. Some submissions were concerned about consistency of application and thought issues might arise if the criteria were open to interpretation. Glasgow City Council warned—

“until there is clarity in this area, the effect may be disempowering, as in having raised expectation and then having hopes dashed. This could impact on working relationships and may be counter productive to establishing longer term collaboration and trust on which effective community planning and community empowerment should be based.”

255. In terms of how Dundee City Council anticipated addressing reasonable grounds, John Hosie said, “A starting point would be to offer support to the group. The way in which we have developed our outline framework for assessment means that 50 per cent weighting is given to community benefit”.

256. A further operational issue raised was the lack of an arbitration or appeal procedure where dispute about a participation request arises.

---

159 Committee meeting papers, LGR/S4/14/28/9, page 108. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/Meeting%20P apers/20141112_Agenda_and_Meeting_Papers.pdf
160 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 44
161, Q&A paragraph 61
162 Glasgow City Council. Written Submission.
163 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 15
257. Scottish Community Alliance suggested the absence of an appeal mechanism “leaves the balance of power with the public body” and this omission “may ultimately discourage communities from exercising this right”.164 The Scottish Youth Parliament also believed there “should be an appropriate appeals procedure in line with the basic principles of due process and transparency.”165 Martin Doherty, Volunteer Scotland also welcomed an appeals process as he considered it unreasonable to expect small voluntary organisations to be able to challenge a public service authority in the courts.166

258. The Minister, however, considered the Bill would have a positive influence on how public service authorities treated community requests—

“The legal requirements should encourage authorities to put good processes in place. If they do not and a request is not handled competently and effectively, I suspect that the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman will have something to say about that.”167

259. He went on to say “given the presumption in the bill, the courts and the ombudsman will be able to point to what councils should have done. That is a game changer for community rights.”168

Recommendations on Part 3

260. Many of our recommendations about the changes required to public service authorities are to ensure the intention of the Bill is achieved in practice. Given the need for this Bill follows the failure of voluntary arrangements we consider it vital progress is closely monitored. To allow that to happen we recommend the Bill require all public service authorities to produce periodic public reports. The following recommendations set out areas to be covered in such a published report and also other recommendations in respect of this Part.

A community officer (Parts 3 and 5)

261. We support the idea of a community officer with responsibility for coordinating activity under the Bill. We recognise public service authorities should have flexibility and freedom to put in place local solutions when implementing the legislation. We also acknowledge the argument there could be a tendency for staff to rely on the ‘community officer’ rather than individuals within the organisation taking responsibility for this policy in their work area. Taking these concerns into account rather than recommending this role should be a statutory one we recommend the report set out the arrangements made by each body to support communities to utilise these provisions.

164 Scottish Community Alliance. Written Submission.
165 Scottish Youth Parliament. Written Submission.
166 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 41
168 See footnote 166
Role of community engagement in encouraging participation
262. The report should set out the methods used to encourage community participation and comment on how successful they have been.

Capacity of community groups to participate
263. The report should set out the steps taken to underpin the community focused provisions in the Bill (Parts 3 and 5). It should also identify those communities which have been supported along with a summary of the support provided and details of how successful this has been.

Building community capacity
264. The report should set out how they have built capacity in communities which has allowed them to take advantage of participation requests and asset transfer requests. In addition it should set out measures taken to address inequalities between communities in their area.

265. The importance of anchor organisations and the third sector in delivering support to communities and in bridging knowledge and skill gaps is widely accepted. Accordingly we would like the Scottish Government to state its approach to building this capacity and how it is to be funded, thereby allowing Parts 3 and 5 to be accessible to all.

Requirement for a written constitution
266. In a Bill designed to empower communities the requirement for a written constitution is disempowering. Part 3 is about the community coming forward with ideas to improve services and nothing in the Bill should be a barrier to this happening by any individual or group of people. The need to have this Part of the Bill has arisen as a consequence of the failure of an informal system and it seems counter-intuitive to provide a process for the community more restrictive than currently exists.

267. Accordingly we recommend the removal of the need for an application to be by a group and in the event of an application under this Part by a group for the requirement for any written constitution together with the removal of any other restrictions which could dilute the community accessing these provisions. For any that are to remain we expect to hear compelling reasons for their inclusion otherwise as the process, which is designed also to assist public service authorities in improving services, should be open to all.

Publicity and guidance to encourage participation
268. We also recommend the report set out the steps taken to provide information to communities, including publicity, and how successful this has been in making the participation request process accessible to all.

Refusal of a request
269. We recommend complaints concerning the handling of participation requests made to the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO) are separately identifiable in their records and shown in annual reports. This will enable implementation and effectiveness of the new process to be monitored.
270. Finally, we recommend information be included in the reports on public service authorities’ willingness to allow community participation; the number of participation requests made; the number refused; and an explanation of organisational initiatives which encourage community participation in shaping of and the delivery of services.
PART 4: COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY

271. The report on Part 4 of the Bill by the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee can be found at Annexe A of this report.

PART 5: ASSET TRANSFER REQUESTS

Background

272. Part 5 sets out a framework for an asset transfer process for certain public bodies. In other words, how a “community transfer body” (the community body acquiring the asset) can request to buy, lease, manage, occupy or use land belonging to a “relevant authority” (a public body listed in Schedule 3, for example a local authority or a health board), and how the authority is to deal with such requests. The definition of “land” in the Bill relies on the Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010\(^\text{169}\), and as such ‘land’ referred to in this report also includes buildings and other structures, land covered with water, and any right or interest in or over land.

273. At present, a number of public authorities have established asset transfer schemes to allow communities to take control (i.e. buy, lease, manage, occupy or use) of assets within their area. The Policy Memorandum welcomes the existence of current schemes but states that—

“The Bill goes further, giving the initiative to communities to identify property they are interested in, and placing a duty on public authorities to agree to the request unless they can show reasonable grounds for refusal.”\(^\text{170}\)

274. The Policy Memorandum also highlights that the intention is not for the focus of asset transfer requests to necessarily be on buildings and land considered surplus to the public sector’s requirements, but on—

“what the community seeks to achieve and what property would help them achieve that.”\(^\text{171}\)

275. Community ownership of assets is one approach to achieving community participation, developing community enterprises and community renewal. The Christie Commission findings highlighted the value of transferring assets that the public sector currently owns on behalf of communities to communities themselves allowing them to achieve better outcomes.

276. Prior to the Bill, other policy approaches have sought to stimulate the transfer of public assets to communities. For example, the Scottish Government commissioned the Development Trusts Association Scotland (DTAS) to raise awareness and improve the practice of local authority asset transfer which subsequently led to the creation of the Community Ownership Support Service (COSS). COSS supports and represents over 200 Development Trusts in

---

\(^{169}\) Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 asp10, Schedule 1 Definitions of Words and Expressions. Available at: \url{http://www.legislation.gov.uk/asp/2010/10/schedule/1}

\(^{170}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 76

\(^{171}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 75
Scotland.\textsuperscript{172} This work has led some local authorities to develop their own asset transfer strategies and procedure. COSS has been involved in 38 asset local authority transfers from 2011 to 2014\textsuperscript{173} and almost half of Scotland’s local authorities now have asset transfer strategies in place.\textsuperscript{174}

277. In addition, a recent relaxation in the procedural requirements to be followed by local authorities when disposing of assets now means that under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010\textsuperscript{175} a local authority can dispose of an asset for less than market value where the local authority is satisfied that it is achieving “best value” through economic, regeneration, social, environmental or health benefits.

278. Some communities in Scotland have already acquired assets ranging from village halls and bowling greens to sports facilities; from amenity land to rural estates. A study in 2009 showed 75,891 assets are owned by a total of 2,718 community-controlled organisations in Scotland and have a combined value of £1.45bn. Included in these assets is 483,006 acres – 2.38% of Scotland’s land area. Also as part of the overall figure 2,740 assets are “community assets” (bring benefits to the whole community) and these have a combined value of £0.65bn\textsuperscript{176}

279. Even though some assets have transferred into community hands, there are cases across Scotland where community asset transfer was possible but had not been achieved because the process had not been clear or had taken too long. The Scottish Government believes both the public sector and communities could benefit from having clear and realistic processes to manage community asset transfer. By making the process more consistent and ensuring relevant authorities provide a reasoned response to requests, the Government hopes the provisions will result in an increase in the number of assets transferred.\textsuperscript{177}

280. Section 50 defines a “community transfer body” as either a ‘community-controlled body’, as defined in section 14, or a body designated as a community transfer body by the Scottish Ministers, such as a company or a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation (SCIO). Section 51 defines a “relevant authority” as a person (or organisation) listed in schedule 3, for example Scottish Water or Scottish Enterprise, or one designated as a “relevant authority” by the Scottish Ministers by subordinate legislation.

\textsuperscript{172} Elected Member Briefing Note No.23, Community Ownership and Transfer of Local Authority Assets, The Improvement Service, July 2014, About this briefing note. Available at: file:///C:/temp/EM%20Briefing%2023%20-%20Community%20Ownership%20Transfer%20of%20Local%20Authority%20Assets.pdf
\textsuperscript{173} Financial Memorandum, paragraph 72
\textsuperscript{174} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October, column 37
\textsuperscript{176} Elected Member Briefing Note No.23, Community Ownership and Transfer of Local Authority Assets, The Improvement Service, July 2014, How do we know it works? Available at: file:///C:/temp/EM%20Briefing%2023%20-%20Community%20Ownership%20Transfer%20of%20Local%20Authority%20Assets.pdf
\textsuperscript{177} Financial Memorandum, paragraphs 71-72
Other provisions set out further procedures and time limits to be followed along with how appeals are dealt with by different relevant authorities. In addition there is provision to help relevant authorities deal with repeated or vexatious requests. For example, if a second request relating to the same land or building is made within two years of a previous request, which was refused, the relevant authority may choose not to consider that second request.

Committee submissions

282. Overall, the right to request an asset transfer has been welcomed by those responding to our call for evidence, particularly because the power extends not only to ownership of an asset, but also to the right to use, manage or lease. The Big Lottery Fund wrote—

"the Bill provides communities with a variety of ways in which they can make better use of public land and buildings. It also gives them the option to ‘test their mettle’ by maybe starting off by leasing and managing an asset to see how they get on before deciding to buy it outright from the public authority."

283. Another reason for support was it permitted community use in situations where the property was earmarked for another use in the longer term, Linda Gillespie of COSS told the Committee she was supportive of the Bill because it would encourage “meanwhile use of land”.

284. Notwithstanding the overall positive response, there were a number of general concerns about the approach taken in the bill—

- Capacity of communities to request an asset transfer
• Relevant authorities’ willingness to respond to requests
• Timescale for consideration of requests
• Information to be provided to the community transfer body
• Publicly available asset register
• Exclusion of certain public bodies
• Appeals process
• Definition of a community transfer body

Capacity of communities to request an asset transfer

285. Much like Part 3 of the Bill (participation requests), a great many written and oral submissions focussed on the ability of communities to acquire an asset and the potential inequality of access for some communities. Inclusion Scotland considered “marginalised, fractured and impoverished communities will, by definition, have fewer assets, or assets of lower quality, in their areas, which will in turn be harder and more expensive to manage and maintain.” sportScotland cautioned against “asset grab” where strong community groups seek asset transfer for exclusive use to the detriment of the wider community and suggested that inclusivity should be fostered with any community asset transfer.

286. Linda Gillespie was less concerned on the above—

“In general, we find that communities react to threat and opportunity—when there is the threat of closure or when an opportunity emerges”

287. Where the difference occurs, advised Linda Gillespie, was in the cost of going through the transfer process. If a community required grant funding to go through the process it would be in the region of £20,000 to £25,000 whereas if the skills were available in the community the cost would be around £12,000 to access the professional services only.

288. A number of submissions called for dedicated support to be provided to community groups. Children 1st considered support to “navigate complex bureaucratic processes is vital to ensure communities do not find the process alienating”.

289. Unlike participation requests, in terms of supporting communities to take over control of a public sector asset, witnesses considered there could be a conflict of interest. Approaches to this ‘dilemma’ differed. Geraldine McCann, South Lanarkshire considered the Council’s role was to direct communities to where they could get advice. Whereas, Kay Gilmour from East Ayrshire considered the dedicated council team (which includes lawyers) could provide professional advice without compromising the council’s overall legal service.

---

180 Inclusion Scotland. Written submission.
181 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October, column 31
182 See footnote 181
183 Children 1st. Written submission.
184 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October, column 30
185 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October, column 30
Community Land Advisory Service suggested third sector support services should be developed to fill this gap.\textsuperscript{186}

290. We have quoted the Ministers response on conflict of interests concerns that they are an excuse he does not consider valid at paragraph 46. He went on to add that “authorities are more at liberty to do that than they suggested to you.”\textsuperscript{187}

291. We agree with the Minister that ‘conflict of interest’ is an unacceptable excuse to avoid suitably supporting communities to acquire assets.

292. DTAS and the Big Lottery Fund believed there was an opportunity to export the knowledge of those who had been through the process of asset transfer. DTAS argued—

“\textit{We need to recognise that the knowledge and expertise increasingly rests, not within external support organisations, but within the development trusts and other community anchor organisations who are turning around failing assets, developing renewable energy projects, managing landed estates, successfully regenerating high streets, taking over post offices, petrol stations and local shops, etc, etc! The implementation of the Community Empowerment Bill presents an exciting opportunity to recognise this, and develop a peer education and peer support programme which taps into and effectively utilises this knowledge and expertise. Such a programme would be incredibly resource efficient in relation to other methods of capacity building, with the added benefit that the main financial beneficiaries would be community organisations themselves.”}\textsuperscript{188}

\textit{Relevant authorities’ willingness to respond to requests}

293. It is clear to us, not only from the information gathered in response to this Bill but also through our work on the delivery of regeneration, that a negative experience of trying to acquire an asset is all too commonplace. We were keen to examine whether there were coordinated strategies for asset transfers and proactive, knowledgeable, frontline staff who have the backing from the very top of the organisation as this can have a significant bearing on the success of communities’ aspirations in relation to acquiring assets.

294. It is apparent not all the relevant authorities who spoke to us were well placed to deal with the impact of the legislation. The Health Boards, although engaging with the community about community health priorities, were focussed on the integration of health and social care. It appeared they had not fully quantified how asset transfers would affect the property they were responsible for. NHS Tayside expressed its concern that—time when we are and will continue to be challenged financially, for most NHS Boards, the need to vacate property ‘not fit for purpose’ and secure optimal returns from the sale of such assets via the open market has been an absolute necessity. The right to buy should therefore be at the full market value of the land or buildings and through the open market.‖

“\textit{The benefits to communities to exercise their rights to buy and request asset transfers have many potential positive outcomes. However, at a...}

295. Although most witnesses acknowledged the legislation was a “catalyst for change” and could “stimulate culture change” some community representative witnesses were doubtful whether relevant authorities were ready to respond to asset transfer requests.

296. David Coulter from Dumfries Third Sector Interface considered “there needs to be a long-term change in culture around the way in which public authorities view assets.” He sensed public bodies regard assets as being owned by them saying “that might be the legal position, but the reality is that we as a community in Scotland own them”. Linda Gillespie from COSS also considered more work was required “to get public authorities into a mindset where it becomes second nature to make land available to communities”.

297. As well as a change in culture, others noted some relevant authorities would need to make practical changes to facilitate the process.

298. One of the main frustrations expressed by groups wishing to acquire an asset was the difficulty in finding the right person to speak to within a public body who had the knowledge to answer their questions or to direct them to such a person. This was brought into sharp focus in the experiences recounted by the community groups in North Lanarkshire and Dundee. Teresa Aitken from Glenboig Neighbourhood House felt there was “no consistency or accountability” in her dealings with North Lanarkshire Council. She expanded on this point saying “within the authority and its various departments, people do not communicate with one another, so we have to communicate with all the different departments”. This was echoed by Ryan Currie from Reeltime Music who said “public bodies do just enough to get by, and it does not always seem to be joined up”.

299. We heard about successful interactions and the difference these had made to groups trying to acquire an asset. Both Alice Bovill of St Mary’s Centre Dundee and Yvonne Tosh from Douglas Community Open Spaces Group commended Dundee City Council’s approach. Yvonne Tosh commented that in Dundee “we are lucky” adding “we usually get help quite easily and it is sustained, so that is a

---

189 Written Submission 45
190 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October, column 6
191 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October, column 39
193 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October, column 24
big help.‖ Alice Bovill pointed to the success of the community officer approach, which “will help us with every individual aspect of what we are trying to do.”

300. Other local authorities adopted an approach where the personnel required to underpin asset transfer were grouped. Kay Gilmour explained East Ayrshire Council’s approach to handling asset transfer requests. The Council established a dedicated community asset transfer team which comprised a surveyor, a lawyer, a person from property services and “importantly” two community workers. She said the team “has been critical in building capacity in our communities”. While South Lanarkshire did not group particular professions together, Geraldine Gilmore told us housing and technical services, planning and regeneration teams have had “a great deal of involvement” and “a number of assets have been transferred successfully to community groups”.

301. Under the current processes, to acquire an asset commonly requires community groups to have a great deal of drive and determination, diverse skills, and even personal finances, to tackle unnecessarily bureaucratic and disjointed procedures. It is of concern to us the Bill will have little impact unless there is a change to public bodies’ mindset to underpin the new asset transfer process; we believe if relevant authorities do not rise to the challenge a large number of good community ideas will be stifled at a very early stage.

302. We commend those relevant authorities which have already geared up for asset transfers and have a proactive and positive approach to assisting communities. By marshalling expertise to support the transfer process these bodies are making it easier for communities to become empowered.

Timescale for consideration of requests

303. An area of significant concern for community groups was the time it took to acquire an asset. There is no period set for a relevant authority to issue a decision notice. We note there is a six month period for a community transfer body to conclude a contract, failing which, the offer falls.

304. In Teresa Aitken’s experience, deadlines were set for them to provide information but the authority did not meet its deadlines “the community has to do all the running.” This view was echoed by Ryan Currie who reflected “work is very much done on a piecemeal basis”.

305. One of the sticking points for community groups acquiring an asset is the length of time negotiations take with the relevant public body. We heard from Louise Matheson about her Council’s approach to asset transfers—

---

195 See footnote 194
197 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October, column 27
198 See footnote 194
199 See footnote 194
“Dumfries and Galloway Council has a process that allows a maximum period of 18 months for the community group to bring forward its proposals and for the transfer to happen.”

306. However Inspired Community Enterprise Trust explained it had taken 18 months to negotiate a lease with Dumfries and Galloway Council and this was still on-going. We heard this could have had significant implications for the viability of the project had the Enterprise Trust not successfully separated the funding conditions from the leasing of a property. We have continued to keep an eye on the progress of these negotiations, not least to gain a deeper understanding of the issues involved.

307. Other local authorities advised timescales could vary. Scottish Borders Council advised timescales could vary according to—

“the complexity of the project. Sometimes it can take 2/3 months but it could extend to several years due the need to work with communities to ensure that they have robust and sustainable business plans which enable them to be ready to take on the asset.”

308. We also heard from community representatives about the vagaries of the application process for funding. An inordinate amount of time is spent locating funding streams, making applications for funding, and reapplying to meet previously not communicated conditions. While in Fort William, an attendee at the stakeholder event told us funding organisations are disconnected from local communities today much more so than 20 – 25 years ago. The LEADER programme is managed by business gateway and other funds are managed differently. So it is very hard for local communities and community groups to track where funding is coming from or where it might be available.

309. Yvonne Tosh of Douglas Community Open Spaces Group told us—

“Getting funding has been quite hard for us. We would keep getting told that we fitted the criteria, but when we put in an application we were told that the words were too official. We took it back and wrote it in our language, but it came back to us because we did not fit the criteria.”

310. When asked about whether timescales could be set to minimise the impacts for community groups in the Bill, the Minister advised he was not keen on centralising timescales but said, “we can consider the timescales issue more closely, but I would rather that authorities acted in good faith and considered and responded timeously to any requests that are made of them. I would be slightly

---

200 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October, column 26
202 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, column 49 fearful if an arbitrary timescale were set whereby they might simply say no."^{203} However, he commented further, "we must ensure that we better calibrate and organise the various funding streams to support community groups, rather than going through the process time and time again."^{204}

311. The Bill does not set a time limit for consideration of a community group’s asset transfer request and the issue of a decision notice. Section 55(8) does enable the Scottish Ministers to prescribe by regulations the period within which a decision notice should be issued. In addition there is no timescale for relevant authorities to conclude a contract, whereas the community transfer body has to conclude the contract within six months of the date of the offer, otherwise a transfer agreement ceases to have effect. The community transfer body can negotiate with the relevant authority to agree a longer period. If a longer period is not agreed then the community transfer body can apply to Scottish Ministers to direct that the period should be extended.

312. We sought to query the timescales with the Minister and following an exchange of correspondence^{205} were advised—

"The scenario you outline in your letter is that a relevant authority has agreed to an asset transfer request, given notice of its decision to the community body, specified the terms of the transfer, lease or other arrangement and has received an offer from the community body. The relevant authority then deliberately delays the conclusion of the contract so that the process ends and is treated as if the asset transfer had not been agreed."^{206}

313. Minister Biagi said "I believe that this scenario is unlikely to happen in practice".^{207} He added—

"We have no plans to amend these provisions. Property transactions can be complex, and issues may arise which take time to work out, or which ultimately make the transfer unachievable, despite the best intentions of both parties."^{208}

314. It is important that an asset transfer is not thwarted by delay, as funding can be time-barred. An appropriate balance must be found between speed and rigor because no one wants to see failed asset transfers in Scotland.

^{206} See footnote 205
^{207} See footnote 205
^{208} See footnote 205
Information to be provided to community transfer body

315. The Policy Memorandum\(^{209}\) states secondary legislation will stipulate what information relevant authorities will be required to provide to community groups before they decide to request the transfer of an asset. Examples of maintenance costs and energy efficiency are provided in the Memorandum. We received a number of suggestions which were considered vital by respondents to inform a community’s assessment of whether to obtain an asset:

- value of the asset (if appropriate)
- rental value (if appropriate)
- yearly running costs
- details of impending repairs or maintenance costs
- energy efficiency.

316. Of these submissions, a good number focussed on the importance of valuations within the asset transfer process.

317. Section 52(4)(e) of the Bill requires the community transfer body making an asset transfer request to specify in its request the price it is prepared to pay for the asset it wishes to acquire. The Big Lottery Fund pointed out this would entail the community body having to arrange and pay for a survey/valuation at a very early stage. The Fund believed this to be unfair and onerous at this stage of the process. Instead, it suggested the public body should give prior notice to the community body of the minimum price it would accept. This could prevent the community body having to become embroiled in a costly and time consuming negotiation.\(^{210}\)

318. The preferred approach of both DTAS and Big Lottery Fund would be for the community group to have the valuation early as part of the information relevant authorities are required to provide to community transfer bodies. Big Lottery Fund explained the benefits – it would let the group know the amount of funding they would need and give them the opportunity to make early contact with potential funders to gauge the likelihood of funding being made available.\(^{211}\) DTAS covered this Part in detail in its submission, concluding—

> “The commercial sustainability of an asset transfer will often hinge on the value of the asset and the conditions (e.g. economic burdens) attached to the transfer. It is essential that there is scope for negotiation on these issues within the asset transfer processes and we suggest that clause 56(2)(a) could be reworded to encourage negotiated settlements.”\(^{212}\)

319. Some third sector respondents were concerned to ensure that liabilities were not “offloaded” to communities. On this subject, Professor Annette Hastings, University of Glasgow, drew attention to her ongoing work with English local authorities which are “involved in ambitious asset transfer programmes as part of their approach to managing severe budget cuts”. She suggested offloading “will be

\(^{209}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 77
\(^{210}\) Big Lottery Fund. Written submission.
\(^{211}\) Big Lottery Fund. Written submission.
\(^{212}\) Development Trusts Association Scotland. Written submission.
a real danger in some places”. However, local authority witnesses advised us it was important to work with communities to ensure any proposal was viable and sustainable; Geraldine McCann of South Lanarkshire said “it would be wrong to allow an asset to be transferred if by doing so we were setting someone up to fail”.

320. Business organisations had concerns about the impact on local businesses. In particular, the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB) suggested—

“If the transfer of an asset is accompanied by any form of public funding, a rigorous test of displacement is required when assessing the proposed activity. For example, using a vacant building to fund community-run commercial activity which directly competes with existing businesses (or may do so at some point in the future) is particularly unhelpful for our high streets”. The FSB suggested a potential solution would be to require relevant authorities to consult with any business using the asset, prior to agreeing to the transfer request.

Publically available asset register

321. Many of the submissions made to us centred on the lack of a publically-available asset register for relevant authorities which would enable communities to recognise opportunities within their community. It was also a topic discussed by those attending our community events. Many wanted a national asset register.

322. SCVO, the Alliance, DTAS and the Poverty Alliance were strong proponents of a requirement for relevant authorities to maintain and publish an asset register. SCVO stated—

“We are disappointed that the Bill does not provide a duty for public bodies to maintain and publish an asset register. Knowing what assets a public body holds which could be made available for community use would be a significant resource for communities. It would allow them to look at all the assets in their area and identify those which would suit their purpose.”

323. The Minister confirmed in a letter to us he too believed, “there is benefit in requiring relevant authorities to publish their registers of assets, to help community bodies understand what land or buildings may be available for asset transfer.”

324. The Minister did not agree about the benefits of a national asset register, “I do not see what purpose that would serve. As this is about local empowerment and participation, I do not see how a national picture would help us.”

---

213 Professor Annette Hastings, Written submission.
214 Federation of Small Businesses Scotland. Written submission.
215 Federation of Small Businesses Scotland. Written submission.
216 Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations. Written submission.
Exclusion of certain public bodies

325. The Bill lists the bodies subject to asset transfer requests at Schedule 3 – “relevant authorities”. It does not currently extend to bodies such as the National Museums of Scotland or the National Galleries of Scotland amongst other Scottish public bodies.

326. We would welcome an explanation of the rationale as to why some bodies have been listed as a “relevant authority” at Schedule 3 and why others are deemed not appropriate for inclusion.

327. For many communities, usage of an asset may be as important as ownership. A number of submissions, including those from Federation of City Farm and Community Gardens,\(^\text{219}\) Nourish Scotland\(^\text{220}\) and the Community Land Advisory Service, were concerned the:

“main issue with asset transfer requests is that the terms of the Bill do not permit a request to be made to public sector landowners whose functions and governance are reserved to Westminster, so limiting the community benefits that might be realised.”\(^\text{221}\)

328. Nourish Scotland said the Crown Estate, the Forestry Commission, Ministry of Defence and Network Rail are all significant land-owners.\(^\text{222}\)

329. Andy Brown from the Scottish Woodlot Association drew our attention to the incompatibility of the provisions of the Bill with those of the Forestry Act 1967, which precludes Forestry Commission Scotland from leasing woodland for forestry purposes. He went on to explain a further complication in regards to the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 which is very specific on the bodies that can lease land—

“While the bill that is before us could in theory enable a non-profit co-operative to lease land from the Forestry Commission, the 2010 Act says that only companies limited by guarantee can do so”.\(^\text{223}\)

330. The Forestry Commission do lease land to the community as Sunny Lochaber Urban Gardeners told us when we visited Fort William, but we note this was for allotments and not for forestry cultivation.

Appeals process

331. Sections 58 and 59 of the Bill deal with Appeals and Reviews. Where a relevant authority refuses an asset transfer request, or specifies conditions which vary significantly from the request, or does not give a decision notice within the prescribed timescale or otherwise agreed timescale, the community transfer body can appeal to Scottish Ministers. Where the relevant body is a local authority the \(^{219}\) Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens (Scotland). Written submission.

\(^{220}\) Nourish Scotland. Written submission.

\(^{221}\) Community Land Advisory Service. Written submission.

\(^{222}\) Nourish Scotland. Written submission.

\(^{223}\) Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 27 October 2014, column 8 community group can seek a review. The procedure, manner and timescale are to be set out in regulations.

332. DTAS welcomed the introduction of an appeal provision within the local authority asset transfer process. It requested that appeals should be considered by elected members. DTAS also sought clarification of whether the appeal process will apply to the valuation of the asset and the conditions attached to the transfer.224

333. The Bill currently makes no provision for a right of appeal against a refusal by Scottish Ministers to agree to an asset transfer request.

Definition of a community transfer body

334. We received submissions concerning what type of body should be included within the definition of a “community transfer body”. Section 53 stipulates a community group must be incorporated as a company or a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation (SCIO). The Scottish Woodlot Association would have liked to have seen Industrial & Provident Societies (IPS) included within this definition.225 The Association had an understanding that the Scottish Ministers have discretion to designate particular bodies (which might include IPSs) as eligible for asset transfer by purchase, but the timescale for this was not clear. Others, such as Co-Operatives UK considered co-operatives and Community Benefit Societies (BenComs) had an appropriate structure.226 While Social Enterprise Scotland believed Community Interest Companies (CICs) should be specifically mentioned in the Bill.227

335. In correspondence it was explained a key reason for requiring a community body to be a company or a SCIO was because it was seeking to take ownership of an asset. These structures ensured the body had proper governance and financial management, regulated either by Companies House or by the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator (OSCR). Officials advised there were many resources and model articles of association etc. available, and becoming incorporated was not overly onerous in the context of the other responsibilities of owning land or buildings.228

336. We note the Minister’s commitment229 to bring forward amendments to include BenComs as a type of body which can make an asset transfer request for ownership of land, under section 53 and note BenComs are now defined under the Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Act 2014.

---

224 Development Trusts Association Scotland. Written submission.
225 Scottish Woodlot Association. Written submission.
226 Co-operatives UK. Written submission.
227 Social Enterprise Scotland. Written submission.
337. In addition we note from Scottish Government officials\(^{230}\) it will be for the public body to satisfy itself that the community body has an appropriate structure to take on the responsibilities involved. It may be appropriate for a 25 year lease to require the body to be a company or SCIO; whereas for a short lease or use agreement, an unincorporated association may be sufficient.

338. The Minister gave a commitment to look at the Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Act 2014 and consider how this will impact on the implementation of the Bill. We are concerned to ensure as many community groups, as long as they have the right safeguards in place, can access ownership of an asset without delay.

Committee Recommendations on Part 5

339. Some of our recommendations are directed at the changes required to public bodies to ensure the intention of the Bill is achieved in practice. Given this Bill has been found to be necessary we consider it vital progress is closely monitored. To allow that to happen we recommend the Bill require all public bodies to produce periodic reports. The following recommendations include areas to be set out in such a published report and other recommendations.

Capacity of communities to request an asset transfer

340. Our recommendations in Part 3 (paragraphs 261-265) in relation to capacity of communities also applies to Part 5.

Relevant authorities’ willingness to respond to requests

341. We recommend information be included on relevant authorities’ willingness to respond to asset transfer reports: the number of asset transfer requests made; the number refused; and an explanation of organisational initiatives which encourage transfer of assets to communities.

Timescale for consideration of an asset transfer request

342. The Bill should stipulate a 6 month\(^{231}\) maximum time limit following receipt of community transfer body’s offer within which relevant authorities must conclude contracts unless otherwise agreed by all parties.

343. Any delay beyond the above period must be reported to the Chief Executive of the relevant authority setting out the reasons why an asset transfer has not been concluded.

344. Any breaches of the period must be reported in the report.

Information to be provided to community groups

345. To enable groups to assess the funding options available to them we recommend the Bill should stipulate that as a minimum the information listed at paragraph 315 be included in subordinate legislation.

---

\(^{230}\) See footnote 228

\(^{231}\) See paragraph 311 for explanation of timescales
Publically available asset register
346. We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to require all relevant authorities subject to Part 5 of the Bill to provide a publically available asset register.

Exclusion of certain public bodies
347. In addition we recommend the Scottish Government gives consideration to the various pieces of legislation which prevent the Forestry Commission from leasing land to communities for forestry purposes, and in particular, the leasing to not-for-profit industrial provident societies to enable greater use by communities of their land.

Appeals process
348. The Minister’s commitment to put in place an appeal process for refusals of asset transfers by the Scottish Ministers is welcome. We look forward to hearing detail of the framework.

349. We recommend the Bill detail how the appeal process for relevant authorities, local authorities and Scottish Ministers will apply to the valuation of an asset and the conditions attached to the transfer.

Definition of a community transfer body
350. The Scottish Government should specify which organisational structures it deems appropriate for ownership of assets.
PART 6: COMMON GOOD

Background

351. Part 6 of the Bill proposes to reform the law on common good assets held by Scottish local authorities. Sections 63 to 67 of the Bill place new statutory duties on local government in the way they acquire, handle, manage and dispose of assets held for the common good of the community ("common good assets").

352. The concept of “common good” property has its origins in the Middle Ages where local communities used areas of land/property for communal purposes. Over time such property and other assets became part of the Scottish burghs where they were administered on behalf of local inhabitants.\textsuperscript{232}

353. In today’s terms common good property is owned by local authorities for the common good of the inhabitants in their areas. Common good property can include land, buildings, moveable items such as furniture and art, and cash funds.

354. The Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 (1973 Act) brought an end to the burgh system in 1975 by abolishing the town councils which had responsibility for the burghs. Their common good assets were, however, transferred to the new district or islands councils and then, in 1996, to the current unitary local authorities (Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994 (1994 Act)) Common good property is, therefore, limited to those assets held by the burghs at the time of their abolition. No new common good property can now be created.\textsuperscript{233}

355. It is sometimes difficult to know whether property is part of the common good, and there may be restrictions on how certain items of common good property are allowed to be used and whether the local authority can dispose of them. Under the common law those that can be used for a different purpose or disposed of are called “alienable” and those which cannot are “inalienable”. In some cases this has to be decided by the courts.\textsuperscript{234}

356. Common good assets are required to be treated differently by local councils when compared to other assets a council holds. They enjoy a certain status and stand apart from other property owned by local authorities and in handling them consideration requires to be given to the particular purpose for which the land or other assets were originally granted to the burgh.

357. The governing framework for these assets is complex and combines elements of both statutory law enacted over time, as well as case law from judicial rulings.

\textsuperscript{234} Explanatory Note, paragraph 276
358. The Bill places a statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property and assets held by them for the common good. It also requires local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community bodies before disposing of, or changing the use of common good assets.\footnote{Policy Memorandum, paragraph 4}

359. The Policy Memorandum explains the aim of Part 6 of the Bill is to increase transparency “about the existence, use and disposal of common good assets, and to increase community involvement in decisions taken about their identification, use and disposal.”\footnote{Policy Memorandum, paragraph 87}

Committee submissions

360. From the submissions received, the Committee’s oral evidence sessions, and external visits several key issues emerged:

- The definition of common good assets and resolving disputes;
- Assessing whether an asset is alienable or inalienable;
- The scale of the task and the resource implications of Part 6 of the Bill;
- The coordination, timescales and reporting on common good registers (“CG Register”)
- Equalities and devolved powers.

Defining common good assets and resolving disputes

361. The provisions of the 1973 Act in relation to common good assets continue to apply and it is the principal piece of primary legislation regulating the administration of common good assets by local government in Scotland. It does not define the “common good. Neither does Part 6 of the Bill provide a statutory definition of ‘common good’. Local authorities and others in Scotland rely on a series of common law definitions of common good from court rulings supplemented by statutory or regulatory provisions on such issues as how such assets are to be used and disposed of, or how they are to be accounted for in local authority accounts etc.

362. The Policy Memorandum states—

“These provisions do not seek to provide a new definition of common good. Inclusion on the register, or exclusion from it, will not determine whether property is in fact common good. Given the complexity of the subject, there is a high risk that any such approach might not cover all existing assets which are considered to be common good, and might cover things which are currently excluded. Rather, the intention is to provide an opportunity for community councils, other community bodies and individuals to see what the local authority considers to be common good property, and to highlight any items they believe should be included (or omitted). It is not intended that local authorities will be expected to legally verify the status of every item on the register or proposed during the consultation; this will normally only be necessary if there is significant dispute.”

363. The issue of a definition for common good was raised by a number of witnesses. Glasgow City Council in its written submission stated—

“One of the main difficulties encountered by local authorities in dealing with common good issues is determining what actually constitutes ‘common good land’. The existing law on common good is obscure and uncertain due, mainly, to the lack of legislation in the area and the absence of definitive and clear case law. The Bill does not attempt to “define ‘common good land’ and no guidance is given as to which assets ought to be included in the Register.”

364. Jim Grey of Glasgow City Council, set out the scale of the task facing a council like Glasgow—

“Glasgow City Council might have in the region of 20,000 title deeds to look at. I am not commenting on what proportion of those could fall within the common good definition, but if you want to do an exhaustive analysis, you will require to look at them.”

365. The Society of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland (SOLAR) also raised the following concerns—

- “How and in what circumstances moveable assets held on the common good account [of a local authority] could be disposed of? The legislation is currently silent on this point;

- Definitions of “alienable” and “inalienable” common good. The lack of clarity on these definitions has resulted in the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland refusing to issue a full title indemnity on the sale of any common good land, even where the property is clearly alienable;

- Ideally, the Bill would attempt to define common good rather than having to rely on less than perfect common law definitions.”

366. Commenting on this, Andrew Ferguson of SOLAR stated the main problem with the management of common good assets by local authorities “is uncertainty about the law”. He pointed out the Bill provides an “opportunity to clarify that situation”, adding—

“If property had been held on the common good account or had been acquired and put on the common good account, it would be difficult for a council, even now, to claim that it was not common good. I do not really see that as a difficulty. I suppose that you could expand the definition to talk about the common good account, so that if property had been acquired after the burgh days it would be included in that definition, but I just do not see it being too difficult."242

367. Mr Ferguson added “people have argued that there is a risk that doing that could exclude something that people have always thought was common good” but he felt that “with a bit of thought, that need not necessarily be the case”.243

368. However, he insisted “defining common good is not terribly difficult”... Indeed, a definition of common good land would also be useful. At the moment, the situation relies on lawyers interpreting some very old case law, and it would be far better if we had modern legislation that anyone could read and make a decent stab at understanding.”244

Disputes over common good assets

369. The Policy Memorandum states it is “not intended that local authorities will be expected to legally verify the status of every item on the register or proposed during the consultation; this will normally only be necessary if there is significant dispute.”

370. Dr Lindsay Neil of the Selkirk Regeneration Company spoke from the perspective of a group who would seek to engage with its local authority on the drawing up and maintaining of a common good register—

“The bill should aim to restore to communities their control and influence over what happens to their common good fund. It should also act as a referee on the management by local authorities of common good funds, because we have had experience—and new examples are still cropping up—of failures by local authorities to observe the existing regulations, never mind any change in regulation. The main thing is to involve local people, because the best guardians of property are its owners.”245

371. Recent cases in Edinburgh and East Renfrewshire246 appear to demonstrate disputes over common good assets can be time consuming and expensive, as well as very detrimental to good community relations.

372. Jim Grey of Glasgow City Council outlined some of the additional expense faced by the Council and explained why they sometimes seek external legal advice on common good assets—

243 See footnote 242
244 See footnote 242
245 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 5 November 2014 column 4
“We take that course of action to minimise disputes. Other parties and stakeholders might not agree with the legal advice that we receive from our own solicitors; we will want to create a degree of independence; and such a move stops just short of our going to court. That is the only reason why we would do that, because in general we rely on our own legal advice.”

373. We also heard from Audit Scotland. Responding to comments about its consideration of common good assets it recognised the importance of these issues for communities noting that although councils have made significant strides in registering common good land, buildings and other assets they have made different choices about the priority that should be attached to reconstructing historical records. Audit Scotland recognised making information complete would be a very expensive and possibly impossible task.

374. A further concern raised is the approach taken by the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland who, we were told, had indicated a full title indemnity on the sale of any inalienable common good land could not be issued without court authority. The Minister did not consider the issue to be relevant stating—

“I am not requiring all common good assets to be registered with the keeper of the registers of Scotland or with the land register. The common good register should be a user-friendly register that people can understand and which can trigger their involvement when decisions are being taken about the disposal of assets.”

375. Nevertheless we wrote to the Keeper on this issue who advised—

“One of the changes made by the coming in of the 2012 Act [Land Registration etc. (Scotland) Act 2012 which commenced on 8 December 2014] is to make rectification of the register more straightforward, by breaking the link to the warranty scheme (which replaces indemnity). Accordingly, the consequences of a wrongful registration decision are easier to correct. I anticipate that this may shift the balance in dealing with these borderline cases. In particular, I will be less likely to limit warranty in the majority of cases where the applicant for registration is able to certify the validity of the deed implementing the transfer, bearing in mind that I am entitled to be compensated by the applicant if they fail to comply with the new duty to take reasonable care to ensure that I do not inadvertently make the register inaccurate.”

---

250 Registers of Scotland. Written submission.
376. The Minister did not believe definitions of common good or inalienability are necessary for the Bill.\textsuperscript{251} As an alternative he suggested—

“…current CIPFA guidelines are clear that the best professional practice is that local authorities should maintain a separate register of their common good assets, so it should not be a significant cost or bureaucratic exercise to fulfil the bill’s requirements. I fear that the understanding of some local authorities might be that they have to clarify title deeds and have them registered, but that is a different interpretation.”\textsuperscript{252}

He added we--

“…chose not to [define common good] because there is an understanding of what common good is at the moment. If people are carrying out their duties with the CIPFA guidance in mind, they should already have an understanding of what common good is…. Frankly, I think that [a definition] would be a feast for lawyers, and I do not see the need for that.”\textsuperscript{253}

\textbf{Alienable vs inalienable common good assets}

377. As stated earlier, there may be restrictions on how certain items of common good property are allowed to be used and whether the local authority can dispose of them. Those that can be used for a different purpose or disposed of are called “alienable” and those which cannot are “inalienable”. In some cases this has to be decided by the courts.

378. Following recent cases\textsuperscript{254} in which the courts rejected attempts by local authorities to utilise inalienable land to build new schools we were advised this has created an anomaly with disposal of inalienable land to a third party for commercial purposes being permitted without the need for any authority.\textsuperscript{255}

379. Dr Michael Pugh and Dr John Connolly of the University of the West of Scotland called for the Bill to provide “clearer steps for community groups taking control of common good property”.\textsuperscript{256}

380. Fife Community Safety Partnership expressed general concern in terms of the division of common good assets into alienable and inalienable and the problems this can cause in terms of determining whether a common good asset can be disposed of without court consent. The Partnership suggested the Bill—

“provide more certainty for local authorities and communities alike as to what common good property needs consent for disposal, and what does not. This could be provided by a requirement on local authorities to maintain, in their register, separate lists of what they consider to be alienable and inalienable common good property; to do this, it would be

\textsuperscript{253} See footnote 251
\textsuperscript{254} See paragraph 246
\textsuperscript{255} Fife Community Safety Partnership. Written submission.
\textsuperscript{256} Dr Michael Pugh and Dr John Connolly. Written submission. extremely helpful to have a statutory definition inserted. Again, this would not in itself be overly difficult. It would be a case of codifying the existing case law and ensuring that the definition was as clear as possible.\footnote{257}

381. Both SOLAR and Glasgow City Council were anxious to ensure Part 6 of the Bill was clarified so that the transfer of common good assets, under Part 5 of the Bill, from councils to community ownership was made easier, and not inadvertently made more difficult. It was suggested to us “if the community has a plan for it, why should it not be able to take on that asset without there being blocks standing in the way?”\footnote{258}

382. Dr Lindsay Neil of the Selkirk Regeneration Company pointed to the issue of community benefit of common good assets. He contrasted this against the role of local authorities holding the title to assets and the importance this has for common good—

“A fine distinction avoided by many people is that the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 did not confer to local authorities the entire ownership of common good funds. It transferred the title, not the beneficial ownership.
The beneficial ownership remains with the citizens as a form of power and, in the present day and age, they have very little say indeed in what happens to their common good fund.”\footnote{259}

383. On the decision not to define common good assets in the Bill the Minister stated “the same reasons apply [for not defining common good] because of how common good has been constructed over the years. Some approaches are centuries old and some are the construct of changes to local authority structures.”\footnote{260}

384. Responding to the transfer of common good assets to community groups under Part 5 of the Bill, the Minister stated— “there would be no restriction on a community body using, managing or leasing such an asset—transfer of ownership or disposal is the issue—as long as that fits with the use for which the property was acquired.”\footnote{261}

The scale of the task and resources implications
385. In considering the evidence received on common good there was a lack of knowledge on the extent of the task involved in estimating the scale and extent of the work required by councils in complying with Part 6 of the Bill.

\footnotesize{\begin{itemize}
\item \footnote{257} Fife Community Safety Partnership. Written submission.
\item \footnote{258} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 5 November 2014, column 7
\item \footnote{259} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 5 November 2014, column 4
\item \footnote{261} Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 12 November 2014, column 26
\end{itemize}}
386. Jim Gray of Glasgow City Council told us there was a significant potential task facing the Council in assessing the title ownership of its assets, both for the purposes of common good and more generally.262

387. Audit Scotland stated that at 31 March 2011, councils managed common good assets valued at £219 million. While this accounts for less than 1% of the estimated total value of council owned property assets (then valued at £35 billion), common good assets often have strong historical and emotional value to local communities, as well as being of practical use to them.

388. Many who gave evidence referred to the administrative task facing councils in relation to the common good provisions of the Bill. For example North Ayrshire Council referred to the challenge it faced in—

“identifying all of the community bodies which are known to the authority. Central registers will require to be established, which can be accessed when representations are required to be offered.”263

389. This concern was also echoed by Highland Council. They pointed out that as a local authority, they have—

“…responsibility for administering ten different Common Good Funds… In relation specifically to Community Councils, the current wording in the Bill would require Highland Council to consult with all 156 Community Councils in its area on the establishment of a register and each disposal of property across any of the funds.”264

390. Highland Council went on to “strongly suggest” the wording [in the Bill] be amended to read “consult only with Community Councils that represent the inhabitants of the areas to which the Common Good related prior to 16 May 1975.” Community bodies agreed, Kincardine and Mearns Community Planning Group stated it would be “unmanageable and unadvisable that every community council in Aberdeenshire be located on every possible change of use of common good land”.265

391. In certain local authorities common good assets make up a large proportion of total assets. Community Planning Aberdeen stated—

“Aberdeen City Council’s Common Good makes up approximately a third of the total city assets therefore Aberdeen has one of the most substantial asset bases of Common Good land in Scotland”.266

392. In response to the debate around the costs of the provisions of the Bill to local authorities, and especially on the compilation of Common Good Registers, the Minister said—

263 North Ayrshire Council. Written submission.
264 Highland Council. Written submission.
265 Kincardine & Mearns Community Planning Group. Written submission.
266 Community Planning Aberdeen. Written submission.
"The bureaucracy—the cost of servicing the process—could easily be subsumed. Take the common good requirements, for example. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy already requests that the register—the understanding of assets as they relate to common good—be kept separate from mainstream council funding. Therefore, it should not be too onerous to produce a register of what is in the common good fund and what those assets are. The question is then about how we engage with communities. If the public sector engaged more collaboratively—through community planning partnerships, for example—it could remove some of the costs of duplicating the consultation by consulting just once, properly and more effectively."

The coordination, timescales and reporting on common good registers ("CG Register").
393. It is clear local authorities have had a scattergun approach to common good registers. Given the pressures placed upon them over the last 30 to 40 years in terms of delivering complex and interlinked public services, it is perhaps not surprising that common good had not featured as a priority in their work.
394. Responding to the view that the public would find it hard to understand how a local authority was unable to state with any certainty all of the assets under their control, Jim Grey of Glasgow City Council responded—

"We have a register, but we regard it as imperfect. We are trying to perfect it and to make it as comprehensive as possible… It is regrettable, but the matter is very complex and over years and decades local authorities have perhaps not given it the priority that they might have."

395. Andrew Ferguson of SOLAR told us—

"I do not see why the timescale for producing a common good asset register should not be fairly short. As colleagues have said, most local authorities have a common good asset register of some sort. The first step, in terms of the legislation, is to publish those registers, which will lead to a discussion. There is no doubt that community interests will have local knowledge; I know that because we have been through the process in Fife. That local knowledge will feed in and help to create a robust common good register. I see no reason why the timescale for initial publication, as proposed by the bill, should not be short. However, getting to the end of having a common good asset register that is absolutely 100 per cent accurate is a bit like painting the Forth bridge."

396. Responding on timescales for local authorities to draw up registers, the Minister told us he would consider whether that should be set out in regulations.

---

267 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 12 November 2014, column 4
Committee Recommendations on Part 6

397. We recommend the Bill be clarified to make it clear to local authorities and communities that no conflicts exist in relation to the transfer of common good assets under Part 5 of the Bill.

398. Given the approach outlined by the Minister we see no difficulty in the Bill specifying a maximum timescale for the compilation and production of Common Good Registers which we recommend be no later than 5 years from Royal Assent. Such timescales would also include the requirements on local authorities to report at specified intervals.

399. We note evidence on the impracticalities of being required to consult all community councils within a local authority area on specific common good assets, especially geographically larger councils. The Bill should be amended to permit regulations to allow for a necessary degree of flexibility.
PART 7: ALLOTMENTS

Background

400. Existing allotments legislation is a complex area, particularly in relation to land owned by local authorities. The principal legislation governing allotments is the Allotments (Scotland) Act 1892 as amended by the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919 and the Allotment (Scotland) Acts of 1922 and 1950. These acts currently detail the duty of local authorities to provide land in their local area for allotments, and the conditions under which this duty is placed. The legislation also gives local authorities powers to provide sufficient numbers of allotments in their area by purchasing or leasing suitable land.

401. Further, the 2003 Local Government Act (Part 3) creates a discretionary power which enables local authorities to do anything they consider is likely to promote well-being of their area and/or people.

402. Part 7 of the Bill proposes to repeal the existing legislation (that specifically relates to allotments) and make a new “updated, simplified and clarified” provision for allotments. The Policy Memorandum notes this was considered to be a more straightforward approach than to seek to amend the previous legislation. The new legislation includes the restatement of existing legislation where appropriate.

403. The Scottish Government published its first National Food and Drink Policy, Recipe for Success in 2009, which included a commitment to strategically support allotments and community growing spaces. Following on from this publication, the Grow Your Own Working Group was established in 2009 and their report (Grow Your Own Working Group 2011) contained a recommendation to amend the existing legislation governing allotments. The Group specifically highlighted the need to review the duties placed on local authorities in this area.

404. In addition to two consultations on the Bill, the Scottish Government also held a separate consultation on the proposed allotments legislation in April-May 2013, which they advise has informed the detail of the provisions in the Bill.

405. The provisions in Part 7 of the Bill seek to ensure local authorities have a duty to provide allotments and to manage requests through the maintenance of a waiting list. Local authorities also have a duty under the Bill to take “reasonable steps” to provide a sufficient number of allotments to ensure that waiting lists are kept below a specified target. This part of the Bill also defines the duties of local authorities in respect of running, maintaining and reporting on their allotment sites. This includes preparing a food-growing strategy and an annual allotments report. The remainder of Part 7 relates primarily to local authority powers to manage allotments and to the rights of allotment tenants in respect of these powers.

Committee submissions

406. Initially only a relatively small number of submissions received focussed on allotments. Given the community focus of this part of the Bill, we undertook an additional public engagement programme to seek the views of allotment holders and communities from across Scotland on the issues surrounding the role of allotments, access to land and food growing space and how community-based food initiatives could add to physical, economic and social well-being. As part of this process we undertook fact-finding visits, produced a short internet video and made use of social media to engage with people and communities. Annexe D sets out the extent of this in more detail, as well as containing responses we received via social media.

407. A number of areas highlighted were examined further through the Committee’s oral evidence sessions. These matters can be summarised under the following main heading:

- The number of allotments
- Provision of allotments
- Size of an allotment plot
- Availability of land for allotments
- Food growing strategy
- Food growing skills
- CPPs, food growing strategies and cultural change
- Equality and accessibility

The number of allotments

408. The number of allotments in Scotland has fluctuated greatly over the last century. The high water mark for allotment use came towards the end of World War II, owing to rationing and the need to generate food during the war, when there were approximately 65,000 allotments in Scotland. Since then numbers have declined.

Provision of allotments

409. We heard “more than half” of the current stock of active allotments are “in our four main cities, and the rest—fewer than 3,000 of the 6,500—were scattered across the rest of Scotland”.270 And we were told statistics show there are currently about 4,500 people on waiting lists in our four main cities.271

410. While there is existing legislation to regulate the operation and management of allotments in Scotland, there is currently no statutory duty on local authorities to provide members of the public with allotment sites. Part 7 requires local authorities to “take all reasonable steps” to provide an allotment to those who request one.

411. Scottish Allotments and Garden Society (SAGS) was concerned local authorities would reduce plot sizes to meet demand. Others suggested many people did not put their names on waiting lists as the wait was too long. John Hancock told us “There is a need for provision for people who arrive in town and want to just get on with things rather than putting their name on a waiting list in the expectation that they will still be living in Glasgow in five years’ time.”272

---

412. In this regard the Minister told us—

“…councils must take all reasonable steps to satisfy demand. We are not talking about some absolute trigger point whereby, when a certain level is reached, allotments must be produced within said time in said place for said people, because that would take away from the flexibility of local authorities to adapt to circumstances. It is about taking all reasonable steps to meet the demand.”

Size of an allotment plot
413. The ‘traditional’ size for an allotment plot was about 300 square yards, or about 250m\(^2\). SAGS is keen to see this specified in the Bill. It was also concerned about the lack of precision when referencing the size of an allotment and proposed the Bill should refer to a normal plot as being 250m\(^2\), which could then be subdivided into halves or quarters to suit local circumstances.

414. SAGS justified the need for a normal size to be set in term of allotment plots—

“A 250m\(^2\) plot is sufficient for someone to feed a family of four. Plots that are smaller than that will not have that capability.”

415. We explored issues around flexibility for local authorities, and others, to meet the demand for varying types of growing spaces, suitable to the needs of the applicant.

416. Mr Hancox, who has petitioned the Parliament regarding the right of access to land to grow food, told us “small-size growing, which can be growing in a square metre, a barrel or in a flower pot on a windowsill, is all great and I would encourage all of it.” He continued—

“Although I am very much in favour of increasing allotment provision, I think that it is essential that we allow considerable flexibility, whereby local authorities and other agencies can allow land to be used for a period of time without getting too bogged down in legal hurdles…..There has to be a partnership approach with landowners. That is critical. My petition looks at publicly owned land—health board land, local authority land and so forth.”

417. Responding to the need for local authorities to have flexibility in the provision of growing spaces, SAGS stated—

\[ \text{Citations:} 273 \text{ Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 12 November 2014, columns 6-7} \]
\[ \text{274 Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society. Written submission.} \]
\[ \text{275 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 5 November 2014, columns 21-22} \]
\[ \text{276 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 5 November 2014, column 25} \]
\[ \text{277 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 5 November 2014, columns 22-23} \]
“I take your point about flexibility. We want the 250m$^2$ there as a reference standard, not as an obligatory standard that has to be applied in all instances. Part of the response that we have had to our concerns about the removal of any reference standards is that, if it appeared that the majority of plots provided through local authorities in future were reducing in size, action could be taken but, if there is no reference standard, what would that action be based on?”

418. The Minister told us the Government wished to be “quite flexible” and to “not be too prescriptive” by leaving it up to local authorities “to decide the size and nature of allotments”. He sought to reassure local authorities that the Bill “will not place a huge new burden on them, but it will certainly move things along more proactive lines.”

419. On a standard size for allotments he stated—

“...the spirit of the legislation is that the trigger point encourages a local authority to meet demand, which might simply be for a space to grow things in, not necessarily for an allotment of a set size. We want local authorities to be able to define that for themselves. It would send the wrong message about empowerment and localism if I determined everything centrally in Edinburgh, including the size of an allotment, when, for good reason, local variations might be required in relation to things such as the size and nature of a site or the size of allotment that local people want.”

420. He noted also the Government “have powers under the bill to prescribe the size of allotments, if necessary.”

Availability of land for allotments

421. Many local authorities raised concerns about the cost of providing suitable land to meet the statutory duty placed upon them by Part 7 of the Bill. Access to suitable land is, in many respects, central to the discussion around the provision of allotments and access to space for growing food.

422. Much of urban Scotland has parcels of land which are, or could be, made available for cultivation but which are currently sitting idle and not being used for a variety of reasons. Three categories of such land were referred to in evidence to us.

423. The first category is vacant or derelict land earmarked for development at some future point for other uses, such as for house construction, or commercial or retail development. Such land may be owned either by public or private interests, and its interim use is often referred to as meanwhile land (i.e. land which is used for a temporary purpose, such as food growing, until such time as it is required by its owner to use for some other form of development).

---

280 See footnote 279

424. The second category is vacant or derelict land which may be unsuitable for growing due to contamination of the soil with the by-products of its former use. Often this land is former industrial land which may contain hazardous material, chemicals or heavy metals making the land unsuitable for cultivation without remediation and decontamination works being carried out.

425. The final category is land currently used for other purposes, such as parks, green spaces, or land which either forms part of the grounds of existing public or private buildings (e.g. hospitals, offices, or other buildings) or land which is adjacent to major infrastructure systems (such as the road and rail networks, water infrastructure or other areas).

426. Speaking about vacant and derelict land, and its potential usefulness in cultivation and growing areas, John Hancox told us “in Glasgow, there is around 3,000 hectares of vacant and derelict land. There are vast areas of what is known in the trade as green desert—great areas of grass where nothing happens.”

427. Nourish Scotland suggested—

“... we need more ground under community cultivation, whether that is allotments or community gardens. There is 300 hectares of derelict land in Edinburgh alone ... Less ground is being used for allotments in Scotland than there is derelict land in Edinburgh.”

428. Nourish Scotland said there was a need to approach the provision of allotments as part of a much wider strategic process of land reform, and to seek to see such land as a resource to be utilised—

“A strategic approach to supporting allotments and community gardens and, as John Hancox said, using land that is not being used for other purposes will form part of a much more strategic approach by local authorities to promoting local food growing and more sustainable food consumption and reducing food inequalities. We have to see food as part of a much more strategic approach. We also expect that the new land reform legislation will broaden our approach to looking at the use of land in the public interest and for the common good.”

429. We have been impressed by the meanwhile use of land as a method to provide access to growing space for community-based projects, such as the Grove Garden Project at Fountainbridge in Edinburgh. We took the example of the Grove as the basis for a short engagement video to seek further engagement from the public on this Part of the Bill. This video can be viewed on the Parliament’s

---

283 See footnote 282
YouTube Channel and Annex D contains examples of the feedback in response.

430. The Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens (FCFCG) spoke of the “potential to use a lot of derelict and underused land” at present. We were told “in Glasgow, the stalled spaces programme has been quite successful in using such land. Guerrilla gardening is but one type of community gardening that people can do to make use of that kind of land.”

431. Nourish Scotland while pointing out the costs associated with decontaminating such land spoke of “good examples of growing on derelict contaminated land” using systems such as raised beds and the like.

432. The FCFCG told us that the “grow your own working group recently launched a contaminated land guide for groups wishing to assess whether their land is contaminated. There could be more support for organisations that are doing that kind of work.”

433. Responding to the view that a broader approach should be taken by requiring land owning public sector bodies to have a duty in relation to both the provision of allotments and the food-growing strategies, the Minister stated—

“That is a very helpful suggestion. ….I would expect a local authority to be able to work with other public sector—or even private sector—partners to identify suitable sites…. Although the absolute duty rests with local authorities, I would expect them to work with other public sector partners, whether the police service, the fire service or the health service, to meet that demand. That would be an example of the true joint planning and resource management that we intend to take place in community planning partnerships.”

Food growing strategy
434. Part 7 also introduces a statutory requirement for local authorities to draw up and maintain a food growing strategy. The requirement reflects the growing awareness of the need to promote sustainable food production locally, and many local authorities already have food growing or horticultural strategies in their areas. This provides an opportunity to link several policy developments together, namely local food growing strategies, the national food and drink strategy and community planning.

435. In its written submission, Nourish Scotland noted—

---

“the local authority is also under an obligation to prepare a food growing strategy within two years of the Bill coming into force. The strategy should also identify areas that might be used to provide allotment sites or other areas of land that may be used for community growing. This must be reviewed every 5 years but there is no requirement to report on it.”

436. On 20 November 2014 the Parliament debated the progress to date of A Recipe for Success, and considered how it would be improved and built upon. During the debate reference was made to the need to develop food growing and horticultural skills amongst the public, especially children.

437. Responding to questions about the need to encourage children to take part in gardening and food growing the Cabinet Secretary for Environment and Rural Affairs, Richard Lochhead, said—

“…we have fantastic, nutritious food on our doorstep but not enough people, particularly our children, enjoy and have access to it. If we can make that happen, it will also be good for our economy.”

438. During this debate Alex Rowley MSP said the national food and drink policy, and the provisions of the Bill – especially those relating to allotments – should complement each other—

“…I think that it is important that we look right across Government. The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, which is currently being scrutinised, has a part on allotments. A lot more can be done….local authorities must be a clear partner in the strategy. They are doing a lot of work.”

439. Nourish Scotland indicated a need for a wide approach—

“We should not focus our allotments policy on the existence of waiting lists. We should have a clear public policy that we want to see more people growing more of their own food. It is part of community empowerment and part of a resilient food strategy.”

“We think that the food-growing strategy should include clear provision for traditional allotments, for the use of meanwhile land for community growing, and also for more ambitious larger-scale programmes.”

---

290 Nourish Scotland. Written submission.
293 Meeting of the Parliament, Official Report 20 November 2014, column 45
Food growing skills
440. The FCFCG highlighted that “more thought needs to be given to strategically addressing the skills and resources of community groups”. They told us there “is a massive skills gap in horticulture at the moment, and the food-growing strategy seems to be an opportunity to address that at a local authority level”.297

441. SAGS also reflected concerns over the “lack of knowledge and skill” which exists in terms of food growing and gardening, one of the reasons for which is the fact that the “allotment world has shrunk so much that it is not something that features in many people’s experience any longer”. SAGS went on to state—

“…community gardens and the other smaller growing initiatives all have a part to play. That is where people will learn, so there is undoubtedly a value to all that, but there needs to be a mechanism to allow for people who learn and then want more”.298

CPPs, food, growing strategies and cultural change
442. The Parliamentary debate on 20 November reflected a theme we identified in our scrutiny of this Part of the Bill, namely how allotments and community food growing projects can empower communities, not only assisting them in becoming food resilient and reducing their dependency on food banks, but also to assist towards promoting a food-growing economy.

443. In their evidence to us, Nourish Scotland said “there should be an emphasis on a community food economy in and around our cities and that food-growing strategies should contribute to developing that.”299

444. Nourish Scotland did not consider the Bill would support the Government’s strategy of providing allotments and food growing space, it suggested a wider cultural change was necessary.300

445. John Hancox was more positive, suggesting the Bill—

“has the potential to change the culture in local authorities and institutions such as the Forestry Commission, so that they can use their considerable landholdings and financial clout to enable community engagement and develop growing.”301

He added—

“There ought to be a culture in which people are able to identify bits of ground that are not being used and can then dig holes and get on with it. The essence of community empowerment is that people are able to get on with it. The onus should be put on to local authorities and others to be 300 Nourish Scotland. Written submission.

301 See footnote 297
supportive and to enable that process to happen, rather than to create onerous frameworks that put a lot of responsibilities around public liability on to the local groups, which can be difficult for groups that are not terribly powerfully constituted to deal with.”

CPPs, National Performance Framework and local development plans

446. Many we heard from suggested there was potential for food growing strategies to provide the platform necessary to ensure allotment policy and provision of food growing space becomes a central element of community planning.

447. This, in turn, could ensure all CPP partners, and not just local authorities, become responsible for the delivery of allotments and food growing space.

448. Nourish Scotland spoke of the link to outcomes and the importance of ensuring the forthcoming sustainability United Nations goals are integrated into food growing strategies from the outset—

“We welcome the part of the bill that focuses on outcomes being part of community planning. We want to see an outcome related to food squarely in the middle of the new set of outcomes that are agreed with local authorities’ post-2016. We would want them to draw on the new, post-2015 United Nations sustainable development goals, which are being published next year and which include the strategic goal to end hunger, improve nutrition and promote sustainable agriculture. Once those UN goals are in place, they will frame a lot of the single outcome agreements. Once an outcome relating to food is part of the national performance framework, we will see a much greater focus by local authorities on food-growing strategies.”

449. In response to a question as to whether allotments and garden spaces should feature in councils’ local development plans, SAGS responded “yes” and said—

“It is important that people get decent affordable housing, but it is equally important that land is set aside for some type of growing activity or whatever type of green space activity that people want.”

450. Nourish Scotland called for food growing strategies to deliver “far more allotments and community gardens in Scotland,” adding a concern “the bill does not have any levers to require that to happen. The framework of single outcome agreements is the lever that we need.”

---

303 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 5 November 2014, column 21
451. During our visit to Fort William we were told of the work of Sunny Lochaber Urban Gardeners ("SLUG"), and how they had in 2010 established allotments on land provided by the Forestry Commission owing to a lack of suitable allotment land in the Fort William area.

452. Up until now most of the produce generated by SLUG has been for the personal consumption of the allotment holders and their immediate families. However, SLUG now has ambitions to move into the commercial food growing economy, by selling its produce to local people and businesses (such as restaurants and hotels etc). This is where the commercial restrictions of allotment legislation intersect with the social, commercial and empowering effects which successful community-based allotment and food growing enterprises have, as well as clashing with the longer term aspirations of those involved. SLUG recognised with this might come a need to change its legal basis.

Equality and accessibility
453. The need to ensure the Bill delivers allotments and growing spaces which are accessible to all sectors of society was raised with us.

454. The Glasgow Third Sector Forum sought to ensure the allotments provided under Part 7 of the Bill were accessible and they recommended the Bill be amended by—“adding a requirement to include a proportionate number of accessible allotments in any new allotment, for use by wheelchair users and buggies. Accessibility aspects would include wide, all-weather decking and raised planting areas. For all existing allotments, we recommend that accessibility be phased-in over five years from the date of the implementation of the Bill. This equalities-based suggestion would clearly need to be resourced, and public bodies should be encouraged or required to make provision for this.”

455. Similar issues were raised during our fact-finding visits to Glasgow, Dumfries and Fort William. Several allotment holders expressed concerns about a lack of accessible or suitable growing space by local authorities. Many felt the Bill should specifically reflect the benefits to wellbeing and health which allotments and growing space can have for people.

456. These points were acknowledged by the Minister when he told us—

“It is fair to say that we need to expand our communities’ capacity, but we need to make the approach more consistent and to build in legislative provision to tackle inequality. In the guidance, we are very mindful of the inequalities that exist and of the fact that there is not a level playing field.”

457. He mentioned a proposed amendment at stage 2 which we understand will broaden the definition of “disability”—

“That is necessary so that, when people are weighing up decisions on asset transfers and so on, they think about inequalities. Local authorities might well want to consider that more fully in relation to allotments.”

Committee Recommendations on Part 7

458. A consistent message we have taken from our scrutiny of Part 7 of the Bill is the opportunities for community empowerment and physical, mental and social well-being through access to allotments and food growing space. In essence it is the basis for a shared community of place and interest, providing many with networking links, and human interaction.

459. On issues such as the size and number of allotments, we agree with the Minister that setting a defined standard plot size on the face of the Bill would not be helpful. This would remove local flexibility from councils, however we would like to see guidance covering this matter.

460. While we expect Local Authorities to take the lead in making land available for allotments etc, we expect other public bodies to look closely at their land holdings and respond positively to demand from communities. We recommend the Bill widen the responsibility to include the CPP to ensure the other partners are engaged.

461. We recognise local authorities are the appropriate public sector organisations to draw up local food growing strategies. However, confining this duty simply to local authorities would be a missed opportunity. We recommend that food-growing strategies be made a CPP duty, so that all CPP partners will have an obligation to contribute to meeting the objectives of the strategy through the Single Outcome Agreement. This should be developed in such a way as to support the forthcoming United Nations Sustainable Development Goals from 2016 onwards.

462. The Scottish Government should indicate how it will ensure CPPs are required to engage private and commercial sector land owners to assist in supporting food growing and allotments. As examples such as the Grove Project in Fountainbridge have shown, there are economic and commercial benefits for private landowners to engage and support food-growing strategies.

463. We have heard of the benefits access to allotments and other food-growing space can have for communities and individuals. CPPs should be required to support the delivery of access to food-growing activity as an objective. This could be achieved by providing access to publicly-owned land held by public sector agencies or by providing other resources such as funding the development of growing skills, or utilising existing programme or skills within the public sector (for example on decontamination of land etc.). We recommend guidance make this duty clear along with a requirement to report on how it is being achieved.

464. Local authorities should work to ensure their food-growing strategies are inclusive of the need to develop horticultural skills, especially amongst children.

---

308 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 12 November 2014, column 34
465. We recommend the community-based allotment and food growing sector be encouraged to become part of a viable empowering food economy while also ensuring the land available to them is not taken advantage of by the larger scale commercial food production industry. We look forward to an appropriate amendment loosening the restrictions in section 87 to make this clear.

466. The need to ensure allotments and food-growing strategies support the equality agenda is an important one. We welcome the proposed Stage 2 amendment to ensure the provisions relating to physical disabilities address a broader definition of disability and inequality.
PART 8 NON-DOMESTIC RATES

Background

467. Part 8 of the Bill introduces a new power to allow local authorities to create localised relief schemes relating to non-domestic rates (“NDR”). These are also known as “business rates” and are a property based tax charged on properties used as businesses (e.g. shops, offices, warehouses and factories) and the public sector. As at 1 April 2012 there were 217,598 properties subject to non-domestic rates.

468. The rates liability for each property is determined by taking the rateable value and multiplying by a rates poundage set annually by the Scottish Ministers, less any relief to which a ratepayer may be eligible. The rates poundage rises annually, usually in line with inflation.

469. The Scottish Government has a series of relief schemes that are aimed at helping businesses by reducing their rates bill. The main relief is the Small Business Bonus Scheme aimed at supporting small to medium enterprises and business start-ups. Other reliefs include empty property reliefs and reliefs for charitable properties and properties in rural areas. Agricultural land is generally exempt from NDR.

470. In 2011, 57% of business properties paid zero or reduced rates. Currently reliefs are set centrally by the Scottish Government, with local authorities having very limited scope to vary the terms locally.

471. NDR income is currently the single largest source of revenue under the control of the Scottish Government and in the last five years has been increasing annually, principally as rateable values have increased.

472. The administration of business rates and relief schemes is a matter for each local authority. The income is pooled at a Scotland wide level and distributed to each local authority as part of the local government funding settlement. Once set local authorities are guaranteed to receive the amount stipulated, with central government making up any shortfall and local authorities returning any excess collected.

473. This differs from other arrangements for example the Business Rates Incentivisation Scheme (BRIS) which, from 2013/14, allows an authority to keep 50% of any rates growth with the remainder being passed to the Scottish Government.

474. With reference to Part 8 of the Bill the Policy Memorandum states “there will be no restrictions on this power; local authorities will be able to grant the relief to any type of ratepayer or for any reason, as they see fit.” But, it goes on to state that any reliefs “will need to be fully funded by that authority, so it will need to balance the interests of taxpayers across its area.”

309 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 103
475. The Committee sought elaboration on the potential uses of the power in this Part. The Government replied—

"Relief could be granted to a sole property, a street, a town centre or a particular type of business or sector. They could be used, for example, to support or create employment, or to encourage regeneration of a particular area." \(^{310}\)

The reply add relief--

"will vary depending on local economies and communities. By reducing business rates taxation local authorities may, for example, reduce the overheads of community based groups, or owners/occupiers of properties that otherwise support vulnerable communities, or could incentivise such groups to occupy premises they could not otherwise afford." \(^{311}\)

476. These provisions were consulted upon as part of a wider consultation on reform of business rates by the Scottish Government in 2013, Supporting Business, Promoting Growth and received a high level of support (75% of those who expressed a view).

477. The summary of responses to the Government consultation concluded—

"The creation of a new power for local Councils to offer their own localised discounts on business rates was viewed by most consultees as a positive step, including by a majority of Councils themselves. Such a power could, for example, be used to attract new or support existing businesses."

478. Overall forty-one respondents to the Scottish Government consultation supported the proposal with 13 against. The Committee were interested to note that more councils (5) opposed the proposal than business representatives (3).

479. 13 respondents said councils should not have flexibility to introduce and fund relief schemes to reflect local circumstances and priorities. The main theme was the need for uniformity across Scotland. Some said non-domestic rates are a national tax and, as such, there should be limited differences across Scotland while another felt this flexibility might favour large councils. Another noted it may lead to businesses playing councils off against each other.

480. One response from business representative organisation/ trade body groups was illustrative—

"Consistency between Local Authorities is important and we would not wish to see a return to the 32 Scottish Councils having flexibility to set their own poundage rates or fund relief schemes. We believe such flexibilities could only be funded by other local existing business rates payers, increasing their bills and acting as a disincentive to investment. This would create a competitive distortion."

\(^{310}\) Q&A 135
\(^{311}\) Q&A 132
481. Consistency was also a theme in other responses as well as funding considerations with neither local authorities nor existing local businesses keen to fund discounts.

Committee submissions

482. Only a few respondents to the Committee’s call for evidence commented on Part 8. Argyll and Bute Council were of the view—

“there should not be any flexibility to introduce local relief schemes as NDR is a national tax which local government collects on behalf of the Scottish Government and as such there should be very limited difference in how this is levied across Scotland.”

483. They were particularly concerned they would be—“subject to many more calls for us to offer rates relief e.g. in response to roadwork disruptions. However it will usually be difficult to fit individual circumstances into an overall “scheme” - which is what is required under this new legislation.”

484. In evidence to us John Mundell, Chief Executive Inverclyde Council highlighted an advantage of the provisions in Part 8 of the Bill—

“They will allow a local authority to take notice of specific local conditions, possibly right down to an individual street or particular community in a local authority area, and to target that area to help incentivise and support businesses.”

485. Garry Clark from Scottish Chambers of Commerce suggested—

“The power to reduce business rates in a local authority area could be a cost to a local authority. That is only right, but the business rates incentivisation scheme ought to be geared to allow that local authority to benefit at least in part from the encouragement of enterprise in its area.”

486. North Lanarkshire Council suggested the current strength of the existing system is it provides a consistent, and reasonably non-discriminatory, tax on business regardless of the location of the business within Scotland. They were concerned the proposal may create a ‘race to the bottom’ where businesses will look to the local authority to better the scheme on offer elsewhere and the cost of the relief granted will be met by the council tax payer. This, they suggested, may favour larger/Council Tax rich local authorities in their ability to fund such schemes at the expense of other local authorities.

487. East Ayrshire Council noted—

---

313 See footnote 312
“should the Council wish to continue such schemes for example, to help regenerate town centres by encouraging empty properties back into use, then it would be potentially at the Council’s expense. It would be important therefore that [other] Scottish Government/national funding streams continued to be made available and accessible to support local authorities.”

Adding--

“the ability to introduce local relief schemes puts a degree of control in the hands of the Council. However, while we continue to operate a national pool, this will only impact on the margins. The key determinant of the cost of Non-Domestic Rates for businesses will remain the rateable value (determined by the assessor) and the rate poundage (determined by Scottish Ministers). The challenge will therefore be ensuring that any scheme is fair, affordable and delivers community benefits.”

488. We heard from Garry Clark from the Scottish Chambers of Commerce that “business rates are usually the number 2 or 3 cost for many businesses”\(^{314}\) and the proposed scheme could be a “useful tool in the box”. He added the power would—“allow a local authority to fine tune the non-domestic rating system in its area, perhaps to target an area or a type of business that it wants to encourage. It could target streets or communities in an area.”\(^{315}\)

489. East Lothian council’s submission to the Finance Committee noted the potential for interested parties to make representations to obtain relief and the concomitant effect that would have administratively. They then answer their concerns indicating—

“To facilitate an orderly administration of relief available under the scheme it would be essential to include any provisions within our Discretionary Rates Relief policy thereby ensuring that decisions are made in a consistent manner, robust enough to withstand appeal.”\(^{316}\)

490. East Lothian council also noted potential benefit based on experience in Leeds which sought to attract new businesses to their area and to encourage economic growth by awarding relief for a limited period. Observing short term costs could be beneficial in the longer term.\(^{317}\)

491. The Scottish Retail Consortium (SRC) supported the principle behind the proposed local discretionary relief, viewing it as a welcome acknowledgement of the need to keep down costs for retailers and other businesses.

\(^{317}\) See footnote 316
492. However the SRC strongly counselled against any amendment to allow councils to increase rates bills, for example in the form of a local discretionary supplement. Their research showing one in every eleven retail premises is empty, and anything that makes it more expensive or more difficult for retailers to invest would only exacerbate this problem.

493. Similarly the Royal Incorporation of Architects Scotland noted a potential benefit; if schemes resulted in an increase in the use of redundant/neglected properties there would be an overall net financial gain. They also suggested the provisions will help empower communities to create solutions to their needs and revitalise run-down town centres.

494. The FSB Scotland suggested local discretion over extending reliefs may be one way to support small, independent businesses. However, they remained “cautious about the likely impact of this new power, particularly if they have to be fully funded by the local authority.”

495. Both the Historic Houses Association Scotland (HHAS) and Scottish Land and Estates cautioned against “any relief scheme which arbitrarily gives a market advantage to one particular type of ownership or governance structure.” HHAS added—

“we could perceive difficulties arising for instance in the rural sphere where a community-owned shop was party to relief, which was not available to an adjacent privately family owned historic house shop paying full rates.”

496. The Scottish Property Federation’s submission to the Finance Committee raised the potential impact this could have on landlords. They were concerned local authorities might seek to recoup the reduced rates income by passing it on to local landlords. Given the restrictions inherent in the scheme we do not understand how this could occur. An alternative scenario was expressed in oral evidence by Jim McCafferty from the Institute of Revenues, Rating and Valuation who suggested there was anecdotal evidence that some landlords would seek to increase rentals for some types of properties benefiting from rates reductions.318

497. John Mundell, Inverclyde Council made the point that—

“any grant or support given by the community planning partnership, or indeed by the council, would have to be tied to some performance measure so that we get some transformational change through that process to help business to grow or to attract them to the area.”319

498. Finally we considered a petition from Ellie Harrison that raised issues about the growth of the large retail sector, such as the Tesco Metro and Sainsbury’s and suggesting their local shops are being created to the detriment of some of the smaller traders in high streets and town centres. We asked whether Part 8 of the Bill takes on board communities’ concerns about the number of Tesco Metros,

---

318 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 1 October 2014, column 34
319 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 1 October 2014, column 32
Sainsbury’s Locals or whatever else that are coming into an area and potentially decimating local high street traders.

499. John Mundell from Inverclyde Council in response indicated powers were more likely to be used to assist—

“not necessarily the Tesco Metros but, say, a local butcher to develop in a town centre or on the high streets of our small towns.” He added “I would rather use the powers in a selective and focused way to attract smaller businesses instead of the national networks such as Tesco that you mentioned.”

Committee Recommendations on Part 8

500. Having considered the responses we have received on this Part of the Bill we make the following observations:

501. We are content to have variability in the way this power is used across Scotland and indeed within and across local authority areas, we view the power as one providing increased flexibility to local authorities that can be used to support the creation of new businesses and to sustain existing businesses.

502. We have no concerns about the suggestions of a “race to the bottom”, viewing this power as but one tool for local use principally to incentivise and regenerate local areas. The power can only be utilised within the uniform business rates scheme.

503. We request the Scottish Government to consider ways in which they can promote the use of this power to prioritise regeneration activities within disadvantaged areas.

504. We would be concerned if landlords were to target rent increases on properties receiving relief under this power and encourage the Scottish Government to consider ways in which this could be prevented.

---

320 Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Official Report, 1 October 2014, column 36
ANNEXE A: RURAL AFFAIRS, CLIMATE CHANGE AND ENVIRONMENT COMMITTEE REPORT ON PART 4 OF THE COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

The Committee reports to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee as follows—

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

1. The Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee considered Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and reports to the lead committee as follows.

2. The Committee considers that a Bill is required to remedy the defects of the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act and achieve the aim of extending the community right-to-buy. The Committee recognises that land reform is an on-going and complex process and the Part 4 provisions of the Bill address some of the issues of the land reform agenda. The Committee considers that these provisions could have been incorporated within the forthcoming land reform legislation but recognises the desire of many stakeholders and of the Scottish Government to resolve the identified shortcomings in the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act speedily and, on that basis, the Committee is content that the Part 4 provisions have been included in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

3. The Committee is aware of the concerns of many stakeholders in relation to the drafting of the Bill and in relation to what is included and what is to be left to further regulation and guidance. The Committee shares some of those concerns and comments on this in further detail within the report.

4. The Committee is concerned about the level of detail provided in the Policy Memorandum and in the Financial Memorandum. The Committee believes that the significance and complexity of the provisions within Part 4 of the Bill would have merited further explanation and clarification within the Policy Memorandum. The Policy Memorandum could also have provided further consideration of sustainable development and human rights could have been brought into the wider context of the Bill which may have assisted, and might still assist, in establishing an environment which would facilitate a more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities.

5. Whilst the Committee understands that community right-to-buy will be demand-led, the costs for communities and landowners and the costs to public bodies of providing support to communities are unclear and the Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum ought to have given greater consideration to this. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government monitor the cost implications of the Part 4 provisions closely over the coming years, in terms of both the direct costs to communities and landowners and the indirect costs to public bodies and keep the funding requirements under review.
6. The Committee recognises the overwhelming support of stakeholders to extending the community right-to-buy to the whole of Scotland. The Committee considers that parity of opportunity should be available to all communities and welcomes the provisions in section 27 of the Bill extending the community right-to-buy Scotland wide.

7. The Committee heard the views of those who would prefer the Bill to define the characteristics of an eligible community body rather than specify the eligible legal structure. However at this time the Committee remains unconvinced of this approach. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to consider potential amendments at stage 2 to extend the list of eligible community bodies and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies.

8. The Committee heard evidence suggesting that the definition of community should include communities of interest as well as those of geographic place. The Committee is also aware of the dispersed nature of some rural communities, and of many communities of interest within those areas. The Committee had some sympathy with those who sought to include communities of interest in the Bill, however agrees with the Cabinet Secretary on the importance of communities maintaining a sense of place, and being rooted in place.

9. The Committee was interested to hear the views of stakeholders on the requirement on communities to register an interest in land. The Committee understands that many communities only start to take an interest in land acquisition when land comes on the market and many stakeholders support the removal of the registration requirement. On balance, the Committee considers that there are benefits in encouraging communities to pro-actively engage in community development and, where possible, to identify the assets they may need to deliver their objectives. The Committee is also concerned that there can be difficulties in supporting community bodies at short notice. On that basis the Committee is, in principle, supportive of the requirement to register an interest in land.

10. However, the Committee considers that the Scottish Government should take account of the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group with respect to the ‘right lite’ for registration, i.e. providing communities with a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the ‘heavier’ right of registering a right of pre-emption.

11. Notwithstanding that, the Committee considers that the registration process requires considerable simplification. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to a simplified registration process that would also include the option to register ‘a purpose’.

12. The Committee is aware that for many communities and applications late registration will continue to be the norm. The Committee considers that the process for late registration should reflect the practical reality for communities and should be redesigned to accommodate this. The Committee remains unconvinced, where there is a late application, of the need to impose a requirement on communities to show either good reason or demonstrate relevant work.

13. The Committee recommends that the re-registration process should also be simplified and there should be a presumption in favour of re-registration unless there has been a material change of circumstance. Whilst the Committee has some sympathy with those stakeholders who proposed an extension of the re-registration period from five to ten years, the Committee considers that circumstances can change over time and, if the re-registration process is substantially simplified, a requirement to re-register every five years is appropriate.

14. The Committee agrees with stakeholders that the power to extend the community right to buy where there is no willing seller should be a power of last resort, to be exercised only when other methods and negotiations had failed. However, the Committee has concerns that this new right, as the provisions are currently drafted, may be almost impossible to exercise, with too many obstacles and opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. Notwithstanding this, the Committee believes that the existence of this power is likely to play an important role in incentivising negotiation.

15. The Committee questions the need to restrict the definition of eligible land to that which is considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. The Committee is concerned that these provisions, as drafted, may fail to further sustainable development.

16. The Committee also questions why the Scottish Government considers that a definition is needed at all, as the parallel tests for crofting land purchases do not require this.

17. The Committee considers that there are convincing arguments that the tests of ‘furthering sustainable development’ and of being ‘in the public interest’ are capable of testing all requirements. On that basis, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider the requirement that eligible land be restricted to land which is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected and recommends that the Scottish Government consider a definition that relates to the wider circumstances which can be a barrier to sustainable development, such as the lack of achievement of the use and/or development of land that could deliver greater public benefit.

18. In the absence of an unambiguous and acceptable definition of abandoned or neglected land produced by the Scottish Government which both removes the barrier that the present proposal is likely to erect, and which avoids the problems of interpretation giving the existing legal concept

321 Alex Fergusson MSP and Jim Hume MSP dissent from paragraphs 14 to 17.
322 Sarah Boyack MSP and Claudia Beamish MSP dissent from paragraph 18 on the basis of the evidence to the Committee which suggested that the requirement on communities to demonstrate that land is neglected or abandoned is likely to present a barrier which would undermine the aims of the Bill.
of abandoned land, then the Committee is likely to ask the Scottish Government to remove the term ‘abandoned or neglected land’ and bring forward a proposal which will allow the widest possible opportunity for community purchase. The Committee reserves the right to take evidence on this issue at stage 2.

19. Should the Scottish Government wish to retain this provision, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to the following effect—

- the term “abandoned” is sub-optimal and should be removed entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to “wholly or mainly neglected land;

- the definition of neglected should relate to the sustainable development of the land and not solely to a description of its physical condition and there should be a clear justification for the inclusion of the term;

- if prescribed matters in relation to eligible land are to be set out in regulation these regulations should be laid under the affirmative procedure; and

- owners and communities are entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms. The Committee considers it is not appropriate to deal with the transfer of fundamental property rights through secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any definition of terms be set out on the face of the Bill.

20. The Committee considers that there may be a differentiation in urban and rural circumstances and there could be challenges in measuring neglect and abandonment in rural areas. Should this provision remain the Committee considers that it should apply uniformly outwith crofting land. However, further consideration to the criteria for determining neglect or abandonment is necessary and should be set out on the face of the Bill. The Committee considers that land which is classified as agricultural land should be exempt from this provision unless it is determined that it fails to meet ‘good agricultural and environmental condition’. The Committee is also concerned about the possibility that land that is under a low intensity/zero management regime for a valid reason (e.g. natural regeneration for biodiversity or natural flood protection) could be considered ‘wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected’. The Committee considers that land which is intended for recognised conservation or environmental purposes should be exempt from the provision.

21. The Committee shares the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in relation to the power of prescription, which would allow land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual’s home, to be considered as eligible land. The Committee is unconvinced of the case for including this power and urges the Scottish Government to reconsider the provision and remove the power of prescription.

22. The Committee recognises that there can be very real practical difficulties in identifying land owners and considers that there ought to be a mechanism in this Bill, similar to the existing provisions in the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act, providing for communities to be able to register an interest in land without knowing who the owner is.

23. The Committee agrees with those stakeholders who consider that the mapping requirements for community right-to-buy are excessive and strongly believes that there is a need to streamline the mapping process, simplify the information requirements and align the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended Act.

24. The Committee considers that the provision requiring proof that if ownership of land remains with its current owner it would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land is unnecessary, because, in its application the community would have to demonstrate that the community purchase furthered the achievement of sustainable development.

25. The Committee also considered best value, best public benefit, and the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies. The Committee asks the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on this issue and consider what further guidance and amendment is required to address the concerns.

26. The Committee recognises the difficulties faced by communities in seeking to exercise their right-to-buy and is keen to ensure that appropriate support and funding is available to all communities across Scotland to facilitate meeting their aspirations. The Committee considers that public sector bodies have an important role in that regard and welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to establish a community land unit to provide support and advice to communities.

27. The Committee understands that the Scottish Government intends to bring forward amendments at stage 2 to include provision for crofting community right-to-buy. The Committee considers that it would have been preferable had consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy been undertaken alongside consultation on the existing part 4 provisions, and that amendments to the crofting community right-to-buy had been included in the Bill as introduced, rather than at stage 2. The Committee considers that the introduction of significant new provisions by way of amendments at stage 2 is undesirable in terms of effective parliamentary scrutiny, as the time available at stage 2 to consider new evidence is limited.
INTRODUCTION

Parliamentary scrutiny

28. The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill\(^{323}\) was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014. The Bill was accompanied by Explanatory Notes\(^{324}\), which include a Financial Memorandum, and by a Policy Memorandum\(^{325}\), as required by the Parliament’s Standing Orders.\(^{326}\)

29. Under Rule 9.6 of Standing Orders, on 18 June 2014 the Parliamentary Bureau referred the Bill to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee as lead committee, to consider and report on the general principles.

30. On 21 August 2014, Joe FitzPatrick MSP, Minister for Parliamentary Business wrote to the Conveners of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment (RACCE) Committee and the Local Government and Regeneration (LGR) Committee. The letter stated that following discussions with the Conveners of those Committees—

“[the Government is now keen to improve the crofting community right-to-buy legislation in line with the amendments to Part 2 of the 2003 Act and intend to take this forward in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. [...] we discussed and agreed that while the Local Government and Regeneration Committee was still best placed to lead on the overall Bill, there would be merit in the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee taking the lead on consideration of the community right to buy provisions of Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1 and reporting its findings to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. We also thought there would be merit in having any relevant amendments on community right to buy referred to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee at stage 2. I am happy to confirm that this is the Scottish Government’s preferred way forward.”\(^{327}\)

31. At its meeting on 1 October 2014 the RACCE Committee agreed to consider Part 4 of the Bill and to report its findings to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee.

---

\(^{323}\) Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, as introduced (SP Bill 52, Session 4 (2014)). Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Community_Empowerment_(Scotland)_Bill/b52s4-introd.pdf_Bill/b52s4-introd.pdf).

\(^{325}\) Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Policy Memorandum (SP Bill 52-PM, Session 4 (2014)) Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Community_Empowerment_(Scotland)_Bill/b52s4-introd-pm.pdf_Bill/b52s4-introd-pm.pdf).

32. Part 4 of the Bill makes amendments to the community right-to-buy provided for under part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”). The Bill also inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act which provides a framework for community bodies representing communities across Scotland to purchase abandoned or neglected land without a willing seller, in order to further the achievement of sustainable development of land.

33. The LGR Committee considered and agreed its initial approach to the Bill on 25 June 2014. It launched a call for evidence on 26 June 2014 with a closing date for receipt of written evidence of 5 September 2014. 162 written submissions were received by that Committee and made available to the RACCE Committee. The LGR Committee took evidence from stakeholders and those with an interest in the Bill between September and November 2014. The LGR Committee agreed that as the RACCE Committee had undertaken to consider Part 4 of the Bill the LGR Committee would exclude consideration of evidence on the issues raised in Part 4.

34. The Scottish Parliament Information Centre (SPICe) published a briefing\(^{328}\) on the Bill which proved very helpful to the Committee during its scrutiny.

Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee’s approach and call for views

35. The RACCE Committee agreed its approach to consideration of the Bill at Stage 1 at its meeting on 8 October 2014. The Committee decided not to issue an additional call for evidence, but agreed to utilise the evidence received by the LGR Committee, and offered those giving oral evidence, and anyone else who wished to, the opportunity to submit additional evidence in advance of the oral evidence sessions. The Committee received four additional written submissions.

Witnesses

36. The Committee took oral evidence from the Scottish Government’s Bill Team on 19 November 2014, and then from stakeholders on 26 November 2014 and 3 December 2014. The Committee’s oral evidence-taking concluded with a session with the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and the Environment, Richard Lochhead MSP on 10 December 2014.

37. Extracts from the minutes of all the meetings at which the Bill was considered are available online\(^{329}\). Where written submissions were made in support of evidence given at meetings, these are linked, together with links to the Official Report of the relevant meetings are available online\(^{330}\). A link to all other written submissions, including supplementary written evidence, can be found online\(^{331}\).

---

\(^{329}\) Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. Extracts of Minutes. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/86067.aspx

\(^{330}\) See footnote 329

\(^{331}\) Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, written submissions. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/82153.aspx
38. The Committee extends its thanks to all those who gave evidence on the Part 4 of the Bill within a very tight timeframe. The cooperation of all involved was very much appreciated.

BACKGROUND TO AND PURPOSE OF THE BILL

Legislative background

“Part 2 of the 2003 Act provides bodies representing rural communities with rights to register an interest in land with which the community has a connection. These bodies have a right to purchase that land if the owner is willing to sell it. Part 2 of the 2003 [Land Reform] Act sets out the land in respect of which an interest can be registered, and the procedure for registering an interest. It also sets out the circumstances in which the right to buy the land in respect of which an interest arises and the procedures for exercising it (including procedures for valuation of the land, for appeals, and for compensation).

40. The Committee understands that post-legislative scrutiny of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, a summary of evidence and a recent review of options for further land reform have informed the development of the Bill.

Contents/purpose of the Bill

41. The Explanatory Notes that accompany the Bill state that—

“… the Bill reflects the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a framework which will – empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and support an increase in the pace and scale of public service reform by cementing the focus of achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning”.

42. The Committee understands that the Bill is a result of a number of consultations and other preparatory work and is set within the Scottish Government’s wider programme of public service reform.

43. The Bill is in a number of parts—

- Part 1 aims to provide a statutory basis for the issue of ‘National Outcomes’;
- Part 2 contains a number of reforms to the system of community planning;
- Part 3 provides for a process to allow community bodies to become involved in the delivery of public services;
- Part 4 makes a range of changes to the community right to buy land;
- Part 5 provides for a process to allow community bodies to take on assets from the public sector;
- Part 6 makes a number of reforms to the system of common good
- Part 7 is concerned with allotments; and
- Part 8 allows local authorities to set their own reliefs for business rates.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy

44. Part 4 of the Bill proposes a number of amendments and additions to the 2003 Act. At present the right-to-buy provisions in Part 2 of the 2003 Act apply only to community bodies representing rural areas.

45. Section 27 of the Bill amends the definition of ‘registrable land’ and the power of the Scottish Ministers to define ‘excluded land’, so that the community right-to-buy applies across Scotland.

46. Section 28 of the Bill extends the types of body which may be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act and gives Ministers a power to make regulations which prescribe other types of area by which a community may define itself.

47. Sections 29 to 47 make a number of changes to the detailed procedures and requirements of the community right-to-buy process.

48. Section 48 of the Bill inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act to give community bodies a right to acquire land in certain circumstances without a willing seller and sets out the processes and procedures involved. Eligible land is that, which in the opinion of Ministers, is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

49. The Financial Memorandum states that Ministers do not anticipate that modifications to Part 2 of the 2003 Act should impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government.

Scottish Government consultation

50. The Scottish Government issued a consultation on a proposed Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill on 7 June 2012. This was followed by a further consultation between 6 November 2013 and 24 January 2014. A draft Bill was not included in the consultation document.

51. The Committee explored the effectiveness of the consultation process on the Bill with stakeholders. Many stakeholders who had been actively involved in the issue of land reform; who had engaged with consultations issued by the Land Reform Review Group; who had participated in consultations on the Bill and; who were also used to dealing with legislation, stated that they were reasonably satisfied with the level of information that was provided. However, the Committee heard that some who were perhaps less used to dealing with legislation found it confusing and would have welcomed further information. Some stakeholders who had been engaged with the land reform agenda considered that there could have been further consultation on some elements of the Bill. In oral evidence to the Committee, Sarah-Jane Laing of Scottish Land and Estates stated—
“We would probably have liked more consultation on the definitions of abandoned land and neglected land, which I am sure we will talk about later”.

52. The Committee understands that the majority of stakeholders were content with the level of consultation on the issues contained in the Bill. However, the Committee considers that often the ‘devil is in the detail’ and, given the concerns of stakeholders in respect of many of the provisions in the Bill, the Committee is of the view that it would have been helpful to stakeholders and to this Committee, and may have resulted in fewer recommendations for amendment, if a Scottish Government consultation had taken place on a draft Bill.

GENERAL ISSUES CONSIDERED BY THE COMMITTEE

53. Before the Committee comments on the specific sections of Part 4 of the Bill, and examines other issues which were drawn to its attention, it addresses three central questions—

- Is Part 4 of the Bill required, and/or was there a better way of achieving the policy aims?
- Has Part 4 of the Bill been appropriately drafted?; and
- Will Part 4 of the Bill solve the problem?

Is a Bill required, and/or was there a better way of achieving the policy aims?

54. There was general agreement amongst stakeholders that revision to the 2003 Act was necessary and legislation was required to remedy the defects of the 2003 Act and to enact the necessary changes. In written submissions, and in the provision of oral evidence, stakeholders welcomed Part 4 of the Bill, extending the community right-to-buy to all of Scotland, and welcomed the proposed simplifications to Part 2 of the 2003 Act. However, the Committee heard that, as drafted, Part 4 of the Bill contained significant omissions, and many stakeholders considered that further clarification and additional measures were needed to strengthen this part of the Bill if it was to be effective.

55. The majority of stakeholders appeared to be content that the Community Empowerment Bill was the appropriate vehicle for the provisions as set out in Part 4 of the Bill. However, the Committee heard limited evidence that the provisions in Part 4 may sit better within the forthcoming land reform legislation. Sarah-Jane Laing of Scottish Land and Estates commented on land reform as a process and stated—

“It is not necessary for all land reform measures to be in one bill: land reform is affected by various pieces of legislation. However, we need to ensure that people have clarity about what is happening. Simon Fraser referred to how changes impact on other changes; I worry that there might be some confusion if we have parallel pieces of legislation dealing with the same issue”.

---

56. The Committee questioned Richard Lochhead, the Cabinet Secretary for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, on the decision to use the Community Empowerment Bill as a vehicle for the Part 4 provisions. The Committee heard from the Cabinet Secretary that land reform as a whole was undergoing huge change and, in oral evidence to the Committee, he stated—

“We have used the last 10 years’ experience of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 to ensure that the new Act will be easier to use and will give communities greater flexibility. As a whole the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill creates new rights for community bodies and new duties on public authorities, providing a legal framework that will promote and encourage community empowerment and participation…”

57. The Cabinet Secretary stated that the process of land reform incorporated a wide programme with various elements of activity, including this Bill, the agricultural holdings review and the forthcoming land reform bill. He told the Committee that as the Scottish Government wished to make changes to the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act quickly, the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill was considered to be an appropriate vehicle.

58. The Committee considers that a Bill is required to remedy the defects of the 2003 Act and achieve the aim of extending the community right-to-buy. The Committee recognises that land reform is an ongoing and complex process and the Part 4 provisions of the Bill address some of the issues of the land reform agenda. The Committee considers that the Part 4 provisions could have been incorporated within the forthcoming land reform legislation but recognises the desire of many stakeholders and of the Scottish Government to resolve the identified shortcomings in the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 quickly and, on that basis, the Committee is content that the Part 4 provisions have been included in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Has the Bill been appropriately drafted?

59. The Law Society of Scotland welcomed the policy intent of the Bill, but expressed concern in relation to its complexity. In terms of Part 4 of the Bill the Law Society of Scotland stated—

“There are multiple amendments to certain sections of the 2003 Act which are rather difficult to follow and this does not seem to sit well with the aim of empowering communities. The Society suggests that it would be simpler to repeal and re-enact part 2 of the 2003 Act…The Society also notes that a lot of the detail will be set out in subsequent regulation and also guidance and this makes it difficult at this stage to anticipate the overall effect of these provisions.”

---

60. The concerns of the Law Society of Scotland in relation to the drafting of the provisions contained in Part 4 of the Bill and its concerns with respect to the provisions that are to be left to subsequent regulation were echoed by a number of stakeholders. Many stakeholders commented on the omission of a definition of the terms wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected on the face of the Bill and many, including the Community Land Fund, Community Land Scotland, the Community Woodland Trust, the Development Trusts Association Scotland, the Community Land Advisory Service and Scottish Land and Estates also highlighted concerns with respect of a number of the detailed provisions.

61. The Committee is aware of the concerns of many stakeholders in relation to the drafting of the Bill and in relation to what is included and what is to be left to further regulation and guidance. The Committee shares some of those concerns and comments on this in further detail throughout the report.

Will the Bill solve the problem?

62. The Committee understands that almost 500,000 acres of land is now in community ownership. The Development Trusts Association Scotland’s survey of 2012 notes that “the vast majority of this area (95%) comprises 17 large rural estates under community ownership”. Almost 60,000 acres of land has been purchased by 16 communities under Part 2 of the 2003 Act and there are currently 171 Community Bodies with an interest in local assets across Scotland. The Scottish Government’s target for community ownership is 1 million acres by 2020.

The Policy Memorandum from the 2003 Bill states that—

“The objective of land reform is to remove the land-based barriers to the sustainable development of rural communities. To achieve this there needs to be: Increased diversity in the way land is owned and used: in other words, more variety in ownership and management arrangements (Private, public, partnership, community, not for profit) which will decrease the concentration of ownership and management in a limited number of hands, particularly at local level, as the best way of encouraging sustainable rural development; and Increased community involvement in the way land is owned and used, so that local people are not excluded from decisions which affect their lives and the lives of their communities.”

63. Oral evidence to the Committee suggested that the 2003 Act could be viewed as enabling legislation, the benefits of which were challenging to quantify. However, there was broad consensus that community confidence and cohesion in rural Scotland had been transformed in the last 10 years. Jon Hollingdale, of the Community Woodlands Association, stated—

335 Written submission. Law Society of Scotland.
336 Development Trusts Association Scotland baseline survey 2012
“The number of successful acquisitions under the 2003 Act is pretty low; I think that there have been about 16 in 10 years, which does not seem a hugely positive track record, although the Act has a wider symbolic value. The Act sets a framework, and it has been easier to negotiate settlements for other transfers to community ownership because the Act is there. In that respect, the Act has had a very positive effect. Nevertheless, it is probably fair to say that there has not been a step change in the rate of community ownership. .. It has definitely helped, but perhaps not to the extent that we had hoped it would.”\(^{337}\)

64. This view was echoed by a number of stakeholders in the oral evidence sessions including Malcolm Combe\(^{338}\), Rory Dutton of the Development Trusts Association Scotland and Sarah-Jane Laing.

65. However, the Community Woodlands Association noted that “the complexities and hurdles contained within the Act have severely limited its use on the ground” and Jon Hollingdale stated—

“… the Bill has not addressed some of the fundamental structural problems with part 2 of the 2003 Act and the ways in which it does or does not work…. Questions such as whether we need a two-step registration process that is very much at the seller’s whim are far bigger and more fundamental than what form of community body is sitting there, waiting for the land or whatever to become available.”\(^{339}\)

66. Despite the concerns detailed above and those considered in more detail later in this report, there seemed to be broad agreement across stakeholders regarding the policy intention of Part 4 of the Bill. Whilst many stakeholders considered the Bill could have gone further, a significant majority, including Community Land Scotland, the Development Trusts Association Scotland and the Community Woodland Association welcomed the Scottish Government’s commitment to revise Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and considered that a number of amendments should improve the usability of the legislation.

67. The Committee recognises the enabling effect of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 but is also aware that for many communities wishing to acquire land, some of the provisions of that Act may have created complexities and limited its use on the ground. The Committee is of the view that while the provisions of the Bill could have gone further, this Bill is part of a wider process of land reform and the Committee considers that, once amended as recommended by the Committee, the Bill should resolve many of the problems of the 2003 Act.

\(^{338}\) Appearing in an individual capacity.

SUPPORTING DOCUMENTATION

Policy Memorandum

68. In June 2014, the Convener of the LGR Committee wrote to the Minister for Local Government and Planning, seeking clarification on a number of issues relating to the Policy Memorandum stating that it was “little more than a superficial overview” that did not provide “sufficient material to allow for this Part to be scrutinised in a timely manner as part of the Stage 1 process”.340

69. The Scottish Government’s response was received on 1 August 2014. This provided some further detail, and the accompanying letter from the Minister states that the Government aimed to “provide a succinct and broad overview of the policy underlying the Bill as a whole and each Part individually”, adding that “people can be put off by lengthy documents with a great deal of detail”, and that the Policy Memorandum is “only one of the suite of documents that accompany the Bill”.341

70. The Policy Memorandum devotes less than three pages to Part 4 of the Bill, at one point summarising 20 sections in seven bullet points. The Committee explored with stakeholders whether they were content that they had been provided with the necessary information to fully explain the purpose, policy choices and provisions of the Bill.

71. In oral evidence to the Committee, Sarah-Jane Laing stated—

“I am not sure we have had enough information. I have come to the conclusion having discussed elements of the Bill, because we have different people saying provisions mean different things. That means that, somewhere along the line, the explanatory notes and the policy memorandum are not providing enough information.”342

72. This view was echoed by Jon Hollingdale who stated—

“What was missing—we will probably pick up this later—is how certain provisions are expected to deliver the outcomes in the Policy Memorandum. On a line-by-line basis, there are gaps. Although the Government wants to achieve X, it is saying Y. That does not appear to work for us”.343

73. John Mundell, Chief Executive of Inverclyde Council, stated—

340 Correspondence from the Local Government and Regeneration Committee to the Scottish Government (June 2014). Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/20140109-KS_to_Minister_LGP_on_Comm_Emp_Bill_Policy_Memo_20140625.pdf.

341 Correspondence from the Scottish Government (1 August 2014). Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/Kevin_Stewart_MSP_Letter_-_1st_August_2014.pdf.

“The brevity of the Policy Memorandum probably does not help, bearing in mind the complexity of the issues that are addressed in the Bill….I work in the community environment and try to make sure that we liaise and serve our communities in the right way. The Bill is very complex. I am not sure that we have managed to simplify the issues enough so that normal members of the public who are not, as we are, immersed in the issues can understand what the Government is trying to achieve”.

74. Wendy Reid of the Development Trusts Association Scotland was of the view that the Policy Memorandum set out “quite well the policy context in relation to community empowerment, what is meant by that and the purposes of the bill…” although she continued “…we were also disappointed that the word “renewal” was dropped from the Bill title, because we thought that that contextualised the Bill as being about renewal and regeneration, as well as community empowerment. Community empowerment must be for a purpose: that purpose is renewal and regeneration.”

This view was supported by Dr Coleen Rowan, of the West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations.

75. The Committee questioned the Cabinet Secretary on how best to strike a balance between encouraging public dialogue and participation and providing sufficiently detailed information. The Cabinet Secretary responded by outlining the importance of presenting the high level and broad policy objectives and striking the balance between these.

76. The Committee considers that Policy Memorandum should strike a balance between presenting the high level and broad policy objectives and providing sufficiently detailed information to clearly explain the provisions of the Bill and enable effective scrutiny. On balance the Committee believes that the significance and complexity of the provisions within Part 4 of the Bill would have merited further explanation and clarification within the Policy Memorandum.

Sustainable development
77. Argyll and Bute Council raised concerns in relation to sustainable development stating “There is limited consideration of the Bill on the various elements of Scotland’s sustainable development (e.g. land use/environment) and it would be useful if a more comprehensive assessment of the impact was provided”. The Scottish Environment Protection Agency suggested that the Policy Memorandum provides a “light touch” assessment of the sustainable development aspects of the Bill stating “…the Bill has the potential to make a positive contribution to sustainable development and there may be an opportunity for Government to provide regulations and/or guidance to help all parties maximise these opportunities”.

---

347 Written submission. Argyll and Bute Council.
The Committee considers that the Part 4 provisions of the Bill have the potential to contribute significantly to sustainable development but agrees with the Scottish Environment Protection Agency which suggested that the Policy Memorandum provides a ‘light touch’ assessment of the sustainable development aspects of the Bill. The Committee considers that the Policy Memorandum could have provided further consideration of sustainable development. The Committee would welcome information from the Scottish Government on its plans to produce further regulation and guidance on this matter.

Human rights and equalities

The Policy Memorandum states that the “Scottish Government is satisfied that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights”, and acknowledges the role of ECHR Article 1, Protocol 1 (A1P1) in certain sections of the Bill, including section 48 (abandoned and neglected land). However, evidence suggested that there is a lack of detail in the Policy Memorandum in relation to human rights, and this makes engagement in a broader discussion about the role that community right-to-buy has to play in human rights difficult.

80. The right to property is recognised in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR); that right being expressed in Article 1, Protocol 1 (A1P1). The Committee understands that A1P1 does not mean that private ownership is sacrosanct in all circumstances. A landowner can be divested of ownership when it is in the public interest for that to happen. In written evidence, Malcolm Combe stated—

“The yin that is the apparently retarding force of A1P1 is balanced against the yang of Article 11 of the UN Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which guarantees certain rights such as sanitation, food and housing. Scottish legislation must not be in breach of the ECHR, in terms of the Scotland Act 1998, but the Committee should be aware that human rights do not begin and end at Strasbourg (where the European Court of Human Rights sits.).”

81. The Committee heard a range of evidence in relation to the Bill’s proposals and ECHR, and there appears to be a general agreement that the provisions are ECHR compliant. However, some evidence has suggested that it goes much further than would be required in order to achieve a “fair balance” required by ECHR A1P1, particularly in relation to section 97H. In written evidence, Community Land Scotland stated—

“This appears to be a very high and most probably impossible hurdle to be overcome and unnecessary to meet ECHR requirements; it implies that, even if a community was able to show that the land was mainly neglected for the purpose of its sustainable development, and this was not in the public interest, if that owner could show that, none the less, their continuing ownership was not “inconsistent” with some level of sustainable development then the community’s application must be refused”.

---

348 Written submission. Malcolm Combe.

82. Professor Alan Miller, Chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission, said he did not think that human rights had been brought in to the wider context of the Bill to a great enough extent. He said it would have been better to concentrate on the wider human rights aspects of the legislation and he felt that the debate had become too narrow and could have been wider in focus. Professor Miller stated—

“If human rights is seen in the wider context that I have set out, there will be a realisation that it drives us not towards courts and lawyers but towards having an environment in which there is more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities”.

83. Professor Miller went on to state—

“If we are talking about community empowerment, we really have to understand what the community’s rights are, and we should not let the debate be polarised by the notion of an absolute right-to-buy, which does not exist. Communities cannot be given that. There has to be a public interest, so it is a qualified right and not an absolute right-to-buy”.

84. The Equalities and Human Rights Commission commented on the delay in publication of the Equality Impact Assessment for the Bill, stating—

“We note the reference to the centrality of equality and human rights to the Bill’s aims as set out in the Policy Memorandum (para 6) and look forward to the publication of the Equality Impact Assessment for the Bill. Given the centrality of equality principles, law and policy to the Bill’s proposals, it would have been helpful to see the Equality Impact Assessment earlier in Stage 1: at the time of writing (late August) it is still not available”.

85. When questioned on the issues of human rights in relation to the Bill and the Part 4 provisions, the Cabinet Secretary talked about the need to strike a balance between property rights and the public interest, he stated “…we must have at the forefront of our mind the rights of communities and the wider public interest as much as the rights of landowners or property owners”. He noted sympathy with Professor Miller’s comments and undertook to reflect on the points made by Professor Miller and others in relation to human rights issues.

86. The Committee was interested to hear the views of Professor Alan Miller, Chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission, and considers that human rights could have been brought into the wider context of the Bill. The

---

349 Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
352 Written submission. Equalities and Human Rights Commission.
Committee believes that a wider consideration may have assisted, and might still assist, in establishing an environment which would facilitate a more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities.

87. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on the points made in relation to human rights issues, both in respect of this Bill and in respect of the forthcoming land reform legislation. The Committee was, however, disappointed that the Equality Impact Assessment was not made available at the time of the publication of the Bill and is concerned that this delay may have had an impact on the effective scrutiny of the Bill.

Financial Memorandum

88. The Financial Memorandum states that Ministers do not anticipate that modifications to Part 2 of the 2003 Land Reform Act (sections 27 to 47), or the new Part 3A (section 48) “should impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government. (...) All additional costs would be met from existing resources.”

89. In terms of communities and landowners, the Financial Memorandum states that there is a “large degree of uncertainty on the level of costs” that might be incurred as it will be up to individual bodies how to use and respond to the provisions. Notwithstanding the costs of acquisition it would appear to the Committee that, with respect to the Part 4 provisions, the legal costs arising from appeals may be the largest areas of potential cost for communities and landowners. However the Financial Memorandum does not provide a range of costs, as would be expected. The Committee understands that there are various funding schemes that communities can apply to, but an increase in applications could put pressure on those funds. Evidence indicates that the Bill is likely to generate significantly more community right-to-buy applications, and that there are associated difficulties in estimating demand and cost, not least for local authorities.

90. Highlands and Islands Enterprise’s written evidence to the Finance Committee states that—“... there are difficulties in estimating demand in the first three years of operation of the new community right-to-buy, and that a reasonable estimate has been made to capture the costs, however the Bill is: [...] likely to generate significantly more community right-to-buy applications. We agree it is difficult to quantify the increased demand and consider an increase of between 5 and 10 per year to be on the conservative side. There are around 15 applications / year to register an interest at present. Extending these provisions to urban communities (with 80% of the population) is, in our view, likely to generate more applications than anticipated which will generate additional costs for Scottish Government”.

355 Written submission to the Finance Committee. Highlands and Islands Enterprise.
91. The importance of adequately resourcing and supporting communities, particularly urban communities, was highlighted by David Cruickshank of the Lambhill Stables Community Development Trust who, in oral evidence, stated—

“The simple fact is that, in urban communities, there is not only significant deprivation but significant lack of resource. There is no point floating the possibility of ownership without resourcing that with capital and on-going revenue. There is no magic wand that will allow deprived communities suddenly to have the confidence and experience to own and manage resources; there must be resources coming in that would make that feasible”. 356

92. The Committee understands that there are also likely to be cost implications for public bodies, particularly for local authorities. In its written submission, Glasgow City Council considered that the provisions in Part 4 would potentially allow the Council to work with community bodies to take over surplus assets and undertake community owned and backed projects or deliver services not currently provided in a community but, in relation to Part 3A, the Council considered that there were financial implications of putting a process in place and of utilising resource from a range of services in order to enable a response to be made within a very short timescale—

“…In addition the financial implications for Glasgow may be significant in the circumstance where the proposed acquisition may deal with a short term issue but is not aligned to the Council’s longer term strategy...(and)...in the circumstance where a registered interest has a negative impact on potential investment in the city.” 357

93. The Finance Committee, in its report on the Bill, invited the RACCE Committee to “seek clarification of how the Community Land Fund’s budget was arrived at and to consider what parallels can be drawn between it and funding for community right to buy in the context of the Bill”.

94. The Committee explored the costs and funding of the Part 4 provisions with the Cabinet Secretary, specifically: what costs the Scottish Government anticipate for urban and for rural communities and landowners; what costs public bodies may have to bear; and what additional support is likely to be required to meet the anticipated increase in applications, particularly in an urban context.

95. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed the demand-led nature of community acquisitions and the difficulties in estimating what that demand may be, with the resultant degree of uncertainty in the Financial Memorandum. He noted the increase in the Land Fund to £10m from 2016 and a further £10m for the Empowering Communities Fund that will be available from 2015. He confirmed that the Scottish Government’s commitment to meeting costs related to community right-to-buy (such as balloting costs) would have to be met from within the Government’s budget and stated “Primarily the budgets will be used for communities as opposed to public bodies. If there are costs for public bodies, we will have to take them into account. However, the primary focus of the funds is helping communities.” The Committee heard that funds for the Registers of Scotland to support the registration of all land in Scotland would be made available from Government. The Cabinet Secretary stated that “a number of public agencies and bodies will have to take the burden of this agenda as we move forward.” He also confirmed that the available funds would need to be kept under review in future years.

357 Written submission: Glasgow City Council.

96. The Committee understands that community right-to-buy will be demand-led. However, the Committee considers that the Scottish Government should have provided further clarification of how the Community Land Fund’s budget was arrived at and should have considered what parallels could be drawn between it and funding for community right-to-buy in the context of the Bill. The Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum ought to have given greater consideration to this.

97. The Committee is also concerned that the costs for communities and landowners (e.g. legal costs arising from appeals, costs to communities in preparing and developing proposals and bids) and the costs to public bodies of providing support to communities are unclear. The Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum should have better reflected this.

98. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government monitor the cost implications of the Part 4 provisions closely over the coming years, in terms of both the direct costs to communities and landowners and the indirect costs to public bodies and keep the funding requirements under review.

Rules relating to lottery funding

99. The Committee understands that the Finance Committee received evidence from Sport Scotland, relating to concerns about the duties of public bodies that award lottery funding, which stated—

“We would not wish to see liabilities handed to community groups who then need to seek financial or other support from national organisations such as ours which funding rules do not allow us to give. As a distributor of National Lottery resources…..we are required to ensure the additionality principle…”

100. The Committee sought clarity from the Cabinet Secretary on how the rules relating to lottery funding might impact on the community right-to-buy. The Cabinet Secretary responded saying “…our initial view is that there is not a conflict and it should not present a problem.”

359 Written submission to the Finance Committee. Sport Scotland.
101. The Committee welcomes confirmation from the Cabinet Secretary that the initial view that the rules relating to lottery funding would not have any impact on the right-to-buy. However, the Committee encourages the Scottish Government to clarify this initial view and advise the Committee of any change in that position.

SPECIFIC ISSUES CONSIDERED IN PART 4

Nature of land in which community interest may be registered (section 27)

102. At present, the right-to-buy provisions in Part 2 of the 2003 Land Reform Act (and secondary legislation) apply only to community bodies representing rural areas (i.e. with a population of less than 10,000). Section 27 of the Bill amends the definition of ‘registrable land’ and the power of Scottish Ministers to define ‘excluded land’, so that the community right-to-buy applies across Scotland, irrespective of the size of the settlement. This section also provides for a community interest to be registered in salmon fishing and mineral rights which are owned separately from the land to which those interests relate.

103. Extending the community right-to-buy to the whole of Scotland was welcomed by the majority of stakeholders who considered that parity of opportunity should be extended to all and saw no reason why urban communities and those in settlements of over 10,000 people should not enjoy the same rights as those in smaller rural communities. Nourish Scotland highlighted the importance that small urban sites can have for a high number of people and believe that these sites can have a considerable impact on the surrounding community even though many do not contribute significantly to the acreage target.\(^{361}\)

104. Duncan Burd, of the Law Society of Scotland, raised a concern in oral evidence and in the Society’s written submission that was echoed by some other stakeholders, in relation to the possibility of development blight in urban areas. The Society stated—

‘‘… a small community in an urban environment might be interested in a particular asset that is part of a larger asset that is capable of development. In such a case, the development could become blighted and there could be a scenario of competing interests. It is important […] to include a safeguard to balance out the greater development good to the Community’’.\(^{362}\)

105. Evidence from Community Land Scotland in relation to rural areas differed. Peter Peacock, Policy Director of Community Land Scotland, stated—

‘‘[…] the blight that we experience in the areas that have bought their land in rural Scotland is not being caused by the community purchase; rather the community bought the land to get round the blight that it felt was there, because the land was not being developed to its full potential by the current ownership structure. The Communities that Sandra Homes and John Watt help, through their roles, are interested in developing their assets, because they feel that that has not happened in the past. I am sure that the technical points that Mr Burd raised are worth considering, but it would be wrong to characterise the communities as causing blight, because that is not necessarily the case.”

---

\(^{361}\) Written submission. Nourish Scotland.

106. The Committee asked the Cabinet Secretary if he shared the concerns of the Law Society of Scotland in relation to potential development blight and questioned whether it was the intention of the Scottish Government to bring forward amendments to address those concerns at stage 2. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed that in applying the public interest and sustainable development tests the issue of blight would be taken into account and stated—

“The Law Society describes a scenario that would be taken into account as part of the process. Ministers would not want to create a blight because blight is negative. That would be taken into account in the context of sustainable development.”

107. The Committee recognises the overwhelming support of stakeholders to extending the community right-to-buy to the whole of Scotland. The Committee considers that parity of opportunity should be available to all communities and welcomes the provisions in section 27 of the Bill extending the community right-to-buy Scotland wide.

108. The Committee understands the concerns of the Law Society of Scotland and others in relation to potential blight in urban areas. However, the Committee is re-assured by the response of the Cabinet Secretary that consideration of this would be taken into account in the process of assessing an application and in applying the public interest and sustainable development tests.

109. The Law Society of Scotland also raised concerns in relation to the possible unintended consequences of extending the right-to-buy to urban areas where, in its view, land may be subject to redevelopment proposals and the potential uncertainty that applications could create, adversely impacting on investment decisions. In its written submission it suggests that clear rules are needed on how Ministers will deal with an application where there are active development proposals and suggests “…that land subject to an active planning permission will, for a period of time, not be subject to registration under Part 4 of the Bill”. It suggests that primary legislation should offer—

“… greater certainty in the circumstances in which the community right to buy would operate in relation to active development proposals. In particular, the Society suggests that consideration is given to allowing for a mechanism to obtain a certificate exempting a site from community right-to-buy for a certain amount of time. This would allow investment decisions to be made.

with a degree of certainty but would also retain the community right to buy in the event that the development did not proceed as envisaged”.

110. The Committee understands the concerns of stakeholders in respect of areas subject to an active planning consent. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give further consideration as to whether amendment at stage 2 is required to provide a mechanism to exempt such sites, for a period of time, to offer greater certainty to the investment and development market.

111. The Community Land Advisory Service questioned whether specific mention of salmon fishings and mineral rights may create an implication that the right-to-buy is not exercisable in relation to other separate tenements and, in its written submission, states—

“... the right-to-buy should also be available for rights to gather oysters and mussels, rights of port and ferry, and also sporting rights separate tenements created under section 65A of Abolition of Feudal Tenure (Scotland) Act 2000”.

112. It is not clear to the Committee whether specific mention of salmon fishings and mineral rights implies that the right-to-buy is not exercisable in relation to other tenements. The Committee would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government as to whether that is indeed the case.

Meaning of community (section 28)

113. Section 34 of the 2003 Act provides that the only type of legal entity that can apply to register a community interest in land is a company limited by guarantee. It also provides for the use of postcode units in order to define a community that a community body can represent. Section 28 of the Bill extends the types of body which may be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) and any other type of body which Ministers specify in regulations. This is subject to certain provisions e.g. that the SCIO must have not fewer than 20 members, that the majority must be members of the community, and that provision must be made for proper financial management. This section also gives Ministers a power to make regulations which prescribe other types of area by which a community may define itself. According to the Policy Memorandum, the Bill makes it easier for communities to define themselves in a greater variety of ways than by postcode.

114. Oral evidence broadly supported the amendments to extend the type of bodies that can be considered to be a community body and to provide greater flexibility in the definition of community. However stakeholders expressed corns in relation to the way in which community bodies were defined and some stakeholders suggested that the Bill should specify the characteristics of a community body rather than list the types of legal entity that can apply to register.

Written submission. Law Society of Scotland.

A tenement is defined as any type of property of a permanent nature, including land, houses and other buildings and attached rights.

Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
Opinion was divided on the focus on geographic communities and on the inclusion of communities of interest. Some stakeholders considered that their inclusion could be ‘a good deal more complex’, and others considered that a way had to be found to put the emphasis on people rather than place.

Defining community bodies

115. There was support amongst stakeholders for the inclusion of Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations in the definition of an appropriate community body. In their written submission, the Development Trusts Association Scotland highlighted the use amongst community bodies of Community Benefit Societies (Bencoms) and stated—

“In our experience many community organisations using a Bencom structure can meet the ‘prescribed requirements’ of an appropriate community body, and given the increasing use of community shares to fund the acquisition and development of assets, the omission of Bencoms from the legislation seems perplexing.”[^368]

116. In written evidence[^369], the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations call for the Bill to be amended to specifically list housing associations and co-operatives as community bodies. Similarly, the Church of Scotland Trustees proposed that the definition of community body be widened to include charities such as them.[^370]

117. In its written submission to the Committee, Brodies LLP highlighted six different type of community body provided by the Bill and questioned the necessity for this and what it considered to be the “lack of consistency for the requirements of different bodies.”[^371] It suggested that clear guidance on the constitution and powers of each should be provided.

118. Some stakeholders proposed an alternative approach to defining community bodies, focussing on the criteria and characteristics of bodies, rather than listing types of legal entity. The Forest Policy Group considered that the meaning of community as defined in the Bill was too narrow and should be defined by eligibility criteria, rather than specific organisational types. It continued, stating—

“Further, we feel it is inconsistent to include SCIOs as eligible community bodies but not other types of community organisation for example a community benefit society. In Section 28(2) of the Bill, Ministers will be able to make orders allowing other organisational types of community bodies to be eligible. Our concern with this level of non-specificity is that there is no certainty as to when this might happen or what the mechanism for making an allowance order is. Clarification on these points is welcomed.”[^372]

119. The Plunket Foundation also suggested it would be better for legislation to simply define the characteristics of a democratically accountable community body

[^368]: Written submission. The Development Trusts Association Scotland.
[^369]: Written submission. The Scottish Federation of Housing Associations [^370]: Written submission. Church of Scotland Trustees.
[^371]: Written submission. Brodies LLP.
[^372]: Written submission. Forest Policy Group. and not restrict the choice of legal structure to the two options currently proposed. It raised particular concerns about the exclusion of Registered Societies (Formerly known as Industrial and Provident Societies) and the inability within the 2003 Act to use community shares to fund the acquisition of the assets, stating—

“We cannot predict now what legal structures communities will need in the future to take advantage of the opportunities presented by the Bill, so cannot see any reason to restrict them unnecessarily? If Ministers are uncomfortable with the proposal that the exact type of legal structure for an eligible community body is left open, eligibility in principle should at the very least be extended to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies as well as SCIOs”.373

120. The Committee explored the definition of eligible community bodies with the Cabinet Secretary. He confirmed that the Bill would relax the definition of community to include companies limited by guarantee and SCIOs. The Cabinet Secretary also confirmed that the Scottish Government was considering potential stage 2 amendments to extend the list of community bodies.

121. The Committee heard the views of those who would prefer the Bill to define the characteristics of an eligible community body rather than specify the eligible legal structure. However at this time the Committee remains unconvinced of this approach. The Committee understands that new forms of legal entities that could be eligible may emerge over time but the Committee is comfortable that provision exists to define those entities in secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any such legislation be brought forward under the affirmative procedure.

122. The Committee welcomes the inclusion of Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations in the Bill. The Committee listened carefully to the evidence on the impact of restricting the choice of legal entity to two options and, on reflection, considers that the Bill should extend the eligibility of legal entities to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to consider potential amendments at stage 2 to extend the list of eligible community bodies and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies.

123. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government also give consideration to the proposals of the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations and the Church of Scotland that the Bill should mention housing associations and co-operatives, and charities such as the Church of Scotland, as community bodies.

Membership requirement for Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIO’s)

124. John Mundell, Chief Executive of Inverclyde Council, commented on the membership requirement for SCIO’s. He stated that—

373 Written submission. Plunkett Foundation.
“The Bill says that a SCIO must not have “fewer than 20 members”. That is particularly restrictive. We have a couple of SCIOs that are working very well, one of which has eight members and the other has 10. Are we now saying that, even though we know what the SCIO wants to achieve and we are doing everything that we can to support it, because someone in an ivory tower has said that the SCIO must have 20 members, it cannot continue? It does not have 20 members, but it is an active and progressive community and wants to make things happen, but it cannot, because it is barred. That issue needs to be addressed. Does the bill have to be prescriptive about having a minimum of 20 members on a SCIO?”

125. The Committee is concerned that the requirement for Scottish Incorporated Charitable Organisations (SCIO’s) to have a minimum of 20 members will, in practice, mean that a number of existing SCIOs would be excluded from the definition of an eligible community body and would therefore be unable to apply to register a community interest in land. The Committee considers that the requirement for SCIOs to have a minimum of 20 members is overly prescriptive and strongly recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward relevant amendments at stage 2.

Communities of place and communities of interest
126. The current provisions in the Bill are based on a geographic community but some stakeholders considered that the Bill might be more enabling and accommodating of future needs if it also included the option for communities of interest to be included.

127. The Committee explored the possibility of including communities of interest within the Bill with stakeholders in the oral evidence sessions and with Cabinet Secretary.

128. In oral evidence to the Committee, Sandra Holmes, of Highlands and Islands Enterprise, stated—

“Communities of interest have a legitimate role but, under the existing structure, the definition of “community” is centred on a geographic community. Currently, the geographic community has to be described using postcodes—although that might change—and the membership of the community has to be established to demonstrate that a majority of them are in favour. It is difficult to get a constituency of voters for a community of interest—how do we determine where the community of interest is and who would get a vote in a ballot?”

129. In its written submission, Helensburgh Community Woodland Group raised concerns about the definition of community where, in its view, individual projects in urban areas may only concern part of an area and a minority of those who live within it and questioned whether it would be appropriate to use a single council election ward for a specific area as the interested community rather than the settlement as a whole. It stated that its preferred option would be that of defining the community by people who would be directly affected or would directly benefit from the facility.

130. The Committee discussed extending the definition of community to include communities of interest with the Cabinet Secretary. In response, the Cabinet Secretary stated—

“In theory a community of interest could be an organisation that is based far away from the community. It might have some local members and it might have an interest in the community but that is not really a community. It does not have a sense of place and it is not rooted in a place”. He continued to say"...it is important that the community that defines itself as a “community” is actually the community. The idea that we should allow a community of interest to be included in the definition of “community” gives us some concerns. Therefore we are not proposing to include it in the definition because it is quite clear that a body could be set up that has an interest in the community but is not the community itself. We want to maintain the sense of place and ensure that we are genuinely dealing with the community.”

131. The Committee welcomes the provision in the Bill that enables communities to define themselves in a greater variety of ways than by postcode.

132. The Committee heard evidence suggesting that the definition of community should include communities of interest as well as those of geographic place. The Committee is also aware of the dispersed nature of some rural communities, and of many communities of interest within those areas. The Committee had some sympathy with those who sought to include communities of interest in the Bill, however agrees with the Cabinet Secretary on the importance of communities maintaining a sense of place, and being rooted in place.

Provision of Minutes upon request (section 28(3)(c) and (4)(1A)(g))

133. Some stakeholders who have been active in community land acquisitions highlighted a number of practical concerns in relation to the provision of minutes upon request. The Highland Council\(^{377}\) and Community Land Scotland\(^{378}\) sought clarity on a number of points: whether the minutes relate to all meetings – Board meetings, members meetings, sub committees; and whether these provisions relate only to ‘approved minutes’. Community Land Scotland had concerns that this provision would apply retrospectively to existing community bodies (not to a Part 3A or Part 3 body) which would have to convene special meetings to make alterations to their Articles and failure to do so could then result in a termination of interest or trigger consideration of compulsory purchase by Ministers. Community Land Scotland suggested that the same policy could be affected by a requirement for community bodies to enact bylaws or rules.

---

\(^{377}\) Written submission. Highland Council.

\(^{378}\) Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
134. The Committee listened to the concerns of stakeholders in relation to the provisions of minutes upon request and recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to this provision and the need for further clarification and reflect on the impact of this provision on existing community bodies. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government consider whether there are other means to affect the policy objective such as a requirement for community bodies to enact relevant bylaws or rules, and bring forward relevant amendments at stage 2.

Detailed procedures - Sections 29 - 47

135. The Scottish Government’s letter of 1 August\textsuperscript{379} states that sections 29 to 47 of the Bill make a number of changes to “the detailed procedures and requirements of the community right-to-buy process, including streamlining and increasing flexibility.”

136. Evidence to the Committee indicated some areas of concern in relation to the detailed procedures. In written evidence, John Randall\textsuperscript{380} noted a need to simplify procedures so that “genuine and strong applications cannot be thwarted by legal action on technical issues contrary to the wishes of Parliament when they passed the legislation”.\textsuperscript{381}

137. The issues raised in evidence are highlighted in the following sections. The Committee only comments on those sections on which it has a view.

Period for indicating approval under section 28 of the 2003 Act (section 30)

138. Section 30 amends section 38 of the 2003 Act, which sets out the criteria which must be met before an application to register a community interest in land is approved by Ministers and inserts a subsection that precludes Ministers considering any community support that is dated earlier than six months before the date on which an application to register a community interest in land is received.

139. Community Land Scotland\textsuperscript{382} and the Community Woodlands Association\textsuperscript{383} raised practical concerns in relation to the proposal for a six-month limit precluding Ministers considering any community support that is dated earlier than six months before the date an application to register a community interest in land is received. They both stated that registration of a community body can take in excess of 6 months itself in certain circumstances and feasibility and other studies may date back before that period. These bodies believe that Ministers should be free to take account of anything they consider relevant in indicating approval.

140. The Committee recognises the practical issues for communities in considering an interest in land and agrees that Ministers should not be artificially restricted by a six-month time limit in considering any relevant \textsuperscript{379} Correspondence from the Scottish Government (1 August 2014). Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_LocalGovernmentandRegenerationCommittee/General%20Documents/Responses_to_LGR_Committee_Questions_-_1st_August_2014.pdf.

\textsuperscript{380} Writing in an individual capacity.
\textsuperscript{381} Written submission. John Randall.
\textsuperscript{382} Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
\textsuperscript{383} Written submission. Community Woodlands Association. material. The Committee would welcome further consideration of this section by Ministers.

Procedure for late applications (section 31)

141. Section 31 amends section 39 of the 2003 Act relating to the procedure for late applications. The Policy Memorandum states that it replaces “the “good reasons” test for “late” applications with one which sets out clear requirements to be met by community bodies when submitting a “late” application”.

142. An application is deemed to be “late” when it is received by Ministers after the owner of the land has taken action to transfer the land, but before missives are concluded or an option to acquire is granted. Key amendments include—

- allowing Ministers to request further information from the current owner (or a creditor in a standard security), to be provided within seven days of receipt of the request, to ensure that Ministers have the necessary evidence to determine whether an application is “late”;

- where further information is requested, extending the time that Ministers have to make a decision on whether an application is “late” from 30 days to 44 days;

- removing the requirement to show “good reasons” for not submitting an application before land came on the market and replacing it with a requirement that such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out by a person, or such relevant steps as Ministers consider reasonable were taken by a person. Section 31(9) inserts a new subsection (6) into section 39 of the 2003 Act to define relevant work and relevant steps;

- setting out the timescales in which the relevant work or steps must have been taken. Allowing Ministers to request further information from any relevant party within the relevant timescale;

- providing that where missives have been concluded or an option conferred in respect of the land Ministers must decline to consider the application; and

- land in respect of which the relevant work or steps have been carried out does not need to be the same land as that to which the application relates.

143. Many stakeholders commented on the registration process and the need for a process at all and/or the need for simplification of this. The Committee also received considerable comment on the process for late registration. Evidence noted that whilst many communities only start to take an interest in land acquisition when land comes on to the market, there was also a need to encourage a degree of proactivity because of the difficulties in supporting community bodies at short notice. Difficulties have also been noted with the need to re-register every five years. The Committee considers the need to register; the registration process, including pre-registration; late registration and re-registration in paragraphs 144 to 171.
The requirement to register

144. The requirement to register an interest in land was considered by many stakeholders in written and oral evidence. The comments of Wendy Reid, from the Development Trusts Association Scotland, on the need for simplification of the registration process, reflected the views of a number of stakeholders. She stated—

“I am in two minds about the registration process. The need to register is a prompt for communities to think about how they would like their communities to develop and what opportunities they would like to have to influence how things develop. However, the process is onerous, as is the reregistration process. There is something to be said for having an easier process for registering interest if a piece of land comes up for sale that the community had never anticipated would come up for sale, because things happen that no one could have predicted. As the Bill stands, it will be extraordinarily difficult for communities to do anything about such situations, which might involve the loss of a service or whatever. I am not sure about getting rid of registration altogether, although I can see that that would have advantages. What is useful about having to register is that it gets community organisations to think about why they might want assets and what they might want to do with them. We might not want to lose that prompt if we were to go down the route of not having early registration of interest”. 384

145. Jon Hollingdale, of the Community Woodlands Trust, stated—

“As I understand it, the idea behind pre-registration is to encourage communities to be proactive, and I think that we will agree that being proactive and thinking ahead are generally better than simply being reactive to opportunities. However, having been encouraged to be proactive and make these registrations, communities are then not rewarded for doing that… If I were designing things from scratch, I would have a system in which communities…would carry out community development planning and identify the sort of land and buildings assets that they need to deliver the things that their community wants…. A specification would be laid down and when land came on to the market, communities would have the possibility of pre-emption if that land fitted their previously announced specification”. 385

146. The option of registering land for a purpose which would take account of the preparatory work undertaken by communities was supported by Community Land Scotland.

147. In oral evidence to the Committee, John Watt reminded the Committee that the Land Reform Review Group, of which he was a member, produced a menu of rights for communities. He stated—

“…The first right that we suggested was a “right lite” whereby a community could simply register an interest. Under the 2003 act, there is a right of pre-emption. However, if there was a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the “heavier” right of registering a right of pre-emption. We thought that that might be a way of getting round everything becoming a late registration”.

148. This proposal was supported by the Community Woodland Association, which also suggested that there could be a requirement for a landowner to give notice to an established community body prior to any sale, which would mean that the community received notice before land went on the market.

149. The Committee explored the issues in the registration process with the Cabinet Secretary and asked why there was a need for registration at all. The Cabinet Secretary stated—

“The Government has to balance people’s right to sell their assets with the rights of the community” and he suggested that a community which is preparing and thinking about the future and is already defined would need to be in place. He also stressed his concerns that otherwise there would be a disadvantage to an owner who would have to wait for some time for the community to be formed and the process concluded and this would interfere with the rights of the owner wishing to sell.”

150. The Committee was interested to hear the views of stakeholders on the requirement on communities to register an interest in land. While the Committee understands that many communities only start to take an interest in land acquisition when land comes on the market and many stakeholders support the removal of the registration requirement, on balance the Committee considers there are benefits in encouraging communities to pro-actively engage in community development and, where possible, to identify the assets they may need to deliver their objectives. The Committee is also concerned that there can be difficulties in supporting community bodies at short notice. On that basis the Committee is, in principle, supportive of the requirement to register an interest in land.

151. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government should take into account the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group with respect to the ‘right lite’ for registration, i.e. providing communities with a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the ‘heavier’ right of registering a right of pre-emption.

152. Notwithstanding that, the Committee considers that the registration process requires considerable simplification. The Committee was also interested to hear the proposals from stakeholders to allow communities to register a purpose. The Committee considers that there may be scope for a dual registration process to enable registration for specified areas of land or buildings and to enable registration for a purpose which could potentially be met by a range of assets. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to a simplified registration process that would also include the option to register ‘a purpose’ and bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

---

Registration for late applications

153. Many stakeholders raised concerns with respect to the proposals for consideration of late applications to register an interest in land. This was considered to be an issue of great significance to the future prospects of community ownership. Many considered that the process of late applications should be considered as the norm, stressing that communities are often reactive. However, some stakeholders considered that the legitimacy of the process is undermined when late applications become the norm.

154. In written evidence to the Committee, Community Land Scotland stated—

“For a variety of legitimate reasons, communities do not think of or register an interest in land as an abstract exercise. For all communities to protect the potential interests of the community though timeous registrations of interest in land may require registrations of interest in a significant number of areas of land, with little or no prospect that they may ever come on the market. There are considerable administrative implications for a community and for government from any process of ‘mass registration’ of interests in land by communities, yet the current LRA rather founds on that broad assumption. Experience shows communities are also very reluctant to register in land if they feel that might be interpreted as a hostile act by an owner”.

155. This view was supported by the Scottish Community Alliance which stated—

“In an ideal world a community body would survey all local land and assets, agree amongst themselves which assets are of strategic long term importance to the community and then set about making a multiple set of applications, thereby registering interest in all these key assets. But the real world is not the ideal world. Communities are reactive not proactive by nature, and are galvanised into action usually only when something is threatened. But even if they had the inclination to think forward to the day that any of these strategic assets were to be put on the market it is unlikely they would wish to asset their rights due to the potential for ill feeling that this might arouse from the potential seller who will perceive this as a constraint on their freedom to access the best market price possible. The additional hurdles associated with a late registration also appear to be too burdensome. We would therefore support the position of Community Land Scotland in respect of this aspect of the Bill”.

156. Community Land Scotland suggested that the new provision which replaces the need for a community to show “good reasons” why it did not apply timeously with a provision to show they had undertaken sufficiently well in advance “such

---

388 Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
389 Written submission. Scottish Community Alliance.
relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out”...may well make the opportunity for a late registration more difficult than it already is. It suggests that “this would not assist any objective of greater community ownership that was in the public interest.”

157. Highland Council stated that applications for late registration were becoming the norm, adding that—

“Given the likelihood that the number of late registrations will increase, it is considered that existing hurdles regarding the requirement to demonstrate additional community support and that the registration would be strongly in the public interest are of themselves sufficient without the new requirements suggested in the Bill.”

158. Community Land Scotland suggested that it would be best to accept late registration as the likely norm and that it, of itself, need not be justified by any prior action or lack of action, and instead could rest on the other existing tests for late registration. It also suggested that it might be possible to make provisions that where Ministers were notified by a land owner that they had an interest in selling their land, Ministers would take steps to seek to establish if a community had an interest in buying the land.

159. This evidence was supported by Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE), which suggested it would be helpful if communities could progress a late registration if they had considered purchase of an asset (specific or general) as detailed in a local development plan and stressed the importance of communities taking a strategic and holistic approach to their development through the establishment of whole community plans. HIE believes that community plans should be considered as appropriate evidence under the proposed ‘taking relevant work’ provision. It also suggested that guidance to clarify eligible work/steps would be beneficial. Based on their experience of working with communities, where often initial work was undertaken by a community council or working group with the intention that another body would pursue the community right to buy application, it suggests that consideration be given to de-coupling the requirements for relevant steps/relevant work and the practical application being made by the same community body.

160. Contrary to these views, the Historic Houses Association for Scotland and Scottish Land and Estates considered that the legitimacy of the process is undermined where late applications become almost standard. These organisations suggested that the late application procedure could be improved if a landowner could obtain exemption from a late application by giving forward notification (of six months) of a potential sale of land by advertisement in a local newspaper, giving the community body four months to organise itself and register an interest in the land, after which time Ministers would not consider a late application. They also 390 Written submission. Community Land Scotland.

391 Written submission. Highland Council.
392 Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
393 Written submission. Highlands and Islands Enterprise.
394 Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland.
395 Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.
suggested that they would welcome the introduction of a monitoring system into delays in the process for (Ministerial) consideration of applications.

161. Brodies LLP was of the view that community bodies should be obliged to explain why an application was not submitted prior to the land being put on the market and raised concerns that removing the good reasons test could make some landowners wary of putting land on the market for fear of “triggering” community interest.³⁹⁶

162. The Committee is keen to ensure that the provisions in Part 4 of the Bill simplify the provisions of the 2003 Act and effectively support communities in their aspirations to acquire land and deliver wider public and sustainable development benefits, whilst balancing this with the need to protect the rights of land owners. The Committee is aware that whilst encouragement and support should be given to communities in registering an early interest in land it is likely that for many communities and applications late registration will continue to be the norm. The Committee considers that the process for late registration should reflect the practical reality for communities and should be redesigned to accommodate this.

163. The Committee has concerns about the ‘good reasons’ test but is also concerned that removal of the ‘good reasons’ test and replacement of this with the need to show ‘relevant work’ may make the process more restrictive and more onerous. The Committee remains unconvinced, where there is a late application, of the need to impose a requirement on communities to show either good reason or demonstrate relevant work and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this requirement.

164. If the Scottish Government decides not to amend the Bill to remove the requirement on communities to demonstrate relevant work/steps, the Committee urges the Scottish Government to de-couple the requirement for the work and application to be made by the same community body.

Re-registration
165. Many stakeholders expressed concerns with regard to the process and timescale for re-registering an interest in land. Community Land Scotland, the Community Woodland Association, the Development Trusts Association Scotland, Highland Council, and many others, suggested that the five-year timescale is too short and consideration should be given to extending this to ten years. The Committee understands that this view is supported by the Land Reform Review Group in its final report (section 17.1-9 &10).³⁹⁷

166. Many stakeholders considered that it was important to retain the ability to test the will of the community on their continuing interest in purchase, while reducing the burden on communities and were concerned that the proposed re-registration provisions would require replicating the original registration demands.

³⁹⁶ Written submission. Brodies LLP.
Stakeholders suggested that there was considerable scope to simplify the process. Sarah-Jane Laing said—

“...I think that all that is necessary is for it to be asked at the point of reregistration is whether there have been material changes. If the answer is yes, those involved would go down one route, and if it is no, they would go down another. I do not think that it would be a problem to have a dual process for reregistration...a material change such as a huge swell of opinion in the community, which could have different views and different needs, must be taken into consideration, but it would be possible to have a dual registration process.”

167. Highland Council suggested that the requirement to re-register should be extended to ten years, in line with the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group. The Scottish Community Alliance stated that—

“Given the procedural burden placed on communities to re-register their interest after five years have lapsed, and given the assumption that late applications are viewed generally as the exception rather than the rule (and therefore the assumption that multiple applications should be being made by community bodies) we would support the proposition that the re-registration should be required after ten years rather than five.”

168. The Committee explored the re-registration process with the Cabinet Secretary, who stated—

“...Things can change in ten years. You can imagine a community defining itself, imagining its future, putting together its ideas and carrying out its registration but then finding that, ten years later, things were quite different. We do not think that ten years would be a wise approach. The five year period was our judgement of a good timescale.”

169. The Committee heard a range of views on the appropriate timescale for the re-registration of an interest in land. The Committee considers the most significant requirement is the need to simplify the registration process to one of a presumption in favour of re-registration unless there has been a material change of circumstance. The Committee believes that this should substantially reduce the burden on community bodies, particularly if those community bodies have multiple registrations. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

170. Whilst the Committee has some sympathy with those stakeholders who proposed an extension of the re-registration period from five to ten years, the Committee considers that circumstances can change over time and, if the re-registration process is substantially simplified, a requirement to re-register every five years is appropriate.

399 Written submission. Highland Council.
400 Written submission. Scottish Community Alliance.

171. The Committee raised the issue of the inability of applications to be amended once submitted with the Cabinet Secretary and recommends that amendments be brought forward by the Scottish Government at stage 2 to enable applications to be amended once submitted.

Concluded missives, option agreements and registering interests (sections 32 – 35)

172. Sections 32 – 35 relate to evidence and notification of concluded missives or option agreements and notifying Ministers of certain changes to information relating to registered interests.

173. The 2003 Land Reform Act (section 51(2)(a)) provides that at least half of the members of the community must have voted or, if half of the members have not voted, the proportion which voted is sufficient in the circumstances to justify the community body buying the land.

174. Scottish Land and Estates,402 the Historic Houses Association for Scotland403 and the Community Land Advisory Service404 comment on section 33, which introduces a requirement for an owner to inform Ministers within 28 days of an exempt transfer being made of this taking place. They considered this to be at odds with the transfer being “exempt” and suggest that as the Registers of Scotland maintain both the Land and Sasine Property Registers and the Register of Community Interests in Land, it would be sufficient to include a declaration in the disposition detailing the exemption rather than placing what they consider to be an unnecessary additional burden on the owner to notify.

175. The Committee questions the rationale for the requirement for an owner to inform Ministers of an exempt transfer being made and considers that it should be sufficient to include a declaration in the disposition. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider whether amendment to this provision is required at stage 2.

176. The issue of prior options relates to the scenario where, at the date Ministers receive an application for registration of a community interest, the landowner has already entered into a binding option agreement with a third party, under which that party may elect, at some future point, to buy the land.

177. The Community Land Advisory Service highlighted contradictions in the 2003 Act which it considered appear to be resolved by the Bill which, in its view, puts beyond any question that a prior option “trumps” a community interest application. In its written submission it states—

402 Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.
403 Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland.
404 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
“.. this is the wrong policy choice; ... it should be possible for Ministers to consider whether, in the given circumstances, a community interest may be registered over land subject to a prior option.”

178. Other stakeholders raised concerns with respect to the possibility of landowners granting option agreement in order to thwart a potential community purchase. Helensburgh Community Woodland Group stated—

“We are concerned that there are still too many opportunities within the Bill in its current form that enables landowners/property owners to avoid the community’s ability to register/lease or buy. For example, there exists and option for owners to grant a ten year option to purchase to their siblings, children or other family members. If this type of loophole is not removed it will only frustrate the community right to buy process and ultimately lead to the Bill having to be amended.”

179. Other stakeholders took a different view on the issue of options. The Scottish Property Federation welcomed the inclusion of consideration of option agreements within the Bill but stated “we believe that other pre-agreed rights over the land that may be extant between the landowner and a third party should also be considered by Ministers.”

180. The Committee would be concerned if landowners were found to be seeking to thwart legitimate applications from communities. The Committee considers that the existence of an option to purchase should not automatically exclude a community application and recommends that the Scottish Government consider this provision and bring forward amendments at stage 2 to ensure that land and buildings under option are not excluded from eligible land for registration or purchase.

Approval of members of community to buy land (section 36)

181. Section 36 removes the reference to at least half of the members of the community voting and provides that the requirement is met if the proportion of the members of the community who voted is sufficient to justify the community body proceeding to buy the land.

182. The Committee welcomes the provisions within section 36 which provide greater flexibility by removing the requirement that half the members of the community must vote on an application. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to clarify what considerations and criteria will be taken into account in assessing whether a sufficient proportion of the community has voted. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government issue guidance on this matter.

---

405 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
406 Written submission. Helensburgh Community Woodland Group.
407 Written submission. Scottish Property Federation.
Appointment of person to conduct ballot on proposal to buy land (section 37)

183. Section 37 inserts a new section 51A into the 2003 Act. It provides for an independent ballotter to undertake the community ballot. The Policy Memorandum states that—

“Scottish Ministers [will] arrange for this to be conducted by an independent third party, and […] meet the cost of this, making the community right-to-buy process easier for community bodies.”

184. Requirements on Ministers include providing the ballotter with a copy of the application and other information as prescribed in regulations. This must be done within 28 days of the valuer being appointed. The community body is also required to provide the ballotter with wording for the proposition that they buy the land, together with other information as set out in the regulations within seven days of receiving notification of the value of the land.

185. HIE suggested that, as much of the information will already have been submitted to Ministers as part of the application process and as Ministers supply background information to the ballotter, it did not see merits in this subsection and stated it was “… not persuaded of the need for a ballotter to hold this information as the ballotter’s role is solely to undertake the ballot.”

186. The Committee questions whether there is any practical merit in the Minister and the community body providing background information to the ballotter, given that the ballotter’s role is solely to undertake the ballot. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to re-consider the necessity of this provision with a view to bringing forward amendments at stage 2 to delete that requirement.

187. The Community Land Advisory Service suggested that, in relation to section 37(4)(b)—

“Given the Bill intends to make it clear that the right to buy can be exercised in relation to separate tenements, I think that the requirement to affix a notice to the land needs to be relaxed for those cases…”

188. The Committee also questions the requirement of the provision in section 37(4)(b) on fixing notices to the land in relation to right-to-buy applications for separate tenements and asks the Scottish Government to consider whether that requirement could be relaxed for those cases, and, if necessary, bring forward amendments at stage 2.

Approval of right-to-buy application, ballot and payment (sections 38 – 42)

189. Sections 38 – 42 relate to the information Ministers must take into account when deciding whether to approve a community body’s exercise of the right-to-buy and relates to the provision of information and evidence relating to ballot results; Ministerial powers to review whether ballots have been properly conducted; the timescale for the conduct of the ballot; and the timescale for payment by the community body.

190. Both Scottish Land and Estates\textsuperscript{411} and the Historic Houses Association Scotland\textsuperscript{412} suggest that as the ballot is at the initiation of the community body, the community body should meet the expenses of this rather than the public purse.

191. The Committee considers that, given the significance of the policy objectives of land reform and the Part 4 provisions of this Bill, and the very real difficulties many communities face in building capacity and in securing resources, should Ministers consider the application meets the public interest and sustainable development tests, then it is appropriate that the cost of the ballot be met from the public purse.

Views on representations under section 60 of the 2003 Act (section 43)

192. Section 43 amends section 60 of the 2003 Act, which requires the valuer to invite the landowner and the community body to comment on issues that may have an impact on the valuation. This inserts a new subsection (1A) into section 60 of the 2003 Act, which requires the valuer to pass on any written representations about the value of the land (whether by the landowner of the community body) to the other party and invite counter representations from that party. These views must then be considered while undertaking the valuation. It is believed that this process will increase confidence in the valuation.

193. The Policy Memorandum states that the Bill gives Ministers discretion to allow them to recover the cost of the independent valuation from the landowner where the landowner has withdrawn the land from sale after the valuer has been appointed, thus deterring landowners from allowing the process to proceed where land is not genuinely being offered for sale.\textsuperscript{413}

194. The Committee considers that the requirement on the valuer to consider the views of both parties when undertaking the valuation should increase confidence in the process.

Circumstances where expenses of valuation are to be met by the owner of the land (section 44)

195. Section 44 inserts a new section 60A into the 2003 Act. It provides for certain circumstances where Ministers may require the landowner to pay the expenses of Ministers in connection with the valuation. This also provides landowners with a right of appeal.

196. The Historic Houses Association for Scotland\textsuperscript{414} and Scottish Land and Estates\textsuperscript{415} raised concerns in relation to section 44. In particular, they highlighted \textsuperscript{411} Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.

\textsuperscript{412} Written submission. Historic Houses Association Scotland.
\textsuperscript{413} Policy Memorandum. Paragraph 63.
\textsuperscript{414} Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland. that under community right-to-buy an owner has a right to withdraw his or her land from a sale to a community body after the right-to-buy has been activated, provided the appropriate notification has been given. They sought comfort that this section would not be used arbitrarily to penalise a landowner who, for a variety of reasons (such as where family or financial circumstances of the landowner change or where the land is held in trust, not all of the trustees being made aware of the sale) decide not to proceed with the sale. They sought further clarification on the criteria that would form the basis for Ministers’ decisions on recovery of expenses. They suggested, as did Brodies in its written submission,\(^{416}\) that Ministers should exercise their discretion with care.

197. Some stakeholders, including the Community Land Advisory Service, raised concerns in relation to the basis of the Minister’s decision. Specifically, stakeholders sought further clarification on the criteria which would form the basis of that decision and highlighted the potentially adverse effects on land owners, who might be pursuing long term development proposals.\(^{417}\)

198. While the Committee is concerned to ensure that landowners do not thwart the legitimate proposals of communities, the Committee recognises that there will be cases where landowners, for legitimate reasons (e.g. where family or financial circumstances change) decide to withdraw land from sale after a right-to-buy has been activated. The Committee is of the view that there should be Ministerial discretion on this matter. The Committee considers that further clarification, by way of regulation, will be required to set out the criteria which would form the basis of the Ministerial decision.

Rights of appeal, calculation of time periods and provision of Information (sections 45 – 47)

199. Sections 45 – 47 relate to rights of appeal to the sheriff; calculating certain time periods in relation to community right to buy; and the provision of information to Ministers to enable monitoring and evaluation of any impacts that the right-to-buy under Part 2 of the 2003 Act has had or may have.

200. The Community Land Advisory Service\(^{418}\) commented on section 47 (the proposed new section 67A of the 2003 Act) highlighting that some periods specified in the revised 2003 Act would include public and local holidays and some would not and this could potentially cause confusion and lead to mistakes.

201. The Committee welcomes the provisions that support effective monitoring and evaluation of the impact of the community right-to-buy provisions.

202. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give further consideration to the requirement for consistency in the 2003 Act on the treatment of public and local holidays and bring forward amendments at stage 2 to ensure this.

\(^{415}\) Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.

\(^{416}\) Written submission. Brodies LLP.

\(^{417}\) Written submission. Pinsent Masons LLP.

\(^{418}\) Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
Community right to buy abandoned and neglected land (section 48)

203. The existing community right to buy provisions under Part 2 of the 2003 Act allow a rural community to register an interest in land at any time. However a community body can only buy the land if the owner willingly decides to sell. As outlined in paragraph 102, section 27 removes the restriction on rural land and communities. The Policy Memorandum states—

“Land that is neglected or abandoned can be a barrier to the sustainable development of land. In some cases it may prevent the community from developing or improving facilities. There are also cases where derelict or neglected sites become a blight on the surrounding area, and the community could bring the land back into productive use. The Scottish Government considers that in such circumstances, where all other options fail to achieve improvement, communities should be able to acquire the land without having to wait for it to be put on the market.”

204. Section 48 of the Bill inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act to give communities a right to buy land that is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected, for the purposes of the sustainable development of that land, where there is no willing seller. Where Ministers approve the application, the owner will be required to transfer the land to the community body, which will be required to pay the market value for the land. The procedure for Part 3A is based on the procedure in Part 3 of the 2003 Land Reform Act, which gives crofting communities an absolute right to buy and is not dependent on there being a willing seller. The provisions in the proposed Part 3A as inserted by section 48 are summarised below.

Meaning of Land (Section 97B)

205. The new section 97B of the 2003 Act defines “land” as including “bridges and other structures built on or over land, inland waters, canals and the foreshore” (i.e. land between the high and low water marks of ordinary spring tides). The definition does not include salmon and mineral rights.

Eligible land (Section 97C)

206. The new section 97C of the 2003 Act defines eligible land as that which is, in the opinion of Ministers, “Wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” for “the purpose of the sustainable development of that land” and “in order to further the achievement of sustainable development”. Factors which Ministers must have regard to when deciding whether land is eligible will be set out in regulations. Land which is not eligible includes—

- land on which there is an individual’s home, though this can be subject to exceptions set out in regulations;
- land pertaining to an individual’s home as may be set out in regulations;
- eligible croft land (as defined in section 68 of the 2003 Act) or croft land which is occupied or worked by its owner or members of their family;

419 Policy Memorandum. Paragraph 65.
• certain land that is owned by the Crown (because no owner or heir to the previous owner exists or can be identified); or

• land of such other descriptions that Ministers may set out in regulations.

207. The Policy Memorandum suggests that matters which could be considered in relation to whether land is abandoned or neglected include—

“The physical condition of the land or building; its current use (or non-use); any detrimental economic or environmental impact on the local area; and any failure by the landowner to comply with regulatory requirements. Ministers would also need to consider any environmental, planning or historic designations affecting the land and buildings, for example if there are any restrictions on its use or development relating to conservation purposes.”

208. Many stakeholders supported the introduction of the new power extending the community right-to-buy where there is no willing seller, but the majority who commented on this provision viewed it as a power of last resort, to be exercised when other methods and negotiations had failed. They considered that the existence of the power would, however, have an important role in incentivising negotiation. Stakeholders such as the Community Woodland Association\(^{421}\) and Community Land Scotland\(^{422}\) suggested that this proposal responds to a weakness in the 2003 Act, that is, even if it were in the public interest, there is no means by which a community can acquire land unless it comes on the open market. In their view, the new provision means that the matter can now be considered.

209. Whilst stakeholders were broadly supportive of the introduction of this power in principle, many questioned whether the provisions, as drafted, effectively meet the policy objectives. Many also highlighted significant concerns with respect to the definition of abandonment and neglect and the additional requirements resulting from the definition; the scope of eligible land; and the provision for exceptions in relation to an individual’s home. Many stakeholders raised practical concerns in relation to the operation of the provisions. Community Land Scotland\(^{423}\) and the Community Woodland Association\(^{424}\) stated that, in their view, the significant qualifications on the new right would probably make it impossible to exercise in practice. The Community Woodland Association stated—

“The bar is being set too high, there are too many obstacles in the way and there are clear opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. We are concerned that this requirement is overly limiting and whilst it may be possible to demonstrate this requirement is met for buildings we do not believe it will be workable in practice with respect to woodlands and other extensive land holdings.”\(^{425}\)

\(^{420}\) Policy Memorandum. Paragraph 68.
\(^{421}\) Written submission. Community Woodland Association.
\(^{422}\) Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
\(^{423}\) Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
\(^{424}\) Written submission. Community Woodland Association.
\(^{425}\) Written submission. Community Woodland Association.
210. Highland Council shared those concerns, suggesting that section 48 appears to introduce a significantly higher barrier to community ownership than currently exists. It had particular concerns that the requirement for an interested community to demonstrate that land had been abandoned, particularly in a rural setting, would be very challenging indeed.\footnote{Written submission. Highland Council.}

211. Community Land Scotland also stated that it did not believe that there was a clear and fundamental difference between the sustainable development of crofting land (as required by the crofting community right-to-buy in the 2003 Act) and the sustainable development of other land which necessitates the additional requirements of abandonment or neglect in order for it to be eligible for the potential exercise of these new powers.\footnote{Written Submission. Community Land Scotland.}

212. John Watt told the Committee that he would prefer the Bill to mention “fulfilling the greatest potential for sustainable development”, rather than including a requirement that land should be proven to be “abandoned or neglected.”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. \textit{Official Report}, 3 December 2014, Col 29.}

213. Some also questioned, given the stated policy intention, whether section 97C should include a further provision to the effect that eligible land would be land which, if sold to a community body, would contribute to the achievement of greater diversity of ownership of land in Scotland.

\textit{The public interest and sustainability tests}

214. The Committee explored the views of stakeholders on the public interest and sustainable development tests. The Committee heard evidence about the operation of the community right-to-buy to date and concerns that tying the Part 3A route to community ownership of land solely to the concept of abandonment or neglect is too limiting as community ownership of land is principally motivated by communities considering barriers to sustainable development of their place. There was discussion that, had these provisions existed at the time of the Eigg case, the community might not have been able to successfully argue a case for community ownership.

215. In oral evidence, Peter Peacock stated—

\begin{quote}
“Sustainable development is defined in three ways. That is the problem at the heart of the definition of “abandoned and neglected”: it deals with one of the three definitions of sustainable development but not necessarily with the other two…The difficulty with sticking to a definition of abandonment and neglect is that it appears to relate to the physical construct of the land rather than to sustainable development. The whole policy purpose of the bill, and of the original 2003 act, is about furthering sustainable development. There is a bit of a trap here, given the way in which sustainable development is currently defined. The issue can be sorted—for example, it would be possible to have a third criterion. If the aim of the requirement for a building to be proven to be “abandoned and neglected” …the bill could specify that a building can also be proven to be in need of sustainable or sustained development. That would allow the social and economic considerations to be taken into account”. ⁴²⁹
\end{quote}

216. The Committee agrees with stakeholders that the power to extend the community right-to-buy where there is no willing seller should be a power of last resort, to be exercised only when other methods and negotiations had failed. However, the Committee has concerns that this new right, as the provisions are currently drafted, may be almost impossible to exercise, with too many obstacles and opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. Notwithstanding this, the Committee believes that the existence of this power is likely to play an important role in incentivising negotiation.

217. The Committee questions the need to restrict the definition of eligible land to that which is considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. The Committee is concerned that these provisions, as drafted, may fail to further sustainable development.

218. The Committee also questions why the Scottish Government considers that a definition is needed at all, as the parallel tests for crofting land purchases do not require this.

219. The Committee considers that there are convincing arguments that the tests of ‘furthering sustainable development’ and of being ‘in the public interest’ are capable of testing all requirements. On that basis, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider the requirement that eligible land be restricted to land which is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected and recommends that the Scottish Government consider a definition that relates to the wider circumstances which can be a barrier to sustainable development, such as the lack of achievement of the use and/or development of land that could deliver greater public benefit. ⁴³⁰

220. In the absence of an unambiguous and acceptable definition ⁴³¹ of abandoned or neglected land produced by the Scottish Government which both removes the barrier that the present proposal is likely to erect, and which avoids the problems of interpretation giving the existing legal concept of abandoned land, then the Committee is likely to ask the Scottish Government to remove the term ‘abandoned or neglected land’ and bring forward a proposal which will allow the widest possible opportunity for community purchase. The Committee reserves the right to take evidence on this issue at stage 2.

221. The Committee sets out its detailed consideration of the evidence in relation to definitions of abandonment and neglect in the following paragraphs.

⁴³⁰ Alex Fergusson MSP and Jim Hume MSP dissent from paragraphs 216 to 219.
⁴³¹ Sarah Boyack MSP and Claudia Beamish MSP dissent from paragraph 220 on the basis of the evidence to the Committee which suggested that the requirement on communities to demonstrate that land is neglected or abandoned is likely to present a barrier which would undermine the aims of the Bill.
Definitions of abandonment and neglect

222. Many stakeholders, including Scottish Environment Protection Agency (SEPA); the Law Society of Scotland; Community Land Scotland; Scottish Land and Estates; the Community Land Advisory Service; Brodies LLP; the National Farmers Union Scotland; and West Dunbartonshire Council, raised significant concerns in relation to how land would be identified as being abandoned or neglected.

223. The Law Society of Scotland stated—

“The lack of a definition for abandoned or neglected land gives rise to considerable uncertainty in relation to what land would be within the scope of section 97C. The Society believes that there should be a proper definition of abandoned or neglected land”.432

224. Scottish Land and Estates433 considered that an owner is entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms “abandoned” and “neglected”. This concern was shared by the Scottish Community Alliance which stated—

“…We would also support the view that more clarity is needed to determine what is meant by abandoned and neglected land….Given that these provisions could result in an asset owner being deprived of his/her property against their wishes, it is very important that there is absolute clarity around the circumstances in which this would be permissible”.434

225. Community Land Scotland raised the question of fairness to landowners and, in its written submission, stated—

“that more consultation and discussion is needed on the sorts of land susceptible to the proposed right to buy. This should include consideration of (1) land land-banked for future development, (2) farmland left fallow as a matter of good agricultural practice and (3) spaces deliberately allowed to go wild for good environmental reasons”.435

226. Malcolm Combe stated that the word “abandoned” is “sub-optimal, because it has a very specific meaning in Scots private law” i.e. it is used in a situation where an owner has actively sought to walk away from an item of property. “Whilst land cannot be cast away in quite the same manner, an owner may seek to disclaim land. This was most recently witnessed in the case SEPA v Joint Liquidators of Scottish Coal (2014 SLT 259)”.436

227. Mr Combe discussed whether an appropriate synonym for “abandoned” could be found and concluded that—

432 Written submission. Law Society of Scotland.
433 Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.
434 Written submission. Scottish Community Alliance.
435 Written submission. Community Alliance.
“The Committee should consider carefully whether “abandoned” is appropriate. One drastic solution might be to remove “abandoned” entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to “wholly or mainly neglected land.”

228. This concern was shared by other stakeholders, including the Historic Houses Association for Scotland, who suggested that “mainly abandoned” did not appear to be a legally competent term.

229. The submission from the Community Land Advisory Service raised concerns that the definition of abandoned and neglected land was to be defined by future statutory instrument, subject to the negative procedure. It also raised concerns in relation to potential disputes that might arise should the definition be left to a later date and set out in subordinate legislation, highlighting possible adverse consequences for the land market.

230. The Church of Scotland General Trustees stated—

“…While there are clear difficulties in setting out criteria to define “abandoned or neglected”, it appears to the Trustees that the definition of these terms is at the heart of this element of the proposals. Without statutory definition of these terms, Parliament is being asked to approve a concept, rather than scrutinise the specific terms and application of the legislation with the danger of unintended consequences. The Trustees submit that the terms “abandoned or neglected” should be defined within the primary legislation and should take into account: a property owner’s right to peaceful enjoyment of his or her possessions…”

231. Scottish Land and Estates commented on the human rights issues associated with these provisions and stated—

“In terms of the process set out in the Bill, we believe that deprivation of ownership is not the appropriate final outcome and it is questionable in ECHR terms whether this is in fact a proportionate response. Where there is “abandoned and neglected” land, the key issue the Bill requires to address is land use, not land ownership.”

232. In providing oral evidence to the Committee, Dave Thomson, from the Scottish Government Bill Team, said that he agreed that the definition should be on the face of the Bill, adding that—“I think that matters that the Minister would have to consider in deciding whether that definition applies will be followed up within regulation rather than in the Bill, but you are right that the definition should be in the Bill itself. We 436 Written submission. Malcolm Combe.

437 Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland.
438 Written submission. Church of Scotland General Trustees.
439 Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates. are still actively considering exactly what the definition should be, to ensure that we get it right.”

233. In response to the discussion of the Committee’s concerns in relation to abandoned and neglected land, the Cabinet Secretary said he would reflect on the issues raised with the Committee and consider whether there is a need for further clarity.

234. Notwithstanding the Committee’s recommendation in paragraph 220, with respect to the terms wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected land, which takes precedence, should the Scottish Government wish to retain this provision, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to the following effect—

- the term “abandoned” is sub-optimal and should be removed entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to “wholly or mainly neglected land;
- the definition of neglected should relate to the sustainable development of the land and not solely to a description of its physical condition and there should be a clear justification for the inclusion of the term;
- if prescribed matters in relation to eligible land are to be set out in regulation these regulations should be laid under the affirmative procedure; and
- owners and communities are entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms. The Committee considers it is not appropriate to deal with the transfer of fundamental property rights through secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any definition of terms be set out on the face of the Bill.

Impact of the provisions in urban and rural areas

235. The Committee heard from stakeholders that there may be a differentiation in the circumstances of urban and rural areas.

236. Some stakeholders including Scottish Land and Estates\(^{443}\) and the Historic Houses Association Scotland\(^{444}\) raised the question as to whether the provisions relating to abandoned and neglected land should apply only in an urban context if

---

\(^{441}\) Alex Fergusson MSP and Jim Hume MSP dissent from paragraphs 216 to 219.

\(^{442}\) Sarah Boyack MSP and Claudia Beamish MSP dissent from paragraph 220 on the basis of the evidence to the Committee which suggested that the requirement on communities to demonstrate that land is neglected or abandoned is likely to present a barrier which would undermine the aims of the Bill.

\(^{443}\) Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.

\(^{444}\) Written submission. Historic Houses Association Scotland.
the focus was on small parcels of land which prevent sustainable development or cause blight.

237. The Committee considers that, whilst there may be a differentiation in urban and rural circumstances and there could be challenges in measuring neglect and abandonment in rural areas, should this provision remain, the Committee is of the view that it should apply uniformly outwith crofting land. However, further consideration to the criteria for determining neglect and abandonment is necessary and should be set out on the face of the Bill.

238. The National Farmers Union of Scotland (NFUS) was concerned that some agricultural land may be out of “regular” use for periods of time and may, as a result, be subject to these provisions. It considered that where land is classified as agricultural land it should be exempt from this provision unless it is proven that it fails to meet “good agricultural and environmental condition”.

239. The Committee shares the concerns of the National Farmers Union of Scotland (NFUS) in relation to the possible impact of the provisions on agricultural land that may be out of regular use for periods of time. The Committee considers that land which is classified as agricultural land should be exempt from this provision unless it is determined that it fails to meet “good agricultural and environmental condition”. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

Timescales

240. Some stakeholders, including the NFUS and Community Land Scotland suggested that consideration be given to the timescales in which land would be considered to be abandoned or neglected and proposed that a minimum timescale be set out.

241. The Committee recommends that, should the provision relating to abandoned or neglected remain, the Scottish Government give consideration to the issue of appropriate timescales in which land could be determined to be abandoned and neglected and bring forward amendments to identify timescales in relation to this provision at stage 2.

Other potential impacts of the provisions

242. Brodies LLP suggested that safeguards would be required to ensure that the provisions are not used to obstruct the development plans of competitors.

243. The Scottish Property Federation highlighted significant concerns in relation to land that may be part of a complex development process (possibly comprising several small plots or buildings) and the impact of potential uncertainty on investor decisions. It also raised concerns in relation to land owned by an entity in administration or other insolvency process connected with the land and

---

445 Written submission. National Farmers Union Scotland.
446 Written submission. National Farmers Union Scotland.
447 Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
448 Written submission. Scottish Property Federation.
suggested that there was a need for appropriate and clear policy in relation to this issue.

244. The Committee considers that the information to be provided as part of the application process should enable Ministers to consider the potential impacts of an application. The Committee is aware of the concerns raised in relation to land owned by an entity in administration or insolvency process and recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on that and consider the need for further regulation or relevant guidance, and if necessary bring forward amendments at stage 2.

245. Stakeholders sought clarification as to whether, in cases where some parts of a land holding could be considered to be either wholly or mainly (significantly) abandoned or neglected, whether the provisions would apply to those parts only or to the whole land holding. This issue was also raised in relation to the rural context and with respect to large estates.

246. The Committee recommends that should the provision relating to abandoned or neglected remain, the Scottish Government provide clarification as to whether the provisions in relation to abandoned or neglected land would apply only to those parts of a land holding that were considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected or would apply to the whole land holding. The Committee asks that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider the need for further regulation or guidance to provide clarity on this matter.

Management of land
247. The Committee received written evidence and heard oral evidence from Holmehill Community Buyout, which stated that—

“... we are concerned that the concept as presented in the Bill will be of limited value in many cases. There may be cases where it will be of real use to communities so we are not suggesting that it is removed, rather that it is strengthened. The key issue is not that the land is un-managed, but how it is managed...consequently we consider that the Community Empowerment Bill should include the ability for the local community to take ownership of land that is not being used in line with the defined planning designation and where there is a clear community need...”

248. Scottish Land and Estates and the Historic Houses Association for Scotland also raised concerns in relation to the importance of land use rather than land ownership. They raised the issue facing owners of land under agricultural tenancies, both stating in their written submission that (they)— “...may have very limited control over the utilisation of the leased land and short of going through time consuming and potentially costly court processes may be unable to rectify this. It would seem inequitable for land to be

449 Written submission. Holmehill Community Buyout.
compulsorily acquired, where the owner is not actually responsible for the perceived absence of activity or poor management."450 451

249. The Committee recognises that, in some cases, control over the management of land will lie primarily with the tenant rather than with the landowner. The Committee considers that the Bill as currently drafted does not appear to provide for situations where the owner is not responsible for the absence of activity or for poor management. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider whether relevant amendments are required to clarify this at stage 2.

250. Concerns in relation to land that is intended for conservation purposes were raised by Scottish Natural Heritage, the National Trust for Scotland, the Scottish Wildlife Trust and others.

251. Scottish Natural Heritage, referred to paragraph 73 of the Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill 2013452 which stated that “land which is intended for recognised conservation purposes would not be considered to be neglected or abandoned”. It suggests that this does not seem to be reflected in Section 48 of the Bill, and states—

“In our response to the consultation we commented that the term neglected or abandoned land should be defined so as to exclude land that is delivering wider public goods in the form of ecosystem services despite it not being “actively” managed. The absence of active management is not necessarily a sign of “abandonment” or “neglect”. For example, areas of peat-land might be helping to deliver carbon capture which is part of the Scottish Government’s response to climate change. Owning and managing land for nature conservation is an important land use. We would welcome the legislation reflecting the statement made in the consultation on the draft Bill”.453

252. Similarly, the National Trust for Scotland highlighted its concerns that although the Policy Memorandum refers to land or buildings held for conservation—

“…there is nothing in the Bill which would suggest that land or buildings held for conservation could not be considered to be abandoned or neglected. The Scottish Wildlife Trust454 and the National Trust for Scotland would like all land held for conservation to be excluded from the statutory provisions. In addition the National Trust for Scotland requested that the Trust’s inalienable land should be deemed to be held for conservation. “Should this not be accepted by the Committee, we would suggest that the Scottish Ministers should have the power to reject an application where land is held for conservation and the Trust’s inalienable land should be presumed or (preferably) deemed to be held for conservation. If the Trust’s inalienable

450 Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.
451 Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland.
453 Written submission. Scottish Natural Heritage.
454 Written submission. Scottish Wildlife Trust land is not absolutely excluded from the statutory provisions, then we would seek a special parliamentary process to be built into the legislation to allow the Trust to appeal any compulsory sale order (in the same form as in the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) (Scotland) Act 1947 and the Crofters Acts..."455

253. SEPA also noted that there could be cases where abandoned or neglected land could have a high value in terms of the ecosystem services it offers such as supporting biodiversity and flood risk management. It highlighted the importance of having a robust evidence base to inform decision making and suggested that both the land valuation and processes of determining requests for transfer of land should take account of ecosystem value in a systematic way. SEPA also suggests that there may be cases where abandoned or neglected land is partly or wholly contaminated and may not be suited to the use that the community would like to see. SEPA suggested that there was a need for appropriate mechanisms to ensure that communities had access to expert advice and support. 456

254. The Historic Houses Association for Scotland stated that—

“...the absence of active management is not necessarily a sign of either “abandonment” or “neglect”. Land may be delivering wider public good in the form of ecosystem services despite not being actively managed. Active management of itself can therefore not be properly used as a term in defining abandonment and neglect. Biodiversity, carbon capture, recreation and cultural value may all be components of different sites and the Bill as drafted does not take into account such circumstances”. 457

255. The Committee was concerned about the possibility that land that is under a low intensity/zero management regime for a valid reason (e.g. natural regeneration for biodiversity or natural flood protection) could be considered “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” and recognises that in practice there appears to have been a presumption in favour of development rather than public amenity and nature conservation (e.g. at Holmehill).

256. The Committee recommends that, should the definition of abandoned and neglected land remain in the Bill, land which is intended for recognised conservation or environmental purposes be specifically excluded from that definition. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

257. The Committee is aware that vacant or derelict land may be contaminated. The Committee believes that it is unlikely that communities will have the skills or resources to deal with such situations and agrees with the Scottish Environment Protection Agency that there is a need for appropriate mechanisms to ensure that communities have access to expert advice and support. The Committee recommends that the Scottish 455 Written submission. National Trust for Scotland.

456 Written submission. Scottish Environment Protection Agency.
457 Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland.
Government addresses these concerns and ensures that appropriate guidance, advice and support is provided to communities.

Eligible land – provisions with respect to an individual’s home

258. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform (DPLR) Committee reported on the Delegated Powers Memorandum and made a number of specific comments in relation to this, as well as some general observations about the quality of responses received from Scottish Government officials and the detail of the Bill. One of the DPLR Committee’s main concerns relates to the new section 97c(3)(a) on eligible abandoned or neglected land, which states—

“Eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual’s home unless the building or structure falls within such classes as may be prescribed”. In its report the DPLR Committee stated that it “[…] remains in a position, having considered both written and oral evidence, whereby it is unable to form a view as to how this power is intended to be used. The Government has not provided an explanation for taking this power beyond a need to retain flexibility within the Bill. The Committee considers that explanation to be inadequate in light of the significance of this power and what it appears to permit. The Committee further finds it concerning that the thinking behind a power of such significance to the scope and application of the Bill appears still to be in the early stages of development”. 458

259. Brodies LLP459 and the Community Land Advisory Service460 also raised concerns in relation to the exclusion of an individual’s home and, in its written evidence, Brodies stated “We are however wary that this exclusion is also subject to further regulation”.

260. The Committee raised the concerns of the DPLR Committee directly with the Cabinet Secretary; sought information on the thinking behind the power; asked for examples that demonstrate how the power might be used in practice; and questioned how the power was intended to be used.

261. No detailed information on the thinking behind the power or examples of how it might be used in practice or how it was intended to be used were offered. The Cabinet Secretary stated that he was aware of concerns in relation to the power and undertook to review those concerns but stated “We will still have to have the power to exclude homes…”461.

262. The Committee shares the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in relation to the new section 97C(3)(a) on eligible abandoned or neglected land, which states “Eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual’s home unless the building or structure falls within such classes as may be prescribed”. The Committee is also concerned that the thinking behind this significant power is in the early stages of development.

459Written submission. Brodies LLP.
460Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.

263. Given the lack of detail provided in response to its questions on the thinking behind the power the Committee remains unconvinced of the case for its necessity. The Committee urges the Scottish Government to reconsider the provision that grants Ministers the power to include an individual’s home in the definition of eligible land for the purpose of section 97C(3)(a) and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this power of prescription.

Bona vacantia land and Crown land
264. Some stakeholders sought clarity as to why bona vacantia land is excluded from eligible land, particularly when related to the need to identify ownership of the land, which may not always be possible. Clarity was also sought on why Crown land was excluded.

265. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide further information on the decision to exclude bona vacantia and Crown land from the definition of eligible land. The Committee further recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and the potential for amendment at stage 2 to include such land as eligible.

Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer (QLTR)
266. The Community Land Advisory Service questioned the proposed new section 97C(3) of the 2003 Act, which states that land administered by the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer (QLTR) is an exception to the general rule.463

267. The Committee would be interested to know why it is proposed that land which is under the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer power of disposal should be treated differently from any other land and asks the Scottish Government to provide further information on the decision to treat land which is under the power of the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer differently. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and, if appropriate, bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this power of exception.

Part 3A community bodies (section 97D)
268. The new section 97D outlines the requirements which must be met by a body be eligible to purchase land under Part 3A of the 2003 Act.

269. Subsection (1) specifies that a Part 3A community body must be a company limited by guarantee. It also lists the requirements which must be included in the company’s articles of association. In terms of subsection (2) Ministers have discretion over the minimum number of members a Part 3A community body must 462 Bona vacantia means vacant goods and is the name given to ownerless property which passes to the crown.

---

463 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
have. Ministers must also be satisfied that the body’s main purpose is consistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

270. Subsection (5)(a) sets out that the articles of association must define the community to which it relates by reference to a postcode unit (or units) and/or a type of area which Ministers set out in regulation. The community includes people who are resident in that postcode unit or in one of the postcode units or other areas set out by Ministers in regulation. In addition to being resident, members of the community must also be entitled to vote at local government elections in a polling district that encompasses that postcode unit or postcode units or the alternative areas set out by Ministers in regulations.

271. There are additional supplementary provisions to section 97D – a Part 3A community body cannot change its memorandum or articles of association without prior written consent from Ministers, while the land purchased under Part 3A of the 2003 Act remains in its ownership. Ministers would have the power to acquire land should the community body no longer be entitled to buy the land, should it continue to be considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

272. The Community Land Advisory Service states that—

“The types of body permitted to acquire a Part 3A right to buy should be the same as those permitted to acquire a Part 2 right to buy under Part 2 as proposed to be amended by the Bill. Accordingly this provision should be amended to permit SCIOs and other bodies prescribed by statutory instrument to be Part 3A community bodies”.

273. Both Scottish Land and Estates and the Historic Houses Association for Scotland stated that they were unclear (in terms of the proposed Section 97D) why the community body for this part of the Act effectively required to be a company limited by guarantee and suggested that there should be parity with the new provisions for “normal community right-to-buy”.

274. The Committee considers that there should be consistency in the Bill and in subsequent regulation with respect to the definition of an eligible community body for the purposes of all community right-to-buy provisions. The Committee therefore recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to address the current inconsistency.

Section 97E(1) of the 2003 Act

275. Some stakeholders, including the Community Land Advisory Service, suggested that this provision be amended to refer to constitutions as well as to memoranda and articles.

276. The Committee notes this apparent omission and recommends that the Scottish Government brings forward amendments at stage 2 to this provision to refer to constitutions as well as to memoranda and articles.

---

464 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
465 Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.
466 Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland.
Register of community interests in abandoned or neglected land (section 97F)

277. The new section 97F of the 2003 Act provides for the creation of a Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected land, to be set up and maintained by the Registers of Scotland.

278. The Community Land Advisory Service suggested that such a register would be unnecessary, as in its view, the proposed Part 3A right to buy is absolute and not pre-emptive. When the Land Registration etc (Scotland) Act 2012 has been fully commenced, it argued, the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland will be empowered to unilaterally register any unregistered parcel and relevant information would be disclosed in routine conveyancing searches.\(^{467}\)

279. The Committee questions the necessity for, and the benefit of, the creation of a register of community interests in abandoned or neglected land and recommends that the Scottish Government re-consider the value of this provision and consider the requirement for amendment at stage 2.

Right to buy: application for consent – Section 97G

280. The new section 97G relates to the process of applying to exercise the right to buy land under Part 3A, and provides that this can—

- only be exercised by a Part 3A community body;
- only be exercised with Ministers’ consent following a written application by the community body; and
- be exercised on multiple holdings, providing that separate applications have been made for each holding.

281. An application must set out whom the owner of the land is and any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land or any part of it. The required form of the application and accompanying information will be specified in regulations.

282. A Part 3A community body must also list in the application why it believes that its proposed purchase is in the public interest, how it is compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of land, and the reasons why it considers the land to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. This application must also be sent to the land owner and any creditor. On the invitation of Ministers, owners and creditors would then have a 60 day period to provide written comments on the application. There is also a 60 day period for public notice and for receipt of the comments from the community body which is provided with all views received by the Minister.

283. In considering whether or not to give consent to the application, Ministers must have regard to all views received in relation to the application and must decline to consider an application that does not comply with the requirements of the new section 97G, is incomplete, or where Ministers are otherwise bound to reject it.

\(^{467}\) Written submission: Community Land Advisory Service.
Identification of the owner

284. Many stakeholders expressed concerns in relation to the provision requiring community bodies to identify the landowner. Jon Hollingdale stated—

“As the 2003 act stands, the current community right-to-buy provides for communities to be able to put a registration on land without knowing who the owner is, although they have to demonstrate, and the Minister has to accept, that they have taken reasonable steps to find out who the owner is. If it is not possible to find out, a registration can still stand. At the very least, there ought to be a similar mechanism in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. It strikes against the whole abandonment issue. If the land is abandoned, that suggests that we would not know who the owner was because they had run away.”

285. Concerns were also expressed by the Community Land Advisory Service and others in relation to the practical difficulties of tracing owners, as ownership records may not provide information on the identity and contact details of a current owner, making it difficult or impossible to trace or to make contact with them. The Community Land Advisory Service referred to their experience stating it would find it difficult to comply with the requirements of this provision. It also raised concerns that in a situation where the owner can be identified but may be an adult with incapacity or a lapsed trust with no surviving trustees capable of acting.

286. In oral evidence to the Committee, members of the Bill team discussed the absolute requirement to identify the owner and suggested that there was an alternative procedure whereby if the owner could not be found and the land were declared bona vacantia, the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer could be approached to purchase the land.

287. The Committee recognises that there can be very real practical difficulties in identifying land owners and anticipates that the Land Registration (Scotland) Act 2014 will, over time, have a positive effect on the availability and accessibility of information on ownership.

288. However, the Committee remains unconvinced that the provision requiring community bodies to identify ownership, rather than a requiring community bodies to demonstrate they have taken all reasonable steps to identify ownership, is appropriate. The Committee considers that there ought to be a mechanism in this Bill, similar to the existing provisions in the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act, providing for communities to be able to register an interest in land without knowing who the owner is. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider its position on this and bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

289. In relation to the proposed section 97 G (10) some stakeholders considered that the information to be provided by the owner should include information about

---

469 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
the effect on the owner’s funder and/or the existence of any leases or other contractual commitments which bind the owner in relation to the land and sought further clarity on this, particularly as such contracts can be rendered void by section 57 (5).

290. In its written submission, Brodies LLP proposed—

“In terms of Section 97G(11) Bill the community body is to receive copies of all views submitted to the Ministers. The landowner should also be entitled to see these views and make counter representations if necessary.”

291. The Committee considers that all parties should be treated fairly and in this regard recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward the necessary amendments at stage 2 to allow landowners sight of all views submitted and to ensure that the process allows the opportunity for Ministerial consideration of counter views.

Crichel Down rules

292. Where land is acquired by, or is under the threat of, compulsory purchase, a non-statutory arrangement known as the Crichel Down Rules provide that surplus land should be offered back to former owners and their successors. Some stakeholders considered that the equivalent to Crichel Down Rules should apply where land acquired under the amended 2003 Act is not used for the purpose for which it was acquired. It was suggested that the former owner or their successors should be entitled to first refusal if the land is no longer used by the community for the intended purpose. Others commented that the Bill was silent on this issue and suggested that it would be helpful to have some clarity on this aspect of the community right to buy process.

293. The question as to what happens to a community body asset (including liabilities and responsibilities) where the body ceases to exist or is unable to continue to function was raised by stakeholders, including the Scottish Property Federation. Stakeholders questioned whether this would fall to Scottish Ministers.

294. The Finance Committee also invited the RACCE Committee to seek clarification of how the expansion of community right-to-buy might interact with the Crichel Down Rules.

295. The Committee raised the question of the Crichel Down Rules with the Cabinet Secretary, who stated that—

---

471 Written submission. Brodies LLP.
473 Pinsent Masons LLP, submission number 50.
474 Written submission. Scottish Property Federation.
296. The Committee welcomes the clarification from the Cabinet Secretary that, as the Crichel Down Rules are not statutory, they do not preclude a community having the right-to-buy. The Committee understands that these rules apply only to land bought during the Second World War; however, the Committee would welcome further detail from the Scottish Government on the application of the rules in relation to the land that they do and do not apply to.

297. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government to provide clarification on what it envisages in a situation where there is an approved application but the purpose for which the application was approved is not pursued. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government’s view of what would happen in a situation where the community body has bought the land but ceases to exist. If the Scottish Government considers that the previous owner should be offered first right of refusal to buy back the land then the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflects on the requirement for the introduction of relevant provisions within the Bill.

Mapping requirements

298. Many stakeholders such as the Community Woodlands Association and Community Land Scotland raised concerns in relation to the mapping requirements for community right-to-buy, which, in their view, are widely considered to be excessive. They suggested that there was a need to address streamlining the mapping process and aligning the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended Act.

299. John Randall suggested that there was a need to simplify the information requirements where land or a lease was to be acquired. Highland Council shared this view and highlighted that this issue was considered by the Land Reform Review Group. John Randall stated—

“there seems no logical or functional rationale for being required to provide the following details: a map and written description showing not only the boundary of the land or lease to be acquired, but also all sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits, and fences, dykes, ditches or other boundaries. This goes far beyond what is required in other land or lease transactions and there seems no functional reason to require this information. It is particularly onerous when the area to be purchased extends to several thousand hectares. Yet similar detailed requirements are proposed in Section 48 of the Bill (Clause 7G(6)(d) and (f) for the new proposed Part 3A”.

300. He also had concerns in relation to the requirement for inclusion of all postcodes and OS 1km grid squares to be included in the land or lease area to be

---

477 Written submission. Community Woodland Association.
478 Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
published, particularly where the area extended to several thousand acres and highlighted the possibilities for technical challenge due to inadvertent omissions. He stated that in his view—

“...in relation to the mapping requirements, the new Part 3A is modelled on the Part 3 of the 2003 Act, and this “goes far beyond what is required in other land or lease transactions, and there seems no functional reason to require this information...” 479

301. The Committee agrees with those stakeholders who consider that the mapping requirements for community right-to-buy are excessive and strongly believes that there is a need to streamline the mapping process, simplify the information requirements and align the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended Act. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to this effect at stage 2.

Criteria for consent (section 97H)

302. The new section 97H sets out various criteria for consent. Ministers must be satisfied that applications meet the criteria. These are as follows—

- that the land a part 3A community body is proposing to buy is land which is eligible under the new section 97C of the 2003 Act;
- that the exercise of the right to buy by a Part 3A community body is in the public interest and that its plans for the land are compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of the land;
- that, if continuing ownership of the eligible land by the current owner would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of the land;
- that the owner of the land is not prevented from selling the land or is not under an obligation to sell the land to someone other than the Part 3A community body (other than an obligation which is suspended by the regulations which are to be made by Ministers under the new section 97N(3));
- that a Part 3A community body meets the requirements in section 97D;
- that a significant number of the members of the community which the Part 3A community body represents have a connection with the land or the land is sufficiently near to land to which those members of the community have a connection;
- that the community which the Part 3A community body represents has approved the proposal to exercise the right to buy under Part 3A; and 479 Written submission. John Randall.

that the Part 3A community body has tried and failed to buy the land, other than by making an application under Part 3A.

Ownership inconsistent with the achievement of sustainable development

303. Some stakeholders raised concerns in relation to the requirement under section 97H; that Ministers must not consent to an application to buy by a community body unless they are satisfied "that, if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land". Many considered that it would be difficult to prove this "as it requires proof of a negative as distinct from proof of a possibility" and that it goes much further than would be required in order to achieve a "fair balance" required by ECHR A1P1.

304. In its written submission, Community Land Scotland stated that this "appears a very high and most probably impossible hurdle to overcome and unnecessary to meet ECHR requirements". It was of the view that the tests under the provisions that Ministers have to satisfy themselves that the land is eligible, that is that purchase by the community body is in the public interest and would be consistent with the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land, were sufficient. Community Land Scotland highlighted that there was no equivalent of this requirement in Part 3 of the 2003 Act and in their view this further requirement was unnecessary. This view was echoed by the Community Woodland Association. In oral evidence, Peter Peacock referred to this as "a killer clause."

305. Evidence to the Committee suggested that, given that Ministers already have to satisfy themselves that the land is eligible land (i.e. abandoned or neglected) and that purchase by the community body is both in the public interest and compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land, this further test is either an unnecessary duplication or sets impossibly high hurdles. Stakeholders suggested that it would be difficult to see how the above requirement could ever be met. Stakeholders considered it implies that even if a community were able to show that the land was mainly neglected for the purpose of its sustainable development, and this was not in the public interest, if that owner could show that their continuing ownership was not of itself "inconsistent" with some level of sustainable development, the community's application would require to be refused.

306. When questioned on the double test, the Cabinet Secretary stated he considered the approach of the double test to be sensible and continued to say—

"on the second part of the test – whether continuing ownership under the current arrangements from the existing owner will further sustainable development – I offer the reassurance that ministers will want evidence and proof from the existing owner...They will want evidence that things are happening, investments are being made, a plan is in the pipeline and people

480 Written submission. Community Land Scotland.
481 Written submission. Community Woodland Association. have been commissioned to bring the land out of neglect or abandonment.”

307. Notwithstanding the points made by the Cabinet Secretary, the Committee is concerned that the Bill as currently drafted appears to suggest that the onus will be on the applicant, rather than on the owner, to show that the current ownership would be inconsistent with sustainable development.

308. The Committee considers that this additional provision is unnecessary because the community would have to demonstrate, in its application, that the purchase furthered the achievement of sustainable development. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to delete the provision that currently states that, should the ownership of the land to remain with its current owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land.

Community demonstration of trying and failing to purchase land

309. Some stakeholders considered that 97H(j) might benefit from clarification in guidance as to the circumstances under which it would be considered that a community had tried and failed to buy the land, for example to have made an offer.

310. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government provide guidance for communities setting out the basis of the required evidence to prove that a community had tried and failed to purchase the land.

311. Concerns were also raised in relation to the potential for landowners who, if minded to obstruct the process, could obfuscate ownership by selling or giving options on some or all of the land or by carrying out the bare minimum of management activity required to counter the abandoned or neglected criterion. This issue has been dealt with in paragraphs 176-180.

Ballot to indicate approval for the purposes of section 97H (section 97J)

312. The new section 97J sets out the requirements for a ballot to establish that a right to buy application by a Part 3A community body has the support of its community. A proposal to exercise a community right to buy will be deemed to have been approved by the relevant community if—

- the ballot takes place within the six-month period immediately preceding the date of the right to buy application;
- at least half of the community voted in the ballot or, where fewer than half of the members of the community voted, the proportion is sufficient to justify the community body proceeding to purchase the land; and
- the majority of the votes cast were in favour of making the application.

313. Further requirements are also set out, including that a Part 3 community body is responsible for the expense of conducting the ballot and that it must be conducted as set out by Ministers in regulations. These regulations should include calculating and publishing the number of eligible voters, turnout, and the number of votes cast for and against the proposition. Thereafter, the Part 3A community body has 21 days in which to notify Ministers of the result (in some circumstances this can be included with the application). Should the ballot not be conducted in accordance with regulations, the Part 3A community body’s right-to-buy is extinguished.

314. Stakeholders raised concerns with regard to the timing of the valuation in relation to the ballot, specifically that under the current 2003 Act the community body is aware of the valuation at the time at which the ballot takes place. Stakeholders were concerned that, under the proposed provisions, at the time of the ballot communities will not have this information and therefore will not have complete information on the option on which they are voting and the valuation may subsequently turn out to be significantly higher than had been anticipated.

315. The Committee recognises that it may be helpful for communities to have information on the valuation at the time of the ballot and that such information may inform their views. The Committee recommends the Scottish Government give further consideration to this prior to stage 2 and consider the possible benefit of amendments to that effect.

316. Under the provisions of Part 3 of the 2003 Act, the Scottish Government is responsible for the expense of conducting the ballot. The new provisions propose to make the community body responsible for that cost. There was concern amongst stakeholders that this could cause issues for many communities, particularly for those more disadvantaged communities, which, in the absence of adequate financial support, might find it difficult to source the necessary funds to conduct the ballot.

317. The Community Land Advisory Service suggested that this provision should be modified in the same way as the equivalent provision in Part 2, in order to provide that the ballot is to be conducted by an independent baloter appointed and paid for by Ministers.

318. The Committee is concerned that communities should have equivalent access to the right-to-buy provisions of part 2 and part 3 and agrees with the view of stakeholders who suggested that the independent baloter should be appointed and paid for by Scottish Ministers. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to this effect at stage 2.

319. Fife Community Partnership commented on the 50% threshold, stating—“Groups wishing to undertake the Community Right-to-Buy only have access to the edited register whereby up to 30% of the electorate may not be included. This makes the initial 50% threshold difficult to achieve.”

320. The Committee understands the concerns of stakeholders with respect to the edited register and the initial 50% threshold, however, the Committee considers that this needs to be balanced against the provision which could deprive an owner of their asset. Given the significance of this provision, the Committee considers that the proposed threshold is appropriate. However, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government keeps this under review.

Detailed procedural matters (Sections 97K – R)

321. The new sections 97K – R relate to detailed procedural matters. The Committee only comments on those sections where it has a view.

The right to buy same land exercisable by only one Part 3A community body (Section 97K)

322. The new section 97K provides for the situation where more than one Part 3A community body submits an application seeking to buy the same land. Where this occurs, Ministers will decide which application should be allowed to proceed, once they have considered all views and responses related to each application.

323. The Committee considers that Ministers should have the discretion to determine which application should proceed and recommends that the criteria to be considered in coming to a decision should be set out in regulations.

Consent conditions (Section 97L)

324. Section 97L enables Ministers to impose conditions on the consent to an application.

325. The National Trust for Scotland considered that this section should be explicit in stating that the conditions set could include the application of Conservation Agreements or Conservation Burdens with a provision relating to conservation agreements similar to those in the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993 (p.5).488

326. The Committee understands the concerns of the National Trust for Scotland. However, the Committee is of the view that there could be many and varied conditions that could apply to each consented application and that each application and the relevant conditions should be considered on a case by case basis. In that regard, the Committee is not persuaded of the need to specify the range of possible conditions on the face of the Bill or by way of a definitive list in subsequent regulation and considers that this is rightly a matter for Ministerial discretion.

Effect of Ministers' decision on the right to buy (Section 97N)

---

487 Written submission. Fife Community Safety Partnership.
488 Written submission. National Trust for Scotland.
327. This section gives Ministers powers to make regulations prohibiting certain persons from transferring or otherwise dealing with the land in respect of which an application under section 97G has been made. It also provides that Ministers may make regulations to suspend rights over land in respect of which a Part 3A application has been made.

328. The Committee would welcome further information from the Scottish Government on the circumstances under which Ministers envisage suspending rights over land in respect of which a Part 3A application had been made.

Completion of purchase (Section 97Q)

329. The new section 97Q of the 2003 Act deals with conveyancing practicalities relevant to the transfer of land following Ministers giving consent to a Part 3A community body to buy land.

330. The Law Society of Scotland noted that, in its view, this provides an opportunity for Ministers to impose statutory burdens and sought clarity as to what was envisaged. For example, what types of burdens and claw-back provisions should be put in place should the plans of the community body not be implemented?\(^{489}\) Similarly, the Scottish Property Federation questioned what would happen were a community body to fail to deliver the proposed benefit within a reasonable period of time.\(^{490}\)

331. The Committee would welcome further information from the Scottish Government on what is envisaged in terms of burdens and claw-back provisions should the plans of a community body not be implemented. The Committee would also welcome further information on whether the Scottish Government has considered applying a time requirement for implementation of community bodies’ plans and how this would work in practice.

Assessment of the value of land (Section 97S)

332. The new section 97S sets out the procedure for valuation of the land that a Part 3A community body wishes to buy. Ministers must, within seven days, appoint and pay for a qualified, independent, knowledgeable and experienced valuer, who will assess the market value of the land at that point, as well as take into account the views of the Part 3A community body and owner. This must be done within eight weeks of being appointed (unless Ministers specify otherwise).

333. However, unlike the new amendments to section 60 of the 2003 Act, where both the owner and the community body have rights to make comments on the other party’s representations, there appears to be no such right in this case.

334. The Committee received a written submission highlighting that there may be situations in which the valuation has been agreed between the parties but the valuer may not arrive at the same valuation. The submission suggests that this may be an issue should the figure agreed be higher than the valuer’s assessment and public money is being used to finance the acquisition.

---

\(^{489}\) Written submission. Law Society of Scotland.

\(^{490}\) Written submission. Scottish Property Federation.

335. The Committee understands that market value is defined as the sum of the open market value if the sale were between a willing seller and willing buyer, compensation for any depreciation in the value of other land, and interests belonging to the seller as a result of the forced sale. The Committee heard that, in deciding the value of the land, the valuer may take account of the known existence of other potential purchasers with a special interest in the property.

336. The Big Lottery Fund suggested that it would be useful for the community body to have the valuation early, as it could provide the basis for a negotiated settlement with the owner. It would also give an early indication of the amount of funding needed and provide an opportunity for the community body to make early contact with potential funders to gauge the likelihood of funding being made available.

337. The Committee considers that the valuation procedure should ensure that both parties are treated fairly by giving each the opportunity to comment on issues raised in the other’s representations and draw attention to anything inaccurate or potentially misleading. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to provide both the owner and the community body the right to comment on the valuation and other party’s representations.

338. The Committee agrees with the Big Lottery Fund’s suggestion that it would be useful, for a number of reasons, for the community body to have the valuation early and recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and the merit of amending the Bill to this effect at stage 2.

Compensation and grants towards Part 3A community bodies’ liabilities to pay compensation (Sections 97T and 97U)

339. The new sections 97T and 97U are consequential to the main policy in section 97S and relate to further regulations setting out amounts of compensation payable, who is liable, and how this may be claimed. These sections also provide that Ministers may, in certain restricted circumstances, pay a grant to a Part 3A community body to assist it in meeting the compensation it is required to pay. Ministers are, however, not bound to pay a grant even when all the circumstances specified arise.

340. The Development Trusts Association Scotland raised concerns about this section, which provides owners with a right of compensation from the community body stating that this should be limited to situations where the application is approved.

341. The Community Land Advisory Service raised a question in the context of the Part 3 right-to-buy—

---

491 Written submission. Anonymous.
492 Written submission. The Big Lottery Fund.
493 Written submission. Development Trusts Association Scotland.
“...what is to happen where the absolute right-to-buy causes the owner a capital gains tax or corporation tax liability on the price which could have been avoided or reduced had the owner had control over the timing of the sale. I certainly do not think that the community should bear this cost, but equally do not think the owner is being properly compensated for the deprivation if they are left in this position.”

342. The Committee concurs with the view of the Development Trusts Association Scotland that the right of compensation should be limited to situations where the application is approved, and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to clarify the provision in this respect.

343. The Committee shares the concerns of the Community Land Advisory Service in relation to owners’ tax liabilities and the timing of the sale and agrees that the community should not bear this cost. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and clarify the appropriate source of compensation for this deprivation by way of amendment at stage 2.

Appeals (Sections 97V, 97W, 97X, 97Y, 97Z)

344. The new sections 97V, 97W and 97X set out the rights of appeal to the sheriff and the Lands Tribunal, and the right of reference to the Lands Tribunal in relation to decisions made by Ministers, valuations and questions relating to Part 3A applications.

345. Section 97V provides that the landowner, a member of the community to which a Part 3A community body relates and a creditor in a standard security may appeal against the Ministers’ decision to consent to the application. Subsection (2) allows the Part 3A community body to appeal against a decision to refuse an application and, where there is more than one community body wishing to purchase the land, subsection (3) provides that Ministers' decision on which body's application will proceed is final and cannot be appealed.

346. Section 97W sets out the rights of appeal to the Lands Tribunal in connection with the valuation under the new section 97S. The new section 97X sets out rights of appeal to the Lands Tribunal on a question relating to a Part 3A application. The new Section 97Y provides that parties to a Part 3A application are not prevented from settling or agreeing on a matter which is subject to an appeal under sections 97V or 97W between them. The new section 97Z clarifies some matters of interpretation.

347. The Committee has no specific comment to make in relation to appeals. However, the Committee considers that a process of mediation should have been built into the Bill to ensure that effective discussion between a landowner and a community is facilitated. The Committee considers that Ministers should have the powers to facilitate negotiation, and where necessary appoint, and provide financial resources to support, a mediator.

494 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to an appropriate mediation process and include provision for this within the Bill by way of bringing forward amendments at stage 2.

Other issues considered by the Committee

Community use of land

348. The Community Land Advisory Service commented on communities which may have more of an interest in securing the use of land rather than securing ownership at a future date. The Royal Town Planning Institute Scotland suggested that the Bill should consider not only the right-to-buy, but the right to manage as part of the community rights, and provide detail on how this might be facilitated.

349. Brodies LLP suggested that communities could be given the chance to lease property in the first instance to establish whether they could make the property work to pass the test of sustainable development.

350. The Committee was interested to hear the views of stakeholders in relation to land use and the right to manage land and recommends that the Scottish Government consider the scope to include provisions in relation to management rights in this Bill by way of amendment at stage 2 and/or in the forthcoming land reform legislation.

Best value and best public benefit

351. The Committee heard oral evidence that suggested that some local authorities’ interpretation of “best value” (under the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003) might hinder a number of aspects of the proposed legislation.

352. John Mundell, Chief Executive of Inverclyde Council, stated—

“…If we are disposing of assets, we are always required to obtain best value, and that normally means market value, whether we use the district valuer or another mechanism to value assets. That is a key issue, but it is not one that the Bill addresses.”

353. The Royal Town Planning Institute Scotland suggested that there was a need for clarity in the definition of ‘best value’ and ‘best public benefit’ in terms of the disposal of public land. It stated that this should not only be about financial value, but should also take into consideration social, community and environmental aspects, particularly in terms of the transfer of land to community or voluntary organisations.

354. Wendy Reid, of the Development Trusts Association Scotland, stated—

495 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
496 Written submission. Royal Town Planning Institute.
497 Written submission. Brodies LLP.
500 Written submission. Royal Town Planning Institute.
“There is a reason why there has been less movement of other public sector assets into community ownership. According to the Scottish public finance manual, those other public sector bodies have to get the best financial return from assets, whereas local authorities have a bit of dispensation, in that they can dispose of assets at less than market value under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. Communities are very interested in other assets, but up until now, it has been easier to negotiate transfers of local authority assets, because of that flexibility for local authorities to dispose of land at less than best consideration. It would be interesting to see whether the Scottish public finance manual will be reviewed to allow other public sector bodies the same flexibility.”

355. The Committee was concerned to hear in oral evidence that Glasgow City Council had bonded some of its land to Barclays Bank which may mean that it would be difficult to release that land for communities. The Committee was concerned that the same situation might exist in other local authority areas.

356. The Committee explored the issue of best value with the Cabinet Secretary and questioned whether some local authorities might consider the best value of the land they hold to be the financial value that they can obtain rather than value to the community being the number one priority. The Committee notes that if that were to be the case it could be a potential hindrance to some communities that might wish to access local authority land or the land of other public bodies. The Cabinet Secretary stated that as local authorities had the power to dispose of land at lower than market value and could treat the public interest as having a value, the issue should not be an obstacle. The Committee subsequently agreed to write to all local authorities in Scotland to ask for confirmation of their policy and practice in relation to the holding and disposal of their land-holdings. The Committee awaits receipt of all the responses from the local authorities in relation to their policy and practice in relation to the holding and disposal of their land holdings and their approach to best value. Responses received to date are available on the Committee’s website. The Committee will review the responses received and consider what further action it wishes to take.

357. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to what more can be done to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and, the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government identify further measures to address this issue, through a review of the public finance manual, by the inclusion of related provisions within the proposed land reform bill and by the provision of further guidance.

to local authorities in relation to their assets, their considerations of best value, and supporting communities to acquire land.

358. The Committee also recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to an appropriate mechanism, such as the proposed land commission, to adjudicate in cases where there are suggestions that local authorities may be seeking to frustrate local communities. The Committee asks the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on this issue and consider what further amendments could be brought forward at stage 2 to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and the practical impact of the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies.

Provision of support to communities

359. The Committee heard evidence about the importance of providing ongoing support to communities to enable them to take full advantage of the community right to buy provisions. Many stakeholders expressed concerns in relation to those communities most likely to benefit from the provisions (the most affluent) and suggested that more disadvantaged or more marginalised communities could be left behind without investment (including financial support; support to strengthen skills and confidence; knowledge and training; and access to professional advice and support). Many stressed the need for capacity building. The Committee also heard from Susan Carr of the Community Alliance Trust who stated—

“I hear about capacity building all the time, but quite frankly this is not about building capacity; it is about releasing it. That is what really needs to happen. The capacity is there; it is just not released. There are too many barriers for people to get past.”

360. The Plunkett Foundation echoed the views of many when it stated—

“It is critical that communities are properly supported to take advantage of opportunities the Bill presents….Outwith this area (the highlands and islands), in lowland and southern rural Scotland, the support is much more fragmented, and communities face a patchy landscape of advice and signposting. Marginalised and disadvantaged communities will need a lot more support in capacity building and confidence raising to realise the potential opportunities.”

361. The Children’s Wood referred to its experience and suggested that mechanisms should be established to monitor and report on levels of community engagement and report on any difficulties.

362. The Committee understands that the broader issues in relation to empowering communities and capacity building are being considered by the LGR Committee and, on that basis, has sought to limit comment to the difficulties faced by communities and the need for support in relation to the provisions in Part 4 of the Bill.

505 Written submission. Plunkett Foundation.
506 Written submission. The Children’s Wood.
363. The Committee raised concerns about the difficulties communities encounter when faced with issues such as state aid rules, public finance regulations and a range of other matters with the Cabinet Secretary and sought further information on what steps the Scottish Government is taking to put the necessary support in place.

364. The Cabinet Secretary responded by stating—

“... your point about equipping communities with more information about and understanding of the issues is a good one. We have to give much more thought to that. The Land Reform Review Group recommended that we set up a community land agency, and we responded by saying that we will set up a unit in Government, which will look at the issues and work with communities, giving much better advice and operating as a huge support mechanism that facilitates community buyouts. An important function of that new unit will be to explain state aid and the pathway....and I will ensure that it does that.”

365. The Committee questioned the Cabinet Secretary on HIE’s social and land remit and whether the Scottish Government had plans to extend the remit of Scottish Enterprise. The Cabinet Secretary responded by stating that all agencies, including Scottish Enterprise and HIE, must play a role in taking the agenda forward. The Cabinet Secretary also suggested that the Scottish Government should give further thought as to how the social remit should be taken forward outwith the Highlands and Islands.

366. The Committee recognises the difficulties faced by communities in seeking to exercise their right-to-buy and is keen to ensure that appropriate support and funding is available to all communities across Scotland to facilitate meeting their aspirations. The Committee agrees that public sector bodies have an important role in that regard.

367. The Committee is familiar with the role of Highlands and Islands Enterprise in supporting communities to acquire land to date and requests further information on the role that the Scottish Government envisages for Highlands and Islands Enterprise and for Scottish Enterprise in taking the land reform agenda forward. The Committee also asks for the Scottish Government’s view on how best to take forward the social remit outwith the Highlands and Islands.

368. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to establish a community land unit to provide support and advice to communities. The Committee seeks information on how the Scottish Government anticipates the new community land unit will utilise the expertise and interact with the existing unit within Highlands and Islands Enterprise.

---

369. The Committee also requests that further information be provided on the remit and resourcing of the unit; the timescale for its establishment; the location of the unit; the ways in which the unit will work with, and practically support, communities at a local level; and how the work of the unit will be monitored and evaluated.

370. The Committee welcomes confirmation that fresh guidance which takes a more relaxed view of state aid issues has been issued and recommends that the Scottish Government actively promote this guidance to local authorities across Scotland.

Relationship between applications under Part 4 and the Part 5 asset transfer provisions

371. The Community Woodland Association stated that the interaction of Part 3 of the 2003 Act and the asset transfer provision contained in Part 5 of the Bill require to be addressed. Specifically, it questioned whether communities, having failed with an asset transfer request, can then attempt a Part 3A acquisition and, if so, sought clarification as to what the decision-making process would be in cases where Scottish Ministers are the landowner.

372. Having considered the Bill, it does not appear to the Committee that there is any restriction on communities seeking to use the provisions within Part 3 and Part 3A of the 2003 Act, and the part 5 provisions of the Bill; however, the Committee would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government that this is indeed the case. The Committee would also welcome further information from the Scottish Government on the decision-making process where Scottish Ministers or Scottish Government agencies are the landowner.

ISSUES NOT INCLUDED IN THE BILL

Crofting Community Right to Buy (Part 3)

373. Many stakeholders expressed concern in relation to the apparent omission in the Bill of any measures amending Part 3 of the 2003 Act. They stated that they welcomed the correspondence from the Scottish Government responding to the concerns of the LGR Committee and providing notification of its intention to use the Bill to simplify Part 3 of the 2003 Act.

374. The Committee questioned stakeholders on the consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy. Simon Fraser, of Anderson MacArthur, stated—

“The consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy was fine. The suggested changes to part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 have come along pretty late in the day, and it will be essential to ensure that the enhanced community right-to-buy—which, in a way, mirrors the current crofting community right-to-buy—is brought into line with whatever is done to the crofting community right-to-buy as a consequence of the new measures.”

509 Written submission. Community Woodland Association.

375. The Committee considers that it would have been preferable had consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy been undertaken alongside consultation on the existing part 4 provisions and that the amendments to the crofting community right-to-buy had been included in the Bill as introduced, rather than at stage 2. The Committee considers that the introduction of significant new provisions by way of amendments at stage 2 is undesirable in terms of effective parliamentary scrutiny, as the time available at stage 2 to consider new evidence is limited. The Committee would welcome the opportunity of early sight of the proposed Scottish Government draft amendments.

---

INTRODUCTION

1. The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) was introduced on 11 June 2014 by the Scottish Government (“the Government”). As with all bills, it was accompanied by a Financial Memorandum (FM) (page 51 of the Explanatory Notes) which set out the estimated financial implications of the Bill’s provisions.

2. Under Standing Orders Rule 9.6, the lead committee at Stage 1 is required, among other things, to consider and report on the Bill’s FM. In doing so, it is required to consider any views submitted to it by the Finance Committee (“the Committee”).

THE BILL

3. The FM states that the Bill “reflects the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes” and provides a framework which will—

   • empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and
   • support an increase in the pace and scale of public service reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.”

4. The FM states that it sets out the costs associated with the following parts of the Bill—

   • Part 1 places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which builds on the Government’s internationally acclaimed “Scotland Performs” framework.
   • Part 2 places community planning partnerships (CPPs) on a statutory footing and imposes duties on them around the planning and delivery of local outcomes.
   • Part 3 provides a mechanism for communities to have a more proactive role in having their voices heard in how services are planned and delivered.
   • Part 4 amends Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, extending the community right to buy to all of Scotland, and introduces a new Part 3A to that Act to make provision for community bodies to purchase neglected and abandoned land where the owner is not willing to sell that land.
   • Part 5 provides community bodies a right to request to purchase, lease, manage or use land and buildings belonging to local authorities, Scottish public bodies or the Scottish Ministers.
- Part 6 places a statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good and requires local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.

- Part 7 updates and simplifies legislation on allotments. It requires local authorities to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if waiting lists exceed certain trigger points and ensures appropriate protection for local authorities and plot holders.

- Part 8 provides for a new power which will allow councils to create and fund their own localised business rate relief schemes to better reflect local needs and support communities.

5. A table summarising the additional costs expected to arise as a result of the Bill’s provisions is provided on pages 52 to 60 of the FM.

EVIDENCE

6. The Committee received 16 responses to its call for evidence on the FM, around half of which were from local authorities. Responses were also received from organisations including COSLA, Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE), NHS Lothian, The Office of the Scottish Charities Regulator (OSCR), the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency (SEPA), the Scottish Property Federation (SPF) and SportScotland. All written evidence is available on the Committee’s website.

7. The Committee also received a letter dated 3 October 2014 from the Minister for Local Government and Planning (“the Minister”) which provided further financial information with regard to forecasting the use of participation requests and asset transfer requests.

8. The letter highlighted the difficulties the Government and stakeholders had faced in estimating the financial impacts of the Bill, but provided “examples based on current practice to show the level of resource and costs that may be involved in both participation requests and asset transfer requests.”

Issues highlighted in evidence

10. A number of written comments were received in respect of specific aspects of the Bill and their estimated financial impacts as set out in the FM. The Committee then raised a number of these points in its oral evidence session with the Bill Team.

---

511 Letter to Convener from Minister for Local Government and Planning dated 3 October 2014
11. However, several respondents also commented on the possible financial implications of the Bill as a whole and expressed concerns regarding its overall impact on their budgets. Given that some of the Bill’s costs are expected to be demand driven, the Committee notes that the FM does not fully quantify the total estimated financial implications of the Bill.

General Comments

12. A number of general comments about the FM were received with several respondents acknowledging the difficulty in predicting demand. HIE for example, stated that—

“The FM makes a good ‘estimate’ of ‘unit costs’ for aspects of the Bill’s delivery, in many cases providing ranges where those are informative, however, the inability to profile demand take up makes it impractical for the FM to estimate the total costs that might be expected in say the first three years of operation.”

13. Several local authorities, however, foresaw difficulties in meeting the costs of the Bill and called for additional resources from central government. East Lothian Council for example, stated that—

“Local government will incur extra cost as a result of these provisions (which constitute a new legislative burden) and it is not possible to allocate money to these costs from within our budgets without taking it from other activities. We would expect central Government to add to our settlement any money necessary to fulfil the provisions of the Bill.”

14. Glasgow City Council echoed this view stating that likely additional costs on local authorities were not quantified to any reliable extent in the FM due to difficulties in predicting demand and activity. However, it stated “that the costs will be significant and that local authorities will find it challenging to meet these costs from existing resources.”

15. Inverclyde Council also stated that there was “no evidence” to support the FM’s assertion that costs, in many cases, would be minimal and able to be contained within existing budgets. In its view, this was “not the case” and there was no additional fund within the Council to absorb any demand.

16. Similar suggestions that additional resources would be required to implement the Bill’s provisions were made by other respondents including North Lanarkshire Council and North Ayrshire Council which stated that—

“Where costs have been included in the narrative the ranges are sufficiently wide to accommodate a huge amount of uncertainty. However in other sections there is no mention of costs but it does mention there will

---

512 Highland and Islands Enterprise, written submission
513 East Lothian Council, written submission
514 Glasgow City Council, written submission
515 Inverclyde Council, written submission be additional costs incurred. The implication is that the additional costs will be minimal but there is uncertainty that is not addressed in the bill."

17. However, North Ayrshire Council also stated that "in the main the council was in agreement with the financial implications contained in the Bill."

18. COSLA also acknowledged the difficulties in quantifying demand—

"it is difficult to anticipate the uptake and demand that will be placed upon Local Authorities. This makes it very difficult to quantify the financial cost that will be placed upon local government in complying with the legislation and indeed the Financial Memorandum makes no attempt to quantify a cost for these areas of the proposed legislation…

COSLA seeks reassurance that further work be undertaken to better quantify these costs before the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill is passed."\(^{517}\)

19. When asked about the work it had undertaken to attempt to anticipate demand and to ensure local authorities are adequately resourced to effectively deliver the Bill's measures, the Bill Team explained that work had been undertaken prior to publication of the Bill. However, it stated that "little financial information and cost information was provided by others" in response to its consultations and it had "found it difficult to amass information on how the legislation might be used" meaning that "it was difficult to consider what demand might be."\(^{518}\)

20. The Bill Team explained that, as communities are not homogenous and will have different priorities and needs which could not be amalgamated into a single demand profile, it "will be hard to predict what communities will do." It further pointed out that "no one else has been able to do it either."\(^{519}\)

21. In response to concerns expressed by the Committee that the Bill might raise expectations where there was insufficient support available to meet them, the Bill Team explained that, the Government had a general convention that it would provide additional funding where new costs had arisen from legislation. However—

"The difficulty with the bill is that we cannot quantify that funding at the moment. That additional funding would need to be demonstrated and quantified through practice. That would happen through the normal processes and the funding would be provided in that way."\(^{520}\)

22. When questioned about how the funding mechanism would work, given the impossibility of estimating figures, the Bill Team replied—

\(^{516}\) North Ayrshire Council, written submission

\(^{517}\) COSLA, written submission

\(^{518}\) Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 48

\(^{519}\) Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 48

\(^{520}\) Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 49
“We cannot say at this time. If local authorities can demonstrate and quantify what the new duties in the bill have cost them, that will be part of the on-going process of local authority settlements.”\(^{521}\)

23. Given that the Bill was expected to take effect during financial year 2015-16 and the draft budget for that year was expected to be published imminently, the Committee asked how much would be set aside to cover the costs of the Bill’s provisions. In response the Bill Team stated—

“We are not anticipating any particular financial burden in 2015-16. COSLA is right to say that it will not be overly onerous and therefore could be encapsulated within current resources. However, we recognise that additional funding might be required in the future.”\(^{522}\)

24. When it was pointed out that COSLA’s position appeared to be that whilst the costs of the Bill’s individual elements might not be overly onerous, overall costs had the potential to be so, the Bill Team acknowledged this point but stated that it did not agree that overall costs had the potential to be significant. It confirmed that it believed that—

“the cost can be managed within current resources, with some addition if the demand is more than local authorities can cope with.”\(^{523}\)

25. In the event that costs did turn out to be greater than expected as a direct consequence of the Bill, The Bill Team confirmed that—

“That would be part of the normal discussions with local authorities through the annual budgeting process. Local authorities would have to demonstrate and quantify what was involved and then go into discussions with the Scottish Government”\(^{524}\)

26. However, the Bill Team further stated that it would be for the Minister for Local Government and Planning to respond more fully to this question.

27. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarity from the Minister regarding whether and by what mechanism additional funding will be made available for local authorities should they incur significant additional costs as a result of the Bill.

28. With particular regard to Parts 3 and 5 of the Bill, the lead committee may wish to explore the issue of how the Government can be confident that any additional costs can be managed within current resources, given that costs are expected to be demand driven.

29. In response to questions from the Committee about whether there was a risk that, had the FM presented more concrete estimates of potential demand and costs, these might have been seen as “an upper limit for how much could be done”, the Bill Team agreed—

\(^{521}\) Scottish Parliament Finance Committee. Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 54

“Absolutely: demand will be led by communities, so we cannot work in that way. If we set a limit, that will confine the process and box it in.” 525

30. Expanding on this point, the Bill Team explained that it did not wish to set a benchmark as “we want the legislation to be successful and we want as many communities as possible to use it—it is for the communities to use and not for us to tell them to use it.” 526

31. Towards the end of the evidence session, the Committee drew attention to Standing Orders rule 9.3.2 which states that—

“A Bill shall on introduction be accompanied by a Financial Memorandum which shall set out the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, best estimates of the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise, and an indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.” 527

32. When asked whether the FM met these criteria, The Bill Team explained—

“We attempted to include costs in the financial memorandum in a number of places where we believed that we could actually indicate what the costs will be. In some areas, we know that the costs under the current provisions are fairly low, for example, and we therefore have an idea of what the costs may be in the future.

We express a caveat a number of times about the margins of uncertainty, because to attempt to state what the bill might cost in future would be unreasonable and potentially misleading.” 528

33. Following the oral evidence session the Convener wrote to the Minister 529 seeking an explanation of how the FM met the requirements of Standing Orders and also of the Scottish Government’s own guidance on Financial Memoranda (SG 2009/1). 530

34. The Committee received a letter from the Minister dated 24 October 531 which confirmed his view that the FM did meet the requirements of Standing Orders and had been conducted in line with the Government’s guidance.

525 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 52
526 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 52
527 Standing Orders of the Scottish Parliament
528 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 58
529 Letter from Convener to Minister for Local Government and Planning dated 14 October 2014
530 Scottish Government Guidance Note 2009/01: Financial Memoranda that accompany Scottish Government Bills
531 Letter from Minister for Local Government and Planning to Convener of Finance Committee dated 24 October 2014
35. The letter highlighted the work that had been undertaken with stakeholders in order to estimate unit costs and noted that the FM had provided examples of costs arising from similar processes—

“Thus the FM and the additional information supplied contains the full range of financial information that can be made available with certainty in relation to this Bill.”

36. However, the letter also stated that “the FM cannot estimate the level of demand for asset transfer or participation requests, and consequently does not provide ranges for the total potential costs of these provisions.” This, the Minister explained, was intended to avoid giving a flawed figure as the variables inherent to the Bill in terms of “the number of requests, their complexity and their distribution over time” “would make a specific figure or range far too questionable.”

37. Therefore, the letter concluded—

“the information provided is clearly the best estimate that can be provided of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, the best estimate of the timescales over which such costs would arise and has given a very clear indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.”

38. The Committee acknowledges the difficulties faced in quantifying potential future costs arising from services that will be demand driven. However, the Committee remains concerned that, despite the requirements of Standing Orders, best estimates have not been fully provided.

39. The Committee invites the lead committee to ask the Minister what plans are in place to ensure that any costs arising from the Bill will be monitored on an ongoing basis. It also invites the lead committee to seek clarity regarding the funding mechanism by which resources will be made available to local authorities in the event that such costs prove to be significant.

Part 2: Community Planning

40. The FM states that the Bill seeks to strengthen CPPs by placing new duties on public sector partners “to play a full and active role in community planning and the resourcing and delivery of local priority outcomes.” It explains that some of these bodies are already statutory community planning partners, whilst others are not, although in practice they “frequently participate in community planning.”

41. The FM states that “for those public bodies which are complying with national and local action already underway at policy level to strengthen community planning it is anticipated that the provisions will impose either no or minor costs” (such as costs relating to travel or staff time).

42. Similarly, the FM states that “for those local authorities which are complying with national and local action already underway at policy level to strengthen community planning, it is anticipated that the provisions will impose either no or minor additional indirect costs, in terms of commitment by senior officers and elected members.”

43. COSLA’s written submission agreed that any additional costs arising from this part of the Bill “would appear to be minimal.”

44. SEPA expressed surprise that it had been designated as a public body for community planning and expressed concerns about “false expectations that SEPA will fully engage with all CPPs in Scotland” stating that this would be “highly resource intensive and not cost neutral”, especially if it did not “have the flexibility to tailor our engagement with different CPPs, and to deploy our limited resource where we can add the most value.”

45. The Bill Team confirmed that SEPA would be a partner to the 32 CPPs across Scotland, but pointed out that the Bill did not stipulate what the level of engagement with each CPP should be. Therefore, “how SEPA engages will be flexible and will be decided in collaboration with CPP partners, so we do not necessarily see the same resource issues as SEPA does.”

Part 3: Participation Requests

46. The FM states that the Bill will enable community bodies to seek to participate, along with a public body, in a process to improve the outcome of a service delivered by that public body. Public bodies will only be able to decline a request for dialogue where there are “reasonable grounds” to do so and will be required to publish a report at the end of the process.

47. The FM acknowledges that public bodies (including local authorities) are likely to incur costs in responding to participation requests. However, it provides no estimates of what these potential costs might be, stating that “the costs will depend on how often community participation bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland.”

48. Expanding on this point in oral evidence, the Bill Team gave the example of one local authority area where demand for participation requests might be very low as the public authorities were already excelling in public engagement and participation as opposed to another area which might have low demand as a result of lack of capacity in the community. This scenario, it suggested, highlighted the difficulties in attempting to estimate the demand profile across Scotland.

49. The Bill Team also suggested that demand might increase over time as communities became increasingly aware of their new rights—

“When people see such requests being used, they might catch on. If people see them having an impact in their local area, demand may

---

532 COSLA, written submission
533 Scottish Environmental Protection Agency, written submission
534 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 50
increase from that. It all depends on what communities want to do and how they want to use the provisions.\textsuperscript{535}

50. In response to questioning as to why other FMIs previously scrutinised by the Committee where costs were also expected to be demand driven had set out approximate upper and lower limits, albeit with appropriate caveats, yet this one did not, the Bill Team explained that any such ranges would “be too large to be considered worthwhile.” Levels of demand, it stated, would only be seen when the Bill took effect.\textsuperscript{536}

51. Expanding on this, the Bill Team continued—

“There are too many variables to factor into what would be a reasonable demand profile, or a reasonable idea of how many requests could come forward. We have gone back to what the unit cost might be and, as COSLA says, it is not overly onerous.”\textsuperscript{537}

52. When asked to give an example of a piece of previous legislation for which the costs had been similarly unquantifiable the Bill Team confirmed that it had looked but had been unable to find a similar example.

53. The letter from the Minister dated 24 October explained that “there is no existing community-led mechanism comparable to participation requests on which to base estimates of demand” and highlighted the uncertainties over uptake of participation requests and the work required to respond to them.\textsuperscript{538}

54. The Committee acknowledges the difficulty in providing concrete estimates of services that will be demand driven but emphasises that Standing Orders require FMIs to provide best estimates of costs, their timescales and margins of uncertainty.

55. The FM also states that public bodies (including local authorities) will incur costs in relation to the provision of an outcome improvement process, although again, no estimates are provided. Two examples of the costs incurred by a local authority in relation to community engagement events (ranging from £1,100 to £41,000) are provided with the FM stating that they mainly related to staffing costs.

56. HIE agreed that there were “inevitable uncertainties” associated with the extent to which communities would seek to utilise the opportunities presented by the Bill, but anticipated that communities in its area would wish to engage strongly and utilise the new powers conferred by it. However, with regard to participation requests it expected that it would be able to absorb them “to a large extent within the costs of staff time currently devoted to on-going business improvement activities.”\textsuperscript{539}

\textsuperscript{537} Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 8 October 2014, Col 54
\textsuperscript{538} Letter from Minister for Local Government and Planning to Convener of Finance Committee dated 24 October 2014
\textsuperscript{539} Highland and Islands Enterprise, written submission

175
57. COSLA’s submission drew parallels between the potential impact of participation requests and that of the existing Freedom of Information laws and expressed concerns about the associated administrative burden. However, the Bill Team stated that the Bill was not directly comparable to the Freedom of Information Act 2000 as it applied to everyone whilst participation requests would only apply to community bodies which met the criteria set out by the Bill. Furthermore, any such requests would then be assessed against certain criteria meaning that demand would be more limited.

Capacity Building
58. A number of respondents raised the topic of “capacity building” in community bodies with NHS Lothian, for example, suggesting that the FM’s costs were “arguably understated” and noting that its original consultation response had stated that—

“community bodies may not possess the relevant skills, experience or knowledge to allow them to be meaningfully or effectively involved. Public service authorities would therefore need to consider how they could provide support for capacity building. This could add pressure to public service authorities from an already under-resourced position… There does not seem to be consideration in the bill that addresses the inevitable financial and capacity implications of participation for community bodies in the improvement process.”

59. NHS Lothian also drew attention to the impact of the Bill in terms of tackling inequalities in Scotland, stating that—

“there needs to be specific regard made to what support infrastructures are in place to empower our less equipped communities, if not, the bill will further increase the inequalities gap between communities, some of whom are well equipped and able to articulate their needs while some will struggle to be heard/access this empowerment opportunity.

Without appropriate support and investment in community empowerment the key components of the Bill will not be fairly accessible to communities (both geographic or communities of interest).”

60. East Lothian Council stated that, in order to assist community groups to develop the capacity to take on the opportunities and challenges represented by the Bill, appropriate consideration should be given to the provision of adequate resources nationally “rather than assuming that local authorities will be able to find the resources from current spending allocations.”

61. This view was echoed by South Lanarkshire Council, which suggested that additional resource was required to establish appropriate structures and to support CPPs in maximising the Bill’s impact.

540 NHS Lothian, written submission
541 NHS Lothian, written submission
542 East Lothian Council, written submission
62. However, the Bill Team stated in oral evidence, that whilst it agreed that “communities are not necessarily on a level playing field”, it did not believe that this was a matter for the Bill. Whilst the Bill provided a legal framework for such requests, support for capacity building in community bodies was provided through different avenues such as the Strengthening Communities Fund announced in April.\(^{543}\)

63. South Lanarkshire Council also sought clarification of the definition of a community body, questioning whether such bodies were “restricted locally” or whether national organisations were also covered by the provisions. In the event that the latter was the case, it suggested it could be left open to “vast quantities of requests” leading to substantial costs which it was not resourced to deal with. It also expressed concerns that it could face further substantial costs if the outcome of the improvement process was that it had to “markedly change the way in which it sets its priorities and delivers services.”\(^{544}\)

64. The Explanatory Notes state that—

“There are no restrictions on how a community may be defined for this purpose: it may be based, for example, on geographical boundaries, common interests, or shared characteristics of its members (such as ethnic background, disability, religion, etc.).

65. The lead committee may wish to invite the Minister to respond to the concerns raised by South Lanarkshire Council regarding the definition of a community body.

66. Fife Council also suggested that consideration might need to be given to levels of staffing needed to take on the organisation, assessment, and administration of additional requests from community groups. Whilst acknowledging that any investment in additional staffing might not be significant in terms of its overall budget, it noted that specific services such as Community Learning and Development were already under pressure as a result of having to respond to requests from local groups.\(^{545}\)

67. The letter from the Minister dated 3 October provided examples showing that the overall costs for participation and engagement events could vary depending on the issues being looked at. It suggested that this was also likely to be the case with regard to participation requests and on this basis, estimated that costs per request could range between £1,000 and £7,500 “in most cases”. Therefore, should there be 100 participation requests across Scotland, the total cost could be expected to be between £100,000 and £750,000.\(^{546}\)

Part 4: Community Right to Buy Land

68. The FM states that the Bill makes changes to community right to buy (CRTB) in order “to make the process easier and more flexible for communities while

\(^{543}\) Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 49
\(^{544}\) South Lanarkshire Council, written submission
\(^{545}\) Fife Council, written submission
\(^{546}\) Letter to Convener from Minister for Local Government and Planning dated 3 October 2014
continuing to strike a fair balance between the rights of communities and landowners.” The FM further states that the Bill extends the right to buy to all of Scotland and removes the power of Ministers to designate “excluded land”.

69. Whilst the FM acknowledges that these changes could be expected to lead to more communities taking up the right to buy, it states that “it is not possible at this stage to accurately estimate the demand and how many new applications may be received.”

70. HIE agreed that it was difficult to quantify the likely increase in demand, but suggested that the extension of the right was “likely to generate significantly more CRTB applications” than anticipated with the attendant increase in costs to the Government. Whilst the FM does not make concrete predictions of the likely increase in CRTB applications, it provides examples on the basis of increases of five and ten additional applications per year which HIE suggests is “on the conservative side”, particularly given the extension of the provisions to urban communities. This point was echoed by the SPF which questioned whether this assumption could “remain credible.”

71. The Bill Team agreed that HIE could expect more work as a result of the Bill, but stated that it would have “a certain amount of flexibility” in how it assisted communities. When communities come to HIE, it suggested that —

“the process will not be about engagement and consultation through HIE’s mechanisms; it will be about what the communities want to do.”

72. The Committee acknowledges that bodies such as HIE will have some flexibility in how they deal with increased volumes of CRTB applications. However, the lead committee may wish to seek further clarity over what support might be put in place for such bodies in the event that demand exceeds expectations.

73. Glasgow City Council stated that the FM “wrongly suggests that there are no financial implications for local authorities in relation to right to buy.” It expected costs to arise as a result of the council “putting a process in place and of utilising resource from a range of services in order to enable a response to be made within a very short timescale” where the request relates to its land or that of an Arms Length External Organisation. It also raised the issue of possible financial implications “in the circumstance where the proposed acquisition may deal with a short term issue but is not aligned to the Council’s longer term strategy.”

74. The SPF also suggested that the Bill might result in costs relating to events that did not happen or were delayed as a result of CRTB, for example where funding or investment was available for a limited time only and financial losses might be incurred as a result of delays resulting from CRTB applications.

75. Expanding on this point the SPF stated that its main concern was—

---

547 Highland and Islands Enterprise, written submission
548 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 51
549 Glasgow City Council, written submission
“that the enhanced scope of CRTB and by extension asset transfer may inhibit larger scale and complicated investment in development land in a manner that has not hitherto been an issue under the existing CRTB rights.”

76. However, the Bill Team rejected this suggestion, explaining that similar concerns had been expressed during the passage of the Land Reform (Scotland) Bill, but they had not come to fruition. It further explained that in the event that community applications were made with the intention of inhibiting large-scale projects, it was unlikely that they would meet the public interest case set out in the Bill.

77. When asked whether it was correct that “the community land fund was established with a finger in the air to make a judgment, because nobody knew how many communities would apply or register interest in land” the Bill Team confirmed that it understood that to have been the case, although it did not know how the figure was arrived at.

78. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarification of how the community land fund’s budget was arrived at and to consider what parallels can be drawn between it and funding for CRTB in the context of the Bill.

79. A further point raised by the SPF was the lack of a clear explanation of how the expansion of CRTB inter-relates with the Government’s guidance on what is known as “the Crichel Down rules” and the potential for costs in the event of a challenge under them. It explained that—

“This is where land has been compulsorily purchased by a public authority but is then surplus and subject to disposal by the public authority in question. In these circumstances it is government policy for the previous owner to have right of first refusal. We do not see any assessment of the costs of ensuring this guidance is followed or indeed, provision made for where challenges might be made by former owners to the (erroneous) sale of properties to CRTB.”

80. The lead committee may wish to seek clarification of how the expansion of CRTB might interact with “the Crichel Down Rules”.

81. The SPF also questioned whether NDPBs such as Historic Environment Scotland would “no longer have the same level of protection under the Bill as had been previously envisaged when they were an Agency of Government”, suggesting that were this to be the case, there could be significant financial implications for its estate and for those of other public bodies.

82. A final point raised by the SPF related to what might happen in the event that a community body—

---

Scottish Property Federation, written submission
Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 56
Scottish Property Federation, written submission
“Successfully purchases via CRTB from, for example, a public sector authority but then two or three years later finds it is unable to continue to hold the property and needs to sell the asset on but is unable to. A public authority may well be obliged to resume ownership and we do not see that this has been factored into the financial implications of CRTB or asset transfer.”

83. SportScotland expressed concerns in the context of its duties under funding rules stating—

“We would not wish to see liabilities handed to community groups who then need to seek financial or other support from national organisations such as ours which funding rules do not allow us to give. As a distributor of National Lottery resources, continuing to invest in line with national guidance, we are required to ensure we protect the additionality principle. This means lottery investment adds to, and does not replace, other funding sources, achieving additional impact to what otherwise would have been achieved. Furthermore, our standard terms and conditions attached to awards state that lottery monies must be used for the purpose set out in the approved application and are non-transferable. Any proposed disposal of assets wholly or partially acquired, restored, conserved or improved through lottery (or Scottish Government funding) cannot be progressed without first giving us written notification and we are satisfied that full market value is being sought.”

84. The lead committee may wish to seek clarification of how rules relating to lottery funding might impact on CRTB.

Part 5: Asset Transfer Requests

85. The FM states that the Bill seeks to increase the amount of asset transfers from public bodies to community bodies by allowing such bodies to identify for themselves what they wish to achieve and the assets that they wish to acquire. It notes that the service which supports asset transfers was involved in 38 asset transfers from 2011 to 2014 but states that it cannot accurately predict future demand post-implementation.

86. The FM also states that the Government and/or local authority may decide to transfer an asset at lower than its market value following a full cost/benefit analysis which would include predicted future savings.

87. In respect of the Scottish administration and public bodies, the FM states that “the costs of these provisions will depend on the arrangements put in place and any additional costs will be met from existing resources.”

88. The FM provides no estimate of the financial impact of these provisions on local authorities stating that they “were not able to provide monetary estimates for any costs and savings that may arise.” It explains that this was in part due to the

553 Scottish Property Federation, written submission
554 SportScotland written submission difficulty of predicting the number and variety of requests as well as the “complexity in predicting savings associated with better service provision.”

89. As with participation requests, the Bill Team explained that there were too many variables in terms of potential demand to quantify the potential volumes of asset transfers—

“As we go forward, we will see what the bill involves, but we cannot give the committee a definite figure for how much it might be used.”

90. East Lothian Council estimated that it would require an additional full-time post costing around £40,000 per annum due to increased workloads arising from asset transfer requests. This additional work would include dealing with enquiries, the provision of detailed information, responding to and processing asset requests, preparing reports and valuations, responding to appeals, and providing plans and information. District Valuer valuations were also estimated to lead to fees of around £5,000 per annum.

91. East Lothian Council also estimated that its legal team could incur costs of between £400 and £1,200 per transaction and that it could spend around £500 each year in dealing with reviews (estimated at four per year).

92. The letter from the Minister dated 3 October provided further information on the possible costs of dealing with asset transfer requests. In addition to the estimates provided by East Lothian Council, the letter also highlights figures from the Forestry Commission Scotland which indicate that it currently incurs costs of between £7,500 and £12,500 per asset transfer under its National Forest Land Scheme which enables communities to buy or lease Forestry Commission land.

93. The letter also provided a breakdown of the potential costs to community bodies undertaking an asset transfer. This states that “the estimate for community transfer bodies to obtain agreement to transfer is between £13,480 and £25,040.”

94. With regard to overall costs, the Minister’s letter dated 24 October explained that “any estimate or range would be inherently flawed” as a result of uncertainties relating to the complexity of requests and demand over time.

95. East Lothian Council also drew attention to councils’ duty to secure best value in their activities and to maximise the use of their assets. It pointed out that—

“It may not necessarily be in the best interests of the community as a whole to transfer a surplus building to a community group on request. The community as a whole may be better-served by attracting an economic use of such a building. In other words, there might be both economic and

---

Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 54

East Lothian Council, written submission

Letter to Convener from Minister for Local Government and Planning dated 3 October 2014

Letter from Minister for Local Government and Planning to Convener of Finance Committee dated 24 October 2014 community wellbeing justification in seeking interest from the market to see if we could attract an economic use which would increase footfall and employment in the local area.\footnote{East Lothian Council, written submission}

96. Fife Council agreed that it was “difficult to estimate savings, especially if assets are being disposed at less than market value (as has been the case in transfers to community organisations).” With regard to potential costs it stated that—

“Local Councils may need to develop a cross Service team with a suitable skill mix to fully implement and manage any programme of transfer of assets. There is also an unknown potential cost to Councils as they will require to be reactive to communities’ aspirations. In addition to suitable community work expertise to engage with local organisations, legal, financial and property management skills may be required.”\footnote{Fife Council, written submission}

97. However, Fife Council did confirm that it did not expect these costs to be prohibitive in terms of implementing the Bill.

98. South Lanarkshire Council also noted that it could incur costs relating to asset transfers where it had to retain a property off market while the process was ongoing. These could include costs in relation to empty property rates, insurance, security, utility bills, repairs and maintenance. Noting that it could also lose income where the community body sought a reduction in price or rent (which it stated could be expected “in most cases”), it also drew attention to its responsibility to ensure that any such reduction was “clearly set against community benefits.”\footnote{South Lanarkshire Council, written submission}

99. NHS Lothian echoed these concerns stating—

“The longer and more complex the disposal process becomes, the greater the cost to the public sector body. Non-domestic rates will be incurred, security costs will have to be paid and the potential for deterioration and vandalism increases.”\footnote{NHS Lothian, written submission}

100. In addition to these costs, NHS Lothian shared the views of East Lothian Council, suggesting that “the increased complexity and more onerous process may necessitate additional staff resources and a greater demand for consultancy services” as well as costs relating to legal fees and the valuation of assets.

101. In terms of potential savings, South Lanarkshire Council acknowledged that these were more difficult to identify as they would depend on the specific proposal. It stated that savings could be made if the alternative to asset transfer was demolition or if maintenance and operational costs were to be borne by the community organisation. However, it also pointed out that these savings could also be achieved through a sale or lease on the open market.\footnote{South Lanarkshire Council, written submission}
102. COSLA’s submission stated—

“Very little information on the potential cost savings have been outlined, as again this will be demand driven and COSLA is concerned that these savings may have been overstated. COSLA would welcome clarity around this area of the Financial Memorandum.”

103. The Committee invites the lead committee to ask the Minister to respond to COSLA’s request for further clarity in this area.

104. NHS Lothian drew attention to anecdotal evidence that local authorities might regard the transfer of assets to community groups as a cost saving exercise and expressed concerns that such groups might not have “the funds nor the capacity to maintain these areas once a lease has been drawn up.”

105. It also expressed concerns that public bodies could incur losses as a result of the Bill—

“There may be potential costs to public service bodies as a result of land not necessarily being disposed of at true market value. Public bodies may bear a cost if they are not properly financially compensated for any asset transfers under Part 5 of the Bill. The Bill does not appear to require public bodies to be compensated for asset transfers.”

Part 6 – Common Good Property

106. The FM states that as of 31 March 2011, local authorities managed common good assets valued at £219 million. It explains that the Bill seeks to improve transparency around such assets and to increase community involvement in decisions regarding their identification, use and disposal.

107. To this end, the Bill will require local authorities to establish and maintain a register of common good assets and to invite community groups to comment on it in draft form.

108. Fife Council pointed out that the Bill does not amend the law of common good to allow local authorities to use certain categories of common good land for other purposes such as building new schools. It went on to suggest that this might have unintended financial consequences for local authorities as it would reduce their options for using their land. This, it suggested, could force councils to “acquire land from third parties at cost rather than making best use of existing resources.”

Part 7 – Allotments

109. The Bill replaces existing legislation relating to allotments, “updating and clarifying” the requirements on local authorities.

---

564 COSLA, written submission
565 NHS Lothian, written submission
566 Fife Council, written submission
110. Local authorities will be required to provide more allotments when certain trigger points are reached in relation to numbers on a waiting list.

111. The FM states that local authority costs “will be dependent on how much provision is required to meet their targets, how much provision is actually possible due to land availability and costs, and factors such as the local cost of land and whether road access, toilets etc. need to be created.” It also states that estimates provided by some local authorities indicate a cost ranging from £1,900 to £6,250 per plot and from £21,000 to £150,000 for a whole site. The FM states that demand is variable, with some local authorities facing substantial demand whilst others would need no more plots to meet this target.

112. North Ayrshire Council, however, stated that its response to a recent COSLA consultation had indicated an upper limit of £250,000 for a whole site.\textsuperscript{567}

113. South Lanarkshire Council drew attention to the right of the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the size of allotments, which it stated would—

“clearly impact on the cost to the Council since a prescribed size will mean that the Council will have to consider this when acquiring land. Clearly, the larger an allotment is the greater the cost to the Council.”\textsuperscript{568}

114. Whilst Glasgow City Council pointed out that—

“Specific costs are noted for the aspects of the Bill relating to allotments but this focuses on the administrative costs as opposed to the capital investment costs. The council believes that the capital investment costs would be significant.”\textsuperscript{569}

115. COSLA also suggested that significant financial implications could arise for local authorities as a result of the development of new allotments, “in particular, where this includes the provision of roads for access and facilities such as toilets and access to water on site” and expressed concerns that the costs of site maintenance and utility bills had not been considered in the FM.\textsuperscript{570}

116. In oral evidence, the Bill Team agreed that costs in relation to allotments would be “dependent on existing provision and demand” but explained that the FM’s figures were based on information provided by “the 15 out of 32 local authorities that responded” to its consultation.\textsuperscript{571}

117. The Minister’s letter dated 24 October confirmed that—

\textsuperscript{567} North Ayrshire Council, written submission
\textsuperscript{568} South Lanarkshire Council, written submission
\textsuperscript{569} Glasgow City Council, written submission
\textsuperscript{570} COSLA, written submission
\textsuperscript{571} Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 48
“the costs associated with the allotments provisions will depend on the amount of provision already in place compared with any unmet demand, as well as the local cost and availability of land.”\textsuperscript{572}

118. However, it went on to state that “the figures provided by local authorities provide some examples but do not allow robust national estimates to be constructed.”

119. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarification as to whether additional resources will be made available to any local authorities which incur significant additional costs as a result of the duty to provide additional allotments.

Part 8 – Non-Domestic Rates

120. The FM states that, in effect, this provision allows local authorities “to create localised relief schemes to respond to local needs and demands.” Any such discretionary reliefs awarded by a local authority must be funded from within that authority’s existing resources and not at the expense of the [Government’s central NDRI] pool.”

121. The Bill does not give local authorities equivalent powers to levy any additional rates.

122. Fife Council stated that “in effect it proposes the establishment of localised relief schemes which could be used to help incentivise development and investment in areas deemed appropriate by the local authority.”\textsuperscript{573}

123. However, Fife Council also noted that whilst this could create opportunity, it could also lead to additional costs in terms of administration costs and the loss of income arising from the reliefs themselves. It further pointed out that the Bill explicitly prevented local authorities from raising NDR in other areas to compensate for any loss of income.

124. East Lothian Council stated that any reliefs would have to be funded by savings elsewhere and would ultimately be borne by council tax payers. It further suggested that the Bill could be expected to lead to a marked increase in applications for NDR relief and related disputes and in their complexity which would inevitably impact on its workload. This additional work, it suggested, could lead to a reduction in the collection of NDR as the absorbing of the additional workload could leave its Business Rates Team with fewer resources to target poor payers.

125. East Lothian Council did acknowledge that longer-term financial benefits could result from the targeted use of reliefs to stimulate economic growth in certain

\textsuperscript{572}Letter from Minister for Local Government and Planning to Convener of Finance Committee dated 24 October 2014
\textsuperscript{573}Fife Council, written submission areas, but stated that in the short-term, it would “be costly in a time of monetary constraint as we would be funding any reduction.”

126. North Lanarkshire Council also suggested that “the new localised relief scheme has the potential to benefit larger/Council Tax rich local authorities at the expense of other local authorities.”

127. The SPF raised the issue of whether local authorities might seek to spread the costs of NDR relief among local landlords and expressed the hope that central government would provide some financial support for the policy.

CONCLUSION

128. The lead committee is invited to consider this report as part of its scrutiny of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill’s FM.
ANNEXE C: DELEGATED POWERS AND LAW REFORM COMMITTEE REPORT ON THE COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

1. At its meetings on 19 August, 30 September, 28 October and 4 November the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) at Stage 1. The Committee submits this report to the lead committee for the Bill under Rule 9.6.2 of Standing Orders.

OVERVIEW OF BILL

2. This Government Bill was introduced by John Swinney MSP on 11 June 2014. The lead Committee is the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. The Bill makes wide-ranging provision in relation to various types of community body and their rights. It is divided into 9 parts.

3. Part 1 places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, to be reviewed every 5 years. Public authorities are to have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out their functions, as are all persons carrying out functions of a public nature. The Scottish Ministers are obliged to prepare and publish reports about the extent to which the national outcomes have been achieved.

4. Part 2 concerns community planning. Section 4(1) provides that local authorities, the bodies listed in schedule 1 of the Bill and community bodies must participate with each other in community planning. ‘Community planning’ is defined as planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes in relation to the area of a local authority resulting from, or contributed to by, the provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the local authority or the persons listed in schedule 1 to the Bill. Schedule 1 lists bodies such as National Park authorities, Scottish Enterprise and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.

5. Part 2 of the Bill also makes provision in relation to local outcomes improvement plans. These are plans prepared and published by community planning partnerships setting out local outcomes to which the partnership must give priority with a view to improving the achievement of the outcome, as well as a description of the proposed improvement action and the time period within which the improvement is to be achieved. The local outcomes improvement plan is to be kept under review by the community planning partnership.

6. Part 3 of the Bill relates to participation requests. A participation request is a request made by a community controlled body to a public authority to permit the body to participate in an outcome improvement process. In making a request, the community body must set out details of any knowledge, expertise and experience.

577 Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill [as introduced] available here: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/Community%20Empowerment%20(Scotland)%20Bill/b52s4-introd.pdf
the body has in relation to the specified outcome. The Bill also sets out the process to be followed by an authority where it receives a participation request.

7. Part 4 of the Bill does two things. Firstly, sections 27-47 make amendments to Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 ("the 2003 Act"). The principal amendment is an extension of the community right to buy (currently available in respect of rural land only) to all land in Scotland. Sections 27-47 of the Bill also make various other changes to Part 2 of the 2003 Act so as to improve the working of those provisions.

8. Secondly, Part 4 creates a new community right to buy in respect of abandoned or neglected land. Section 48 of the Bill introduces a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act. The provisions set up a process whereby community bodies may apply to the Scottish Ministers to exercise their right to buy land which is abandoned or neglected. The new right to buy differs from the existing rights in Part 2 of the 2003 Act in one important respect, which is that the right to buy abandoned or neglected land may be exercised in circumstances where the owner of the land does not wish to sell.

9. Part 5 of the Bill relates to asset transfer requests. An asset transfer request is a request made by a community controlled body to a 'relevant authority' which seeks permission to buy, lease or otherwise acquire rights in respect of property owned by that relevant authority. A 'relevant authority' is a body listed in schedule 3 to the Bill, and includes local authorities, the Scottish Ministers, SEPA and the Scottish Court Service. Part 5 sets out the requirements to be met by a community body before it can make a request, the process to be followed in making a request and the rights of appeal that are available in the event that a request is refused.

10. Part 6 of the Bill relates to common good property. "Common good" refers to assets originally acquired from former burghs to which local authorities have taken title. The Bill requires each local authority to establish and maintain a common good register which must be available to members of the public for inspection. The Bill also imposes requirements on local authorities to publish details of any decision it proposes to take to dispose of common good assets or to change their use. The authority is required to have regard to any representations it receives in relation to the proposed disposal of common good assets.

11. Part 7 of the Bill concerns allotments. It replaces the provisions of the Allotments (Scotland) Acts of 1892, 1922 and 1950 which are repealed in their entirety. The Bill also repeals some provisions of the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919. The Bill creates a new definition of 'allotment' and 'allotment site', and it places a duty on local authorities to hold and maintain waiting lists for allotments and to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if the waiting list exceeds key trigger points. The Bill creates compensation rights in favour of tenants of allotments for disturbance, deterioration of an allotment site or loss of crops.

to grant localised relief from business rates. Any relief granted is to form part of a relief scheme which is funded by the authority. Before creating such a scheme, the authority is required to have regard to the interests of persons liable to pay council tax which is set by that authority.

DELEGATED POWERS

14. The Scottish Government provided the Parliament with a memorandum on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill (“the DPM”). Due to the volume of powers in the Bill the Committee adopted a staged approach to its scrutiny. At its first consideration of the Bill, the Committee delegated authority to its legal advisers to ask written questions of the Scottish Government. At its meeting on 30 September, the Committee took oral evidence from Scottish Government officials on a number of powers in the Bill following receipt of the Scottish Government’s answers to the written questions.

15. At its meeting on 30 September, the Committee took oral evidence from Scottish Government officials on a number of powers in the Bill following receipt of the Scottish Government’s answers to the written questions.

16. The Committee makes no recommendation in respect of the powers listed at Annex A to this report. These powers are divided into powers with which the Committee was initially content; powers with which the Committee was content following written evidence from the Scottish Government; and powers with which the Committee was content following both written and oral evidence from the Scottish Government.

17. The Committee’s comments and recommendations on the remaining delegated powers in the Bill are detailed below. Before considering the individual powers, the Committee makes the following general observations:

i. The reasons advanced in the DPM for taking many powers in the Bill were not sufficiently detailed so as to enable the Committee to reach a view on whether those powers were acceptable in principle. With regard to several powers, the necessary information was only obtained following both written and oral evidence.

ii. The quality of some of the written answers provided by the Scottish Government in response to the Committee’s questions was inadequate, requiring the Committee to explore a number of issues further with Scottish Government officials in oral evidence. In relation to some key powers in the Bill, for example the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act, the answers given by the officials in oral evidence failed to provide the information sought by the Committee.

578 The Delegated Powers Memorandum is available here: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/S4_Bills/CE_DPM.pdf
iii. In relation to the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act, the Committee remains in a position, having considered both written and oral evidence, whereby it is unable to form a view as to how this power is intended to be used. The Government has not provided an explanation for taking this power beyond a need to retain flexibility within the Bill. The Committee considers that explanation to be inadequate in light of the significance of this power and what it appears to permit. The Committee further finds it concerning that the thinking behind a power of such significance to the scope and application of the Bill appears still to be in the early stages of development. The Scottish Government may wish to reflect on its reasons for taking this power as the Bill progresses through the Parliament and the lead Committee may wish to explore the power further when it takes oral evidence from the Minister for Local Government and Planning.

iv. More generally, the Committee finds it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer certain wide-ranging powers on the Scottish Ministers in circumstances where the Scottish Government has not informed the Parliament in sufficient detail of its plans for using those powers or of the reasons for taking a particular approach to the framing of certain powers. The Committee considers that there is a clear need for delegated powers to be fully explained, their terms appropriately framed and their scope clearly delineated.

v. The points made above are concerning to the Committee given the significance of many of the powers in this Bill. The quality of delegated powers memoranda in particular is an issue that the Committee is monitoring on an ongoing basis, and will continue to raise in its annual and quarterly reports and, as appropriate, with the Minister for Parliamentary Business.

Recommendations

Sections 1 and 2 – National outcomes

Powers conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: published determination
Parliamentary procedure: none

Scrutiny procedure for setting and review of national outcomes

18. Section 1(1) of the Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to determine national outcomes in relation to Scotland that result from, or are contributed to by, the carrying out of functions of Scottish public authorities, cross-border public authorities, and other persons carrying out functions of a public nature. Such bodies are required to have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out their functions.
19. Section 1(2) of the Bill places a requirement on the Scottish Ministers to consult on the national outcomes and section 1(3) requires Ministers to publish the outcomes. There is no provision for Parliamentary scrutiny of the outcomes prior to their publication, or for the outcomes to be laid before Parliament once published. The Committee sought written explanation as to why it is considered appropriate for the power to decide on national outcomes to be exercisable by informal published determination as opposed to by, for example, Scottish statutory instrument.

20. The Scottish Government’s written response to the Committee indicated that Parliamentary scrutiny will focus on progress toward the national outcomes, not the setting of the outcomes. The response also indicated that it may be that the Parliament would wish to debate the outcomes set out by Ministers, and that the arrangements put forward by the Bill do not prevent that.

21. The Committee explored these issues further with the Scottish Government officials at its meeting on September 30th. Anne-Marie Conlong of the Scottish Government’s Performance Unit explained that—

“The Scottish Government believes that what we have set out in the provisions reflects the current separation of powers between the Scottish Government and the Parliament. It would be for the Scottish Ministers to co-ordinate Government business and to set out the strategic direction for Government – within its overall accountability to the Parliament, of course - and the Parliament would exercise a scrutiny function, holding ministers to account on progress toward the national outcomes and objectives.”

579 Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Official Report, 30 September 2014, Col.3

22. Furthermore, officials indicated that they were—

“…more than happy to take back for further consideration with Ministers the Committee’s views on the respective roles of the Parliament and the Government in setting the outcomes.”

580 Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Official Report, 30 September 2014, Col.3

23. There is recent comparable provision for national outcomes to be set out in subordinate legislation. Section 3(2) of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 requires that a local authority and a health board must, in preparing an integration plan, have regard to the national health and wellbeing outcomes in section 5 (and the integration planning principles in section 4). Section 5(1) enables the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the national health and wellbeing outcomes by regulations which are subject to the affirmative procedure.

24. In the DPM for the 2014 Bill, the Scottish Government explained why it was considered appropriate that the health and wellbeing outcomes should be prescribed by regulations subject to the affirmative procedure: “By allowing Ministers to set national outcomes, it provides for a consistent focus nationally. It is appropriate that outcomes are set by regulations as this requires a process of consultation to be followed, contemporaneously with integration plans being prepared, to inform the outcomes. It also provides flexibility for the Scottish Ministers to amend outcomes in the future, in response to innovation locally and changing circumstances, and in order to support continuous improvement.... This is subject to affirmative procedure as the national outcomes are fundamental to health and social care integration in that they express its practical purpose. Whilst this level of scrutiny involves more parliamentary time, it is considered that the national outcomes are sufficiently important to justify this, and it is not anticipated that they will be regularly amended.”

25. The Committee considers that there is a clear comparison to be drawn between the health and wellbeing outcomes for Scotland as provided for by the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014, and the national outcomes under this Bill. The Committee also observes that the national outcomes set under the Bill will be applicable to a wider range of bodies than the health and wellbeing outcomes therefore the requirement for Parliament to have a role in the process of setting or reviewing the outcomes is, in the Committee’s view, greater.

26. The Committee acknowledges, however, that there are alternative ways to afford the Parliament an opportunity to scrutinise the national outcomes. By way of example, the Committee notes the provision in section 16 of the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008. Section 16 relates to guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers or the Lord President as to the manner of exercise by the Judicial Appointments Board for Scotland of its functions. Section 16 provides that before issuing guidance, the Scottish Ministers or, as the case may be, the Lord President, must lay a draft of the proposed guidance before the Parliament. The guidance must not be issued until 21 days after it has been laid before Parliament, and the Parliament may by resolution make recommendations in relation to the draft guidance to which the Government or the Lord President must have regard. The Parliament does not, however, have power to prevent the guidance from being issued.

27. While the Committee acknowledges that the Parliament would not be prevented from debating such outcomes as are set by the Scottish Government, the Committee considers that a more active scrutiny role for the Parliament in relation to the outcomes would be appropriate and should be set out on the face of the Bill. One clear way to enable Parliament to scrutinise the outcomes would be for the outcomes to be prescribed in regulations subject to scrutiny by the affirmative procedure, although as noted above, the Committee acknowledges that there may be alternative ways in which the Parliament could be afforded a role in considering the outcomes and that the formulation of such a role is ultimately a matter for the Scottish Government.

Consultation on the national outcomes

28. Sections 1(2) and 2(5) of the Bill provide that before determining or revising the outcomes, the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate. The Committee explored in the oral evidence session why, in principle, the provision does not specify any persons or bodies which (at a minimum) the Scottish Ministers would need to consult.
29. It was explained in the oral evidence session that the intention is to leave the potential scope for consultation as broad as possible, which has been favoured by stakeholders. In some cases consultation would be very wide, but in other cases focussed. The intention is not to limit or narrow the scope of the persons who may be consulted. It was indicated that if the Committee was of the view that the Bill should include a minimum list of bodies that suggestion would be considered further, however the Scottish Government would not want to limit the scope of potential consultation in any future review.

30. Sections 1(2) and 2(5) provide that the consultation on the national outcomes will be with such persons as (subjectively, at the particular time) the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate. The Committee accepts that this approach keeps the scope for consultation as broad as possible, but observes that, equally, it does not offer any guarantee of consultation at a minimum level, where the outcomes are to be set or revised.

31. The Committee also notes that, by comparison, section 5 of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 specifies a minimum level of required consultation before the national health and wellbeing outcomes are prescribed by regulations. Ministers must consult in advance local authorities, Health Boards, each integration joint board at the time established, and in respect of various groups set out in section 5(4) involved in health and social care provision, such persons appearing to be representative of the group as the Ministers think fit.

32. The Committee considers that a list of persons or bodies that, at a minimum, the Scottish Ministers must consult when national outcomes are set or reviewed should be adopted in the Bill. Such an approach could be tailored to ensure a minimum base for consultation while leaving it open to Ministers to consult such other bodies as they think fit in the particular circumstances, having regard to the nature of the outcomes being set or revised.

33. The Committee has concerns that the process for setting and reviewing national outcomes under Part 1 of the Bill leaves no role for the Parliament to scrutinise the outcomes that are proposed to be set or, as the case may be, revised, before they are published.

34. The Committee considers that it would be appropriate for the setting and review of the national outcomes to be subject to the scrutiny of Parliament, possibly through scrutiny of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure. A more active scrutiny role for the Parliament appears to be justified having regard to the significance of the national outcomes, the discretion afforded to the Scottish Ministers in deciding how the outcomes are presented and measured, and the fact that all public bodies and other persons carrying out functions of a public nature as described in section 1(1) would require to have regard to the outcomes.

35. Sections 1(2) and 2(5) provide that before exercising the power to determine or revise the national outcomes, the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate. The Committee recognises that the determination of which bodies and persons ought to be consulted is a policy matter. The Committee draws to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee however that sections 1(2) and 2(5) keep the scope for consultation as broad as possible, but equally they do not guarantee any minimum level of consultation that might be suitable, depending on whether it is proposed to set or change the outcomes generally or to have a more focused review.

Sections 4(6), 8(3), 16(2) and 51(3) – power to add or remove bodies

Powers conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: regulations (sections 4(6) and 8(3)); order (sections 16(2) and (3) and 51(2) and (3))
Parliamentary procedure: negative

36. Section 4(6) allows Ministers to modify schedule 1 of the Bill to expand the list of community planning partners to which Part 2 of the Bill applies. The power also enables Ministers to remove bodies from the list, thereby reducing the scope of Part 2 of the Bill. Section 8(3) provides a similar power in respect of the list of community planning partners which have governance requirements in relation to community planning as set out in section 8(2).

37. Sections 16(2) and (3) provide powers to expand or reduce the list of public service authorities to which a participation request may be made in terms of Part 3 of the Bill (the list is contained in schedule 2). Sections 51(2) and (3) create similar powers in respect of the list of relevant authorities to whom an asset transfer request may be made under Part 5 (the list of relevant authorities is set out in schedule 3).

38. These powers are subject to the negative procedure. The Committee sought explanation from the Scottish Government as to why that was considered appropriate as opposed to the affirmative procedure, which would afford the Parliament a greater measure of scrutiny over the exercise of these powers which not only permit the modification of primary legislation, but which could also have a considerable impact on the scope and application of Parts 2, 3 and 5 of the Bill.

39. In response, the Scottish Government explained that the negative procedure was considered appropriate for the exercise of these powers, as adding or removing bodies from a list in one of the schedules to the Bill is unlikely to be controversial. The response also drew a parallel with section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 (“the 2002 Act”) where a power to amend a list of bodies is subject to the negative procedure. In oral evidence, the officials explained that these powers provide flexibility to make changes to the relevant lists should that be considered necessary.

40. The Committee considers that the exercise of these powers is capable of having a considerable impact on the scope and applicability of some of the key provisions in the Bill. For example, the power in section 4(6) could in theory be used to considerably expand the application of Part 2 of the Bill by adding large numbers of bodies to the list of community planning partners contained in schedule 1. Conversely, it could also be used to reduce the application of Part 2 of the Bill by removing bodies from the schedule 1 list.

41. The Scottish Government draws a parallel with section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 as a similar provision to add or remove bodies to or from a list which is also subject to the negative procedure. The Committee observes, however, that more recent powers to make amendments to lists of bodies have adopted a different procedural approach. For instance, section 25 of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 provides that an order which adds a body to the list in schedule 5 is subject to the affirmative procedure, but to the negative procedure where a body is removed from the list. A similar example pertains in section 7 of the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014 (power to modify the list of regulators).

42. These examples, which post-date the 2002 Act, suggest that where bodies are added to lists, the powers should be subject to the affirmative procedure. Conversely, where the application of the Bill is shrunk and bodies are removed from lists, the negative procedure may be appropriate. Standing the absence of reasons why the present Bill should not follow these more recent examples, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to require these powers to be subject to the affirmative procedure where they add bodies to the lists, but to the negative procedure where they are exercised so as to remove bodies from the lists.

43. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to make the powers in sections 4(6) and 8(3) subject to the affirmative procedure when exercised so as to add bodies to the lists in schedule 1 or section 8(2) respectively. The Committee also recommends that the powers in sections 16(3) and 51(3) be made subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 10 – Power to issue guidance

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Power conferred on:</th>
<th>the Scottish Ministers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Power exercisable by:</td>
<td>guidance (published)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary procedure:</td>
<td>none</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

44. Section 10(1) provides that each community planning partnership must comply with any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the carrying out of functions conferred on the partnership by Part 2 of the Bill. Section 10(2) provides that each community planning partner must comply with any guidance issued by the Ministers about the carrying out of functions conferred on the partner by Part 2. Before issuing either set of guidance, the Ministers must consult such persons as they think fit. Section 95 provides that the guidance will be published on issue, in such manner as the Scottish Ministers think fit.

45. The Committee explored two aspects of the power to issue guidance in the oral evidence session: a) why the guidance is proposed to be binding on community planning partnerships and partners, rather than there being a requirement that they will have regard to it; and b) why there is no provision for any Parliamentary procedure to apply to the guidance or for it to be laid before Parliament.

46. As to a), the proposed automatically binding nature of the guidance is a change to the provision in section 18 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. That section provides that every person initiating, maintaining, facilitating or participating in community planning shall, in doing so, have regard to any guidance provided by the Scottish Ministers about community planning. The consultation requirement in section 10(3) is similar to that already in section 18(2) of the 2003 Act.

47. The Committee explored in oral evidence the considerations underlying the proposal that the guidance should be binding. A key aspect as outlined by the Scottish Government officials was that the policy intention is that there should be local discretion and local innovation in how community planning is approached and dealt with, but there may be some matters that the Scottish Government feels are fundamental enough to apply on a national level, where the guidance could specify binding requirements on community planning partnerships and partners.

48. In reply to the question how it is foreseen that this power of binding guidance would be utilised, the officials responded—

“It is hard to know at the moment...the guidance will be subject to quite a lot of consultation before we put it out...It is hard to say what particular provisions will be used for, but that will emerge from the process.”

49. The Committee considers that a power to issue guidance which is automatically binding according to its terms is highly unusual, and might be expected to require particular explanation as to why the power is needed. A binding requirement in such guidance would in law be binding in the same way as if the provision was contained in a statutory instrument or in an Act. The Bill appears to put no enforcement mechanism in place for compliance with the guidance. The guidance must cover matters “about the carrying out of functions conferred on community planning partners and partnerships under part 2 of the Bill.” But this is a broad requirement, and there is no enforcement or scrutiny mechanism proposed in the Bill to review whether matters required by the guidance are properly covered as concerning the various functions conferred in Part 2.

50. It was explained to the Committee in evidence that the policy intention is that some matters covered by the guidance should be matters which would be binding on a national level, while others would permit local discretion. However, the scope of the power in section 10 makes no such distinction, for instance by specifying a range of matters or requirements which possibly could be included as binding.

---

581 Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Official Report, 30 September 2014, Col.9
51. The Committee accordingly draws to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee that it has concerns, in principle, as to the proposal that the guidance should be binding on community planning partnerships and partners. This concern has a number of factors, and a power of this nature is unusual.

52. The Scottish Government officials were not clear in their oral evidence to the Committee as to the reasons why this power was being taken and how it could be exercised. It was indicated that there is a policy intention that some matters would be fundamental enough to be binding on a national level, while others would not and could permit local discretion and innovation. This distinction, however, is not provided for in section 10.

53. The Bill also makes no provision for an enforcement mechanism, to enforce compliance with the guidance. The guidance must cover matters “about the carrying out of functions conferred on community planning partners and partnerships under Part 2 of the Bill”. This is a broad requirement and the Bill makes no provision for a scrutiny or review mechanism, to review whether any automatically binding matters which may be specified in the guidance are properly included, because they concern the carrying out of functions conferred in Part 2 of the Bill.

54. These concerns would not apply if, in a similar way to the existing provision for guidance in section 18 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, there was provision that community planning partners and partnerships would “have regard to” the guidance.

Section 48 inserting section 97C(3)(a) into the 2003 Act – Eligible land

Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative

55. The new Part 3A of the 2003 Act as inserted by Part 4 of the Bill will apply only in respect of “eligible land”. Eligible land is defined in the new section 97C(1) of the 2003 Act as land which the Scottish Ministers consider is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. The remainder of the new section 97C provides further detail as to the meaning of eligible land.

56. Section 97C(3)(a) provides that eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or structure which is an individual’s home, unless the building or structure falls within such class or classes as may be prescribed. The word ‘prescribed’ adopts the definition set out in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”. The effect of section 97C(3)(a), therefore, is that Ministers may make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body notwithstanding the fact that such buildings or structures may constitute an individual’s home.
57. The DPM states that the policy intention is that eligible land should not include an individual’s home. It also states that this power will enable there to be flexibility as to exactly what buildings or structures constitute an individual’s home. The power is subject to the affirmative procedure and the DPM states that this is considered appropriate, given that what constitutes “eligible land” is fundamental to the scope and application of the new Part 3A.

58. While the Committee agrees that this power is fundamental to the scope and application of the new Part 3A of the 2003 Act, it does not consider that the DPM provides a sufficiently detailed explanation as to how it is intended to be used. The Committee accordingly sought written clarification from the Scottish Government as to what this power enables the Scottish Ministers to do and how it is intended that the power will be used.

59. In its written answer, the Scottish Government confirmed that section 97C(3)(a) enables Ministers to add prescribed classes of building back into the pool of eligible land to which the new Part 3A applies. The Government explained that it was unable to provide examples of the kinds of building or structure which may be prescribed using this power, but that the power “allows for flexibility”. The Government also stated in its written answer that it would be happy to consider changes to the provision should the Committee be of the view that that would be of benefit to the Bill.

60. At the oral evidence session on 30 September, Members sought further information from the Scottish Government officials as to why this power was being taken, standing the lack of detailed explanation in the Government’s written response and the DPM. Members also asked what factors – other than flexibility – were taken into account in framing this power.

61. In oral evidence Dave Thomson from the Scottish Government’s Land Reform and Tenancy Unit repeated that the power was required to allow for flexibility—

“The flexibility on those powers is the key part at the moment. The policy intent is not to take people’s homes away in any circumstances, but still to allow community bodies to take control of assets. Essentially, the powers that we are looking to take on through that provision are simply to allow that flexibility to set out in detail the types of buildings or assets that can be included or excluded. At the moment, we do not have specific examples, hence the current need for flexibility in those powers.”

62. Rachel Rayner of the Scottish Government Legal Directorate also commented on this power:

“There are regulations made by Ministers would have to comply with the European Convention on Human Rights. As you will be aware, Article 8 of the ECHR provides a right to respect for private and family life, which would include

[582] Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Official Report, 30 September 2014, Col. 10 respect for a person’s home, and that would have to be taken into account were the power to be used.”

63. The Committee finds it concerning that the taking of a power as significant as that proposed in section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act has not been justified by the Scottish Government, either in written or oral evidence, beyond the apparent need for flexibility. While the Committee accepts that some flexibility in the available powers could be appropriate to ensure that the scheme envisaged by the new Part 3A of the 2003 Act is capable of operating effectively in practice, it considers that flexibility is not in and of itself sufficient explanation for the taking of such an important power. The Committee also observes that any regulations made by the Scottish Ministers in exercise of this power - or indeed any power - require to be ECHR-compatible.

64. In oral evidence, the Scottish Government officials explained that the policy intent underpinning these provisions is not to take individuals’ homes away in any circumstances. The power appears, however, to directly contemplate making buildings and structures available for compulsory acquisition by community bodies despite the fact that those buildings and structures are an individual’s home.
If it is not the Government’s intention to make homes available for acquisition by Part 3A community bodies as the officials explained in oral evidence, the Committee finds it difficult to decide what this power is intended to do.

65. The Committee further finds it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer this power upon the Scottish Ministers without having received satisfactory answers to questions asked about its intended use. When asked to give examples to demonstrate how the power might be used in practice, the Scottish Government did not do so either in written or in oral evidence. The Committee considers it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to approve powers where the thinking behind them appears still to be in the early stages of development and where officials are unable to offer a detailed explanation of the circumstances in which it is planned that they will be used.

66. The Committee draws the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the basis that it has concerns about the scope of the power and its intended use.

67. The power permits the Scottish Ministers to make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body notwithstanding the fact that such buildings or structures may be described as an individual’s home. The Committee’s questions of the Scottish Government, both written and oral, did not elicit a clear explanation from the Scottish Government as to its reasons for taking this power, or how the power is intended to be exercised. The Scottish Government also did not provide the Committee with any examples of the

583 Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Official Report, 30 September 2014, Col.12 kinds of building or structure that may be prescribed in regulations made in exercise of this power.

68. The Committee finds it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer a power of this significance upon the Scottish Government in the absence of a detailed explanation as to why it is necessary or what it is for and in circumstances where the thinking underpinning the power appears to be in the early stages of development. Together with the lack of examples of the kinds of building or structure which may be prescribed using this power, the Committee finds it difficult to reach a view as to whether the power is acceptable in principle and recommends that the lead Committee explore the power further as part of its further consideration of the Bill.

69. The Scottish Government may wish to reflect on its reasons for taking this power as the Bill progresses through the Parliament and the lead Committee may wish to explore the power further when it takes oral evidence from the Minister for Local Government and Planning.

Section 97N(1) and (3) – Effect of Ministers’ decision on right to buy

Powers conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative

70. New section 97N(1) of the 2003 Act provides that Ministers may, by regulations, make provision for or in connection with prohibiting prescribed persons from transferring or otherwise dealing with land which is the subject of an application under Part 3A during the prescribed period. Section 97N(2) provides that those regulations may in particular include provision prescribing transfers or dealings which are not prohibited; requiring or enabling prescribed persons to register prescribed notices in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected land; and in prescribed circumstances, requiring information to be incorporated into prescribed deeds relating to the land.

71. Section 97N(3) provides that Ministers may, by regulations, make provision for or in connection with suspending, during the prescribed period, such rights in or over land in respect of which a Part 3A community body has made an application as may be prescribed. Section 97N(4) provides that such regulations may in particular include provision specifying rights to which the regulations do not apply, and rights to which the regulations do not apply in prescribed circumstances.

72. The Committee considers that it may be appropriate for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations for the purpose of suspending rights in or over land for the duration of the period within which Ministers are considering a Part 3A community body’s application. The Committee also considers it appropriate that these powers are subject to the higher level of scrutiny afforded by the affirmative procedure. Despite these conclusions, the Committee considers that there are issues of clarity with the drafting of these powers. The Committee explored these issues with the Scottish Government both in written and oral evidence.

73. Section 97N uses the word “prescribed” a number of times. “Prescribed” has a specific definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”. The Committee wrote to the Scottish Government to ask whether the word “prescribed” as used multiple times in section 97N is intended to attract the definition of that term set out in section 98(1) with the effect that section 97N in fact creates a new power to make subordinate legislation each time that word is used, in addition to the two free-standing powers conferred by sections 97N(1) and (3).

74. In its written response, the Scottish Government confirmed that the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is intended to attract the definition of that term set out in section 98(1). The Government also stated, however, that its view is that section 97N confers only two powers to make subordinate legislation: the power in section 97N(1) and that in section 97N(3). Sections 97N(2) and (4) are intended to provide further detail of the matters which regulations made under subsections (1) and (3) may cover, and the use of the word “prescribed” in those subsections does not have the effect of conferring separate powers to make subordinate legislation.

75. The Committee considers that if the word “prescribed” as used in section 97N is intended to adopt the definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, it seems clear that multiple powers are being conferred. The existence of the definition means that wherever the word “prescribed” appears in the 2003 Act, including where it appears as a result of amendments made to that Act by this Bill, it is an instruction to the reader to construe the word as conferring a power upon the Scottish Ministers to make regulations unless contrary provision is made.

76. The Committee therefore asked the Scottish Government officials for further explanation of the power when it took oral evidence on 30 September. The Scottish Government officials reiterated their position, which is that section 97N confers only two powers to make subordinate legislation. The officials offered to write to the Committee following the meeting to explain further their position. A letter dated 8 October 2014 is attached at Annex C.

77. This is a technical drafting point. The Committee does not object to the powers in sections 97N in principle, not to the selection of the affirmative procedure as the appropriate level of Parliamentary scrutiny over the powers. Nevertheless, the Committee finds that the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is apt to cause confusion when construed in accordance with section 98(1), and, as such, draws the conclusion that the Bill should be clarified at Stage 2.

78. The Scottish Government’s intention is that section 97N confers only two powers to make subordinate legislation: the power to make regulations prohibiting the transfer of land pending a decision on a Part 3A application in section 97N(1); and the similar power to suspend other rights e.g. rights of pre-emption or redemption that is set out in section 97N(3). The Committee considers, however, that this intention is not readily compatible with the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N and its definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act. Other provisions in the Bill use the word “prescribed” and rely on the definition of that term in section 98(1) to create a free-standing power to make subordinate legislation. It is not clear from the evidence received from the Scottish Government why that same reliance does not apply in the case of the word as used in section 97N.

79. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to clarify the new section 97N of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 as inserted by section 48 of the Bill. Section 97N makes repeated use of the word “prescribed”, and the Scottish Government has explained to the Committee, both in written and oral evidence, that while the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is intended to adopt the definition of that term in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”, section 97N is considered to confer only two powers to make subordinate legislation: the power in section 97N(1) and the power in section 97N(3).

80. The Committee considers that if the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is not intended to confer separate and free-standing powers to make subordinate legislation, the Bill should be clarified for Stage 2 so as to remove the scope for doubt over the interpretation of the section and the powers it confers by re-drafting the provision so as to remove the references to “prescribed”.
Annex A

The Committee was content with the following powers on first consideration of the Bill:

Section 7(3) - local outcomes improvement plan: progress report
Section 12(2)(d) - power to prescribe other matters to be addressed in an application for incorporation
Section 15(2) - meaning of “community participation body”
Section 18(1) - regulations (further provision about participation requests)
Section 19(7)(a) - participation requests: decisions
Section 19(8) - participation requests: decisions
Section 21(6) - power to specify information to be published about the outcome improvement process
Section 24(3) - modification of outcome improvement process
Section 25(4) - reporting (of outcome improvement process)
Section 28(2) - power to prescribe bodies that are “community bodies”
Section 28(7) - power to define a “community”
Section 33 - power to specify the description of land
Section 37 - power to prescribe the information to be provided to the ballotter by the Scottish Ministers
Section 37 - power to prescribe information to be provided to the ballotter by a community body
Section 38 - power to make regulations which set out the information a community body must provide to the Scottish Ministers
Section 40 - ballot not conducted as prescribed
Section 48 - power to prescribe that eligible land does not include certain land for the purposes of Part 3A Section 48 - power to approve/direct the transfer of property on winding up

Section 48 - power to set out the definition of a “community”

Section 48 - payment of charges for copies of entries in the Part 3A Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

Section 48 - power to prescribe the application form for Ministers to consent to a Part 3A community body’s right to buy

Section 48 - power to prescribe the manner in which an application under Part 3A is given public notice

Section 48 - power to prescribe how the ballot of the community is undertaken and the form of the ballot return to Ministers

Section 48 - Ministers’ notification of their decision on an application under Part 3A

Section 48 - power to direct that community body’s right to buy is extinguished

Section 48 - power to make provision in relation to compensation

Section 48 - power to make grants towards Part 3A community bodies’ liabilities to pay compensation

Section 48 - rules affected by Ministers in relation to the Lands Tribunal Act 1949

Section 50(2)(a) - designation of a community transfer body

Section 50(2)(b) - designation of a class of bodies as community transfer bodies

Section 53 - power to approve or direct the transfer of property on winding up

Section 54(3) - power to make provision about information relating to land in respect of which an asset transfer request is proposed

Section 55(8) - power to prescribe a time for a decision notice to be given

Section 55(9) - power to make provision regarding the information contained in a decision notice and the manner in which it is to be given

Section 56(7)(b)(ii) - power to direct an extended period within which a contract is to be concluded

- power to make provision about a direction to extend the period within which a contract is to be concluded

- power to issue directions following an appeal

- guidance about common good registers

- guidance about disposal etc. of common good property

- meaning of “allotment”

- request to lease allotment

- duty to provide allotment

- duty to prepare food-growing strategy

- annual allotments report

- delegation of management of allotment sites

- termination of lease of allotment or allotment site

- sale of surplus produce

- compensation for disturbance

- compensation for deterioration of allotment

- compensation for loss of crops

- ancillary provision

- commencement

The Committee was content with the following powers after receiving written evidence from the Scottish Government:

- power to establish a body corporate for community planning purposes

- meaning of “community”

- eligible land

- inserting sections 97C(2), 97C(3)(b) and 97C(4) into the 2003 Act
Section 48 - register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

Section 48 - right to buy: application for consent

Section 73(1) - allotment site regulations: additional provision

The Committee was content with the following powers after receiving both written and oral evidence from the Scottish Government:

Section 48 - provisions supplementary to section 97D

Section 54(1) - power to make further provision about asset transfer requests

Sections 58(3) and 59(3) - appeal or review of decisions on asset transfer requests

Section 80(7) - power to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites

Annex B – Written Correspondence

Part 1 – National Outcomes

1. Sections 1-3 – publication of national outcomes

a) Sections 1(3), 2(4) and 3(1) provide for the publication of the national outcomes that are determined by the Scottish Ministers, and reports about the extent to which they have been achieved. The Scottish Government is asked to explain why it has been considered appropriate that the power to decide on the national outcomes should be exercisable by informal published determination, and not by Scottish statutory instrument which could be subject to Parliamentary scrutiny and procedure.

The decision was taken not to use Statutory Instruments as we envisage the primary role of Parliament to be scrutiny of progress towards the national outcomes. It may well be that the Scottish Parliament may wish to debate on the national outcomes set by the Scottish Ministers and the arrangements proposed do not prevent that.

b) Section 1(2) states that before determining the national outcomes, the Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate. The Scottish Government is asked to explain why this provision does not specify any persons or bodies which (as a minimum requirement) the Ministers would consult.

The intention here is to leave the potential scope for consultation as broad as possible. In some cases, e.g. where a review is of a technical nature and focuses on specialist or statistical issues, it may be more appropriate to limit the scope of consultation to those who have expertise and experience in that area. In other cases, the review may be of a more general nature and in those cases, it would appropriate to consult more widely. Consultation with appropriate people would also include consultation with the public as a whole if appropriate.

Part 2 – Community Planning

2. Section 4(6) – power to modify schedule 1

The power in section 4(6) is capable of being used to considerably expand the list of community planning partners to which Part 2 of the Bill applies, or alternatively to considerably reduce the scope by removing bodies that are listed in schedule 1.

The Scottish Government is asked to explain therefore why it is considered more suitable that any regulations made under section 4(6) should be scrutinised by the negative procedure - rather than by the affirmative procedure where regulations add or remove persons from the schedule 1 list, and the negative procedure for regulations which amend an entry (which could adjust an entry on a change of name of a body).

This power provides flexibility to make future changes to the list of community planning partners in schedule 1. The power to amend the primary legislation is restricted to amending the list of public bodies who are members of a community planning partnership. Adding a body to, or removing it from, the list is unlikely to generate controversy. An example of a power to amend a list of public bodies in a schedule to primary legislation which is subject to negative procedure can be found in section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2000. In these circumstances it is considered that subjecting the exercise of the power to negative procedure is appropriate.

3. Section 8(3) – power to modify section 8(2)

The power in subsection (3) of section 8 is capable of being used to considerably expand the list of community planning partners in subsection (2) which have governance requirements in relation to community planning, or alternatively to considerably reduce the scope by removing bodies from that list.

The Scottish Government is asked to explain therefore why it is considered more suitable that any regulations made under section 8(3) should be scrutinised by the negative procedure - rather than by the affirmative procedure where regulations add or remove persons from the schedule 1 list, and the negative procedure for regulations which amend an entry (which could adjust an entry on a change of name of a body).

The power relates to making changes that may be required as the nature and practice of community planning evolves and the provisions of this part of the Bill take effect. It is restricted to allowing the Scottish Ministers to amend a list of public bodies who are partners in a community planning partnership so that they are also subject to a governance role. As with the power in section 4(6), it is not considered that the exercise of this power would generate controversy. It is considered that the negative procedure offers an appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny.

4. Section 10 – power to issue guidance

The Scottish Government is asked to explain why the powers to issue guidance in section 10 are appropriate, and how the powers could be used. In particular an explanation is sought as to-

a) why the guidance is proposed to be binding on community planning partnerships and partners, rather than there being a requirement that they will have regard to it; and

b) why there is no provision for any Parliamentary procedure to apply to the guidance or for it to be laid before Parliament.

With regard to the request for an explanation as to why the powers to issue guidance are appropriate, the Scottish Ministers have inherent power to issue guidance and the Bill does not confer express powers to that effect. The purpose of section 10 is to confer a status on any guidance Ministers may issue regarding the carrying out of functions by the Community Planning Partnership. Section 10(3) requires that any guidance must be the subject of consultation before it is issued.

a) The Scottish Government believes that this section will help to enable the dissemination of best practice in community planning across Scotland and is necessary to support the process by which public bodies work together and with community bodies to plan for, resource and provide services which improve local outcomes in the area. With regard to the obligation to comply with guidance, we would of course be happy to consider amending this to an obligation to have regard to the guidance if the Committee feel it would be of benefit to the Bill.

b) There is currently no provision for any Parliamentary procedure to apply to the guidance or for it to be laid before Parliament as it was considered that the guidance would deal with a range of issues in some detail, including administrative issues as necessary and that this was not a necessary or appropriate use of valuable Parliamentary time and resources.

5. Section 12 – power to establish bodies corporate

a) The Scottish Government is asked to explain why the wide power to specify any other matters in section 12(3)(h) is required, and how this power could be used.

b) What additional matters would this power enable, beyond the ancillary powers to make incidental, supplementary or consequential provisions contained in sections 96(1) and 97?
Section 12(3)(h) is in the same terms as, and replaces, section 19(3)(h) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. The inclusion of 12(3)(h) provides the necessary flexibility to deal with any new development which may need to be addressed when exercising the power in section 12(1). It also makes it clear that the provision that can be included in the regulations made under section 12(1) is not restricted to the matters listed in section 12(3)(a) to (g).

Part 3 – Participation Requests

6. Section 16 – meaning of “public service authority”

a) The powers in section 16(2) and (3) are capable of being used to considerably expand the list of “public service authorities” to which participation requirements could be made in accordance with Part 3 of the Bill, or alternatively to considerably reduce the scope by removing bodies (or types of body) from the list in schedule 2.

The Scottish Government is asked to explain therefore why it is considered more suitable that any order made under sections 16(2) and (3) should be scrutinised by the negative procedure - rather than by the affirmative procedure where the order proposes to remove persons from the schedule 2 list and/or designate more persons or classes of person as “public service authorities” and the negative procedure for an order which amends an entry in schedule 2 (which could adjust an entry on a change of name of a body).

b) The Delegated Powers Memorandum (“DPM”) states in relation to section 16(2) that the Scottish Ministers are included in schedule 2, but this is not the case. Clarification is sought as to whether there is any intention to include the Ministers in the schedule.

a) These powers provide flexibility to make future changes to the list of public service authorities in schedule 2. The power to amend the primary legislation is restricted to amending the list of public bodies to whom a community participation body may make a participation request. Adding a body to, or removing it from, the list is unlikely to generate controversy. An example of a power to amend a list of public bodies in a schedule to primary legislation which is subject to negative procedure can be found in section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2000. In these circumstances it is considered that subjecting the exercise of the power to negative procedure is appropriate.

b) The reference to the Scottish Ministers in the Delegated Powers Memorandum in relation to section 16(2) was an error.

Part 4 – Community Right to Buy Land

7. Section 28(6) – duty to provide information about community right to buy
The power in the new section 34(4B) of the 2003 Act, as inserted by section 28(6) of the Bill, appears to be subject to the negative procedure while the DPM refers to the power being subject to the affirmative procedure. Section 98(5) of the 2003 Act, as amended by paragraph 4 of schedule 4 to the Bill, provides that regulations made under the new section 34(4A) will be subject to the affirmative procedure, but there is no reference to regulations made under the new section 34(4B), the effect of which would appear to be to leave such regulations to take the negative procedure.

Can the Scottish Government explain whether this is an error or, if the Scottish Government intends the power to be subject to the negative procedure, can it explain why this is considered appropriate?

The Scottish Government agree that the new section 34(4B) of the 2003 Act, as inserted by section 28(6) of the Bill, is subject to the negative procedure but that it would be appropriate for this power to be subjective to affirmative procedure, as stated in the DPM.

8. New section 97C of the 2003 Act – eligible land

a) Can the Scottish Government provide more information as to how it envisages using the power in the new section 97C(2) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”? The DPM refers only to the power being used to prescribe matters which are “too detailed to include in the primary legislation”. Can the Scottish Government provide any examples of matters which it is intended will be prescribed in regulations made in exercise of this power so as to inform the Committee’s consideration of the power?

b) The Scottish Government is asked for a fuller explanation as to the relationship between the powers in the new section 97C(3)(a), 97C(3)(b) and 97C(4) of the 2003 Act, as inserted by section 48 of the Bill. How is it considered that these powers will interact?

c) Does the Scottish Government agree that the power in section 97C(3)(a) enables Ministers to add prescribed classes of building back into the ‘pool’ of eligible land to which the new Part 3A applies despite the fact that such buildings may constitute an individual’s home? Can the Scottish Government provide any examples of classes of building or structure which it intends to prescribe in regulations made in exercise of this power?

(a) The matters that Ministers should take account of in considering whether land is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected is currently under discussion with stakeholders. Some examples of matters might include the physical condition of land, environmental or historic designations affecting the land and the extent to which the land is having a detrimental effect on the local environment, where environment can be physical or social.

(b) The relationship between the various powers is that that section 97C(3)(a) provides that land on which there is an individual’s home is not eligible land but this doesn’t apply to classes or descriptions of land set out in regulations. This will enable exceptions to be made should this be considered appropriate in the future. Section 97C(3)(b) will enable regulations to provide that land associated with an individual’s home such as private gardens and land forming the curtilage of the home will not be eligible land, and section 97C(4) allows regulations to be made treating buildings or structures as homes and so the land which these are situated on will not be eligible land. For example a house that is used just for holidays and which doesn’t constitute an individual’s home could be treated as a home and so the land which it is on would not be eligible land.

(c) Section 97C(3)(a) enables Ministers to add prescribed classes of building back into the ‘pool’ of eligible land to which the new Part 3A applies. At this point in time, we are not able to give specific examples, but this power allows for flexibility. We would of course be happy to consider changes if the Committee feel it would be of benefit to the Bill.

9. Section 97E(4) - power to make an order relating to matters connected with the acquisition of the land

Can the Scottish Government explain how the power in the new section 97E(4) is intended to be exercised and why it requires to be drawn in such wide terms? Can the Government provide any examples of the kinds of modifications to primary legislation that the Scottish Government anticipates making in exercise of this power as permitted by the provision in section 97E(5)?

The underlying reason behind the power in section 97E(4) is to ensure that the process for buying back land from a community body is open and transparent as well as robust. There are examples of similar powers e.g. sections 1 and 2 of the Transport and Works (Scotland) Act 2007.

10. Section 97F(6) – power to modify the information and documents that are to be contained in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

The Scottish Government is asked to explain further its reasons for taking the power to modify new sections 97F(3) and (4) of the 2003 Act as inserted by section 48 of the Bill. In particular, can the Government explain the circumstances in which it considers that it may be appropriate to modify those subsections given that they exempt, in circumstances where a Part 3A community body requires it, any information or documents relating to the raising or expenditure of money by that body from being entered in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land?

There is already a similar power in respect of the Register of Community Interests in Land in Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (section 36(6)) so the power in section 97F(6) ensure that Parts 2 and 3A are consistent. It is allows the Register to be kept relevant should there be any changes to the requirements of community bodies, or the information that they are required, by law, to provide.
11. Section 97G(5)(c) – power to prescribe information in an application form for Ministers to consent to a Part 3A community body's right to buy

a) The Scottish Government is asked to justify the power in section 97G(5)(c) as distinct from the power in section 97G(5)(a). The DPM provides the same information in respect of both powers, however the power in section 97G(5)(a) is a power to prescribe the form of an application under Part 3A of the 2003 Act, whereas the power in section 97G(5)(c) is a power to prescribe kinds of information to be included in such a form, or to accompany such a form.

b) Can the Scottish Government explain why this power is necessary, and can it provide examples of the types of information it intends to prescribe in regulations made in exercise of this power?

These powers allow the style of the form, and the information contained in that form, to be set out in regulations. These are two separate things, hence the need for the two powers. There are examples of the sort of form (both in terms of style and content) anticipated in The Community Right to Buy (Prescribed Form of Application and Notices) (Scotland) Regulations 2009.

12. Sections 97N(1) and 97N(3) – effect of Ministers' decision on right to buy

a) The Scottish Government is asked whether the word “prescribed”, as used multiple times in the drafting of the new section 97N of the 2003 Act is intended to capture the definition of that term as set out in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act with the effect that new section 97N confers multiple powers to make subordinate legislation, or whether the matters which may be “prescribed” as referred to in that new section are intended to form specific aspects of the two standalone powers expressly conferred by sections 97N(1) and 97N(3).

b) If the Scottish Government does not intend for the word “prescribed” to adopt the definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act when it is used in section 97N, can it explain how the Bill prevents this?

Section 98(1) of the 2003 Act defines “prescribed” for the Act and provides that it means “prescribed by regulations made by Ministers”. We agree that the use of “prescribed” in section 97N attracts that definition. Each time the expression is used in section 97N it effectively confers power to specify something in regulations. These powers operate in the context of the powers in section 97N(1) and (3). For example, in section 97N(1) “prescribed period” means the period set out in regulations made by Ministers prohibiting the transfer or other dealing in certain land.

Part 5 – Asset Transfer Requests

13. Section 51(2) – power to modify schedule 3
The Scottish Government is asked whether, given that the power in section 51(2) of the Bill permits the modification of primary legislation, this power should be subject to the affirmative procedure.

This powers provides flexibility to make future changes to the list of relevant authorities in schedule 3. The power to amend the primary legislation is restricted to amending the list of public bodies to whom a community transfer body may make an asset transfer request. Adding a body to, or removing it from, the list is unlikely to generate controversy. An example of a power to amend a list of public bodies in a schedule to primary legislation which is subject to negative procedure can be found in section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2000. In these circumstances it is considered that subjecting the exercise of the power to negative procedure is appropriate.

14. Section 54(1) – power to make further provision about asset transfer requests

The Scottish Government is asked why this power requires to be drawn in such wide terms. The specification of particular matters about which regulations may be made in exercise of this power does not appear to restrict the overall width of the power, and consequently the power would appear to be capable of being used to make different provision, subject only to the requirement that that provision be “about asset transfer requests”. The Government is invited to explain why such a wide power is considered to be necessary.

Section 54(2) sets out some of the general scope of the matters which it is envisaged that the regulations relating to asset transfer requests will deal with and the wording of section 54(1) is to ensure flexibility so that other matters which it may be appropriate to include could be included if necessary. As the Committee point out the power is limited by the requirement that the regulations only enable provisions to be made in relation to asset transfer requests and, as the Delegated Powers Memorandum states, the further provision that may be required regarding process and procedure is a largely administrative matter.

15. Section 58(3) and 59(3) – power to prescribe asset transfer request appeal and review procedures, time limits and the manner in which appeals and reviews are to be conducted

a) The Scottish Government is asked for further explanation of the meaning of sections 58(4) and 59(4) of the Bill, which provide that the provision that may be made by virtue of the powers in section 58(3) or 59(3) to prescribe the procedure to be followed in an appeal against or a review of a decision on an asset transfer request includes provision that the manner in which an appeal or review, or any stage of an appeal or review, is to be conducted is to be at the discretion of, respectively, the Scottish Ministers or the local authority.

b) The Scottish Government is asked to explain what aspects of an appeal or review it considers might be made subject to the discretion of the Scottish Ministers or the local authority in exercise of these powers, and why the Government considers that that would be appropriate, as opposed to specifying the appeals procedure in the subordinate legislation that is made under sections 58(3) or 59(3).

Section 58(4) and 59(4) follow the approach taken in relation to appeal processes in planning (see section 267(1C) of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1997). The intention is that the regulations setting out appeal processes would enable the choice of appeal procedure to be flexible and selected in particular cases to meet the needs of that case. It is envisaged, as with planning appeals, that the selection of the appropriate process for conducting the appeal, for example, by written submission or a form of hearing, or mix of procedures would be determined by the Scottish Ministers in the light of the circumstances of each case.

Part 7 – Allotments

16. Section 73(1) – Allotment site regulations: additional provision

Can the Scottish Government explain why the power in section 73(1) is proposed to be exercised by the local authority by way of regulations rather than, for example, by way of byelaws subject to confirmation by the Scottish Ministers (as under section 202 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973)? If it is considered appropriate for the power to be exercised by the local authority by regulations, can the Scottish Government explain why there are no proposals for the regulations to be confirmed by the Scottish Ministers or laid before Parliament, or otherwise to be subject to scrutiny?

The Scottish Government does not consider that the power in section 73(1) falls within the scope of byelaws. Section 201 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 ("the 1973 Act") confers power on local authorities to make byelaws, "for the good rule and government of the whole or any part of their area, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances therein". Contravention of byelaws is generally dealt with by summary prosecution. The current approach has been taken since the Regulations are not principally intended to address nuisance and as such carry no criminal sanctions. The sanctions are that the lease holder would be given notice to quit the allotment.

The Scottish Government does not consider it necessary for the regulations proposed under section 73(1) to be confirmed by the Scottish Ministers, laid before Parliament, or otherwise subject to scrutiny. The Scottish Government notes that byelaws made under the 1973 Act have no effect until confirmed (section 202(3)), however contravention of byelaws will generally carry criminal sanctions. Management rules under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (to which the Scottish Government considers the proposed regulations more similar) are not subject to confirmation or other scrutiny. In line with the procedure for making management rules, section 74 of the Bill requires local authorities to consult interested persons and provides for a period of notice with an opportunity for representations before regulations under section 73(1) are made. Given the relatively narrow purpose of such regulations and the absence of offences relating to their contravention, the Scottish Government does not consider scrutiny by the Scottish Ministers or Parliament to be required.

17. Section 80(7) – power to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites

Can the Scottish Government explain further the intended purpose of the power in section 80(7) and in particular what further provision, standing the procedural requirements already contained in section 80(5) and (6), the power in section 80(7) might be used to make?

Section 80(7) permits, but does not require, the Scottish Ministers to expand upon the detail of the procedure set down in sections 80(5) and 80(6). At this point in time, we are unable to give specific examples of what further provision this power might be used to make, but the power allows for flexibility. We would of course be happy to consider changes if the Committee feel it would be of benefit to the Bill.

Annex C – Letter from the Scottish Government:

Section 97N(1) and (3) of new Part 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“2003 Act”) (to be inserted by section 48 of the Bill) confers powers on the Scottish Ministers to make regulations. Section 98(1) of the 2003 Act defines “prescribed” for the purposes of the 2003 Act and provides that it means “prescribed by regulations made by [the Scottish] Ministers”. The use of “prescribed” in section 97N has, and is intended to have, the meaning given in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act.

Regulations made under section 97N(1) and (3) will be subject to the affirmative procedure (see paragraph 2(5)(a)(ii) of schedule 4 to the Bill which will amend section 98(5) of the 2003 Act).

Section 97N(1) confers powers on the Scottish Ministers to make regulations prohibiting the transfer of land or otherwise dealing with land if a Part 3A community body has made an application under section 97G for consent from the Scottish Ministers to exercise the right to buy that land. Subsection (1) further provides that those regulations can specify: (a) the period of the prohibition; and (b) the persons who are prohibited from transferring or otherwise dealing with the land during that period.

Subsection (2) sets out particular matters that may be included in any regulations made under subsection (1). Subsection (2) is not a free-standing power. It provides some detail of the provision that may be made in regulations made under section 97N(1).

So for example, the power conferred by section 97N(1) would enable the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out that, from when the landowner has received notice of an application made by a Part 3A community body until the Scottish Ministers have determined the application, the landowner is prohibited... from transferring or otherwise dealing in the land that is the subject of the application. The regulations could also make provision for exceptions to this prohibition. The regulations would be made under section 97N(1) and would specify the period of the prohibition and also specify the persons to whom the prohibition applies. In making exceptions to the prohibition, the Scottish Ministers would still be making use of the power in subsection (1) as further described in subsection (2).

Section 97N(3) confers power on the Scottish Ministers to make regulations making provision for suspending rights in or over land in respect of which a Part 3A community has made an application under section 97G. This subsection further provides that the regulations may specify: (a) the period during which the rights are to be suspended; and (2) the rights that are to be suspended during that period. Subsection (4) provides that any regulations made under subsection (3) may include provision specifying any rights that are not to be suspended and any rights to which the regulations do not apply in certain circumstances. These are examples of the kind of provision that may be made in regulations made under subsection (3). Subsection (4) is not a free-standing power. It provides some detail of the provision that may be made in regulations made under section 97N(3).
ANNEXE D: EVIDENCE RECEIVED VIA SOCIAL MEDIA AND ONLINE VIDEOS

The Committee utilised social media to ensure as much individual and community engagement as possible on the Bill.

The Committee produced two short engagement videos on the Bill, on—

- Part 5 - Participation Requests http://youtu.be/yVgICs_Rgro, and Evidence was received via Facebook, Twitter and Email.

Responses received via Facebook

Video 1 (Participation Requests)
Responses received via email/twitter to engagement videos

From: Phil Sykes

Received – 22/10/2014

I’d like to make the following comments on the community empowerment bill:-

1. Firstly, I’d like to say that I support a bill like this

2. I’m concerned that if public bodies have a right to decide whether the community group can participate, then there is a danger that only those groups which are seen to support the public bodies agenda, are allowed to participate, without a long process of appeal.

3. Will there be a process of appeal for those groups the public body does not want to work with?

4. Will there need to be a partnership agreement with the public body for the community group to work with them? These are, in my experience, painful to get, and are written by the public bodies. Adequate legal support is beyond most community groups and there is a danger that they are forced to sign up for things that they don’t understand.

5. I understand that the community group should be formally constituted, but it is often difficult to get groups to form within communities: not because there is lack of interest, but because of many other factors. If this is going to work, then some thought needs to be put to how communities communicate within themselves.

6. Within my community, which was a regeneration area previously, but is now an area of need, we have two community groups – a community council, which represents everyone and a Neighbourhood Management Board which is organised and controlled by the local council. There is a real risk of conflict of interest in having more than one representative community group. How does the bill intend to deal with this situation?

From: Russell McLarty

Received: 8/10/2014

I write as co-ordinator of the Chance to Thrive 5-year church-community pilot project.

We certainly welcome effective ways of taking forward ideas from local communities where we have been offering processes to encourage local communities to take forward their own ideas.

Over the past few years we have provided ‘spaces’ where local ideas have been generated in 8 of the poorest parishes in Scotland – Lochee, Raploch, Drumchapel, Maryhill, Red Road, Cranhill, Castlemilk & Strutherhill in Larkhall.

Particular features of Chance to Thrive are

- regular group meetings for vision and strategy – ‘dreaming and scheming’
- volunteer mentors giving encouragement and helping extend ambition and connections
- the groups have been open to church folk, community folk, project partners and local politicians & officers
- the 8 local groups meeting together to share ideas and approaches the project has £70,000 research budget in partnership with Carnegie UK Trust to work over a 3 year period with a research team http://www.carnegieuktrust.org.uk/changing-minds/people---place/chance-to-thrive

The big challenge is always to find ways of funding the ideas generated by the local groups. If the Community Empowerment Bill provides ways of partnership working with government this would be welcomed.

Do you think the Bill as it stands is the best way of getting people's ideas in front of the decision makers?

It really depends on what level removed from the local community this will happen.

We have the sense that the more local the engagement with ‘decision-makers’ the better.

In the past Community Planning Partnerships are often quite remote from ‘natural communities’ where decisions are made far away by ‘token’ representatives who don’t really know the communities involved

There might be greater local engagement in some sort of participatory budgeting process where local communities could generate ideas and decide on their own priorities – the local community being ‘decision-maker’.

Would you use this new right?

The local Chance to Thrive Groups would certainly welcome opportunities to put forward ideas

If not, why not?

Remoteness from ‘decision-makers’

What would stop you?

Lack of engagement by ‘decision-makers' with local groups

Would you find it easier to participate as a group or individual?

Chance to Thrive has a rigorous methodology where the group works through a process looking firstly at the ‘life’ of a community, then ‘place making’ and lastly at buildings where they are possible assets to achieving goals. The process, guided by a volunteer mentor, helps refine and develop ideas getting a wider ‘buy in’ where the group is actively involved. Chance to Thrive looks to work with groups over a number of years and in this way

1. build up local confidence
2. look to short, medium & longer term goals with a more strategic approach
3. get encouragement from small successes

- What help do you need to become involved?

Participation of local politicians and officers with the Chance to Thrive groups has proved in a couple of places to be a great way of building partnership in setting up processes of engaging with the wider community and in thinking through how ideas might be brought into reality.

Russell McLarty - Coordinator

From: Colin McGrath

Received: 4/10/2014

Scottish Borders Community Councils Network (representing 67 Community Council Areas) Evidence Submission to Scottish Government Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

“The Bill sets out a plan for empowering all the people of Scotland. This means everyone can get involved and help to make important decisions.”

(page 3 Policy Memorandum – Easy Read Version)

1. Community Planning contains no mention of involvement of Community Councils in the formation of ‘Community Planning Partnerships’. What is the reason for excluding them?

2. Community Organisations contains no mention of Community Councils, which are organisations already existing for this service. What is the reason for excluding them?

3. Empowering all the People of Scotland?

Empowering all the People of Scotland is now of much higher importance following the Referendum. Community Councils are the way of achieving this objective. Local Councillors do not have the in-depth local knowledge of those on Community Councils who are also independent of thinking and do not have any party political allegiance

NOTE

The Response for Evidence had to be submitted by 5th September 2014. I requested an extension because not only was the Community Council Network not meeting but Community Councils themselves did not meet in July and August. An extension was agreed. However today I telephoned to check details and was informed that the person who had agreed to this extension was not empowered to do so as Scot Sayers had left the department and it was under reorganisation. Today a senior member of staff, Jean Waddie, informed me that our submission should be sent to David Cullum, Clark to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I telephoned David Cullum on his direct line, but it was an answerphone, so I left a message saying that our response would be received shortly.

Colin McGrath

From: Nick Underdown – Scottish Environment LINK

Received: 29/09/2014

Response to the call for evidence by the Local Government & Regeneration Committee for the draft Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

by the Scottish Environment LINK Marine Taskforce

Date: September 2014

Summary

Scottish Environment LINK’s marine taskforce outlines the potential of Community Empowerment Bill to consider issues of public participation in marine planning and decision-making, namely:

- how the process for participation requests could be adopted in the future by Regional Marine Planning Partnerships
- how broader measures in marine planning governance could assist with community empowerment in Scotland

Background:

The members of Scottish Environment LINK’s marine taskforce collectively engage on a number of marine policy issues relating to the implementation of the Marine (Scotland) Act; specifically the legal framework for marine spatial planning and marine conservation in Scotland via the development of a National Marine Plan, Regional Marine Planning Partnerships and an ecologically coherent network of Marine Protected Areas.

The main interest of LINK’s marine taskforce in the CE Bill is the potential for its provisions to enable community empowerment in relation to marine planning.

The context:

Marine spatial planning is an emerging area in Scotland. It is commonly understood that marine planning in Scotland is 40 years behind the terrestrial planning system, insofar as there has to date been no statutory system that plans, balances and coordinates marine activities in line with national level objectives and commitments to achieve sustainable development. A strategic and responsive marine planning system is urgently required due to the growing competition for limited marine resources: the increasingly varied, interconnected and often competing uses of the sea are occurring within the context of severe ecological decline, documented in the Scottish Government’s own Marine Atlas. Coordinating activities to ensure sustainable development and fulfil a legal duty to “enhance” Scotland’s seas is therefore critical. The role of communities to help drive this... sustainability agenda should not be under-estimated – coastal communities can be the agents of change in marine management and often experience before the wider public the consequences – both positive and negative - of marine policy and planning decisions.

Marine governance in Scotland is complex. The Scottish Government is a signatory to the UK Marine Policy Statement. The Scottish Government has consequent jurisdiction over marine planning matters from 0 -12 nautical miles and has executively devolved powers (from the UK Government) for marine planning matters from 12 – 200 nautical miles. Marine Scotland takes overall responsibility for most marine planning matters; Transport Scotland is responsible for ferry services, ports and harbours; and Scotland’s local authorities currently have responsibilities for aquaculture. This work is also supported by Local Coastal Partnerships. There are also considerable overlaps with components of the terrestrial planning system via statutory arrangements such as the River Basin Management Plans of the SEPA-led Area Advisory Groups. In short there is a complex multi-agency governance framework for policy and decision-making in the development, management and conservation of the marine environment. This framework has developed organically and is still developing.

A more regional approach to marine planning issues is now on the near horizon. The Marine (Scotland) Act gives Scottish Ministers powers to establish Regional Marine Planning Partnerships (RMPPs), but this is a work in progress and therefore the development would benefit from strategic join up with a community empowerment agenda. Efforts to ‘engage’ communities in policy-making via public consultations in recent years has been notable, but for the reasons set out in response to Question 1 below there is currently reduced scope for meaningful and genuinely community-led policy-making.

This response therefore focuses simply on two aspects of the Community Empowerment Bill:

1. Outcome Improvement processes
2. The future role of Regional Marine Planning Partnerships

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

We do not attempt to consider whether the Bill will empower communities generally. We also recognise that the Bill was not designed to empower communities in relation to marine planning. However, for many coastal communities decision-making around the use and development of the inshore marine area is of vital importance to the health of those communities. Participation in those processes is therefore a wider requirement of their empowerment. The development of Scottish Marine Regions (and their RMPPs) is understandably a work in progress – such a major administrative change cannot be effected overnight. The continuing lack of clarity around regional marine planning therefore remains a significant blind-spot in the community empowerment agenda. The Clyde and Shetland Scottish Marine Regions will likely develop as ‘pilot areas’ for the roll-out of regional marine planning. This is an approach we support, as both regions will identify a wide spectrum of different challenges owing to the fact that Shetland comprises just one local authority, whereas the Clyde encompasses seven local authority areas.

Section 12 of the Marine (Scotland) Act provides that Scottish Ministers may develop regional marine plans and delegate functions in relation to those RMPs to a ‘delegate’ (or Regional Marine Planning Partnership). A commissioned report for the Scottish Coastal Forum suggested that the delegate be supported by a technical group; and consultative/advisory groups. The consultative and advisory groups would appear likely to be the only mechanism for community involvement in decision-making and there is no obvious recommendation that would ensure communities have a transparent procedure to proactively request participation in the work of the RMPP. “The Scottish Ministers’ direction should require the establishment of general, topic or geographically based advisory or consultative groups to assist in preparation of the Regional Marine Plan. The number, remit and administrative arrangements of such groups should be decided by the delegate.”

LINK MTF members therefore suggest that procedures for participation requests in outcome improvement processes outlined in sections 17-24 the CE Bill could be considered as a mechanism for giving communities a clear right to participate in regional marine planning. This would indeed contribute to the wider National Performance Framework. One of the 50 key indicators of the Scotland Performs framework (designed to track progress towards achieving Scotland’s National Outcomes) is “Improve the state of Scotland's Marine Environment.”

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill

No comment

3. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill? If not what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

No comment

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Section 16 & Schedule 2 set out the definition and list of “public service authorities” respectively. Regional Marine Planning Partnerships (because they do not yet exist) are not listed in Schedule 2. LINK members note that this list can be modified by Scottish Ministers in the future, but suggest that it would be a strategic time to consider how regional and national marine planning processes can be integrated with community planning processes more widely and whether this would have any implications for the draft Bill.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?
No comment

This response was compiled on behalf of LINK Marine Taskforce and is supported by:

- Hebridean Whale and Dolphin Trust
- Marine Conservation Society
- National Trust for Scotland
- RSPB Scotland
- Scottish Ornithologists Club
- Scottish Wildlife Trust
- Whale & Dolphin Conservation
- WWF Scotland

From: Bruce Morrison – Ferintosh Community Council

Received: 8/10/2014

Hi there,

Some comments on the 'participation request' idea.

- The way it is described in the video would be usable by a Community Council like ourselves with no help required

- I question, however, the statutory approach to compulsion of public servants to comply and respond. Re-designing services through formal request and response will not be nearly as effective as would improving working relationships between public officials and residents. For that to happen there has to be education and culture change and introducing more form filling takes vital time away from relationship building.

From: Jeannie Mackenzie

Received: 6/10/2014

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee ask the following questions for individuals and groups to respond to:

- Do you think the Bill as it stands is the best way of getting people's ideas in front of the decision makers? More support needs to be built in to help groups be constituted and the public bodies concerned should be obliged to set out in public their reasons for NOT making the changes. These reasons should have to fall into specific criteria - public bodies should not be let off the hook with spurious excuses.

- Would you use this new right? Yes, definitely. I am involved in a local group which may well wish to make such representation to a public body. As an individual, I often have creative ideas for improving services, but don't feel at the moment I have anywhere to take these ideas.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee, 2nd Report, 2015 (Session 4) — Annexe D

- If not, why not?

- What would stop you? I think what would stop people becoming involved would be the need to form a 'properly constituted' group. Some groups need support to achieve this and the current community development workforce is too poorly resourced at present to do this work.

- Would you find it easier to participate as a group or individual? Sometimes an individual has a very good idea for improving public services, but lacks the time or opportunity to find others and form a constituted group. Therefore, there should be also be a place for individual ideas to be presented.

- What help do you need to become involved? Personally, I don’t require any, but many groups may. They need strong advocates of community empowerment, people skilled in helping groups form and achieve constitution. The workforce in community development needs to be better resourced.

From: Mairianna Clyde

Received: 7/10/2014

Dear Sir/Madam

I am responding to your request for feedback on the Community Empowerment Bill, specifically on how local groups or individuals can have an idea and engage with local government to improve the delivery of services.

I am a member of a community council in Edinburgh, and have been for some years. I have endured no end of frustration with the City of Edinburgh Council in response to issues that residents think are a good idea but the Council apparently does not.

I do not see how the proposals in the bill as outlined in your video take us any further forward. Councils like Edinburgh are battle-hardened into saying 'No'. The usual excuse is 'resource implications' but more honest councillors will tell you frankly that the real reasons initiatives from the public are not carried forward is 'lack of political will'. Another frequent excuse we hear for doing nothing is 'we have insufficient powers'. Councils employ wily officials who are able to cite numerous laws as to why they can't do what you request. They are less good at finding laws which might actually support their authority to be proactive - except where it suits their own purposes, but not yours. For instance when a group of Edinburgh citizens recently challenged the right of the Council to appropriate 4.5 ha of a public park in order to build a school, successfully gaining a Court of Session ruling in their favour (clarifying the law on common good which suggested that Councils did not have the alleged right), the Council sought the advice of its legal department and overturned this ruling via a private bill from the Scottish Parliament. Now councils all over Scotland are gearing up to consider how they might also acquire common good land for public building purposes thanks to this precedent.
In your video, which featured Whale Arts Centre in Edinburgh, you suggested that the bill aimed to ensure that local people had some say in the services they received and in being able to approach the local council with fresh ideas. You stated that whilst people could come forward with an idea, that currently a Council did not need to respond, but that the bill would mean that councils will now be obliged to respond. Sorry, but this seems like a minuscule gain for local democracy! The right to receive a response! The right to be told No! The obligation of a Council to engage in a futile exercise they have no intention of delivering on! I fail to see how this will lead to actual delivery, given our experience of a 'listening Council' like Edinburgh, especially as your bill proposes that the group must comply with a range of criteria which will put a brake on initiatives and ensure they are controlled by the Council. I'm sorry, but this does not sound like people power, just more authoritarian paternalism of the kind that is a dead weight on civic life in Scotland. It does not enable proactive citizenship.

I cannot speak for other parts of the country but I will say quite emphatically that to their credit, the City of Edinburgh Council DOES respond. It is a 'listening' Council. However that is not to say that it necessarily responds in the way that residents wish, even when they have presented a good case. The way it responds is often to prevent you from going forward with your suggestion by attempting to educate you into how futile and intractable are the proposals you are trying to put forward. They have a welter of ammunition with which to stymie civic initiative.

I will give a couple examples of civic initiatives in my fifteen years of campaigning which have been killed stone dead by a local authority paying only lip service to being a 'listening' Council.

1. Houses in Multiple Occupation

About the turn of the millennia residents in tenemental areas in Edinburgh began experiencing considerable disruption and nuisance from rented flats in areas such as Marchmont. A problem had built up in the 1990s (after Thatcher's 1989 Short Assured Tenancy Act de-regulated the private rented sector, ending 74 years of consensus on fair rents and security of tenure in the private rented sector that had informed policy since the Glasgow Women's Rent Strike of 1915). The 1991 census had revealed only 3% of city centre dwellings were in the private rented sector; the 2011 census revealed that this was now closer to 20%. That this was concentrated in particular streets of an already compact city exacerbated the problem. The problem was specifically that this intensive type of use was accumulating in whole stairs, pushing the settled population out, because there was no on site management. Loud music, frequent parties, litter, stairs not being swept, gardens left to go to ruin, railings being removed, fires, floods, caused owner-occupiers to vote with their feet. As For Sale signs went up the properties were bought by other landlords so that over time only a minority of mainly elderly residents too ill to move were left to manage an unmanageable situation, and there were no longer 'neighbours' in the accepted sense to aid or support them, as the tenants changed so frequently.
In response to this, a local group was formed in Marchmont called Magpie, which initially took an environmental focus to the problem, but eventually began arguing for HMO planning controls to be implemented on a per stair quota basis, as it was discovered that Glasgow had done. This group gained some support from a sympathetic ward councillor.

The Scottish Government also began new legislation on HMOs around that time, but this was geared towards helping tenants, and not towards addressing the fact that tenants, in unmanaged situations, could be making victims of others. Licences for HMOs were to be placed under the control of local authorities and it was hoped that those who were victims of badly managed HMOs might also receive some justice via this means. But sadly this was not to be the case.

Around 2003 the Council also began plans to implement Neighbourhood Partnerships in accordance with recent legislation. NPs were an attempt to do what the community empowerment bill now attempts to do, bring local government closer to communities and enable a more participative approach; and at the initial public meetings, councillors and officials were bombarded by legions of residents wanting action via planning controls on the HMO issue.

Accordingly one councillor proposed setting up a Short Life Working Group on HMOs, to which Magpie and various community councillors like myself were invited to send representatives, but it quickly became apparent that this was a set-up to ensure that though there was an appearance of democracy and participation, that the community's proposal for planning controls or other remedial action would be perpetually blocked. Representatives of various Council services and departments were invited to attend, including those in the Council charged with the new HMO legislation, the Council's legal services, Edinburgh University Students Association, Edinburgh University Accommodation Service, and various landlords and letting agents associations. Discussions were repeatedly stalled by an inability to make any progress because residents groups were outnumbered and outgunned by the preponderance of other stake-holders. As we attempted to move the ball across the pitch, we would find that one or other stake-holder was neatly positioned to block it. Game, set, and match, to Goliath v David.

I accept that governance is always a compromise, and that you can only hope to get a portion of what you ask for, but every single proposal as regards fairness for permanent residents in the implementation of the HMO legislation by the Council that residents groups put forward was blocked. I finally gave up on attending this group when our modest proposal that the Council at least keep a record to be presented before the licensing committee of known bad landlords who owned multiple properties across the city each time a licence renewal came up, was refused on the spurious grounds by the Council's legal officer that this would breach data protection and compromise the landlord's human rights... I had vainly thought this was one area at least that we could all have agreed on; the Council doesn't like bad landlords who avoid registration and other legal compliances; tenants don't like dodgy landlords who withhold deposits and fail to make repairs; ditto university accommodation officers with a duty of care towards students; letting agents and landlords associations like to put across an image of responsible professionalism, so they don't appreciate rogue landlords tarring the rest either. To cap it all, the said legal officer came up with a new legal directive... from the EU, which stated that henceforth all licences granted by local authorities to commercial operators were to be regarded as the perpetual property of the operator, and that once a licence had been granted 'Europe' was effectively blocking the Council's ability to refuse a licence renewal to a rogue landlord on any grounds whatsoever!

Any educated person can see that the law can be variously argued and interpreted. Such is the complexity of the law that authority can usually be found (after scrutiny and reasoning) when authority is needed. What we were perpetually confronted with was a refusal to engage in that process. Or as one councillor honestly and helpfully put it, 'the lack of political will'.

2. Seagull Action Group

In recent years lesser black backed gulls have been nesting on urban rooftops so successfully that their numbers have increased dramatically and during August at the height of the nesting season these become a fearsome problem, nosediving and threatening attacks on residents. Sometimes they actually do attack - the back of the head, causing gashes needing stitches, and sometimes concussion. Earlier in the season noise and bird mess are the main problem. This species is social and forms large colonies so that there is a build up of the problem over several years where the birds find easy nest sites. And they find that the flat sections of tenement roofs are particularly amenable as here they have space to form large groups. Thus large gull colonies build up where there are also large concentrations of people. So large numbers of residents suffer large amounts of noise and mess. In my local streets we took direct action ourselves after the Council refused to do anything, saying it was not a statutory responsibility and as it was private property it was therefore for private owners to do something. Community meetings were held. I raised money amongst neighbours to hire a falconer as I'd heard this had been tried in Dumfries, and over two seasons between 2000 and 2001 we had entirely eradicated the problem. It was astonishingly successful.

But it became clear that it wasn't the falconer/falcon that was doing the trick, but the nest clearance that he and I undertook to remove the nests as we walked across the roofs. The next and next again seasons I didn't bother to hire the falconer but did these patrols myself with the help of a neighbour. This method was so astonishingly simple, cheap, and effective, (and non-violent) that I felt I had to tell the Council about it, so that other communities could do the same. This fell on deaf ears, and advice was not amended in published Council leaflets which continued to say 'there is nothing you can do'. But not all communities are so well organised, especially in those tenement areas where there is now a large transient population with few owner-occupiers or long term residents willing to take ownership of the issue.

One of our community councillors lived in such an area, and using my experience of what works as a template, she managed to win the support of the Transport and Environment Committee to make a trial of similar methods in her area during 2011-2012. This was an astonishing achievement, and the project (surprise, surprise) came out under budget, just as I advised it would do; because once you gain access to one tenement roof in a street, you can access all the others in that street section. The logistics of the operation turned out to be far less than the Council had anticipated, and I felt vindicated. The legal issues of such action and access were also explored and found not to be a problem. The costs were negligible. The project was deemed a success. Gull nuisance isn't a specific statutory responsibility, but other aspects of environmental responsibilities do come into play. For instance gull faeces spread a number of pathogens such as e-coli, cryptosporidium and campylobacter. Plus, a Council can choose to take on non-statutory responsibilities if it so wishes. Festivals aren't a statutory responsibility either, but Edinburgh does plenty of them.

But following the local elections and a change in the political composition of the Council, the continuation of the project was abandoned by the next Convener. Grounds of cost were raised as an excuse, although the costs were spurious; Council labour only was used, and there were no capital outlays. The trial was a pilot, merely for the Council's pest control service to become aware of how easily this menace could be dealt with from within the Council's own resources. What I had envisaged emerging out of this eventually was a small Council 'hit' team, of about three men, doing about 12 hours nest clearance during May, June, and early July, plus some slight administration costs. This 'service' would eventually be available to affected areas throughout the city on a rota request basis, as what I discovered was that once nesting populations are dislodged by intensive, targeted action, they disperse and do not return to that area. Thus over several seasons, bit by bit, city centre tenement areas could be progressively cleared of gull colonies.

Having campaigned and attempted to raise the profile of this problem over many years, and having discovered how cheap, effective, and humane the simple solution to it is, I was bitterly disappointed to find that such civic endeavour was so lightly cast aside, apparently on the whim or prejudice of the new Convenor, who seemed to be under the impression that mine's was a 'posh' area trying to hog scant resources, though it contains streets where low income groups live, and it was specifically these sorts of areas that our initiative was trying to help. Plus my plan was to help all of the city, but a bit at a time (unless further resources became available). Citizens can be patient if they see some steady progress; what is utterly disheartening is to see none at all, and problem just ignored.

I could cite several other incidences where local groups have campaigned on local issues and not got anywhere.

I have therefore come to the reluctant conclusion that if community empowerment is ever to be meaningful it needs to bypass large unitary authorities like Edinburgh. The bill's proposals may work better in smaller more rural authorities where there is more of a face-to-face society, life is simpler, and the layers of bureaucracy are less complex.

Direct action by community groups accessing funds directly from the Scottish Government for projects and receiving advice and assistance from the SG to run them themselves would I feel work better than having to deal with the fickleness, bad faith, and arterial sclerosis of large local authorities.
Allotments Video - Responses

From: Ron Smith

Received: 13/11/2014

Quite frankly, I am flabbergasted by this latest 'consultation'. It seems to relate only to allotments, a subject which has little to do with true 'community empowerment'. Even worse, the video relates to only a temporary arrangement at the (welcome) whim of a prospective developer, pending development.

Whilst I would be the first to support any reasonable legislation to ensure that there is a proper provision of permanent allotment garden sites for folk who want them, having promoted two allotment garden sites when I was responsible for the Regeneration of Oatlands in Glasgow and being the Chairman of Burgh Beautiful Linlithgow, I feel that this should NOT be under the heading of 'community empowerment'.

As you will be aware, I did respond to the last stage of the consultation, suggesting that the best form of community empowerment would be the delegation of a range of powers to local communities - 'town councils' or similar. As far as I can see, this representation was completely ignored.

This is most disappointing!

Perhaps the title of the bill needs to be changed to the 'Allotments and Extension of Bureaucracy Bill'!

From: Karen Allan

Received: 21/11/2014

I started the Stonehaven Allotments a few years ago. Despite having many interested members, we got the run-around from the Council who, legally, only have to "consider" providing allotments, not actually provide them!! They asked us what land we wanted, we asked them what land they had, they offered us land, then changed their mind, offered us other land, changed their minds again, and offered us the land they proposed in the first place! All this took about 3 years by which time some of our founding members were too old, others were losing heart, and people were starting to fall out. It is all sorted now, after a generous donation and fundraising helped us on our way, but it was such a strain I would be loath to get involved in a similar project. I propose that District Councils MUST provide land, and perhaps some money, and that allotment societies be set up under the auspices of Community Council. Local parks could also contain community gardens, perhaps not with vegetables, but with herbs, flowers (for bees) and fruit trees/bushes.

That is my tuppence worth.

Good luck!
From: Lynne Palmer

Received: 19/11/2014

Community Empowerment Bill,: further questions. FAO Kevin Stewart MSP & Ann McTaggart. I received an email asking for more suggestions. Lynne Palmer, Nov. 19th 2014.

1) What are the benefits of having access to an allotment?
In my experience, stress relief & relaxation are at the top of the list. Also distraction from life’s problems/escape etc. Relief from city life. Fresh air & exercise. Good for anyone living in a flat or tenement/multi-storey. Contact with natural things & seeing wildlife. Growing & eating your own food & enjoying the growing process.
Some plot-holders enjoy the hard physical work; I remember some years ago asking one tenant about the amount of digging she did, by her response I judged that she loved it & watching her I noticed that the rhythm of digging was possible what she enjoyed. Others I have noticed have great problems getting on with the hard graft, including myself!

2) What other types of spaces could be used to grow food & plants?
   a. Community gardens on land which Local Authorities don’t (or won’t) seem to get on & make use of e.g. in Perth, Tulloch Marshalling Yards. Also there’s a large open space of green land between the Marshalling Yards & the back of Fairfield Housing Association; this land includes The Town Lade & a narrow public footpath. These could be incorporated with a new growing area/community garden.
   b. Bee-keeping could happen on railway sidings or unused railway land. High fences keep people off railways in built-up areas, at least they do at the above mention site. But danger need not be a problem as proper training should be given to bee-keepers who are in an authorised group with permits to enter by certain locked gates.

3) How could a food-growing plan assist you?
As I don’t grow fruit & vegetables, (I have flowering shrubs & plants), I can only suggest help for an allotment association that has problems with pests/diseases. e.g. eel worm on potatoes on more than one plot. So a Plan for plot-holders to try & rid their Association of pests by agreeing to the Plan & sticking to it. An Association would have to start practicing working together.

From: Jane Brennan

Received: 24/11/2014

Hello

We are Edinburgh Garden Partners, an Edinburgh based/focused charity that matches up people who have growing space to spare with those who want to grow.
We target people on the allotment waiting list and match them with people who can no longer, for whatever reason, manage their gardens. They share the garden space and share the produce. A very simple and obvious idea that works really well. We currently have over 50 gardens in production just now with around 90 volunteer gardeners involved.

In reality the people who 'gift' their green space for sharing in this way are elderly, vulnerable people who can no longer maintain their outside space. In return for giving over a dedicated patch to a volunteer gardener the garden is maintained (basic tidying and keeping it looking 'looked after'). It's an exchange that works well and very often results in lasting friendships and an improved quality of life for the elderly garden owners.

If any more information would be useful at this stage please do not hesitate to get in touch.

Best regards

From: Gavin Rosborough

Received: 25/11/2014

Hi Anne,

It’s good to hear you are involved in something like this. I have recently got a small allotment in Yoker. I’m on a waiting list for Scotstounhill which I have been for around 3 years now – getting an allotment isn’t easy and the allotments that are available are not full size allotments due to the government not providing funding and land to expand current plots. The Yoker allotments is a perfect example of this, the surrounding areas have a massive amount of disused space which should be looked at with a view for expansion.

1. What are the benefits of having access to an allotment?
   - Growing your own food and helping the environment is one of the main perks of having an allotment. It also helps communities together and increase friendship within the local community.

2. What other types of spaces could be used to grow food and plants?
   - Disused ground should be used to kick-start new allotment space, there is so much disused ground around the communities it should be used which will reek benefits in the long term as the communities start to bond together.

3. How could a food-growing plan assist you?
   - A food growing plant would help in the learning of growing your own food and how to maintain the land you have. This learning process will be passed on to the younger generation which is would hope to carry on growing.
From: Nick Virgo

Received: 25/11/2014

Dear Ms McTaggart

This is my response to the request for feedback on the allotments part of the Community Empowerment Bill. Apologies, I ramble on a bit.

What are the benefits of having access to an allotment?

I’ve had an allotment with my wife in Riddrie by the M8 for the past twelve years or so. The first thing I would say is that despite where it is situated, it is a haven and it is amazing how quickly the noise of traffic disappears as I get on with digging and planting. For me, there is a whole aspect of mental well-being associated with having my plot. It’s not just about physical health and I think this is very important. In high summer we spend at least 17 person hours on the plot per week which I think is a considerable investment of time but absolutely worth it.

We grow a lot of plants as well as veg. Some of the plots are places of extreme beauty when they are fully in bloom. I greatly value the impact this has on our environment. This year our plant growing had the knock on effect of there being enough seedlings to put up hanging baskets in our back court.

We are virtually self-sufficient over the summer months for vegetables. Apart from huge levels of self-satisfaction, I have become more aware of issues around the politics of food: it’s quality, taste, where it comes from and who gets it. The first pack of supermarket salad leaves in the Autumn always highlights these things: it is such a huge disappointment when it could be so much more.

What other types of spaces could be used to grow food and plants?

There are all kinds of spaces begging to be grown on. For example large areas of land in Royston and Cranhill which are currently serving no real purpose could be used for growing. I know that groups like Dennistoun Diggers in Glasgow have been proactive in growing on new sites. I’m also aware of pop-up community gardens. My one fear is the transitory nature of many of these: here one moment and gone the next. I was particularly sad when I realised that the Greyfriar’s Gardens in Glasgow Merchant City was only temporary. It was obvious considering the amount of development going on round about, but so many people appeared to have caught the growing bug and in the heart of a city too. I understand they are now joining the waiting lists for allotments outwith the Merchant City.

I think there is room for all kinds of strategies where land is reclaimed on a temporary basis, but local authorities must be proactive and back this up by creating additional allotment sites which are permanent and which meet popular demand. Growing spaces need to be nurtured over years if necessary; a small orchard or decent area for strawberries or other fruit isn’t created in one season. Only permanent spaces will enable this.
If there is one drawback to some of the community gardens I’ve seen, it tends to be to do with the size of growing spaces that are available. These tend to be just large containers. Not much can be grown on them. The old size of allotment was always meant to be enough to sustain a family of four. This seems like a good definition of what an optimum size of growing space should be. Obviously, different people will have different needs but these spaces need to be flexible and cater for all kinds of commitment and need. But I would hate to see spaces proscribed but what is convenient for an authority and not for a grower.

Twelve years ago, our plots were derelict and we couldn’t give them away. Over the last six years, we have created a variety of spaces on our plots: the majority are still full-size plots but we also have a number of half and quarter plots and raised beds. These enable people with different needs and abilities to work on them. Some trade up over the years and some trade down. Some just try out a raised bed for a year and then decide it is not for them. We also have customers from Fair Deal and the Riddrie Centre using their own spaces on the site. It is a thriving community.

How could a food-growing plan assist you?

I’m one of the lucky ones. However, I’ve worked in primary schools in Glasgow’s East End and know that getting decent food (or even enough food in some cases) really is a central part of changing people’s lives. Connecting with growing and rediscovering how to cook it is an important part of that.

Anecdotally, our plots have kept bees for the past two years. This year we had the first batch of honey (around 110 jars). At our open day, local people (not from the plots themselves) were queuing to bag a jar. I think the honey was a source of fascination (bees in Riddrie), it was produced by the slightly odd people behind the fence (so that’s what they do), and it was also a source of local pride.

Many thanks for taking the time to read this. Hope it makes sense.

With best wishes

From: Barbara De La Rue

Received: 26/11/2014

There are benefits for the individual with access and also for the wider community.

For the individual:

* there is the opportunity to grow and consume really high quality fruit and vegetables - allotment soil has recently been shown by scientific studies to produce food with a greater range of nutrients than soil of commercial growers

* there is the opportunity for regular exercise in the fresh air,

* there is the companionship of other plot holders
For the wider community

* there is an attractive green space providing a safe habitat for a wide range of wild life (allotment gardeners tend to be mean about their use of pesticides)

* there is a reduction in 'carbon footprint' because the fruit and vegetables grown on allotments usually are grown and supplied to the table using relatively little petro-chemical derived fertiliser, little use of tractors and other petrol driven tools and little use of petrol driven transport.

What other spaces can be used to grow food?

Food can be grown in adequately sized private gardens, but modern developments are tending to minimize garden size. Food can also be grown in communal spaces, but the problem here is who has the right to use the crop. Food is best grown directly in the earth. It is fun, but financially crazy to grow food crops in small raised beds and window boxes. It is possible that the damage done to peat bogs in renewing the compost in such spaces far outweighs any carbon footprint benefits. Food grown commercially in polytunnels etc. requires large inputs of artificial fertiliser and pesticide.

How could a food growing plan assist me? Sorry I do not understand the question. What is meant by a food growing plan? Is this different from the advice given in a good gardening book?

Hope this is helpful

From: Karin Chipulina

Received: 26/11/2014

As an employee for Carr Gomm my remit is to help organisations who work with isolated members of the community in Edinburgh especially in Craigmillar to develop areas of ground to grow food in.

I can therefore say from my own experience of working in this field for 20 odd years that growing food, and being outdoors has many values and one of the very important ones is combating isolation.

Obviously there are an incredible amount of other benefits, difficult to quantify but these include, self-reliance, empowerment, self-esteem, socialisation, community cohesion, health, better diet, fitness, better integration of different cultures through cooking, creating local food networks, keeping things local, fresher food and so on.

Other types of spaces could be roof tops, walls, stalled spaces, brown field land, small areas of unused ground around the centre of town and backyards.

A local food growing plan would assist me in making it easier to find accessible land for various communities, make it more straightforward when it comes to leases and costs and make it easier to get in touch with the right person in the council to deal with such issues.
It is sometimes hard for communities to understand planning laws and who owns which areas of land. It would also be useful as there would be a better understanding of the value of growing food and the many benefits it brings.

From: Barbara Glass

Received: 1/12/2014

Having been an allotmenteer for the past three years and having worked in the social care sector for thirty nine years, I would like to comment favourably on the stabilising influence that allotments offer in our communities.

Both from an intergenerational and a socioeconomic perspective, the shared experience of working the soil transcends many levels.

Varying gender, cultural, ethnic and religious beliefs work side by side.

Our own allotment is one of the oldest and we have a made space for a local nursery, primary school and learning disability project - alongside our plotters in their eighties and our patents of new babies.

It is imperative that we protect these stable legacies for the future generation.

The opportunity to grow organic, low carbon impact food and sustain our living environment whilst developing our neighbourhoods shared responsibility for biodiversity is a valuable life skill but needs to be sensitively managed by local government and local people and needs to be maintained at a level wee can afford

From: Georgia Skinner

Received: 2/12/2014

I was the Secretary of Aden Community Allotment Association for two years right from the very start of the project from the find raising right through to our first growing season. Would like to help in any way possible.

From: Rob Gray

Received: 2/12/2014

Allotments in Scotland where who are owned and let by a local authority must be compatible with current laws i.e. the human rights act Allotments holder must be forced to join an allotment association to obtain an allotment from a local council.

Policing of allotment sites in scotland where the land is owned and let by a local authority must be policed by them and not by the allotment association to whom of many are left in charge in some circumstances are left to run an allotment site with over a hundred people on them without having the proper funding nor training to do so.
From: Laura Thomson

Received: 3/12/2014

I have heard that you’re interested in hearing from people with experience of allotments and community growing and have posed several questions. I’d like to share with you how having an allotment since February of this year has benefitted me.

I am 41. I was diagnosed with mental health problems in my late twenties having been ill but untreated for a long time. I have had various jobs - from temping in various offices as a student to being a Public Relations Executive. Most of the time I was feeling pretty desperate - I couldn’t cope with the interpersonal relationships in the workplace, wasn’t actually good at what I was doing and didn’t see the point to most of it in any case. When I had a psychotic breakdown and was finally diagnosed I was working as a Training & Development Advisor for ScottishPower. After several failed attempts to return to work they and I accepted that this wasn’t going to happen and I accepted an Ill Health Retiral when I turned 31.

There followed ten years of therapy, medications, illness, self-harm and changing diagnoses. I made a few attempts to work again, self-employed or as a volunteer. None of these really had a happy ending. I’d try one activity after another, trying to find some kind of meaning to my life but couldn’t sustain my interest for more than a few days or a couple of weeks. Every time I dropped the threads of a project I felt a failure. I was depressed, unfulfilled and couldn’t see that there was any point in living. I was so ill that Leverndale authorised me to take a high, unlicensed dose of one of my medications with the attendant risks to my physical health that this brings.

In September/October last year I decided to try gardening. I planted vegetable seeds in troughs in a cold frame my parents weren’t using. I watered them. They grew as I watched and, eventually, I ate them. I had grown my own food! Here was something for which I could see the point in working even when I didn’t feel much like it. I kept adding pots and troughs to my parents’ garden and had good results. But I wanted more … and my parents wanted their garden back!

At the beginning of this year I decided to take the plunge and apply for an allotment. I expected to have to wait years and I would have if I wasn’t prepared to travel. It takes two hours to reach ‘Lottie’ by public transport, a little less if I can afford to take the train. Lottie was in quite a state when I first met her but the Allotment Committee gave me lots of support and practical help (and two skips and a lot of muscle power) but by June of this year I was cooking food I’d grown myself. My best moment this year has been cooking a meal using only produce I’d grown myself.

Over the year I’ve learned that:

* I am strong and love hard, physical work.
* I can make friends with people I have something in common with.
* I can work as part of a team.
* It’s OK to ask for help.
* People seem to like me.
* Sometimes all you need is to sit down and watch the birds.

My mental health has improved greatly - I’ve had my medication reduced three times this year and am nearly back to the licensed dose. I’m stronger and healthier than I have been in years. I’m eating well of fresh, organic produce. I’m getting exercise. I’m making friends - something I haven’t been able to do for a very long time, if ever. And I know that there is one place I can go to in Glasgow when I’m feeling ill that somehow makes me feel like all is well with the world.

I couldn’t cope with the world of work and I don’t know if I’ll ever work again. In today’s climate that left me feeling useless and a drain on society even though I knew I’d done my best and damaged myself in the process. But Lottie has given me purpose and a fulfilment I have never felt before. I don’t know why working outside to grow my own food should make such a difference. But it does.

From: Dr Lindsay Neil

Received: 4/12/2014

Comment on the forthcoming Community Empowerment Bill

Allotments

There is no doubt that there is a national demand for allotment provision as there is indeed in Selkirk. A need identified in 2007 was partly met by an entirely private allotment initiative in Bannerfield housing estate in lower Selkirk but the Community Council was unable to help towards allotment provision in Selkirk burgh proper owing to Local Authority inability/refusal to provide. The successful initiative provided 15 allotments for 20 people but there is a present unmet demand for another dozen.

It is also noteworthy that a recent Forestry Commission scheme in D & G to provide 10 smallholdings generated 90 applicants. So one can conclude from these and other sources that there is an embedded desire in Scotland to be part of the food production chain and a widespread desire to ‘grow your own’.

Food security for the next decades must be given a high priority. There is compelling and irrefutable argument for developing a greater level of food production because of the international situation. One of the predictable problems facing the world and Scotland in the next 50 years is shortage of food. This is because of unrestricted world and UK national population increases, diminishing food resources owing to many factors and increasing cost due to competing international demand for what food is available. Add to this unpredictable physical calamities such as weather, conflict etc.
Scotland currently meets approximately 70% of its own food needs before imports. Figures for Scottish agricultural production in the early 1970s show that Scotland produced a surplus¹. This was used to trade for those things which don’t grow well here and is a situation we should strive to recreate.

Encouraging individual ‘home’ expertise in growing food and exploiting popular desire combined with developing potentially cultivable parcels of derelict or presently unused land all round the country is a way to achieve this. Greater provision of allotments could help but will only have a small overall impact. However the ability of the Scottish Parliament to recognise and plan for a predictable future food problem will proclaim to all that Scotland has a mature understanding of international problems. I have 4 suggestions on that which I will detail below.

Future food security is essential. This is a theme that runs through the 2008 “Committee of Enquiry into the Future of Scotland’s Hills and Islands”² (see recommendations 2,3,5,17 & 19, which all mention in passing the advantages of co-ordination among the various agencies in order to achieve better outcomes including food security)

Possible areas the Bill could address:

1. Peremptory encouragement to Local Authorities to provide allotments towards meeting the demand.

2. Empowerment of Local Authorities to use CPOs (Compulsory purchase orders) to acquire land to make allotment provision. The present slow CPO process could be shortened and criteria for CPO eligibility clearly defined for allotment purposes. (derelict or undeveloped land with unmatriculated planning permission, industrial sites etc and any appropriate land suitable for allotments).

3. Ex-industrial urban sites which would be otherwise too polluted for housing and too expensive to develop could be assessed for ‘carpetting’ with impermeable membrane enabling either topsoil or polytunnel facilitation of horticulture/allotments.

4. Extension of Crofting to the Lowlands and better enforcement of crofting regulations re absenteeism and dereliction. The re-establishment of crofts, where decrofting has taken place eg. in the furtherance of sporting estates. (See attached paper which was sadly disregarded when the Crofting amendment act was considered) [Not strictly allotments but can be considered alongside]

¹ ‘Scotland in Figures’ 1972 compiled by RBS.

Dr Lindsay D Neil, Selkirk, 3/11/2014

From: Maureen McKendrick

Received: 6/12/2014

I have been lucky enough to have had an allotment over the past 2 years and thought it important to share my experience so you can consider it when discussing the Community Empowerment bill.

My closest allotments (Budhill and Springboig) put me on their waiting list but in the meantime, I applied to Kennyhill Community Allotments and within a reasonably short time, I was offered a large raised bed to see how I managed this, was I able to plan, prepare the bed etc. and more importantly commit to maintaining it.

Kennyhill is a great site but it’s a 15 minute drive there and back so it’s not just around the corner.

My raised bed was a great success and within a few months I had potatoes, garlic, leeks, onions, strawberries, sprouts and swede all growing away. The only problem was the size of the bed and the constraints I faced due to the limitations of what I could physically cram into the ground!

In the meantime a large plot was being divided into quarters and I was offered one of them as my commitment to growing was clear to see and I was ready to start all over again.

This quarter plot gave me the scope to try out proper crop rotation, good growing principles etc. and I constructed 4 raised beds for this purpose. I grew tomatoes, broccoli, sweetcorn, courgette, and used the lasagne no dig method to try to minimise the amount of heavy digging while at the same time improving the soil.

This plot also opened the possibility of having a shed available for storing hand tools etc. and especially somewhere to shelter from the rain and take a well-earned break!

I had made so much good progress over the year that when a larger half plot came up for grabs I went for it straight away as I wanted to have the space to start off my growing as early as possible in a greenhouse and there just wasn't the space available in my quarter plot.

This half plot had been neglected and it was really hard work initially to clear the space of weeds, composting as much as possible and laying out raised beds, getting the ground ready for planting. This plot benefitted from an old greenhouse and linked shed so it provided all I needed for growing and shelter - apart from it being in a really derelict state! The fact that a gang of wasps also liked my shed did not deter me and we seemed to get along well by simply ignoring one another! (They were there first after all).

I was delighted to receive an email from Budhill and Springboig Allotments offering me one of 5 x plots which had become available. I walked round with a committee member and although I couldn’t get access to view my current plot, I knew right away that it was going to be the size I wanted and I would never have to move again.

The plot I have now is a full plot and has everything I need in the one place. I can properly rotate my crops, it has a pond with fish and all the associated wildlife this automatically attracts (cats and all), a good strong greenhouse and shed, running water, etc. and I can walk to it in 15 minutes.

This means that I now have the scope to become totally self-sufficient in terms of growing fruit and vegetables to feed my family. Large plots are not for everyone but it is really important that they remain available to those people who first of all prove they can commit the time and effort required to maintain them, but who also want to do what allotments are all about - i.e. saving money, managing what we as a family eat, know where the food is coming from and that it has been grown using good practice.

The current rumblings of having to reduce large plots in order to provide raised beds so that local government can meet their waiting list quotas fills me with dread. This move is absolutely not about promoting the benefits of becoming self-sufficient in producing food for a family, but is simply a box ticking exercise - literally a window box exercise in this case! because some of the raised beds currently being offered are no more than that.

All that is required to manage plot waiting lists effectively is that allotment committees become more organised and consistent in their guidance around what constitutes activity (i.e. a plot that is being actively worked) as opposed to a plot which is clearly being neglected. As long as monthly inspections are maintained and followed up, this will naturally make plots become available as people move out and thereby waiting lists will begin to fall naturally.

Allotments have been running themselves successfully for over a hundred years in some cases and will continue to do so. We don’t need bureaucracy to make things work better - please leave it to the people who know what they are talking about to make the right decisions for their communities.

From: G Williamson

Received: 7/12/2014

Dear All

I am an allotment holder in Kilmarnock and wish to respond to the community empowerment (Scotland) bill
The benefits of having access to an allotment are many but the basics include the benefit to health and wellbeing of the individual. My allotment provides me with much needed exercise at a pace suited to me and allows muscles all over the body to benefit from the non normal everyday use. This exercise promotes a better life for me and also helps to fight off the occasional small dips into a depression type mode which can happen to anybody.

The allotments also promote a sense of comradeship where everyone can help one another and be a social pleasure in meeting and discussing with others the benefits of what they are growing.

My allotment provides me with produce I would probably never buy but allows me to have a taste of the vegetables, it also allows me to pick fresh produce that is ready and picked and on my plate within hours.

My allotment gives me the chance to eat and control what I eat without incurring costs to my normal household bills as I am pretty much self-sufficient throughout the year in a lot of the vegetable areas.

My allotment also helps me know what has gone into the food I grow and eat and whether I wish to be organic or use chemicals which often end up banned in years to come.

My allotment give me a taste of what food was like years ago when food actually had a taste instead of being pumped full of chemicals and other ingredients.

My allotment encourages me to eat more healthy foods and more often instead of reverting to junk food.

My allotment has a wide species of bird life that may help keep the population growing instead of helping with their decline.

So to quickly sum up that section I would say health wealth and wellbeing are the main points of having an allotment.

Other types of spaces that could be used in growing food and plants are many and varied but require more encouragement and security as any work done in these areas may result in vandalism and a sense of despondency.

The use of communal space or a communal garden can be utilised to grow produce along with areas in public parks whereby the local populace may wish to be involved. I know from my experience of youth many years ago that going through our public parks when we had council gardeners was a lovely sight when the parks and gardens were in bloom. These have all been affected by various cut backs and the parks and gardens are no longer the places they used to be. Motorway and Bypass bankings can be used to grow more wildlife friendly areas as we often think only of ourselves when it comes to food produce.

A food-growing plan is like many other plans and ideas. It will only work if the weather allows it to work and the person follows it. I am all for a food growing plan as I have had an allotment now for 25 years and always seem to make the same mistakes every year but also have the same success every year. Food growing plans are possibly useful depending on the situation but I would never knock one without having tried it.

Allotment growing was a big issue during the war years whereby everything helped but nowadays the generations seem to care less and less about things like this and seem to believe that produce actually comes straight out of the ground all washed and clean and that every swede turnip is the same size and all fruit and veg can be bought cheaply and thrown away if not used. Too much foodstuff is sent to landfill and allotment use may help encourage less of this issue as you would then pick as you need and compost anything that goes over and thus return the compost back to the soil

From: Pat Abel

Received: 16/11/2014

This was discussed at a Land Use working group that arose from Edible Edinburgh and we endorsed the concerns put forward by John Glover at our first meeting.

Community Empowerment Bill – John Glover

John gave an outline of his paper on the concerns about the bill

- Participation Requests The right for community groups to pro-actively approach the public bodies including council and NHS with proposals to improve public services – could include proposals about planting and maintenance of their land. Concern that this right limited to devolved public bodies.

Extension and Improvement of pre-emptive community right to buy to include urban as well as rural land. However, Bill does nothing to assist community groups in raising the purchase price of the ground or building. Also there is no provision for specialist help and support for community groups going through the buy-out process.

- Community Right to Buy Abandoned and Neglected Land There is little in the way of definition and this could lead to decisions by Ministers be challenged in court by the landowner with the great loss of time and money for the community. Nor is there support for the community in finding out who the land owner is, this can be difficult and costly. Timescale from assessment of market value of the land to actual purchase has to be within 6 months. It may be difficult for a community to raise the purchase price in that time.

- Asset Transfer Requests – right to request transfer of ownership, grant of a tenancy or rights of use and management from certain public bodies. Where a transfer of ownership is sought there is a requirement that the community purchase vehicle be a SCIO or a company subject to an asset lock which, on winding up, prevents the property acquired under the asset transfer passing to members of the company; or such other constitutional form as may be prescribed. The community is to have the right to appeal if the decision does not go their way. Again the public bodies concerned include the Council and NHS but not bodies whose functions are outwith the devolved competence of the Scottish Parliament (e.g. MoD or Network Rail.) John thinks Westminster should legislate to make it possible to make participation and asset transfer requests to reserved public landowners.

- Common Good Land Councils will be required to publish registers of their common good land. However, the Bill does nothing to clarify the obscure rules on what is or is not common good land, and what can or cannot be done with it.

- Allotments Sections 77 and 78 They place local authorities under a duty to prepare, publish and keep under review a food-growing strategy. This should be separated out from the allotments section as it is about all forms of community growing and not just allotments.

As described in the Youtube, from the Grove Garden in Edinburgh, Community Gardens are a new and growing phenomenon, however, they come in many different shapes and sizes and therefore different needs. The land use sub group has put in a response to the Good Food Nation which might give an understanding of the place of community gardens. More than happy for you to visit the Gracemount Walled Garden and to discuss some of the issues the community there has to provide a long term hub for the community.
Dear Derek,

Re: Policy Memorandum on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee agreed its approach to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and will launch its call for evidence on the Bill on Thursday 26 June:

As part of its approach, the Committee has agreed I write to you seeking clarification on a number of issues relating to the Policy Memorandum (PM) which accompanies the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

The Committee notes that paragraph 28 of the PM states a concern “people might have difficulty in understanding the language of the draft legislation”. The elaboration sought in this letter is, in part, to address this concern and make it easier for those who want to participate in the legislative process and provide comment on the provisions to do so.

The questions set out in the Annex are also designed to seek elaboration on information to inform the Committee scrutiny of the Bill and make it easier to meet the challenging parliamentary timetable for consideration. A full response to these questions should significantly reduce the information the Committee will require to gather during the Stage 1 process.

Given the above the Committee have requested that a response to all questions, together with any other information you consider relevant, should be provided to the Clerk of the Committee by 1 August 2014 in order to assist those who wish to provide written evidence to the Committee.

In general whenever there is reference in the PM to planned guidance and/or regulations by the Government following the passage of the Bill, it would be helpful if the Committee could have an indication of what is to be contained in said guidance or regulations. In addition, in each instance, the Committee would ask that you indicate whether, and when, drafts of these will be available for the Committee to consider in support of stage 1 scrutiny.

If you, or your staff, have any questions, please feel free to contact the clerk of the Committee.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours sincerely,

Kevin Stewart MSP
Convener
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

CC: Joe FitzPatrick MSP – Minister for Parliamentary Business
Alasdair McKinlay - Head of Community Planning and Community Empowerment Unit, Scottish Government
Ian Turner - Community Planning and Community Empowerment Unit, Scottish Government
Jean Waddie – Scottish Government Bill Team leader
Robin Haynes – Scottish Government Local Government Unit
David McGill – Head of Chamber Office, Scottish Parliament
Susan Duffy – Head of Committees and Outreach, Scottish Parliament
Tracey White – Head of Legislation Team, Scottish Government
Jim Johnstone – Clerk to the Finance Committee, Scottish Parliament
Euan Donald – Clerk to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Scottish Parliament.
Introduction and Background sections

1. In paragraph 5 reference is made to the bill increasing the “pace” and “scale” of Public Service Reform. Given this statement please indicate the ways in which the Bill delivers on these aspects.

2. In the following line the bill cements the focus on achieving outcomes. Please indicate what parts of the Bill deliver this.

3. In paragraph 6 the bill will ensure people can “meaningfully participate”. Could you explain how that differs from the current participation set out in various parts of the memorandum, see for instance paragraph 12 which suggests local authorities use a range of methods.

4. Please provide examples of communities achieving “significant improvements” by doing things themselves as described in paragraph 7.

5. In paragraph 7 the suggestion is made the bill will increase employment. Please indicate which parts of the Bill will contribute to that together with an indication of the respective levels anticipated.

6. Please indicate, preferably with prior examples, how the bill will reduce inequalities as set out in paragraph 7.

7. Paragraph 7 states “Communities can often achieve significant improvements by doing things for themselves because they know what will work for them”. Can you point to evidence in support of this?

8. Could you indicate where the “responsibility” on all public service providers set out in paragraph 11 can be found?

9. Paragraph 12 states that when people are engaged in community issues and come into contact with elected members, “they are more likely to become involved in the electoral process themselves”, please reference to evidence in support of this statement.

10. Towards the end of paragraph 12 there is a suggestion that being ‘heard’ is an insufficient form of engagement in contrast to other parts of the Bill where communities being ‘heard’ is deemed a sufficient form of community empowerment. Could you please clarify this?

11. Please provide examples to justify the “inspire” suggestion in paragraph 12 and also examples of the evidence to support the statements in the second part of the paragraph.

12. In paragraph 14, and elsewhere, “place” is used in quotations. Please explain the significance of the quotations.

13. Paragraph 15 refers to the current CPP process including the role of communities. Could you provide a brief description of how this currently operates as the Committee have been unable to identify any CPP’s which have direct community representation.

14. Could you indicate the extent of progress since March 2012 to the introduction of the bill in developing community planning arrangements as set out in paragraph 16. This will assist the Committee in understanding the need for the Bill and put in context activities to date.

15. Given the statement in paragraph 20 that local authorities have greater experience than other public authorities (of community empowerment) can you explain in what ways this experience is to be shared, and in particular what role
What Works Scotland (paragraph 37) will play?

16. In relation to the examples in paragraph 25, please explain how community groups are assisted by the Procurement Reform Bill.(3rd bullet)

17. In relation to the 4th bullet, why is the “right” not being given to communities?

18. On bullet 6 please indicate what work is being taken forward following the Community Council Short Life Working Group reporting.

19. Please provide a link to the consultation analysis. (paragraph 27)

20. Could you indicate which stakeholders will be involved in development of guidance?

21. Given the overarching policy objective of community empowerment, please explain the extent to which the Bill supports delivery of the Scottish Government’s Low Carbon Scotland: Behaviours Framework?

Part 1 National Outcomes

22. Towards the end of paragraph 30 there is a suggestion that the National Performance Framework is “helping to change the way public services are delivered” can you explain in what ways this is happening and point to supporting evidence.

23. Please elaborate on the role of “National Wellbeing” as set out in paragraph 31 and how it links to Scotland Performs and the National Outcomes.

24. Section 1(6) refers to “any other person” carrying out functions of a “public nature”. Please provide some examples of who this might include.

25. The Policy memorandum is silent on sections 2 and 3. Please provide the policy thinking underpinning each of the review and reporting provisions.

26. What is the level of flexibility referred to in paragraph 32 and how might it be used.
27. Who will be consulted under 2(5)?

28. What is this government's intention in relation to the timescales to review and report.

29. Given the government currently publishes information, in what way will the provisions set out in paragraph 33 “enhance accountability”?

30. Who is ultimately accountable for delivery of the national outcomes?

31. Is the parliament expected to contribute to the delivery of the national outcomes and if so where is the scrutiny function?

32. Can you explain why there is no requirement to consult with or report to the parliament?

Part 2 Community Planning

33. Can you indicate the status of the guidance referred to in paragraph 35, and also indicate what other legislation exists in this area to support the suggestion legislation is not currently clear.

34. The Scottish Government “expects CPPs to drive public service reform effectively at local level. Can you indicate the steps being taken by the government to promulgate this expectation?

35. Please indicate, or reference to, the work of the Auditor General and Accounts Commission which has provided the “assurance” referred to in paragraph 37.

36. Can you indicate what is intended to happen with the evaluation referred to in paragraph 37.

37. In paragraph 38 is it the first consultation paper being referenced?

38. Paragraph 35 indicates a need to replace guidance with legislation. But paragraph 38 suggests new guidance will be produced. Can you elaborate and indicate to address the seeming contradiction. What is to be contained in new guidance?

39. Paragraph 39 places communities at the “core”. However it would appear from paragraph 39 their role is restricted to consultees. Please explain the apparent conflict.

40. In paragraph 40 can you confirm the CPP is required to publicly publish (see for example paragraph 32 re the Government) and also confirm towards what progress they must report.
41. In paragraph 41 mention is made of “key partners”, please confirm that the reports they are required to make will all be publicly available, and in what time frame.

42. Paragraph 42 discusses duties placed by the Bill. Can you extend to indicate how this is to be done, the policy thinking behind the making of these provisions and what the sanctions are for non-compliance.

43. Section 4(8) defines community bodies. In 4(5)(a) how will the selection process work and what role will the bodies chosen be asked/expected/permitted to fulfil?

44. Can you explain the need for section 5(3) given the existence of section 4(5). Are there differences in approach to be taken and if so why.

45. Why does section 6(1) not also apply to section 5(2)(b)?

46. Can you indicate what steps are expected of a CPP under 5(4)(b), will that include full public consultation of those in the relevant area? If not can you indicate why the community are not being empowered here?

47. How long do the plans last for and when do they require to be revised? Please indicate why no mandatory period is specified?

48. What timescale applies to the completion of section 7 plans?

49. Can you indicate what is meant in practice by “facilitate” in section 8(1)(a)

50. Please provide some examples of “reasonable steps” under 8(1)(b).

51. In what circumstances might 9(1) apply?

52. What is to be covered in guidance under section 10?

53. Please explain what is envisaged under section 11 and in particular how it might impact communities, groups and public authorities.

54. Please explain the purpose of section 12 indicating the circumstances envisaged and the potential impacts on the whole process.

Part 3 Participation Requests

55. This part would benefit from a general explanation indicating what powers are given under it, and setting out the background to the need for these powers.
56. While the Scottish Government sets clear expectations as set out in paragraph 45, it has been the Committee’s experience during recent inquiry work that public sector organisations do not engage in any meaningful sense. Given Part 3 does not replace the current “expectation” what action is the Government proposing to empower communities in the areas set out in paragraph 45?

57. Please indicate the policy thinking behind requiring a community-controlled body to have a written constitution.

58. Paragraph 46 makes clear communities do not need to be of place. What will happen if a community of interest with virtually no local residents as members seeks to become involved.

59. Perhaps the above might be an example of a reasonable ground to refuse. Could you indicate what might be covered by that provision.

60. What types of bodies or organisations might be covered by section 15(2)

61. Are ALEOS included as part of section 16, if not why not?

62. Does section 16 include the Urban Regeneration Companies?

63. This Part proceeds on the basis the community require to opt in to participation. Earlier the Committee has suggested empowerment would be better enhanced by an opt-out provision with communities automatically eligible unless they decline to participate. Please indicate the policy thinking in favour of the approach adopted as opposed to the Committee’s preference.

64. Paragraph 48 suggests a possible role is to “discuss”. Why is legislation necessary to facilitate a discussion, what prevents this simply being a function of consultation, or a follow up to consultation responses?

65. Please also indicate how “discuss” meets the test at section 17(2)(a).

66. What is envisaged in regulations under section 18?

67. Can you explain the reasons for the list at section 19(3)(c), why were those aspects chosen and how will this operate in practice to avoid any risk they are set at a level which will potentially exclude community involvement?

68. Can you indicate why no provision is made for the application request to be published, which might attract other interested groups.

69. There is no information provided covering sections 19-25 in relation to the process to be followed. Please explain the thinking behind and any derivation of each of these provisions. In so doing please indicate the benefits of the process at each stage for community participation.

70. What is the maximum period intended to be allowed for publication of a report under section 25?

71. The Financial memorandum is silent on the cost of handling a participation order. Please provide an estimated cost to local authorities for handling a request, including estimated costs for each scenario the Bill provides for.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy

72. The Committee has had no prior involvement in matters covered by this Part and consider the detail provided in this section of the Policy memorandum to be little more than a superficial overview. This does not at present provide the Committee with sufficient material to allow for this Part to be scrutinised in a timely manner as part of the Stage 1 process. Please provide detail of each section individually including the policy thinking behind any changes or reasons for keeping the right to buy provisions the same as the 2003 Act. The following paragraphs in addition to the detail requested here set out specific questions.

73. Please explain the rationale for the one million acres target referred to at paragraph 55.

74. Paragraph 56 refers to “These changes” please provide detail of each change including the reasoning behind making the change.

75. Please indicate who undertook the post-legislative scrutiny of the provisions in the 2003 Act, who was consulted, and provide detail of the findings of that work.

76. Paragraph 57 suggest the Bill provides a “framework”, please indicate where the detail is provided to enable the provisions to operate.

77. What are the “particular issues” referred to in paragraph 59?

78. Please detail the “substantial public benefit” referred in in paragraph 59.

79. Please indicate which consultation is being referred to in paragraph 59 and also provide detail around the position of the other 7% who did not support the extension of right to buy to urban areas. What are the other reasons for these provisions?

80. Please provide the detail surrounding paragraph 62, how many cases were over 80% and which ones were not. What were the views of the other respondents? Which changes have not been subject to consultation and please provide the reasons for not consulting in each case.
81. Paragraph 63 is a useful summary of the main amendments. However the Committee requires details of all amendments including the reasons for making each and the views of those who did not agree. Please also set out the benefits expected from each change.

82. The Committee requires detail of each of the new provisions providing right to buy abandoned or neglected land.

83. Please detail the “other options” referred to in paragraph 65.

84. Please set out the complexities highlighted by local government respondents referred to in paragraph 66.

85. In paragraph 66 please provide the reasons why government does not agree with the views of local government, and the expected benefits.

86. Given the earlier statement about the complexity of the legislation for consultees please amplify the summary provided in paragraphs 69 and 70.

87. The paragraphs covering alternative approaches (71-73) also require to provide detail of the level of support/opposition. What are the “appropriate circumstances” in paragraph 71?

88. Please provide detail of the “broader” rights sought by some stakeholders referred to in paragraph 72.

89. Who suggested the improvements referred to in paragraph 73 and to what extent etc. have they been subject to consultation.

90. Who undertook the “overall review” of the system and where can the details of findings be found.

Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests

91. Please provide detail of the provisions covered by this Part including in particular the policy thinking underlying the approach in each section. The following paragraphs in addition to the detail requested here set out specific questions.

92. Paragraph 77 and elsewhere in this Part use the phrase “Community bodies” as being the bodies who can apply. In fact the detail in the sections is much wider/narrower than the impression given by that phrase. Please provide full information on each class of body who can apply and the policy underpinning their inclusion. Please include reasons why they require to have a written constitution.

93. The basis of a decision is set out in section 55, please provide the policy thinking and linkage to the overall aims of the bill for each part, which we note also includes regeneration and public health as well as a more wider “any other benefit”. For the latter please provide some indications of what this might cover.

94. What impact will the Asset Transfer Requests’ process have on the Community Ownership Support Service in terms of its role and its resources?

95. Please provide detail of the consultation responses, as requested for earlier Parts. In particular for this Part the detail should cover the views of other public authorities.

96. Please indicate the anticipated demand under this provision, and any goals the Scottish Government has set.

97. Please provide indicative costs for handling each part of the process.

Part 6 Common Good Property

98. Please provide brief details of the “special rules” referred to in paragraph 86 and in particular any impact the bill’s provisions will have on them.

99. Paragraph 87 refers to consultees agreeing, please indicate what the views of the other 25% were, and provide detail of any proposals they suggested which are not being taken forward together with the reasons for not doing.

100. Please indicate how many local authorities currently have registers?

101. How long will local authorities have to establish a register or, amend an existing register to comply with the provisions of the Bill?

102. It would be helpful to specify detail of what bodies are covered in this section by the term “community bodies” (see section 67 of the Bill).

103. Please indicate why consultation on disposal is restricted to those community bodies with a known interest and how this fits with the transparency and consultation approach set out in paragraph 93.

104. Please indicate details of what the ministerial guidance might cover and when this will be available to the Committee.

105. Can you give an example of what might be considered to be a “significant dispute” referred to in paragraph 91, and who will adjudicate on what constitutes a “significant dispute”, and how such an adjudication can be challenged (see question 98)?

106. Given existing requirements referred to (accounting and asset management for example) what is the policy thinking behind not requiring ownership to be legally verified?
107. Why are there no appeal or review provisions in this Part of the Bill?

108. We note in paragraph 93 the demand for communities to have more say in the management of common good property. Please indicate how these provisions meet that aspiration.

Part 7 Allotments

109. Please provide a link to the National Food and Drink Policy referred to in paragraph 95.

110. We note the link in paragraph 99, Can you confirm that link is to the Working Group and contains up to date information on their meetings and recommendations. (see also below)

111. Paragraph 96 refers to consultation, please confirm which of the three consultations later referred to this is intended to cover.

112. Paragraph 96 helpfully sets out an overview of this Part. Unfortunately that is as far as the detail goes in the memorandum. Please provide detail of each section individually including the policy thinking behind any changes or reasons for keeping them the same as the original. Please provide detail of the original provision. The following paragraphs in addition to the detail requested here set out specific questions.

113. Does section 70(6) also apply to joint request made under section 70(5)?

114. Will the list be made public, in some way accepting Data Protection issues, and if not will the Local Authority be under any duty to indicate publicly the length of the list and expected waiting period?

115. Please provide some details of what might be considered “reasonable steps” as set out in section 72.

116. To how many local authorities is this provision expected to apply at commencement?

117. Please indicate the policy thinking behind setting the trigger in section 72 at 15? To how many local authorities will this apply at commencement?

118. Given the earlier work of the working group and the consultations please indicate the reason for allowing a further 2 years from commencement for regulations to be made. Please provide the same details covering section 77.

119. How many local authorities currently have regulations in place?
120. Please indicate what consultation with allotment holders and other persons will be undertaken by Ministers under sections 75 and 76.

121. Please explain why there is no consultation required under section 77 and thereafter any reviews.

122. What period do the government consider is a “reasonably practicable” one under section 79 and why has no specific time limit been specified. Do any local authorities currently produce such a report?

123. Please indicate the extent of the current problem anticipated by section 80.

124. Are delegated schemes of management currently operating, if so please detail experiences to date.

125. Please indicate the policy thinking behind section 82.

126. Please indicate the extent to which section 84 requires prior consultation with tenants.

127. Please indicate the types of produce intended to be covered by section 87 and the policy thinking underpinning this provision.

128. What will happen to items not removed timeously under section 88?

129. Please confirm regulations under section 90 will require consultation with the tenant concerned.

130. Please indicate the detail of the progress being made by the Working Group (paragraph 99) including detail on the recommendations covered by this Part and detail of those not covered including reasons for them not being covered and detail of how they will be taken forward in the future.

131. Paragraph 100 should also provide detail of the consultation responses relating to those supporting the provisions and details of areas not being taken forward. Detail of why the approach taken was thought appropriate and why other options were not is also required.

Part 8 Non-Domestic rates

132. Paragraph 101 refers to the “needs of businesses and the local economy” please indicate what these needs are linking to the promotion of resilient communities and sustainable places.
133. Parts 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the Bill could lead to community groups generating profits for community uses, how does Part 8 support the policy objectives of these Parts?

134. Please indicate the extent of the scope local authorities currently have to vary reliefs locally (paragraph 102 refers).

135. Please provide some examples of the potential uses of the powers being granted by this section.

136. Paragraph 102 indicates powers are without restriction, please indicate how this is consistent with the restrictions set out in paragraph 103.

137. Please indicate the extent to which consultation responses provided examples and full details of the consultation carried out including details of any suggestions received which are not being implemented. Please elaborate on what constitutes “strong support” and indicate the extent of the opposition and details of those not supporting. Please provide policy details covering the provisions in sections 94(2) to (4).

Effects on Equal Opportunities

138. When will the assessment be published?

139. Please indicate what is required under the public sector duty.

140. We note in paragraph 108 the inclusion of the equality duty when considering asset transfer and participation requests. Please indicate why this is not also necessary for other parts of the Bill.

141. In relation to the final sentence in paragraph 108 can you confirm the Government’s position regarding the completion of an EQIA. In what circumstances might this not be appropriate?

142. We note the last line in paragraph 113, which states that right to buy abandoned land is “either compatible with Article 1 of Protocol 1 or capable of being exercised in a manner that is so compatible”. Please provide more information on this view and clarify the circumstances where the government believes there may be a doubt over the compatibility of the purchase of such land.

Island Communities

143. Given the subject matter of the Bill and the recent report “Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities” please indicate the extent to which the Bill has been “island proofed” as set out on page 24 of the report.
144. Please indicate which aspects of the Bill will produce a differential impact on the islands.

145. Please clarify whether paragraph 120 is suggesting the approach in the Islands to the provision of allotments to meet demand is to be different from that of other areas.

Local Government

146. It is not clear what purpose paragraph 122 is serving, can you clarify the impact the information provided is designed to have on the consideration the Committee is required to make of this aspect.

Sustainable Development

147. The terms “sustainable development” and “sustainability” appear in the policy memorandum in the context of: Communities (paras 3 and 59); Control of assets (para 53); Access to land and land use (paras 57, 65, 67, 72, 113); Place (para 101); and Economics (para 2, 36 and 104). This suggests the Bill is concerned with several social, economic and environmental aspects of Scotland’s sustainable development. However the sustainable development section of the Policy Memorandum includes only a limited consideration of the impacts of the Bill on the environment and land use. Please provide a more comprehensive assessment of the impact on sustainable development to enable the Committee to consider this aspect.
Dear Kevin

Re: Policy Memorandum on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Thank you for your letter of 25 June seeking further information regarding the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

We recognise the issue you raise about making it easier for stakeholders to provide comment on the draft provisions and welcome the opportunity to provide clarification. One of the concerns raised to us through our extensive engagement with stakeholders was that people can be put off by lengthy documents with a great deal of detail. We aimed, therefore, in the Policy Memorandum to provide a succinct and broad overview of the policy underlying the Bill as a whole and each Part individually.

The Policy Memorandum is, of course, only one of the suite of documents that accompany the Bill. Taken with the additional detail in the Explanatory Notes, the Delegated Powers Memorandum and the Financial Memorandum, we hope that stakeholders have access to information that will help them understand the Bill’s policy aims and detailed provisions. These documents were highlighted to stakeholders when we circulated the link to the published Bill. Where we feel that the detail provided in those other documents answers your questions, we have referred to them in this response.

I am sorry that we omitted to inform the Committee of the publication of the analysis of responses to the Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, and we apologise for that. The link was belatedly sent to your team on 8 July. All relevant documents can be found on our website at:

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/People/engage

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
Cidhe Bhictóirí, Dún Èileann, EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
We do not feel it is practicable to set out policy justifications or consultation responses for each section of the Bill individually. The provisions in each Part are intended to work as a whole to provide processes which will achieve the policy objectives. The Bill has developed from a long and inclusive process in which there has been extensive engagement with stakeholders. While specific consultation questions have been asked about some aspects, others have grown more organically from general comments made in the consultation, in evidence to the Committee and in wider engagement, as well as existing good practice. We welcome comment from the Committee and from stakeholders, during the process of Stage 1, on where they feel the provisions might be improved to achieve the policy objectives.

In relation to guidance or regulations, details of the purpose of secondary legislation is provided in the Delegated Powers Memorandum. We do not anticipate drafts of guidance or regulations being available during Stage 1. These will be developed with the participation of stakeholders following the passage of the Bill through Parliament. This will allow us to take account of comments made at Stage 1 and any amendments made to the Bill during Stages 2 and 3.

Your questions range over the whole of the Bill and are often linked in to each other. We have attempted to provide the information requested in as straightforward a format as possible, combining questions within a single response where we thought it appropriate.

Please do not hesitate to seek further clarification on any aspect of the Bill as you think necessary. As indicated previously, my officials are happy to provide informal oral briefing to the Committee and Clerks if that would be useful.

DEREK MACKAY
Introduction and Background Sections

1. In paragraph 5 reference is made to the bill increasing the “pace” and “scale” of Public Service Reform. Given this statement please indicate the ways in which the Bill delivers on these aspects.

As set out in Empowering Scotland: the Government’s Programme for Scotland 2013-14:

‘Empowering communities to work with local service providers to design and deliver innovations that improve outcomes for local people is at the heart of the Scottish Government’s approach to public service reform. It is the responsibility of those in the public, third and private sectors to work together to recognise and support those community assets.’

As the Policy Memorandum states in paragraphs 13 and 14, this follows from the Report of the Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services and the Government’s response Renewing Scotland’s Public Services: Priorities for reform in response to the Christie Commission which is founded on four pillars: People; Partnership; Prevention; and Performance.

In this respect community planning has a key role to play in shaping and delivering change as outlined in paragraphs 15 to 17 of the Policy Memorandum. Paragraph 16 outlines the statement of ambition for Community Planning and SOAs, issued by the Scottish Government and COSLA in March 2012, says that "Effective community planning arrangements will be at the core of public service reform. They will drive the pace of service integration, increase the focus on prevention and secure continuous improvement in public service delivery, in order to achieve better outcomes for communities."

Paragraph 17 of the Policy Memorandum outlines the work that is already underway to strengthen community planning. More detail on this is provided at Annex A. The Bill will underpin these developments by strengthening the legal base for community planning.

2. In the following line the bill cements the focus on achieving outcomes. Please indicate what parts of the Bill deliver this.

While the Scottish Government has implemented and promoted the outcomes approach since 2007, Parts 1 and 2 of the Bill give it a statutory basis to ensure that this approach will continue in future.

Part 1 of the Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on, publish and report on a set of national outcomes for Scotland. It also places a statutory duty on public authorities and others carrying out public functions to have regard to those national outcomes in carrying out any devolved public functions. This places in statute the approach which has been taken by the Scottish Ministers since 2007.

Part 2 explicitly focuses community planning on “improving the achievement of outcomes”, again giving a statutory basis to the approach which has developed as best practice in recent years.

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
Part 3 also requires participation requests to relate to an outcome resulting from a service, and the response to the request is the establishment of an outcome improvement process, thus maintaining the focus on outcomes rather than outputs or inputs.

3. In paragraph 6 the bill will ensure people can “meaningfully participate”. Could you explain how that differs from the current participation set out in various parts of the memorandum, see for instance paragraph 12 which suggests local authorities use a range of methods.

In paragraph 6 the Policy Memorandum states that the ‘...bill will help to ensure people can meaningfully participate in decisions that affect their lives’. While paragraph 12 identifies that a range of community engagement and participatory activities are used by local authorities and others, paragraph 20 notes that, as the Committee has identified, such approaches are by no means universal. By creating a number of statutory rights for community bodies, and corresponding duties on public authorities, the Bill will provide a degree of consistency and a supportive legal framework to underline the Scottish Government’s expectation that all public authorities will support community empowerment and participation. In addition, the processes established or improved under Parts 3, 4 and 5 are to be initiated by community bodies, thus enabling them to set the agenda for participation in line with their own wishes and concerns.

4. Please provide examples of communities achieving “significant improvements” by doing things themselves as described in paragraph 7

5. In paragraph 7 the suggestion is made the bill will increase employment. Please indicate which parts of the Bill will contribute to that together with an indication of the respective levels anticipated.

6. Please indicate, preferably with prior examples, how the bill will reduce inequalities as set out in paragraph 7.

7. Paragraph 7 states “Communities can often achieve significant improvements by doing things for themselves because they know what will work for them”. Can you point to evidence in support of this?

Questions 4 to 7 all relate to paragraph 7, which is part of setting the context to the Bill in terms of the value of community empowerment.

In preparing the Policy Memorandum we welcomed the Committee’s report into the Delivery of Regeneration in Scotland, and noted that in conducting that enquiry the Committee heard of many excellent examples of community projects delivering a range of benefits to local people. Community-led regeneration projects are aimed at reducing socio-economic inequalities between areas, and also often seek to bring together different groups in the community and foster a sense of cohesion. While we appreciate the Committee’s wish to provide clarity for stakeholders, we feel that the benefits of community empowerment are well attested, and the audience for this Policy Memorandum includes a large number of people and organisations from the community sector and those who support and engage with them.

The Bill is not prescriptive; it is intended to provide a framework to help communities realise the change they want to see. The precise type and level of benefits that may be achieved will depend entirely on the priorities that individual communities choose to address.
Examples of community activity and the benefits achieved can be found in many places. Websites include the Scottish Government’s “Our Great Ideas” http://our-great-ideas.org/, and the linked Communities Channel Scotland site, run by the Scottish Community Development Centre http://www.communityscot.org.uk/, as well as those of umbrella groups such as the Development Trusts Association Scotland http://www.dtascot.org.uk/.

Evidence of the economic benefits of community ownership, including increased employment, were published by Community Land Scotland in April 2014. A summary is provided at: http://83.223.124.6/~communi1/images/uploads/FINAL_CLS_Economic_Data_Study_2_Pag e_Summary_140414_For_Release.pdf, and the full report is available from info@communitylandscotland.org.uk.

The Big Lottery Fund is a significant funder of community projects, and carries out regular evaluations of its grant programmes. Research reports can be found on BIG’s website at http://www.biglotteryfund.org.uk/research. The evaluation of the Growing Community Assets (GCA) programme may be of particular interest – this can be found under “Related Documents” on the GCA page http://www.biglotteryfund.org.uk/global-content/programmes/scotland/investing-in-communities-growing-community-assets.

8. Could you indicate where the “responsibility” on all public service providers set out in paragraph 11 can be found?

The responsibility referred to in paragraph 11 is a general description of the need for all public service providers to consider capacity building and support in the way they engage with communities. This is not, for example, a role for local authorities alone. All public authorities are expected to take account of the national outcomes in the design and delivery of services, in this case with particular reference to the following:

‘We have strong, resilient and supportive communities where people take responsibility for their own actions and how they affect others.’

Information on that national outcome describes more fully how a range of public bodies can contribute to it: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Performance/scotPerforms/outcome/communities

“Our public services are high quality, continually improving, efficient and responsive to local people’s needs”

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/About/Performance/scotPerforms/outcome/pubServ

This national outcome builds on the Scottish Government’s response to the Christie Commission, ‘Renewing Scotland’s Public Services’, which states, “The focus of public spending and action must build on the assets and potential of the individual, the family and the community rather than being dictated by organisational structures and boundaries. Public services must work harder to involve people everywhere in the redesign and reshaping of their activities ...”

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
9. Paragraph 12 states that when people are engaged in community issues and come into contact with elected members, “they are more likely to become involved in the electoral process themselves”, please reference to evidence in support of this statement.

11. Please provide examples to justify the “inspire” suggestion in paragraph 12 and also examples of the evidence to support the statements in the second part of the paragraph.

In response to questions 9 and 11, there is evidence to show that social exclusion is strongly correlated with low turnout in elections and limited participation in other forms of democracy. This is also linked to whether people feel that they can influence political decisions. See http://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/__data/assets/pdf_file/0007/63835/Social-exclusion-and-political-engagement.pdf

Wider research shows that when people are empowered to participate in decisions about issues that affect them, this increases trust in the organisations that ultimately take those decisions, and a stronger sense of ownership in the outcome. http://www.pbnetwork.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2014/04/DCLG-empowerment-research-2009.pdf

10. Towards the end of paragraph 12 there is a suggestion that being ‘heard’ is an insufficient form of engagement in contrast to other parts of the Bill where communities being ‘heard’ is deemed a sufficient form of community empowerment. Could you please clarify this?

We believe this may refer to paragraph 11 rather than paragraph 12. Paragraph 11 does not suggest that being ‘heard’ is an insufficient form of engagement. Rather it says that community engagement, by which we mean activity led by service providers with the aim of improving their services, differs from community empowerment, which is led by the community on their own terms. Engagement is important, but public service providers should also support communities to take action independently, and must be open to proposals that arise from outside their own consultative structures.

12. In paragraph 14, and elsewhere, “place” is used in quotations. Please explain the significance of the quotations.

Paragraph 14 relates to the Christie Commission’s report and the Scottish Government’s response. “Place”, in that form, is used in those documents in reference to the need for effective partnership and integrated service provision at a local level, building on the experiences of service users and frontline workers to tackle area-based disadvantage. The quotation marks indicate that in this context the word means more than simply a physical location.

13. Paragraph 15 refers to the current CPP process including the role of communities. Could you provide a brief description of how this currently operates as the Committee have been unable to identify any CPP’s which have direct community representation.

Public service providers work with communities in a number of ways as part of community planning.

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
The recent CPP audit reports capture a range of methods through which CPPs and partners do this, such as household surveys, local citizens panels, and groups set up to involve local communities in tackling local issues (see Aberdeen, pp. 20-22; North Ayrshire, pp. 19-20 & 26-27; Scottish Borders, pp. 16-17; Glasgow, pp. 31-33; Falkirk, pp. 22-23; Moray, pp. 25-27).

14. Could you indicate the extent of progress since March 2012 to the introduction of the bill in developing community planning arrangements as set out in paragraph 16. This will assist the Committee in understanding the need for the Bill and put in context activities to date.

15. Given the statement in paragraph 20 that local authorities have greater experience than other public authorities (of community empowerment) can you explain in what ways this experience is to be shared, and in particular what role What Works Scotland (paragraph 37) will play?

In response to questions 14, 15, 34 and 35, we have provided a note at Annex A on the progress made on developing community planning arrangements since the publication of the Statement of Ambition in March 2012, including the steps taken to support CPPs in driving public service reform effectively at local level, and the external audit process.

16. In relation to the examples in paragraph 25, please explain how community groups are assisted by the Procurement Reform Bill. (3rd bullet)

Community groups will be assisted by the Procurement Reform (Scotland) Act 2014 particularly through the sustainable procurement duty, Procurement Strategies and community benefit requirements. The Act will help tackle unnecessary inconsistencies for suppliers doing business with the public sector and will help ensure that doing business with the public sector can be simple, transparent and more accessible to suppliers.

Under the sustainable procurement duty (section 9), before carrying out a regulated procurement a contracting authority must consider how in conducting the procurement process it can: improve the economic, social and environmental wellbeing of the authorities area; facilitate the involvement of SMEs, third sector bodies and supported business in the process; and promote innovation; and in carrying out the procurement it must act with a view to securing the identified economic, social and environmental improvements.

Contracting authorities with significant (£5m+) regulated procurement expenditure a year must produce a Procurement Strategy (section 15). This must set out, amongst other things, how the authority intends to ensure its regulated procurements are carried out in compliance with its duties, and include a statement on the authority’s policy on community benefit requirements and on consulting and engaging with those affected by its procurements.

1 http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2013/nr_130320_aberdeen_cpp.pdf
2 http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2013/nr_130320_north_ayrshire_cpp.pdf
6 http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2014/nr_140710_moray_cpp.pdf

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
Under section 25, when a contracting authority proposes to carry out a regulated procurement valued at more than £4m, it must consider whether to impose community benefit requirements and, if it does not, state in the contract notice its reasons for not doing so.

17. In relation to the 4th bullet, why is the “right” not being given to communities?

As we indicate in paragraph 25 it was felt that not all issues needed to be addressed through legislation and other approaches might be more effective. The 4th bullet highlights that the Bill will strengthen the involvement of communities in setting priorities for public services, which is closely related to how budgets are spent. Part 2 will strengthen requirements for communities to be involved in community planning, which includes the determination of priority outcomes and planning how the achievement of those outcomes is to be improved. When community bodies exercise their right to make a participation request under Part 3 of the Bill, this may also address how budgets can be spent more effectively.

International experience shows that legislation is not necessary to make participatory budgeting (PB) effective, and in most of the places where it is used it is not required by statute. The international “Participatory Budgeting Project” states in its FAQs: http://www.participatorybudgeting.org/about-participatory-budgeting/faq/

“In order to be implemented, PB usually does not require legal changes to budgetary authority. The Mayor, City Council, or other authority retain legal power to approve budget decisions – but they make a political commitment to honor the PB vote. Once the process is established and the initial kinks are ironed out, some governments have sought to revise their charters to make PB legally binding.”

The Scottish Government is funding consultancy support to promote the development of PB in Scotland. We believe this is the most effective way to address this issue.

18. On bullet 6 please indicate what work is being taken forward following the Community Council Short Life Working Group reporting.

The Scottish Government, in collaboration with COSLA is working with the Improvement Service (IS) to further enhance the role of Community Councils. The IS is working with Scotland’s Community Council Liaison Officers (CCLO’s) based in each of the 32 local authority area to:

- provide web-based training and development opportunities for Community Councillors;
- improve communication by establishing a website for Community Councillors (a first of its kind);
- raise awareness by developing a national register of Community Councils and Councillors to be made publically available digitally;
- improve communications between CCLO’s by establishing a Communities of Practice website and by holding bi-annual networking events;
- open dialogue with national organisations, such as the Duke of Edinburgh Award and Young Scott to encourage young people to engage with community councils.

It is anticipated that this broad programme of work will help to stimulate greater participation in the work of community councils and encourage more people to stand for election as community councillors.
19. Please provide a link to the consultation analysis. (paragraph 27)

Please see link below:

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2014/06/3535

20. Could you indicate which stakeholders will be involved in development of guidance?

We have sought the views of a wide range of stakeholders in the consultations leading up to development of the Bill, and received a large number of responses. We expect to establish groups of stakeholders to develop guidance on each topic, building on our engagement at earlier stages of the process, and to consult publically and widely on the drafts produced in this way. We will ensure a balance is obtained between the various interested sectors in the Bill, in particular between the public and community and voluntary sectors.

21. Given the overarching policy objective of community empowerment, please explain the extent to which the Bill supports delivery of the Scottish Government’s Low Carbon Scotland: Behaviours Framework?

As the Bill will help communities to acquire ownership of land and buildings, its provisions may very well support community action on climate change through, for example, the identification of land for community food growing or provision of more energy efficient community buildings. Such activities (though not actual land or building purchase) are currently supported by the Scottish Government’s Climate Challenge Fund. The provisions relating to allotments should also result in an increase in people growing their own food. Other actions taken under the Bill may also result in better access to services locally, reducing car use.

In addition, the Bill will support the delivery of actions in the Low Carbon Behaviours Framework which seek to influence the uptake of low carbon behaviours. The Framework sets out a commitment to use the Individual, Social and Material (ISM) approach (http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/06/8511) to improve the Scottish Government’s understanding of low carbon behaviours and support the successful take-up of these behaviours. The approach demonstrates that considering individual level factors in combination with the social and material factors is more likely to be successful in influencing behaviours. The Bill, in particular, will support community bodies to influence material factors (e.g. design and delivery of local services, use of land and buildings) which constrain and shape behaviour.

Part 1 National Outcomes

22. Towards the end of paragraph 30 there is a suggestion that the National Performance Framework is “helping to change the way public services are delivered” can you explain in what ways this is happening and point to supporting evidence.

The National Performance Framework (NPF) is part of a transformative shift in how policy is made, and is a key enabler of public service reform. By aligning the whole public sector around a common set of goals, we can deliver real collaboration and lasting partnership working. Different organisations are now working towards shared goals defined in terms of benefits to citizens, rather than simply efficient service delivery. For example, the Strategy for Justice in Scotland is an outcomes-focused and ambitious plan, developed and committed to collectively by the Scottish Government, the Court Service, the Prosecution Service, the Prison Service and other agencies. It involved the joint identification of the key priorities for action, based upon sound evidence, and sets out a coordinated response, which requires working across boundaries, to deliver a wide range of financial and societal benefits.

23. Please elaborate on the role of “National Wellbeing” as set out in paragraph 31 and how it links to Scotland Performs and the National Outcomes.

The focus of the Scottish Government’s Purpose is on creating a more successful Scotland with opportunities for all to flourish. Within the NPF, national wellbeing is covered through a wide range of social and environmental indicators including mental wellbeing, income distribution and carbon emissions as well as economic growth. The Carnegie UK Trust has identified the NPF as a world-leading example in measuring National Wellbeing:

“We did not expect to find international innovation on our doorstep. But our work has repeatedly found that the Scottish National Performance Framework is an international leader in wellbeing measurement, a sentiment repeated by Professor Stiglitz in his address to the OECD World Forum in India, in 2012”.

24. Section 1(6) refers to “any other person” carrying out functions of a “public nature”. Please provide some examples of who this might include.

This is explained in paragraph 6 of the Explanatory Notes. In particular, it would include private or third sector bodies contracted to deliver public services.

25. The Policy memorandum is silent on sections 2 and 3. Please provide the policy thinking underpinning each of the review and reporting provisions.

Paragraphs 9 to 13 of the Explanatory Notes provide more detail on the review and reporting provisions.

26. What is the level of flexibility referred to in paragraph 32 and how might it be used.

As described in paragraph 32, and paragraph 13 of the Explanatory Notes, the flexibility referred to means that the Scottish Ministers must set national outcomes and must report progress against them, but the legislation does not specify what form the outcomes and the reporting should take. It does not, for example, require future governments to use the same format of purpose, targets, outcomes and indicators, and online reporting, as is used in the current NPF.

27. Who will be consulted under 2(5)?

We would anticipate that all governments would want to consult widely and inclusively on the national outcomes as a whole. However, if a review related only to individual outcomes on particular topics, it might be more appropriate to have a more focused consultation.
28. What is this government’s intention in relation to the timescales to review and report.

The intention behind a regular review period is to ensure that the national outcomes continue to reflect the kind of Scotland we want to see and that we have the best measures in place to show how well we are doing in relation to achieving these outcomes.

Putting the monitoring and reporting of progress on a statutory footing is consistent with the Government’s view that evidence, data and transparency are essential elements of improvement and delivery.

29. Given the government currently publishes information, in what way will the provisions set out in paragraph 33 “enhance accountability”?

Accountability will be enhanced due to the prominence of the national outcomes approach. There will be a clear line of sight between delivery and the national outcomes.

30. Who is ultimately accountable for delivery of the national outcomes?

The Scottish Ministers are ultimately accountable for delivery of the national outcomes.

31. Is the parliament expected to contribute to the delivery of the national outcomes and if so where is the scrutiny function?

The Parliament is not expected to contribute to the delivery of the national outcomes. We would expect that the Parliament will scrutinise Ministers’ delivery of their selected outcomes.

You will be aware of the correspondence between the Clerk/Chief Executive to the Scottish Parliament and the Permanent Secretary, in relation to whether the Scottish Parliament and the SPCB are included in the term “Scottish Public Authorities” in section 1(4). It is not our intention that the Parliament (or the Parliament’s corporate body) should be under any duty to have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out its functions, and we will review the wording of the Bill with this in mind.

32. Can you explain why there is no requirement to consult with or report to the parliament?

The Government is responsible for developing and implementing policy; the role of the Parliament is to scrutinise Ministers’ performance of their functions. The Bill will require the Scottish Ministers to publish both the national outcomes and reports about the extent to which they have been achieved. The Parliament will be able to hold Ministers to account in relation to that published information as they do at present, for example through the use of performance scorecards which were developed for the purposes of budget scrutiny last year and which are being produced again this year.
Part 2 Community Planning

33. Can you indicate the status of the guidance referred to in paragraph 35, and also indicate what other legislation exists in this area to support the suggestion legislation is not currently clear.

Part 2 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 contains the current legislative framework for community planning. It places a duty on local authorities to initiate, facilitate and maintain a process called community planning by which public services are provided, after consultation with such community bodies and other bodies or persons as is appropriate.

The non-statutory SOA guidance referred to in paragraph 35 of the policy memorandum goes beyond those statutory requirements, by focusing the purpose of community planning (including engagement with community bodies) around the planning and achievement of better outcomes on local priority themes. Part 2 of the Bill reflects these expectations in legislation for the first time.

34. The Scottish Government “expects CPPs to drive public service reform effectively at local level. Can you indicate the steps being taken by the government to promulgate this expectation?

35. Please indicate, or reference to, the work of the Auditor General and Accounts Commission which has provided the “assurance” referred to in paragraph 37.

In response to questions 14, 15, 34 and 35, we have provided a note at Annex A on the progress made on developing community planning arrangements since the publication of the Statement of Ambition in March 2012, including the steps taken to support CPPs in driving public service reform effectively at local level, and the external audit process.

36. Can you indicate what is intended to happen with the evaluation referred to in paragraph 37.

This evaluation from What Works Scotland will evaluate evidence from approaches to public service delivery and reform at CPP, national and international levels. It will then utilise this evidence to promote and share best practice, by assessing the impact and effectiveness of emerging approaches to service delivery in CPPs. This initiative seeks to improve the way local areas in Scotland use evidence to make decisions about public service development and reform which can then be shared more widely across organisations, partnerships and localities.

37. In paragraph 38 is it the first consultation paper being referenced?

This refers to the 2013 Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

38. Paragraph 35 indicates a need to replace guidance with legislation. But paragraph 38 suggests new guidance will be produced. Can you elaborate and indicate to address the seeming contradiction. What is to be contained in new guidance?

The proposals reflect the recognition by Scottish Government and COSLA that there is a need to replace the legislative framework in Part 2 of the 2003 Act with one which strengthens the roles and responsibilities of CPPs and partner bodies around the planning, resourcing and delivery of local outcomes. This is described in more detail in paragraphs 140 – 147 of the 2013 consultation. In the same way as guidance adds detail to the legislative framework in the 2003 Act, so section 10 of the Bill provides that there should be scope to produce guidance to add detail to the new framework provided for in Part 2 of the Bill.

39. Paragraph 39 places communities at the “core”. However it would appear from paragraph 39 their role is restricted to consultees. Please explain the apparent conflict.

The role of communities goes well beyond that of consultees. The duties which sections 4, 5 and 9 of the Bill place on CPPs and partner bodies collectively provide a basis within which community bodies can engage closely in community planning.

Sections 4 and 5 include duties on CPPs around engaging communities. Section 4(5) places a general duty on CPPs to participate with community bodies in community planning – that is, planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes. In complying with this duty, a CPP must make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of whichever community bodies it considers can contribute to community planning. It should then take all reasonable steps to enable a community body which wishes to participate to do so. This provides community bodies with a role at the core of community planning activity, which can include understanding needs and circumstances, identifying priority outcomes, deciding how to respond to these priorities and reviewing progress made. Section 5(3) places an additional specific requirement on CPPs, to consult community bodies and such other persons as it considers appropriate in preparing a local outcomes improvement plan.

Section 9(3) places complementary duties on community planning partners. In particular, it requires partner bodies to contribute funds, staff and resources as the partnership consider appropriate to secure the participation of community bodies. This may therefore support community capacity building activity. Community planning partners may also resource community bodies to deliver services, as part of their related duty to provide resources to support the improvement of a local outcome.

40. In paragraph 40 can you confirm the CPP is required to publicly publish (see for example paragraph 32 re the Government) and also confirm towards what progress they must report.

Yes, the local outcomes improvement plan to be published in accordance with section 5(1) will be a public document.

Under section 7(2), CPPs are required to report on whether there has been any improvement in the achievement of each local outcome set out in the local outcomes improvement plan

41. In paragraph 41 mention is made of “key partners”, please confirm that the reports they are required to make will all be publicly available, and in what time frame.

The intention of section 9(4) is to ensure that the CPP has access to all the relevant information it requires to carry out its day to day duties. Each community planning partner must provide such information to the CPP about the local outcomes as requested by the CPP (section 9(4) refers). This information might take a range of forms and serve a range of purposes, to inform and support the work of the CPP, and will be provided in different time frames. Information provided by community planning partners will contribute to the progress report which the CPP is required to prepare for each reporting year, setting out its assessment of whether there has been any improvement in the achievement of the local outcomes to which they have given priority. It will be for the CPP and partner bodies to decide which information to publish, having regard to freedom of information requirements for public sector bodies.

42. Paragraph 42 discusses duties placed by the Bill. Can you extend to indicate how this is to be done, the policy thinking behind the making of these provisions and what the sanctions are for non-compliance.

50. Please provide some examples of “reasonable steps” under 8(1)(b).

Paragraph 42 refers to duties which section 8 places on certain specified partners about governance for the CPP. For the avoidance of doubt, these are not the only duties placed by the Bill. Section 8 replaces a provision in the 2003 Act which placed a duty only on a local authority to initiate, maintain and facilitate community planning. The new provision both extends the onus of facilitating community planning to a wider range of partner bodies, and requires them to take reasonable steps to ensure the CPP operates effectively and efficiently. In this way, the provision reinforces the importance of shared leadership in community planning, a principle which attracted considerable support from respondents to the recent consultation. Like Part 2 of the 2003 Act, the Bill does not specify sanctions on CPPs and partner bodies for non-compliance. Partners can expect to be held to account for how they fulfil community planning duties as part of their existing formal lines of accountability (e.g. those of NHS Boards to Scottish Ministers, or a council to its electorate).

In addition, external CPP audit reports are recent additions to the scrutiny landscape. They have been valuable in identifying strengths and areas for improvement in CPP and partner performance, supporting ongoing improvement and providing assurance that expected progress is being made. Themes covered by these audits include clarity of vision leadership, governance, operational structures, performance management, how partners engage with local communities, how partners hold each other to account and the quality of public reporting. Hence, “reasonable steps” may include action by partners subject to this duty to review and reassure themselves that the CPP is operating effectively against these criteria.

43. Section 4(8) defines community bodies. In 4(5)(a) how will the selection process work and what role will the bodies chosen be asked/expected/permitted to fulfil?

Section 4 of the Bill does not prescribe a process which CPPs should adopt for engaging with community bodies. These are decisions for CPPs and partner bodies to take locally, as they are best placed to determine which approach is most suitable for the particular circumstances of each occasion.

44. Can you explain the need for section 5(3) given the existence of section 4(5). Are there differences in approach to be taken and if so why.

Section 4(5) imposes a general duty to involve community bodies in community planning. In complying with this duty, CPPs will decide for themselves which community bodies to involve because they are likely to be able to contribute to community planning, and how to do so.
Section 5(3) applies specifically to the preparation of a local outcomes improvement plan. The scope of this consultation may encompass community bodies and persons who are otherwise unable or do not wish to contribute to community planning.

45. Why does section 6(1) not also apply to section 5(2)(b)?

Section 5(2)(b) refers to the outcomes referred to in section 5(2)(a). The reference to "the outcome" in section 5(2)(b) is a reference to each local outcome referred to in section 5(2)(a).

46. Can you indicate what steps are expected of a CPP under 5(4)(b), will that include full public consultation of those in the relevant area? If not can you indicate why the community are not being empowered here?

CPPs use a range of sources to understand the needs and circumstances of people and communities in the CPP. This includes statistical information and feedback which partners receive from their own engagement with communities. The consultation with community bodies which a CPP will be required to conduct under section 5(3) will add to this understanding. A CPP may in addition undertake a public consultation if it considers this would be valuable for obtaining this understanding of local needs and circumstances. We consider it should be for CPPs to decide for themselves which methods they adopt to acquire this understanding.

47. How long do the plans last for and when do they require to be revised? Please indicate why no mandatory period is specified?

The relevant period may differ, depending on what the period relates to and other circumstances, which may be outwith the control of the CPP. Guidance can set out overarching principles about the periods which plans should cover.

48. What timescale applies to the completion of section 7 plans?

Section 7 deals with the progress report which each CPP is required to prepare for each reporting year. The Bill does not stipulate a timescale within which these reports should be published. If the Committee and stakeholders consider it would be helpful to set a deadline in statute, we would be happy to consider any suggestions.

49. Can you indicate what is meant in practice by “facilitate” in section 8(1)(a)

This duty to facilitate community planning already applies to local authorities under the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. In community planning practice, “facilitate” may include taking appropriate improvement actions to ensure the efficient and effective functioning of the CPP (e.g. to support the work of chairs of CPP committees; prepare reports and advice; share papers and materials; organise meetings).

50. Please provide some examples of “reasonable steps” under 8(1)(b).

Please see response to question 42.
51. In what circumstances might 9(1) apply?

How the duties in section 9(2) to (5) apply to community planning partners will vary from one CPP to another, depending on the particular needs, circumstances and priorities of the area. An example of where section 9(1) might apply is a scenario where a partner and CPP agreed that the duties on the partner in that area can be waived because the duties on that partner under the rest of section 9 would contribute only modestly to the work of the CPP.

52. What is to be covered in guidance under section 10?

As explained in response to section 38, guidance will add detail to the new legislative framework as the current guidance does for the existing legislation. The guidance will be developed in consultation with stakeholders to ensure that it is relevant to the needs of the area and to what would be helpful. It may include, for instance, the purpose and content of new general outcomes improvement plans (under section 5) or how governance duties (section 8) should be applied.

53. Please explain what is envisaged under section 11 and in particular how it might impact communities, groups and public authorities.

This replaces the duty under section 16(8) of the 2003 Act. It reflects the recognition that the Scottish Government has for the importance of community planning in contributing towards public service delivery in Scotland and ensures that Ministers take account of this in carrying out their functions.

54. Please explain the purpose of section 12 indicating the circumstances envisaged and the potential impacts on the whole process.

Section 12 replaces section 19 of the 2003 Act, which gives the Scottish Ministers a power to establish corporate bodies with community planning functions. The purpose of the provision is to allow corporate bodies to be formed to co-ordinate or further community planning in an area. Community Planning Advice published in 2004 illustrated what incorporation could help achieve (e.g. it might enable local partners’ research, procurement or administrative resources to be pooled and used more effectively and efficiently). We do not expect that it would be used to establish a corporate body that substantially delivered services in itself.

While the Scottish Government is not aware of any current demand from CPPs to incorporate, we consider it appropriate to retain the power, bearing in mind incorporation would only occur on the application of at least two local partners, with the agreement of Scottish Ministers to make regulations to establish a body corporate and with the agreement of the Scottish Parliament to those regulations (see also references to section 12(1) and 12(2)(d) in the Delegated Powers Memorandum).

Ministers could not establish a community planning corporate body using Order-making powers under Part 2 of the Public Service Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, as this power is not exercisable in relation to local authorities, other than to transfer or delegate functions to local authorities.

---

7 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2004/04/19167/35258

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
Part 3 Participation Requests

55. This part would benefit from a general explanation indicating what powers are given under it, and setting out the background to the need for these powers.

The power given under the Bill is outlined at the end of paragraph 45 and is set out in section 17(1) of the Bill:

‘A community participation body may make a request to a public service authority to permit the body to participate in an outcome improvement process.’

This is combined with the duty on public service authorities to decide whether to agree to or refuse the participation request (section 19(2)), to agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it (section 19(5)), and if it agrees to establish and maintain an outcome improvement process (section 23). A full description of the proposed process and the bodies engaged in it is provided in paragraphs 26 to 36 of the Explanatory Notes.

Paragraphs 44 and 45 of the Policy Memorandum provide some background to the need for this power, but it responds more generally to the call to strengthen the voices of communities in the decisions that matter to them. This need has been identified in a number of reports, including the Christie Commission and the Committee’s own report on the Delivery of Regeneration in Scotland. Participation requests provide community bodies with a statutory right to bring forward their own proposals about the outcomes which matter to them, on their own initiative, and to receive a proper hearing and a reasoned response.

56. While the Scottish Government sets clear expectations as set out in paragraph 45, it has been the Committee’s experience during recent inquiry work that public sector organisations do not engage in any meaningful sense. Given Part 3 does not replace the current “expectation” what action is the Government proposing to empower communities in the areas set out in paragraph 45?

We are interested in the Committee’s experience that public sector organisations do not engage in any meaningful sense, and are keen to understand the different perspectives on this issue.

As set out in response to question 8, the Scottish Government highlights the need for all public service providers to engage with and support communities through its response to the Christie Commission and through the national outcomes. Part 2 of the Bill will require CPPs to secure the participation of community bodies, and to consult with community bodies on their local outcomes improvement plans. Participation requests are intended to go beyond community engagement and provide a power for communities to initiate dialogue on their own terms and have a right to have their views properly considered.

57. Please indicate the policy thinking behind requiring a community-controlled body to have a written constitution.

As set out in paragraph 46 of the Policy Memorandum it was a concern of respondents to the consultations to ensure community bodies are open, inclusive, and truly represent their communities. Section 14 of the Bill identifies the key features of a body which meets those requirements. Requiring a written constitution is, we believe, the least onerous way in which a body can show that it has appropriate rules relating to membership, the purposes of the body and the use of its assets. The requirement for a written constitution was in the draft... provisions which were consulted on in 2013 and was not raised as an issue by respondents (see paragraphs 4.2 to 4.18 of the analysis of responses).

58. Paragraph 46 makes clear communities do not need to be of place. What will happen if a community of interest with virtually no local residents as members seeks to become involved.

The Bill is designed to enable a wide selection of community bodies to be able to make participation requests. Section 17(2)(a) of the Bill requires that a participation request must specify an outcome of a service provided to the public, which may or may not have a local focus. Section 17(2)(b) also requires that the request must set out the reasons why the community participation body considers it should take part in the outcome improvement process. It will be for the public service authority to decide whether to agree to or refuse the request for dialogue, taking those issues into account. In determining whether to implement any changes to a service suggested through an outcome improvement process, the authority will also need to take into account the needs of all service users.

59. Perhaps the above might be an example of a reasonable ground to refuse. Could you indicate what might be covered by that provision.

As you suggest the circumstances suggested in question 58 might be an example of a reasonable ground to refuse a request but it will depend on the circumstances of the request. It is difficult to outline at this stage what other reasonable grounds for refusal might be. It is appropriate to allow public service authorities a degree of discretion, and they will need to explain the grounds for any refusal.

60. What types of bodies or organisations might be covered by section 15(2)

As set out in paragraph 26 of the Delegated Powers Memorandum

‘Community bodies come in many different forms. The intention of the policy is that as wide a range of community bodies as possible should be able to act as a community participation body and make a request to a public service authority to participate in an outcome improvement process. It is important that community participation bodies are open, inclusive and represent their community, and in most cases this should be demonstrated by meeting the criteria for a community-controlled body. However, there may be bodies which are established in a different way, especially those established before current approaches became standard, which Ministers still consider should be able to act as community participation bodies. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate additional community bodies for this purpose.’

61. Are ALEOS included as part of section 16, if not why not?

There is no single definition of an arm’s length external organisation (ALEO). They are separate from local authorities and take a range of legal forms, such as companies, trusts or other bodies, and carry out a range of functions. The form in which they are controlled or influenced by local authorities also varies.

No ALEOs are currently listed in schedule 2 to the Bill. Subsections (4)(c) and (5) to (7) of section 16 allow for bodies to be designated as public service authorities if they are bodies corporate which are wholly owned by one or more public service authorities. It would therefore be possible to designate ALEOs which are wholly owned by one or more local authority, or local authorities and public bodies. It is not the Scottish Government’s intention to place duties in terms of participation requests on bodies which include members from outwith the public sector.

62. Does section 16 include the Urban Regeneration Companies?

As with ALEOs, Urban Regeneration Companies could be designated as public service authorities if they are wholly owned by one or more public service authorities.

63. This Part proceeds on the basis the community require to opt in to participation. Earlier the Committee has suggested empowerment would be better enhanced by an opt-out provision with communities automatically eligible unless they decline to participate. Please indicate the policy thinking in favour of the approach adopted as opposed to the Committee’s preference.

As described in response to previous questions, the Scottish Government expects all public sector authorities to involve community bodies in decisions about the design and delivery of services, and Part 2 of the Bill places a statutory duty on community planning partnerships to secure the participation of community bodies. However, such activity is initiated by the public authority. Part 3 provides a statutory power for community bodies to initiate dialogue on their own terms and a right for them to have their views properly considered. All communities are equally eligible to take part in both provider-led and community-led approaches.

64. Paragraph 48 suggests a possible role is to “discuss”. Why is legislation necessary to facilitate a discussion, what prevents this simply being a function of consultation, or a follow up to consultation responses?

As the Committee is aware, many community bodies feel that when they approach service providers with suggestions for improvements, it can be difficult to establish a dialogue where views can be properly discussed. Participation requests address this by placing clear duties on public service authorities to respond to a request, or give reasons for any refusal.

The reference in paragraph 48 to a discussion of how a service provider could better meet the needs of users is contrasted with proposals for the community body to become involved in the delivery of a service. A number of responses to the consultation on the draft Bill appeared to view participation requests primarily in the context of community bodies wishing to take over delivery of services, but not all community bodies will wish to take on that role.

65. Please also indicate how “discuss” meets the test at section 17(2)(a).

Section 17(2)(a) requires a participation request to specify an outcome relating to a service provided by that public service authority, which will be the subject of the outcome improvement process resulting from the request. The examples given in paragraph 48 relate to the proposals which would be put forward in the outcome improvement process; the discussion mentioned would be about how to improve the specified outcome.

66. What is envisaged in regulations under section 18?

As set out in paragraphs 45 and 46 of the Delegated Powers Memorandum:

‘Under section 17(1) participation requests allow a community participation body to make a request to a public service authority to permit the body to participate in an outcome improvement process, which is a process established by the authority with a view to improving an outcome that results from, or is contributed to by virtue of, the provision of a public service. Section 17(2) describes the information which must accompany the request.

The Scottish Government considers that section 18(1) is necessary to require that further information is provided and to make provision on the procedure for making requests and for handling them.’

The detail of the regulations will be subject to consultation following the passage of the Bill through the Parliamentary process.

67. Can you explain the reasons for the list at section 19(3)(c), why were those aspects chosen and how will this operate in practice to avoid any risk they are set at a level which will potentially exclude community involvement?

The list at section 19(3)(c) is intended to ensure that the public service authority considers the full range of benefits that community proposals might help to deliver, and to avoid requests being excluded because the benefits they refer to fail to fit limited criteria. (Equal opportunities are also included at section 19(4) in response to stakeholder requests, this does not fit directly into the list because of the structure of existing equality legislation.) There is no intention to set qualifying levels of benefits.

The trio of economic, social and environmental issues are often referred to in describing “wellbeing”; the Scottish Government’s guidance on the Power to Advance Well-Being in the Local Government (Scotland) Act 2003 also includes health (which might be considered part of social wellbeing); economic development and regeneration are linked, but are both specified for the avoidance of doubt.

68. Can you indicate why no provision is made for the application request to be published, which might attract other interested groups.

This was not included in the draft provisions and was not raised during consultation but we would of course be happy to consider it if the Committee feel it would be of benefit to the Bill. Different groups may, of course, have different concerns or proposals in relation to a service, and in some cases it may be more appropriate to have separate discussions with individual groups, although provision is clearly made in the Bill for community bodies to make requests jointly (section 17(3)), and for new bodies to join an existing outcome improvement process (section 20(2)).

69. There is no information provided covering sections 19-25 in relation to the process to be followed. Please explain the thinking behind and any derivation of each of these provisions. In so doing please indicate the benefits of the process at each stage for community participation.

Paragraphs 33 to 36 of the explanatory notes set out the process to be followed. The provisions in Part 3 are intended to work as a whole in order to enable communities to help shape the services which affect them.

70. What is the maximum period intended to be allowed for publication of a report under section 25?

There is no period set out in section 25 but we would expect all reports to be published timeously. As the report must summarise the outcomes of the process, including whether the specified outcome to which the process relates has been improved, it would be difficult to specify a maximum time limit under section 25 as the time will be dependent on the process and the outcome to which it relates. We would be interested to hear whether stakeholders feel a time limit should be set, and what it should be, taking into account the wide range of circumstances which could be covered.

71. The Financial Memorandum is silent on the cost of handling a participation order. Please provide an estimated cost to local authorities for handling a request, including estimated costs for each scenario the Bill provides for.

As noted in paragraphs 22 and 23 of the Financial Memorandum, the costs of implementing this Part will depend on how often community participation bodies use the provisions, and the costs to an individual local authority of providing an outcome improvement process will vary according to circumstances. Costs ranging from £1,100 to £41,000 have been quoted by one local authority for a number of community engagement events it undertook.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy

Three major themes arise from the questions in this section. We cover those themes first, and then address the issues which fall outwith them.

Question 72 highlights that the Committee has had no prior involvement in matters covered by this Part. In addition to the principal legislation and its accompanying documents, the Committee may find it helpful to consult the information available on the Scottish Government’s “Rights to Buy Rural Land” website, http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/farmingrural/Rural/rural-land/right-to-buy, and particularly the guidance on the community right to buy, http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2009/06/08101427/0

Should the Committee wish, the Community Right to Buy branch would be happy to meet with them to offer an overview of how the Community Right to Buy works and its progress throughout the past ten years since implementation began. Please let us know if you would like to arrange a meeting. We understand that key stakeholders have also offered to work closely with the Committee on these issues.

72. The Committee has had no prior involvement in matters covered by this Part and consider the detail provided in this section of the Policy memorandum to be little more than a superficial overview. This does not at present provide the Committee with sufficient material to allow for this Part to be scrutinised in a timely manner as part of the Stage 1 process. Please provide detail of each section individually including the policy thinking behind any changes or reasons for keeping the right to buy provisions the same as the 2003 Act. The following paragraphs in addition to the detail requested here set out specific questions.

74. Paragraph 56 refers to “These changes” please provide detail of each change including the reasoning behind making the change.

81. Paragraph 63 is a useful summary of the main amendments. However the Committee requires details of all amendments including the reasons for making each and the views of those who did not agree. Please also set out the benefits expected from each change.
82. The Committee requires detail of each of the new provisions providing right to buy abandoned or neglected land.

86. Given the earlier statement about the complexity of the legislation for consultees please amplify the summary provided in paragraphs 69 and 70.

Questions 72, 74, 81, 82 and 86 request details of each section or amendment individually, including the reasons behind each one.

The Policy Memorandum provides information on the policy underlying the major changes, ie, the extension of the community right to buy to the whole of Scotland and the introduction of a right for communities to buy neglected or abandoned land. It also explains that a number of changes are made to the detailed procedures and requirements of the community right to buy process, including streamlining and increasing flexibility.

The Explanatory Notes provide detail of the individual sections. Paragraphs 37 to 117 cover the amendments to Part 2 of the 2003 Act, explaining in each case the effect of the current provision and the change being made. Paragraphs 118 to 250 describe each section of the new Part 3A. Each Part is intended to work as a whole to provide an effective and efficient process for all parties involved.

75. Please indicate who undertook the post-legislative scrutiny of the provisions in the 2003 Act, who was consulted, and provide detail of the findings of that work.

89. Who suggested the improvements referred to in paragraph 73 and to what extent etc. have they been subject to consultation.

90. Who undertook the “overall review” of the system and where can the details of findings be found.

Questions 75, 89 and 90 ask about the post-legislative scrutiny and review of the 2003 Act.

The following reports have been carried out to scrutinise and evaluate the operation of the 2003 Act (most recent first):

- Land Reform Review Group Interim Report, May 2013
  This report was prepared by Alison Elliot and Sarah Skerratt, members of the LRRG, drawing on their work from August 2012 to April 2013, during which time James Hunter was also part of the LRRG.

- Post Legislative Scrutiny of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, final report, September 2010, Calum MacLeod, Centre for Mountain Studies, Perth College UHI; Tim Braunholtz-Speight, UHI Centre for Remote and Rural Studies; Issie Macphall, UHI Centre for Remote and Rural Studies; Derek Flyn; Sarah Allen; Rural Analysis Associates and Davie Macleod, Rural Analysis Associates.
This research was commissioned by the then Rural Affairs and Environment Committee of the Scottish Parliament between 2009 and 2011. Further information is available at:
http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/77795.asp

In addition, the Community Right to Buy Branch of the Scottish Government monitors the way the provisions are working and takes account of user feedback from community bodies, landowners and other stakeholders such as Highlands and Islands Enterprise, Development Trust Association Scotland (DTAS), among others. On the basis of this monitoring and feedback, amendments have been made to secondary legislation and additional guidance has been provided, for example through a comprehensive guidance document (June 2009).

During 2013, the Branch undertook an extensive analysis of the operation of the 2003 Act, to identify and seek remedy of issues that have arisen which require amendments to the primary legislation. This included a review of all the post-legislative scrutiny analysis set out above as well as working with stakeholders. The substantive issues that were identified in this way were included in the 2013 consultation on the Bill.

79. Please indicate which consultation is being referred to in paragraph 59 and also provide detail around the position of the other 7% who did not support the extension of right to buy to urban areas. What are the other reasons for these provisions?

80. Please provide the detail surrounding paragraph 62, how many cases were over 80% and which ones were not. What were the views of the other respondents? Which changes have not been subject to consultation and please provide the reasons for not consulting in each case.

81. Paragraph 63 is a useful summary of the main amendments. However the Committee requires details of all amendments including the reasons for making each and the views of those who did not agree. Please also set out the benefits expected from each change.

87. The paragraphs covering alternative approaches (71-73) also require to provide detail of the level of support/opposition. What are the “appropriate circumstances” in paragraph 71?

Questions 79, 80, 81, and 87 seek information on the consultation on this part of the Bill.

All references to consultation in this part of the Policy Memorandum are to the 2013 consultation, unless otherwise stated. Details of the questions asked in the consultation and the responses to them are covered in Chapter 7 of the consultation analysis. References to percentages in support of particular changes refer to yes/no responses, but respondents may also have provided commentary either in addition to, or instead of, a yes/no answer. The analysis provides a summary of the comments on each question.

Those changes which were not explicitly covered in the consultation have been included to make the system work effectively as a whole. For example, the provisions in section 40 (ballot not conducted as prescribed) arise from consideration of how the ballot should be undertaken by an independent balloter.

73. Please explain the rationale for the one million acres target referred to at paragraph 55.

The target of one million acres of land in community ownership of land by 2020 was announced by the First Minister on 7 June 2013 (announcement at - http://www.scotland.gov.uk/News/Releases/2013/06/landreform07062013). This announcement was made to encourage the further transfer of land into community ownership. There is around 450,000 acres of land currently in community ownership.

76. Paragraph 57 suggest the Bill provides a “framework”, please indicate where the detail is provided to enable the provisions to operate.

Part 3A of the 2003 Act (inserted by section 48 of the Bill) is referred to as a “framework” as it creates a mechanism through which community bodies can seek to purchase abandoned or neglected land. Likewise, the community right to buy provision provides a framework for community bodies to secure a pre-emptive right to acquire land. The detail is provided by community bodies in terms of their proposals for the land or buildings they seek to acquire.

77. What are the “particular issues” referred to in paragraph 59?

The particular issues faced by rural communities in relation to the ownership and use of land include the concentration of ownership in relatively few hands, reliance on the land to deliver community-wide social, economic and environmental benefits, and having certain specific areas of land or buildings that are important to community development.

78. Please detail the “substantial public benefit” referred in in paragraph 59.

The benefits of community control of assets include

“...a sense of community identity and pride; the potential for increased social cohesion; increased confidence, skills and aspirations locally; improved access to services and activities – both those provided by local community organisations and those provided by external agencies; jobs, training and business opportunities; physical improvements to the area. Assets could help to make the organisations running them more financially viable and give them more leverage with external agencies, like the local authority. By changing stereotypes about the communities they served, some organisations reported that the asset had led to the locality becoming more attractive to outsiders, with people moving in rather than queuing to move out. Taken together, it could be argued that these benefits combined to produce a ‘social good’ of well-being and quality of life that was greater than the sum of the parts.”

83. Please detail the “other options” referred to in paragraph 65.

These “other options” include negotiation with the landowner or use of the community right to buy in Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. There are also a range of mechanisms open to local authorities to require owners to remedy neglect, depending on the circumstances. The community body could also ask a local authority to compulsorily acquire the land.

84. Please set out the complexities highlighted by local government respondents referred to in paragraph 66.

8 local authorities responded negatively to this question. Some of them appeared to see the proposals as relating to the existing structure of Compulsory Purchase Orders, which are administered by local authorities. For example, comments included:

- “the use of compulsory purchase powers tends to be controversial, slow and expensive. This doesn’t appear to be the correct approach for applications for the community right to buy” (Renfrewshire Council)
- “The current compulsory purchase legislation is exceedingly complex and difficult to negotiate. It would be difficult for small community bodies to be able to follow through the use of compulsory powers without substantial technical and professional assistance” (Fife Council)

Others simply stated that the power should rest with local authorities, if the existing powers to deal with neglected or abandoned land were felt to be insufficient.

85. In paragraph 66 please provide the reasons why government does not agree with the views of local government, and the expected benefits.

The Scottish Government is mindful of the fact that local authorities have compulsory purchase powers. It wanted to create specific powers for communities to have their own compulsory purchase powers to address the problems caused by abandoned and neglected land in order to further the achievement of sustainable development of land in their community. In particular, Scottish Ministers are aware that abandoned and neglected land can be a barrier to the sustainable development of land, and as such this power will allow communities that choose to take the opportunity to use it to achieve the sustainable development of land in their community.

87. What are the “appropriate circumstances” in paragraph 71?

The consultation asked what the circumstances should be in which communities should have a compulsory power to buy neglected or abandoned land. Details of the responses are set out in paragraphs 7.18 to 7.24 of the analysis. The circumstances provided for in the Bill are that the purchase should be in the public interest and compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of the land.

88. Please provide detail of the “broader” rights sought by some stakeholders referred to in paragraph 72.

A number of stakeholders consider that there should be a right to buy without a willing seller wherever this is in the public interest, without it being restricted to neglected or abandoned land. Community Land Scotland set out their views in detail in an annex to their consultation response, http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0044/00445331.pdf. Other responses to the question “in what circumstances should this be available” focused on the needs of or benefits to the community rather than the existing condition of the land, for example where there is a need for land for housing, or where the community has clear plans which will support economic development.

Part 5 - Asset Transfer Requests

91. Please provide detail of the provisions covered by this Part including in particular the policy thinking underlying the approach in each section. The following paragraphs in addition to the detail requested here set out specific questions.

The provisions in this Part are intended to work as a whole to provide a process which will achieve the policy objectives described in paragraphs 53 to 55 and 74 to 79 of the Policy Memorandum. Paragraphs 251 to 275 of the Explanatory Notes set out how the process will operate, and paragraphs 155 to 201 of the Delegated Powers Memorandum describes the purpose of the secondary legislation involved. We welcome comment from the Committee and from stakeholders, during the process of Stage 1, on where they feel the provisions might be improved to better implement the policy objectives.

92. Paragraph 77 and elsewhere in this Part use the phrase “Community bodies” as being the bodies who can apply. In fact the detail in the sections is much wider/narrower than the impression given by that phrase. Please provide full information on each class of body who can apply and the policy underpinning their inclusion. Please include reasons why they require to have a written constitution.

As you have identified, the phrase ‘community body’ is used in a general sense to provide an indication in the Policy Memorandum of organisations that can make an asset transfer request. The definition of what constitutes a ‘community transfer body’ for the purposes of this Part is set out in section 50 of the Bill, referring to a “community-controlled body” as defined in section 14. The features of a community-controlled body are intended to address concerns raised about ensuring that community bodies are open, inclusive and representative, and that their assets are applied for the benefit of the community. They take account of the comments made in consultation about the draft definitions of community bodies for both asset transfer and participation requests, providing for a single core definition which aligns with existing good practice. The reasons for requiring a community-controlled body to have a written constitution are provided in response to question 57. In relation to bodies that might be designated as community transfer bodies, as noted in paragraph 157 of the Delegated Powers Memorandum:

“Community bodies come in many different forms. The intention of the policy is that as wide a range of community bodies as possible should be able to act as a community transfer body and make an asset transfer request. It is important that community transfer bodies are open, inclusive and represent their community, and in most cases this should be demonstrated by meeting the criteria for a community-controlled body. However, there may be bodies which are established in a different way, especially those established before current approaches became standard, which Ministers still consider should be able to act as community transfer bodies. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to designate additional community bodies for this purpose.”

93. The basis of a decision is set out in section 55, please provide the policy thinking and linkage to the overall aims of the bill for each part, which we note also

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh  EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
includes regeneration and public health as well as a more wider “any other benefit”. For the latter please provide some indications of what this might cover.

As set out in paragraph 262 of the Explanatory Notes, in deciding whether to agree to or refuse an asset transfer request, the relevant authority must compare the benefits that might arise if the request is agreed to with those that might arise from any other proposal for the land or building (section 55(3)(e) and (f)).

The list set out at section 55(3)(c) is intended to ensure that the public service authority considers the full range of benefits that community proposals might help to deliver, and to avoid requests being refused because the benefits they refer to fail to fit limited criteria. Equal opportunities are also included at 55(4) in response to stakeholder requests, this does not fit directly into the list because of the structure of existing equality legislation.

The trio of economic, social and environmental issues are often referred to in describing “wellbeing”; the Scottish Government’s guidance on the Power to Advance Well-Being in the Local Government (Scotland) Act 2003 also includes health (which might be considered part of social wellbeing); economic development and regeneration are linked, but are both specified for the avoidance of doubt. “Any other benefit” is included further to ensure that no benefits are excluded from consideration. We would welcome the views of the Committee and of stakeholders, during the process of Stage 1, on the range of benefits which are referred to in section 55(3) and (4).

The authority must also consider any obligations that may prevent or restrict its ability to agree to the request, and other matters the authority considers relevant, including how any benefits may relate to the functions and purposes of the authority. This would enable the authority to refuse a request if, for example, they are subject to restrictions on the use or disposal of the property, or if the proposed community transfer or use would hinder the authority in carrying out its own functions.

94. What impact will the Asset Transfer Requests’ process have on the Community Ownership Support Service in terms of its role and its resources?

The Community Ownership Support Service would be best placed to comment in detail on the impact of the Bill on the organisation. We would not expect its role to change significantly but we recognise that as more asset transfers may arise it will have an impact on the demand for its services. The Scottish Government will keep under review the level of need for support in relation to asset transfer.

95. Please provide detail of the consultation responses, as requested for earlier Parts. In particular for this Part the detail should cover the views of other public authorities.

Responses relating to the draft provisions on asset transfer can be found in Chapter 3 of the analysis of consultation responses (pages 16 to 28). The analysis includes a breakdown of responses by category, including local government responses.

96. Please indicate the anticipated demand under this provision, and any goals the Scottish Government has set.

The Scottish Government has not set any goals for this Part of the Bill and we cannot predict at this stage what additional demand the Bill will produce.
97. Please provide indicative costs for handling each part of the process.

As noted in paragraphs 77 and 78 of the Financial Memorandum, local authorities have not to date been able to provide estimates for any costs or savings that may arise from these provisions. This in part reflects the difficulty in predicting how many requests will be made, the wide variety in the types of request that could be made, and the complexity in predicting savings associated with better service provision and reductions in running costs associated with assets.

Part 6 Common Good Property

98. Please provide brief details of the “special rules” referred to in paragraph 86 and in particular any impact the bill’s provisions will have on them.

This requires that where a local authority desire to dispose of common good land and there is a question over the right of the authority to alienate, they should apply to the Court of Session or the sheriff to authorise the disposal. The Court or sheriff may, if they see fit, authorise the disposal and may also impose conditions.

The provisions of the Bill do not amend section 75 of the 1973 Act. However, the requirement to consult will ensure that information about local views will be available to the local authority, and if necessary to the court, to help inform decisions on disposals.

99. Paragraph 87 refers to consultees agreeing, please indicate what the views of the other 25% were, and provide detail of any proposals they suggested which are not being taken forward together with the reasons for not doing.

A single question was asked on this section of the consultation paper: “Do you think that the draft provisions will meet our goal to increase transparency about the existence, use and disposal of common good assets and to increase community involvement in decisions taken about their identification, use and disposal.” 75% of the respondents who answered this question directly said yes, but many provided commentary in addition to, or instead of, the yes / no response. A summary of the comments is provided in Chapter 5 of the analysis of consultation responses.

100. Please indicate how many local authorities currently have registers?

The Scottish Government does not require local authorities to provide this information. A few local authorities confirmed that they have a register in their response to the Bill consultation. Others stated that establishing a register would have considerable resource implications, which may imply they do not currently have a complete or current register.

101. How long will local authorities have to establish a register or, amend an existing register to comply with the provisions of the Bill?

We will consult with stakeholders over the schedule for commencement of the Bill’s provisions.
102. It would be helpful to specify detail of what bodies are covered in this section by the term “community bodies” (see section 67 of the Bill).

The definition of community bodies in relation to consultation on common good is intended to be as broad as possible and to cover any group whose purposes include promoting or improving the interests of any community in the area.

103. Please indicate why consultation on disposal is restricted to those community bodies with a known interest and how this fits with the transparency and consultation approach set out in paragraph 93.

When local authorities propose to dispose of or change the use of a particular common good asset, this is a more focused consultation than is required for establishing what common good property exists in the area. This approach will also help to address concerns that consultation on common good property should be restricted to residents of the area of the former burgh to which the property originally belonged (although we do not intend that community bodies from outwith that area should be excluded from expressing an interest).

104. Please indicate details of what the ministerial guidance might cover and when this will be available to the Committee.

Guidance issued under sections 64 and 66 is likely to set out the information to be included in common good registers and how they should be published. It may also provide advice on consultation in relation to drawing up the register and any proposed disposal or change of use. Ministers may also decide in future that it would be helpful to provide guidance on the management and use of common good property. All such guidance will be developed in consultation with stakeholders.

105. Can you give an example of what might be considered to be a “significant dispute” referred to in paragraph 91, and who will adjudicate on what constitutes a “significant dispute”, and how such an adjudication can be challenged (see question 98)?

106. Given existing requirements referred to (accounting and asset management for example) what is the policy thinking behind not requiring ownership to be legally verified?

107. Why are there no appeal or review provisions in this Part of the Bill?

The answers to these 3 questions are linked.

A “significant dispute” would be where the categorisation of the property would have a significant effect on a proposed land transaction. This is likely to be a case where, if the property were common good property, the council would require court agreement to a disposal or would be unable itself to appropriate the land. In such a situation any proposed disposal or appropriation could be challenged by a third party making an application to a court to prevent it.

This type of court action would be the mechanism for verifying the common good status (rather than ownership) of property. Given the costs involved, it would not be appropriate to require local authorities to take such action except in particular cases where a disposal or appropriation is in question. An application to the court would be the route available to any individual who disputes the local authority’s assessment of whether a property is common good or not, if the local authority is unwilling to reconsider that assessment.

108. We note in paragraph 93 the demand for communities to have more say in the management of common good property. Please indicate how these provisions meet that aspiration.

The provisions of Part 6 of the Bill will ensure that communities are aware of what property in their area forms part of the common good and will have a role in the process of establishing that. This will make it easier for them to make representations to the local authority about the management and use of that property, as well as allowing them to inform the local authority of any property they believe is common good which is not listed. The Bill also introduces a clear statutory requirement for communities to be consulted on any proposals to dispose of or change the use of common good property.

Part 7 Allotments

109. Please provide a link to the National Food and Drink Policy referred to in paragraph 95.

See the link below:

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2009/06/25133322/11

110. We note the link in paragraph 99, Can you confirm that link is to the Working Group and contains up to date information on their meetings and recommendations. (see also below)

The link provided gives information about the Grow Your Own Working Group, and a link to the Working Group’s own website, http://www.growyourownscotland.info/ . Minutes of the Working Group’s meetings are available at
The Group has been asked to update this as soon as possible.

111. Paragraph 96 refers to consultation, please confirm which of the three consultations later referred to this is intended to cover.

Agreement that the legislative framework for allotments should be updated has been shown through all three consultations.

The separate Allotments Consultation is available at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/04/5940  The analysis of responses is at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0043/00437683.pdf and an overview of the responses and the Scottish Government’s proposals is at 112. Paragraph 96 helpfully sets out an overview of this Part. Unfortunately that is as far as the detail goes in the memorandum. Please provide detail of each section individually including the policy thinking behind any changes or reasons for keeping them the same as the original. Please provide detail of the original provision. The following paragraphs in addition to the detail requested here set out specific questions.

Paragraph 96 of the Policy Memorandum identifies the existing legislation on allotments and the consultation which has been undertaken. Paragraphs 97 and 98 outline the main provisions in the Bill, which replace rather than amend the existing legislation. The detailed explanation of these provisions is set out in paragraphs 283 to 343 of the Explanatory Notes, and paragraphs 202 to 242 of the Delegated Powers Memorandum describes the purpose of the secondary legislation involved. The provisions in this Part are intended to work as a whole to provide a process which will achieve the policy objectives. We welcome comment from the Committee and from stakeholders, during the process of Stage 1, on where they feel the provisions might be improved to better implement the policy objectives.

113. Does section 70(6) also apply to joint request made under section 70(5)?

Yes. The request is still made under section 70(1), even if it is made jointly as permitted by section 70(5). The notice requirement in section 70(6) therefore applies whether the request is from one or more than one persons.

114. Will the list be made public, in some way accepting Data Protection issues, and if not will the Local Authority be under any duty to indicate publicly the length of the list and expected waiting period?

Section 79(2)(g) provides that the number of persons entered in the list must be published within the Annual Allotments Report.

115. Please provide some details of what might be considered “reasonable steps” as set out in section 72.

“Reasonable steps” might be that local authorities, in conjunction with residents and other landowners, have identified all available land suitable for allotment use and have progressed these sites where possible. Reasons sites may not be progressed include planning issues, contamination, local objections and disproportionate costs.

116. To how many local authorities is this provision expected to apply at commencement?

The Scottish Government does not hold up to date waiting list information for all local authorities. Of the 15 local authorities that provided information, 11 already hold waiting lists. 7 of these needed no more plots to meet the target while the remaining 4 would be required to increase provision substantially.

117. Please indicate the policy thinking behind setting the trigger in section 72 at 15? To how many local authorities will this apply at commencement?

Existing legislation sets out that local authorities must consider provision when 6 people express an interest in an allotment. This was increased to 15 in line with consultation responses. The Scottish Government does not hold up to date waiting list information for all local authorities. Local authorities which do not currently have any allotments may not hold a waiting list.

118. Given the earlier work of the working group and the consultations please indicate the reason for allowing a further 2 years from commencement for regulations to be made. Please provide the same details covering section 77.

Under section 74 local authorities must consult interested persons before making regulations. Some local authorities do not currently have regulations in place and the new regulations may be site specific, requiring authorities to produce more than one document.

For section 77, local authorities will require time to identify demand, establish the steps they will take to provide allotments, identify suitable land and determine whether this could be used for allotments or other food growing before writing and publishing their report.

119. How many local authorities currently have regulations in place?

The Scottish Government does not hold up to date information on which local authorities currently have regulations in place. Of the 15 local authorities that provided information, 10 currently have regulations in place as a standalone document or within lease agreements.

120. Please indicate what consultation with allotment holders and other persons will be undertaken by Ministers under sections 75 and 76.

Allotment holders will be offered a lease of another allotment if required in terms of sections 75(4) and 76(5). No specific consultation requirement is set out, however Scottish Ministers would have to satisfy themselves that the conditions of sections 75(4) and 76(5) were met in deciding whether to grant consent.

121. Please explain why there is no consultation required under section 77 and thereafter any reviews.

The document is intended to set out the local authorities’ intention to provide allotments and detail their available land. Once published residents will be able to approach the local authority to discuss taking over the identified land for growing, or work together to provide a site. Local authorities may wish to consult with local residents and other land owners to help them to identify suitable land, but the Bill does not make this a statutory requirement.

122. What period do the government consider is a “reasonably practicable” one under section 79 and why has no specific time limit been specified. Do any local authorities currently produce such a report?

This period has been left open to allow local authorities flexibility to prepare their report.

Of the 15 local authorities that provided us with information, 2 currently produce a report showing details of tenancy, acreage and rent of let and unlet allotments, with an annual statement showing receipts and expenditure every year.

123. Please indicate the extent of the current problem anticipated by section 80.

Under existing legislation (section 7(5) of the Allotments (Scotland) Act 1892) local authorities already have the power to remove unauthorised buildings but this is out of date. It does not, for instance, provide procedural safeguards to be followed before the removal and

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
disposal of an unauthorised building takes place. Section 80 is intended to provide local authorities with a clear process to remove unauthorised buildings, while protecting the rights of tenants. The Scottish Government does not hold any information on how many times this power has been used in the past, but consultation responses indicated that the power should be retained.

124. Are delegated schemes of management currently operating, if so please detail experiences to date.

There are many sites being run by allotment associations or other groups across the country but exact numbers are not known. For example Stirling Council currently manage one site and lease land to 3 allotment associations.

‘Finding Scotland’s Allotments’ produced by Scottish Allotments & Gardens Society in 2007 found that 69% of sites are in local authority ownership. Local authorities managed 68% of the sites they owned with the remainder devolved to site associations.

Consultation responses indicated local authorities were in favour of placing more responsibility on the users of allotments to provide and run them themselves whether in partnership with local authorities or with support from them.

125. Please indicate the policy thinking behind section 82.

Consultation responses indicated that appropriate training and promotion of allotments could lead to more appealing and environmentally friendly sites and would raise awareness of the benefits of allotments. Training could also reduce the turnover of allotment sites, reducing administrative burdens on the local authority and/or allotment association.

126. Please indicate the extent to which section 84 requires prior consultation with tenants.

Allotment holders will be offered a lease of another allotment if required in terms of section 84(5). No specific consultation requirement is set out, however the Scottish Ministers would have to satisfy themselves that the conditions of section 84(5) were met before granting consent.

127. Please indicate the types of produce intended to be covered by section 87 and the policy thinking underpinning this provision.

Produce to be sold would include those items intended to be grown on allotments, ie vegetables, fruit, herbs and flowers. Other items created from that produce, such as jams and chutneys, may be included where the local authority sees fit and other relevant legislation such as food safety and hygiene is complied with.

128. What will happen to items not removed timeously under section 88?

Items can remain on the allotment for use by the next tenant or can be removed by the local authority.
129. Please confirm regulations under section 90 will require consultation with the tenant concerned.

Before making regulations under section 90(4), consultation is required with (a) each local authority and (b) any other person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have an interest (see section 90(6)). Such regulations must set out the procedural steps to be followed for determining liability and the amount of compensation.

130. Please indicate the detail of the progress being made by the Working Group (paragraph 99) including detail on the recommendations covered by this Part and detail of those not covered including reasons for them not being covered and detail of how they will be taken forward in the future.

The Working Group are currently writing a report on their activities in 2010-14 and plan to set out new recommendations for 2014-17. This report has not been published yet but currently two thirds of the original recommendations have been completed while the others still require some action. The original recommendations can be viewed at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Business-Industry/Food-Industry/own/qyorr

131. Paragraph 100 should also provide detail of the consultation responses relating to those supporting the provisions and details of areas not being taken forward. Detail of why the approach taken was thought appropriate and why other options were not is also required.

This information is set out in the Allotments Consultation Analysis Report and Consultation Report as referred to under question 111.

Part 8 Non-Domestic rates

132. Paragraph 101 refers to the “needs of businesses and the local economy” please indicate what these needs are linking to the promotion of resilient communities and sustainable places.

These needs will vary depending on local economies and communities. By reducing business rates taxation local authorities may, for example, reduce the overheads of community based groups, or owners/occupiers of properties that otherwise support vulnerable communities, or could incentivise such groups to occupy premises they could not otherwise afford.

133. Parts 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the Bill could lead to community groups generating profits for community uses, how does Part 8 support the policy objectives of these Parts?

Local authorities could use the power to give discounts to community groups who do not currently benefit from centrally set reliefs. Part 8 also supports the wider objective of enabling decisions to be made at a more local level to reflect local needs and circumstances.

134. Please indicate the extent of the scope local authorities currently have to vary reliefs locally (paragraph 102 refers).

Currently all reliefs are set centrally by Scottish Government and local authorities have only very limited powers to vary the percentages of certain reliefs from 80 to 100% provided centrally set criteria are met. They have no current powers to create bespoke relief schemes.
135. Please provide some examples of the potential uses of the powers being granted by this section.

Relief could be granted to a sole property, a street, a town centre or a particular type of business or sector. They could be used, for example, to support or create employment, or to encourage regeneration of a particular area.

136. Paragraph 102 indicates powers are without restriction, please indicate how this is consistent with the restrictions set out in paragraph 103.

There is no restriction on the circumstances in which local authorities may grant reliefs. Paragraph 103 clarifies that only a power to grant reliefs is being created, powers to make other changes to non-domestic rates, including creating supplements, are not being transferred, nor will any of the national reliefs funded by the Scottish Government change.

137. Please indicate the extent to which consultation responses provided examples and full details of the consultation carried out including details of any suggestions received which are not being implemented. Please elaborate on what constitutes “strong support” and indicate the extent of the opposition and details of those not supporting.

A full analysis of the consultation was published on 4 September 2013 and can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/09/1530/0. Responses to this particular question are covered in paragraphs 2.48 to 2.61.

Please provide policy details covering the provisions in sections 94(2) to (4).

As noted in paragraph 346 of the Explanatory Notes, section 94(2) amends schedule 12 to the Local Government Finance Act 1992 (payments to local authorities) to ensure that the arrangements for pooling of income from non-domestic rates and funding of rating authorities will accommodate and remain unaffected by the power to create relief schemes. Subsections (3) and (4) make consequential amendments to allow these changes to take effect.

Effects on Equal Opportunities

138. When will the assessment be published?

The Equality Impact Assessment will be published very shortly. We will inform the Committee and stakeholders when it is available.

139. Please indicate what is required under the public sector duty.

The Commission states:

“In summary, those subject to the equality duty must, in the exercise of their functions, have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

These are sometimes referred to as the three aims or arms of the general equality duty. The Act helpfully explains that having due regard for advancing equality involves:

- Removing or minimising disadvantages suffered by people due to their protected characteristics.
- Taking steps to meet the needs of people from protected groups where these are different from the needs of other people.
- Encouraging people from protected groups to participate in public life or in other activities where their participation is disproportionately low.’’

140. We note in paragraph 108 the inclusion of the equality duty when considering asset transfer and participation requests. Please indicate why this is not also necessary for other parts of the Bill.

A public authority is required to have regard to the public sector equality duty in the exercise of all its functions. Stakeholders requested that equality should be explicitly included in the list of benefits to be considered when authorities are taking decisions on community proposals, and sections 19(4) and 55(4) reflect this, to the extent possible within devolved powers. Similar lists of benefits do not occur elsewhere in the Bill, and the issue has not been raised in relation to other Parts.

141. In relation to the final sentence in paragraph 108 can you confirm the Government’s position regarding the completion of an EQIA. In what circumstances might this not be appropriate?

The specific duties under the public sector equality duty require listed authorities to “where and to the extent required to fulfil the general equality duty, assess the impact of applying a proposed new or revised policy or practice against the needs of the general equality duty”. Authorities which are only subject to the general equality duty are also recommended to assess policies to help them to comply with the general duty.

It is for individual authorities to determine whether an assessment should be carried out in relation to any policy or practice, and the degree and depth of the process that may be required.
142. We note the last line in paragraph 113, which states that right to buy abandoned land is “either compatible with Article 1 of Protocol 1 or capable of being exercised in a manner that is so compatible”. Please provide more information on this view and clarify the circumstances where the government believes there may be a doubt over the compatibility of the purchase of such land.

The Scottish Government is content that section 48 concerning a right to buy neglected and abandoned land is compatible with Article 1 of Protocol 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The provisions inserted into the 2003 Act by section 48 do not as such determine any person’s ECHR rights as the provisions provide a mechanism whereby a community body may apply to purchase abandoned and neglected land and give Ministers a power to consent to that such an application. The Scottish Government is content that the provisions inserted by section 48 are capable of being exercised in a way that is compatible with the ECHR. Ministers will be required to ensure that any decisions or secondary legislation they make under the provisions inserted by section 48 are compatible with the ECHR.

Island Communities

143. Given the subject matter of the Bill and the recent report “Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities” please indicate the extent to which the Bill has been “island proofed” as set out on page 24 of the report.

“Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities” sets out the Scottish Government’s commitment to the principle of island proofing, and intention to formalise this approach in statute through an Islands Act following independence (p. 23-24). The consideration given to the impact of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill on island communities, reflected in paragraph 120 of the Policy Memorandum, demonstrates that the Scottish Government is already informed by the principle of island proofing when exercising its functions.

144. Please indicate which aspects of the Bill will produce a differential impact on the islands.

Having considered the allotments issue in more detail, we do not consider that any aspects of the Bill will produce a differential impact on the islands. All parts of the Bill allow flexibility to reflect local circumstances and to respond to the needs and ambitions of local communities.

145. Please clarify whether paragraph 120 is suggesting the approach in the Islands to the provision of allotments to meet demand is to be different from that of other areas.

Paragraph 120 does not indicate a different approach to the provision of allotments in island areas. Local authorities in any area could work with private landowners to lease land for allotments. Crofting (which is not confined to island communities) is one possible reason for shortage of land for allotments, but other types of areas may also face shortages for other reasons.
Local Government

146. It is not clear what purpose paragraph 122 is serving, can you clarify the impact the information provided is designed to have on the consideration the Committee is required to make of this aspect.

Paragraph 122 indicates the level of involvement which local government has had in developing the Bill, and therefore the opportunities it has had to consider and shape the impact of the provisions.

Sustainable Development

147. The terms “sustainable development” and “sustainability” appear in the policy memorandum in the context of: Communities (paras 3 and 59); Control of assets (para 53); Access to land and land use (paras 57, 65, 67, 72, 113); Place (para 101); and Economics (para 2, 36 and 104). This suggests the Bill is concerned with several social, economic and environmental aspects of Scotland’s sustainable development. However the sustainable development section of the Policy Memorandum includes only a limited consideration of the impacts of the Bill on the environment and land use. Please provide a more comprehensive assessment of the impact on sustainable development to enable the Committee to consider this aspect.

As noted in paragraph 5 of the Policy Memorandum, the Bill aims to support approaches that can contribute to improving outcomes in all aspects of people’s lives. By empowering community bodies to take action directly, and strengthening the focus on outcomes and the involvement of communities in shaping the design and delivery of public services, the Bill will support the achievement of improved outcomes on a wide range of issues, determined by the needs and ambitions of individual communities.

The Scottish Government’s Regeneration Strategy, “Achieving a Sustainable Future” 8 sets out in Annex A a series of outcomes supporting the strategy, relating to economically, physically and economically sustainable communities. While the particular actions taken will vary from place to place, it is clear that the Bill’s provisions have the potential to support many of these outcomes. In addition to the core aim that communities will be involved in designing and delivering the services that affect them, that involvement and the support for community-led action can also result in strong and effective community networks, positive identity and future aspirations (socially sustainable). The Bill will empower communities to improve their area and maximise local assets (socially sustainable); address vacant and derelict land and property and provide access to quality public space and appropriate greenspace (physically sustainable). Community projects or community input to public services can also provide access to effective local services (socially sustainable), learning and development opportunities and sustainable employment (economically sustainable).

8 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2011/12/09110320/0

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
ANNEX A: Development of Community Planning since 2012 (Questions 14, 15, 34, 35)

As the Committee knows, the Scottish Government and COSLA are committed to strengthening community planning in line with the clear vision in our shared Statement of Ambition, referred to in paragraph 16 of the policy memorandum. The Statement articulates how CPPs should drive public service reform at local level.

Since March 2012, when the Statement of Ambition was published, the Scottish Government and our partners have taken forward a range of actions to promulgate this expectation. Many of these activities are set out in paragraph 37 of the policy memorandum.

CPPs have produced and are now delivering on new Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs), developed in line with Guidance which the Scottish Government and COSLA issued in December 2012. Scottish Ministers and Council Leaders signed off these SOAs in July and August 2013, following a quality assurance process of the draft agreements. Development priorities for CPPs identified from this quality assurance are reflected in development plans which accompany their SOA. CPPs have since been taking action to address these development priorities. A paper which the National Community Planning Group considered at its October 2013 meeting summarised strengths and areas of development across CPPs which the quality assurance process identified.

For most CPPs, one development priority has been on joint resourcing. Key community planning partners are expected to give effect to the Agreement on Joint Working on Community Planning and Resourcing, which was signed by Scottish Ministers, the President of COSLA and the Chair of the National Community Planning Group and published in September 2013, alongside the draft Scottish Government Budget for 2014-15. This requires partners to work together through CPPs to deploy their collective resources towards jointly agreed priorities as set out in their SOA.

The National Community Planning Group was established in 2012 to provide national leadership and strategic direction to strengthen community planning. It has been working to provide national support for CPPs on joint resourcing and other development priorities it identified from CPPs' development priorities and key messages from the Accounts Commission and Auditor General’s report on Improving Community Planning in Scotland produced by Audit Scotland. These include prevention, tackling inequalities and community engagement and co-production.

The Scottish Government and our partners have worked in other ways to support efforts by CPPs and partner bodies to strengthen community planning. What Works Scotland was launched in June 2014. It is a centre which will support and share effective practice by evaluating evidence from emerging approaches to public service delivery and reform in Scotland. It will then use this evidence to promote and share best practice.

---

9 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Government/local-government/CP/soa
11 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Government/PublicServiceReform/CP/communityplanningreview/October2013
13 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Government/PublicServiceReform/CP/communityplanningreview
15 http://whatworksscotland.ac.uk/

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ classroom scissors

www.scotland.gov.uk
A national community planning conference in June 2014, entitled Changing Lives, Celebrating Success brought together 200 community planning practitioners from across the public and third sectors. The event showcased examples of innovative work taking place locally across Scotland involving public and voluntary sectors and communities themselves.

Scottish Government and the Improvement Service both support the work of the Improving Evidence and Data Group, which also includes a number of other public sector partners (including SOLACE, NHS National Services Scotland and Scottish Enterprise). This group is leading efforts to support CPPs in making better use of evidence and analysis in driving improved outcomes for their communities. The Scottish Government is also part-funding an Improvement Service-led project to develop a benchmarking framework for CPPs.

CPPs have been working with the Improvement Service to map the activities and resources which will help build local capacity. This includes the provision of support for self-assessment and improvement planning. 21 CPPs will have been through this process by the end of 2014.

Scottish Government Location Directors provide further support to CPPs by discussing progress with them and where necessary challenging them. They also act as liaison channels between CPPs and the Scottish Government.

CPP audits led by Audit Scotland both support efforts to strengthen community planning and provide the assurance to which question 35 refers. The Accounts Commission and Auditor General published their first set of three CPP audit reports (Aberdeen\(^{16}\), North Ayrshire\(^{17}\) and Scottish Borders\(^{18}\)) in March 2013. A further three reports have been published to date in 2014. Two more audit reports, together with a follow-up to Improving Community Planning in Scotland\(^{19}\), are due to be published later in 2014.

Recent audit reports (covering Glasgow\(^{20}\), Falkirk\(^{21}\) and Moray\(^{22}\) CPPs) show that, while there is more work to be done, CPPs are making progress. Examples of strengths and areas of recent improvement from these reports include clarity of purpose and direction, closer focus on preventative work and addressing inequality, and stronger partnership working towards shared priorities.

Despite this already broad programme of reform, Scottish Government, COSLA and wider community planning partners consider that legislative reform is also required, for reasons explained in paragraphs 38 to 43 of the policy memorandum. The key issues are placing the focus of community planning on the achievement of outcomes, the involvement of community bodies and placing statutory duties relating to this revised purpose for community planning on partner bodies. The 2013 Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill revealed general support for the direction of change.

\(^{16}\) http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2013/nr_130320_aberdeen_cpp.pdf
\(^{17}\) http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2013/nr_130320_north_ayrshire_cpp.pdf
\(^{19}\) http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2013/nr_130320_improving_cpp.pdf
\(^{22}\) http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/docs/central/2014/nr_140710_moray_cpp.pdf

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered and agreed its general approach to scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1. The Committee also agreed to—

- write to the Scottish Government seeking further information on the Policy Memorandum on the Bill; seeking a written response by 1 August, 2014 and to consider this response, in private, at a future meeting;
- a timetable for the scrutiny of the Bill;
- issue a call for written evidence;
- issue a targeted call for written and oral evidence from specific key stakeholders;
Present:

Cameron Buchanan    Mark McDonald
Stuart McMillan    Anne McTaggart
Alex Rowley        Kevin Stewart (Convener)
John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee agreed its approach to the scrutiny of written and oral evidence on the Bill at Stage 1. As part of this approach, the Committee noted the written response received from the Minister from Local Government and Planning to various questions it had raised on the Policy Memorandum which accompanies the Bill.
LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND REGENERATION COMMITTEE

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES

23rd Meeting, 2014 (Session 4)

WEDNESDAY 24 SEPTEMBER 2014

Present:

- Cameron Buchanan
- Mark McDonald
- Stuart McMillan
- Anne McTaggart
- Alex Rowley
- Kevin Stewart (Convener)
- John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence, in round table format, on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

- Elma Murray, Past Chair of SOLACE Scotland, and Chief Executive of North Ayrshire Council;
- Pauline Douglas, Head of Operations, Coalfields Regeneration Trust;
- Angus Hardie, Chief Executive, Scottish Community Alliance;
- Ian Cooke, Director, Development Trusts Association Scotland;
- Felix Spittal, Policy Officer, Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations (SCVO);
- Calum Irving, Chief Executive, Voluntary Action Scotland;
- Professor Annette Hastings, Senior Lecturer in Urban Studies, University of Glasgow;
- Councillor David O'Neill, President of COSLA;
- Councillor Harry McGuigan, Spokesperson for Community Well-being and Safety, COSLA;
- Barry McCulloch, Senior Policy Advisor, Federation of Small Businesses;
- Eric Samuel, Senior Policy and Learning Manager, BIG Lottery Fund; and then from—

- Ian Turner, Bill Team Leader, Alasdair McKinlay, Head of Community Planning and Community Empowerment Unit, Norman McLeod, Scottish Government Legal Directorate, Dave Thomson, Land Reform Tenancy Unit, Rachel Rayner, Scottish Government Legal Directorate, and Dr Amanda Fox, Food and Drink Policy Leader, Scottish Government.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill The Committee considered the evidence received.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered and agreed its approach to the scrutiny of the Bill at Stage 1, including the witnesses it wishes to invite to give oral evidence on the Bill. The Committee also agreed a digital engagement strategy to enhance its level of engagement with the public, and community groups, as part of its Stage 1 scrutiny. Finally, the Committee noted the potential for a fact-finding exercise to support its scrutiny of Part 7 of the Bill on allotments.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

09:35

The Convener: Agenda item 3 is our first oral evidence session for stage 1 scrutiny of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We have decided to start the process by having a round-table session with key stakeholders, to set the scene for the work.

As many of you may know, the committee has used its work programme over the past two years to examine key policy areas that are relevant to this very important piece of legislation. That has included examining public services reform, local elections, non-domestic rates, the community planning system, land use planning, public procurement, community regeneration policy and, most recently, flexibility and autonomy in local government.

We have also undertaken a wide programme of public and community engagement, in which we have visited all parts of Scotland. In the past three years, the committee has undertaken 10 visits and meetings outside Edinburgh, from Shetland to the Scottish Borders and from Ayrshire to Aberdeen.

I invite our witnesses to introduce themselves before we move to our discussion on the bill.

Eric Samuel (Big Lottery Fund): I am senior policy and learning manager with the Big Lottery Fund in Scotland.

Elma Murray (Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers): I am chief executive of North Ayrshire Council and I am representing the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers.

Ian Cooke (Development Trusts Association Scotland): I am director of Development Trusts Association Scotland.

Councillor David O’Neill (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): I am president of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities.

Councillor Harry Mcguigan (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): I am a North Lanarkshire councillor and COSLA spokesperson.

Professor Annette Hastings (University of Glasgow): I am professor of urban studies at the University of Glasgow.

Angus Hardie (Scottish Community Alliance): I am director of Scottish Community Alliance.

Pauline Douglas (Coalfields Regeneration Trust): I am head of operations in Scotland for the Coalfields Regeneration Trust.

Calum Irving (Voluntary Action Scotland): I am chief executive of Voluntary Action Scotland.

Felix Spittal (Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations): I am policy officer at the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations.

Barry McCulloch (Federation of Small Businesses): I am senior policy adviser at the Federation of Small Businesses.

The Convener: Thank you; you are all very welcome.

I will start. The minister has said that legislation in itself will not be enough to deliver community empowerment. I have always been of the opinion that sometimes you cannot legislate for things and that sometimes a bit of gumption—a bit of common sense—is required.

We are keen to ensure that as many people as possible are engaged in processes. Professor Hastings, you have done a fair bit of work on disadvantaged communities and engagement. How can we ensure that the bill and the common sense that we hope is behind it will let disadvantaged communities have their say?

Professor Hastings: The first step is to recognise, through the bill, that there is a problem and to state explicitly that the bill should not have the unintended consequence of empowering those in society who are already advantaged and empowered. A symbolic statement in the bill would give an important steer by suggesting that that should not happen.

Our concern is that there are insufficient safeguards in what is proposed to ensure that additional support and positive discrimination are afforded to more disadvantaged groups.

There is a considerable body of research evidence, which is growing all the time, that more affluent social groups have the necessary skills and cultural and social capital to take advantage of opportunities that are put before them. There is a clear case for our taking deliberate strategic action to ensure that more disadvantaged groups can avail themselves of the opportunities that undoubtedly are present in the bill.

The Convener: So by a symbolic statement you mean a statement of intent rather than something that is symbolic.

Does anybody else have any comments on how we ensure that we engage folks from more disadvantaged communities?

Councillor O’Neill: The unprecedented turnout that we saw last Thursday was replicated in... disadvantaged communities. The turnout was slightly lower in disadvantaged communities, but we still had a massive increase. We must take advantage of the fact that people engaged in that process. It would be a real shame if we let the engagement that we saw last week slip away.

Calum Irving: One of the reasons why we saw that big turnout and an increase in citizen activism was that people felt that they could influence the vote. Building on that is one of the key targets that should be written into the bill. There should be expectations in relation to not just outcomes but assessment of how people have been involved and whether the way in which the statutory sector has done that has led to greater involvement. We have said that the bill should not casually confute the third sector and the much more empowering, citizen-based processes. That would do a disservice to both communities and the third sector. Those need to be clarified and separated out in the bill, and capacity building should be focused on engagement and participation.

Angus Hardie: As the minister said, the bill itself will not be enough. In order to avoid the sharp-elbow syndrome, whereby the more able, higher capacity communities get most advantage from the bill, we will have to ensure that resources are allocated fairly soon to build capacity in communities.

The Government has invested a lot in capacity building in the past and, frankly, it has not worked. We have to look at how we can change our approach to building capacity in the most disadvantaged communities so that it makes an impact and changes the normal pattern of those communities being the last to benefit.

Pauline Douglas: The phrase that I used was that people don’t know what they don’t know. We have to help communities to understand that they can be involved and will be listened to, and point them in a direction and offer help and support. I am just reiterating what everybody has said. How can we help the more disadvantaged people in communities to become involved and take part?

The Convener: As David O'Neill has rightly said, over the past few weeks and months we have seen a rebirth of things such as town hall meetings and the establishment of grass-roots groups on both sides of the referendum debate. There might be some hope there. If we grasp that and continue with it, we might get somewhere.

Stuart McMillan (West Scotland) (SNP): My first point is for Councillor O’Neill. I am very much aware that in some of the more disadvantaged communities, turnout was a lot higher than in some of the more affluent or middle-class areas. Mr Hardie made some comments a moment ago. What would he or his organisation suggest to take the issues he mentioned forward?

Angus Hardie: This is a very complicated area. Our approach could do much more on peer support. In other words, communities that have already developed capacity could be harnessed much more effectively in supporting other communities. Traditionally, we come into communities from the top down and deliver capacity-building programmes, which generally miss their mark.

We should be looking for more peer support and mentoring, or at least we should begin to try that because it does not happen at the moment.

Eric Samuel: We attached to our submission to the committee details of the our place initiative, which I think the committee is aware of. We are into the second phase of that. In both phases, we put in support contractors. This time we are taking an asset-based development approach, so we are building on the assets. The support contractors are there to build on the assets that communities already have. In round one, although we thought that the process would take two years, it turned into a three-year process. In phase 2, we are leaving people in the communities for five years.

The first phase will be very much about working with communities rather than just leaving them, and in the second phase we will think about the vision that the communities have come up with and how we work towards it. It can be done, but it takes time and resources.

09:45

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): Certainly in my constituency and in less deprived or regeneration communities a huge amount is going on. Sometimes when we talk about community capacity we mean the professional expertise that exists in the community. In more affluent areas, there are more likely to be solicitors and other professionals who can be called on, but such people are less likely to be available in more disadvantaged communities to support the organisations that exist there.

Is the issue how we get communities to build capacity through activism? In the areas that I represent, I detect that community activism is alive. Is it more to do with having a support base for existing community groups and organisations? If so, how do we get such a base into communities that do not have the people who would fill those roles?

Professor Hastings: I very much agree with suggestions about building capacity from the bottom up, but there is also a role for more top-down solutions to the problem. Particularly in the years of austerity, when resources are tight, I am concerned that when community bodies come forward to request improvements to their service, outcomes can be improved for one community at the expense of another. The process that is developed for requesting participation should require public bodies to consider displacement effects on other communities as a result of improving the outcomes for a community.

Elma Murray: During the conversation I was reflecting on three or so examples, which might help the committee in its deliberations.

I agree with the comments about an asset-based approach. A lot of that is about building people’s confidence in their ability to step up, bring forward their ideas and solutions and articulate the case for getting support. As Professor Hastings said, if we are to get people in our communities to that position, we need to provide up-front support. I would not necessarily call that a top-down approach. It is about working with people and providing them with extra capacity. We have done that in a number of communities across Scotland, and it is very much an asset-based approach. That is an example that it might be helpful for the committee to consider.

We should take opportunities as they present themselves. The Commonwealth games in Scotland this year were a significant success and a number of communities got involved. For example, when the Queen’s baton relay went through their areas, communities organised local events and celebrations of local heroes, thinking about what the games meant for their area. That sense of community is hugely important in building empowerment and people’s confidence in what they can do for themselves.

A lot of work on parenting is going on across Scotland, which is not about bringing in people who have professional skills but about finding people who are prepared to come forward as local community champions, to work with people who might have a wee bit less confidence and help them to feel able to do things that a few months or a couple of years earlier they did not understand that they could achieve. Such an approach can completely change people’s aspirations and ambitions in their local community.

Felix Spittal: Over the past couple of years, we have had quite a few discussions with our members about capacity, and one of the comments that has stood out, which was made in one of the early sessions, is that communities need expertise on tap, not on top. Communities need a bit of technical expertise and organisational support at a specific time as well as different levels of support at different stages as they go through the process of empowering themselves.

There is a big argument to be made for building capacity directly into the organisations that communities have identified as those that should take forward their priorities and ambitions. The Scottish Government’s strengthening communities programme is piloting that approach well, but it needs to be widened and offered to many more communities to ensure that the organisations that they have chosen to take forward the priorities in their areas have capacity.

Angus Hardie: I absolutely support Felix Spittal’s comments. As for how we respond to communities that do not have the middle-class capacities and skill sets that other communities might have, I think that the distinction is that we should invest in local leadership and local activists and give them the confidence to bring in those skills on their own terms. That is significantly different from skills being delivered in a top-down or up-front fashion to a community. If they are brought in on the community’s terms, that is absolutely fine—indeed, that is what the communities need—but, as Felix Spittal has pointed out, that sort of thing should happen on communities’ own terms whenever they need it as they move along the pathway of empowerment.

Mark McDonald: Communities often find that the pathways for support—if you will—are complicated and that they have to overcome hurdles in accessing funding or developing business cases. Sometimes, that funding needs to be match funding, which is easier for some communities to achieve. Moreover, local authorities often put up barriers to support because they perceive that the asset that a community might wish to take over is a local authority one.

Because of a perceived conflict of interest, communities can find barriers being put up, some of which might be genuine but some of which might be artificial. Is there any means of simplifying and streamlining the landscape for communities—particularly those that do not know where to go—to ensure that they know exactly where they can get relevant support? Can we remove any barriers that prevent communities from accessing the support that is out there?

Councillor McGuigan: Perhaps it might help if I refer to an experience that I had a number of years ago and which I think that we can all learn from. I certainly did—I hope.

When major issues emerged in a housing estate in the area that I represented, I went about my business, talking to the police, community development officers, social work and all sorts of professionals who knew how to go about social planning and social reconstruction. We looked at all the problems and held a major and well-attended public meeting in a local school. However, within five minutes of my standing up to introduce the meeting, I could see heads shaking; after 10 minutes or a quarter of an hour, I saw lots of heads going down and shaking. At that point, we invited people to discuss the matter, because of what was being expressed by the voice—if you like—that was coming from the audience.

We—or, at least, I—realised quite quickly that that had happened because, although we had consulted all the experts and some of the influential community groups that operated in the area, we had not consulted the real experts, who were the people who lived in the community and who were experiencing what life was really like there. There were people who had skills, understanding, knowledge and a desire to make a change in their community, but we had forgotten—I had forgotten—to include that important voice. That is what the empowerment bill should be about.

I was not surprised by the huge turnout for the referendum on Thursday, because I realise that some people wanted to make a fairly simple statement. There were people at the polling stations whom I had never seen before and who said that they were voting a particular way for a particular reason. They said, “I want things to change. I want to be involved. I want my voice to be heard.” They did not say that individually, but the collective statement that they made was, “We want our voice to be heard. We want people to help our voice to be heard and to understand where we are coming from.” We have the expertise to do that.

Somebody mentioned pathways. We have to be careful that we do not construct a set of pathways that look good to the experts but are not relevant to, appropriate to or consistent with what is being felt out there in our communities.

Ian Cooke: I will pick up some strands of the conversation. Community capacity building is a wide concept. It is critical that we are clear about whose capacity we are talking about building and for what purpose. That is the fundamental question, which often does not precede the discussion.

I link that back to what the bill is trying to achieve. DTA Scotland’s particular interest, which I understand to be part of the rationale for the bill, is in how we further community-led regeneration in Scotland. We are talking primarily about the idea of building community anchor organisations. We are talking about community capacity building that builds organisational capacity, which Felix Spittal touched on. We have examples of where that is happening.

There are great examples of disadvantaged communities that have strong community anchor organisations. Disadvantaged communities often have a plethora of small community organisations. The question is how we work with them and bring them together to create strategic community anchor organisations. That is the task at hand. We can use the peer support to which Angus Hardie referred.

To answer the original question, as well as capacity building, we have to look at the funding and resources that will help the activity that the bill promotes.

The Convener: The FSB has a huge role in helping businesses to become more empowered. Can we learn anything from the business community about empowerment?

Barry McCulloch: Yes. The FSB comes at the issue from a completely different perspective. Our general point is that we should not forget that small local businesses are a key part of their communities and that the skills and expertise that they have can help the wider efforts to regenerate communities.

Calum Irving: Third sector interfaces—whatever kind of third sector we mean—are trying to do the job of building the capacity of third sector organisations, connecting them to public policy and helping them to find a way into influencing local decision making, through local authorities, health and social care partnerships and so on. One of the challenges that the committee needs to consider is the variable accessibility of the system. It is possible to connect the disparate parts of the third sector, but we find that the influence that they can have on the system varies massively across the country.

The Convener: I will play devil’s advocate. We have heard the terms “community anchor organisations” and “third sector interfaces”. Over the years, there has been much different terminology. When I was the chair of a social inclusion partnership, I banned some of the gobbledygook phrases. Do the terminology and the kind of discussion that we are having here often put folk off becoming involved in their communities because sometimes they listen to us and think, “What the hell is that all about?”? I see people nodding.

Ian Cooke: Having used the term “community anchor organisation”, I accept that point. It is a convenient shorthand to describe the organisations that we are trying to create, without being too prescriptive about what they are.

In our experience, what helps local people to understand what the approach is about is visiting other communities that are doing things and speaking to them about the common issues and problems and how they have been addressed—about what has and has not worked. To facilitate that cross-community learning does not cost a lot of money. We have a small grant fund for a development trust or an aspiring development trust to do that. Widening that out to include all sorts of community organisations would get round the problem.

10:00

Elma Murray: I agree with a lot of what Ian Cooke said and I accept the points that the convener made. It is easy for us to look at how we want to organise communities so that we can best engage with them. I think that that is part of the point that the convener is trying to make. However, that is probably not how communities would wish—

The Convener: Can I interrupt you? Do we maybe have a difficulty in that it might be others who want to organise communities rather than communities organising themselves in areas of work that they want to deal with, instead of being pushed into a box?

Elma Murray: For reasons of convenience, we probably try to organise communities so that we can marshal our resources. I am not saying that that is acceptable; I am saying just that I see that happening quite often.

There is without a doubt a requirement for us to marshal the resources that we can make available to assist, support and help communities. However, in my experience, a lot of that can be much better provided through a significant amount of building trust with communities. Even if we have in place the structures or organisation to help them or the pathways—we have used such words this morning—if communities trust us, they will ask questions and we will be able to help them to find their way through all that. A lot of the work is about how we engage with communities, build trust with them and are clear about what we are doing. We must also do a lot of regular and authentic consultation with them.

Councillor O’Neill: I have a number of points to make. If we are to deal with inequalities, particularly in our disadvantaged communities, we will have to disadvantage some other communities that are currently doing okay. I first became aware some years ago through the indices of multiple deprivation of the differences in life expectancy in North Ayrshire. At that time, the difference was 14 years between our most deprived and least deprived communities. In the intervening period, the community with the longest life expectancy has changed, but the community with the shortest life expectancy has remained the same, and instead of being 14 years, the difference is now 24 years. That is inequality going in the wrong direction, and we need to be willing to tackle that.

We also need to be willing to have a messy approach. We cannot have a one-size-fits-all approach to finding solutions in our communities. In many instances, different communities have the same problems, but in other instances, each community has unique problems. We therefore cannot have a one-size-fits-all approach. As Harry McGuigan said, the best folk to tell us what the solution is are probably the people who live in the community. We can help a wee bit and put some structure into finding solutions, but by and large it is the people in the communities who know what the solutions are.

The convener is absolutely right about language, because we use language that excludes people from the discussion. As part of the work of the commission on strengthening local democracy, we undertook a poll. Polls are very popular, as members know. One thing that the poll told us was that government is remote from communities. What the people polled meant by government was national and local government. That situation is partly down to the language that we use.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Good morning. Following on from what the convener and Mr McGuigan said, I want to say that we should not use fancy words, because that disadvantages people. My question is: how would you prioritise Scotland’s poorest communities? That is the key, and I would like your suggestions on it. We should not use fancy words.

Professor Hastings: I will augment points that I have already made. The bill is trying to deliver two distinctive things. It is trying to strengthen what is already there on community engagement and to make community anchor organisations more substantial. Making it easier to transfer assets would, for example, be an indicator of that. The bill falls short on the agenda of strengthening what is already there by not committing to more substantial resources for capacity building in the communities whose voices are heard to an extent but which could do with more support to have them heard more effectively. That is one intention of the bill.

A separate intention is to open up new routes and possibilities for people who do not have their voices heard. I guess that that is Councillor McGuigan’s point—that there is a pent-up demand in disadvantaged areas for routes to enable voices to be heard. I am not sure that the bill delivers on that at all. It delivers on providing additional routes for some groups to have their voices heard, which could be at the expense of more disadvantaged groups.
Pauline Douglas: The Coalfields Regeneration Trust has been involved in the our place programme that Eric Samuel mentioned and in the Ayrshire 21 initiative. In addition, we have a programme of our own that is all about the asset-based approach, which we have found to be a fabulous way of working in communities.

The key area of our work is to be a facilitator. I do not live in all the communities concerned and nor do my staff, so it is a case of getting the people who live in those communities to take forward their ideas and do the work. We need to facilitate that and to ensure that they know where to go and know about all the different ways of making things happen in their community.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): I will raise an additional point. Highland Council has raised the omission of community councils from the bill. We are talking about government being remote. The committee recently did a piece of work on local government across Europe. In many parts of Europe, local government is far closer to communities than the 32 authorities in Scotland are. One might argue that, regardless of whether community councils in their current form are successful—some are more successful than others—they might offer the structure for a fourth tier of government and, if real powers and budgets were devolved to community councils, that would generate interest across communities. I throw that in. If community councils cannot perform that role, what could? How else could we deal with remoteness?

I will pick up on consultation. People talk about the turnout last week, but many people have gone along to local authority consultation meetings, thought that they were a waste of time and been put off ever going back to such meetings again. The Scottish Community Development Centre raised the issue of the difference between engagement and empowerment. Engagement can happen in all sorts of ways. Sometimes it can be hollow, but other times it can be fruitful. However, the empowerment part is the difficult bit. Getting into those communities will be tough, but we should not shy away from that. I think that we can find ways of improving engagement.

I represent COSLA at the Council of Europe Congress of Local and Regional Authorities and have been appointed as a rapporteur to look at and learn from what is happening in Scotland, in the United Kingdom and across Europe with regard to further devolution of power and communitarianism. I will be reporting on the first stage of that work on 17 November. I hope that that will be fruitful and helpful. We can learn from what works in other places, and we should not be afraid of small areas having some power and control over the factors that affect their lives.

David O'Neill made a valid point about prioritisation. Of course, we always have to make probably interfaces with some of what Alex Rowley said.

Sometimes we assume that the well-intending organisations in our communities are reaching the communities that they speak for and are meeting their aspirations. Sadly, however, that is not always the case. I see the same faces at the meetings of three local organisations that I attend. They are good people, but if you were to ask people in some areas in my constituency who those people are, you would find that they are not known to the wider community at all.

That touches on what might be the hard business that we face. As Alex Rowley says, it is important to differentiate between engagement and empowerment. Engagement can happen in all sorts of ways. Sometimes it can be hollow, but other times it can be fruitful. However, the empowerment part is the difficult bit. Getting into the communities and connecting with people in those communities will be tough, but we should not shy away from that. I think that we can find ways of improving engagement.

My final comment goes back to the point about substantial resources that Annette Hastings made and the failure to provide them in poorer communities. All the evidence suggests that poverty and social deprivation are a major barrier to people being able to engage. Could we build more into the bill to address that?

I do not apologise for shifting resources to the areas of greatest need. Not doing that is the reason why inequality has continued to increase over the past years.

I am just throwing those points into the discussion.

The Convener: I will let Harry McGuigan speak next. Anyone may respond to the points that have just been made.

Councillor McGuigan: The point that I want to make probably interfaces with some of what Alex Rowley said.

The majority of people tell me that the issue needs to be dealt with. That seems to be common sense, but the tree surgeon says that the trees are perfectly healthy and council policy is that such trees are not cut down. For the life of me, I do not understand why that is the case. If we were truly empowering the people on that estate, we would enable them to deal with the issue. The danger is that the bill is full of rhetoric but has few teeth to empower anyone to do anything about the issues that bother them in their communities.

David O'Neill made a valid point about prioritisation. Of course, we always have to prioritise. However, we must remember that in every community there will be opportunities to enable that community to feel more satisfied because it is being listened to. We need to try to get to that point.

Angus Hardie: I support what Councillor O’Neill said about the nature of community empowerment and about communities in general being messy. We cannot take a one-size-fits-all approach to the notion of community empowerment. That is why, in our evidence, we suggested that we should try to frame the bill around some first principles concerning subsidiarity, local people being in control, assets and so on that we could use almost as a framework to examine the impact of the bill once it is on the statute book. If we did that, we would begin to see community empowerment in the round, rather than as some prescription that we can use to sort out the most disadvantaged communities.

The other point is about the remoteness of government, or the fact that that is how government is perceived by communities. You could argue that the bill is, in some ways, a compensatory measure for the absence of real localised government. The bill fits within that vacuum of local democracy, which is a risk that it is running. As was touched on by the report of the commission on strengthening local democracy, if we had real local democracy the bill might still be needed, but it might contain different measures. We need to see the bill in that context. It is landing in a sort of vacuum of local democracy.

10:15

Felix Spittal: The question of prioritising powers links up with the engagement route. One aspect that is missing from the bill concerns participatory budgeting and other participatory approaches such as citizen juries. Such approaches can potentially solve a lot of the problems by involving people in poor communities in meaningful consultation and participatory events. That would help to address the disadvantage that those communities experience and make engagement more meaningful. It would begin to get to the heart of the Christie commission’s recommendations on building public services around people and communities and giving them a real say in decisions about how public services are delivered and where the money is spent.

The commission on strengthening local democracy recommended a much greater increase in participation and the establishment of a participation unit in Scotland. The bill could assist that process by legislating for participatory approaches and for participatory budgeting in particular.

Stuart McMillan: I have a question for Mr McCulloch with regard to his earlier comments on the FSB. I accept that there are many small businesses in the communities that we are discussing. Do you see a greater role for FSB members, and for larger companies, to facilitate and help communities, rather than just being based in a community that the workforce does not necessarily come from?

Barry McCulloch: Business can play a greater role in local communities, but we cannot be prescriptive about that. The level of influence and involvement that businesses may choose is defined by scale, size, sector and geography, and it is difficult to say that a particular business will choose to get involved. However, I agree that businesses could, through their skills and expertise, contribute to the community approach that is outlined in the bill.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): I will move on to the national performance framework and the national outcomes. I am intrigued by Councillor O’Neill’s earlier comment that there was an increase, rather than a decrease, in poverty after the work had been done. In what ways do the Scotland performs strategy and the national performance framework currently inform your work? We can go round the table so each of you can answer.

The Convener: Who wants to have a crack at that first? I realise that it is a pretty complex question.

Elma Murray: At the local authority and community planning partnership levels, the national performance framework and the outcomes from it feed directly into single outcome agreements, so there is something there. I accept that it is still quite removed from individual communities in the way that we have discussed this morning, but there is a link to community planning partnerships.

The links between what we do at community planning partnership level and our local communities need to improve, although they are starting to do so. Most community planning partnerships now have a clear and well-defined view of each of the neighbourhoods and localities in their area, and of the needs of those localities. We know where our most disadvantaged areas are, whether they are geographical areas or areas of need that might be linked not specifically in terms of geography but to the particular vulnerabilities of individuals in our communities. We understand that clearly, or more clearly than we used to.

Every area in Scotland is implementing a new integrated health and social care partnership, and we are doing a great deal of locality planning to ensure, again, that the needs of specific communities—particularly the health needs—are properly reflected in the way in which we prioritise our financial and people resources to target individuals in communities.

I hope that that is helpful, convener.

Councillor O'Neill: In support of what Elma Murray says, I note that, over the years, we have had a focus on national targets. It is not something that any one political party has been guilty of—we have all done it. That has meant that we have tried a one-size-fits-all approach for communities, but communities are different. As we sit here today, local government and the health service are focused on targets that may not be appropriate for certain communities. We need to get away from the national approach to targeting and make the approach very specific to what communities actually need.

Anne McTaggart: Under the bill, can we do that through CPPs?

Councillor O'Neill: I do not believe that the bill goes far enough on that, but it is going in the right direction. Perhaps your committee would like to make a suggestion on that.

Anne McTaggart: Okay. Thank you.

Councillor McGuigan: Community planning partnerships have a long way to go in some areas. Some are better than others. I believe that they represent one of the brightest opportunities to really make a difference by using the strengths and competences and the institutions in their areas to the very best effect. However, the approach cannot be driven by local government alone. There has to be a realisation that the rest of the public sector also has an important role and important sets of responsibilities. People do not always realise that to the extent that they should. However, we have the right direction of travel.

The Convener: So we still require some cultural change in public bodies and community bodies in order to make the processes work a little better than they currently do. Will the bill help to address that?

Councillor McGuigan: I certainly hope so, although I am not sure that it will. I would like to see in the bill a realisation that local government has an important and crucial role to play in all of this, yet it does not have any statutory status in terms of what would be considered required status under the European Charter of Local Self-Government.

We are moving in the right direction, but local government has to learn that it has to ensure that the voices are being heard at every level. I hear people talk about the failure to listen to the third sector or the voluntary sector, and the mechanisms for representation at CPPs so that messages get through to them are not as good as they should be. That has to change.

Councillor O'Neill: Today, within the public sector and the third sector, no one has experienced anything other than a centralisation project. I emphasise again that no one political party is guilty, as this goes way beyond the lifetime of the Parliament and the involvement of any one party. All the parties have been guilty. There is a culture and a mindset that it is better to centralise things. We saw that most recently with the fire and police services. Three of the four major political parties had that in their manifestos, so this is not a criticism of any one party.

There is a culture that says that we get more efficiency if we centralise. We may get more financial efficiency, but we get poorer results within our communities by doing it that way. Let us get back down to communities and into the heart of communities. If that looks messy, so be it—if we get better results for our communities, that is a good thing.

I thank Harry McGuigan for mentioning the European Charter of Local Self-Government. If I had gone back to COSLA without that having been mentioned, I would have been kicked up and down Princes Street. We asked the minister to include the issue in the bill and his response at the time was that, subject to a yes vote, there would be a written constitution and local government would be protected within that. We now know the result of the referendum, so an opportunity exists to revisit the issue and put it in the bill.

I say that because, within living memory, a whole system of local government was effectively abolished at the whim of a Prime Minister because of Strathclyde region’s temerity in stopping the privatisation of Scottish Water. There is no suggestion in what I am saying that anyone is thinking of doing that now—indeed, there has not been a single hint of that—but it could happen if local government is not enshrined in law.

The Convener: I have three committee members on my list to speak next, but if anyone wishes to intervene, please do so.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): On Ms Murray’s comments about health inequalities and the joint work with health boards and, indeed, Councillor McGuigan’s comments about institutions, what work is being done with communities to develop services? I picked up from Ms Murray’s comments that health boards, local authorities and other agencies are still taking a top-down approach to developing strategies, but our hope is that the bill will allow us to develop inclusive strategies that listen to and act on communities’ wishes and aspirations. If, even as the bill is going through its parliamentary process, we are still talking about the top-down development of strategies for delivering services, we are stuck in a groove that we need to jump out of.

As someone who has a number of years’ experience of working in deprived communities, I believe that we need to engage fully with communities and ask them what they need instead of giving them what we think they deserve or should get. It is all about giving them what they want and interacting with them. I realise that that gives rise to issues of accountability with regard to the people we are engaging with, but those issues can be taken on board by local authorities, CPPs and other agencies as they develop strategies. Can anyone assure me that things are moving forward and that we are not stuck in the groove of continuing to make policy at the top and expecting people at grass-roots level simply to accept it?

Elma Murray: I apologise to Mr Wilson for perhaps leaving him with the wrong impression; I will give him a wee bit more of an explanation.

What we are doing with communities—not, I should stress, to communities—is not new; what is new is how we are doing it. The local authority will always have worked with a range of local stakeholders, local interest groups and particular representative individuals from certain groups to define and identify the provision of services in their areas. Depending on their needs, that will happen either with or for those communities. The health board will do the same.

What is new and different is that we are doing that work together. As has been pointed out, communities can be messy because everyone is coming from a different place and has different needs and different representatives, and we sometimes try to organise them a bit to make it easier for us to help them. What I am trying to say is that, through the integrated health and social care partnerships, we, too, have organised ourselves a bit to work with our communities. We have accepted that they would welcome a more structured approach to ensure that they do not need to deal separately with health boards and councils and can work jointly with us.

I cannot say what is happening across Scotland with regard to integrated health and social care partnerships, but the legislation prescribes the establishment of integration boards that take into account a range of interests from our local area. In North Ayrshire, the integrated health and social care partnership board is made up of 24 members. Eight members are from the council and the health board and the other 16 members are a range of representatives from across the community, including staff who provide services. Our staff often understand exactly what people need and want, because they work with them day in and day out.

I hope that that gives some clarification.

10:30

The Convener: I will stop you there—I am sorry if I am cutting in on John Wilson.

I hark back to a number of years ago, when a community that I represented on the council put mental health as its number 1 health priority. The main priority of the health board and the council was stopping smoking, but the reality was that many people would have found it difficult to stop smoking unless some of their mental health problems were gone.

I think that John Wilson was driving at this: how can communities get across their priority in the face of priorities of the local authority, the health board or well-meaning front-line staff, who sometimes cannot quite get to grips with what the difficulties are? What are the ins for communities?

Elma Murray: I hear those issues as well. Are we determining our priorities through a top-down or a bottom-up approach? I guess that that links back to some of the comments that were made about the performance management framework that we have in Scotland and the provision of more local flexibility to enable us to take into account what communities say their priorities are.

The communities that we work with tell us what they want and we listen to that. We work with them to make decisions about what we prioritise.

John Wilson: The end of that response—the point about working with communities to prioritise—was interesting. Surely through the bill we are trying to get communities’ priorities to be at the top of the agenda. The convener highlighted the issue of mental health vis-à-vis smoking. I understand that argument: if we tackled the mental health issue, people would have less need to smoke.

The bill has come around as a consequence of the failure of agencies—which may be the Scottish Government, the UK Government, health boards or others—to listen to and act on communities’ priorities. Many deprived communities might not have running a community facility as their priority; their priority might be to ensure that every house in the area is at a tolerable standard and that people’s next-door neighbours are behaving themselves and not engaging in antisocial behaviour.

How do we get that turnaround in the thinking of agencies, authorities and Governments to ensure that they address communities’ issues rather than the issues that they think that communities have?
How do we stop them working towards their priorities rather than communities’ priorities?

Councillor McGuigan: John Wilson makes a good point. There has been a frustration, certainly in the early days of CPPs. CPPs did not always have the solidarity of purpose that they should have had and that there needs to be. The bill will at least insist that members of CPPs—health boards and the Scottish Prison Service, which will have a role to play in relation to safe communities—come together and be required to undertake the same type of consultation, listening and learning that local authorities try to undertake.

There is a greater insistence that we will and can work together better, and that the agenda that we are setting and the outcomes that we are working towards—which the bill proposes will be set nationally—will be properly addressed by all, not just one or two, of the partners. There has to be a real insistence on that.

I think that the situation will improve as a consequence of the bill. If it does not improve, questions will need to be asked.

The Convener: I return to Elma Murray’s point—[Interruption.]

10:35

Meeting suspended.

10:59

On resuming—

The Convener: Welcome back. I apologise to our witnesses and to our thousands of viewers at home for the breakdown of the broadcasting system. I always say that there are thousands of viewers at home—around the world.

I was in the middle of asking Elma Murray a question about integrated health and social care boards. You were saying that since their establishment the way things have been done has changed. My question is this: why has it taken the establishment of the integrated health and social care boards to make that change rather than it having come from community planning partnerships since their inception?

Elma Murray: First, I would like to emphasise that in some places integration of health and social care took place prior to the new legislation; the change had happened in some areas of Scotland that had already decided that that was right for them. The new legislation has put a requirement on everyone to do that, and that is now being progressed, certainly in relation to adult services. However, in a lot of areas it is being done on a voluntary basis for both adults’ and children’s health services.

I could not say exactly why such integration has not happened before. The issue for me is that it is now starting to happen on a much more widespread basis, which is to be welcomed.

The Convener: Maybe the lesson for the committee, when it comes to dealing with the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, is that rather than hope that certain things will happen voluntarily, we should put down a legislative marker at the very beginning. Is that a fair suggestion?

Elma Murray: Professor Hastings made a point at the start of the meeting about the bill’s intent and what we want to see as its outcome. It will be very important to make sure that that is clear.

The Convener: So, the statement of intent is probably important. Before the break, Annette Hastings wanted to come in. Do you still wish to do so?

Professor Hastings: I will do so quickly, if that is all right. I want to say a word in defence of strategic overviews. I am not suggesting that people who are advocates of community empowerment do not think that strategic action is important, but I think that it is worth having a reminder. Learning takes place at the level of the individual public body or community partnership, so that it is seen that it is not smoking, but mental health that is the issue, and that the issue is not the community centre, but housing. That learning can take place at the level of the institution so that mistakes are not replicated.

There is therefore the issue of how we aggregate the learning from the various community empowerment activities and institutionalise it within public bodies. Thinking about the need for strategic co-ordination and action around avoiding perverse outcomes as a result of participation is also needed.

In my written evidence I used the example of street sweeping and how the processes of participation can inadvertently lead to more services being provided in more affluent areas, and their having better outcomes. The local authority that we did our research with took action and said that that was not what it was trying to do, so it has prioritised poor areas in a deliberate strategy. It is important to think about the sum of the parts and about maintaining capacity at the centre—dare I say it?—to undo some wrongs that might be done.

The Convener: What is needed is a combination of legislation, culture change and good old gumption.
Professor Hastings: Recognition that sometimes decisions will be made that appear to be anti-participatory is also needed.

Councillor O'Neill: Perhaps the legislation needs to focus more on what the outcomes should be. It is absolutely right that central Government decides that it wants, for example, a reduction in differences in life expectancy or a reduction in the number of children who live in poverty. The Government setting out the outcomes for legislation is probably a good thing, but it should not necessarily get into the nitty-gritty. As I said earlier, one size does not fit all; the same model will not necessarily apply everywhere.

Ian Cooke: The challenge for the bill is how we empower communities from the top down, which is quite difficult. I think that there is agreement around the room that there is no one blueprint, that communities are very different in nature and that this sort of activity can be quite messy. In trying to do it from the top down, there is a real danger that we crush the sort of creativity and enterprise that have contributed to much community-led regeneration, which has been largely organic and has happened in communities all over Scotland.

It seems to me that the bill builds on experience. It is not just about middle-class or rural communities; I am talking about working-class and disadvantaged communities. The task at hand is to inspire, encourage, nurture and support communities to engage in the process. By introducing new duties and powers, the bill offers a framework that will make it a bit easier for communities to engage in activities, which we hope will encourage more communities to take part. However, it cannot be imposed on communities.

It is crucial that there is culture change. I hope that the bill will influence the culture, but the process really has to go two ways. That culture change needs to take place in the public sector because a lot of the activity involves some risk, and public organisations can—understandably—be quite risk averse. Equally, a culture change is required in the community sector.

In going around Scotland, what has struck me is that the challenged and disadvantaged communities are very dependent on grants and the public sector. We have to begin to change that. There are opportunities with the bill to do that through encouraging people to take a more enterprising approach through looking at ownership of assets, at community enterprises and so on.

Different sorts of interventions and approaches will be required to support implementation of the legislation.

The Convener: It is interesting that you used the word “cajole”, which can sometimes be understood as forcing something.

Voluntary Action Scotland has been vocal about the issue of forcing folk into voluntary positions. Is there a danger that there will be a backlash if we try to force people into participation?

Calum Irving: I am not sure that there would be a backlash per se, but there is the principle that supports what Ian Cooke said about not forcing participation. However, the point is that the legislation could be an opportunity to create the best possible environment for participation. I encourage the committee to look at how we can drive into the system much more of a duty to involve that can be measured. That is not imposing something from the top down; we are not saying exactly how that should happen, but we would be able to test whether there were processes and means by which involvement and participation were supported. Not for one second do I suggest that we want to do anything to take away from the creativity of grass-roots activity. We are trying to get to a system in which that creativity can flourish even more than it does now.

The Convener: Ian Cooke.

Ian Cooke: I do not know that I would use the word “cajole”. This is about encouraging and inspiring, not forcing. If I gave that impression, I would like to correct it.

The Convener: Thank you.

Stuart McMillan: I have a question for Ian Cooke, first. A moment ago, you mentioned culture change and dependency on grants and the public sector. Earlier I asked Mr McCulloch a question about FSB and other business organisations assisting in communities. Are you aware of DTAS organisations being in contact with local branches of the FSB and other business organisations to see what joint working could be done to help communities to help themselves?

Ian Cooke: We have a lot of examples of that kind of partnership. Part of the development trust approach is about encouraging partnerships while redefining what we mean by partnership. Partners aim to achieve whatever the community is trying to achieve.

A lot of the partners are private sector partners—often small and medium-sized businesses. Sometimes arrangements are informal, but they can range right up to joint ventures. I can give the committee lots of examples. If we are trying to encourage a more enterprising approach, there are many lessons and much experience to draw on in the private sector.
The Convener: The Big Lottery Fund has previously put funding into community capacity building. What more can you do to help disadvantaged communities to participate?

Eric Samuel: We can do various things; we are involved at many levels. As you know, I am interested in community asset transfer. It started in rural communities, but has developed over the 13 or 14 years in which we have been involved in it, and many more urban and deprived communities are now involved. It is not only the well-to-do communities that are doing that sort of stuff.

We try to help communities from the early stages all the way through. We provide £10,000 for a feasibility study that allows them to consult their communities and visit other projects. It is a two-stage process. If they get through stage 1, we can give them more development funding to do the technical stuff that they need to do. As I have said to the committee before, we have a social enterprise that is available to help communities with the financial side of things. That kicks in between stages 1 and 2, but we do not just leave it there. If the community gets an award, that social enterprise will work with it after it has got the award. That is one example of how we deal with the matter in one investment area. I am sorry that I am getting into jargon again.

I have talked to you this morning about the our place initiative, which is a different approach. We are trying lots of different things and trying to learn lessons from them. We are taking an asset-based approach and fitting that to a community of learning. We had the first meeting of the initiative about three weeks ago. We brought people together to learn from each other's experience, pass on the lessons and find out where the wider community—not just the Big Lottery Fund—can go with it.

Felix Spittal: In answer to Stuart McMillan's question about grant dependency, it is worth highlighting a recent report from Community Land Scotland that considered the role of community land trusts and compared their grant funding to their business income. It showed a lot of economic development through, for example, community energy, and it punctured the myth about community land trusts and development trusts being grant dependent. It is well worth looking at that piece of research.

Barry McCulloch: The business improvement district model is a good example of joint working between business organisations and the community sector. In Carluke, it is development-trust led but involves small business owners. There is a slight omission in the bill and the accompanying documents in that the BID model brings people together in a specific locality to deliver additional services for the business community, which also benefits the wider community.

Eric Samuel: The Big Lottery Fund is a grant giver, but we are not in the business of trying to create grant dependency. Often, our grants kick things off. We are looking a lot more at social investment now and asking projects to take a much more enterprising approach. Projects often cannot get off the ground unless they have some grant funding. We are not talking about grant dependency, but about injecting grant to let projects get started, then making them enterprising.

Stuart McMillan: Mr McCulloch gave the example of Carluke. Do you have any examples of that type of activity in places such as Easterhouse, Craigmillar or other schemes throughout the country?

Barry McCulloch: There are no such examples, to my knowledge. There is an urban regeneration company in Craigmillar but, to be completely honest, in many areas where there is deprivation, such activity is local-authority led because the capacity for it has not existed in the past.

As the bill demonstrates, community empowerment and involvement require a step change. From our perspective, the question is how small businesses play a part in that and contribute to the process.

Mark McDonald: We need to think about the outcomes that we were speaking about and how we would measure the success, or otherwise, of the bill. Empowering communities is one thing, but those communities then using that empowerment is something different, as is how they go about using it. Different communities will have different ideas about what they want to do. Sometimes, ambition will not tally with what can be achieved, which will be the case whatever legislation is put in place.

When the legislation has been passed and we come to look at how it operates in practice, how will we correctly assess what is happening, so that we do not say that it has been a runaway success when that does not match what communities are saying, and so that, if some communities have not been able to realise their ambitions for perfectly valid reasons, we do not fall into the trap of suggesting that the legislation is failing or is not doing what it is supposed to do?

The Convener: Does anyone want to comment on that?

Calum Irving: I will make a suggestion. I talked about a duty to involve; the guidance could talk about citizens juries, which the commission on strengthening local democracy in Scotland considered. Why not drive into the community planning system an annual citizens jury process, to set the agenda for community planning and to test what has been delivered? It is possible to make enabling legislation and then, in guidance, to consider suggestions about how to test it.

The Convener: If no one else wants to comment, I thank the witnesses for their evidence, which has been extremely useful. I apologise for the breakdown in the broadcasting system.

I would be interested in your feedback—through the clerks—on whether the round-table approach to taking evidence suits you. Many of you have given formal evidence in different ways. A number of members of the committee like round-table sessions, but I am keen to hear your feedback, too. I am empowering you in that regard.

I suspend the meeting to allow for a changeover of witnesses.

11:16

Meeting suspended.

11:25

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel. I understand that Alasdair McKinlay, who is head of the community planning and community empowerment unit, will introduce his colleagues and tell us what their remit is when it comes to the bill.

Alasdair McKinlay (Scottish Government): Thank you, convener. In fact, I will ask them to introduce themselves, if that is okay. There are quite a few of us, and we all have different responsibilities.

Norman MacLeod (Scottish Government): I am from the Scottish Government legal directorate.

Ian Turner (Scottish Government): I am the bill team leader.

Dr Amanda Fox (Scottish Government): I am from the food and drink team, and I have a responsibility for the part 4 elements of the bill on allotments.

Dave Thomson (Scottish Government): I am from the land reform and tenancy unit. I am responsible for the part 4 elements of the bill on the right to buy.

Rachel Rayner (Scottish Government): I am from the Scottish Government legal directorate. I am dealing with the provisions on allotments and the right to buy.

The Convener: Do you wish to make an opening statement, Alasdair?

Alasdair McKinlay: No, thanks.

The Convener: You heard the evidence from our previous panel. Annette Hastings said that the bill should make a statement of intent about empowering disadvantaged communities. Have you given any thought to that?

Alasdair McKinlay: We have been very conscious of that in the wide-ranging engagement that we have done on the bill. The first thing to say is that the bill provides opportunities for all communities in Scotland on asset transfer and participation requests. We certainly recognise that the capacity to benefit from those opportunities will not be evenly spread across the country, although I was particularly heartened by the recognition during the discussion with the first panel that, just because people are in disadvantaged communities, that does not mean that they cannot do many things for themselves.

The Scottish Government already invests in a range of things, some of which were mentioned earlier. The community ownership support service, which provides some of the technical expertise that was mentioned, is important. It is focused on asset ownership in disadvantaged areas. The strengthening communities programme, which was also mentioned, is involved in direct investment in community anchor organisations—to use the shorthand jargon—in disadvantaged areas. We are conscious of the issue that you raise, convener. As you said at the outset, the bill will not do everything. Those are policy responses to address that issue.

We are conscious that, as well as fulfilling the duties in the bill, the public authorities must fulfil their equalities duties, which are set out in other legislation.

The Convener: Thank you.

We heard a lot about culture change and common sense. Although it is sometimes possible to legislate for culture change, it is less easy to legislate for gumption. How do we ensure that, as we go through the process, we get the maximum amount of gumption out there? Beyond the bill, what do we need to do to ensure that logicality comes into play?

Alasdair McKinlay: Again, it came up in the discussions, which was helpful, that the bill tries, in the way that any legislation can, to found itself on some gumption. It tries to reflect some of the things that we know were already happening. Beyond that, we will have a very important job to do in promoting the bill in adopting the approach that we have taken in its development of being inclusive and in recognising that, as it is a piece of legislation, some people will struggle with some of the language and the concepts in it. We have a big job to do in promoting—in the clearest possible language that we can, in the way that we did with the easy-read version of our policy memorandum—what the bill is about and what opportunity it provides, and in explaining to people the committee’s interest in the fact that a lot of what we are talking about is common sense.

The Convener: In framing the bill, how much attention has been paid to stakeholders? Let us consider the allotments scenario, Ms Fox. We have had a number of responses from folks who are involved in allotments and the various allotment societies. How much attention has been paid to what stakeholders have said?

11:30

Dr Fox: We have undertaken a substantial amount of consultation on the specific issue of allotments, first, through the consultation on the community empowerment and renewal bill back in June 2012. In April 2013, we had a consultation that looked solely at the potential duties and powers relating to allotments, and in November 2013, individual provisions in different areas were consulted on through the consultation on this bill. In addition to those written exercises, we have gone out to stakeholders and had a lot of meetings with the growing community and our colleagues in local authorities and COSLA.

The Convener: One of the bill’s more complicated aspects is the issue of common good. Given the forthright opinions that are out there about what should and should not be done with common good funds, what consultation has been carried out with stakeholders on that part of the bill?

Alasdair McKinlay: The issue was not addressed separately, but it formed part of the exploratory and secondary consultations. It is important to point out that, because the bill is about community empowerment, our focus has been on participation, transparency and helping to establish what common good is in local authority areas and how it is being used.

Anne McTaggart: Staying on the subject of allotments, I note that, according to the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society, the bill “repeals the existing legislation and in doing so some of the protections for plot-holder and allotment sites contained in the provisions of the old legislation appear to have been lost.”

Dr Fox: The bill updates quite a lot of provisions, but a number of powers and duties have been removed. Would it be helpful if I briefly went over them?

The Convener: That would be useful.

Dr Fox: The duties and powers that have been omitted from the current draft of the bill include the duty to provide access to allotments, which was not restated in the bill because it is already provided for under the general law of landlord and tenant, and the use of local authority rooms for discussions about allotment-related business. The latter came about after consultation with local authorities, which indicated that buildings could be made available for that purpose but that there should be a requirement to pay, as is the case with other community groups.

The power of entry on to unoccupied land for the purpose of providing allotments and the power of compulsory purchase of land have also been removed. The first power, which was introduced to drive an increase in food production, reflected the post-war era in which it was drafted, and it is viewed as being unnecessary at present. Local authorities have indicated that they are unaware of any situation in which these powers have been used to provide allotments, and they consider that using them would be a last resort because of the financial costs involved. The Scottish Government views the powers as being draconian and rather difficult to justify because of the costs. Additionally, such actions would deprive a person of their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their property and could not be justified in the wider public interest on the basis of the provision of allotments.

The power for a local authority to charge a fair rent has also been removed because the Government believes that land values and the costs of managing allotment sites are likely to vary between sites depending on where they are in Scotland and that, consequently, decisions on rents are best made at local level. Indeed, the bill requires local authorities to make regulations that specifically relate to rent.

The power for a local authority to purchase plants, seeds and fertilisers to sell to tenants has also been removed. It was a rather outdated duty, which reflected the post-war era in which it was drafted. It came into force when there were not very many garden centres or agricultural suppliers around. It has been excluded from the bill, but that does not prevent local authorities from continuing that practice if they so wish and if there is a need for it.

The next power that has been removed is on the improvement and adaptation of land for allotments. It was considered unnecessary to restate that as it is part of a local authority’s general powers under subsequent legislation. On the rating of allotments, the power allows a local authority to deem itself the occupier of land despite it being let for allotments. It was considered unnecessary to restate that provision, as subsequent legislation has excluded allotments from the ratings regime. The provisions relating to land leased for allotments have been updated and are reflected in the bill.

The provisions in the bill that relate specifically to private landowners, which ultimately deal with the termination of leases and compensation, have also been removed from the bill. The rationale behind that—bear with me while I refer to my notes—was that the Government believes that those arrangements are better dealt with under individual lease arrangements. It was difficult to see what justification there was for interfering with such private arrangements. In addition, general law on landlords and tenants would apply to those arrangements.

To support private landowners with lease negotiations, in 2013 the Government supported the production of a guide for landowners, which was developed in liaison with the community land advisory service. That guide, which applies to both private and public landowners, encourages landowners to make sites available for growing food. It provides comprehensive information and makes suggestions about background details to try to equip landowners to play their part in making more land available to local communities in Scotland for growing food. I am happy to provide the detail of that to the committee if you would find it helpful.

The Convener: That would be useful, Dr Fox. Anne, did you want to come back in?

Anne McTaggart: Yes, I have another small point—in fact, it is a huge point. Some sector bodies have highlighted a difference of opinion, shall we say, in relation to the financial memorandum attached to the bill.

Dr Fox: Given the different ways in which allotments are managed across Scotland, it was very difficult to get definite costs for the individual duties and powers in the bill and to see the implications for local authorities. We have made estimates, but obviously they are only estimates. It was very difficult to get tangible information relating to the different impacts. However, we have tried to identify the areas that might incur costs.

The Convener: John Wilson has a supplementary.

John Wilson: I am glad that you will provide us with the briefing that you have just referred to, Dr Fox. You will be aware that there was a major campaign in Glasgow in which residents of the tenemental properties in particular tried to take over vacant and derelict land to create small areas where residents could grow their own food. How would the changes that you have outlined in the post-war legislation and the proposals before us today change the actions of individuals or groups who want to take over vacant land to put it back into productive use for food in those areas?

Dr Fox: Under the wider provisions of the bill—on asset transfer and the community right to buy—there is scope for communities such as the ones in Glasgow to approach the relevant authority to take over that land. I will defer to my colleagues, who might want to add to that. The allotments provisions will not necessarily help those people per se, but the wider provisions of the bill will.

Alasdair McKinlay: Yes indeed. That is one of the examples that we heard a lot, Mr Wilson, which strongly influenced part 5, on asset transfer. On the question of engaging with stakeholders, some community growing colleagues took us from a place where we focused very much on community bodies owning assets to the broader provisions in the bill around lease management and indeed land use. Some people said that they did not necessarily want to own a piece of land that is in the public sector but that they would love to be able to grow on it. Part 5 provides a process for making the case for the benefits of community growing and places a duty on an authority to respond to that, if the vacant and derelict land is owned in the public sector. As Amanda Fox said, the extension of the community right to buy across the country will be another tool for communities to use in such circumstances.

Stuart McMillan: In the consultation, what activity took place to get as many consultees and responses as possible from schemes across Scotland? We heard in the previous session that there are challenges in getting information and feedback from various parts of the country. The bill is about community empowerment. What activity did you undertake to get information from people in schemes?

Alasdair McKinlay: We relied a lot on some of the people whom the committee heard from earlier. We worked through intermediaries such as the Development Trusts Association Scotland, the Scottish Community Alliance and the Scottish Community Development Centre. Community Land Scotland ran a conference to which a number of community activists were invited.

We would always like to do more. For example, we did not go out and visit a range of our most disadvantaged communities specifically to discuss the bill. That is partly a resource issue, because we are a small team. However, we tried extremely hard to ensure that a wide range of voices was heard. During the second stage of consultation, ministers and officials had 40 meetings. We also had the first stage of consultation. We did not write out our ideas, send them out, put them on the website and wait for people to reply; we were proactive and we went out to speak to people face to face.
Stuart McMillan: I assume that you spoke to the community councils across Scotland.

Alasdair McKinlay: Community councillors participated in a number of sessions that we were involved with. It might be better if we provided you with a fuller report on the consultation, rather than me trying to remember the 40 meetings. Would that be helpful?

Stuart McMillan: Yes.

The Convener: That would be extremely useful. In other work that we have done in the lead-up to the bill, we have heard from community councils that feel that some local authorities are not adhering to the existing legislation and guidance. It would be interesting to get an idea of the feedback that you guys had in your consultation.

Alasdair McKinlay: Absolutely. We also surveyed local authorities about community councils, so we have details of the number of community councils that have had contested elections and which are active. That came up in the earlier conversation, so we can provide that information, too, if you would like it.

The Convener: That would be extremely useful. If that could be provided, we would be grateful.

Mark McDonald: We discussed earlier how the bill’s success could be measured and the outcomes that will be sought. Alongside that sits expectation management. In your discussions and soundings with communities, do you get the feeling that people understand that, although the bill will have a significant impact on communities and their empowerment, expectation management is needed from communities and legislators about what can be achieved?

Alasdair McKinlay: I think so, but my experience from working on policy with communities for a number of years is that it does not take too long for communities to understand the issues with expectations. Community activists are some of the most reasonable and sensible people to speak to, as long as the conversation happens in a respectful, open and trusting way.

Through all our consultation, we have worked hard to explain to people that the bill is only one element of how we might empower communities. As the convener said, the minister has made that point repeatedly—Mr Mackay brings up culture and resources all the time.

It is important that we do that, while not seeking to underplay the role that the bill can play in empowering communities in culture change and so on. I expect that it will be a fairly straightforward thing to do, as I said.

11:45

Mark McDonald: The reason why I raised the matter is that there have also been discussions about how community capacity is developed. I made the point that there is a feeling out there that development of community capacity is required in some of our most deprived areas, but those are some of the areas where we see the most activism within communities. It is just a question of the support that community organisations are given and have available to them.

We cannot legislate for everything, but there will be a role for legislative guidance in relation to setting parameters and expectations for public bodies as to how they work with community organisations that want to take forward some of the elements of community empowerment. Do you envisage guidance that will spell out to local authorities, for example, what is expected of them? If a deprived community does not have ready access to the expertise that might be required to enable the drafting of a business case, for example, or the handling of a transfer of an asset, public bodies will be expected to provide that support. Will that be spelled out clearly in the guidance that follows the legislation?

Alasdair McKinlay: An important principle is that we will develop all the guidance in close partnership with the people you listened to earlier this morning—colleagues in COSLA and the community sector—because we want the guidance to reflect the best possible practice. We are already in a positive position with things such as the statutory instrument that now exists on community learning and development, which places obligations on local authorities to assess capacity in communities and to do things about that.

There are other things that we can discuss with people. A specific example is participation requests, which is a new aspect in the bill that has been warmly welcomed because it puts communities on the front foot and enables them to raise the issues that are on their agenda. In the guidance, we could talk about the quality of engagement and the requirement to use existing tools that promote good-quality engagement, for example.

The guidance is another opportunity to lift people’s game in relation to participation and empowerment.

Mark McDonald: Thank you.

Anne McTaggart: On lifting people’s game, many community groups in my area meet around the medium of sport. Have you spoken to and consulted people in sport?
Alasdair McKinlay: Again, I would need to refer to the detail on the kinds of people who came to the events that we ran. I have certainly come across people such as those at Beith Community Development Trust, who have a close interest in sport. I would need to look at the detail of who we have spoken to about that, but we certainly recognise that an interest in sport is often a positive thing in terms of empowerment.

Anne McTaggart: Sport should be a viable partner as it involves huge parts of our community, for very good reasons.

The Convener: If we could get that information, it would be useful and helpful to us. It may well be that the committee will write to you after today and ask for other pieces of information, too.

HIV Scotland and Inclusion Scotland highlight possible unintended negative impacts on those who are currently marginalised from engagement. Inclusion Scotland states:

“Community should not be defined by a narrow definition based on location and residence. Disabled people are often excluded from traditional communities, or have specific needs and interests that are best addressed by their own community.”

How do we ensure that communities of interest are best served by the bill? What does it do to ensure that they are included?

Alasdair McKinlay: Interestingly—this also relates to your earlier question about consultation—we have half a dozen little examples of things that we believe we changed quite significantly following the consultation, and one of them concerns improving the definition of “community body” in the elements around participation to do two things.

One is that, in the draft bill, we defined “community body” in different ways and people felt that it was confusing, so we simplified it so that the definition is the same in different parts of the bill. Secondly, the definition is now drafted in such a way that it could include communities of interest. We have had a discussion about top-down and bottom-up approaches and the challenges of empowering from above, which in a sense some aspects of legislation will always do. However, interestingly, the definition of “community body” leaves the community to define itself. A community body will have to be certain things, but how it defines itself is left to the community.

The Convener: Do members have any more questions?

John Wilson: Yes, convener. Sorry, but I want to make good use of the witnesses’ time while they are here.

One pertinent issue is the community asset transfer debate. In some areas, communities are being actively encouraged to take on buildings, particularly sports facilities. We had a discussion earlier about the long-term financial viability of such assets. What thought has been given to ensuring that, when communities take on assets, they get the required financial support? When any organisation, not just a community organisation, takes on an asset, it sometimes takes several years to build it up so that it is financially sustainable.

What support will be given to communities that take on sports facilities in the longer term? One local authority suggested that we can give a community an asset and the community can get the grants to do it up but, if the asset is not viable after two or three years, it will transfer back to the local authority at the value for which it was transferred, despite the fact that a couple of million pounds-worth of improvements might have been carried out. How do we ensure that communities are given the time and opportunity to develop an asset’s economic viability so that it can be sustained?

Alasdair McKinlay: If I may, I will first make a broader point, on which I am sure Ian Cooke would support me. When we developed the provision, there was anxiety that it would somehow signal that we want all communities to take on assets. We have to be very careful about that, because it just will not be the right way for some communities to develop. We have heard and fully understand that what might look like an asset on the face of it can be a liability. We have therefore tried to build that into the process in the bill, so it is all about a business case and ensuring from the outset, before an asset is transferred, that questions about sustainability and viability have been asked and that a really clear view is being taken.

On existing support, Eric Samuel mentioned the growing community assets fund. There is also the Scottish land fund in rural communities. On revenue funding, which is often raised with us as an issue, Ian Cooke raised an interesting point about community organisations being enterprising. That is a fundamental part of the approach. People might be able to access other funding streams such as the climate challenge fund, which is popular among many communities.

That business of actually looking at the hard sums is a critical part of the process.

John Wilson: To follow up on that, Eric Samuel said that funding had been extended from two to three years for some organisations. I declare a vested interest in the issue, because I am actively involved in my local community and we are going to take on a community asset. The long-term planning for that community asset and its financial viability is tied to proposed major housing developments in the area. The difficulty is that, if those developments do not take place within the timescale in which the community asset is developed—if, say, three or five years pass before the housing developments finally come to fruition—the financial viability plans could fall apart. Can you envisage any fallback position so that, if a financial viability strategy is predicated on certain things happening at certain times but, due to other circumstances, those do not happen, the community can ask for an extension to the funding process to allow the asset to continue to operate until everything is in place to make it sustainable in the long term? We are not talking about sustainability in five years—we are talking about sustainability over 25, 30 or 50 years for some of these assets. Can we look at that?

The other issue is that the Big Lottery has indicated that it will give funding only if the premises are seen to be viable in the long term.

How do we ensure that we support communities when they take on assets so that they can be safeguarded and, if other factors do not come into play, they can turn to someone for help to ensure that a project comes to fruition and that they are on track with the investment strategy and the sustainability strategy?

The Convener: Although we cannot legislate for changing factors, I ask Alasdair McKinlay to attempt to answer that point.

Alasdair McKinlay: Mr Wilson’s point is incredibly helpful because it is a reminder of just how complex the matter is sometimes and that each case is different. This is a good point for me to say that I welcome the committee’s involvement and interest in the bill. It has been incredibly helpful to us that the committee has unearthed a whole range of such examples through its regeneration inquiry and so on.

We have to continue to listen and to ensure that, whether they are legislative issues or policy issues, the community ownership support service, for example—which can at least help with learning and advice—is picking up on those issues. I am sure that Ian Cooke will do that in relation to cost.

However, it is one of those things where we will just have to keep listening and ensuring that the issues are picked up. Fundamentally, this is not about owning an asset simply for its own sake, although that can have huge benefits in relation to a sense of ownership and a positive view for the future; rather, it is about achieving outcomes.

If the outcomes are going to be so fantastic for communities in Scotland, we must have a culture that looks to overcome those barriers in order to achieve the outcomes that people want.

The Convener: Grand. Cameron Buchanan is next.

Cameron Buchanan: Can alienable and inalienable common good land be used for allotments if it is purchased? Is that possible? It seems that we need clarification on what common good land is, and it seems very unclear to most of us what it could be used for.

Alasdair McKinlay: I am afraid that we will have to get back to you on that specific point because although there are six of us here, the common good policy specialist is not among us. I reiterate that the bill really only deals with involving local people. I should say that it includes community councils because I know that some community councillors felt that community councils were absent from the legislation. Community councils are specifically mentioned in relation to common good and in relation to participation requests, so there is a recognition of the important role that many community councils play. However, we will have to get back to you on that specific point.

Cameron Buchanan: Thank you.

The Convener: Finally, a lot of the submissions from local authorities and community planning bodies have been very positive—we often find that that is the case. How do we ensure that local authorities and community planning partnerships do not end up taking a narrow interpretation of the bill?

Alasdair McKinlay: The parts of the bill that I mentioned in relation to asset transfer and participation requests shift the landscape significantly because there is a duty for those bodies to respond to rights that community organisations have.

In my view, people have not quite seen the potential of participation requests yet. They will mean that groups of community bodies in our more disadvantaged areas that work with young people and have really good ideas about how to make the lives of those young people better will not have to wait until they are consulted by children’s services. They will put their case together, and the authority will have to respond. When I spoke to local government colleagues during the consultation, I heard that they feel that that will make them up their game. They can see it coming—they can see that communities will approach them—so they are thinking that they have to get their own processes in order.

Once we get into the detail of the community planning provisions, we can see that community bodies are now a more significant player. They will participate in community planning, not just be consulted on a plan.
Community planning partners are now required to properly resource community bodies—if the lawyer present will forgive me for saying that, as the legislation obviously does not say "properly". However, the fact that the law now recognises that there should be an obligation to resource the involvement of community bodies is another significant change.

The Convener: I told a fib. That was not the final question.

Part 3 of the bill says:

“In this Part, a ‘community-controlled body’ means a body (whether corporate or unincorporated) having a written constitution”.

Why does a body have to have a written constitution in order to participate?

Alasdair McKinlay: Ian Turner is better placed than me to deal with the detail of that.

Ian Turner: That comes from the consultation. People expressed a view about what “community” means. It was felt that, given that we were going into a legislative process, some sort of structure was required in that regard. It is not that a huge amount is required in order to get involved in the process; a written constitution is the minimum requirement. It is the same with regard to asset transfer requests.

The Convener: It would be interesting to see the responses to the consultation in that regard.

Ian Turner: Okay.

The Convener: I thank our witnesses for their evidence. We now move into private session.

12:01

Meeting continued in private until 12:26.
Present:

Cameron Buchanan  Mark McDonald
Anne McTaggart  Alex Rowley
Stewart Stevenson (Committee Substitute)  Kevin Stewart (Convener)
John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Apologies were received from Stuart McMillan.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Danny Logue, Director of Operations, Skills Development Scotland;
Stephen Kerr, Interim Head of North CHP, NHS Lanarkshire;
Linda McDowall, Executive Director, Scottish Enterprise;
Superintendent Alick Irvine, Licensing and Violence Reduction Division, Police Scotland;
Jim McCafferty, Junior Vice President, Institute of Revenues and Rating Valuation;
Garry Clark, Head of Policy, Scottish Chamber of Commerce;
John Mundell, Chief Executive, Inverclyde Council.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered the evidence received.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee consider and agreed details for its proposed external meeting in Dumfries on Monday 27 October as part of its Stage 1 scrutiny of the Bill.
Scottish Parliament
Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Wednesday 1 October 2014

[The Convener opened the meeting at 10:00]

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the 24th meeting in 2014 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I ask everyone to switch off mobile phones and other electronic equipment as they affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members may consult tablets during the meeting; that is because we provide the relevant papers in a digital format.

We have apologies from Stuart McMillan; Stewart Stevenson is attending as a substitute member and I welcome him to the committee.

Agenda item 1 is our second oral evidence session on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We have two panels giving evidence this morning. I welcome our first panel: Danny Logue, director of operations, Skills Development Scotland; Stephen Kerr, interim head of North Lanarkshire community health partnership, NHS Lanarkshire; Linda McDowall, executive director, Scottish Enterprise; and Superintendent Alick Irvine, licensing and violence reduction division, Police Scotland.

It appears that no one wants to make any opening remarks, so we will crack on with the first question. The written submission from Community Planning Aberdeen states:

“The Bill provides an opportunity to ensure genuine community engagement, consultation and active participation by citizens in identifying local needs and involvement in setting priority outcomes and how they should be addressed.”

Do you agree with that statement and what do you think of the proposals in the bill for community engagement?

Superintendent Alick Irvine (Police Scotland): From a policing perspective, the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 articulates the principles that establish that, as an organisation, we need to engage with communities across Scotland in order to develop and drive services that meet community needs. We have already established a national consultation process to seek the views of more than 31,000 people in Scotland at local community level. The 2012 act and the proposals within the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill fit extremely well with regard to our intention to consult, engage and drive forward local service.

The Convener: In terms of police involvement in community planning partnerships, previously the police presence and involvement was greater in some areas than in others. Do you intend to ensure that there is uniformity in participation across the country?

Superintendent Irvine: Absolutely, convener. One of the things that we would rightly see across Scotland is the integration of policing services at community planning level. There is a long and positive history of community involvement and engagement in community planning, but I agree that there were different levels of that commitment and engagement across the country. That is at the forefront of our minds in considering how we engage appropriately with community planning partnerships and drive towards common outcomes through the single outcome agreement.

The Convener: Ms McDowall, what do you think of the Aberdeen community planning partnership’s statement?

Linda McDowall (Scottish Enterprise): I welcome that statement and the bill. Scottish Enterprise is committed to supporting community planning and we already sit on all 27 CPPs—our most senior people are allocated to each one of those partnerships within the Scottish Enterprise geographic region.

I welcome the focus on the evidence-based approach and tangible outcomes that can be agreed by partnerships working together to reach a common goal. That will be welcome at both a local and regional level. There are lots of examples of areas in which we have already engaged at that level. We can clearly see the opportunities when we all bring our own strengths to the table and can consider a single agreement with business community, local community, key partner and stakeholder involvement in order to deliver tangible outcomes. That is very welcome.

Danny Logue (Skills Development Scotland): I echo Linda McDowall’s comments: we welcome the bill. We also recognise the comments made by Community Planning Aberdeen.

As a national organisation, we have been actively engaged with all the community planning partnerships and the associated sub-groups. We want to ensure that our focus on service delivery of the outcomes mentioned is reflected in our local planning, that local needs are addressed and that we are flexible across all 32 local authorities. As has been mentioned, that involves engagement at community and stakeholder level across all areas.
The Convener: Your written submission says that SDS is extremely happy that "the Bill recognises the valuable contribution we can make to community planning by being proposed as a statutory community planning partner".

Will you expand on that and say what difference that will make?

Danny Logue: When community planning partnerships were first established, SDS had just been formed as a result of the previous organisations that we came from joining together. Therefore, there was no reference or recognition to SDS’s creation. As I said, we have since worked with all 32 local authorities about how to input into community planning partnerships.

Formal recognition of SDS as a key stakeholder would give us a formal involvement and consistency across all 32 authorities. To date, we are on 24 of the CPP strategic boards and 32 of the local employability economic development sub-groups. The bill gives us more formal recognition as a strategic partner, and we can play a role in referring the outcomes from our local planning in the CPP arrangements.

Stephen Kerr (NHS Lanarkshire): Perhaps I can bring a local perspective as I am here on behalf of NHS Lanarkshire and the North Lanarkshire partnership. We welcome the opportunity to strengthen community planning and to make it an issue on which people have a clear focus.

All the partners are very keen to work in that way. At times, I suppose that other priorities get in the way but, if we are serious about our aims to improve health and tackle inequality, we need the full input from all partners and a much more rigorous look at the single outcome agreement and how that reflects priorities in the localities and sub-localities in our area.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): Good morning, panel. CPPs have been around for a while and you have all been involved in them, particularly Ms MacDowall, who has involvement in 27 CPPs. Why do we need to make that participation statutory? What difference will that make?

Stephen Kerr: Perhaps in many situations where things are not necessarily done voluntarily, there is an expectation that people will participate. Across the country, you might see variability in participation and in the success of the community planning partnerships. Putting that participation on a more solid base will help to reduce the variability and improve outcomes across the country.

Anne McTaggart: How will participation change?

Stephen Kerr: We have a very strong community planning partnership. However, we do not have complete connectivity between the aims of all the organisations. Even though that is a high priority, the bill would make it an even higher priority, and that could be linked more clearly into those organisations’ objectives and the single outcome agreement made more reflective of the communities’ needs.

In some areas, the tendency is to have outcomes in the single outcome agreement that reflect existing requirements, targets, standards and so on and perhaps not so much the specific local priorities relating to inequalities and health.

Anne McTaggart: Will the new CPP structures that are set out in the bill make a difference to community involvement?

Stephen Kerr: There is an opportunity for that involvement to be strengthened.

The Convener: How will you do that?

Stephen Kerr: We are reviewing the partnership agreement in our area. We are reviewing our structures and how we link with local communities, and we are beginning to focus much more on finding sub-localities—smaller geographical areas and populations where we think the greatest need is. That focus is proving to be very helpful. If there was a statutory framework for community planning work, all the partners would be more likely to be engaged in a stronger way. It is hard to express it, but that is what I am trying to say.

The Convener: Superintendent Irvine is itching to come in.

Superintendent Irvine: I agree that the legislation needs to be strengthened to make it more effective. In my experience at a national level, effective partnership working and collaboration depend on the individual rather than the process. If the individual understands the beneficial outcomes for communities that working collaboratively can deliver, it works pretty effectively. It is less effective where there is an absence of legislation because of the demands that are placed on individuals by their own organisations.

Strengthening the legislation to reflect a more collaborative approach and to articulate the benefits of more effective partnership working would be useful. In doing that, you would strengthen the link with communities, and their engagement in consultation is critical to agreeing what local action should be pursued to achieve which outcomes. There are some good examples at the national level of consultation and engagement shaping some of the outcomes, but there is also an absence of such engagement in other places. A consistent approach would be exceptionally beneficial.

Linda McDowall: Making such engagement statutory would also give people a collective responsibility for making things happen. I am a great believer that it is people, not structures, who make things happen. The bill provides an opportunity for people to rally around the local outcome plans and to see some tangible outcomes from them after agreeing—genuinely collectively—to deliver those outcomes. For me, that is where you will get the greatest involvement of both the business community and the local community.

The Convener: I will play the devil’s advocate. You said that it is people, not structures, who make things happen, yet we are having to produce legislation to improve the situation. Some folk have said previously that some of the bodies that are involved in community planning partnerships try to push all the responsibility on to the local authorities, saying that they are the lead bodies and that it is up to them to do this, that and the other. Is that fair? Why do we need the changes, and why have people thus far not managed to make community planning partnerships work to the degree that they should in many areas?

Linda McDowall: I can speak only of my own involvement in the community planning partnership in Perth and Kinross. That is not how it operates. We have agreed that each partner will map out the assets of the area, looking at it both locally and regionally in the wider Tayside area, and will then agree where it can help to deliver the outcomes that have been identified as providing the greatest opportunity. I genuinely believe that we sometimes need that structure to get people around the table and to appreciate what each partner brings to the table and how it can play a part in delivering those outcomes while involving the local community.

We have lots of examples of working with team North Ayrshire, and we have done some work in the south of Scotland and Renfrewshire, where partners have genuinely worked together to deliver specific, tangible outcomes at very little cost apart from people’s time. People can see the benefit of pooling the collective resource to make a difference locally that then makes a difference to the Scottish economy overall.

The Convener: You said that you have agreed to map assets. I was involved in a community planning partnership that agreed to map assets but failed to do that. Did you achieve that?

Linda McDowall: We are still in the process of doing that. We have a number of workshops planned in Perth and Kinross, and we are looking at the wider Tayside region.

The Convener: When did that process start?

Linda McDowall: It has been going on for about three or four months, and we are beginning to see real benefits to being aware of the asset base and how it builds into the collective picture of sustainable growth in Scotland.

10:15

Danny Logue: I want to pick up on the earlier question about the difference that the legislation will make. As I mentioned, we are on 24 of the 32 local authorities’ CPP strategic boards. However, when SDS was created we were on very few of those boards and we ended up creating a parallel structure called a service delivery agreement. That was our attempt to align ourselves with single outcome agreements, which have been mentioned. We are now members of a large majority of the boards. In fact our chair, John McLelland, has written to the boards on which we are not represented to ask for SDS representation. We have had early feedback on that.

Formalising arrangements helps to achieve consistency and it helps collaboration to have the key partners there. I am personally involved in quite a few CPPs and I have not experienced any notion of partners offloading any of the responsibilities on to local authorities. There has been collaboration on assets, resources, services and priorities. Our local plans are very much aligned to the single outcome agreements. That is about the accountability of partners. That is why we have been able to have local resources devolved to local partners in each of the CPP areas.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): People listening to the evidence this morning might be forgiven for thinking that the bill is about forcing public bodies to work together because they are not doing so currently. What is your view on that? It sounds as though you are saying that we need to legislate to get public bodies in a given geographical area to work together.

Superintendent Irvine: It goes back to the point that was made about consistency across the country. There are strong examples of areas in which effective collaboration functions very well. I would question whether that is consistent across the country. In some places, for a variety of reasons, people do not see any inherent value in the process. The examples of good practice are patchy. We in the public sector need to capture that good practice and try to promote it more effectively across Scotland. The bill provides a framework to enable us to do that.

Linda McDowall: There are lots of examples of this working really well. I mentioned team North Ayrshire. We work with North Ayrshire Council to look at the challenges that the area faces. We have been building business capacity there and looking to get further investment into the area. We have been looking at town centre improvements. North Ayrshire formed an economic regeneration strategy and a board for the area. Team North Ayrshire, which was established in December 2013, looked to create a one-stop shop for the community and the business community in considering the outcomes, assets and opportunities in Ayrshire. That is a great example of partnership working at community planning level achieving results.

I could give you other examples from the south of Scotland and Renfrewshire, where we looked at exporting opportunities. There was more signposting to partners’ services to make it clearer to local people, including local business people, where to get help and support. Collectively, we achieved results. We also had joint, collective responsibility to deliver and we knew that we had the expertise around the table to make things happen.

Danny Logue: The point about having consistency across all areas has been made. The picture varies, so there is a need for greater consistency. Linked to that is a need for genuine collaboration from all the key partners around the table. In many of the CPPs that I am involved in, the membership differs—different organisations and individuals are involved.

To add to what Linda McDowall said, it is about genuine engagement of partners whereby everyone feels that they are making an equal contribution to the discussion around the table and no one feels that they are there as an afterthought.

Two years ago, we introduced co-commissioning in establishing skills pipelines for young people across each of the 32 local authorities. We did co-commissioning in relation to the employability fund and some of the services that we deliver. There is genuine involvement of local stakeholders in defining what services we provide within the local community.

Stephen Kerr: I agree with the points that were made about variation and trying to bring all the partnerships up to a standard. As others have said, there are many examples of areas where it works well, and in my own area, Shotts, we have a healthy living centre to which all the partners contribute. It tackles lots of related issues, such as physical activity, with activities for young people and help for them to access services and leisure. Crime and youth disorder in the area have gone down, and the community transport that is in place helps people with employability. We have a lot of input into health promotion in the area, and there are lots of activities and social opportunities for older people. Early years work is going on and we have a food co-op where people can not only access food but learn cooking skills, and that helps to tackle issues such as obesity.

The Convener: I do not want to stop you, Mr Kerr, but you have given us a flavour of what there is.

Alex Rowley: Some of the criticism that has been levelled at community planning partnerships has focused on the fact that having a lot of projects does not necessarily show joined-up public services. That is not a view that I hold—the living well project in my area involved all the different partners and was often used—but I wonder what can make partnerships more transparent. Should every budget, whether in a local authority or health authority, clearly reference where that budget fits within the community plan and the strategic outcomes that are being suggested? How do you demonstrate and make transparent the fact that those public bodies are working to a common agenda, whatever that may be?

Stephen Kerr: You would expect the single outcome agreements to do that to a certain extent, in identifying the common priorities that we are working towards. I agree that there may be other ways of doing that, and linking the objectives of each organisation to the community plan and single outcome agreement would be a good way of doing that. The same could be true of finances and of identifying where contributions are being made.

Alex Rowley: Could you reach a stage at which each organisation has to bring its budget to the CPP board and demonstrate how that budget is delivering for the area?

Stephen Kerr: Our partnership is beginning to do work around joint resourcing. It would be perfectly reasonable to expect each organisation to report to the CPP on how it is spending its budget or how its activity contributes to community planning.

The Convener: This is an extremely important line of questioning. One of the things that the committee has previously been told about outcomes—and let us stick to health—is that although a community planning partnership may have agreed a health outcome, the national health service health improvement, efficiency and governance, access and treatment targets will differ from that outcome.

Mr Rowley is right to ask where the budgeting emphasis of the NHS will be in that regard. Will it be to achieve that HEAT target or to achieve the outcome in the single outcome agreement?

Stephen Kerr: The resources and attention of the organisation should be on achieving what is in the single outcome agreement for improving health and reducing inequalities, but I agree that resources and activity tend to be targeted towards HEAT targets rather than towards an outcomes-based approach.

The Convener: I do not quite get what you are saying, because you are saying both things at the same time—that the priority should be achieving the single outcome agreement aim but also the HEAT target.

Stephen Kerr: I suppose that what I am trying to say is that from a purely NHS perspective, our resources are sometimes targeted specifically at achieving HEAT targets, when in fact the outcomes for individuals might be improved more by taking an outcomes-based approach linked to the single outcome agreement. For example, it is quite possible that in trying to achieve a target for delayed discharges, people might be discharged from hospital to a care home, whereas if they had had a period of further assessment they might have been able to return home. I am not saying that that happens universally or in any specific location, but it is something that we are working on in Lanarkshire. Some HEAT targets can drive resources and expertise towards a focused point in a person’s journey through the healthcare system.

Alex Rowley: That is an excellent example relating to delayed discharges.

I want to ask about the involvement of the community. I do not know whether you are aware of the model that was set up by Fife Constabulary under its chief executive Norma Graham. Every two months they would go to a community meeting and pick up three priorities of that community. Two months later, they would report back on the progress that they had made. They led the way on that; the local authority and others followed behind. Obviously, the Police Scotland change then came about, but that was a model for engaging the community and for taking on board community priorities. When we are talking about single outcome agreements and high-level outcomes, I wonder whether we are, in the same breath, talking about engaging the community and about the role of the community in all of this.

Superintendent Irvine: The example from Fife is an exceptionally good example of effective policing, in which good community engagement drives local priorities in order to make safer communities. Other examples use a similar model. As organisations working in the public sector, we have to deliver that type of model in order to deliver sustainable solutions.

At strategic level within community planning partnerships, there are examples of investment decisions being taken that build projects and programmes. My experience is that there is a bit of a disconnect between the type of local service in policing that we are saying is really effective—where we speak to people about what they want at community level—and programmes that are driven strategically. The challenge for us all is to join that up. Unless we deliver an on-the-ground service that is visible to people, and unless it is understood how we are driving our business through community engagement and shaping what we are trying to achieve, there will always be a disjoint between what community planning is seen as, through communities, and what we are actually doing in terms of working on the ground.

Alex Rowley: Does anyone else want to comment on that? We talk about community planning, and the word “community” suggests people, but is planning actually done at a much higher level? Are we kidding ourselves that this is somehow about the community setting the agenda?

Danny Logue: It is both—planning is done at the strategic level and at the community level. Skills Development Scotland has been heavily focused on local delivery. National organisations can be criticised for having a national focus that does not really reflect local priorities and we have very much been at pains to address that. That has been done through a number of areas. We have on-going customer evaluation and local stakeholder engagement with partners and individuals about the services that we provide. One good example of that is the local employability partnerships—the third sector is heavily involved in those and in what is delivered locally. The same goes for other community organisations. It goes back to my earlier example about the co-commissioning of services, particularly employability funds, and how we deliver them locally. It is really important that we do that.

Finally, it is important that we reflect two things. One is local performance, and how we deliver our services to local areas. Also, we have a very detailed communications strategy and plan that reflects SDS as a national organisation, but more important is that it also reflects what we are doing locally. That forms the basis of partnership agreements with local schools and parent-teacher councils and so on—the Department for Work and Pensions is also involved—to ensure that we get communications out to local partners and stakeholders.

10:30

Linda McDowall: Scottish Enterprise’s main engagement has been with the business community, and we will continue to have that focus. Until now, the business community has found it quite difficult to engage with community planning partnerships, perhaps because they have been very high level. With the evidence-based local outcome plans, it will be easier for the business community to engage. We hope that we can work with communities to create jobs locally, to build business capacity and to compete for other opportunities. We can even escalate the approach up to regional level, where we can look at travel to work patterns and the various skills assessments that SDS delivers for industry. We have industry advisory boards and regional advisory boards, which also involve the business community. All that presents an opportunity to allow the business community much greater involvement and a bigger role in delivery of tangible outcomes.

The Convener: Superintendent Irvine talked about the strategic level of a community planning partnership. During that, I expected to hear how local ward policing plans form the basis of the outcomes that community planning partnerships are after. There is proactive community engagement in coming up with those plans, but you did not talk about them at all at CPP level.

Superintendent Irvine: That is an important part of how we deliver our business. The 353 local ward plans for Scotland are based on the consultation process that I spoke about. In turn, those plans feed into the local police plans for each authority area, so we should see a link between the local police plans and the single outcome agreements. That structure gives us a degree of confidence in how we are shaping the service, and it helps us to inform our partners at community planning level and to collaborate more effectively with them in the delivery of the local service.

The issue comes back to the different accountabilities and how the local police plans link into the Scottish Police Authority plan and the national police plan. Although I think that the plans are positive, I come back to the dilemma—there is a similar one in the health sector—about what takes precedence when we pursue outcomes at local level. All those plans add to the jigsaw and enrich the picture, but the question, which is not unusual, is how, in operational decision making, we balance the need to deal with national priorities against the need to deal with the local priorities that are driven through that process.

The Convener: Are we saying that the bill will have to make all the organisations that are represented here rethink governance structures, possibly, and certainly some of your priorities, as you see them, in order to fit into the priorities of communities and community planning partnerships? Is that a fair statement?

Superintendent Irvine: Yes, I think that that is fair.

The Convener: How will your organisations look at all of this after the bill is enacted?

Superintendent Irvine: One inherent challenge relates to funding challenges. The policing budget goes to the Scottish Police Authority, which makes investment decisions based on that. However, if we give more power to community planning partnerships to require investment from local partners, there will be a dilemma for local police commanders, who do not control the purse strings or how much money comes down to the local level. How can they support the community planning agenda locally, given the degree of control that they have? That will create a challenge within the organisation, although it is probably a positive challenge.

The Convener: Community planning partnerships were supposed to end some of the duplication that goes on. Mr Rowley talked about pooling budgets. Why do you think that you will need extra resource when, in some cases, you could actually save quite a bit of money?

Superintendent Irvine: I am sorry, convener, I did not mean that we need additional resourcing; I am saying that the investment model for the organisation is that the money goes to the SPA, which then determines how that money is used. The local police commander in Fife, for example, is the key component in our engagement at community planning level, but they do not control the amount that they get to invest or the resourcing level, which means, by and large, the people who are involved rather than the financial contribution. If the expectation from a community planning partnership is that we will invest money in it, that will create a difficulty, because the commander does not control the purse strings or how much he has to spend at local level.

The Convener: So, we will have to consider a situation in which the budgets are devolved to local commander level, which some folk would be quite in favour of.

Stephen Kerr: We have community planning structures that are replicated in localities. Each of those areas has a locality action plan that is reported back to the partnerships, so I suppose that there is a link with what is important in communities. However, there is a new player in town—the integrated health and social care partnerships. It will be important that the strategic needs analysis for all the communities and the strategic plans of the health and social care partnership, the community planning partnership, the NHS board and the local authority are reflective of one another’s priorities and actions.
The Convener: Will there have to be governance changes to make that work?

Stephen Kerr: Yes.

Linda McDowall: I do not see the priorities of Scottish Enterprise changing as a result of the bill. We are an opportunity-driven organisation. We are an economic development agency, and our main aim is to—

The Convener: I am sorry to interrupt, but I am not talking about priorities. I am talking about governance arrangements that will make it easier for you to focus on co-operating with CPPs and getting the outcomes that they want, rather than on meeting other targets elsewhere.

Linda McDowall: We are already involved in 27 CPPs, and I think that our involvement will continue at that level.

The Convener: Okay. Let me ask you a simple question about your involvement in those 27 CPPs. How much money has Scottish Enterprise put into individual partnerships?

Linda McDowall: I cannot answer that specific question, although I could find that out for you. Our resource is very flexible and is based on our being an opportunity-driven organisation. We need to understand better the assets and the opportunities in each community areas to ensure that, collectively, they contribute to Scotland’s economic growth. Much of our contribution around the CPP table is in staff resources. I would not like to think that it revolved around a percentage of a budget. As I said earlier, it is a question of people bringing expertise to the table to make things happen. I would be disappointed if our role was budget led.

The Convener: Let me change the question slightly. How much money has Scottish Enterprise given to CPPs to fulfil their priorities rather than Scottish Enterprise priorities?

Linda McDowall: I cannot answer that specific question, because I do not know the exact value of our input and I would not like to guess it.

The Convener: It would be interesting for us to get a flavour of that.

Linda McDowall: I would be happy to provide that information.

Danny Logue: We do not envisage any change in governance arrangements being necessary, because although we are a national organisation, our focus has been on delivering locally. Our structures are local, we have local teams and planning is done at CPP level. As I mentioned earlier, we are involved in a large number of CPPs at strategic level and our chair has written to those that we are not involved in with a view to getting membership of them.
Danny Logue: When I was talking about consistency, I had two things in mind. First, we are not involved in all CPPs, and there was a plea in there about that. Secondly, CPPs vary in terms of the make-up of the membership and the maturity of the partnership in terms of outcomes.

Another point that is worth making is the fact that, rather than various organisations having different plans, we are all keen that there is a common line of sight with regard to the single outcome agreement. With regard to priorities and resources, we can work with partners to reflect local priorities and local needs, whether we are dealing with Castle Douglas or Castlemilk. We would, along with our community planning partners, build into that a number of factors, in order for us to deploy resources in terms of skills or careers advice.

Stewart Stevenson: I do not want to let you off the hook on this. Should the CPP decide what should happen before the single outcome agreement, or is it in the business of implementing the single outcome agreement? Which comes first?

Danny Logue: The CPP comes first in terms of identifying priorities. There are national priorities, but the issue is how to deploy resources to address local needs and issues. It is necessary to gather and ring fence all the various resources of the partners that operate in an area. We also deploy resources in terms of needs and we must ensure that they are aligned with all the other partners in terms of what they are doing in that local outcomes focus.

Stewart Stevenson: We can pick up other people’s views later, but I will press you on that at the moment. Does the bill’s creation of a national framework carry with it the danger that the decision making will be elevated upwards rather than being driven from the bottom? If so, how do we manage that danger?

Danny Logue: I do not think that that danger exists. I think that the focus of the CPPs and the single outcome agreements over the past number of years has established that framework in the local areas. We just need to address some of the issues that we have all talked about in terms of consistency, the focus on local outcome agreements and how we deploy resources locally. There is the required degree of maturity and involvement on the part of the local partners within each of the CPP areas to enable the local issues to be addressed. I do not see a danger of decision making coming down from on high.

For example, Skills Development Scotland gets a letter of guidance from the Scottish Government that says, “We are asking SDS to deliver X.” We deliver that X through local frameworks. We know what the priorities are. In the development of our annual operating plan, we would discuss those priorities with local CPP partners to ensure that they fit in with local needs, local priorities and the other plans and resources in that area.

Linda McDowall: That is a similar approach to the one that we take. The variability question is based on where the assets and the opportunities lie. If we can use that evidence-based approach and local knowledge to see where the tangible outcomes lie, that can complement and enhance the single outcome agreement. That is a win-win situation.

Stewart Stevenson: In fairness, I say that you were the only member of the panel whose words I did not write down.

Linda McDowall: Thank you.

Superintendent Irvine: I think the positive way is to introduce, as soon as you start engaging with communities, a degree of variability because different communities want and expect different things from public services. I do not think that we should shy away from that.

10:45

Stewart Stevenson: Do you agree that the evidence of variability is likely to support the argument that there is good local engagement?

Superintendent Irvine: Absolutely. Variability is not a negative thing. As soon as we start engaging with and consulting communities, it drives services in a different way. The challenge is in how the consultation and engagement drive the single outcome agreement. I have seen good examples in which a lot of the outcomes that have been identified in single outcome agreements were driven by consultation. On the other hand, others have simply been driven by a set of strategic priorities that organisations have put on the table. We need to make sure that that is the right way round and that the outcomes are community driven.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): I wonder why we are here and, if things are working so well with the CPPs, why we need legislation to improve things. Mr Logue’s case is the exception, because the SDS gets a seat at the table in the community planning partnerships. That is not what we hear when we take evidence from communities, whose experience clearly contradicts what we have heard today.

Mr Stevenson referred to the top-down approach and the bottom-up approach, and three members of the panel belong to national organisations that have national priorities for the work that they do. Mr Logue said that his organisation gets a letter from the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth that tells him what priority X is.

Where is the conflict that we are picking up between communities and the direction taken by the CPPs on single outcome agreements and the other work that the CPPs are doing? We have picked up that such conflict apparently exists. The communities feel that they are being ignored in the decision-making process and that they have very little control or say over the priorities of the community planning partnerships.

Stephen Kerr: I find it difficult to answer that other than from a local perspective. We have local community planning arrangements in each of our six localities in North Lanarkshire, each of which engages in the community forum and has a local action plan that reflects the local priorities that have been agreed with the local population.

I am not saying for one minute that we are a perfect example—far from it. We appreciate that we could make many improvements to how we organise ourselves, how we engage with communities and how we focus on some of our more deprived areas. However, I guess that the answer to the question lies in each of the partnerships.

The Convener: Let us look at North Lanarkshire. One of the points that Mr Wilson is making came out most clearly during a committee visit to Cumbernauld where folks said that they did not feel that they were involved in the process. A lot of folks did not know about the local community planning arrangements, and they certainly did not know anything at all about the community planning partnership. Where does the failure lie?

I have to say that most of the folks we talked to were very heavily involved in their communities in one way or another, and many of them were involved in many organisations.

Stephen Kerr: As I said, the arrangements are by no means perfect. I will take that information and look at it very carefully. We engage with the community forums in that area as part of the community planning process specifically in relation to the NHS. If there is still the perception that there is not enough engagement, perhaps we need to improve on that.

Danny Logue: One of the issues is the level of the engagement that Stephen Kerr mentioned, particularly with community forums. I am involved in a number of CPPs in West Dunbartonshire and elsewhere, and community forums and representatives are indeed involved with CPPs. I have also seen some interesting developments around some of the substructures to which I alluded, particularly around employability and other issues. There are local community representatives on local employability partnerships, and they come to the CPP to discuss services that will be delivered locally.

The issue partly comes down to the need for the community engagement that Stephen Kerr spoke about, but we also need people to get involved through membership of community planning groups—not just strategic bodies, but the subgroups that address local outcomes and are there to ensure that there is a certain level of stakeholder engagement.

I mentioned third sector involvement. There are some really good examples of the third sector being heavily involved in addressing local priorities and taking a local focus.

Linda McDowall: We are an evidence-led organisation, and we are involved mainly with the business community. We have a strong track record of involving that community in various forums to look at the services that we provide. Given our remit, we do not engage with the local community as such, but we hope that our engagement with the business community will benefit the local community by way of job creation, business capacity building and so on.

I am not sure that there will be a huge volume of participation requests to Scottish Enterprise from the community as a result of the bill, but we would be happy to look at ways in which we could involve the local business community if its members felt that they could participate in our work.

Superintendent Irvine: Another North Lanarkshire example is Gowkthrapple, just outside Motherwell, where there is an exceptionally effective model in which joined-up public sector delivery is linked to community engagement. That example meets the aims of all the principles and intentions in the bill with regard to strengthening community links, public service and the community planning process.

Therein lies the challenge for us all in public sector delivery. There are some exceptional examples. If there is a difference between what that delivery looks like in Cumbernauld and in north Motherwell, why is that the case? It is the same local authority area, and the same policing partners are engaged in the same process. There is certainly a communication issue with regard to how we articulate our intentions. That highlights the need for us all to ensure that our community engagement process is fit for purpose and tailored to meet the needs of the local community.

John Wilson: My follow-up question is on whether the implied issues arising from the bill will mean that CPPs will look to national bodies to contribute funding for the delivery of services in their own areas. Given Superintendent Irvine’s comments about the budgetary constraints on local commanders and Ms McDowall’s comment that a financial contribution from Scottish Enterprise would involve devoting staff time to working with CPPPs, would it generally be viewed as favourable if CPP partners asked national bodies to contribute more to local funding initiatives so that the CPPPs could direct the work of such organisations or work around them, or would there be concerns with regard to organisations’ existing tight budgets and CPPPs’ demands on those budgets as they currently stand?

Danny Logue: I mentioned the letter of guidance that we received from the Scottish Government. It lays out the priorities for SDS in any given year with regard to careers advice, modern apprenticeships, the employability fund, regional skills assessments, skills investment plans and so on. We take those asks and look at our resources, which cover staff, support for businesses that are running modern apprenticeship programmes and the employability fund.

Any flexible resources for local deployment are already committed to our current priorities. We have flexibility on the ground in terms of how we deliver careers services, the employability fund, regional skills assessments and skills investment plans. The budget and the resources are important, but the focus on local outcomes is even more important. The focus is on what we are trying to achieve with all those pooled resources, rather than discussions about pounds, shillings and pence. If everyone is signed up to a local single outcome agreement that specified and detailed the outcomes and how we should achieve them, SDS can say, “Here are the resources that we can deploy within that geographical area to deliver those local outcomes.”

Linda McDowall: If we in Scottish Enterprise are trying to achieve sustainable economic growth for Scotland, we need to understand where the assets and opportunities lie locally. I would be disappointed if we put a percentage of a budget against trying to deliver on a local outcome improvement plan. If we get the right people in and identify assets and opportunities, the challenge should be to make the most of our resources, regardless of where they lie, so that collectively we have the benefit of growth in the Scottish economy. However, there would be a danger if we said that, for example, 10 per cent of the budget had to be spent on that. What would happen if the opportunity demanded 50 per cent of the budget? We are an opportunity-driven organisation, and I like to think that our resources are fed in to where the greatest opportunities lie for the growth of the Scottish economy.

The Convener: There is a little supplementary question from Stewart Stevenson.

Stewart Stevenson: I am someone who does not believe that we should restrict ourselves to everything that we already know will succeed. What proportion of your budget are you knowingly putting aside for high risks in support of community needs?

Linda McDowall: I cannot answer that question. I would have to find out the exact figure, as I do not know it.

Stewart Stevenson: Let me phrase it more broadly. Do you think that there is a figure?

Linda McDowall: Sorry, but can you say that again?

Stewart Stevenson: You do not know the specific amount, but do you think that that is something that you are prepared to do?

Linda McDowall: We look at where the assets and opportunities lie and are driven by where the greatest opportunities are for the growth of the Scottish economy. Clearly, the public purse is best spent on achieving growth and creating jobs, and hopefully the benefits will return to local communities.

The Convener: You have opened up a can of worms.

Alex Rowley: If the key economic opportunities sit in the central belt and the key economic drivers of the Scottish economy are the city region areas of Glasgow and Edinburgh, is that not where Scottish Enterprise’s priorities will be?

Linda McDowall: No, definitely not. If we look at what is happening in the seven cities in Scotland, we can see that there are opportunities to drive the growth of the entire Scottish economy.

Earlier, I talked about what was happening in the south of Scotland. People have been looking at pulling together the work of the south of Scotland alliance and the south of Scotland economic forum and driving work through the M74 corridor. They are looking at various economic development projects around that area, such as opening up Stranraer as a sailing gateway.

It is about looking at where the assets lie in total for Scotland because everywhere is different. There are certainly assets around the cities, but there are also assets around various regions from which communities across Scotland can benefit.

The Convener: We will go back to Mr Wilson’s original question.

Superintendent Irvine: I do not feel qualified to answer the question, which I think should be put to the Scottish Police Authority. However, I note that the policing principles in the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012 drive us towards delivering services at a local level. That should be absolutely integral to policing and so it is a challenge that the organisation should be up for.

Stephen Kerr: Whether or not a percentage or number is identified is perhaps immaterial. If community planning partnerships identify the correct needs in the correct communities, it is about the partners identifying and bringing whatever assets they can and harnessing them in the communities themselves.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): Most of the ground has been covered, but I am interested mainly in what CPPs can do to drive down inequalities in and between communities. I will ask three questions in one. Are CPPs doing enough to reduce inequalities, what more can be done, and how can that be done?

11:00

Stephen Kerr: The simple answer to the first part of your question is no, because we still see health inequalities in our communities. We have done a significant amount of work to improve some of the issues. We are beginning to see—certainly in our partnership—the need to do much more focused work that highlights specific areas and small populations where the inequalities are at their highest levels. We need to make our attempts in those areas much more focused to increase community engagement to bring about improvements and help people to engage in those activities.

Mark McDonald: Is work done to make sure that the outcomes that CPPs are drawing up are linked to the inequalities agenda and reducing inequalities? Where that is not happening, should every outcome be tested against what impact it will have on inequalities in communities?

Stephen Kerr: Yes, we do that, in the sense that we have locality health and wellbeing profiles that identify a range of indicators that show which areas are less equal than others, and we focus our attention on those. You should be able to drill down into our plans to see the focus on the inequalities agenda.

The Convener: I gave an example at last week’s meeting regarding the priorities of local people versus those of organisations. In that example, the priority for the people in one of the deprived areas that Mr McDonald represents was tackling mental health issues, but the priority for the health service was getting folk to stop smoking. The community said that it would be easier for people to stop smoking if some of their mental health problems were addressed. How much cognisance do you take of communities and the folk in them when coming up with local health priorities?

Stephen Kerr: We do so partly by looking at the evidence in the wellbeing profiles, which gives specific information, but work is definitely going on with communities to identify their priorities. We have an initiative in the Craigneuk area where all the agencies are very much working with the community—there is a lot of community engagement. We are hoping that that might be a model that we can use in other North Lanarkshire localities.

The Convener: Okay. I want us to return to Mr McDonald’s original question about tackling inequalities.

Danny Logue: I recognise that there is more that we can do to tackle inequalities. First, an inequalities impact assessment should be undertaken for all outcomes, rather than being seen in a number of areas as a separate bolt-on activity. It would help if that permeated right across all the outcome agreements.

Secondly, it is worth mentioning that, as organisations, we all have inequality action plans and priorities. However, we need to make sure that those are aligned into one objective for the community in the single outcome agreement process.

Thirdly, I return to my point about resource deployment. We need to ensure that equality issues are tackled when we prioritise resources for areas. I mentioned the employability fund as an example that relates to the careers advice that we deliver. We must ensure that resources are weighted according to local issues and challenges.

Linda McDowall: On whether enough is being done to address inequalities, there is always more that we could do. We have talked about health inequalities and Danny Logue has mentioned other issues. Testing every outcome would be one way to make sure that we address inequalities as much as we possibly can. I would welcome equality impact assessments being carried out on all local improvement plan outcomes.

Superintendent Irvine: How community planning partnerships tackle inequality is a critical and fundamental challenge. Inequality is a motivator for crime, criminality and antisocial behaviour. If we could tackle the underlying causes, that would make a significant difference to communities.

As for what more we can do, I would like there to be a shift away from the drive towards annual targets on the part of some organisations. Tackling inequality requires a longer-term, more sustained, approach. The question is how we measure what we do and hold ourselves to account against that type of approach, rather than having short-term targets.

Mark McDonald: This follows on from the question that my colleague Stewart Stevenson posed about Castle Douglas versus Castlemilk. We hear a lot of complaints about postcode lotteries. The postcode lottery that concerns me the most involves people who are born in a certain postcode area, whose life chances are dramatically different from what they would be if they had been born in another postcode area.

Is there perhaps a need to move from considering postcode lotteries to considering postcode priorities? Is there the nerve in community planning partnerships to focus on where resources go and where the priorities are in the postcode areas where people have dramatically worse life chances than people in other areas have?

Superintendent Irvine: Considering the single outcome agreements in their current iteration, with their focus on place, I think that we are already starting to see that shift.

There is a more robust discussion around where the levels of demand are and how we invest in resourcing. There are already examples at a national level: discussions are taking place in community planning partnerships in Fraserburgh, Edinburgh and Renfrewshire about how people drive forward their business based on the level of demand.

There is inequality, so what can we collectively do to deal with it?

Linda McDowall: I agree about moving from a postcode lottery to postcode priorities. It goes back to understanding where the assets and opportunities lie. From our point of view, the issue is about being able to help with job creation, which can hopefully improve the quality of life of communities in the local areas concerned.

Danny Logue: I echo that. On postcode priorities, one big area that we examine is school leaver destinations. Approximately 54,000 school leavers every year go to a positive destination: university, college, a modern apprenticeship, training and so on. How do we address the inequalities and pursue the priority issues, employing our resources to meet needs locally? That does not just involve one single organisation. That is the benefit of having community planning partnerships and a single outcome agreement. How do we collectively pool that focus and the priorities to deal with the issues in the postcode areas that Mark McDonald mentioned?

Stephen Kerr: Absolutely: we need to focus on the areas of greatest need and the areas where the greatest inequalities are. That is starting to happen more now.

Mark McDonald: We all recognise that, and we all accept that there is a difference between those in the most need and those who are most capable of expressing their community’s desires and needs. The question was not whether we recognise those needs, but whether there is the collective will in community planning partnerships to make that step change as regards where resources go.

Stephen Kerr: There is that will locally, and that is why we are beginning to focus much more on the communities where people have the greatest needs and there are the greatest inequalities—where people are perhaps the least vocal about their needs at times.

The Convener: Does everybody else agree that there is that collective will? I see nodding heads.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Somebody said earlier that people, not structures, make things happen. I have been very conscious of the question whether the community planning partnership is perceived as an extension of the local authority. It needs not to be perceived in that way. That point has partly been answered by my colleague Mr Rowley, but I ask the witnesses to comment on whether the CPP is perceived, a bit, as an extension of the local authority, and whether it is about people, rather than structures.

Danny Logue: I referred to that point in relation to our involvement. In the community planning partnerships that we have been involved with, there has been genuine engagement by the local authority and other partners to ensure that each organisation plays its contributing role in the local area concerned. That is not about being given outcomes from the CPP, but about helping to shape the outcomes in each community planning partnership area. There is a high degree of involvement by other partners and other organisations within the CPP infrastructure.

Superintendent Irvine: There needs to be leadership in the community planning partnership. The Local Government Act 1966 and the whole structure drives the local authority towards being that leader. Without leadership, there is no governance, and without governance, there is no activity. Leadership is a critical part of what we need to strengthen at local level.

Linda McDowall: If all the partners are explicit about what they bring to the table, it will be people who will make things happen, as they will agree to have collective responsibility for delivering the local outcome improvement plans and the tangible outcomes that will be of the greatest benefit.
Stephen Kerr: Aside from the local community planning arrangements, we work very hard to ensure that our front-line staff are very much aware of community planning. For example, when a district nurse puts a dressing on someone’s leg, they will talk to them about employability; they will do a financial assessment; they will identify whether the household is in fuel poverty; or they will refer people for community safety checks by the fire service. The list goes on. We are trying to embed that approach among all staff groups in the organisation.

Cameron Buchanan: The issue is the perception, not the reality. I think that that is what has been said. Do you agree that leadership is key?

The Convener: There is a lot of nodding of heads.

Do the witnesses think that the bill includes all the right partners in CPPs? Should any additional bodies be included round the table? Are there any bodies that should be removed from the bill?

Superintendent Irvine: What is included in the bill is entirely relevant. There should also be a degree of flexibility, which the bill includes, to allow local authority partners to identify the relevant people to sit round the table.

Linda McDowall: I agree that the relevant partners are there. However, I would like to see a stronger emphasis on involving the business community.

Danny Logue: I mentioned the involvement of the third sector, and that point has been addressed. Another issue is the involvement of the DWP, given the resources that it brings to the table in relation to its priorities. It is very much involved in partnership with other bodies, including ourselves. That is welcome.

Cameron Buchanan: What exactly do you mean by more involvement of the business community, Ms McDowall? In what respect is that missing?

Linda McDowall: Although the local community is involved in community planning partnerships, because of the high-level nature of the partnerships, members of the business community generally find it difficult to find a way in which they personally can engage. If the bill made much more explicit a mechanism that they could use, many more people in the local business community would want to participate in discussions, including on how they could help implement the outcomes from plans.

Stephen Kerr: I do not think that there is any need to specify any other people in the bill, but we would generally welcome any local partners who are relevant to the agenda that we are trying to address.

The Convener: Thank you all very much for your evidence.

11:12

Meeting suspended.

11:25

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses, who are Jim McCafferty, junior vice-president of the Institute of Revenues, Rating and Valuation; Garry Clark, head of policy at Scottish Chambers of Commerce; and John Mundell, chief executive of Inverclyde Council.

Would anyone like to make an opening statement?

John Mundell (Inverclyde Council): Good morning. I thank the committee for inviting me here to give evidence. I fully support the principles of the bill. It is trying to achieve a lot for local people and the whole thing is about our services being community driven and designed to meet users’ needs. However, the bill will bring certain challenges, especially in this time of austerity.

Not all communities have the capability to take advantage of the bill. That is particularly true for marginalised and disadvantaged communities and could lead to an increase in inequality if the partners do not succeed in delivering the aspirations of the bill. Resources are required to ensure the bill’s effectiveness, and funding is key to building increased capacity in communities, especially the disadvantaged ones. There are also resource implications for councils and local partners in terms of officers responding to participation requests, as well as providing money to set up allotments and support other aspects of the bill.

Of particular concern is the ability of community groups to take full financial responsibility for the assets passed to them and the sustainability of the project. When costs arise for repairs and maintenance for buildings or where key participants no longer want to contribute to the project, local authorities will be expected to provide financial and professional support throughout. That is quite a challenge given that we are reducing resources over the next two or three years. Nonetheless, I support the aspirations of the bill.

Garry Clark (Scottish Chambers of Commerce): I thank the committee for the opportunity to comment on the bill. Our primary interest in the bill regards the effects on non-domestic rating, but we are also very interested in those aspects of the bill that potentially allow the business community to take a more active role in local democracy.

Jim McCafferty (Institute of Revenues, Rating and Valuation): I thank the committee for inviting the IRRV. As you would expect, my interest is in part 8 of the bill. It would be interesting to compare and contrast the views among us.

The Convener: This session is mainly about considering part 8, although I am aware that members may have questions on part 2, particularly for Mr Mundell. I will not stop members asking those questions.

What potential advantages could result from the proposed power in part 8?

Garry Clark: We have looked at the response of the Scottish Government to last year’s consultation on the future of non-domestic rating in Scotland and one of the key aspects to come out of that was the power of local authorities to implement local reliefs and exemptions, potentially to assist businesses in their area and to incentivise business at a local level. That is to be welcomed. It must be considered in conjunction with the business rates incentivisation scheme, which has had a bit of a bumpy ride since its introduction a couple of years ago. If local authorities are going to take full advantage of the proposed powers and pass on potential benefits to local businesses as a result, they will need to be sure that there is an incentive for them to do that—they will be looking for potential financial incentives in particular.

I think that many local authorities will look to apply reliefs and exemptions to encourage more businesses to set up in their areas, which could increase authorities’ resources. However, that would happen only if the business rates incentivisation scheme operates effectively. Progress has been made this year, but the scheme has had a bumpy start.

However, there are drawbacks, which I am sure we will come to later.

John Mundell: The proposal to increase local government’s fiscal power is a good thing. However, mechanisms are in place to support businesses, and I wonder whether the proposal will add an advantage. I say that because there are other opportunities to incentivise businesses in our area, through business grants and so on. At the moment, the revenue goes back to central Government, so I am not sure whether the proposal would be a major advantage to local government. However, anything that helps businesses to start up in the area is a good thing.

Another point that is in the back of my mind is that, if all councils started giving free incentives or alleviating business rates to attract businesses to their areas, that would increase competition. That could be good, but there is a risk of a downward spiral.

The Convener: In many of our poorer areas across the country, there are empty business premises, some of which have been empty for a long time. The fact that premises are empty or that there are no local shops often stops folk moving to and thriving in such areas. Does the power offer a particular advantage to disadvantaged communities?

John Mundell: Yes. I support any incentive to help people in disadvantaged communities to develop skills and build small or medium-sized enterprises. We need to do much more for small and medium-sized enterprises and to encourage people from disadvantaged backgrounds to set up in business. Anything that will help them to do that is good, but I am not sure that the measure is the only way to do that, especially as councils already have powers to help people through grants or whatever. I am not sure of the proposal’s specific advantages; I do not want to say no to it, because it will increase flexibility, but I am not sure that it is the only way to do what we are trying to achieve.

Garry Clark: The proposal will be a useful tool in the box but, as others have said, other methods can be used to incentivise business conduct in an area or a sector. The power will allow a local authority to fine tune the non-domestic rating system in its area, perhaps to target an area or a type of business that it wants to encourage. It could target streets or communities in an area. That is a definite advantage of the measure, but it must be seen in the context of the wider non-domestic rating environment and other incentives that are available to businesses for different reasons, which have been mentioned.

Jim McCafferty: On the other incentives and reliefs, I wonder about the relief that is given for partially empty properties in a reduction of rateable... value via section 24A of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1966. In some ways, that will be in direct competition to the possibility of relief of the type that the convener suggests. Local government might be drawn towards such reliefs and away from the section 24A relief, because the latter might impact on business rate incentives.
The two things might be in conflict. However, we welcome the idea of having a relief that can be targeted to specific areas and gives councils much more flexibility for individual, one-off events, provided that they do not tie themselves up too tightly in setting their schemes.

Stewart Stevenson: Perhaps Mr Mundell might care to address my question first and then Mr Clark. How many businesses in Inverclyde did not proceed with business developments because of business rates in the past five years?

John Mundell: I could not give you that detail just now.

Stewart Stevenson: That suggests that it is not such a big problem that it has assumed any prominence in your in-tray. Is that a fair comment?

John Mundell: It has not assumed any prominence in my personal in-tray, but one of my colleagues deals with such matters all the time.
Generally, the amount of business development in our area is not good enough and it probably never will be. We need to ensure that we do much more, and any tool that we can add to the toolbox will help.

Stewart Stevenson: I am trying to test whether the tool that we are discussing addresses a problem that you experience. Although I accept and understand that the coalface experience does not lie on the chief executive’s desk, I take from the fact that the matter is not in the list of priorities in which you interest yourself that it does not seem to be a particularly big problem for Inverclyde Council. I am asking only about Inverclyde Council.

John Mundell: You are asking about the specifics. There is a range of issues that come to my desk and in which I am particularly interested.
It comes down to employment, especially employment for disadvantaged communities.
Anything that we can do through our community planning partnership we are doing. We are having a degree of success in that respect but, as I said, it is nowhere near enough.

I have already mentioned that I am not sure whether the power in the bill is necessarily the silver bullet that we need. Other mechanisms that we use with partners through our community planning partnership, such as grants, are helping.
In the backdrop, we must always bear in mind the state aid rules, depending on the scale of the businesses that we are trying to attract to the area, and the level of grant that we can give businesses.

At the moment, the specifics of business incentives through business rates are not on my desk all the time, but they are in the mix of ingredients that we need to resolve to help businesses to come to our area.

Stewart Stevenson: Let me reposition the question for Scottish Chambers of Commerce. If we were to ask businesses whether they would benefit from a reduction in business rates, we would get a 100 per cent positive response, so let us accept that and not go there. I do not expect the committee to hear any specific business names—for commercial confidentiality reasons, obviously—but is Scottish Chambers of Commerce aware of any specific developments that have been kiboshed by the current level of business rates whether in general or in specific areas?

Garry Clark: It is difficult to put any decision not to proceed with a project at the foot of any one particular cost pressure but the fact is that cost pressures continually affect businesses strongly in the current environment. Cash flow is also a major issue for businesses.

In that context, business rates are usually the number 2 or 3 cost for many businesses. For businesses that benefit from the small business bonus scheme, they are not an issue at the moment, but many businesses out there face cost pressures and cash flow issues, and their number 2 or 3 cost—after staffing and sometimes rental—is business rates. Therefore, any measure that tackles that number 2 or 3 cost to a business will free up resources for that business to invest.

Stewart Stevenson: Let me test what you are saying. I got the sense that you were leading the committee to the idea of using the mechanism to support businesses that already exist. Instinctively, I feel uncomfortable about that, although I might be persuadable. It seems to me that, were this support to have a value, it would be much more related to making something new happen and to enabling the cost benefit analysis to cross the boundary and create a sustainable business. Are you hearing of specific examples where that ability to nudge across the boundary would mean that more businesses would start up? I am not proposing this; I am merely pursuing a line of questioning so that we can get a case on the Garry Clark: There are two aspects. It is important both to support the creation of new businesses and to sustain existing businesses. I am not sure that we should prioritise one over the other—both need to be a high priority. Existing businesses have the potential to grow and employ

Stewart Stevenson: You appear to be suggesting that there is an argument for existing businesses getting this support when there is an intention to create new employment. I take it that you are not making the case for supporting continuity of employment.

Garry Clark: Continuity of employment, the creation of new employment and investment in extending premises to open up new areas of operation for a business all require investment by that business and they all, therefore, impact on the costs to the business. Anything that would reduce those costs could incentivise any of those activities.

Stewart Stevenson: But they are the costs of making changes.

Garry Clark: Whether those costs are for new services, new products, new staff or securing existing employment, they all require investment by the business. Business rates are one of the greatest cost pressures on many businesses, so if we attack that cost, we can assist businesses in doing any of those other things.

Stewart Stevenson: Does the Institute of Revenues, Rating and Valuation have anything to say on that?

Jim McCafferty: I have just one thing to add. The situation is the same as for any rates relief. Given the high number of rented commercial properties, it must be ensured that the relief goes to the businesses that it is intended to reach instead of seeping into the landlords’ side of things. There is plenty of evidence—particularly from the 1980s—of how the enterprise zones in England did not bring as much to the table to promote businesses as they did to help landlords to let their properties. That is no bad thing in itself, but you should consider what the aim of any rates relief is.

Stewart Stevenson: If the measure is adopted by councils, is it more likely to help businesses than to help landlords, who are rarely anybody’s favourite people?

Jim McCafferty: With any business rates relief, there is a true danger that some of it will—if not initially, then at rent review times—end up with the landlords rather than the businesses. That is an inherent danger with the proposed relief as well.

Stewart Stevenson: I do not know whether this would be legally competent, but could the bill prohibit the relief being a consideration in rent reviews? Am I making that up and stretching things too far?

Jim McCafferty: That would take us into rent legislation and I do not feel that I am competent to cover that.

Stewart Stevenson: I most certainly am not. That is for sure.

Jim McCafferty: It is a hard one to deal with.

11:45

Alex Rowley: The Federation of Small Businesses has drawn a comparison with England, where these powers already exist, and makes the point that the effect of the powers is fairly neutral because they are rarely used. In the current financial climate, it is difficult to see where local authorities would have the resources to be able to finance such measures, so is the bill not just a toothless piece of legislation that has been introduced by a Government that would not have any of the costs to bear, in the knowledge that local government would probably not be able to finance it?

Garry Clark: As I said in my opening remarks, it is difficult to see what incentive local authorities would have simply to spend money to no end other than to benefit a number of businesses in their community. They would want to see some return from that. The business rates incentivisation scheme, which the Scottish Government has put forward, could allow local authorities to benefit if they choose to reduce rates for particular businesses in their area. If more businesses are attracted to that area, or if new businesses are created there, and they are paying more in rates as a result, the BRIS would allow the local authority to retain a proportion of that.

There have been teething problems in setting that up because of the levels of appeals expected in the first year of operation but, as the scheme progresses and as local authorities become more able to benefit from the proceeds of additional economic activity in their areas, the additional flexibility to allow a local authority to incentivise business in its area could result in a positive return for that local authority, and that is when it would become more attractive to local authorities.

John Mundell: I support what has been said. I do not have anything to add to that point, but any grant or support given by the community planning partnership, or indeed by the council, would have to be tied to some performance measure so that we get some transformational change through that process to help business to grow or to attract them to the area.

Jim McCafferty: It could feed into the single outcome agreements at some point in the future.
Alex Rowley: If we were looking at the issue in terms of community empowerment, would the logical inclusion not be to allow local authorities to set their own non-domestic rates in their own areas, given that they are the local elected bodies in those areas? What is your view on that?

John Mundell: To return to my earlier statement, it is my view that increasing fiscal powers for local authorities so that resources can be applied more effectively to the most disadvantaged would be a good thing, and the rate poundage issue is obviously important to that.

Garry Clark: Scottish Chambers of Commerce believes that having the uniform business rate applied throughout Scotland has strong advantages, but the ability for local authorities to make adjustments to incentivise business in their area would be a definite improvement on the current system.

Jim McCafferty: Although it is an attractive option to go for localisation of business rates, it would have to go hand in hand with some equalisation policy on local government funding; otherwise the central belt might very well prosper to the detriment of the rest of the country.

The Convener: Following up on that, I note that North Lanarkshire Council has suggested that the proposal in the bill “may create ‘a race to the bottom’”. Might allowing local authorities to set non-domestic rates in their own areas lead to a race to the bottom, as North Lanarkshire Council has suggested?

John Mundell: As I said at the start of the session, increasing cross-boundary competition, no matter whether we are talking local authority boundaries or community planning partnership boundaries, creates the risk that areas will compete to attract businesses, which might have a regional impact. That would have to be done in the right way.

My view is that the bill is focused on the most disadvantaged communities, and I think that local government and the public services are all about equalising disadvantage. We need to focus on trying to get the long-term unemployed in the most disadvantaged communities into some form of employment. If we can help them generate their own business to start with by upskilling them, that will be excellent, but there is a risk of a downward spiral, in which we are all competing against one another to get the same businesses to come to our respective areas.

Garry Clark: This race to the bottom is one of the reasons why we would be prepared to stick with the current uniform business rate, but giving local authorities the power to take measures to address specific issues in their areas, which the bill could do, is an attractive idea.

As well as sustaining existing businesses and helping them to grow, we need, as Mr Stevenson mentioned, to encourage the creation of new businesses. As a combination of those circumstances will give Scotland the best economic opportunity. I think that the most sensible route is to allow a degree of local incentivisation to meet particular local needs while maintaining the broad spectrum of the uniform business rate.

Jim McCafferty: Although the race to the bottom is part of the issue, and I can see it as a real danger, there is something that happens after that brings me back to the strong connection between rates and rents. If rates in a certain area are reduced for a period of time and it is not possible to contain the behaviour of landlords, rents might well increase, which will be picked up in the next general revaluation, and the rateable value base in that area will increase. I agree with Mr Clark and Mr Mundell about the dangers, but there is also a phase 2 in the long term.

The Convener: In 2011, thanks to the policies that were put in place, 57 per cent of businesses in Scotland paid zero or reduced business rates, which is a fairly significant number. Have rents risen because of the rate reductions that followed the introduction of the small business bonus scheme and other incentivisation schemes? Is there any evidence of that?

Jim McCafferty: There is only anecdotal evidence in relation to some types of property. The absence of evidence might well have something to do with the overriding impact of the recession, but evidence exists of the perverse effect of relief on rents in the charitable retail sector, in which 80 per cent relief is mandatory, prior to the recession. There is sufficient evidence of the private sector landlords not being able to compete in rental bids for retail outlets in certain areas because they were outbid by charities that knew that they would get a cushion on the rates side.

Anne McTaggart: Good morning, panel. Could any changes be made to the provisions to enhance the power and make it more likely to be used? Could anything be done to make it more user friendly, accessible and transparent?

John Mundell: I cannot think of anything at this time. If you are talking specifically about business rates, I am not in a position to give you an answer to that.

Garry Clark: The bill is fairly wide ranging in its possibilities and gives local authorities a fair amount of leeway. I have no specific worries about its scope at present.
Jim McCafferty: I go back to my earlier point that instead of seeing a business community and a non-business community we need to see both as a single community in a particular locality. Can we bring the two communities together? We already have mechanisms for consulting the business community and in a broader sense there is a wider consultation with the community every time there is an election. How do we get people together to recognise the interest of a single community in an area?

Cameron Buchanan: Mr Mundell, you mentioned monitoring businesses for performance. How does one do that?

John Mundell: My comments related specifically to a council or a partnership providing some form of grant to a business that would be tied to a particular outcome such as expansion. The money might well be invested in equipment, an extension to a property or assistance with moving to a different property. We would like the proposed outcomes in the business plan to be met; if we offer a grant, we would like some return on that investment.

Cameron Buchanan: You talked about authorities being able to grant relief to any type of ratepayer, including businesses, as they see fit. Would that include employment in silicon valleys, business parks and things like that? I am just concerned about the notion of a race to the bottom. How does one grant relief to businesses? The overriding condition rather worries me.

John Mundell: I can understand why. Going back to what I said about disadvantaged communities and the need to focus help and support on a particular location, I think that what you have highlighted is important in the context of the bill. On the one hand, it will help us as partnerships develop a particular community area. On the other hand, the usual processes would be adopted for big business, although Scottish Enterprise, which gave evidence earlier, would adopt for big business, although Scottish Enterprise, which gave evidence earlier, would take certain approaches and use certain mechanisms to help attract businesses to different areas.

We have just had a success with a new business—an American firm—coming to our area with the prospect of 500 jobs. That has happened through support from Scottish Enterprise and grants through that mechanism rather than through the council.

Cameron Buchanan: If you had a business park and you found that a business park in another area had lower rates, would you try to match those lower rates? That is the disadvantage because business rates represent a very high percentage of business costs, people might well move.

John Mundell: That is the concern that attaches to the race to the bottom, and I am not quite sure how one squares the circle. You might succeed for a period of time, but then after a few years somebody else will adopt a different approach and business will get attracted to a different area. That happens at present for different reasons.

Cameron Buchanan: But it is the council that should be deciding the relief. It should be empowered to decide what it wants to do with business rates.

John Mundell: That is basically what the bill proposes.

John Wilson: Good morning, gentlemen. I will put my question in context so that you know where it is coming from. The Public Petitions Committee received a petition from a local resident in the west end of Glasgow that raised issues about the growth of the large retail sector, such as the Tesco Metro and Sainsbury’s Local shops that are being created to the detriment of some of the smaller traders in high streets and town centres. We examined the petition and the planning aspects to find out whether the issues could be dealt with through planning legislation. One argument that has come back to the Public Petitions Committee is that the encroachment of such stores on town centres and high streets might be better dealt with under part 8 of this bill. Could that part of the bill take on board communities’ concerns about the number of Tesco Metros, Sainsbury’s Locals or whatever else that are coming into an area and potentially decimating local high street traders?

12:00

John Mundell: There are different stages to consider. For example, the big focus on out-of-town-centre developments that the bigger stores had in the past has had more of an impact on town centres more than the Tesco Metros, Scotmid and other such companies that are developing a different product.

That can have an impact on small businesses. To be honest, I see in my mind’s eye using the powers proposed in the bill to assist not necessarily the Tesco Metros but, say, a local butcher to develop in a town centre or on the high streets of our small towns. I would rather use the powers in a selective and focused way to attract smaller businesses instead of the national networks such as Tesco that you mentioned.

Garry Clark: The bill contains potentially wide powers for local authorities that could be used to incentivise specific business activities in a specific area. That is where it fits into the overall business rates agenda; we have national reliefs at a national level, and as I mentioned earlier, we have the enterprise areas. What the bill provides is a lot more local and a lot more specific to local circumstances, and it can be fine tuned a lot better at the local level. That is its attraction.

On the retail side of our membership, we have certainly found that independent stores have fared reasonably well over the past couple of years and in many circumstances have been growing fairly strongly. There are various reasons for that extremely welcome situation. For a start, people are moving away from supermarkets, particularly to buy meat or whatever in the wake of various scandals that have blown up over the piece, and that has been to the benefit of smaller, independent retailers.

That is the advantage of the powers in the bill. They will allow a local authority to take notice of specific local conditions, possibly right down to an individual street or particular community in a local authority area, and to target that area to help incentivise and support businesses.

Jim McCafferty: I agree with much of what Mr Clark has said. My only rider to those comments is that I question whether the amount of rates involved would be sufficient to dissuade a truly determined larger organisation.

The Convener: Mr Wilson?

John Wilson: I have no further questions, convener.

Mark McDonald: Some of the submissions express concern about the application of local rates reliefs having to be fully funded by authorities. It strikes me that if we want to encourage local flexibility, that should come with local responsibility. Does the panel accept that?

John Mundell: I do not think that there would be any issue with Inverclyde Council or our local Inverclyde alliance taking responsibility for or being accountable for doing precisely what you have outlined. I said earlier that other mechanisms, such as grants to particular communities, can be used. As you know, part of the bill deals with assets, which can be dealt with in different ways through grants, but there is no issue with accountability with regard to Inverclyde alliance or I am sure any other community planning partnership.

Garry Clark: The power to reduce business rates in a local authority area could be a cost to a local authority. That is only right, but the business rates incentivisation scheme ought to be geared to allow that local authority to benefit at least in part from the encouragement of enterprise in its area.

Jim McCafferty: Because they are relatively convinced that the current settlement might come under threat over the next few years, local authorities are becoming concerned about the overall funding picture and about anything that they see as an additional cost. That is one of the drivers for that particular response. Moreover, because of the partition of the two communities that, as I have said, has happened in some areas—not, as we have heard, in Inverclyde—the local authority might lose focus on the fact that, if the approach worked, there would be a direct benefit.

John Mundell: Perhaps I have misunderstood the question. On the issue of increased costs or whatever, I have concerns about a number of areas in the bill. As I indicated in my opening comments, authorities and, indeed, community planning partnerships might well have to meet significant costs associated with delivering on the bill once it is passed. That brings us back to issues such as building capacity, the hand holding that will be required, the development of skills in communities and the assets that will have to be dealt with or transferred and then transferred back again if a community group fails. Those significant potential costs, which are yet to be determined, are of serious concern, certainly from my perspective.

Mark McDonald: I am by no means an expert on Inverclyde—were Stuart McMillan here, he might drill down into this more—but I know that the area is not too far away from one of Scotland’s very large population centres. Although I represent a constituency in the city of Aberdeen, I do not represent the city centre itself, and I know that there is local flexibility in local authority areas in the application of rates relief and that it need not happen on a full local authority basis but can be targeted at specific areas. If there was a feeling in Inverclyde, for example, that investment needed to be attracted at a specific area, a rates relief approach could be taken for that specific area rather than for the whole local authority area. I take on board the point that an authority-wide application of rates relief could lead to a significant shortfall in rates, but surely the targeted approach provides some attractions for an authority such as yours.

John Mundell: Yes. I have already said that it is a tool that could be used to our advantage. However, I have also said that different methods could be employed.

As for our proximity to Glasgow, this morning I was supposed to have been at a meeting with chief executives and leaders from the Glasgow city region; that is an altogether different level on which all the councils in the Clyde valley are working closely together. Obviously, £1 billion-worth of investment over a number of years is tied to that, and all of these business incentives issues will have to be examined to ensure that one council area is not disadvantaged more than another.

In this case, the whole concept of the city deal is to look at the region and improve its economic vitality and gross-value-added outcomes. This is happening not just at local council level or indeed down to local community level; we have to consider these things and do the joined-up bit, which involves ensuring that all the partners join up and work more closely together. Over the past few years, since the previous legislation was introduced, we have made big strides forward, but there is always more that can be done.

The Convener: Is there any advantage in councils that intend to use this power consulting business improvement districts?

John Mundell: The bill’s main thrust is consultation and engagement with different communities. In our area, we have the chamber of commerce, we honour the community planning partnership and we engage with the Federation of Small Businesses. Different engagement mechanisms are used.

Another issue is that local authorities are required to engage and consult on a range of fronts. In the literature that I read before the meeting, I saw references to community learning and development consultation and children’s services consultation. There is a myriad of levels of consultation. The bill talks about consultation with “community bodies”, but I am keen to ensure that we consult with the communities themselves rather than just the bodies.

I will take—or perhaps steal—this opportunity to raise another point. We are, quite properly, being challenged through the bill to improve community engagement, but I wonder how the Scottish Government engages with communities on, for example, the national outcomes to ensure that it develops the most appropriate outcomes at that level. Obviously, we have to engage to ensure that we come up with the right outcomes and performance measures at local level. However, there are different levels, and we are potentially missing a trick in relation to the national outcomes.

Garry Clark: This is an interesting question. One of the premises of BIDs is that a small supplement on business rates is payable to fund the scheme. The number of BIDs in Scotland is growing, and I certainly see no reason why they should not be part and parcel of the consultations in relation to the application of any of the powers in the bill.

Jim McCafferty: Consultation with BIDs works well at the moment but, with regard to Mr Clark’s point about the supplement, one issue with it is that not everybody in an area is able to participate. Therefore, I believe that the power to introduce reliefs provides an opportunity.

Alex Rowley: Mr Mundell’s submission raises a number of issues that will be useful to the committee. Obviously, we are focusing on part 8 of the bill today, but I thank him for his useful submission in general.

The Convener: I think that it was Mr Mundell who said that the power will not be a silver bullet, but that it can be used as part of the basket of other local authority powers. What changes could be made to the power that would make it more likely to be used as part of the basket of opportunities for incentivisation?

John Mundell: Do you mean specifically in relation to business rates?

The Convener: Yes.

John Mundell: The only thing that really concerns me is how meeting 100 per cent of the cost of any relief for businesses would impact on a council financially. I would like that particular issue to be addressed in one way or another, but I cannot give a specific answer. We are working more closely with our partners to apply existing resources and remove duplication, which was mentioned earlier. That absolutely needs to be developed further, but at the moment we do not necessarily have the cash to deal with business rates relief and the other additional cost burdens in the bill. I cannot suggest a specific improvement, but I point out that particular concern.

Garry Clark: As I have said, the key is to ensure that the business rate incentivisation scheme is working correctly at national level. However, I see the powers in the bill as being used at a very local level. The Scottish Government controls other ways of applying reliefs nationally and across rated properties in Scotland, and the advantage of the scheme in the bill is that it can operate at a very local level to address specific needs. It does not need to be hugely expensive for a local authority, although it would certainly help if the business rate incentivisation scheme was set up to allow local authorities to benefit from increased economic activity in their areas.

Jim McCafferty: There is every possibility that there will be low take-up in year 1. After that, if it is made more transparent in the budgetary setting process that the power is available and that councils will consider it and perhaps even take petitions on it, that will at least give a transparency that might help with take-up in future years.
The Convener: I thank our witnesses for their evidence. We now move into private session.

Meeting continued in private until 12:59.
Present:
Cameron Buchanan  Mark McDonald
Stuart McMillan  Anne McTaggart
Alex Rowley  Kevin Stewart (Convener)
John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Andy Brown, Secretary, Scottish Woodlot Association;
David Coulter, Chief Executive, Dumfries Third Sector Interface;
Amanda Macaulay, Dalbeattie Community First Responders;
Jeff Ace, Chief Executive, NHS Dumfries and Galloway;
Geraldine McCann, Head of Administration and Legal Services, South Lanarkshire Council;
Douglas Scott, Senior Policy Advisor, Scottish Borders Council;
Kay Gilmour, Head of Community Support, Department of Education, East Ayrshire Council;
Louise Matheson, Senior Manager Property & Architectural Services, Dumfries and Galloway Council.
Scottish Parliament
Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Wednesday 8 October 2014

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:32]

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the 25th meeting in 2014 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I ask everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic equipment, as they may affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members will refer to tablets during the meeting; that is because we provide papers in a digital format.

Our first item of business is our third oral evidence session on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Three panels will give evidence. I welcome the first panel. Archie MacGregor is land and property development manager at Scottish Water; Alan Thomson is head of corporate relations at Scottish Water; John Hosie is community regeneration and health manager at Dundee City Council; and Judith Proctor is corporate lead integration and general manager in Moray community health partnership, NHS Grampian.

A representative from North Lanarkshire Council was supposed to be here but, unfortunately, that representative pulled out of the session at the last minute. I am extremely disappointed by that.

Do the witnesses have any opening remarks that they would like to relay to the committee? As they are shaking their heads, we will move on.

I will start with a simple question. Why are the proposed new powers necessary? Do you think that there will be changes in current practice? Ms Proctor, would you like to start, please?

NHS Grampian very much welcomes the proposals in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, in particular the opportunities that we see in the provisions for us to engage deeply with communities and co-create sustainable services for the future. However, in common with some of the other submissions that the committee has received, we note that engagement goes so far, and we see a lot of the opportunities through, for example, the locality working that is allowed through the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2104 to really co-produce services with people. We had hoped for further clarity on that.

We think that the opportunities in the bill are significant. We recognise some of the potential challenges for us in delivering on them, but the potential in the proposals for communities and people across Scotland to really engage with public services and help to co-produce them is significant.

Archie MacGregor (Scottish Water): Scottish Water is also very supportive of the bill, and of giving communities the opportunity to submit asset transfer requests in particular. One of the reasons why the bill is needed is that the existing framework in which public bodies operate is a very formal process in which asset transfers can happen only at market value. There is no existing guidance as regards leases or arrangements in which communities can come forward and make use of assets or apply for their transfer. The only other thing in operation is the community right to buy, which, of course, applies to rural areas at the moment. A broadening of the principle for communities to get involved is to be welcomed.

The Convener: I am not fully aware of the rules and regulations that would apply to Scottish Water, but obviously an asset can be sold for less than its market value from other public bodies if there is ministerial approval for that sale. Would that apply to Scottish Water, too?

Archie MacGregor: That is correct, but the bill will provide much more of a framework that will give confidence to officers to deal with requests from communities.

The Convener: I wanted to clarify whether the rules that currently apply to other public bodies apply to Scottish Water, too. That is useful. Thank you.

John Hosie (Dundee City Council): The bill is welcome, because it endorses many people’s aspirations to see more empowered communities. That is positive. There are many diverse opportunities. There are challenges particularly in some areas of greatest deprivation in the support levels that are required to help groups to evidence need and consult within their communities, and the support role of others to help them to go through the process, acquire an asset and sustain it. Those challenges should not be underestimated.

The Convener: Okay. Out of general interest, Mr Hosie, your job title is community regeneration and health manager. Are you funded jointly by the council and NHS Tayside?

John Hosie: No. I am funded fully by Dundee City Council.
The Convener: Okay. That is also useful.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): I thank Mr Hosie for what he said, which leads me on to the next question.

You have illustrated the fact that some of our communities do not have the capacity to take advantage of the provisions in the bill. What will your organisation do to assist those communities?

John Hosie: In Dundee, we have a well-established structure for the co-ordination of local community planning. In the eight multimember wards, we have local community planning partnerships, which are chaired by a first to third-tier officer of the council and involve elected members, council departments, the national health service, the police, fire and rescue, and up to six local people who are representatives of key community organisations. Therefore, we have a strategic mechanism in the city that will assist when we are raising awareness of matters to do with asset transfer.

In the area of work for which I am responsible—community regeneration—there is a direct link with the staff who are under my management and who have roles in capacity building across a diverse range of community groups. A multi-agency approach that reflects our partnerships is probably key to that. However, we do not see ourselves doing anything different in principle from what we currently do. The bill just gives that a very different dimension.

The Convener: Does Scottish Water want to comment?

Alan Thomson (Scottish Water): Support for communities would be wide ranging. An example could be fisheries groups and reservoirs. Some community groups would like to buy a reservoir, but the on-going maintenance of the reservoir might not be defined as being in those groups' best interest. We would look to work and negotiate with them. If the reservoirs are redundant—one in particular is used for unemployed people, wellbeing and a number of other initiatives—we would need to enter into a longer-term lease, so that if the reservoir was sold, the lease would go with it.

There is a range of things that we can do to work with communities.

Anne McTaggart: What would you do proactively to encourage community members?

Alan Thomson: In the example that I gave, we have an involvement with the fisheries group. We have dialogue with it and there are on-going leases. If something was going to happen with the reservoir, we would look at the longer term.

We have community managers across the country who liaise with property colleagues.

Judith Proctor: I will build on some of the comments from my colleagues on the panel. The bill's provisions will enable us to make more of an impact with the work that we do to engage with communities and build capacity. NHS Grampian has responsibility for layers of public health through the organisation and, within community health partnerships, we have responsibility for community wellbeing and health improvement at that level. Those are the resources that we would apply—and are already applying—to building capacity in communities to participate in our work and co-create services in the future.

NHS Grampian has a duty as a partner in local community planning partnerships, of which there are three in the north-east and Grampian, to engage with communities.

The committee will be well aware of the key elements in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014, including the creation of bodies corporate—the integrated joint boards. We will have to set out in our integration schemes how we will engage with and encourage communities to participate. In our submission to the committee, we pointed out the need to ensure that we are aligned with those things, rather than working in two parallel processes, so that we can maximise our input.

Strategic plans are significant vehicles for engaging and working with communities, particularly at local level. They can begin to address some of the challenges that we see around some communities of interest being better able than others to take part. The opportunities in the 2014 act for us to focus on localities might enable us to target some of that work at deprived or disadvantaged communities.

As a public body, we have been undertaking a lot of work under policies such as reshaping care for older people. There are opportunities in that work to build on the engagement and continue dialogues that we have with our communities on shaping services.

The Convener: I am going back to yesteryear, Ms Proctor, in a deprived community in Aberdeen. NHS Grampian came out to consult on local health priorities. The folks there—surprisingly, for me—said that their main priority was mental health. NHS Grampian's priority was to get folk off smoking. A fair number of members of the community gave their view, but mental health did not feature in NHS Grampian's priority list.

Have things changed since then, or do some organisations pay lip service to consultation and forget the views that are expressed by communities?
09:45

Judith Proctor: That is a good question. There could be tension between engagement with communities and the statutory obligations and targets to which some public bodies are subject. The challenge for us all—for policy makers and public bodies—is to balance the rights, responsibilities and opportunities in communities with the other priorities.

In our response to the consultation on the bill, we pointed out the challenge that arises when some of the tensions become apparent, such as when there are requirements for major service change. A community might have given a clear signal on services and change, but tension might arise because that is seen as a major service change, which might be a political challenge locally and nationally.

The task is challenging, and engaging with communities can be challenging. There can be more than one view, so we must balance that by being clear in our approaches and in our way of working that we are listening to all voices.

The Convener: The committee has in recent times gone round the country to talk to folks about various issues. I understand that engagement can be challenging, but I feel that common sense sometimes does not come into play. To return to my example, if folks have a lot of mental health problems that are not being addressed, they are hardly likely to be able to give up smoking. Smoking might be the only thing that is keeping them going.

I know that others set targets and priorities, but going out and speaking to folk to get their opinions should not be a pointless exercise. Common sense dictates that targets will not be met unless other issues are addressed. Participation requests will give folks more ability to influence decisions. How will that make a difference? How do we bring common sense into play?

Judith Proctor: Common sense involves understanding what our communities want. Engagement involves having a genuine dialogue. As an NHS board, we must be clear with our communities about the elements of service that we can provide and the resources that we have to do that. There are examples of participatory budget setting that get us into that productive dialogue.

No public body can do everything that it might want to do or everything that a community or individuals in a community might want to do, but we can genuinely discuss what people want, what their priorities are and what our challenges, targets and statutory duties are. We can find a pragmatic way forward to deliver on all those aspects as far as we can.

That approach involves a shift in how we work and how we all think. Such dialogue does not happen quickly; it takes time to build trust in communities where we might not have done that before. It is important to take time to do that.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): Given that everyone on the panel welcomes the bill, I will ask about participation requests, which I am trying to get my head round. What is your understanding of them? Do you have practical examples of when community organisations could come along with a participation request? If we are trying to explain the term to community groups, what does it mean?

John Hosie: In Dundee, we are in the early stages of the journey. We will accommodate and incorporate participation requests in the future. We will help groups to see their right to make such requests.

We have had no requests yet, but we are prepared to refine our strategy once the bill is implemented. We will make local groups aware of the opportunities.

The Convener: Will you expand on what happens now, without the bill in place, if a community comes to you and says, “We don’t think this service is being delivered right. We want to know the thinking behind the delivery and the budget that has gone in”? If a community wants to influence something, how does it do that at present, without the bill? It would be interesting for the committee to hear your views on that.

John Hosie: We have a part-time asset transfer co-ordinator post. It has only been in place since December last year and it is only 10 hours a week, but it is the first point of contact for most groups and organisations. We have tried to raise awareness, and that person has done a lot of groundwork to help groups to see what is coming. We have our information posted online and we are increasing that information and directing community groups to it.

In short, if we are approached by a community group, we will sit down with it, talk through the issues that it sees as local priorities and work out ways of taking them forward. Things can come to nothing, or they may go through a process. I do not know whether that answers the question.

The Convener: Okay. I ask Scottish Water to comment, please.

Alan Thomson: We deal extensively with communities across the country. A lot of that is to do with our capital programme and the delivery of services for customers. We have a structure within our business whereby we have regional community managers and they work with our capital and delivery teams, but we also issue contact details to local councillors and MSPs and we have a public affairs department. We try to have as many open channels as we can for customers to approach us. We will engage with them in the community because we want to do something, but equally there is engagement back into Scottish Water.

When we get requests, we liaise across the business with our land and property departments to move them forward and we enter dialogue and negotiation with people to see what can be done.

Judith Proctor: I do not think that NHS Grampian has a formal process of the sort that the bill supports for dealing with such requests. However, working alongside communities happens through our community health partnership structures and direct requests to the board, particularly related to specific services.

I can certainly imagine requests for participation where service change is proposed, and there will be examples of that throughout the NHS in Scotland. When we remodel or redesign services, patient groups will want to be involved in the design of those services and we will seek to involve them in that. The same potentially applies where we are looking to remodel or change building-based services.

I can certainly see where requests for participation in those things would come through, and there is an opportunity to have a formal process around that. Such a process would hopefully make it much easier for communities to understand how they can engage. I imagine that, at present, it feels quite complicated and people may not know where to approach a board in order to participate in service change.

Alex Rowley: I am trying to get at whether organisations have properly thought through the participation request process. My reading of it is that a local organisation could look at, for example, the community planning partnership in its area. If it has an outcome to improve health and wellbeing through healthy eating and exercise but a local body thinks that it is not doing that too well, it could come along and say, “We want to get involved in the delivery of this service. We could have healthy eating classes and engage people better than you are doing. The local football team can get involved in running sport and leisure to increase people’s fitness, and the outcomes will be that people will eat more healthily and be fitter. That’s in line with the strategic plan. We want to deliver that, and we’re placing a request.”

How will you deal with that? That is my understanding of what could happen if the bill that you have just welcomed is passed.

Judith Proctor: Yes. That is a really good example of how the formal participation requests would operate. From a board and community health perspective, that is exactly the sort of partnership working that we have been looking to develop in CHPs and will look to develop even further through public bodies work and the integration work in which we are involved.

We will also look to develop it with localities by getting community groups to take part in those processes and take on those services to help us to achieve the outcomes. That must be the ideal for all of us so, as public bodies, we will need to create the formal routes through which we can make known to our communities how they can avail themselves of those opportunities.

Alex Rowley: One of the criticisms of the community planning partnerships is that the third sector and others feel excluded. The partnerships are basically run by the local authorities and the next big partner is the NHS. The idea of the participation request is that community organisations could come forward and demonstrate that they could achieve certain outcomes. Therefore, the relationship would have to change. It would not simply be about them being in there to do something; they would have to demonstrate it.

How geared up are you for that? Would it mean significant change within your organisation if community organisations took a greater role in the delivery of services? What would it mean for your organisation? Are you equipped for that right now?

The bill says that, if the community organisations can demonstrate that they will achieve the outcomes, “The authority”— the local authority, health authority or whoever it is—

“must agree … unless there are reasonable grounds” not to do so. What is the definition of “reasonable grounds” and should there be an appeals process for that?

How geared up are you to make the shift if a community group comes along and says that it could achieve certain outcomes? That would be a significant shift.

Judith Proctor: It involves a shift in the way that we think, but it builds on work that we have been trying to achieve through community health partnerships and local work that has been happening under the umbrella of community planning for a number of years. The third sector—the private sector, too, but particularly the third sector—is key to us being able to deliver that. The roles of the developing third sector interfaces are really important and, although we need to build capacity in communities for participation requests, we also need to support our emerging third sector interfaces to build some of that capacity locally.

My focus on health and social care integration leads to my response to your question about getting geared up for participation requests. The gearing up will be the work that we, under the legislation on integration, will do in defining our localities and how we engage with them and encourage them to participate. It will give us a clear approach to working with the resources and assets that are in a local community to shape services.

I am not sure whether that answers all your points.

Alex Rowley: I noticed that Scottish Water did not say much about outcomes. How good are public bodies at clearly defining outcomes and organising services and budgets based on the outcomes that they are trying to achieve? How good are they at measuring outcomes and how do they report them?

Alan Thomson: Scottish Water’s outcomes are heavily measured. They are based on ministerial objectives. The business plan for 2015 to 2021 that has just been announced was formed after extensive consultation with customers, the customer forum and our regulators—the Scottish Environment Protection Agency and the drinking water quality regulator for Scotland. However, that business plan included what customers want on a range of things—water quality, waste water and flooding—more than it has ever done. That was balanced against what customers want to pay for those services.

I am delighted to say that the plan has just been agreed. It will provide considerable benefits for our customers. We are the only utility in the United Kingdom to agree that our prices will be fixed at 1.6 per cent until 2018, so we are giving customers price stability with a range of outcomes that we need to achieve throughout the country. Those are measured and targeted by regulators and they are agreed in a package of measures. That is, broadly speaking, how the water industry works.

10:00

On your point about how we engage communities in our business plan, I think that every organisation always has to be open to new opportunities and should not close things down. The point that was made about common sense is very apt. We have to remain alert to opportunities to work with communities, partly because of what we want to get out of that. At the end of the day, we need to do certain things in our capital programme and we need to engage with communities. It is not just a case of dig, dig, build, build and everybody should be grateful. We have to engage meaningfully with our communities to ensure that, when we arrive to make improvements, we do that in a collaborative way. When we work with sensitive communities where we have gone in before, we try to learn from the experience and get a better outcome for our customers.

The Convener: Let us look at an apt example for Scottish Water. You have talked about all the engagement that you do with the regulators and Government, the ministerial targets and all the rest. Let us look at Aberdeen, where there have been flooding difficulties in the merchant quarter and the area of the city known as the Green. Businesses and residents there have had real difficulty in understanding what Scottish Water has been doing to resolve the difficulty. If, after the bill is enacted, those folks decide that they have had enough and they put in a participation request to try to influence change—maybe in the capital plan or in what you are doing to resolve their difficulty—how do you deal with that? How do you cope with that?

Alan Thomson: In the merchant quarter in Aberdeen, we have been engaging with local businesses and groups. We have also engaged with the local authorities. The key for us in such situations is to understand the root cause of the problem.

Internal flooding is a terrible thing to happen to any customer, and our capital programme focuses on reducing the number of customers who are at risk of internal flooding. A lot of good work has been done on that over the years. Our next programme involves looking at external flooding in order to understand and define which areas of Scotland are most at risk and what interventions we can put in place to alleviate the flooding for our customers.

We would look at it—

The Convener: Can I stop you, Mr Thomson? You have Scotland-wide priorities, Ms Proctor has priorities right across Grampian and Mr Hosie has priorities throughout the city of Dundee. However, the folks who have businesses in or who live in the Green area of Aberdeen are interested in their little bit. You have talked about communication. A lot of those folks would say that they dinna feel that they are being communicated with particularly well. They feel that they have been unable to influence what you are doing, and the bill will give them the right to do that. Frankly, if you talk to them as you are talking to us about your Scotland-wide priorities, they will say that that communication is of no value to them. How will you ensure that you gain their involvement and ensure that the communication is right for the difficulty that they have instead of talking about your Scotland-wide priorities?

Alan Thomson: We have specific hotspot problems in Aberdeen and we do not yet know what the solution is or how best to resolve them—the issue might be not sewer incapacity but a surface water problem. The key, as with all communities, is to make sure that we give the community named contacts so that they do not have to go through the whole organisation and tell everybody the background to their issue. We try to enable ease of contact so that we can engage with customers. When the fix is not yet known, we always try to put in place interim measures to help customers where we can.

You mentioned Aberdeen, convener, so forgive me for mentioning Glasgow—

The Convener: I am happy—I am not trying to be parochial.

Alan Thomson: It is a good example of our approach, which we are rolling out to other areas. A lot of areas in Glasgow suffered from flooding. Some people said that it was the sewers, others said that it was the surface water and others said that it was the watercourses. The reality was that nobody knew what the problem was. Everybody wanted to pour concrete and come up with a solution, even though it might not have been the best and most sustainable solution. In partnership with Glasgow City Council, SEPA, Clyde Gateway and the then Scottish Enterprise Glasgow, we decided that we would spend money on actually understanding the problem. We created integrated catchment models to understand what happens with certain rainfall events.

The upshot is that we now have that information in Glasgow, and Clyde Gateway is spending £7 million on regional SUDS—sustainable urban drainage system—ponds; we have just announced £250 million to improve the infrastructure in the city of Glasgow; and Glasgow City Council has spent money on flood prevention. Without that information, we would all have been spending money in our own capital programmes. Now that we have the knowledge from the models, we find that the issue is not about putting water in pipes; it is about how we manage the water above the system.

That is a great example, which applies to many communities across Glasgow and in other areas. It shows that, when we get that type of understanding, the solution will be far better for communities and will not just be a patch and repair solution.

The Convener: Mr Hosie, please.

John Hosie: Was the question about outcomes?

The Convener: Yes.

John Hosie: I guess that our guides are the single outcome agreement and the delivery plan, which include matters relating to asset transfer, capacity building and improvement in service delivery. That framework is complementary to our local community planning process. A few years ago, we developed an impact assessment for our local community plans. The next time that we will carry out the assessment will be halfway through our current plans, which run from 2012 to 2017.

We have developed a triangulation system, in which we engage with service planners and providers, the active and engaged community—people who are already involved in their community through community councils, housing groups or other representative structures—and the general public. That is one measure. The last time that we did the assessment, we looked for and could not find any other examples in Scotland of an impact assessment being undertaken of local community plans. The local plans are rolling plans so, as matters relating to asset transfer emerge, they will be incorporated. That system will allow us to measure how effective we are in meeting the objectives and outcomes.

I should say that the plans are based on engagement with local people and do not contain top-down actions. Across the city of Dundee, there are about 900 actions that are based on consultation with local people. We have an obligation to report to those people on the progress that is being made.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): I draw attention to my entry in the register of members’ interests. I need to express my disappointment that North Lanarkshire Council could not send a representative along to speak to the written submission that it made. It will become clear later in the meeting why I am expressing my disappointment in that way.

Is Scottish Water involved in any community planning partnerships or any sub-groups or working groups of community planning partnerships?

Alan Thomson: Yes, we are involved in some but not all of the community planning partnerships. We have written to all 32 council chief executives to indicate our willingness to participate, where appropriate, in community planning partnerships, on water-related issues, anything to do with Scottish Water’s activities, the capital programme or integration. We do not want to go along to meetings just for meetings’ sake and if we are not going to add value. Some local authorities have taken up our offer, but some have not. We are willing to participate, but we must ensure that we have meaningful input in the areas in which we attend.

John Wilson: The reason I ask is that Scottish Water is, as far as I am concerned, crucial, particularly to some of the economic development work that is being done throughout Scotland. It is unfortunate that Scottish Water is not involved in many more community planning partnerships.

However, the question for Ms Proctor and Mr Hosie is whether you see community planning partnerships having an increased role in ensuring that we get greater community empowerment. Should CPPs be assisting communities to identify where community asset transfers should take place, where appropriate? The CPP has an overarching role that brings together a number of different bodies. Do you think that it is the appropriate body to assist communities to take forward community asset transfers, where appropriate?

Judith Proctor: To really support the empowerment of communities, we need to look at the opportunities for leadership that exist at all the different levels that are available to us. Community planning partnerships are a good vehicle for having oversight of an area and a place, and for providing direction and support for better engagement and participation with communities. The leadership role of all the organisations that sit around the CPP table should ensure that all partners are engaged in building capacity and encouraging and supporting engagement.

We should see that in all the layers—again, I bring up integration—from the SOA down to the locality plans that we have to develop. We should see that sort of engagement with communities on service co-production expressed in all the layers, from community planning downwards.

The Convener: When you talk to communities, do you use terms such as “service co-production”?

Judith Proctor: No.

The Convener: No.

Judith Proctor: Well, I do. Although “co-production” is quite a jargonistic term, I think that it is a really good one, and it is one that I use. I acknowledge that it is a jargonistic word, but I think that the sentiment and philosophy underneath it are really sound, because co-production is not about consulting people on a redesign or tweak that we have decided on; when we get underneath it, it is about genuine—

The Convener: I think that the very interesting thing, Ms Proctor—I said this the other week and it was the same last week—is that, if you were to go out into communities and talk in the language that is being used here today and elsewhere, that would be a huge turn-off straight away.

Judith Proctor: Of course.

The Convener: So, in reaching communities and getting the level of engagement that is required, we will have to rethink the terminology and get back to basics in the use of language.

Judith Proctor: Of course.

John Hosie: I agree with that point. When we did the consultation in 2012 to create our most recent local community plans, some issues were raised that were specific to communities in multimember wards and some issues were city wide, such as tackling drug misuse and mental health and wellbeing. The other point that came up was that we should keep things simple and not send out hundreds of leaflets full of text and jargon. We need to do things differently.

To return to Mr Wilson’s question, engaging with communities through community planning partnerships is definitely part of our core business. The way in which the structure has evolved in Dundee means that we have the Dundee partnership, which is the complete community planning partnership, and eight local community planning partnerships, which have local people sitting on them and are well placed to support groups to find a way through the maze. In addition, we have theme groups such as the building stronger communities group, which is one of the places where community asset transfer would be located. The chairs of each of the six regeneration forums in Dundee sit on the building stronger communities group, so we cannot get away with using jargon; the information has to be pretty much factual, straight and understandable. We consistently receive that message.

10:15

John Wilson: An issue that is coming out in the bill involves the right of communities to make an asset transfer request. The bill says that the organisations that currently own the assets or the land have to have “reasonable grounds” not to accept that request. What would be seen as reasonable, from the point of view of members of the panel, with regard to refusing an asset transfer to communities?

Archie MacGregor: Any request would be considered fully. Obviously, to reiterate, we are supportive of the bill. However, in terms of the framework that we consider issues in, we have operational sites that are, in effect, industrial sites where water and waste water are treated. If they are part of our operational infrastructure, they might be serving not just the immediate local community but a vast tract of Scotland. If a community was looking to take over that asset, that would be quite a consideration for us, and we would ask whether that was really appropriate.
We can foresee situations involving not only Scottish Water but any public body in which a community asks whether it can lease or take over areas of ground within a site that are lying unused but which, in asset management plans or business plans, are earmarked for expansion and are simply being kept on hold for future use. Of course, we would approach the request with a flexible mind. If the community was willing to take on the site for only, say, five years and was happy for us to take back the land once we were ready to progress our investment and our expansion plan, there is no reason why we could not come to some arrangement.

Another good example would be assets that carry risks with them. I am thinking of our impounding reservoirs, some of which are close to large built-up areas. In the past 12 months, Scottish Water has taken a decision not to dispose of what we call category A reservoirs, which are those in relation to which, if there were a serious structural failure of the dam, considerable risk would be posed to the communities downstream. We think that we should retain them, as we have expertise in managing reservoirs and in the relevant legislation.

Those are examples of assets in relation to which we would not be minded to grant either a long-term lease or an outright disposal, and something more short term would perhaps be appropriate.

The Convener: I do not want to go into what a category A reservoir is in any great depth at the moment, but perhaps you could send us some details of what that means.

Archie MacGregor: Sure.

Judith Proctor: I echo my colleague's view. From the perspective of NHS Grampian, I believe that every request would be considered. Within the broad range of services that the board delivers, it might be that some services in relation to which there is a request for a transfer are not actually owned by the board—I am thinking about some primary care premises that are owned by general practitioners or independent contractors. Obviously, they would not be included in the ambit of the legislation.

The risk-based approach that Mr MacGregor mentioned is important, as is the need to focus on outcomes when we consider requests—is the request going to deliver good outcomes for the community?

John Hosie: The question was about when we would refuse or defer a request. A starting point would be to offer support to the group. The way in which we have developed our outline framework for assessment means that 50 per cent weighting is given to community benefit. As a starting point, we would help groups that were making requests to see what that entailed, how they could evidence need and how they could consult their communities to ensure that there was collective ownership.

Our starting point would be positive rather than negative, and support would be built into that approach in a range of ways. However, by the time the request came to the community asset transfer steering group, which we have in place with different council departments, we would need to risk assess it from the point of view of governance capacity, community benefit and financial planning. Support would have been built in before that, but I guess that there may be circumstances in which a starting point would be a short lease rather than outright ownership, depending on the capacity of the group. We would see the starting point as being very different, though.

Stuart McMillan (West Scotland) (SNP): Good morning, panel.

I have a few questions following on from Alex Rowley's a few moments ago, and the previous question. What discussions about the bill have you had, or are you aware have taken place in your organisations, with trade unions?

Judith Proctor: I am not aware that we have had any discussions yet with our staff-side representatives. In NHS Grampian, in common with other boards in Scotland, there is a range of guidance and statutory relationships with our unions. There will be opportunities through our partnership forums to have those discussions. I am not aware of any discussions, although that is not to say that they are not taking place.

Alan Thomson: I am unaware of any specific discussions about the bill.

John Hosie: Sorry, could you repeat the question?

Stuart McMillan: Are you aware of any discussions that have taken place between your organisation and trade unions regarding the bill?

John Hosie: Not to my knowledge.

Stuart McMillan: We have received evidence a number of times from local groups that have had something to contribute but have felt as if they have been stonewalled, which makes it quite difficult for them to get involved. I have heard that in the region that I represent, too. Although the bill is designed to open that up, a discussion that I had with a senior public representative a couple of years ago indicated that, if there was a more open approach, it would have staffing implications for that public body.
Section 19(3)(c) contains various points to open up discussions, such as economic development and regeneration. Section 19(5) says:

“The authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it.”

Returning to the initial question about trade unions, if trade union representatives said to you that a more open approach could lead to a public authority losing staff, would you consider that to be a reasonable ground for refusing to enter into discussions?

John Hosie: No. We live in tough economic times and how we utilise resources needs to be carefully measured. If something is a community priority, we need to shift our priorities to support it. I guess that, if they are effective, support and engagement do not come cheap. They are time and staff intensive, and there are implications for how we manage staff workloads. However, that is not to say that they are not a priority and that we cannot look at what the priorities are and match the resources accordingly.

Alan Thomson: We remain open to any approach from communities. Certainly the requests that I am aware of to date tend to be about specific pieces of land or about assets that people may want to buy or lease. The requests have not tended to veer into any form of consequences for staff or internally to Scottish Water. However, we certainly remain open to engaging with third sector or other community groups.

A few community groups have thought about the possibility of training people to become water ambassadors at some of our more historic assets. We remain open to that possibility and we want to engage, because if it leads to a better outcome for communities and for assets that we utilise or no longer utilise, it is in everybody’s interests. It goes back to the point that, if it is common sense for us and for our customers to do it, why would we not do it? However, to date, requests have tended to be site specific.

Judith Proctor: The panel will be aware that NHS staff terms and conditions are nationally negotiated and we are governed by a whole range of regulations that would come into effect if a significant change was expected through the transfer of a service or an asset that would have an impact on staff.

Our well-established partnership working with trade unions would be a key focus and they would have to be partners in such situations. However, I echo what my colleagues on the panel have said. We need to start with a positive view of what a community group is trying to achieve through the asset transfer and how we could support the outcomes that it is trying to achieve, and then our staff-side partners need to be key partners in those discussions.

I can envisage the service change and asset transfer that might lead to those discussions. If we take a positive perspective that we are trying to achieve outcomes, perhaps the opportunity for a board or a public body is to ensure that within the parameters of the staff terms and conditions, we are able to deliver that service in a publicly owned building. It is about that partnership work, with that positive focus on better outcomes for people.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): Returning to the issue of capacity within communities, I note that a number of examples have been given. However, what springs most readily to mind for me is the two save our school campaigns against school closures in my constituency—one in a regeneration community and one in an affluent area—and the contrast between the approaches that were taken.

One campaign was able to call on parents and individuals in the community who had strong professional backgrounds such as doctors and planners; people in the other community required a level of intensive support to put together their campaign and marshal their arguments. That strikes me as being the kind of approach that will be commonplace as the community empowerment agenda moves forward. What role will your organisation play in those communities of most need, where the activism and enthusiasm are undoubtedly there but perhaps that professional expertise to do things such as putting together a business case does not exist? What will the role of your organisation be in supporting those communities to ensure that they can take full advantage of the legislation?

John Hosie: It fits neatly because our resources are deployed in areas of greatest need to try to plug the inequalities gap, which is a long-term aspiration. Where we concentrate our resources, it is a natural role for us to support community groups. When groups have a single issue to do with a school, we need to be careful because our employer is the city council and we are talking about the education department. We can go only so far in the level of support that we give, but we can certainly support groups to campaign and point them in the right direction.

It is our core business to build capacity among groups of people who happen to reside in the areas of greatest deprivation. That is negotiated, and sometimes it involves a balance between challenge and support. Sometimes we have to challenge groups to see things slightly differently, while supporting them on their journey. That is our core business.
10:30

Judith Proctor: That area has been noted as one of risk and concern in many of the responses that the committee has received. There are well-placed communities, with a lot of natural resources, that become very much involved and seize the opportunities, and there are those that do not have the capacity or capability and which lose the opportunity if not encouraged.

There is a role for community planning partnerships, with their place-shaping and identification work. Their boards’ role is to support an understanding of where communities of deprivation are. Sometimes, they will be geographically placed, but boards and public bodies have a role in understanding deprived communities of interest and groups, as well as communities, that are disadvantaged, and in ensuring that they are able to participate. There is a focus on locality working down at the level of general practices, teams, social workers and third sector partners, which builds on work that has already been happening in the communities concerned.

Archie MacGregor: My area of expertise is asset disposals and transfers. Scottish Water has been very proactive in working, in particular, with groups with aspirations to take over some of our underused or unused assets. There is an example in Dundee, where a group has had aspirations for several years to take over a historic building. That group has had capacity and capability issues. We could have walked away and ignored the group, pointing out that it did not have a business plan—obviously, this was before the bill was introduced. In fact, we have engaged proactively with Dundee City Council, which has experience of working with community groups. The group will rely on some lottery funding. It was struggling to put together some of the business case requirements to support a lottery bid, but the council used its experience of similar community projects.

We acted as a facilitator as well as the asset owner, producing the right package of information to help with the project. I am pleased to say that it looks as if the outcome will be in keeping with what we, as asset owner, hope the project will do, as well as with the community group’s aspirations.

Mark McDonald: There are examples, including in my constituency, of community empowerment occurring without legislation being in place. I think that the bill is necessary, because such cases can often be exceptions rather than the rule.

Where your organisations have had positive experiences, with communities taking on assets or becoming more involved in how things operate, is there a role in connecting up communities, so that the ones that have had positive experiences and are doing good things can be put in easy contact with others? We are often bad at sharing best practice across Scotland. We are also bad at making small local authority or community jumps between areas. Is there a role for your organisations in ensuring that communities are better connected in that way?

The Convener: We are now against the clock, so I ask for brief answers if possible, please.

Judith Proctor: On that notion of sharing best practice, communities that are experiencing something that is difficult and challenging and new for them can work with places that have been through the process and have experienced some of the pitfalls and challenges, so that they do not get repeated. That means having a network where communities can be supported. Organisations such as the one that I represent can also be supported in this regard. That would be welcome.

Alan Thomson: I firmly agree with that. We can learn to exchange best practice and share some of the things that went right—or did not go right. For example, we took a lot of learning from the major planning application for the Katrine water treatment plant in Glasgow. It was a big application, which involved a lot of consideration of the community, planning gain and all sorts of things. When it came to the application for the major Glencorse water treatment works outside Edinburgh, we thought about what we had learned and encouraged community groups and councillors to exchange the information so that we could get a better outcome. We got planning for Glencorse in 10 months, partly because we had learned from what had not gone well in the earlier application.

I go round the country and speak to communities. Early engagement is important and people can come forward with good ideas, but if we do not think that what they have suggested will happen, it is as well to say that to the community right from the beginning. If people’s expectations are raised and they form groups and so on, but then the answer is a no, there can be a lot of negativity. There are benefits in giving good, concise information to communities at an early stage about what is likely to happen in the longer term. It is about being open and honest with people right from the start.

John Hosie: I will give two examples. We have regeneration forums in six of the eight most deprived wards in Dundee. The forums elect 15 local people to make decisions about funding allocations. The chairs meet every month with a common agenda, and they find the meeting valuable.

We get feedback from people throughout the city who want us to create opportunities for them to meet people in other parts of the city. As a result of that, the Dundee partnership runs a community conference every six months. It is not for professionals and elected members; it is for local people who sit on community councils, housing groups, youth groups and whatever. The agenda is theirs, not ours. We have had successful conferences in the centre of Dundee on Saturday mornings, which suits people, and people have talked about welfare reform, asset transfer, tackling poverty and so on. We have had positive feedback about the connections that have been made.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): I am interested in asset transfer. Do you have a register of your assets? Is it available to the public? Is there an appeals process if someone does not agree with a transfer? For example, you talked about people taking on property on a short lease. Is there an appeals process in that regard?

The Convener: Let me add to that question. Do you have a full and comprehensive asset register?

John Hosie: Yes. It is online on Dundee City Council’s website. We have just agreed to share it through the local community planning partnerships. We are doing as much as we can do to raise awareness of the opportunities that are available.

We do not have an appeals process. We are in the early stages of implementing the strategy, and we would seek advice on the matter, as appropriate.

Archie MacGregor: We have a register of all our operational and non-operational assets.

The Convener: Is it full and comprehensive?

Archie MacGregor: I do not think that any organisation, particularly a nationwide one such as Scottish Water, could be absolutely sure of having everything on its register. We have inherited assets from predecessor organisations—

The Convener: That always amazes me. I ken everything that I own. [Laughter.]

Archie MacGregor: Certainly all our key assets are listed. There are thousands and thousands of assets on the asset register.

Judith Proctor: The board is required to compile and publish a property and asset management strategy, so that is available. I understand that the strategy includes the physical assets and their condition—

The Convener: The board has a strategy, but does it have a full and comprehensive register?

Judith Proctor: Yes, it does, and it is required to be published. All boards have one.
Thank you for the opportunity to make a presentation to the committee. Our organisation welcomes the fact that a bill dealing with community empowerment is on the table. We know from our work that more connected and empowered communities are more in control of their future and destiny and that they experience better outcomes, and that is why we should have this bill. Although we see some merit in each of its parts, we will judge it not only on how it further empowers already empowered communities but how it tips the balance towards the most disempowered communities—those that experience the most significant inequalities—to ensure that every community benefits from its measures.

As matters stand, the bill can be strengthened, and we have worked with a number of organisations to that end. If some of our issues can be picked up and the bill itself can be strengthened, it will do more to tackle some of the deep inequalities.

Martin Doherty (Volunteer Scotland): I, too, thank the committee for the opportunity to give evidence. One of our gravest concerns is the lack of reference in the bill to the individual—the volunteer—who seeks to empower both thematic and geographic communities.

We are looking for the opportunity to promote the idea of improving the national performance framework. There should be some recognition of the impact of volunteering across the framework to ensure that outcomes related to volunteering can be properly measured and that our knowledge and, critically, the role of volunteering in our communities can be enhanced.

Linda Gillespie (Development Trusts Association Scotland): On a point of clarification, convener, you referred to me as the programme manager of the Development Trusts Association Scotland. In fact, I am the programme manager for the community ownership support service, which operates out of the association.

The Convener: Thank you—that is indeed very useful for us to know.

Thank you for those opening statements. Mr Parker gave us a brief overview of why he thinks the powers in the bill are necessary. What do the other witnesses think? Are public authorities ready for the powers? We welcome the bill as it will help to reduce that inconsistency.

John Glover (Community Land Advisory Service): Thank you for the invitation to speak to the committee. The powers in the bill are useful and necessary. Given that I am involved as much in brokering temporary community use of assets as I am in brokering permanent transfers of assets, I very much welcome the fact that the asset transfer requests provisions talk about not only ownership or leases but management and use. That is important. For that matter, I also agree with the Government's policy memorandum that not all communities are ready to take on ownership.

I am also in favour of the approach taken in the bill because it could bring in a lot more land. After all, the issue is not just the nature of the communities but the nature of the land. As the previous panel touched on, even land that is earmarked for a different use in the long term should be made available to the community in the short term. There are good practice examples of that going on; however, it is also very evident that a lot of land that could be used by communities has had a fence put around it and is lying vacant. I therefore very much support how the provisions will encourage meanwhile use of land.

Are public authorities ready for the powers? I think not. Again, I can highlight good practice examples such as Glasgow City Council's stalled spaces scheme, which is being promoted across Scotland, and I know of successful community interactions with various landowners, but my impression is that more work needs to be done to get public authorities into a mindset where it becomes second nature to make land available to communities.

Maggie Paterson (Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland): Good morning. Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland welcomes both the opportunity to give evidence this morning and the bill itself.

We have members from all 32 local authorities, and I agree with the statement in the policy memorandum that the experience of and progress towards community engagement and empowerment vary considerably across Scotland. We welcome the bill as it will help to reduce that inconsistency.

Readiness for the bill also varies. A number of communities are very strong; they are aware of themselves as assets and aware that they can make an important contribution. Others will need support to be able to take advantage of the rights that are being offered through the bill.

The same applies to public authorities. Some have experience and practice that is in line with the bill and already empowers and engages... communities. However, practice varies; it is not consistent.

Robin Parker: I will add to what I said in my opening remarks and comment particularly on part 3 of the bill.

The bill will enable us to realise much more that participation and involvement in decision making are a right of communities. As things stand, such involvement is understood as best practice and it is something that most public bodies endeavour to achieve. Part 3 or something like it can help to create a situation in which a community can turn round and say, “No, it’s our right to be involved in this decision. We think we’ve got something to bring to it, and we want to be involved in the decision-making process.”

Given our point of view as a children’s organisation, I should mention in particular that involvement in decisions that are relevant to a young person is one of the rights established in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which ministers now have a duty to take into account as a result of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.

I have another point about why the bill is needed. Some people have said that legislation cannot do it all; that is absolutely right, and an element of capacity building and so on needs to go alongside the provisions in the bill. However, there are certain things that the bill can bring. First, as we have outlined in our written submission, strengthening the community planning part will ensure that community empowerment is seen as one of the purposes of public bodies.

Secondly, the reality is that public bodies hold a lot of power in Scotland, and it is quite right that they should. After all, local authorities have elected members and so on as a result of democratic processes. However, the bill can ensure that we hand over some of that power and involve communities day to day in the decision making of public bodies. After all, the people who use public services are above all others the experts in how they can be improved.

The Convener: You mentioned participation requests, Mr Parker. The bill states that, for an organisation to make a participation request, it has to be a constituted body. Let me throw something at you. We know that there have been difficulties around care leavers, and we legislated recently to improve that situation. How do you see a group of care leavers, for example, getting together to challenge a public body and put forward a participation request to improve the services that they get?

Robin Parker: I am pleased that you have used that example, first because we work closely with care leavers and secondly because it is one of the examples that we have been thinking through. The Scottish Government consulted a number of times before the bill reached the Parliament, and thinking about examples such as the one you have mentioned, I note that in one of the first instances of consultation we said strongly that we were keen for the bill to support communities of interest as well as geographic communities. We are pleased that the bill reflects that.

As for the fact that a community body has to be constituted, we would very much welcome clarification from the Government—perhaps the committee can help with this—on how constituted it thinks that a body has to be and whether that needs to be brought out more either on the face of the bill or through guidance. We would like that condition to be applied flexibly so that a group would not need to be constituted formally.

11:00

The Convener: Thanks. The definition in the bill as introduced seems to be pretty loose, so clarification is probably required in that respect.

Mr Doherty, you talked about individuals. Given that volunteers often work on an individual basis, the constitutional aspect might, as with the issue that I raised with Mr Parker, pose some difficulties. Might there be opportunities for volunteers to get together to try to increase their influence in terms of participation?

Martin Doherty: There would be such an opportunity if formal volunteering levels were not flattening, which is what, as the Scottish household survey substantiates, they have been doing for nearly a decade in this country. I can give the committee some instances of that in areas that members might cover as MSPs.

Volunteering levels in Aberdeen city, which you and Mr McDonald cover, have dropped from 33 to 27 per cent since 2007. Although that might not seem substantial, it can be, given the relative figures for volunteering and the inequality in the area. In East Lothian, the formal volunteering rate went down from 37 to 32 per cent. Fife is one of the areas where the rate went up, rising from 22 to 28 per cent. The rate in Glasgow follows many of the city’s own indicators and has fallen from 25 to 24 per cent. In Inverclyde, the rate fell from 29 to 24 per cent; in North Lanarkshire, from 24 to 21 per cent; and in West Lothian, from 29 to 26 per cent.

I mention those figures because the challenge for us, as a national body for volunteering, and for policy makers is to stop them falling. If there is not at least some stabilisation or increase in the number of people identifying as volunteers, we will not have an empowered community. For us, that rings alarm bells for not only this bill but a range of policy agendas, including the integration of health and social care, areas of which rely heavily on volunteering activity.

We therefore have grave concerns. We think that there are opportunities, but there needs to be a wee bit of clarity.

The Convener: You have opened up a can of worms there.

Martin Doherty: That was my intention.

The Convener: Before taking supplementary questions from Mark McDonald and Alex Rowley, I want to ask a question of my own. One of the things that the committee heard on its recent visit to the Western Isles—

Martin Doherty: Thankfully, no one from the Western Isles is here.

The Convener: Almost all the people in that community do some form of volunteering, but they do not see it in those terms. With some of the statistics that you have given us, which as you have rightly pointed out are from the Scottish household survey, might it be the case that some folks who answered the survey’s questions did not actually realise that they were volunteers?

Martin Doherty: There is an element of that. Around 30,000 people participated in the survey in 2007. The number who participate now has fallen slightly but, on the other hand, the methodology has greatly improved, and I am certainly not calling into question the SHS, which I think is a very robust piece of work. Indeed, at this moment, it is also the only piece of work that we have on this issue. We in Volunteer Scotland are trying to work with the Scottish household survey team to try to improve the questions, and we would certainly like to debate with them the idea of informal volunteering.

The recognised figure for formal volunteering in Eilean Siar—the Western Isles—is 57 per cent. The area has pockets of deprivation but it is very rural—indeed, more so than the Highlands—and an island community. That volunteering figure speaks volumes about the opportunities. If someone lives, say, at the top of the Western Isles and the NHS needs someone to clip their toenails because they cannot reach their toes—please forgive the example—they will get a volunteer from Stornoway to go and do it.

Mark McDonald: I am interested in the statistics. As you have said, the SHS is all that we have to go on. From your experiences and discussions with voluntary sector partners around Scotland, can you tell us whether what you have just described is replicated in communities in other areas? Many local authorities have areas of deprivation and areas of affluence, and it would be interesting to find out whether people in areas of affluence are more likely to volunteer than people in areas of deprivation, or vice versa.

Martin Doherty: The link between deprivation and low levels of volunteering is very clear: areas with high levels of deprivation have low levels of volunteering. There are issues around social capacity and social networking—and I use that term in its broadest sense. However, going back to Mr McDonald’s earlier comments about communities sharing skills, I think that you will find a lot of skilled people in communities of high deprivation, but what is lacking are the opportunities to use that skill and to be listened to.

Over the past 10 years, there has been substantial investment in the third sector, but for Volunteer Scotland it is not about just the third sector but all sectors—both private and public—that use volunteers. You have just heard from witnesses from the NHS, but I did not hear them mention volunteers. You also heard from witnesses from Scottish Water, which uses volunteers at some of its reservoirs. Local authorities talk about asset portfolios, and I would be interested to know whether they list the volunteers that they all use. Some local authorities do not even know how many volunteers they have in their asset portfolios.

Alex Rowley: I am pleased to hear the figures for Fife. The only criticism that I have made—and I have made it over a number of years now—is that Fife Council is pretty poor at engaging with third sector organisations. We tend to associate volunteering with the third sector when, as you have pointed out, that is perhaps not the right approach.

How do you see the bill supporting the involvement of more people at a voluntary level? What aspects of the bill are good? More important, what do you think needs to be added to it?

Martin Doherty: For us, as a national body, the bill is a step forward. We were told that the bill is very much a formal bill about the practicalities. As we recommend in our submission, one of the major things that we would have liked to see in it is early involvement. You spoke earlier to the public bodies about community bodies, and you should get the community bodies in before you decide what an appeals process is. You need to get them to help you design the process of applying for an asset transfer, and you need to involve individual volunteering organisations in the design of local approaches to community asset transfer. That would be a practical step forward.

The Convener: I do not want to stay on the subject of volunteering the whole time, but there is one key thing that we need to know from you, Mr Doherty, before I bring in other members. It seems that, in some places, folk are feart to volunteer in... case they lose benefits as a result of the UK Government's welfare reform policies. Has that had an effect on the number of volunteers, particularly in our more deprived communities?

Martin Doherty: There is anecdotal evidence from third sector interfaces—I am aware that you do not like jargon, convener; I am talking about the old councils for voluntary services, volunteer centres and social enterprises—that they are seeing increased numbers of volunteers. However, we would need to get the numbers from them directly, as they are difficult to get hold of.

We are starting to work closely with not just Voluntary Action Scotland but the Department for Work and Pensions on mitigating as much as possible the impact on potential volunteers. We want to ensure that they are being given the right resources and that they are being signposted in the right direction rather than its being a case of, “I’m here because I’ve been told to be.”

Robin Parker: I want to chip in briefly on Mr Rowley’s question. On section 17 of the bill, which deals with participatory requests, we would hope that, if a group of people who were not yet constituted were to come forward, most local authorities would provide them with support and assistance to become constituted and fulfil all the requirements. However, something in the bill that proofed that and ensured that there was some duty on the public body to support such a group in coming together and making something like a participation request would be a beneficial addition.

Anne McTaggart: Welcome, panel. I have a few questions. I might dot all over the place. My first question is for Maggie Paterson. In your submission to the committee, you said that the bill’s provisions “do not directly facilitate community empowerment.” Throughout your submission you talk about national standards. Can you tell me how they could co-relate and work together?

Maggie Paterson: I assume that you are talking about the national standards for community engagement and how all that works.

Anne McTaggart: Yes.

Maggie Paterson: The bill does not, in and of itself, facilitate community empowerment. With regard to sharing power, the bill still puts the community planning partnership or the public authority in the position of responding to a request, rather than its being something in which it participates. I agree with Martin Doherty that the process for participation is decided by the public body.

The standards for community engagement talk about communities being involved at the outset, and it should be clear what the process of engagement is and what is there for discussion. That is the kind of thing that we mean when we talk about progressing empowerment and standards.

Does that answer your question?

Anne McTaggart: Yes. We have heard a lot that less-deprived communities will suffer as a result of the bill. What will your organisation do to combat that?

The Convener: I will add to Anne McTaggart’s question. You represent a national body: Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland. The committee has visited many places and we know that in some areas there is good practice and that there are interventions in deprived communities that help to build capacity, but in other areas that is flat. How do your organisation and the folks whom you represent ensure that best practice is exported across the country?

Maggie Paterson: A key purpose of Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland is to bring together the community learning and development workforce to share best practice, so that in my area I become aware of the good practice in someone else’s area and become aware of the issues that people face. It helps people to learn from others’ experience of overcoming barriers. That is how we do it.

The committee will be aware of the Requirements for Community Learning and Development (Scotland) Regulations 2013. A key aspect of that is about identifying communities’ needs for community learning and development. Across our membership that is a key focus, at the moment. We will support our partners and encourage our membership to use the regulations as a way of identifying need in a range of communities.

The need for support in one community might differ from that in another, but the regulations require authorities to identify need and to explain why certain needs are not being met. As an organisation, we will encourage our membership to be aware of the bill’s implications and of where we can play a role in supporting identification of need for community learning and development—for capacity, in this case—so that people can access their rights under the bill.

As an organisation, our purpose is to share practice and to support the implementation of legislation such as the CLD regulations and the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, when it is enacted.
11:15

Mark McDonald: I asked the previous panel about community capacity and the difference between affluent and deprived communities and the level of support that are likely to require. I do not think that any community is without capacity or ability, but the issue is how that is channelled, harnessed and supported. Do we need to identify somebody whose job it is to support communities? There is a risk that if we do not do that, it will become nobody’s job.

Linda Gillespie: Our community ownership support service has just under 400 inquiries coming through. Mark McDonald’s point about affluent and less affluent communities is well made. Affluent communities get through quickly and have access to mixed skills in their communities. They speak the language of the public sector and of funders.

In general, we find that communities react to threat and opportunity—when there is the threat of closure or when an opportunity emerges. In less affluent communities, exactly the same applies. Through our work with local authorities, we have costed the asset transfer strategies. That is an internal document but, broadly, if a body was to access grant funding to help it through the process, the amount would be in the region of £20,000 to £25,000. If a body has access to skills in its community, it can go through an asset transfer process, just accessing the professional services that it needs, for about £12,000 or £13,000. So, there is a financial element. Straight support is needed for less affluent communities, whereas more affluent communities just get through the process.

John Glover: I agree with everything that Linda Gillespie has just said. The message from the previous panel—that more disadvantaged communities need more support—is one that I hear from the network that I am in. I agree with Linda Gillespie’s point about language. That applies to officialdom and to trying to understand the bill, which is not an easy read for someone who is not used to dealing with legislation.

A lot of groups have difficulty with just finding the right person to speak to in a local authority. Therefore, I am very much an enthusiast for the idea of having a named officer in local authorities with whom communities can engage. All local authorities have an allotments officer, who is often the person that the groups that I deal with are interested in, but there is no consistency across the 32 local authorities on which department deals with the issue—sometimes it is the estates department and sometimes the parks department. There is no consistency among councils on whom a community should speak to if it wants to take on a bit of land.

The Convener: You are concentrating on councils, but the bill covers other public bodies. Should other public bodies have named officers?

John Glover: Certainly the major landholder bodies should. For instance, I would support the proposal for named contacts for Scottish Water and NHS bodies. However, I am not sure that having such a person would be appropriate for some of the more minor bodies.

Maggie Paterson: On participation requests, the bill is quite difficult to assess, and it would be particularly difficult for less affluent communities. The process itself creates another barrier for less affluent communities, if that is what we are calling them. The participation request provisions give me the right to say, “Can I participate in your process?”, but if that process is complicated and inaccessible, having the right to participate in it is only one step forward. I might also need support to access the process and take advantage of it.

That is particularly difficult for less affluent communities. For example, if I had a concern about the process that had been outlined for me to participate in, I would have to put that concern in writing. That is a barrier for me from the start. It is a barrier for some communities, and there is a disadvantage there.

The Convener: Is not that where your members come in to help folk? I am keen to stress that, although we are talking about affluent communities and less affluent communities, there are some folks in those less affluent communities who are as articulate and capable as folks in affluent communities, if not more so.

Maggie Paterson: That is why I said what I said about the terminology that is being used, although what the convener says is certainly the case. The capacities of communities vary not only in relation to their affluence. Nonetheless, there are communities that would find it difficult to access their rights and which need support. The purpose of our organisation is to support our membership to give the best-quality and best-informed directed support that it can. It is clear that resources are limited across our membership and across other public authorities to do that.

Robin Parker: I absolutely agree with the convener’s point. When we looked at the Scottish Government’s last consultation on the bill last Christmas, we put together—with some of our front-line staff—things that, from our experience, matter in community empowerment. One of those things is always to take a strengths-based approach and to recognise the assets that already exist in a community.

I think that Mr McDonald said to the previous panel that specific expertise is sometimes needed, especially perhaps for some of the later provisions. in the bill, such as those on asset transfer, which Barnardo’s is probably less familiar with. Such expertise is needed to allow take-up of the provisions.

We feel that we have expertise, from our experience, in respect of participation requests. There is something missing from the bill in terms of there being a duty placed on public bodies to support groups that come forward to go through the process. I am caricaturing the relevant section a bit, but it currently reads a little bit as though there is an opportunity for community groups to come forward to ask for things and say what they would like to do, but all the decision making is still on the public body side. In the work that we did with Oxfam and the Poverty Alliance, we thought that that section absolutely needs an appeal mechanism that would ensure that it is not just public bodies that that will decide on how the process will happen.

Finally, it is perhaps a bit more difficult to build the need for a named person into a bill, but something could certainly make it clear to public bodies that community empowerment is part of their purpose. That would be really beneficial. It could be made clear which organisation does that.

Maggie Paterson mentioned the national standards for community engagement. Their being put on a statutory basis in the bill would really help. A lot of really good consultation by public bodies takes place, but putting the national standards on a statutory basis would make it clear that high-quality and genuine involvement should always take place.

Martin Doherty: I back up what Maggie Paterson and Robin Parker said. A named person really should be a strategic element of every local authority, community planning partnership and NHS board as part of their vision for how they will involve either individuals through volunteering, or community volunteering that involves organisations. Having another named person on top of 32 local authorities, 15 health boards, our local authorities—I cannot remember how many of those we have—and all the other public bodies would not be of benefit to anybody, but all public bodies should be fully cognisant of the powers in the bill, what it means for them, and how it will be implemented in their physical day-to-day activity. When someone picks up the phone and receives a request about an asset transfer, they should know what that involves, and they should know that it relates to them, because their organisation wants to empower communities and to make them healthier, more sustainable and more resilient. That means ensuring that that is in the culture of organisations; it is not necessarily about naming specific individuals.

I would back up Maggie Paterson with regard to the participation request. If communities and individuals are not involved at the beginning, you might as well not bother. If the aim is to design a participation request, my advice is that it be designed around the people who need it, if you are proceeding with any element of that. The more you do to empower people at that early stage, the fewer problems you will have down the line with governance processes, and the more tangible your outcomes will be. That is why we would really like to see a national performance framework in terms of volunteering.

Mark McDonald: Perhaps I can crystallise that with an example. Before I got involved in elected politics, I was involved with a group of sports clubs, which had come together with a view to taking on an area of land and developing a sporting facility there. The convener will be familiar with it.

The Convener: All too familiar.

Mark McDonald: Because the land was held by the local authority, there was a view from council officers that they did not want to be seen to be too involved with giving support for a business-case grant application and so on, because they would then have a role to play in asset disposal and asset transfer. That led the group to fall into the trap that many groups fall into, with self-proclaimed experts in how to get funding and how to approach things attaching themselves to the group and offering what was, in fact, poor advice. That, in turn, led to things not really moving forward at all. Lo and behold—nothing has happened.

Situations in which there is such a vacuum undoubtedly exist. There might be a conflict of interests if a body gets too involved in providing support for community initiatives, because of its role in the transfer of an asset. Should we therefore have more robust guidance about whom communities can approach, and guidance for public bodies so that they can advise communities that, although they cannot be the organisation to provide the support that they need, there are others that they can approach for that advice and support? That would prevent scenarios such as the one that I described.

The Convener: That was a very long question. I would appreciate briefer answers if possible, please.

Martin Doherty: Talk about me opening up a can of worms! That question opens up various issues for community groups and, I recognise, for public bodies, including cost implications. Nevertheless, there has been substantial investment, both under the present Administration and under previous Administrations, in third sector support for that type of approach.

My approach would be more about how we collaborate. How are we working together in the 32 community planning partnerships to ensure that groups are supported? A substantial amount of work is being undertaken by the community planning partnerships. They need to adopt a more collaborative approach in order to ensure that communities are involved and supported and that there is less duplication.

For public bodies that might feel put off about being involved in providing support during a community transfer, openness and transparency might be the way to tackle that. If bodies are open and transparent, I cannot imagine there being any reason why they would not want to support a community group of which they are supportive.

The Convener: So, is there a certain amount of risk aversion and duplication?

Martin Doherty: I would say so.

Linda Gillespie: The example that Mark McDonald gave is interesting. Over the past year, there has been quite a shift. I know that most of my examples are based on local authorities, but more than half of Scotland’s local authorities now have asset transfer strategies in place, with decision making by different groups.

There is some very good practice. East Ayrshire Council, for instance, has brought together teams of officers to support community groups through asset transfer. That is quite different from the decision making within the council. The South Lanarkshire Council approach brings together external bodies to support community groups as they go through asset transfer. The situation is beginning to improve.

As regards the bodies that do not have the required range of skills available to them compared with local authorities, their approach to the asset transfer process—when they are not necessarily in a position to assess various aspects of it—remains to be developed.

11:30

Maggie Paterson: The bulk of the members of Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland are local authority employees. The conflict of interests that was mentioned has, historically, been a potential issue for our capacity building workers and community workers, but it has probably declined over time.

As an organisation, our role is to support community capacity building staff, to affirm that their role is supporting the community to take actions and to progress issues that are theirs, rather than those of the worker, and to try to create a division or wall between their role as local authority employees and the wishes of the community group, which go in a direction that affects other parts of the local authority. Professional practice has developed along those lines.

To respond to Mark McDonald’s question about capacity building for asset transfer requests, our workforce would recognise that we do not necessarily have all the skills to support community groups to progress such requests and would call in and facilitate a range of support for those community groups by other local organisations, such as the CVS. Indeed, Linda Gillespie’s organisation—the Development Trusts Association Scotland—came and spoke to our membership so that we would be aware of the support and services that are available nationally to groups that want to go down the asset transfer route.

John Glover: I agree with what other witnesses have said about conflict of interests. The reality is that, if local authority or other public body officials are trying to support a community group, they may find themselves having a conflict of interests. In almost every case of asset transfer, there will be a degree of negotiation, but one cannot really negotiate with oneself. If we are negotiating the terms of a lease, we need two informed parties to have a dialogue about that.

There is a need for support services for communities outwith the public sector landowners. The service that Linda Gillespie and her colleagues supply and, within its limited remit, the service that I supply are needed and will need to be developed. Once the bill is passed and as we work towards commencement, we will need to work up the third sector support services to ensure that we are ready to hit the ground running on asset transfer and participation requests.

Robin Parker: One thing that always matters in any type of community empowerment right across the board and across all the provisions in the bill is that we are clear about the agendas of the parties to a discussion. That is always important. All the cards have to be on the table: otherwise, it is not an empowering engagement for either side.

Other witnesses probably have more expertise to bring to the discussion on the asset transfer measures in the bill. Conflicts of interests are much more of an issue with such matters, because they are much more of a legal dialogue and outcome. It is a little bit less of an issue with the participation request provisions, which are much more about co-production and look towards organisations getting alongside each other and taking decisions together.
Cameron Buchanan: Mr Glover, you say in your submission:

“Nothing in the Bill as introduced does anything to promote meanwhile community use of privately owned land.”

Are you advocating that communities should be allowed to purchase or lease privately owned land? I did not quite understand your point.

John Glover: I used the expression “meanwhile ... use” in the context of temporary use. I was talking about privately owned land that might be land banked for future housing but which is not being built on at the moment. Although the bill extends the right to buy, if land is intended for housing, it will probably not be in the public interest for the community to buy it. The bill allows participation requests and asset transfer requests to be made to devolved public sector authorities, but there is nothing in it that will increase the chances of a private sector landowner agreeing to lease or to license land temporarily to the community.

Although there are a few shining examples of good practice, my general experience is that there is a reluctance on the part of landowners to let communities use their land temporarily. There are various reasons for that. There are issues to do with the planning system: landowners may be concerned that they will prejudice their long-term planning use for the land. There are certainly valid concerns about whether a landowner will get their land back if they let a community group on to it. If they agree on a three-year lease, for example, will the community group leave voluntarily at the end of the three years? If not, what reputational damage will the landowner suffer if they have to go through legal processes to regain possession?

There are issues to do with the law of leases that scare people off—in particular, the processes for terminating leases are really quite obscure. Also, there is the issue of risk aversion—land professionals such as surveyors and lawyers may well say to their employers, “Don’t let the community on to your land because it will just cause you problems.” Another issue is contamination—people have concerns about where liabilities for remediation may lie. A range of things could be done through legislation—not necessarily in this bill—to promote more community use of privately owned land.

The Convener: Many of those issues are outwith the scope of the bill, so could you restrict your next question to the bill, please, Cameron?

Cameron Buchanan: Certainly.

There appears to be no appeal mechanism. Are you in favour of an appeal mechanism if requests are denied?

John Glover: If you will permit me to give a fairly technical answer to that, I thought that the bill was satisfactory because, although there is no appeal provision on the face of the bill, normal administrative law will still apply. We are looking at discretionary decisions by councils, so if a council makes an irrational decision, that will be challengeable under normal administrative law, without the need for a special appeal process. In considering that point during the last Government consultation on the bill, I could not think of a way of improving on what the common law already provides in terms of an appeal process.

Alex Rowley: My question is about participation requests and how seriously local government, for example, will take the process and what priority it will have. I suspect that if we went into a lot of communities right now and talked about outcomes, even many of the community groups would not be that up on what the outcomes are—

John Glover: if, indeed, there are any local outcomes. Local authorities are under immense pressure and their social work and education budgets are overspent—Fife Council is projecting that it will have to make £70 million in service cuts over the next wee while, for example—so CLD might be seen as one of the Cinderella services. Given that, does the bill need to go further and force community planning partners to engage more with communities, particularly in looking at local outcomes plans?

Martin Doherty: Collaboration differs among community planning partnerships and it involves the relationships with NHS boards and other public bodies. The sooner individuals or groups are involved in the planning process, the better the process will become and the easier it will be to design services that meet the community’s needs—not the needs of the public sector, the third sector or the private sector. If a service is designed around a community, it will meet the community’s need, which is a good thing.

Alex Rowley: I do not disagree; I am totally committed to the principle. However, the current financial climate and difficulties mean that local authorities have scarce resources, so does the bill need to go further and force local authorities to engage properly on outcomes plans?

Martin Doherty: My answer might go back to what I said about culture change. If bodies are unwilling to change the culture of engagement with communities and individuals, engagement will not improve, no matter how legislation is changed. People—individuals in organisations, community groups and the third sector—need to be willing to work together. In no shape or form can legislation force people to do that; I would find that difficult to see.
Robin Parker: Legislation cannot do everything on its own, but it can help to stimulate culture change and can play an important role. One of the first principles is that the people who use public services are the greatest experts in those services. That principle always applies, no matter whether public spending is increasing or decreasing or whether the decisions that are to be made are difficult or happy. I am interested in how the minister and the Scottish Government see that fitting in with everything that is in the bill.

I see the participation request as a backstop; when other things have been exhausted, communities can say that it is their right to be involved in such decision making. The bill could be strengthened to ensure that participation is not just for Christmas or when it is requested, because participation should take place throughout.

There is no magic bullet for community empowerment, but the national community engagement standards are a shiny projectile. We should apply those standards and ensure that engagement is always done well and genuinely, as happens in the vast majority of cases.

The bill requires community planning partnerships to draw up a local outcomes improvement plan—it will no longer be called a single outcome agreement. When they do so, they need to have much more of a balance. Their main purpose has been joint planning by public services—to be fair, they have been driven to do that. That purpose is good and it delivers better outcomes, but it is fair to say that CPPs have done less well at involving communities in their local public services and in how those services are planned. When CPPs draw up outcomes improvement plans, they must do so through a participative process that involves all members of the community in the area. That is important and should be built into the bill.

Maggie Paterson: I agree that it is possible to go further by strengthening the bill and perhaps by using regulations to implement the bill in a way that is more in the spirit of what is intended. Examples of participation have been given—I also gave one. What matters is the process as much as anything else. The extent to which the process can be legislated for is limited, but perhaps the process can be set out in regulations a bit more. As has been said, terms such as “local outcomes improvement plan” do not necessarily trip off the tongues of our community members.

We need to ensure that the processes are clear enough and that the jargon is translated so that people know what the bill means for them and why they as a community may want to engage with it. That needs to happen on a number of levels. We need to make those concepts more explicit in the bill and in the supporting regulations, but we would also expect the support to be put in place to enable communities to access their rights. The processes must be inclusive and transparent, and they should involve communities from the outset.

11:45

The Convener: I will play devil’s advocate. You talked about strengthening regulation. Many of us, particularly those of us who have served in local authorities, have faced comments such as, “Sorry, we can’t do that because the regulations don’t allow us to.” Should there not be a level of flexibility?

Maggie Paterson: That may be the case. My most recent experience concerns the CLD regulation, which quite explicitly puts the onus on local authorities to identify needs in the community, and outlines the process by which the three-year plan that we are obliged to produce should be drawn up and what it should contain.

We at Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland see the benefits of that approach in enabling us to do what we do. It will, we hope, be possible to have the benefits of the bill without the constraints, and with the flexibility that you mentioned.

John Glover: I am slightly concerned about Alex Rowley’s suggestion. If one requires public authorities to be more proactive, one could end up with a situation in which the public authority imposes its will on the community rather than the community deciding what it wants to do.

Rather than strengthen the bill in this area, my preference would be to treat the matter as an implementation issue. We need to ensure that the mechanisms are in place for sharing good practice so that successful community engagement in one part of the country can be shared throughout the whole country.

Linda Gillespie: I am here to offer an asset transfer point of view, but I work in the Development Trusts Association Scotland. The bulk of our members deliver services in their communities, and I agree with John Glover that the guidance rather than the legislation could be used to encourage wider communication and consultation.

Stuart McMillan: Do you have any views about the assumption that requests will be accepted unless there are any reasonable grounds for refusal?

Linda Gillespie: That assumption is most welcome and it puts a very positive spin on the bill, which will make it considerably easier for communities to move forward with asset acquisition.
John Glover: I agree—the bill is quite a brave, innovative piece of drafting, but that is the right way to do it.

Maggie Paterson: That assumption is helpful in relation to participation requests and asset transfer requests.

Robin Parker: It is positive for participation requests, but that does not negate the need for some sort of appeal process.

Secondly, the section of the bill on the decision process mentions the basis on which the decision must be made, but one thing that is missing from that is any mention of social inequality and poverty.

Martin Doherty: I agree with what the rest of the panel have said, and I agree specifically with Robin Parker’s point about an appeal process. I do not think that any new community group that was starting up, which would have limited resources, would have the ability to challenge any public body in the courts if it had to. It is quite unreasonable to expect the very small voluntary organisations that will be leading on the process to challenge any public body in the courts, so an appeal process would be most welcome.

Stuart McMillan: Section 19(5) says:

“The authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it.”

What would be an unreasonable ground for refusing a request?

The Convener: That is a very difficult question for the panellists to answer, Mr McMillan.

Stuart McMillan: It was worth a try.

The Convener: Does anyone want to have a stab at that? I would not be keen to do so.

John Glover: A plainly unreasonable ground would be if a member of the public body wanted to use the asset for their own benefit.

Maggie Paterson: The bill talks about a participation request theoretically lasting for about two years—that is, another request cannot be made on the same subject during that period. An issue that concerns us relates to the fact that community engagement and empowerment is an on-going process—it tends not to end once it starts. If the area in which the engagement or empowerment had been requested was an on-going issue, it does not seem unreasonable for a community group to say, “Well, actually, that thing that we were involved in last year still seems to be an issue. We would like to continue to be involved.”

I can see why such a provision might be included in the asset transfer element of the bill because there might be vexatious requests, as the policy memorandum says, but in the case of community engagement and empowerment, we would like to think that outcomes could be transformed and that we could achieve health and wellbeing improvements in a short period, although that tends not to be the case. Therefore, it could be unreasonable to end the participation prematurely or, if there was a reason to continue to engage, to withhold continued participation.

John Wilson: Good morning. My first question is for Ms Gillespie, although it is open to the rest of the panel to answer. You gave two local authority examples of what you considered to be good practice in community engagement. Will you give or hint at some of the areas where there is less than good practice?

Linda Gillespie: We are seeing a much more nuanced approach from smaller local authorities that have smaller and more clearly defined communities. In the East Ayrshire example, the nuanced approach was about seeing the issue as a sustainable asset transfer. Larger local authorities in a metropolitan area can find it difficult to articulate how to define their communities and how they would transfer an asset. The value of assets is also an element; indeed, that is more challenging for local authorities in cities. The more metropolitan local authorities are taking a more cautious approach to the development of their strategies.

Robin Parker: I will make generalisations rather than give specific examples.

An issue that came up in discussion with the previous panel was about what point in the process the engagement takes place. It is important that that happens at the start of the process; otherwise a community could be left with a problem. For example, a community might be told that one of two schools should be shut and asked what they think. That would not be a genuine engagement. The authority needs to start at the beginning of the process and, in that example, work through it by asking, “This is a difficult decision that we have to make; how can we best make this together?” That would be a much more positive engagement.

If the start of the whole process is to be the outcomes plan for the community planning partnerships, that is where the participative process in which folk get involved must happen.

My second general point is there are groups that are often described as “hard to reach”, but Barnardo’s much prefers the term “easy to ignore”. It is important to build in ways in which public bodies can be made to think about who those groups are and make a particular effort to involve them.
My final comment relates to the previous point. We talk about community engagement, but what is a community? We have not really thought about that. It can be easy to think that the whole of a local authority area is a coherent community, when that is clearly not the case. Barnardo’s works a lot with families, and for families the sense of community is about something that is much more the size of the school catchment area, for example. There are also communities of interest, which often provide people with a strong sense of community. We talked about them earlier.

This is not in the bill, but some thinking about much smaller-scale things should be reflected in the whole process. The Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 made organisations think about not just the whole local authority planning area but much smaller levels of community. That should happen more widely; it happens in some community planning partnerships.

John Wilson: Mr Glover mentioned the public interest test, which is important in the context of community applications for asset transfer. Who should apply the public interest test? Mr Glover referred to land that has been set aside or banked by a housing developer or large retail supermarket. Who is the final arbiter of whether it is in the public interest to transfer such an asset to the community or retain the right of the housing developer or other entity to bank the land?

The Convener: May I stop you there? That is outwith the scope of the bill, because you are talking about land that is owned by private authorities. The witnesses could answer the question while forgetting the bit about land banking by private developers.

John Wilson: May I turn the question round, then? If a local authority has decided that land that it owns would be better used for a private housing development, who should decide what is in the public interest?

The Convener: You turned the question round well.

Linda Gillespie: The decision should be made by the elected members of the local authority.

John Glover: I agree with Linda Gillespie.

I hope that I am not going out with the scope of the bill when I say that it is worth considering the question in the context of what are sometimes called arm’s-length companies, which are wholly owned by a public authority. Such companies are called “publicly-owned companies” in the bill.

I have been speaking with one of my stakeholders about a site in Edinburgh that is in that situation, and we have come to the view that the bill is perhaps wrong in its treatment of publicly owned companies. As the bill stands, parts 3 and 5 will apply to such a company only if it has been specified in a statutory instrument. Our consideration has led us to think that it should be the other way round. The default position should be that parts 3 and 5 apply to publicly owned companies unless they have been excepted by statutory instrument, because it is not possible for communities to identify all the right companies, whereas it is possible for companies to put their hands up and explain why they should not be subject to the provisions of the bill.

Maggie Paterson: The role of our organisation is to support community bodies to seek whatever recourse is available to them, so we would not comment on that.

Robin Parker: I do not think that I have a view on that point about parts 3 and 5.

Martin Doherty: If the process has been designed with the assistance of the local community, I agree with Linda Gillespie that the fundamental decision should lie with the elected members of the local authority.

The Convener: Thank you for your evidence, folks. It has been extremely useful.

11:59

Meeting suspended.

12:07

On resuming—

The Convener: We move on to our final panel—my notes say “this morning”, but it is now the afternoon.

I welcome Dewi Morgan, chair of old Aberdeen community council; Ryan Currie, project manager at Reeltime Music; Teresa Aitken from Glenboig Neighbourhood House; Alice Bovill from St Mary’s centre in Dundee; and Yvonne Tosh from Douglas community open spaces group in Dundee.

I understand that some of you said to the clerks that there was a lot of gobbledegook earlier. That is a big bugbear of mine, so I agree with you. If we move into that sphere, feel free to intervene and slap our fingers for it.

Would any of you like to make an opening statement?

Dewi Morgan (Old Aberdeen Community Council): First, I am not the chair of old Aberdeen community council but the web administrator and newsletter and general letter writer.

The Convener: I beg your pardon.
Dewi Morgan: We applaud the Scottish Government’s wish to encourage subsidiarity and local decision making, but although the bill could open up new avenues for community involvement, there is a real fear at community council level that it might simply be used and abused by local authorities to offload their costly facilities and services to an unpaid and largely unwilling community group on the basis of local authorities saying, “Take this over or we’re going to close it.”

With particular reference to the participation opportunity, will local authorities or development bodies really be prepared to consider the basically parochial opinions and desires of local communities? The record so far is pretty abysmal.

Teresa Aitken (Glenboig Neighbourhood House): I am really disappointed that there is no representative from North Lanarkshire Council here today. This is a really important time for us in North Lanarkshire because we are just about to develop the community asset transfer policy, and it was really important for someone to be here to represent us.

The Convener: Thank you for that comment. It is on the record, and we will write to North Lanarkshire Council about the situation today.

Does anybody else want to contribute at this time?

Alice Bovill (St Mary’s Centre Dundee): I will give a quick introduction. I am here today representing an organisation that has already worked with the community to have a community facility built in an area where the council was refusing to build one. I can talk about the tried-and-tested community engagement that we had to go through for that to take place, and also other community engagement for other services in the area.

The Convener: Thank you for your comments, which are much appreciated. Some of us had an opportunity to hear more about that engagement when we visited Dundee, but we will be grateful for anything that you wish to add.

I start with a question on the existing powers. Do public bodies adhere to what they should be doing at present, without the provisions in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill being in place? Mr Morgan, I turn to you first because you previously wrote to the committee about issues that you felt the local authority was not addressing properly.

Dewi Morgan: I think that the local authority adheres to the rules of what it has to do, and that is it—it will not go a step further. On planning applications, it will send out the weekly form because that is what legislation says it shall do, but it will do no more. We have to do all the running.

The Convener: Ms Aitken, do you have a view on that?

Teresa Aitken: I think that authorities do just what they have to do. There is no consistency, and I totally agree that we have to do all the running. We can meet officers and there can be deadlines for information to come back, but the community has to do the running and the deadlines are not met. There is no consistency or accountability.

The Convener: Is common sense shown?

Teresa Aitken: From the community, yes.

[Laughter.]

Ryan Currie (Reeltime Music): I have limited experience in the area, but I echo my colleagues. Public bodies do just enough to get by, and it does not always seem to be joined up to anything greater. The work is very much done on a piecemeal basis.

Yvonne Tosh (Douglas Community Open Spaces Group): We are different in Dundee. We are quite lucky in that we get a lot of help. Sometimes we have to fight to get the right people to help, but in the long run we usually get help quite easily and it is sustained, so that is a big help.

Alice Bovill: I feel that local bodies should be led by communities. If communities are inundated with lots of information that they have not asked for or training that they do not require, they can drown in it, and in that way they lose their volunteers. We want to keep volunteers and treat them as responsible people who can make decisions. They should not be bombarded with education from those bodies, although it can be great to have more information.

As my colleague Yvonne Tosh said, we are quite lucky in Dundee as we can access people, through communities officers, who will help us with every individual aspect of what we are trying to do.

The Convener: Those of us who visited Dundee heard about certain things that go on there. Earlier, Mr Hosie mentioned the forum that meets every three months, I think, which seems to be pretty community driven. That clearly leads to the exporting of good ideas and probably creates camaraderie so that you can get what you want for your communities. Does that work well? Would it work well in other parts of the country?

Alice Bovill: It could, but communities have to do some work on the issue themselves and make their voices heard. They cannot just go along to a forum and not speak up for themselves. They have to speak up and say what they require. If it is something to do with the environment, they need to tackle that with the relevant person who is there. If it is to do with education, social work or the NHS, they should tackle that with the people who are sitting round the table. They should take a note of the person's name so that, outwith the three-monthly meetings, they can contact them and say, "You said at the meeting that you'd do this for us, so we're keeping you to that." That is a good way of contacting people.

The Convener: You have talked before about the importance of names, so that accountability continues.

Alice Bovill: Yes.

Yvonne Tosh: I totally agree with that. In the local partnership, if we have a problem in our community, we go to the committee and we will speak directly to the people who are in post in the different departments. As Alice Bovill says, we get a note of their names and then we get back to them if they do not get back to us in a reasonable time. We say, "You were meant to come back to us—why haven't you?" If there is a good reason, that is fair enough but, if they have just forgotten, we will phone them again, and we keep going.

The Convener: Good. Mr Currie, do you have a view on that? It seems that Dundee does things slightly differently from other areas.

Ryan Currie: What specifically are you referring to?

The Convener: I am talking about bringing communities together and having the level of accountability that has been talked about. If you feel that you cannot answer the question, that is fine.

12:15

Ryan Currie: In the papers for a previous committee meeting, I read comments about sharp-elbow syndrome. That really struck home because, in my experience, over time, the same faces are usually involved in the processes.

In some cases, the wrong thing is perhaps being incentivised. For example—again, this is just my opinion—with community learning and development partnership meetings, the incentive is just to have the meeting and not to be accountable for the results of actions that are set in those meetings. We tend to find that organisations are asked to go along to certain meetings just for the sake of it. Nobody who works for a public sector body thinks how much that costs. The difference is that those who work in the voluntary sector or other areas, such as everybody here, could say how much that costs and how much it impacts on an organisation to go along to such meetings.

Teresa Aitken: Dundee has a great thing going. When I heard the evidence earlier, I thought that the forums are a good idea.

We find that there are too many layers and that people do not know about all the layers that they have to go through to get to the partnership. Some community groups maybe do not have the knowledge and understanding to take them up to the level and find the person whom they have to speak to. Because we have been around for a long time, if we do not get a reply and people do not come back to us, we keep going back to them and, if we do not get that accountability, we probably eventually use our elected members. Community groups that have not been around for a long time do not know what the platforms are and what stages they have to go through. That has to be made clearer at community level.

Dewi Morgan: I agree with Ms Aitken on that.

Mark McDonald: I spoke to both the previous panels of witnesses about the fact that some communities can work out, for example, who they need to speak to and how to go through grant applications, whereas other communities might need a bit of support to do that. What are your experiences of the need for support to get grant applications or to transfer assets? Where did you look for that support, and was it readily available from public bodies?

The Convener: Ms Bovill, as you have gone through the process of establishing something new, do you want to go first?

Alice Bovill: For grant funding, we first thought that we would try the lottery. The need for a community facility in St Mary's was identified through community plans. Before that, flats and houses had been offered, but that was not sufficient for an area as big as St Mary's. We went to the lottery board but, because we were getting help from the council, we were too close to it. Eventually, we got to the judging table, and we expected a yes, but we got a phone call to say that our application had been refused.

We invited some of the people up to Dundee and asked why they had refused the application but, as Yvonne Tosh put it, we got a lot of gobbledygook. However, we pulled them up and said, "It's all right, because we are going to build the centre anyway—we will look elsewhere for funding." That is what we did, and we got European regeneration funding. That is the funding part.

From the very start, however, you have to get volunteers on board and ask the local community, from young people to old people, what shape they see the community facility being. You have to do that before you can apply for funding, because you do not know what size they would want, what is affordable, what they would like for it and what opening hours they would like. You have to get your community on board immediately for something that they want to get their teeth into.

You must also keep the momentum going with your community rather than just sit back and expect the community to ride along with you. My knowledge of communities, whether they are poor or not, is that they are very interested in things that are going on in their area and that they have very community-based people.

The Convener: Did you get help from the local authority in trying to access the European funding in particular? It is not an easy process.

Alice Bovill: Yes, we did. It was applied for in conjunction with applying for lottery funding, a lot of which was to be for employing administrative workers and advisers. We did not get that funding, so everything is now community run: led by the community, worked on by the community and the community facility opened by the community. Basically, we do everything, including cleaning.

We worked in tandem with European funding. However, I think that we are fortunate in that we are perhaps one of the only places in Scotland that has the Territorial Army on board as well. It has given us a donation of money, and it has the whole top section of the community facility. We can gain access to it but we do not do that, because it is the Territorial Army's property. We would access it only if there was a problem with a power failure, for example.

Not having lottery funding was a loss at the time, but Dundee City Council was very supportive. I remember the very first meeting that I had with a certain person in the council because she said to me, “I don’t agree with the community centre and I don’t want any more community centres in Dundee to manage, but I’ll support you and I’ll give you all the help that you need to get it.” We therefore had support right from day 1 from the council. I cannot complain about the support that we have had from the council.

The Convener: Thank you. Does anybody else want to pick up on Mr McDonald’s question?

Yvonne Tosh: We are the opposite of Alice Bovill in that she has already gone through the process but we are at the very beginning of it. Getting funding has been quite hard for us. We would keep getting told that we fitted the criteria, but when we put in an application we were told that the words were too official. We took it back and wrote it in our language, but it came back to us because we did not fit the criteria. What is that about? That does not make sense.

Getting funding is quite hard. It is said that it is meant to be easier as soon as you get charitable status, but I think that it is still a fight to get funding.

The Convener: Do you think that the bill might help you get the help that is required to get through the bureaucracy of being told, “Oh, that’s too official,” or, “That’s not enough”?

Yvonne Tosh: It is possible. We have workers from the council who help us with funding, and they are brilliant. We just keep getting funding application forms, filling them out and sending them back, but they keep sending them back to us saying, “No”. That is one of the grumbles. As well as the funding, though, you have to get the community on board, as Alice Bovill said. If you do not have the support of the community, you will never get things moving.

The Convener: Okay. Thank you.

Teresa Aitken: I will speak about the support first. We have been involved in trying to gain a community asset for over seven years now. It started with us being asked by the local council to take over the local community centre, which we were quite keen to do. Being based in a small building made up of two old police cottages, with no space basically, we were quite happy to do what the council asked.

We got a feasibility study done, looked at it, went back to the council and discovered that there was not enough parking space planned, so the proposal was blown out of the water. We then identified a piece of land in our area that we could take over, so we went to the lottery and got substantial funding from it to carry out site investigations. We did that and found that we needed £250,000-worth of remediation on the site before we could build on it.

We have gone from fitting the criteria for the vacant and derelict land fund to not fitting it. The council said that it had spent its money for the year but would put us forward for funding the next year, but when the next year came it had already spent its money.

Also, the cost of the land was prohibitive and we had to reduce the scale of the building that we were building. We had to go back to the council and say that we needed a building of that scale to get the car park in, and the council decided that it would lease us a part and sell us a part, which the Big Lottery Fund would not have been interested in.

We have been having that fight for years. We are up against officers, and when we take the matter up to the top of the council we get sent back down to the same officer again. We feel that we are running up against a brick wall. The elected members cannot seem to get through, either.
The Convener: Let me stop you there for a second. Do you think that it would be helpful to have participation requests and the community being able to influence and ask for the reasoning behind decisions about, for example, the derelict land fund?

Teresa Aitken: Yes, I do. The participation will give us a stronger voice and enable us to ask questions that we cannot ask just now. It will make people accountable.

The Convener: That will happen instead of you being sent from pillar to post and back to the original officer.

Teresa Aitken: Yes, I think that it will. That is only part of my story, but I will let somebody else speak now.

Dewi Morgan: We do not have as much experience of seeking grants, but we recently created the friends of Seaton park group, because the park was falling into heavy disrepair. There seemed to be no drive at all to help us with grants, which may be partly because the group did not have the skills to go banging on the doors of either the grants company or Aberdeen City Council. Things may change now that there has been a change in the management group.

It seemed as though the council was happy to have the group because the park looked good for the Britain in bloom competition—there was a little rubber stamp for it—but nobody said, "It’s great that you’ve started; now, here are all the tools you can have." There was no outward giving, really. It was a pat on the head and, "Off you go."

The Convener: I apologise for being a bit parochial again, but a local group was formed around a park in Sunnybank and much more help seems to have been given to that group. Do you think that participation requests would be helpful if they enabled you to find out what that group got, why you have not got that and the reasoning why you have not received the same level of service?

Dewi Morgan: The Sunnybank park group was led by a council officer who had the inside track—he knew the systems and the people to talk to, and he knew how to do it.

The Convener: We should make it clear that it was a council officer not acting as a council officer but doing it in his spare time.

Dewi Morgan: Yes. The Seaton park group has no council officers on it. Although I was instrumental in getting the group started, it was important to me that, as a member of the community council, I did not run the friends group because it would have become almost a one-man band. I thought that if the group of friends who said that they wanted us to save the park were not prepared to stand up and run it, so be it. The issue is what people are available to run and what their skills are, and those things can be limited.

Mark McDonald: That builds on my earlier point about who the best people are to give that support. Have you found, on occasion, not a lack of willingness by the local authority but a view that the local authority cannot be seen to be supporting a group while, at the same time, negotiating with a group? Has that issue come up, or do you see that becoming a pitfall if the support is not available?

Dewi Morgan: My experience is that it feels as though the council is trying to control the group. It is saying, "We want you to do this amount and that's all. Go and paint this. Go and weed this. We'll put your name on this." It is the opposite of providing support.

Teresa Aitken: Sometimes, if people are after a piece of land or an asset but they are not managing to progress the matter, they wonder whether the council plans to use the land or the asset for something else. If the council has other ideas, we would ask it please to tell us, so that we are not wasting our time. That is what we have come up against.

12:30

Alice Bovill: In Dundee, the council has community officers working in regeneration areas city-wide. The officers are designated specific areas—mine is Strathmartine. All the officers meet—monthly, I think—and they meet the chief executive regularly, too. They take forward the needs and wants of the volunteers whom they speak to in the area. Support for each area is evenly divided; one area is not preferred to another.

The Convener: You have all those forums and you have community officers. Those officers feed up to the very top, to the chief executive, who has a major role to play in the community planning organisation. Is that right?

Alice Bovill: Yes.

The Convener: It would be interesting for the committee to write to the other community planning partnerships to find out whether they are at that level.

Does Yvonne or Ryan want to respond to Mark McDonald’s question?

Yvonne Tosh: All that I can talk about is the land that we hope to get successfully, which is sited where an old school was knocked down. The council wanted to use the site for housing, but the community wanted it for its own use. In the beginning, the council was very adamant but we got the land because we stuck up for ourselves.
Ryan Currie: We are at quite an interesting stage—the very early stages of asset transfer. For a period of perhaps seven or eight years, we as a small charity knew that we had outgrown our physical resources. However, whenever we inquired about possible consultation with North Lanarkshire Council about asset transfer, the result was a dead-end meeting with someone in property who said, “You’re not getting that, because we would make too much money from selling it.” We were at cross-purposes—it was clear that their department’s purpose was completely different from what we were looking for.

The Convener: Aye.

Ryan Currie: That is a fundamental point. In the past, no individual was directly responsible for community asset transfer and that was a problem. How does someone access an entire authority? At what level do they go in and what phone number do they call? Also, the person who made the approach was almost seen to be disrupting the local authority’s activity, whereas the new process is systematic and they are no longer seen to be a peculiar case.

The Convener: That is very useful.

Stuart McMillan: Good afternoon, panel. We heard evidence from the previous panel about having an allocated person to deal with asset transfer. The evidence was conflicting, because some said that there should be no single person and that, rather, the matter should be part of the organisation’s culture. For the future, and with the bill in mind, would it be useful to have such a responsible person in the short or medium term—say for five years or so—and during that time to try to increase the culture in local authorities so that more people are aware of asset transfer, and then for the job to disappear?

Yvonne Tosh: Yes.

Teresa Aitken: I would also say yes—it is vital. We need one person whom we can go and speak to. As Ryan Currie said, we are speaking to a whole authority, and we do not know which person we should speak to. Within the authority and its various departments, people do not communicate with one another, so we have to communicate with all the different departments.

We are at the stage of a pilot for developing a community asset transfer. We have just taken over an asset. We were supposed to take it over in December 2013, but we did not do so until March this year. We got the first management fees in July, only after fighting for them. We do not have a service level agreement, and we still have a draft lease. There needs to be someone who can help us through the process, probably for the longer term.

The Convener: Does the fact that all those things have not fallen into place affect the original business plan that you submitted?

Teresa Aitken: Yes—it affects everything that we are trying to do. We took over a building, and one of the stipulations was that we required the management fees to enable us to run the building, to provide the services that were already being provided there, and to expand and build more services. If the management fees had not been in place, we would have fallen at the first hurdle. That is where we feel we are—we keep getting knocked down at the first hurdle.

Dewi Morgan: I agree that, in a business or engineering sense, if two organisations are working together on a project, there is always an interface engineer. People need to know who to go to, and there needs to be somebody who can disseminate thoughts to the other organisation.

Stuart McMillan: Those comments have been very useful.

Thinking about the bill, has each of your organisations had an increase in interest among people wanting to volunteer and get involved? If so, are they bringing with them additional skills that you do not currently have, which could help with implementation once the bill completes its parliamentary process?

The Convener: In responding, you can be brutally honest and say whether folk actually know about the bill at all. We have tried to disseminate information about it, but there are always difficulties with that.

You are shaking your heads—so, most folk do not know about the bill. The simple answer to Stuart McMillan’s question is that there’s nae been onie additional volunteers, cos nae many folk ken about the bill.

Alice Bovill: Additional volunteers have come forward through word of mouth. There are people who have read the bill and who have taken part in conferences, such the one in Dundee, and they can impart their knowledge.

We are encouraging some young volunteers now—that is the future. They might work for only a couple of hours a week, but there are always new volunteers coming on board. It is good when we talk to them and ask them their opinion about what they would like to see. We explain things to them—we do not just suddenly go into talking about the bill being published and so on. Young people have been at school for all those years, and they do not want all this thrown at them right away. They just want to come in, do their bit for the community, know what is going on and say what they want to do. It is up to people such as me to sit and read what I dare say is boring stuff, and to impart anything that I pick up from it that is of direct benefit to the community.

The Convener: I make an appeal and put out a wee advert as far as the boring stuff is concerned. It would be really good if you all went back to your respective communities, told them about the bill and asked them to write in and let us know any views that they have. We are still looking for folks’ views on the bill, so we would be immensely grateful if you could do that.

Stuart McMillan: I have a final question for Teresa Aitken. You spoke about the frustrations that you had experienced, and you said that you use elected members “eventually”. That was an interesting comment. Why do you do that only eventually? Why would you not approach them sooner in the process?

Teresa Aitken: There are processes that we have to follow. If we were to jump right to elected members—well, we are not popular anyway. [Laughter.]

I have written down things about co-production, participation and empowerment. We are empowered people in our communities, and we have been doing co-production for many years.

The Convener: Would you use the word “co-production” when you are yapping to folk in your community about what you are doing?

Teresa Aitken: Certainly not.

Before we take an issue to the elected members, we have to allow the person in the post to do their job and provide us with the information. We use the elected members a lot, because we have come up against a lot of barriers over the years in trying to take on land and assets. We have got through the brick wall eventually only because of the elected members, but we do not use them immediately because we like to follow the process. If nothing comes from that, we certainly go to an elected member.

John Wilson: Good afternoon, panel. I am an elected member and have been the chair of Glenboig neighbourhood house for a couple of years, so I am not included in the elected members who Teresa Aitken refers to. She is referring to our local councilors, who we tend to involve if we are having particular problems.

Having made that declaration, I have a question for the panel. Having read the bill, would you add anything to it? Would you like to see anything strengthened in the bill to make it easier for communities to take forward what is proposed in the bill?

Alice Bovill: Maybe the only thing that I would encourage is communities having a stronger voice and being included in other committees. I am fortunate in being on the Dundee partnership management group, so I can go to the top on issues. I am also on other regeneration committees and I have worked in the tenants movement and on a children’s panel. I have gained knowledge from all that. However, community members need encouragement and training on public speaking, if necessary, so that it is not always left to two or three people to give evidence to a committee such as this, for example.

Apart from that, I think that we get all the support we need. We have contacts with the right people. If we have a problem, we are not slow in going to them and saying, “This is breaking down.” If something has not been done after it has gone to the local community planning partnership meetings, we can follow it through and say, “This has not been done. Your LCPP meetings are not working. What are we going to do about it? We have to do something.” We have to get the person concerned to go back to his or her seniors and ask whether he or she can make a decision. Sometimes their hands are tied, too, when it comes to making a decision on something important that we are asking them to do.

The Convener: So even without the bill, things seem to be working pretty well.

Alice Bovill: They are working pretty well, but unfortunately because these things are not in legislation they do not have to be done. The bill will let councils know that they have to do certain things. As I said, we are fortunate in Dundee because the council supports us, but it does not have to. A new council could come in and decide that it did not want to work so closely with the communities and did not want to give them the voice that they have now. We must watch our backs and we must look to the future.

The Convener: Thank you. Teresa, do you want to comment? Things are working in Dundee without the bill. Will the bill help you?

Teresa Aitken: I think that the bill will help. We do not have a community asset transfer policy, but we need that. Greater participation and having a voice will make communities stronger. I think that the bill will definitely help communities to go forward.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to have a crack at John Wilson’s question?

Yvonne Tosh: I think that the bill will help. Like Alice Bovill, I wear lots of hats, but the bill can allow someone who does not have so many contacts to help their community. It is good that I have contacts, but the bill will help someone who does not have them.

The Convener: Would you add anything to the bill?
Yvonne Tosh: I would make it shorter. [Laughter.]

The Convener: Less gobbledygook.

Yvonne Tosh: I was going to say that. Put it in plain English.

The Convener: Okey-doke. Does anyone else want to comment?

Dewi Morgan: Yes. I think that there is a problem because the bill is such a portmanteau one. It covers so many issues that it is very difficult for anyone to work out what is going on. It took me several goes at the bill to realise what was there. With the supporting documents, there are about 300 sides of A4 to read through to work out what it all means and which bits are relevant to the community, whatever it is. That is not easy. That is why there is the idiot’s guide; that is a bit embarrassing really, so we need something between the idiot’s guide and the rest of it.

12:45

The problem is not that we cannot understand the bill. After two or three readings and making notes we all understand what is in the bill, but people in communities do not have time for that. If someone wants to make a planning application, they have to get the documents and find what is needed. If it is a piece of law, they have to find it. They have to find out whether the community council is part of it; they have to dig, dig, dig to find the right route. You do not make it easy for us to understand this stuff.

Could the bill help Aberdeen or our community council? I think that it could, but it depends on how the local authority uses it. It could use it as a tool to give us a harder task.

The Convener: I understand that. The bill is pretty tough going, which is why we have divided it up. I have been told to do another advert and mention a wee video that has been produced for communities. We will send it to you and you can pass it on to others. Unfortunately it means that folk will have to look at my face.

John Wilson: We heard evidence earlier from Barnardo’s and other organisations. Barnardo’s indicated in its written submission that the community planning partnerships should set aside 1 per cent of the overall CPP budget for community engagement. Are there enough resources to allow communities to participate fully in the decision-making processes that they want to be engaged in? With the exception of Alice Bovill and Yvonne Tosh, who seem to be quite steadfast in their engagement—they might want to comment, too—do the panel members think that there are enough resources to allow them to participate fully? I am not talking about participating on the edges, but about participating fully in the issues that you want to participate in and in the decision-making structures that are out there making decisions for communities.

Alice Bovill: The resources are there. They are not necessarily money resources, but assistance is available. We identify the internal and external training that we need to take, such as the disclosure and food and hygiene certificate training, for example. We have all those extra things to do. Policies have to be kept up to date every year, so we have to go through training for that.

We could not do all that by ourselves—we need support from community officers. We get support in kind, not in cash, because all our income is grant funded. We get lots of support in kind from other people so that we can bring on our volunteers. I know I said that our volunteers would not all read the bill, but they get involved and they know the policies for a management group running an individual centre with a community-led body.

Teresa Aitken: We are members of DTA Scotland, and resources in kind that are available through DTA have given us a great voice in decision making. What we have learned as part of DTA Scotland over the years has really taken us forward, and other training is available through CLD and different partners.

If we were to really take part in decision making, have a voice and free up a lot more time, we would need financial support that is not there at the moment. However, a lot of DTA Scotland’s expertise has been valuable to us.

John Wilson: People who have read the bill will see that there are issues around the definition of community organisations that local authorities and public bodies should engage with. Should there be some tightening up of that community body aspect? I am trying to get a definition of who should be able to participate and who should engage in the decision-making policy structures of the council or CPP.

Alice Bovill: In the area that I come from, we have a group that deals with community safety so we know that that is where we direct questions to the police. We have a group that deals with the planning partnership, which is the management board in the centre. We have other groups that deal with churches, so we can get in touch with local churches. We have a group that deals with schools. We identify the different areas that we are working with. If we are working on an issue to do with antisocial behaviour in housing, we know who to go to.

It is a matter of identifying the right person with the right information and getting them to come along to the meeting. I might ask the police to come along to a meeting about antisocial behaviour, but I might not ask them to come to a meeting on housing improvement; I would do better not to waste their time, because the police are strapped for time, and to invite the right person at the initial stages.

Alex Rowley: Dundee has local community plans and area plans. How engaged are the Dundee groups in them? Are the other organisations that are represented here aware of their local community planning partnerships and engaged in local plans?

The Convener: Let us start with Dundee.

Alice Bovill: I used to live in Ardler, which became a regeneration area, and I did not move up to St Mary's until 2000. I had said that I would not get involved in anything again, but I got involved in getting tenants' and residents' views on their aspirations for the area—a wish list, basically. We were saying to the community, “You write down on a post-it note what you’d like to see and put it up on the board, and we’ll write a community plan.”

Way, way back in the early 2000s we wrote the first community plan, which is where the idea for a community facility came from. People wanted lots of other things. Believe it or not, the children wanted tidier gardens in the area; they did not like hanging about in an area that had untidy gardens and insufficient lighting. They were coming out with simple things like that.

We have to consult before we even think about a community plan; the community plan has to be led by the community. I cannot go along and say, “I represent the community and I think people need this and that.” I cannot impose my view of what people want; I have to hear everybody’s views.

As I said, our community plan was drawn up way back in the 2000s, before we had LCPPs. LCPPs are quite new—we had regeneration forums before we had LCPPs. Every so often, we take a day to review what has been done, what is still to do and what has not been touched yet, and we create another list of aspirations.

The Convener: Are the other areas that are represented here aware of community planning partnerships and the levels below them? How are you involved?

Teresa Aitken: I am aware of those bodies and I am involved. I can go to the local area partnership meeting once a month and feed in through North Lanarkshire Council community learning and development; there is a partnership through CLD, and a lot of local organisations sit on that. We have a great network in the Coatbridge area. There is a steering group, which involves the NHS, the council, the police and everyone, and we work well at local level. The reshaping care agenda, which came up earlier, is a great avenue for participation, and North Lanarkshire Council has taken it forward in a good way. The bill builds on that. The progress on reshaping care shows what communities can do to build on structures and develop good projects in their areas.

I am also aware of the community improvement plan and how it works locally.

Dewi Morgan: I do not know of a community plan that is in operation in our area. We get involved in the formal ones—the local area plans, and so on—and go through the formal process of putting comments into those fairly torturous documents, but I have heard at the community council forum that there is no community council involvement in the central Aberdeen master plan consultation, which is a plan to rejuvenate the whole centre. They have managed to pull that together without any community council input.

Ryan Currie: I am aware of CPPs, outcome agreements and things like that in the North Lanarkshire area. I have seen all the diagrams and the fancy reports, but Reeltime is not involved. While the other witnesses were talking, I was thinking about why that is the case. There is probably a variety of reasons. We are a small charity and, like everyone else, we are just trying to keep our heads above water trying to get funding for our own plans. I can speak only for myself, but it is sometimes quite hard for small organisations to see where they would fit in to a big, complex diagram, or to decide which meetings to go to and at what level they should be discussing things.

Yvonne Tosh: For me, it started off when I went for a nosey, and my involvement just grew. Now, I fit in and I can put my point forward and say, “Right, this is what the community wants, not what the council wants.” If the community wants something, you have got to fight for it. We have been fighting for a long time for our green space. We did a lot of consultations and the matter went to the LCP, which said that it was a good idea.

Our consultation included five-year-old kids. One wee boy said, “I know what I’d love—a swimming pool.” I said that I did not think we would get a swimming pool in Douglas, but he said, “Yes, but in winter it freezes and we’ll get a skating park.” What do you say to a five-year-old in response to that? If you empower children from the beginning, they will go forward.

The Convener: Absolutely. I probably ended up here because I went for a nosey once upon a time.

Cameron Buchanan: Do the witnesses think that the new powers in the bill will make a real difference to communities?
Teresa Aitken: I do not know. I think that they will be of benefit to us, because of the work that we have been doing in North Lanarkshire and Glenboig over the years. We need something that will make our council accountable, and we definitely need the council to make our communities stronger and to make not only councils but all public bodies accountable. It will help people who are setting up, and it will help us to help them. If there is a proper document, it makes the council, the NHS or any other body accountable.

We could then go to other small groups that are setting up. It is a big thing to set up a group and take on land, or to start projects and look for funding. We have been there for a long time and we still find it quite scary at times. I think that the bill will help to empower other communities and enable them to go forward.

The Convener: You said to begin with, "I don't know," and then you were pretty positive about it.

Teresa Aitken: Well, I kind of thought about it.

The Convener: Sometimes there is a don't-know factor. Should we revisit the issue as a committee after the act is in place to make sure that it is working as it should for communities?

Teresa Aitken: Yes, because acts come in and are supposed to be operational, but often they just get put in a filing cabinet, so you should revisit it.

The Convener: That is grand. Thank you very much.

Dewi Morgan: I think that the bill will make a fantastic difference for one or two specific cases. In the Western Isles, for instance, there have been situations in which people have been desperate to buy land. It could make a difference for smaller community organisations, but I will have to wait and see how it actually works, because it is in the local authorities’ remit to decide whether they deliver or go to the letter. If they go to the letter, not much will happen.

The Convener: Will participation requests deal with some of the difficulties that you have faced? If the facility for participation requests is in place, you might not have to go through the rigmarole of making a participation request, because the council will know that you have that ability. Will councils give you answers sooner?

13:00

Dewi Morgan: We do not want to participate by sitting in committee meetings day after day. There is a lot of that, which is a desperate problem. We do not want to get involved in that way.

At this week’s community council forum, someone made the good point that we seem to be moving from a representative democracy to a participatory democracy. However, we do not want to participate to the ends of the earth, because some of us have day jobs and domestic commitments. We just want the support that we need; we do not want to have to sit on committees unnecessarily. Our forum was asked to sit on a committee for two years to talk about the community council boundaries. That is ridiculous.

Alice Bovill: The bill is useful in advising groups that are starting. I am often asked to talk to people who are trying to set up similar groups to ours, outside my local area, but still in Dundee. It has been handy to take along the bill and refer to it when talking about problems that people might have. What is proposed is down in writing and will become an act, as the convener said. That can be revisited if people do not get the access to officers that we get.

Anne McTaggart: I will reiterate what the convener said. Given how prominent your organisations are in your communities and how hard you work, what plans—if any—did you put in place to gather information for the consultation?

Dewi Morgan: I barely knew that the bill was being considered until the letter to invite us to the committee arrived. I did a little bit of information gathering before, and then an awful lot yesterday. I looked at videos of previous committee meetings, for instance.

Anne McTaggart: Has that made you think about how to inform your communities about the bill?

Dewi Morgan: Yes.

Alice Bovill: I knew what was going on, because I sometimes look at the Scottish Government web pages. I am quite interested in water and sewerage charges, which are our main bugbear at the St Mary’s centre. We are £5,000 in debt because of those charges, but we had Alex Salmond up to the centre and he hopes that we will get charitable status. I tend to check on the bills that are going through Parliament and on whether they have become acts, so I knew about the consultation.

Teresa Aitken: I knew about the bill through DTA Scotland, which asked us to comment on it.

Dewi Morgan: Anne McTaggart asked whether we would pass on information to the community. Given what I now know about the bill, I certainly will talk about it. I have already made a note to mention it in the next newsletter for our area. The information and videos all help.

Until when does the committee want feedback? Newsletters are not issued weekly; the process is slow.
The Convener: It would help to have any feedback by 12 November, which is when the minister will appear before us. However, the process is on-going and you have the right at any time to let your elected representatives know what is right or wrong.

We are at stage 1 of the bill process, so there is room for the committee to look at the bill again. Beyond that, the whole Parliament will have the final look at the bill. Do not feel bound to 12 November—if a flash of brilliance comes from somebody in your communities, as often happens, tell them to let us know about it.

I thank the witnesses for their evidence. I know that you are all volunteers; we are grateful to you for giving up your time to speak to us. I hope that we spoke without too much gobbledygook.

13:04

Meeting continued in private until 13:05.
Present:

Cameron Buchanan
Mark McDonald
Stuart McMillan Kevin Stewart (Convener)
John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Apologies were received from Anne McTaggart and Alex Rowley.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Andy Brown, Secretary, Scottish Woodlot Association;
David Coulter, Chief Executive, Dumfries Third Sector Interface;
Amanda Macaulay, Dalbeattie Community First Responders;
Jeff Ace, Chief Executive, NHS Dumfries and Galloway;
Geraldine McCann, Head of Administration and Legal Services, South Lanarkshire Council;
Douglas Scott, Senior Policy Advisor, Scottish Borders Council;
Kay Gilmour, Head of Community Support, Department of Education, East Ayrshire Council;
Louise Matheson, Senior Manager Property & Architectural Services, Dumfries and Galloway Council.

Following the end of the meeting the Committee undertook a question and answer session with members of the public in attendance at the meeting on the issues raised during the oral evidence session on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

14:33

The Convener: Item 4, our final item of business, is our fourth oral evidence session on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Two panels will give evidence this afternoon. I welcome the first panel: Andy Brown, secretary of the Scottish Woodlot Association; David Coulter, chief executive of Dumfries third sector interface; and Amanda Macaulay of the Dalbeattie community first responders. I apologise to Amanda Macaulay, whose name was spelled wrongly on the agenda; that will be corrected on all the formal papers that will follow.

I invite you all to make an opening statement.

Amanda Macaulay (Dalbeattie Community First Responders): I am the local co-ordinator of the Dalbeattie community first responders. I do not know how much you know about us. We are a group that was set up through the Scottish Ambulance Service and we assist local crews on what are termed time-critical calls. We are sent to things such as cardiac arrests, breathing difficulties and medical collapse. We went live on 12 February and since then, although we do not operate 24/7, we have assisted on 133 calls.

We were originally set up to assist with calls in Dalbeattie, but we decided that we would go where we are needed and we have been to almost all the smaller communities in our area, as well as up to Castle Douglas, where the ambulance station is based. A group of us have also now trained as heart start instructors, and in the new year we will be taking our new skill out into the community to train people in cardiopulmonary resuscitation. We are totally self-funding and, with the exception of six jackets and a bag with some oxygen and a couple of masks, we have bought all our own training equipment and our own defibrillator. We have also taken possession of two public access defibrillators, which we will maintain, again adding to our running costs.

The group is quite expensive to run. Medical equipment costs a tremendous amount of money and we need to use quite a bit, but we are proud of our financial independence, as we are aware of the pressures that the national health service faces. That has predetermined us to be as independent as we can be, not a drain on valuable resources.

Andy Brown (Scottish Woodlot Association): I would like to thank you, on behalf of the Scottish Woodlot Association, for inviting us along to the committee. We are a co-operative of forestry workers who lease forest land from landowners in Scotland. Scotland has the most concentrated land ownership in Europe, and we are offering working people a chance to achieve forest tenure. We think that the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill is an excellent opportunity to take our work to the next level and to offer a lot more people the opportunity to achieve forest tenure in Scotland.

David Coulter (Dumfries Third Sector Interface): I head up the local interface, which is one of 32 in Scotland. The issues that interfaces across Scotland deal with have been presented to the committee in evidence by Voluntary Action Scotland, and I would like to make reference to a couple of points that VAS has already made. One of the most important points is that the guidance that follows the bill must give clarity on the role of third sector interfaces. My specific concern is that, if we are to improve the capacity of community bodies, however defined, to respond to some of the opportunities that will be provided when the bill becomes law, we must address how those organisations and community bodies can take up those opportunities and build their capacity in a way that involves sound governance and financial management, so that our public sector partners have confidence that we as a sector can deliver.

It is interesting that the witnesses on either side of me represent two very different examples of the third sector. Members know the diversity that exists out there and I think—I would say this, would I not?—that there is a huge opportunity in the bill for that diversity to come to the fore and help us find solutions to some of Scotland’s bigger problems.

The Convener: Thank you very much.

Why are the powers for participation requests and asset transfer requests necessary? Do you think that public bodies are ready to deal with those?

David Coulter: On Thursday morning, your colleague John Swinney asked, “Why do we need a community empowerment bill to empower communities?” It was a good question, because the answer from my perspective is that we should be ensuring the empowering of communities as a matter of course. However, the reality is that that does not happen without some catalyst, and I regard what is proposed in the bill as a catalyst for change.

The power for asset transfer requests brings greater clarity to the process and greater opportunity. Is the public sector ready to respond to that? Well, I have my doubts, some of which I expressed in private conversations with members this morning and in the earlier group discussion. I think that there needs to be a long-term change in culture around the way in which public authorities view assets.

My sense is that there is often a culture working within public bodies such that they regard assets as being owned by them. That might be the legal position, but the reality is that we as a community in Scotland own them. There are issues around that which we will need to address. At my table earlier, people described the frustration that they have felt when going through the process of acquiring an asset, whether they were leasing or purchasing it. That is a tangible issue that can be addressed by a change in culture.

I am not sure that either the third sector or the public sector is prepared for participation requests. It will be very interesting to see how participation requests will operate in practice. I think that that is where some of the guidance around the bill will have its impact. In a sense, I am asking the committee a question about that, for which I apologise. What do you expect participation requests to lead to? I would hope that they would lead to very profitable conversations about how we address some of our big issues around, for example, our growing elderly population and youth unemployment. If participation requests are used simply to address parish-pump politics, I think that we will all miss the point. I have some questions about how that will operate, but the answer to whether it is welcome is yes.

The Convener: Before I bring in the other two panellists, I want to ask you about what you said about the ownership of assets. Earlier, we discussed whether there is difficulty in identifying who owns an asset. For example, is it held as part of the common good, or does it belong to the council? Is there a lack of asset registers in this neck of the woods that say who owns what?

David Coulter: I do not know of a register of publicly held assets in Dumfries and Galloway, although there is probably something like that out there. A more publicly available asset register would be of benefit to the third sector and to local communities, provided that it was known about and publicised. There is an awful lot of stuff out there that communities do not know about and therefore cannot access.

Having an asset register is a great idea, but I might go one step further and suggest that we add to such a register those bits of derelict and unused land that we do not know who the heck owns them or whether they are publicly or privately held. Such land should be part of an asset register so that we have a clearer picture across our communities about what is not being used for the greatest benefit of communities. There are bits and pieces of land in our communities that are way underused and could be much better used. However, I cannot say whether that land is held in public or in private ownership.

There is a second part to my answer that makes a cultural point. The issue is not legal ownership but the sense that much of our land and buildings in Scotland needs to be held for the commonweal or common good. It is welcome that the bill addresses those areas of land, too. I would therefore extend the register to include those bits of land too, wherever possible.

The Convener: We are likely to return to that.

I invite Ms Macaulay and Mr Brown to comment on participation requests and whether public bodies are ready to deal with them.

Amanda Macaulay: We deal with the Scottish Ambulance Service and we do not really have any big problems. With regard to ensuring that public bodies do not view people who want to help as more of a hindrance than a help sometimes, we volunteer but we are not always given the help that we need to volunteer. The problem is that the help is inconsistent. When we are asked to do something, we must think about how we can sustain what we are being asked to do. When we volunteer, we run up against the problem that the public body is enthusiastic when it starts us off but its enthusiasm wanes before ours does.

We are in a slightly unusual situation, because we are controlled and run by the Ambulance Service and we just do exactly as we are told. We do not have the freedom to decide what we want to do, or to ask the Ambulance Service whether we can use different bits of equipment and so on. I am afraid that the question on participation requests is a fairly hard one for me to answer. We have had no problems at all in dealing with the Ambulance Service so far. However, I believe that the service is underresourced.

14:45

Andy Brown: We certainly see an opportunity in the bill as it is drafted for a non-profit co-operative such as ours to lease land from the state, from either Government or local authorities. However, we have identified one key issue. The biggest forest landowner in Scotland is the state and Government ministers, with the land being managed by the Forestry Commission Scotland. The Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 is very specific on the bodies that can lease land. While the bill that is before us could in theory enable a non-profit co-operative to lease land from the Forestry Commission, the 2010 act says that only companies limited by guarantee can do so, which would exclude us. One key solution would be to amend the bill to enable such co-operatives to take advantage of its provisions.
The Convener: One issue that has come up quite a lot today is that organisations find it very difficult to get the right person to deal with their request, particularly with regard to asset transfer and leasing or buying a particular property or piece of land. Would you support having a named officer as a point of contact for all community groups to deal with participation requests or asset transfer requests?

Amanda Macaulay: Yes, I would.

David Coulter: Yes, but with the caveat that such a person would need to be appropriately qualified and understand what we are trying to achieve. The obstacle is not necessarily the named person but how that named person operates. The frustration that has been reported to the committee is not necessarily about the individual; it is about how an individual functions in the role. That is often a barrier.

Andy Brown: Yes, there is a great opportunity from a land point of view. The land reform review group was looking at setting up a land commission of some sort. I think that that could also operate with community empowerment and look at local state-owned assets. An officer working on that would be very helpful.

The Convener: Could any elements of the bill be improved on? That is a very difficult question, but Mr Coulter is about to have a go.

David Coulter: Yes. On the role of the third sector interfaces, we do not want to be on the face of the bill, because we want to retain our independence and not be considered in any shape or form as a statutory body. Our role is perhaps not for the bill but for the elements that will underpin the legislation when it becomes an act. Given the investment in setting up the 32 interfaces, we need to be clear about what the role of those interfaces should be not just in asset transfer but in capacity building in communities, assisting in participation requests and providing support to organisations.

If I was answering the named person question from the other side of the fence, I would say that that person should be the third sector interface. We need that strategic input and that one point of contact to which groups can come for advice. Obviously, that will have resource implications for third sector interfaces as we move forward.

I am not sure that it is clear exactly what the bill is trying to achieve in relation to the third sector or in what it says about community planning.

Amanda Macaulay: On the whole, you need to simplify the way in which you do things. I am reasonably intelligent and I had to read the bill about four or five times before I got a grasp of it. It was not until I found the easy-read version that I suddenly realised what it is about. Members of the Scottish Parliament do this kind of thing all the time, because that is your job, so it is probably easier for you to understand these things—

The Convener: Don’t bet on it.

Amanda Macaulay: I work full time—I am self-employed—and this week I have done more than 60 hours of volunteering, so I do not really have time. A lot of people have time constraints, and reading bills and so on is quite threatening. Even minor things are challenging; we want to become a charity so that we can claim back VAT, because everything that we buy costs a fortune, but the process is unbelievably complex.

It would be good if things could be streamlined so that it was easier for the man or woman in the street to become a volunteer. Sometimes the processes seem a little difficult and threatening for someone who wants to volunteer or run a group. I have used third sector first a lot, and it has been brilliant, but it can only take you so far and then you hit a brick wall and think, “Oh, what do I do next?”

The Convener: So we should cut the gobbledygook.

Amanda Macaulay: Yes. I understood the easy-read bill.

Andy Brown: I agree that the bill is complex, because it covers complex issues to do with land ownership and asset transfer and it refers to numerous other acts. We really welcome the gist of the bill, in that it is about asset transfer. On what would improve the bill, the issue from a forestry perspective is that Scotland’s largest forest owner will not be able to lease woodland, and leasing is a key element of the bill.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): Mr Coulter touched on a point that I wanted to raise. The third sector comprises a multitude of organisations, which range from charities that have large amounts of money in reserve to small organisations that can be one or two-person operations. Do you envisage the role of third sector interfaces as being to provide support to much smaller third sector organisations, which might not have the human and financial resources to enable them to take forward opportunities that the bill will open up for them?

David Coulter: The short answer is yes, but let me expand on that. My organisation has not yet reached a point at which we are able to distinguish need from demand. I would not necessarily portray some of the larger organisations as well resourced in the context of their capacity to respond to what is in the bill. I would not assume that a large charity necessarily had that capacity. As I said, the answer is yes, but I have not yet got my head round how support would be provided, and I would not make assumptions about some of the big organisations.

For interest, the income of charities in Dumfries and Galloway—not the whole range of organisations to which you referred but the charitable organisations that have a registered address in the region—is about £100 million. However, only a handful of those charities have a turnover of more than £1 million; for the rest, turnover is substantially below that level. We are talking about a significant number of organisations that are in need, so how we address need is a complex question.

Mark McDonald: We talked about the need for a single point of contact. Is there a disparity in how different public bodies in Dumfries and Galloway deal with community organisations and third sector groups? Is there good and bad practice? How do we ensure that good practice is shared and bad practice is dealt with appropriately?

David Coulter: Let me pause and be careful how I answer your question. There is good practice, but there is also a lot of bad practice. I will frame my answer slightly differently. We have embarked on a cultural journey in Scotland, but I seriously believe that we have a long way to go in our approach to community empowerment and development.

I sit on an executive group of chief officers—I am conscious that the chief executive of NHS Dumfries and Galloway is sitting behind me. Over the 18 months that I have been involved in that group, we have developed a strong strategic view of what the relationship between public bodies and the third sector should be. However, that is not necessarily filtering all the way down to individual third sector organisations. I cannot really speak specifically for local communities and for community councils per se. However, I can tell you that many community-based third sector organisations are often very frustrated by their relationships with public bodies. That is a cultural problem, not a structural one.

Mark McDonald: I have a final question for all the panel members. Something that has come up on numerous occasions is the difference between communities that are active and engaged, and communities that have a lot going on—there is no doubt about that—but may not have the capacity within them to go to the next level of taking on some of the responsibilities that the bill would enable them to take on, such as leasing or owning an asset. Does the responsibility for creating that capacity in communities fall to public bodies, or is there a role for the third sector as well in empowering communities to take that next step?

Andy Brown: That is pretty much exactly what we have done. We were a grass-roots group of forestry workers who formed a co-operative, literally on the forest floor, and took it forward to try to lease land from landowners. We are a voluntary group—it is a non-profit co-op. In some ways, although the top-down approach that you mentioned is probably better resourced, a ground-up approach such as the one that we have taken is perhaps more effective in engaging local folk.

Mark McDonald: Were you given any support to help you get established in the first instance? We find that, in some communities, there is already the capacity within the community for it to go to that next step. Other communities may need a bit more support at the initial stage to get them to that level.

Andy Brown: We got support from Scottish Enterprise locally and from Co-operative Development Scotland, which helped us get established.

Amanda Macaulay: We did not have a problem with getting established. We were set up by the Scottish Ambulance Service, we are used by it and we have a good system in place with it. We train every month and it has been very supportive.

I wanted us to be completely self-funded, which not all units are, because I think that it is important that, if communities want extra, add-on things that are not already supplied, they should supply those things themselves. I know that it sounds minor, but buying our own defib meant that I had to ask my community for not shy of £2,000. It feels to me that it is less likely that we will fail because that money has not just been handed to us by a public body—by some faceless people. It is from people I know in the street. It will keep a lot of community organisations running if they have to depend on themselves, rather than just turning to the public sector every time they want something.

David Coulter: The answer to your question is relatively simple but needs to be qualified. The third sector is quite capable of taking on an awful lot of what the public sector currently takes responsibility for. Our public sector in Scotland—particularly local authorities—is now delivering services in areas where it was never intended in statute that it should deliver them. The sector that has suffered as a result of that is the third sector—self-help and doing things for ourselves in communities.

It comes back to the culture question. I would argue that the third sector can and should do more and we need the support of our public sector partners to make that change. That support needs to come from across the piece, not just from chief officers and elected members but right down to staff on the ground.
The Convener: You have mentioned culture a number of times now. Is a lot of that to do with a lack of common sense and a lack of joined-up thinking at times?

15:00

David Coulter: No. There is a bit of that—it exists in all parts of life—but there is something else in play. We need to recognise that not all parts of the third sector have necessarily had the right governance and financial scrutiny of their affairs. People in the public sector have significant concerns about whether they are being diligent and making the right decision in putting something out to the third sector and relying on it to deliver. Although I am saying that public sector partners need to be more confident that the third sector can deliver, I am in no doubt at the same time that our job as an interface is to work with the third sector to improve its governance, to improve the way in which it manages its finances and—I would go one step further—to make it more enterprising. You will hear from my colleagues on either side of me about the co-operative approach and a more enterprising way of doing things, and about the community-based approach and an independent, self-reliant way of doing things, which is equally enterprising.

It is not all about people not applying common sense, although that happens; it is also about there being an issue for us as a sector to address. It is a two-sided coin.

The Convener: I do not want to put words in your mouth, but are you saying that there is a certain amount of risk aversion out there?

David Coulter: Yes. We had this conversation this morning, so I am not going to give you a different answer this afternoon.

The Convener: It is now on the record, Mr Coulter. We are grateful for that.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Mr Brown, referring to section 53, you say in your submission that you would "like to see the inclusion of Industrial & Provident Societies (IPS) – with appropriate rules – in this section."

Can you expand on that for us, please?

Andy Brown: Yes. When we set up our industrial and provident society, which is a co-op, we were very careful about the terms that were in our rules. We set up our IPS with the help of Co-operative Development Scotland and Co-operatives UK. Basically, we put in many of the key terms that would be looked for in a company limited by guarantee—for example, an asset lock so that the assets could not be sold off—and the co-op is non-profit distributing. Those are two of the key things that we put into our rules when we set up the co-op. That is really what we were referring to in our submission.

Cameron Buchanan: You also said that small woodlot licences could be similar to the requirements for allotments. Would that not be a bit complicated? You ask us to consider it, but it would seem to be rather a complicated thing to administer or to define. Do you agree?

Andy Brown: Not really. A woodlot is basically a forest allotment and it has been called allotment forestry. What we are saying in the part of our submission that you refer to is that the bill's key reference to allotments is about their being non-profit. The small-scale woodlot would have to be just for domestic firewood use. We think that there would be a big demand from rural people for small pieces of woodland that they could get their domestic firewood from. A system that included woodland allotments would probably be no more complicated than our current system—it would just mean that there would be, hopefully, a lot more allotments.

Cameron Buchanan: So you would not define an area for a woodland allotment—for example, so many square metres or a hectare?

Andy Brown: It would depend on the productivity of the wood.

Cameron Buchanan: Right. Thank you.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): Good afternoon. First, I want to concentrate on Mr Coulter's comments about scrutiny of the governance of third sector organisations. Mr Coulter, you said that you would want the public sector to be confident about the organisations that it deals with. I think that that goes to the heart of the bill. The question is how the third sector gives confidence to the various agencies that it wants to engage with that it is capable of carrying out its tasks in relation to community asset transfers. How far would you take that in relation to scrutiny, and who would carry out the scrutiny?

David Coulter: If there is a tender, I think that the scrutiny still has to rest with the commissioning or tendering body. If there is an asset transfer, the scrutiny needs to be done, again, by the public body that starts the transfer and should be done at the stage of analysing the business plan.

I suggest—I hope not too controversially—that communities are often attached to an asset, usually a building, and want to keep it when it is under threat but have not built the plan to bring it back into productive use and maintain it in productive use to ensure that they do not constantly go back to their local authority for a grant. That is where the interfaces come in. Our job is to build the capacity of third sector organisations to be more enterprising, to use the Scottish Government’s language. I apologise for the jargon, but it is really important that we understand that the era of grants is nearly over and that the third sector, such as Amanda Macaulay’s organisation, has to make sure that it is self-sufficient.

That is where the scrutiny must lie on asset transfer. We must not transfer assets simply because someone is attached to a building. If an asset has no future life in it, the community should not go anywhere near it, to be frank. However, that scrutiny role must rest with the public body. The confidence comes from those organisations being supported by 32 competent interfaces.

John Wilson: One of the issues that is raised in the bill is what happens if a public body refuses to transfer an asset. I take on board your comments about the need for a business plan to be in place before a community group makes an application for the transfer of an asset. I hope that the majority of community organisations or third sector organisations that request an asset transfer would have viable business plans in place before they make the request.

If a community organisation has what it considers to be a viable, sustainable business plan in place and the public body refuses to transfer the asset, should there be a right of appeal? In effect, you have just said that it would be up to the public body to determine whether the plan was sustainable and viable and whether the organisation could take on the public asset. Should the decision on whether to transfer a public asset rest only with the public body?

David Coulter: I am reluctant to suggest that we create an industry out of asset transfers and a planning-like system of applications and appeals so, almost instinctively, I am about to say no. I am also aware that public bodies are capable of making what appear on the face of it to be unjust decisions. How do we challenge that? I am not giving you a full answer because I am asking myself questions as I provide you with an answer. I would have thought that, if the business plan or the sustainability of the project was sufficiently well thought through, it is unlikely that we would find ourselves in the position that you describe, unless you can suggest evidence to the contrary.

John Wilson: At the moment, we cannot provide evidence because we do not know because the legislation is not in place.

David Coulter: Yes, we do not know.

John Wilson: I am trying to presuppose what could happen. Mr Brown has given an example. The Scottish Woodlot Association has had numerous discussions with the Forestry Commission Scotland about co-operatives taking over small parcels of land to allow them to carry out their functions, but the Forestry Commission keeps on citing the 2010 act to say that it cannot lease land that could come into productive use to a co-operative of workers.

I am trying to tease out what we could put into the bill that would safeguard the interests of a community organisation that has worked to put together a sustainable business plan but, when it takes it to the public body, has its request refused because the public body does not think that it is viable. Who determines the viability of the plan?

David Coulter: The example that you have just given me is not about viability but about the conflict between bits of legislation, as I read it, so it is in your or the United Kingdom Government’s hands, not our sector’s hands.

The deeper question is around our confidence in our public bodies to assess something fairly. If the decision becomes a quasi-judicial one, there should be a right of appeal, but are we entering into a quasi-judicial decision? I am not sure. We are entering into a contract to exchange land and buildings, and the decision that the public authority has to make is a due diligence one, in the same way as it would make a decision on entering into any other contract.

I genuinely do not want to give a yes answer and say that there should be a right of appeal, because I have not thought the question through, and I have many doubts in my head about creating an industry around those things. As a town planner by profession, I have seen the planning appeal system in operation, and it is abused. If an appeal system is set up, which would, I guess, have to be with an executive branch of the Scottish Government, people who could not take no for an answer would be at the doorstep with umpteen appeals.

Part of what is in my head is the fairness and the route. If the public authorities adopt what is genuinely an engagement process, they will be able to reach a decision that both parties will see as just and fair. If that is what we achieve, we do not need a right of appeal.

John Wilson: As I said, we are not just dealing with local authorities in the bill; potentially we are talking about public bodies. Mr Brown referred to the Forestry Commission Scotland, which is, in effect, a public body. It is run by and on behalf of the Scottish Government.

Mr Brown, in the written evidence that you submitted to the committee, you referred to how the Forestry Commission has dealt with requests for leases to be given for Forestry Commission land. Where have the successes been in taking on board Forestry Commission land? In the private sector, has there been greater success in acquiring leases on private land than there has been in respect of Forestry Commission land? Currently, the bill does not make any reference to private land as part of community asset transfers. We are talking about only public assets.

Andy Brown: Many tens of thousands of hectares of small woodlands across Scotland are currently unmanaged and have not been managed for the best part of 20 years, if not longer. That land is currently not being used to produce timber. Some of it is in the private sector and some of it is on state land.

The woodlot licences that we have already set up and the landowners with whom we are currently working are all in the private sector. They are all on small or larger estates that have unmanaged areas of woodland. Because we cannot currently set up licences on state land, we have had to pursue the private sector. Woodlot licences are based on what happens in British Columbia, where they are all put on state land because the public benefit to rural areas can be seen. To achieve real benefits in Scotland, we need to get woodlot licences on state land.

The Convener: Before Mr Wilson comes back in, it is important to get something on the record. We probably require more information. The Forestry Commission has a somewhat special status in that it is a cross-border public body that is not entirely governed by Scottish Parliament legislation; it is also governed by Westminster Parliament legislation. I do not know how knowledgeable you are, but we probably require more information on what the logjam—if you excuse the expression—is.

Andy Brown: Yes. I can illustrate that. We have just made a submission on that very topic to the Smith commission. The solution that we gave is an amendment to Scottish legislation, so it could be achieved by the Scottish Government through an amendment to the bill. We think that the most opportune time to achieve it is through this bill.

The Convener: I think that we will get more information on that. You are right to make the point and the cross-border aspect has been highlighted. Sorry, John, on you go.

John Wilson: I do not have another question, convener.

15:15

Stuart McMillan (West Scotland) (SNP): Should there be a national asset register? Would that be useful?

David Coulter: The point that immediately comes to mind is that if everyone contributes to a national register, public awareness will be greater than it would be if there were registers for all 32 local authorities and however many NHS boards and other public bodies we have—we could have a plethora of registers. If we had a single national register, there would be a greater chance of communities knowing about it and being able to search it.

The Convener: It was the ambition of community planning partnerships to produce an asset register for the public bodies in each partnership. How did that go in Dumfries and Galloway?

David Coulter: I do not know the answer to that. I do not know whether—

The Convener: You are looking at our next panel of witnesses; we can ask them later.

If such registers had already been produced, would life be much easier? We have heard about folk disagreeing about what is common-good land and not knowing who owns land, which is a barrier to the creation of an asset register.

David Coulter: We need to be careful when we try to distinguish between common-good and publicly owned land. I find the issue frustrating. In whose good is the land held? It is held for the good of the community—the public—and I imagine that the legal position is that a public body is the guardian of such land.

The issue for me is not whether we have registers but whether communities make the best use of assets. If we do not know what our assets are, the likelihood is that we are not making the best use of them.

The Convener: Sorry I interrupted you, Stuart. On you go.

Stuart McMillan: If a public body has a plethora of buildings and land but is not fully aware that it owns those assets, how can a small community or community organisation, particularly in a largely rural area such as Dumfries and Galloway, be aware of the assets?

David Coulter: That is some question. If the public authorities do not know what they own—and there is a chance of that; I have had that experience, wearing another hat in another place and at another time—then that is to do with how we record ownership of land in Scotland over time, and we are into a set of questions that I cannot possibly answer here.

Stuart McMillan: It was worth a try.

David Coulter: It was. I come back to the point that I made earlier. I like the idea of a national register, with publicity around it so that people know that it is there. We should be adding to that register bits of underused and unloved private land, and we should make all the people of Scotland aware that those are potential community assets that communities could tap into.
Stuart McMillan: That is helpful, because it takes me to my next question. Section 48 will insert new section 97F, “Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land”, into the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. Do you have a clear understanding of what constitutes abandoned land?

David Coulter: At some point, the bill will need to be made more specific in its definitions—good luck with that, by the way. If there is not a tighter definition, it is inevitable that we will end up in endless debate about whether or not land has been abandoned. As you know, landowning interests in Scotland take the view that it is not for any arm of Government or for the community to decide whether something is abandoned—the view is, “I own it and I will decide how I use it.” We will come up against that element, and a clearer definition would help in that regard.

I can think of examples of specific areas of land, buildings and harbours where the landlord has become absent. The land has not necessarily been abandoned, but the use of the particular asset has not necessarily been in the community interest. The question of abandonment, in my view, therefore does not arise. The question on the best use of a particular asset in the community is a political one, and I think that the committee should address it.

As I mentioned in the earlier discussion session, there are other aspects missing, such as the impact of second homes on some rural communities. One could say, to get to the strings of the argument, that a second home that is occupied for two weeks of the year has been abandoned. How is that for one?

The Convener: That opens up cans of worms I am keen to hear Mr Brown’s comments on the issue of abandonment.

Andy Brown: The land registry is a key element, and it should be developed as soon as possible. As David Coulter mentioned, the issue is partly that communities often do not know what assets they own. There is often a lot of cloudiness around who owns what, which has led in the past to a lot of common land being lost. It is high time that we addressed that. The land reform review group is looking at a land registry for the whole of Scotland, which will take some time to set up, but we should look first at common land, and it should perhaps be registered first.

Stuart McMillan: Another question about the bill concerns the right to buy, which also touches on the issue of allotments. Should there be a closer tie between the right to buy and allotments? Should there be a preferential system to benefit a group in the community that wants to take on a piece of land to establish allotments?

The Convener: I realise, folks, that you are not allotment experts, but do you want to have a bash at that?

David Coulter: Absolutely—I would not mind having a bash at that at all. Public authorities own a lot of open land, predominantly in urban areas, and they face great problems in how the land is maintained. There are usually large tracts of land that require the grass to be cut and no more. It is common sense that, if we want to increase the number of allotments, we should encourage third sector groups. A lot of allotment societies, going back to the 1920s, would have accessed land because they were granted it, so why should they not be able to exercise a community right to buy?

I can think of tracts of land not too far from here where public authorities have significant problems with upkeep. Why should those tracts not be turned into allotments and used for a much greater community benefit in growing food? There are other agendas in Scotland in that respect, and we need to join them up.

The Convener: Do you want to have a crack at that, Mr Brown?

Andy Brown: Our association’s model is based on leasing rather than buying, so we would not look for a right to buy. From our perspective, if forest land is already owned by the state, we do not necessarily see an advantage in the ownership as such being passed to our association. We can offer rental income and get the land managed, so we would not necessarily pursue the right to buy.

The Convener: Mr Coulter, you mentioned definitions in your previous answer. What do the witnesses think of the definitions of organisations that can become community participation and community transfer bodies? Are they appropriate?

David Coulter: Without going into a lot of detail, I think that you have more work to do in that area. I refer you to Voluntary Action Scotland’s previous response on that issue, from which I would not dissent.

The Convener: So we need to go back and look at Martin Docherty’s evidence again.

David Coulter: I have it here, but you do not want me to start repeating it, given that it has already been submitted.

The Convener: No.
David Coulter: I simply say that the issues that it raises in addressing that question are the same ones that I would raise.

The Convener: Grand—that is very useful. Ms Macaulay, do you have a view on the issue?

Amanda Macaulay: Not really—I do not quite understand the question, to be honest, so I will not answer.

The Convener: Mr Brown, do you have anything to add?

Andy Brown: As I said earlier, the definition is one of the key things that I wanted to talk about today. We believe that industrial and provident societies should be treated similarly to other bodies across the piece, because we can deliver the same advantages and the same community opportunities as other bodies.

The Convener: I thank you for your evidence today. I hope that the experience was not too painful—I am sure that it was not. I will suspend the meeting for five minutes for a change of witnesses.

15:26

Meeting suspended.

15:31

On resuming—

The Convener: Apparently some folk in the public gallery are having difficulty in hearing us, so I ask members to go nearer the mics. Can people hear me okay? Yes—thank you.

Dr Elaine Murray, the MSP for Dumfriesshire, has joined us in the public gallery. After the meeting, if anyone wants to relay anything else to us about the bill, they can do so through her office. I am sure that she will be glad to hear from you.

I welcome the second panel of witnesses: Jeff Ace, chief executive of NHS Dumfries and Galloway; Geraldine McCann, head of administration and legal services at South Lanarkshire Council; Douglas Scott, senior policy adviser at Scottish Borders Council; Kay Gilmour, head of community support in the department of education at East Ayrshire Council; and Louise Matheson, senior manager in property and architectural services at Dumfries and Galloway Council. Would anyone like to make an opening statement?

Douglas Scott (Scottish Borders Council): Yes. Thank you for inviting me along today. Scottish Borders Council welcomes the thrust of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and its various intentions to engage and empower communities, make the most of communities’ talents and look at how that can support service delivery.

Working with communities is crucial. In a rural area such as the Scottish Borders, we are fortunate to still have strong communities not only in our towns but in our villages and more rural areas. That is a huge opportunity and potential for us.

We have many examples in the Scottish Borders of excellent community engagement and community development work, which involves having strong economic, social and environmental outputs across the range of services concerning older people, welfare reform, transport, children and young people, community safety, culture and sport, economic development and regeneration, and community resilience. That work has a particular focus on supporting disadvantaged communities and groups.

The council submitted a detailed response when the Scottish Government had its main consultation on community empowerment.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to make an opening statement?

Louise Matheson (Dumfries and Galloway Council): Yes, thank you. Dumfries and Galloway Council very much welcomes the bill.

We have a reasonable track record on empowering communities to take over assets. There are a number of good examples of that—the committee heard about one this morning when it heard about the Usual Place. Just in the past month, the council has in preparing its new commitments and priorities explicitly recognised the need to be an inclusive council and has made a commitment to empowering our communities to make the most of their assets. As I said, we welcome the bill, and we thank the committee for the opportunity to give evidence.

The Convener: You mentioned the Usual Place. The committee that runs the project gave us a good presentation this morning about its endeavours. It has had difficulties with lease arrangements, which is not unusual, as we have found that in other places, too. How can such difficulties be overcome? Will the bill when enacted bring about a change in practice to ensure that some difficulties are ironed out long before crisis point is reached?

Louise Matheson: To take your second question first, I am not convinced that the bill will in itself change that. The critical thing is the guidance and so forth that will underpin the bill—it needs to be simplified and streamlined and it should endeavour to make it straightforward for communities to take ownership of or manage their assets.

As for your point about the complexity of finalising leases, we are constantly learning on that issue. Obviously, each lease has different circumstances, which depend on the asset. As was discussed earlier, a number of parties at the council are involved. Usually, there are colleagues from the estate section and from the legal section. Often, the pressures on them and their priorities dictate how quickly something is addressed, despite their best intentions to resolve things as quickly as possible. As I said, the issue also depends on the specific asset.

There was a discussion with the previous panel about an asset register. Although it was not the case with the premises for the Usual Place, quite a number of title checks sometimes have to be done to be clear about the delineation of the asset or the property’s exact boundary. Each case is a learning experience. I was not directly involved in the lease for the Usual Place’s premises, but I am certainly happy to give more written information on that, if it would help the committee.

The Convener: That would be extremely useful.

My next question is for all the panel members. In current practice, are local authorities and other public bodies a little risk averse in dealing with some of these issues?

Louise Matheson: There are always concerns about the various practicalities that might arise in taking on an asset, especially if it is an existing building that involves a number of practical considerations. When a community group or body seeks to take on an asset, it needs to do so on the basis of a business plan for using the asset. However, the council or organisation that has to assess that will not necessarily be well versed in what the community group might need to do. There are practicalities, such as how the group will manage the building and take on the premises, what it will do in relation to building safety and maintenance and what capital work might be done at the outset.

Understanding all that can be complex. Some things are very set, regardless of the specific asset involved, while other things depend on specific circumstances, and there is probably quite a bit of work to do to make things more straightforward for communities and council officers in dealing with practicalities. Dumfries and Galloway Council has a disposal policy, which will need to be revisited in light of the bill, as well as a community asset transfer process, which was set up earlier this year to make it easier and more straightforward for communities to take on their assets, come up with practical proposals and make clear how they will look after assets.

Especially when there is not just a desire but a definite need on the part of public bodies and local authorities to make savings, many organisations—including Dumfries and Galloway Council, which owns numerous properties and assets—are under pressure to make better use of their assets, to rationalise and potentially to release assets for sale. The council has had to do just that over the past number of years, and with certain properties that it has marketed people have, as Mr Coulter mentioned, had a desire to save the building instead of having a use for the building in mind. Often the starting point is people saying, "We want to keep that building," and a piece of work needs to be carried out to come up with a use for it.

The Convener: We might come back to that policy in a little while. Does Mr Ace think that we are risk averse in our current practice?

Jeff Ace (NHS Dumfries and Galloway): Yes. We need to give a bit more thought to what that means. In accepting the need not to be risk averse, we also have to accept the potential for and the consequences of failure and to be comfortable with dealing with them. A risk-taking organisation will not call it correctly every time; if it did, no risk would be involved. We still have some way to go if we are to be tolerant of the consequences of taking an ill-judged risk.

The Convener: Are the audit bodies tolerant of that?

Jeff Ace: Their mechanisms for assessing us are clear, well defined and easy to understand. Throughout my career, external auditors have stated that in order to be a more dynamic organisation we have to take more risks, but I have seen less tolerance of failure that results from ill-judged risks. That is why public bodies edge towards a rather staid and conservative approach to risk taking.

Geraldine McCann (South Lanarkshire Council): I agree, although I would describe the approach to risk taking as cautious. After all, we have a duty to follow the public pound, a duty to achieve best value in the use of our resources and a duty to our community. It would be wrong to allow an asset to be transferred if by doing so we were setting someone up to fail.

It is important to work with the community body to ensure that a proposal is viable and sustainable and that the people involved have a hope of achieving it, and that is what South Lanarkshire Council is attempting to do in the community asset transfer process that it has put in place. The bill’s design will assist that process by enhancing it, and that will help us to achieve our aim.
15:45

My concern relates to timescales. From my experience, when a community body first approaches the council, it does not have a business plan; it has an idea. It needs assistance to pull together the business plan. It needs to talk to the appropriate people to get guidance on how to develop a business plan, how to engage the rest of its community—it might have spoken only to a small proportion of its community—and how to access funding. It then needs to come back to the council with a viable proposal that allows us to take the request to a committee for a decision.

It can take anything up to six months before we get to the committee stage. Afterwards, there will be people who are unhappy because the request was not granted, but that might be because, after the due diligence was done on the proposals, the council was not satisfied that the business plan was robust enough to deliver the asset and make it workable for the community.

Kay Gilmour (East Ayrshire Council): I would describe the approach as having the right checks and balances in place. Some time ago, we recognised that we faced many challenges in relation to the number of properties that we had. One of our workstreams in what we called our transformation strategy was linked to our properties and facilities, and we established a dedicated community asset transfer team. It comprises a surveyor, a lawyer, somebody from our property services and, importantly, two community workers. For us, that has been critical to building capacity in our communities and finding what I describe as community solutions to something that was undoubtedly a challenge to us in the local authority.

We are now experienced in our process, which probably takes six months from an expression of interest to a stage 2 application coming in from the community group. That is very much about ensuring that the group’s business plan is sustainable and founded on strong business principles and that the asset will be used and retained for the community. Thereafter, it probably takes about six months to get to our committee decision-making process.

Douglas Scott: Scottish Borders Council is committed to the transfer of assets. It feeds into our outcomes, as I said. It also links into the pressures that we face on council budgets and the need to consider how we support services in that context.

We have an asset transfer policy. In transferring assets, we must be mindful of best value and there is a major responsibility on us from the public and communities to do that correctly.

We work with a range of community bodies on a range of asset transfers. It is important to be cautious, because taking over an asset puts a big responsibility on a community, as we look for the community to be sustainable and to get a sustainable asset and revenue stream. Business plans are therefore important, as are the robustness and sustainability of the community group and how it goes about its organisational work.

All those matters need to be considered before an asset is transferred. It is also necessary to build in conditions with regard to the asset to ensure that the community does not take on too much. That safeguards the community as well as the local authority.

The Convener: I have a couple of quick questions and would like brief answers, if possible.

Ms Gilmour mentioned the community asset transfer team in East Ayrshire Council. Do the other councils have similar transfer teams?

Ms McCann and Ms Gilmour indicated timelines from the beginning of a transfer request to committee stage. Do the other councils and NHS Dumfries and Galloway have timelines in that regard?

Douglas Scott: I will have to come back to you with information on timelines.

Scottish Borders Council has an asset transfer group that is led by our property manager, who is supported by a person who looks after external funding. It provides strong advice to communities. We are working very closely with communities.

The Convener: Are community workers involved in that, as they are in East Ayrshire?

Douglas Scott: We have community work involvement in that group.

Louise Matheson: Dumfries and Galloway Council has a process that allows a maximum period of 18 months for the community group to bring forward its proposals and for the transfer to happen. That is divided into two clear stages: stage 1 is the application, which involves discussion between the council and the relevant group, and the second stage involves detailed assessment so that the proposal can be taken to committee with a recommendation. The council has no dedicated team, as such. Officers in different departments work collectively, as required. There is an initial point of contact in the community officer and the council’s community and customer services department. There is a very proactive process to engage with communities for them to take on particular assets, or to set up service level agreements if they are not taking on the asset fully but are maximising their management of it.
Jeff Ace: NHS Dumfries and Galloway has no dedicated team. It is interesting that at the same time as the bill is progressing, we are going through the process of health and social care integration. In Dumfries and Galloway that will mean the creation, between us and the council, of four joint localities with one manager. We will need to look at whether in each of those localities we have a pathway to enable such requests to be dealt with effectively. Clearly, the bulk of our community assets, from a health point of view, will rest in those localities and will be under the stewardship of the integrated joint board, rather than the health board.

The Convener: Does South Lanarkshire Council have a team?

Geraldine McCann: We do not have a team, as such, but our property manager in housing and technical resources is heavily involved, as are our planning and regeneration teams. There has been a great deal of involvement within the council over the past three years and a number of assets have been transferred successfully to community groups.

The Convener: Ms Gilmour has already given an answer, but is there anything else that you wish to add?

Kay Gilmour: Through our transformation fund we established resources that are available for community groups to bring buildings up to an appropriate standard. We recognised that some buildings needed work on their physical infrastructure and we wanted to support organisations before transferring anything to a lease, so we established a dedicated fund to allow us to do that. That has been helpful to, and supportive of, the overall process.

The Convener: Ms Matheson mentioned 18 months. My understanding is that the Usual Place had a draft lease in April 2013, but still has no lease. I know that it is probably not possible for you to say today why that is the case, but the committee would be extremely grateful if we could have the reason why that lease has taken so long and has fallen outwith your timelines. If you could get that in writing to the clerks, it would be extremely useful.

Louise Matheson: Yes.

John Wilson: Good afternoon. Following Ms McCann’s response to the convener, I ask how many community asset transfers have been requested to date in South Lanarkshire Council and how many have been granted.

Geraldine McCann: I do not have the figures with me today, but I will be happy to supply them in writing, once I return to the office.

The Convener: That would be very useful.

Folk do not need to touch the microphones; they come on and off themselves. It is hard to get used to, particularly when you are used to council chambers, where you are constantly pressing buttons.

John Wilson: I would like answers from the rest of the panel.

Jeff Ace: I am not aware of any requests to the health board, but I will check formally and let the clerks know.

Kay Gilmour: If we, too, could get back to you on that, that would be helpful.

The Convener: That would be grand.

Louise Matheson: We will need to get back to you on the number of requests that have been made.

Douglas Scott: I will do that, too.

John Wilson: I look forward to the responses. Do you have an asset transfer policy in place and what is your appeals process when an asset transfer has been refused?

The Convener: Does anybody want to have a crack at that? Have you had any cases in which there have been refusals? If we could get responses about that in the same letter, that would be useful.

John Wilson: This is my final question. I hope that I can get an answer to it. What is your authorities’ current thinking on the demand that might be generated by the legislation?

Jeff Ace: That is a very difficult question. The big change that is going on in parallel for us at the moment is the integration of health and social care. If we can get that right, one of the offshoots should be a greater localisation of decision making back into our former natural localities in the region.

That should generate a debate about the nature of health and social care at a very local level that perhaps we have been struggling to get going so far. You could take an optimistic view that that greater engagement—if we can pull that off—and that greater empowerment of real, very local and very community-based decision making could generate a substantial amount of requests in both those fields.

At the moment, I am not aware of any requests to the health board, but I will check formally and let the clerks know. If we could get responses about that in the same letter, that would be useful.

Jeff Ace: That is a very difficult question. The big change that is going on in parallel for us at the moment is the integration of health and social care. If we can get that right, one of the offshoots should be a greater localisation of decision making back into our former natural localities in the region.

That should generate a debate about the nature of health and social care at a very local level that perhaps we have been struggling to get going so far. You could take an optimistic view that that greater engagement—if we can pull that off—and that greater empowerment of real, very local and very community-based decision making could generate a substantial amount of requests in both those fields.

At the moment, I am not aware of a single request, so we will be going from a very low base to—I hope—a much higher one.

Geraldine McCann: I anticipate a much higher level of requests from the community, based on communication about the bill and anticipation and awareness raising within the community. Many organisations are ready for greater participation in their communities because they know that councils and other public sector bodies’ resources are stretched, and feel that they could add something to their communities and deliver on behalf of them. I expect an increased number of requests to come to South Lanarkshire Council.

Kay Gilmour: Originally, I was a bit reticent about giving a number in response to Mr Wilson’s question because I can give you the number of initial expressions of interest that we have had—133 in the past nine to 12 months—but I cannot give you the rest of the figures. That gives you some context with regard to what increase we might anticipate from the legislation.

We also have locality planning in our area, and we have established nine community-led action plans, which have been genuinely led by the local community. We intend to roll that out to all communities in East Ayrshire. Perhaps with that, coupled with the implementation of the legislation, we may start to see more requests coming through, but for us just now, 133 is quite a significant number. I cannot tell you what will be the knock-on impact.

Louise Matheson: At the moment, it is difficult to judge properly, but because of the amount of engagement that we have had with communities in this regard, it is hard to believe that there will be a hugely greater volume of requests than we have at present. The vast majority of requests tend to be in relation to community halls, community centres and so on. There could be more expressions of interest in other types of council buildings, but it is a difficult one to call.

Douglas Scott: We are seeing a change with the community empowerment bill and other things that are happening; we are seeing from communities increased interest in and demand for asset transfer. The big issue, thinking ahead, is how we can get specialist support into community groups: helping disadvantaged groups, for example, so that they are able to take over assets, which can be quite intensive work. Even groups with high capacity need specialist support to take forward aspects of community transfer and to think through their sustainability in the longer term. A big investment is required in that, because there are gaps even in councils and the voluntary sector.

People also look to business gateway to get support. We have to look at how public bodies and local authorities can get organised, and at how we give communities good support to move forward.

16:00

John Wilson: I am grateful for Ms Gilmour’s figure of 133 expressions of interest. Has East Ayrshire Council done any analysis of the nature of the asset transfer requests? Ms Matheson said that the biggest demand for community asset transfers in Dumfries and Galloway related to community halls and village halls. Is the picture in East Ayrshire similar?

Kay Gilmour: Yes. We also include football pavilions in the figure that I gave. However, interest is mainly in community halls and facilities.

John Wilson: Thank you very much.

Mark McDonald: In various evidence sessions we have touched on the difference between communities that have capacity and those that do not. Kay Gilmour talked about the council assessing business plans that are submitted. Some communities will have the expertise to take from the idea stage to the stage of presenting a business plan to a local authority a proposal to take on the running of an asset, be that owning it or leasing it, but many do not have that capacity. Do you see a role for your public body in giving those communities the required assistance to get them to that stage? I get the impression that many councils see offering that support as a conflict of interests, rather than as being in the mutual interest of the council and the community.

Kay Gilmour: We have two community workers on our dedicated team to support organisations in building their confidence and capacity. We also work closely with the Development Trusts Association Scotland, which has done quite a lot of work in East Ayrshire in supporting organisations, and which is absolutely expert in that. We also work with the third sector interface. We have lawyers and quantity surveyors on our dedicated team in order that we can offer their professional advice without compromising our overall legal services department. We are taking quite a holistic approach with community groups in order to enable them to get to the stage at which they can submit plans.

Although to date our experience is that it has taken six months to get from expression of interest to committee, it took longer than that when we supported a group in carrying out feasibility studies on facilities that it is interested in taking on. That was not about us; it was very much about enabling that organisation to carry out feasibility studies on the facilities in question. Six months is the average, but the process can take longer.

Geraldine McCann: It is not for the council to develop the capacity, but to give advice, assistance and pointers as to where to get advice from; there could be a conflict of interests if the council was to deliver some advice. Perhaps I am being risk averse, but if an organisation’s bid was unsuccessful, having acted wholly on the council’s advice, I could see there being a challenge to the council.
However, we have packs that give organisations guidance on the sorts of things that they should include in their business plans, and directions to where support can be found.

The Convener: When you said “packs”, was that an acronym?

Geraldine McCann: I was talking about our guidance pack on community transfer, which has been prepared through our community planning team, with our estates advisers. It gives pointers and direction, but we do not assist people in preparing plans.

Jeff Ace: Mark McDonald asked a key question. If we look at the issue strategically, we can see that the future of viable health and social care depends on community capacity and communities’ ability to work with us to solve their problems. If we are identifying communities that do not have that capacity, that is not neutral—it is a real problem for us, because such communities will not have the resilience that is required in the context of the big changes in health and social care that will come over the next decade or so.

We simply have to enable and support such communities. Who is best placed to do that is a tricky question; I take you back to David Coulter’s evidence about the role of organisations such as Dumfries third sector interface, which might be more appropriate than organisations such as mine, in that we will almost certainly get it wrong, because we are coming at it from a top-down perspective, which is the wrong perspective. We need to engage with partnerships such as David Coulter’s, which can tell us how to help communities.

My organisation can offer good public health support; our workers can put things in terms of building healthy communities. However, we are not skilled in developing the sort of capacity that Mark McDonald talked about, and we need help from organisations such as David Coulter’s and the Scottish Health Council, so that we form a coalition of support to work with the community. As I said, not supporting communities is not a neutral option; there is a real risk to us.

Douglas Scott: The reality is that the groups that are looking to transfer assets such as village halls and community facilities often represent the wider community and have the support of elected members. We are all in it together, and it is in our best interests to ensure that business plans are as strong as possible. As I said, we do not want the asset back—the high street building or whatever. We want to ensure that communities can sustain the facilities that they take on into the future.

That is why it is important that we are all in this together. The council has people, of course, as does the voluntary sector, and we must look at how we share work so that we get the greatest benefit. There is a gap in specialist support, and we must strengthen specialist support on various aspects of taking on an asset and making it work in the long term.

Louise Matheson: We provide guidance and support to groups that are interested in taking on assets, and we direct people to the likes of DTA Scotland for more specific advice.

It is not appropriate for the local authority to do everything, for a number of reasons—conflicts of interests being one of them. I argue that it is crucial that there is a central point for guidance and support, rather than having each public body or local authority provide support. The issues are similar up and down the land, regardless of the public body or local authority in question. For instance, in every case in which a building is transferred, the body that takes it on must consider the safety issues that it will have to manage. It would be better if there were a central place to which people could go—that includes the likes of DTA Scotland. That would also provide the opportunity for those bodies to network and to learn from one another’s experience.

Mark McDonald: If a community organisation wants to take on an asset, how easy is it for it to know who to go to?

Jeff Ace: We have not publicised information on how an organisation would go about that—we would work closely with the council to use its greater expertise—so we have a way to go to publicise the bill’s implications for health services.

Geraldine McCann: We have a section on the council website that directs individuals who are interested in community asset transfer to the appropriate people. The main source of contact in the first instance tends to be the council’s property services team. It then calls in other professionals as required to give advice.

Kay Gilmour: We also have information on a dedicated part of our website. We try to identify a named person for each of our communities. That has been important for us not just in relation to community asset transfer, but in relation to some of our other work in communities.

We have issued two newsletters, which have gone out to as many groups as possible, including community councils.

Louise Matheson: Because we have actively gone out to speak to communities over the past couple of years to see whether there is an interest in taking on particular assets, it is currently straightforward for people to identify who to speak to. Whether that would be the case ordinarily, I could not say.
There are also opportunities when there are surplus properties. People can approach the estates team if they have an interest in a property. At that point, if the community group is interested, the property will be taken off or not put on the market until the group has had an opportunity to go through the process.

Douglas Scott: We also have a clearly defined asset transfer process that people are directed to, so that matters can progress.

Mark McDonald: I have one last question on an issue that came up during our earlier round-table discussion. Is it fair to say that community asset transfers can sometimes be stifled by a lack of appreciation of what best value means? Best value is often viewed through a monetary prism, so it is about getting the best monetary value and not necessarily the best community value for the asset.

Douglas Scott: A number of factors must be taken into account with asset transfer. A local authority has responsibility to ensure that the process is, as I have said, viable and sustainable. It must also consider where a community body is coming from. For example, where we are looking to develop assets—that could be a health facility, a school or a public building—and a group is looking to delay that development for other reasons, we must consider its views and take those into account. Therefore, the local authority needs to consider the wider issues.

Another example is the potential capital receipts for selling a site viable for a commercial development. We must think about those wider aspects when we are considering whether to accept a community asset transfer request.

The Convener: I will add to Mark McDonald’s question. Mark asked about monetary value. With all due respect, we probably did not get the whole answer there, Mr Scott. There is the power of wellbeing. How often has your local authority used the power to advance wellbeing and perhaps put to one side the monetary aspects when it comes to community asset transfers?

Douglas Scott: I think that, as an example of the broader expression of that power, the support that we are giving to a lot of these communities for asset transfers is all about wellbeing. We are also providing facilities on long-term leases and at what is sometimes quite a low rental. All of that is being factored into our asset transfer process. My point is that local authorities have to take a wider view of asset transfers.

The Convener: So no asset transfer has taken place in the Scottish Borders on the recommendation to councillors that it should happen under the power to advance wellbeing.

Douglas Scott: I would have to check and come back to you on that.

16:15

Louise Matheson: I know of such instances. I cannot give you the exact number off the top of my head but, if it helps the committee, I can come back with more examples in writing.

I am not sure, convener, whether the initial question referred to a lack of appreciation by public organisations, the communities they might engage with or both.

Mark McDonald: It is all about how public organisations perceive best value, and it is fair to say that the landscape in that respect is very mixed. The committee always hears evidence that best value is perfectly understood but, when I have dealt with these things, best value has been viewed purely through the monetary prism, not necessarily through the prism of the wider community benefits that are supposed to be attached to it.

Louise Matheson: Our council very much recognises the need to take that into account in considering best value; indeed, we have a number of examples of recent transfers that have happened for those very reasons and which have taken place for a nominal sum as a lease or an outright purchase. In such cases, the council will be presented with the considerations in relation to the overall picture instead of just the monetary aspects. That said, I certainly know of a property for which there were competing offers, one of which was less than best consideration and the other much closer to the market value; both cases were presented to the council to consider which of them to accept.

The Convener: And which one did it accept?

Louise Matheson: It accepted the higher offer, but it agreed to support the party that made the other offer—in that case, it was a charitable organisation—in finding a suitable alternative property.

Kay Gilmour: Taking the second question first, I am not aware of any cases in which we have sought authorisation through committees specifically in relation to the power of wellbeing. I should point out that, in all of our committee papers, we always give consideration to community planning implications, although I recognise that that is not the same thing.

As for the question of best value, we are working with two communities just now on three or four community buildings, none of which is very well used. We have had detailed discussions with those communities and have said that, if we close the other two or three buildings, we will invest in the one remaining building that the community, which has said that it wants ownership, can take on. That approach has been very successful for us, and it shows that we genuinely try to take a whole-community perspective on what is needed in a particular community. It would have cost between £300,000 and £500,000 to bring one of those buildings up to scratch and put it at the heart of the community. Although we might not have taken that proposal to the committee under the specific power to advance community wellbeing, I think that it is nevertheless an example of where we have worked with the community, looked at its wellbeing and come up with a community solution.

Geraldine McCann: In community transfer applications, we always not only assess best value in monetary terms but assess the community value and benefit that might be achieved by transferring the asset to a particular community group. There have been occasions on which an asset has been transferred or leased at low value because the impact in terms of community benefit was believed to be greater. In the past 18 months, we have used the power to advance wellbeing to aid a charity that wished to improve a facility. The charity was already using it but wished to take ownership. However, although it wanted to invest in the facility for the benefit of the community, it could not afford to pay the market value for the land and the building.

The application was assessed fully, and the council decided that the proposed ownership would benefit the wider South Lanarkshire area rather than just the locality in which the facility was situated. The council accepted that there was a lack of provision elsewhere of the type of facility that the charity offered, and that overall it was better for the benefit of the wider community to use the power to advance wellbeing to give the charity the asset.

Jeff Ace: There is a slight peculiarity with regard to health assets. When we declare an asset as surplus to requirements, we need to inform the Scottish Government that the receipt is likely to come into the pot. The receipt itself will then be used to add to the overall capital that is available to the Scottish national health service. There is therefore a macro complication in that respect. If we were to forgo a capital receipt, that money would not flow back to the Scottish Government and would not be available for projects elsewhere or locally.

Having said that, we are under the same best value obligations as our local government colleagues. We attempt to look at the wider implications of our decisions on assets, and we are audited accordingly on those best value principles.

Cameron Buchanan: We heard today, and we have heard from other councillors, that there should be a regular opportunity for the public to address their councillors in public en masse. Do you agree with that?

The Convener: That is slightly outwith the scope of the bill—

Cameron Buchanan: It is, but it was mentioned earlier today.

The Convener: Okay—fair play. Mr Scott can go first. It is a difficult question for an officer to answer, I have to say.

Douglas Scott: We have area forums in which there are open questions from the public and communities. There are five forums across the Scottish Borders in which councillors and community planning partners are involved, and they meet regularly.

Louise Matheson: We do not have such an opportunity as set up in the exact manner that has been described, to the best of my knowledge. We have area committees and so on, which the public can attend, but they are not set up in the way that the question suggests.

Kay Gilmour: We do not have such things as set up in the way that the question suggests.

Geraldine McCann: We are the same as the other councils. We have area forums, citizens panels and tenants panels, all of which councillors attend. There are always public meetings on large issues, and planning issues in particular, which council officers and councillors within and outwith the planning process will attend.

Cameron Buchanan: The real question was about whether you can get all the councillors together so that issues can be discussed, even at the end of a council meeting. Does Mr Ace want to say anything?

The Convener: As Mr Ace is from the NHS, I do not think that he can say very much about councils.

Jeff Ace: I will tread carefully. We need to push the issue from a Dumfries and Galloway point of view. We have an area of 2,500 square miles, so for us the area committee structure, in which we have four locality meetings, works pretty well. I am frequently invited to attend those meetings, and they are very well attended by elected members. There is a full and frank exchange with members of the local public at those meetings. For a dispersed rural population, our model is probably more appropriate than the combined model that has been suggested.

Stuart McMillan: Good afternoon. The bill requires public bodies to consider how requests are "likely to promote or improve—
(i) economic development,
(ii) regeneration,
(iii) public health,
(iv) social wellbeing, or
(v) environmental wellbeing"

However, it does not say how those decisions should be prioritised or balanced. How would your individual organisations approach that aspect?

Jeff Ace: We have a performance committee governance structure that is well used to looking at multifaceted business cases and assessing, on the balance of the risks and opportunities that are presented, what is the best way forward, so I do not see the bill presenting a particular challenge in that regard. The public health benefits would be easily assessed by us; equally, we are very experienced at working with community planning partners on the wider assessment. I do not think that we would have a particular problem in engaging in case evaluation through our existing governance structures.

Geraldine McCann: Likewise, I do not foresee any difficulty with that. Our current structure is such that an options appraisal and an analysis of risk are included in every paper that goes to committee.

The Convener: Does anyone have a different view? No one does.

Stuart McMillan: The Development Trusts Association Scotland has suggested that there should be negotiated settlements—in other words, that any conditions that are attached should be negotiated with the community group. Do the witnesses support that proposal?

Douglas Scott: I would have to come back to you on that. I need to consider the suggestion more.

Louise Matheson: If one side is not happy with the conditions that are attached, it will not be possible to proceed. Therefore, if the community says that it cannot accept a condition, that must be discussed, and some other alternative should be agreed if possible.

Kay Gilmour: I am probably in the same position of not having the necessary technical detail on leases to answer the question. We have established a model lease. One would expect some negotiation to take place if there were issues with that, but I do not have a technical background, so I do not feel able to give a full answer.

Geraldine McCann: I would expect a period of negotiation before the decision stage was reached, so that both parties were comfortable with any conditions that were to be attached.

Jeff Ace: I agree entirely with that point.

Stuart McMillan: How many allotments are there in each of your local authority areas? I will ask Mr Ace a separate question in a moment, so he is not getting off lightly.

The Convener: If I allow you to ask it.

Are there any allotment experts who can answer Mr McMillan’s question? Ms Matheson looks keen to answer.

Louise Matheson: I am not an allotment expert, but I can tell you that Dumfries and Galloway Council has 95 allotment plots in the Nithsdale area and 16 in the Annandale and Eskdale area. From the information that I have in front of me, I believe that that is it.

Douglas Scott: I would have to get that information for you.

The Convener: What is your question for Mr Ace, Mr McMillan?

Stuart McMillan: Funnily enough, it is also on allotments. It goes back to something that Mr Ace said about capital receipts. The money would go back to the Scottish Government, but if you had an asset that you no longer required, would it be feasible for you to turn some of the land into allotments, particularly if that would have a mental health and wellbeing benefit?

Jeff Ace: That would certainly be possible, but it would depend on discussions taking place with the Scottish Government’s capital division to ensure that it had not earmarked an anticipated revenue from us. We would have to negotiate with it to allow local flexibility. We have numerous examples of that.

There is not a uniform position whereby, once a property has been disposed of, the money automatically flows to the Scottish Government. We constantly discuss the best use of that with the Government, and the process tends to work well. We have flexibility when it comes to the sort of negotiation that you are talking about.

Stuart McMillan: Do you work in tandem with mental health organisations such as the Scottish Association for Mental Health, whereby services are provided that involve people with mental health issues receiving training in, for example, gardening techniques?

Jeff Ace: We have been involved in a number of community gardening projects. Moreover, as committee members might be aware, we are on the cusp of starting work on a new acute hospital, where we plan to set aside land for gardening and allotments and to work with community groups on growing food for the hospital. That is a big departure for us and is in Scottish terms quite radical.

16:30

The Convener: I note that we have not really touched on participation requests. What issues are you preparing to deal with as part of such requests?

Jeff Ace: As I have said, we are on the cusp of implementing the health and social care integration proposals and establishing our integrated joint board, which will create an impetus to change service provision at a locality level. I expect that there will be—and we will desperately encourage—community participation in the process with regard to the future shape and sustainability of services, and we would expect and encourage requests for involvement in service change from each of the four localities.

Douglas Scott: There is a range of issues to address. Although the whole process has been logically set out, more thinking needs to be done about the numbers. For example, it is difficult to predict what will come forward in the process; there could be a large number of requests, but we just do not know. The proposal needs to be piloted. The freedom of information process, for example, has grown over time, and we could find quite an increase in numbers as a result of the measure.

We have other concerns. For a start, we will all have to make changes to our budgets as we move through the financial perspective that has been put in place for the next five years. Communities will be concerned about that, and we must ensure that the process contains certain safeguards. I know that the bill contains a provision on repeat requests, but it needs to be a bit stronger and to reflect the fact that, at the end of the day, local authorities as public bodies will have to make certain decisions that affect communities. We will do our best, but the issue needs to be considered.

Not all communities are in the same position on participation. Some communities are strong on it, but others are not, which brings us back to the need for support for capacity building. We are already doing that for disadvantaged groups, but perhaps we need more of that approach to ensure that the process works.

The Convener: So you see budgetary matters as the main issue that will be raised in participation requests.

Douglas Scott: Other matters will be raised, but the budget will certainly be one of them. After all, it will be quite a focus for communities. Perhaps the approach should be piloted in two or three areas to find out whether it is effective.

The Convener: We have been told that “Communities can be considered experts in their own needs and by enabling greater input into service planning and delivery, the public sector may uncover innovative delivery mechanisms which more effectively meet their service users’ requirements”, but you seem to see all this as a threat.

Douglas Scott: No, I do not. I recognise that, as you have just said, ideas could come forward that might result in more savings and efficiencies. I am not disputing the statement; all that I am saying is that we need to consider other aspects of the participation process.

Geraldine McCann: I expect to see more requests and suggestions for innovation as a result of greater involvement in community planning partnerships. I am glad that the role of the partnerships will be enhanced, as that will give them more structure than might have been there before and will open them up to the community.

However, I agree that certain communities will be more able than others to participate, particularly in an area such as South Lanarkshire, where we have a bit of everything. For example, we have a new town, disadvantaged areas and very rural communities. Communities are quite widespread, and the issue is how we reach them all and give them all—not just those in the central belt such as Rutherglen and Hamilton—the opportunity to participate.

Louise Matheson: I agree with Mr Scott. It is difficult to anticipate anything outside of what we have seen over the past few years, but I expect that there will be more requests, perhaps on completely left-of-field issues that might reap benefits in terms of efficiencies and cost savings and which might provide a better overall deal. However, I also agree with Mr Scott that complexities and conflicts might arise in certain circumstances that will need to be worked through, which will take time and resources.

Kay Gilmour: Public bodies need to go on a journey that is all about a culture of improvement. I am by no manner of means saying that that culture is not there at the moment, but this is a journey and some are further along it than others. If we have a culture of improvement, we do not get anxious if communities, individuals in the community or community groups make suggestions about how to innovate or do things differently and better.

In East Ayrshire, we have public-social partnerships in which the third sector and the public sector—it is the public sector, as the health board and the local authority are involved—are... working together on different ways of delivering services. Of course, that raises questions about strategic commissioning and procurement, but our building blocks are the groups that have developed their own community-led action plans. We are already seeing an indication from those groups, some of which are in very deprived areas in East Ayrshire, that their confidence has increased tenfold; they are comfortable with talking with us—on what I should say is a very level playing field now in some of our communities—and challenging us, and we need to be open to that challenge. However, we would be concerned if a bureaucratic process were to be put in place and if we started to receive a number of repeat requests, because that is where things become resource intensive.

The Convener: I thank everyone for their extremely useful evidence.

The next committee meeting will be held at 9.30 am on Wednesday 5 November in the Mary Fairfax Somerville room. I close the formal part of this meeting.

Meeting closed at 16:37.
Present:

Cameron Buchanan  Mark McDonald
Stuart McMillan    Anne McTaggart
Kevin Stewart (Convener) John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Apologies were received from Alex Rowley.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Anil Gupta, Chief Officer, Communities, and Rhona Welsh, Policy Officer, COSLA;
Jim Gray, Head of Democratic Services, Glasgow City Council;
Andrew Ferguson, Society of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland (SOLAR); Dr Lindsay Neil, Selkirk Regeneration Company;
Ian Welsh, President, Scottish Allotments and Garden Society;
Pete Ritchie, Director, Nourish Scotland;
Roz Corbett, Scotland Development Worker, Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens;
John Hancox, Petitioner PE01433;

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered the evidence received at today’s meeting.
Scottish Parliament

Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Wednesday 5 November 2014

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:34]

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the 27th meeting in 2014 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I ask everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic equipment, as they affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members might consult tablets during the meeting, but that is because our meeting papers are provided in digital format.

Agenda item 1 is a series of oral evidence-taking sessions on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. This morning, we will take evidence from three panels of witnesses, the first of which will give evidence on part 6 of the bill, which relates to common good assets.

First of all, I should point out that there is a change to the published agenda: Councillor Harry McGuigan has given his apologies for not being able to attend. I welcome to the meeting Anil Gupta and Rhona Welsh, community wellbeing policy officers at the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities; Jim Gray, head of democratic services at Glasgow City Council; Andrew Ferguson from the Society of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland; and Dr Lindsay Neil from the Selkirk Regeneration Company.

Good morning. Would any of you like to make some opening remarks?

Anil Gupta (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): I just want briefly to say what I think Councillor McGuigan would have said, had he been here.

COSLA supports the common good element of the bill. Although we recognise that establishing a register of common good properties will create a burden on local authorities, we hope that it will be of only short duration. One issue that it will clearly be up to us to resolve is the extent to which properties that might be assumed to be common good are or are not, and we will be looking for advice on that judgment call from our legal advisers. Moreover, COSLA welcomes the idea that the bill can help to address tricky issues such as the Portobello high school situation, and we are very supportive of SOLAR’s views on the provisions in the bill.

I am not sure whether we have previously done so, but we also want to draw the committee’s attention to the Improvement Service’s 2008 report, which, in its comments on a common good assets register, on funding arrangements and on the particular notion that after a period of time—the suggestion in the report was 50 years—properties that have been seen as common good should be treated as such, might have influenced the bill’s shape.

Dr Lindsay Neil (Selkirk Regeneration Company): I want to pay tribute on the record to Miss Mary Mackenzie of Peebles, who died about two years ago and devoted the latter half of her life to pursuing the common good much along the lines that the bill, I hope, is going to achieve. You have a posthumous word of support from her.

Most of the issues will come out during the questioning, but an important point that arises in, I think, everyone’s submissions is the need to define the ownership of common good. There is a simple way of doing that, which I will not go into unless asked. A second issue is alienability, which also requires to be defined and, again, there is a way of doing that.

Thirdly, local people need to have more input in the administration of common good funds, and I have made a suggestion in that respect.

The fourth thing that I want to cover is that there should be some control over the money that local authorities take out of common good funds for whatever reason—and some of those reasons are quite elaborate.

The Convener: If our witnesses have no other comments, we will move to questions.

What do you believe to be the main problems with the current management of common good assets in Scotland, and will the bill help to solve them? I start with Mr Ferguson.

Andrew Ferguson (Society of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland): As I see it, the main problem is uncertainty about the law. Although the bill is not in any sense all about common good—it is about something much broader than that—it gives an opportunity to clarify that situation.

In our submission, we have focused in particular on the Portobello park situation and the appropriation of common good land for another public use. However—this is where we are in broad agreement with Dr Neil—there are difficulties in defining what is alienable and what is inalienable common good. In fact, it is hard even to say the words, never mind define them. Having those two definitions in the legislation will be important with regard to what councils can do with common good land.

Indeed, a definition of common good land would also be useful. At the moment, the situation relies on lawyers interpreting some very old case law, and it would be far better if we had modern legislation that anyone could read and make a decent stab at understanding.

The Convener: We obviously have lots of different types of common good, and common good accounts are governed by a number of bodies. The Highland Council submission talks about 10 different common good funds. How would you go about defining what is common good, when each of the funds is set up so differently?

Andrew Ferguson: Common good is a local thing; former burghs are often quite small villages, although some go up to city size, and people have particular views on very local issues and particular bits of property. To me, however, defining common good is not terribly difficult. It is generally accepted that common good property was only property that was part of a burgh’s property. The cases that I referred to are fairly clearly now. In particular, the 1944 case of the Magistrates of Banff v Ruthin Castle Ltd defines common good against two exceptions: the first is to do with property acquired using rates money, rather than common good money, for statutory purposes such as housing; and the other is trust property. I would not like to second guess what legislators would put down, but I would have thought that a basic definition would not be too hard to produce. Essentially, all burgh property would become common good unless it fell under those two exceptions.

The Convener: What about property that was gifted and never belonged to a burgh, or property that was bought from common good accounts? On my home turf in Aberdeen, the common good account has bought quite a lot of property so that the rents could be used to boost that account. How do we deal with such situations?

Andrew Ferguson: If property had been held on the common good account or had been acquired and put on the common good account, it would be difficult for a council, even now, to claim that it was not common good. I do not really see that as a difficulty. I suppose that you could expand the definition to talk about the common good account, so that if property had been acquired after the burgh days it would be included in that definition, but I just do not see it being too difficult.

The Convener: I am playing devil’s advocate, because I do not think that there could be a catch-all definition, given the way in which some accounts have been handled. You obviously think differently.

Andrew Ferguson: I am not saying that there would not still be hard cases. I am saying that the hard cases could be tested against a clear set of legislative principles. At the moment, they are tested against sometimes conflicting judgments in a case from the 1940s, and it seems to me that it would be better if there was at least an attempt at definition. I know that in other submissions people have argued that there is a risk that doing that could exclude something that people have always thought was common good, but, with a bit of thought, that need not necessarily be the case.

The Convener: Dr Neil, I return to my original question. What do you think are the main problems with the current management of common good, and will the bill solve those problems?

Dr Neil: The bill should aim to restore to communities their control and influence over what happens to their common good fund. It should also act as a referee in relation to the management by local authorities of common good funds, because we have had experience—and new examples are still cropping up—of failures by local authorities to observe the existing regulations, never mind any change in regulation.

The main thing is to involve local people, because the best guardians of property are its owners. A fine distinction avoided by many people is that the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 did not confer on local authorities the entire ownership of common good funds. It transferred the title, not the beneficial ownership. The beneficial ownership remains with the citizens of the former burgh, and, in the present day and age, they have very little say indeed in what happens to their common good fund.

09:45

The Convener: Anne McTaggart has a supplementary question.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): Dr Neil mentioned the involvement of local people—I fully appreciate your point. How best can we involve local people?

Dr Neil: As I said in my submission, the best thing would be to have the counterweight of an equal number of local volunteers to the number of local authority people appointed to common good working groups, which is the way that most local authorities organise the management of a common good fund on a democratic level, although it is officers who are involved and who generally attend such meetings. If there were an equal number of volunteers, the local authority would not have the option of steamrollering through any changes in a locality’s common good fund.

I would add to that a limited veto power. The phrase that appears in the 1973 act and in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill is “have regard to”. My Queen’s counsel friend, who has taken me by the hand all the way through the business of common good, says that “have regard to” is legally meaningless, because local authorities can have regard to something and simply disregard it. Therefore, some more teeth in that area would be very helpful. I know that the bill says “must have regard to”, but even that is legally questionable.

The words “must” or “will” instead of “have regard to” would apply an imperative.

The Convener: How do you envisage those community representatives being appointed or elected? How would you ensure that they reflected the people’s views?

Dr Neil: Community councils have been mentioned, and they are a good source from which people can be appointed or volunteer.

The Convener: A lot of people who have given evidence to the committee during our consideration of not only this bill but others say that, in many cases, community councils do not reflect the views of the communities that they represent.

Dr Neil: I have another finger up. The other community bodies that have evolved to meet needs in a community—Selkirk Regeneration Company is one such example, although, even in Selkirk, there are others—could put up a candidate to sit on the management committees. Depending on the numbers, they could be approved by the community council. There could be a limited number for the community council itself. For example, there could be one for the community council and two spread around the community. Different people could come in at different times.

The approval thing is a bit of a problem. Can you ask one potential candidate for such a position to approve another potential candidate? A better idea would be to divorce such approval and give it to some arbitrator, if you can.

The Convener: I can see that causing quite a few difficulties, based on evidence that others have given us.

Jim Gray (Glasgow City Council): I endorse my colleague Andrew Ferguson’s submission. In our written submission on the bill, we strongly put forward the view that a statutory definition would be helpful.

Rather than repeat what Andrew Ferguson has said, I will speak in general terms. We are genuinely trying—we are committed to this—to make the common good fund more transparent and accessible to local communities.

In general, I suggest that it would be helpful to have a statutory definition that is more easily explicable to the general public, rather than have to rely on a number of cases from the past and varying interpretations of what those cases mean. Without overstating it, we strongly feel that the opportunity may have been missed to consolidate the existing definitions from case law and put them into statute.

A degree of confusion arises. Before we came into the meeting, I had the benefit of talking to Dr Neil, who knows a great deal more about the common good than I ever will. However, perhaps understandably, the general public are unclear about what common good funds are. There might be a perception—clearly not on the part of Dr Neil, but among some people—that in some way the common good is unique. However, it is clear that local authorities have a number of restrictions on what they can do with certain categories of property, whether that is restrictions on the title, burdens or contractual obligations that restrict use or disposal. Also, as Andrew Ferguson flagged up, the bill does not take us much further forward on the distinction in the common good between alienable and inalienable—I struggle to say those words, too.

In general, we support the idea of opening up and making more transparent the common good. We are already reviewing our policy on it and our existing register of assets. It might be more appropriate to say this in response to a later question, but we think that the policy memorandum and the financial memorandum have somewhat understated the resource implications for local authorities in implementing the provisions. However, we are committed to making more transparent the operation of the common good fund in Glasgow.

The Convener: Who wants to speak for COSLA?

Anil Gupta: As I said, we are in agreement with SOLAR and Mr Gray on the issue. Clarity is probably the biggest issue for us, as well as the potential burdens that arise from putting in place the register.

I want to briefly make the point that, when local government is required to have regard to various provisions and legal duties, it takes them seriously and, more often than not, that is followed up by examples of good practice being shared between members about how best to manage those things.
The Convener: Part 5 of the bill deals with asset transfers. How do you feel about asset transfer requests to common good accounts? How will that play out and what can be done on that?

Andrew Ferguson: That is a good question. As I mentioned earlier, there is really no opposition to the broad sweep of the bill that communities should be more empowered. Clearly, there are situations in which a local authority is not the best-placed body to take forward the future of a particular building—[Interuption.]

The Convener: Can I stop you there for a second, Mr Ferguson? There seems to be a very strange noise in the room. I do not know whether it is affecting broadcasting. Could it be someone’s hearing aid, by any chance? Sorry, Mr Ferguson, but I am worried that it is upsetting broadcasting.

Andrew Ferguson: That is okay—it seems to have stopped now.

The Convener: Yes.

Andrew Ferguson: As I was saying, the bill tries to cover situations in which a local authority is not best placed to be the guardian of a particular asset and a community-based organisation would be better placed. It would be disingenuous to say that that never happens—of course there are such situations; there are shining examples of that. One of the reasons why we want the clarity that we are asking for on common good law is so that, when an asset transfer is proposed, the somewhat byzantine provisions of common good law do not get in the way.

Essentially, it should not matter terribly much whether something is common good. I know that it matters deeply to the community that something is common good, but regardless of whether a particular asset is common good, if the community has a plan for it, why should it not be able to take on that asset without there being blocks standing in the way? At the moment, it is not quite clear from the wording of the bill whether it would be necessary to go to court if there was an inalienable building that everyone agreed would be better looked after by a community organisation. Under the provisions of the 1973 act, in such circumstances—even though everyone was in agreement—it was still necessary to go to court. It is really a matter of stitching common good property into the overall sweep of the bill and linking it to things such as asset transfer.

Dr Neil: I agree with that, except—I am sorry; I have lost my train of thought.

If a local democratic group that assessed whether an asset should be transferred from the common good to another agency agreed that the purpose of the transfer was for the community good, it would probably offer no opposition. By democratising the management of common good at a local level, some asset transfers will be facilitated.

Jim Gray: I endorse the view that we must be careful that we are not inadvertently making it harder for groups to take on community assets, which is a big enough challenge. Groups need a great deal of support to do that, and it can take a lot of time. There is a great deal of capacity building involved, as well as many issues to do with sustainability. I endorse the view that we need to be clear that we would not want any changes to the operation of the common good system to make it harder for such groups to take on common good properties.

I know that the committee is to hear later from the Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens, but at page 50 of the committee’s papers, it touches on the issue in its submission. It mentions the situation whereby the bill could have the perverse outcome of making it harder for groups to take on common good property, for example for use as allotments.

The Convener: Do you wish to comment, Mr Gupta?

Anil Gupta: I have nothing to add to what is in our submission.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): I welcome Mr Ferguson’s request for a clearer definition to be provided in the bill. One of the issues with the transfer of land, whether common good land, which we are concentrating on, or land that is held in trust by a local authority for a community, relates to the role of the keeper of the registers of Scotland. SOLAR’s submission indicates that the keeper will not give title to such land. What can we do in the bill to ensure that, when there is a transfer of a common good asset or an asset that is held in trust by a local authority to a community organisation, that will be recognised in the land title deeds? For many communities, ownership of the land is a requirement if they are to attract funding. If communities cannot get titles that demonstrate their ownership, some of the funding that they wish to apply for might not be forthcoming.

Andrew Ferguson: Thank you for picking up on that point.

There appears to have been a difficulty recently with the keeper accepting applications for registration. It was another local authority that was involved, so I am not completely conversant with the difficulty, but the keeper seemed to take the position that some sort of proof of court authority was needed if it was inalienable common good land. I suppose that the solution lies in the bill providing definitions of what is alienable and what is inalienable so that the position is quite clear.
If the acquisition had been carried out under the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, that would give the keeper a little bit of extra comfort that it had been done properly and that he could record the circumstances clearly in the land certificate. The clarity of definition that we are asking for would help that situation and help the keeper to be able to give the land certificate that a community body would need.

I do not know whether Mr Gray has anything to add to that.

10:00

Jim Gray: I do not have anything to add on the technical aspect, but it occurs to me that we could have a potentially anomalous situation.

I am currently involved in a long-running piece of work that is to do with transferring a major facility in Glasgow into community management. We will have a service agreement with the voluntary organisation. Where there is a transfer of ownership, if we are staying true to the spirit of the common good, do we need a device to ensure that the common good, or the community as a whole, has safeguards built in if something happened to the group to which the asset has been transferred? The group could, unfortunately, go out of business or fail to deliver. There is an issue quite apart from the legal issue. In what way can we safeguard the longer-term community interest? Obviously, we would need to think about that and look at various agreements that we could enter into with the transferee.

The Convener: Let us go to alienable and inalienable rights. Many folks—our thousands of viewers at home—will find it very difficult to understand what those are. How do we explain them to folks? How do we ensure that the definitions of those things that you want are right?

Andrew Ferguson: You are absolutely right. Explaining those things to anybody who is not deeply steeped in common good traditions is slightly difficult.

Essentially, not all common good property can be sold. That has always been the case. Historically, the courts have held that there has always been a class of common good property that cannot be disposed of. One such class of property is things that were necessary for the administration of the burgh, such as the burgh chambers and the jail. I am going back through historic cases now.

The other main area is where there was a dedication in the title. Philanthropists in the 19th and 20th centuries gave land to towns, but on the condition that it was to be used for ever for the town, usually for a recreational purpose.

A third category relates to the burgh having dedicated an area, usually to recreational purposes. We are usually talking about land in that particular situation.

I appreciate that is quite a long explanation to translate into legislation, but it would not be beyond the wit of the legislators to create a definition. The key issue is that those categories of property could be sold with the consent of the court. Perhaps the question to be asked is whether the right place to make that decision is the sheriff court or the Court of Session, but at least if the case goes before a court, the judge will weigh up the benefits and disbenefits of the sale.

Those properties could be sold under the 1973 act in certain situations. As a result of the Portobello case, in which the local authority wanted to use the common good property for another public purpose, there is now clear case law that says that it could not do that. There is an absolute brick wall against local authorities doing that in any situation other than by taking legislation through the Parliament. One might wonder whether that is the best use of the Parliament’s time.

It would be tricky to define such categories of common good because, certainly in the case of old burgh chambers, for instance, the question whether they are still inalienable changes over time. I do not think that it would be impossible to do that, however. Indeed, it would be helpful to have definitions set down. Rather than having them in a string of 19th and 20th century cases and obscure law books, it would be better to have those set down in legislation that everybody can access on the internet. That would never be a perfect solution, but it would be a better solution than what we have at the moment.

Dr Neil: As regards alienability and non-alienability, a mechanism existed in section 75(3) of the 1973 act, which permitted the Court of Session or a sheriff court to make compensation for anything whose use was proposed to be changed. In other words, if the aim was to build a school in a park, if some other park facility was provided, the court could quite easily decide on the matter. That seems to be a mechanism for transferring something that is inalienable into something that can be used for the public good.

The point about defining alienability and non-alienability was first mentioned in 1937. A report in the Scots Law Times refers to “a Commission appointed to enquire into the state of Municipal Corporations in Scotland” back in 1835. That was the only place where we found a clear definition of what was alienable and what was not alienable. If a definition is included in the bill, that would be a good place to start.
Jim Gray: I do not have a lot to add to that. However, it has occurred to me that, if there is a feeling that it would be too difficult to capture all that in the bill, there might be a case for statutory guidance which, while not being prescriptive, could at least provide examples of what would be regarded as inalienable or alienable, and that could allow for an easier dialogue between local authorities and other interested parties. Where something is alienable, there could be examples of overriding benefit to the community from the land being disposed of, based on case law and good practice.

John Wilson: I wish to follow up on one of the issues that have come out of the evidence from local authorities in particular: the compilation of the register of common good. If there is a difficulty in compiling a register of common good assets, how do we know what assets are held in common good and what criteria are assigned to those assets?

Mr Ferguson made a comment about the philanthropists of the 19th and 20th centuries. The Carnegie Trust gave, purchased and built property for many local authorities in Scotland to provide public libraries, mainly. In the town that I live next to, the public library has been closed and transferred to a new-build facility. The original facility is up for sale. How would the local community determine or find out whether the local authority is entitled to sell that property, if the property was gifted to the people of the burgh of Coatbridge?

Rhona Welsh (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): We have been contacted by a number of members who have recognised that holding a register of common good property is good practice. In fact, it is cited as good practice under Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy guidelines. A lot of local authorities know about the proposed legislation and have started this process already. That is why we have been emphasising today the need for clarity around what is considered to be common good. A number of authorities are currently compiling their registers and are coming up against some of the issues that you raised. At their heart, local authorities are keen to make sure that communities have access to that information. In the process of building the register, they welcome the opportunity to consult community councils and others in the area. They are always open to answering those questions. We have certainly never had any negative feedback on these proposals in the bill.

Jim Gray: On the scale of the task, my colleagues who are working on this tell me that they estimate—I stress the word “estimate”—that Glasgow City Council might have in the region of 20,000 title deeds to look at. I am not commenting on what proportion of those could fall within the common good definition, but if you want to do an exhaustive analysis, you will require to look at them.

We are giving priority to the assets that have been queried in the past or cases where there is a proposal to dispose of or sell the asset—in other words, the parts of the potential register that are most likely to be contentious in the near future. We have run a programme of paid graduate internships, through which we have managed to get some assistance, and we will do the same again next summer.

If we are going to have a meaningful and comprehensive register, that will require a large-scale exercise. It goes back to the issue of having a definitive definition. Once we have the register, we are required to publicise it and community organisations as defined in the legislation will have the right to query some of the entries and to be consulted if and when there is any intention to dispose of assets. I am at risk of repeating myself by saying this, but the more we can improve public knowledge of what is common good, the less likely we are to have unnecessary disputes.

The Convener: From my humble perspective, I think that members of the public out there find it very difficult to believe that all this is not registered anyway. I know what I own. Folks get quite upset at points when they try to find out who owns something and the local authority then spends years trying to find out for them—if it can find out at all. Folks find that quite hard to comprehend. What do you have at the moment by way of a register of Glasgow’s common good assets?

Jim Gray: We have a register, but we regard it as imperfect. We are trying to perfect it and to make it as comprehensive as possible. I understand your point, convener. The problem is that we cannot rewrite history. The fact is that we are the successor body to other local authorities and the register has built up over a long period of time. It is many years since I did conveyancing—and, frankly, I was not very good at it when I did it—but I know that it is not always simple and straightforward, as those who know more about it than I do would confirm. We are where we are. It is regrettable, but the matter is very complex and over years and decades local authorities have perhaps not given it the priority that they might have.

The Convener: On the point about being the successor body, I have to say that I have inherited very few things in my life, but I know what I own.

Dr Neil: I will give you an example of where the local authority is almost blind to the existence of moveable assets. In a Borders town that I will not identify, there is a room full of pictures that say underneath, “Dedicated to the Burgh of” or “Given to the Burgh of”, but the local authority refuses to believe that there are any moveable assets. Its argument is that because it did not receive a list of moveable assets from the previous administration, it has no obligation to continue to keep a list.

10:15

Andrew Ferguson: I was going to make one point, but now I want to make two.

Mr Wilson’s point is very well made. Even if we had a common good register, dividing it into assets that are alienable and those that are non-alienable—I am adopting Dr Neil’s word, because it seems easier to pronounce—would be an extra step and would involve another quite big exercise. At the end of the day, having a statutory definition will allow communities to challenge the local authority and say, “Well, you have said that this is common good, but do you consider it to be alienable or non-alienable?”

Dr Neil has made a good point about moveable common good assets. We have never really inherited a list of such assets and, although in Fife we have made some efforts to create some sort of register, I am quite sure that it is very imperfect. I point out, however, that we have tried to involve the local communities in what we have created.

Coming back to another point that we have made in our submission, I want to give the committee a concrete—or, I should say, wooden—example. With the sale of Lochgelly town house, we now have sitting in storage in Glenrothes a huge table that once belonged to Lochgelly burgh and which was where the members had their meetings. We do not know what to do with it, and I have advised my colleagues that there is nothing that says that we can legally dispose of it. As there seems to be no community use for it at the moment, the situation has become difficult.

The Convener: At this moment in time, then, the table is a liability rather than an asset.

Andrew Ferguson: It is a liability, because all we can do is store it. Obviously, there are lots of other assets such as paintings and so on, but it is a question of what we do with the table now.

The Convener: It sounds like another case where we ask, “Do we legislate to deal with this or does common sense come into play?”

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): I hesitate to ask this question, given that unitary authorities were established 18 years ago and some of them—perhaps all of them—still do not have a comprehensive common good register. However, should we have an expectation of some deadline being set for the completion of such registers? Given that we still do not have common good registers 18 years after unitary authorities came into being, can we afford to sit around and wait for local authorities to get their act together without such a deadline?

Rhona Welsh: A number of local authorities have fed back to us that their main problem is that when they themselves are uncertain whether an asset should be included in the common good fund, they have to take legal advice, which might be that they have to go to court for a determination. Obviously, that takes time and incurs costs, and I am not sure whether it is for us as a member body to indicate what deadline, if any, should be set.

Mark McDonald: I presume that authorities are seeking that advice from their external solicitors. If it were internally sourced legal advice from their own legal departments, would that not give rise to conflicts of interest?

Rhona Welsh: I can think of one particular local authority that has taken external legal advice on the matter, but I cannot speak for all 32.

Jim Gray: Where such a situation arose, we would seek external legal advice; indeed, we have done so. It is, to some extent, a judgment call as to whether we get the opinion of a QC or whether we go to court, but going to court clearly costs more money and takes longer. For that very reason, I can only endorse COSLA’s comments that it is very difficult for us to give a timescale for completing a common good register. I can understand—

The Convener: I want to stop you there, Mr Gray. We are hearing all this talk of seeking external legal advice when in many local authorities there are perfectly good lawyers being paid quite substantial sums. Are we being overly risk averse in dealing with this situation?

Jim Gray: We take that course of action to minimise disputes. Other parties and stakeholders might not agree with the legal advice that we receive from our own solicitors; we will want to create a degree of independence; and such a move stops just short of our going to court. That is the only reason why we would do that, because in general we rely on our own legal advice.

Dr Neil: I suggest that each local authority be written to and asked for its assessment of how long it will take to compile its list of moveable and fixed assets. A judgment could be made after that, perhaps by the minister.

The Convener: That is not a bad idea.

Andrew Ferguson: I do not see why the timescale for producing a common good asset register should not be fairly short. As colleagues have said, most local authorities have a common good asset register of some sort. The first step, in terms of the legislation, is to publish those registers, which will lead to a discussion. There is no doubt that community interests will have local knowledge; I know that because we have been through the process in Fife. That local knowledge will feed in and help to create a robust common good register.

I see no reason why the timescale for initial publication, as proposed by the bill, should not be short. However, getting to the end of having a common good asset register that is absolutely 100 percent accurate is a bit like painting the Forth bridge.

Mark McDonald: I think that you are right that there would be an initial process, but my concern is that if we leave it open ended, it is a licence for heel dragging. Although some local authorities will be further down the road than others, there will be some authorities—picking up from the inferences made by Dr Neil—that are engaged in a process of heel dragging on the issue. Rather than just leaving it up to individual local authorities to get their act together, should there be a co-ordinated approach? Does COSLA have a view on whether there should be co-ordination or should local authorities be left to plough their own furrows?

Rhona Welsh: In general, COSLA’s position would be to ask that local authorities have the local flexibility to deal with the issues as they see fit. I am not sure that taking a co-ordinated one-size-fits-all approach would necessarily solve the problem. I appreciate the point that you have raised.

Mark McDonald: Perhaps I can clarify my point. I am not suggesting that one size fits all; rather, I am suggesting that we can ensure that local authorities are taking the right steps and moving in the right direction, and that no authority is being “allowed” to drag its heels.

The Convener: Dr Neil suggested that local authorities could be approached for timescales. Has COSLA ever approached local authorities and asked them how long it would take them to complete that kind of task?

Anil Gupta: We have not yet done so, but if the minister is to ask local authorities about the timeframes for producing a list of both moveable and non-moveable assets, it would be useful also to ask about the costs attached to developing those registers in given timeframes, because of the points that Mr Gray has already raised.

Stuart McMillan (West Scotland) (SNP): Good morning, panel. I would like clarification on one point.

Mr Gray, in your comments a few moments ago, you used two phrases. The first was, “We are where we are.” I will paraphrase the second phrase; you said that in the past, local authorities have possibly not given common good the attention that it should have received. We should also bear in mind the discussion that we have just had. Given some of the controversy that there has been over the years regarding common good the length and breadth of the country, why have local authorities not grasped this particular thistle to ensure that registers are up to date?

Jim Gray: I am not sure that I am best placed to answer that. I have worked in local authorities twice in my career—latterly, for about six years and for Strathclyde Regional Council in the 1980s. I understand why members may think that I have spent a long time in local authorities, but I have not.

I was responding to the understandable concern or frustration that the convener expressed about why it has taken so long to get clarity about what local authorities own. In that context, I was expressing a personal view that, given the other pressures on local authorities over the decades, they may not in some cases have been definitive in maintaining an absolutely comprehensive register. I presume that they have been more concerned about the individual conveyancing transactions that they have been engaged in. I am purely speculating that, if they had treated that register as a high priority, we would not be where we are.

However, that is not easily undone. Land transfers are complex. Andrew Ferguson has given some examples, and this is not necessarily just about land; it is also about assets. Local authorities have taken on a range of functions over the years involving not just component parts of the local authorities but other organisations that have merged with or demerged from them. A series of complex transactions has taken place. I speculate that the lack of clarity about what is and is not in the common good may well have compounded the problem. However, that is purely a personal view.

Andrew Ferguson: In Fife—I am not really speaking for SOLAR overall here—we have been involved in an exercise of that nature, and it is massively resource intensive. It takes a lot of time to read back through titles, some of which go back to the 1600s or 1700s, and try to make sense of them in the modern-day context. However, it can be done, and I stress again that with community involvement we can often get information about particular properties that local authority officials sitting in a central office may not have. There is also a generational thing, in that many colleagues who maybe had that information in-house have now retired.

The local nature of the work is important. Fife has 26 former burghs within its boundaries, so there are 26 different sets of problems and 26 different communities to engage with. Although, as I say, we have tried to go through that in Fife and I think that we are in the final stages of the work, it has not been without difficulties—of communication and otherwise.

Stuart McMillan: We received a submission from Highland Council, which is not here today, and one of its suggestions regarding consultation with the community is that there should be a requirement to “consult only with Community Councils that represent the inhabitants of the areas to which the Common Good related prior to 16 May 1975.”

Do you have views on that suggestion?

Anil Gupta: We are aware of that view, which relates specifically to Highland Council’s large geography. It would probably also be taken by other local authorities with similarly broad, dispersed populations. To Highland Council, it seems odd that a community council in Wick would have a view about what is going on in Skye.

Anne McTaggart: I have three small questions about the appeals process. As we discussed earlier, the bill requires local authorities to consult community councils and other community bodies about their common good registers. However, there is no appeals mechanism if the community disagrees with the local authority’s decision. Should the bill define an appeals mechanism?

10:30

Andrew Ferguson: Ideally it would, but I struggle to think what a good appeals mechanism would be that did not involve an expensive process and, essentially, paying lawyers to come to a decision. I understand the desire for an appeals process. As we discussed earlier, the bill requires local authorities to consult community councils and other community bodies about their common good registers. However, there is no appeals mechanism if the community disagrees with the local authority’s decision. Should the bill define an appeals mechanism?

Dr Neil: One of Audit Scotland’s functions is to review the local authorities’ management of common good, including their asset registers, on an annual basis, but over the years I have been impressed by the inadequacy of its comments on the compilation of asset registers by various local authorities, particularly in the Borders. Audit Scotland is in a position to judge an appeal, in so far as it is supposedly totally disinterested and arbitrary, but I have had reason to doubt its effectiveness in certain respects.

Jim Gray: I do not have much to add, except to say that I think it would certainly be preferable if we had some form of dispute resolution that did not require our going to the Court of Session, with all the costs and the length of time that that entails.

The Convener: What does COSLA think?

Anil Gupta: COSLA would agree with Mr Gray’s comments.

Anne McTaggart: Could Mr Gray give us an example of good practice in respect of the dispute resolution that he mentioned?

Jim Gray: A variety of alternative dispute resolution methodologies can be explored but, generally speaking and as members will be aware, both parties have to come to an agreement. The question is whether there is provision for an independent person to be appointed, whether there is mediation or whether there is something else.

We would not want a community to feel completely disaffected because of a certain outcome, but there could be economic reasons why a particular piece of land had to be disposed of; for example, jobs or investment could be at risk. We would certainly be looking for speed and certainty. I do not have anything specific to offer, other than to say that we should try to avoid disputes and that any disputes that arise should be resolved without people having to go to court, if that is possible.

Anne McTaggart: And—

The Convener: Could you be quite brief, please?

Anne McTaggart: Yes, convener. This might require just a yes or a no, but do you support the rules that require local authorities to have regard to the views of community councils and bodies when disposing or changing the use of common good property?

The Convener: I ask the witnesses to be very brief.

Dr Neil: I have already said that the phrase “have regard to” does not have a great deal of legal strength. If some phraseology could be used to make it clear that, if the community were consulted, its opinion carried weight, that would smooth out the decision making and avoid conflict. There are conflicts all over the place—lawyers thrive on them.

The Convener: Do any of the lawyers wish to comment?

Andrew Ferguson: I agree with the proposals in the bill.
Anne McTaggart: Thank you. My other question has been answered, convener.

The Convener: I thank the witnesses very much for their evidence, and I suspend the meeting very briefly for a change of witnesses.

10:33

Meeting suspended.

10:37

On resuming—

The Convener: We will now consider part 7 of the bill, on allotments and food-growing strategy.

Before we move to the witnesses, I would like to say that the committee is working hard to engage with as many people as possible on this bill. We launched a short video on the participation aspect of the bill a few weeks ago. I am delighted to say that it has been watched nearly 1,300 times on YouTube and has led to more evidence being received. Later this week, we will launch a second video, on part 7, on allotments and food-growing strategy. We are keen to hear from folks on the provision for food growing, and we will be taking further evidence on the topic at our meeting in Fort William on 24 November. I hope that the video will encourage more people to engage with us on those issues.

In our second panel, I welcome Ian Welsh, president of the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society; Pete Ritchie, director of Nourish Scotland; Roz Corbett, Scotland development worker, the Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens; and John Hancox, who lodged petition PE1433. Would you like to make any brief opening remarks?

Ian Welsh (Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society): Yes. I represent the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society, which represents most of the allotments in Scotland, of which there are currently 8,000. When we carried out a survey in 2007, there were 6,400, which was about 10 per cent of the number left at the end of the war. We are therefore left with a low level of allotment provision. We hope that the new legislation will facilitate turning that situation around.

We have a number of concerns about the bill. It may take up too much time, but I can outline them now if you want.

The Convener: They will come out in questioning.

Pete Ritchie (Nourish Scotland): Nourish Scotland has around 2,000 supporters. It campaigns for a fairer and more sustainable food system in Scotland. We welcome the bill in general terms. We want much greater community participation not just in food growing but in a community food economy, because we think that sustainable food is one of the defining challenges of the 21st century and that communities have to be part of the solution.

John Hancox: I am chair of Scottish Orchards and director of a network of orchards called the commonwealth orchard. We lodged the petition, which was about making land available to people who have not got land, and I am pleased that it has been referred to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. The petition is about far more than just digging holes and planting things. It is very much the essence of what community empowerment is about.

I am interested in the concept of developing a right to grow, which is a little bit akin to the access laws that have been brought in. Basically, land should be made available for growing if it is not being used for anything better. It is the use of assets that is important, rather than ownership. Without going back to what Andrew Ferguson was saying earlier, I think that assets should generally be available for people to use unless there is a good reason why not.

Roz Corbett (Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens): Thank you for the chance to speak today. The Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens has more than 70 members and supports a number of other community gardens that are not members. We welcome the update to the allotments legislation, although we would like to see broader recognition of community gardening and other community growing in legislation. We also welcome the measures for local authorities to prepare food-growing strategies, although we would like a recognition that community growing is about much more than just food and that it has many other impacts and benefits. Following on from what Mr Hancox said, I would also like to say that the meanwhile use of land should be more readily supported for communities.

The Convener: To what extent do you think that the bill will deliver on the Government’s commitment to strategically support allotments and community growing spaces?

Ian Welsh: We have some concerns about whether the bill, as it is framed, will do that. One of our major concerns is that the bill removes any reference to plot size from the legislation, and we would like reference to a standard of 250m² to remain in the legislation. The existing acts progressively reduced down the size of what was defined as an allotment, and the new bill appears to be removing it. A 250m² plot is sufficient for someone to feed a family of four. Plots that are... smaller than that will not have that capability. We feel that that sort of allotment is what defines us a community, so you would be removing the definition of the allotment community by not providing a reference to the standard size.

The Convener: I attended the Scottish older people’s assembly on Friday to talk about the bill, and the discussion focused on certain aspects, including allotments. Some of the folk I spoke to informally said that they could not manage a big allotment any more but that they still wanted to carry on, perhaps with a smaller plot. Do you not think that they should have some rights too?

Ian Welsh: I take your point about flexibility. We want the 250m² there as a reference standard, not as an obligatory standard that has to be applied in all instances. Part of the response that we have had to our concerns about the removal of any reference standards is that, if it appeared that the majority of plots provided through local authorities in future were reducing in size, action could be taken but, if there is no reference standard, what would that action be based on?

We recognise that the number of allotments in Scotland has declined so greatly that many people may have their own definition of an allotment, which may differ from the one that was defined in law, and their own ideas about what it should be capable of doing. We recognise that there is a lack of skill and that people have different time commitments. We recommend that other sizes of allotment, such as half plots or quarter plots, can be provided in agreement with the users and the providers.

10:45

Pete Ritchie: The answer to your question is no, the bill will not address the strategy of ensuring a significant increase in allotments, because we do not yet take the business of food growing seriously enough. We need a much wider cultural change to start addressing that.

We welcome the part of the bill that focuses on outcomes being part of community planning. We want to see an outcome related to food squarely in the middle of the new set of outcomes that are agreed with local authorities post-2016. We would want them to draw on the new, post-2015 United Nations sustainable development goals, which are being published next year and which include the strategic goal to end hunger, improve nutrition and promote sustainable agriculture. Once those UN goals are in place, they will frame a lot of the single outcome agreements.

Once an outcome relating to food is part of the national performance framework, we will see a much greater focus by local authorities on food-growing strategies. The work that Nourish has been doing with others such as the Soil Association on sustainable food cities is moving food up the agenda of our cities.

A strategic approach to supporting allotments and community gardens and, as John Hancox said, using land that is not being used for other purposes will form part of a much more strategic approach by local authorities to promoting local food growing and more sustainable food consumption and reducing food inequalities. We have to see food as part of a much more strategic approach.

We also expect that the new land reform legislation will broaden our approach to looking at the use of land in the public interest and for the common good. Those other things will build on the work of the bill and help create a more strategic approach. However, I do not think that the bill in and of itself will produce a strategic change.

John Hancox: I am very encouraged and pleased by the bill. It has the potential to change the culture in local authorities and institutions such as the Forestry Commission, so that they can use their considerable landholdings and financial clout to enable community engagement and develop growing. The legacy of the bill could be to help transform the amount of food growing that is done locally. I would be very encouraged if that happened, because it is what I have been working towards.

It is important that we do not get too caught up in the issues of land ownership. Although I am very much in favour of increasing allotment provision, I think that it is essential that we allow considerable flexibility, whereby local authorities and other agencies can allow land to be used for a period of time without getting too bogged down in legal hurdles. There ought to be a culture in which people are able to identify bits of ground that are not being used and can then dig holes and get on with it. The essence of community empowerment is that people are able to get on with it. The onus should be put on to local authorities and others to be supportive and to enable that process to happen, rather than to create onerous frameworks that put a lot of responsibilities around public liability on to the local groups, which can be difficult for groups that are not terribly powerfully constituted to deal with.

The Convener: You have said that folks should just be allowed to go and dig holes on land. Does that include private land, as well as public land? How do folk ensure that the land that might have the hole dug in it is fit for growing? Many areas in certain parts of the country are contaminated sites.

John Hancox: There has to be a partnership approach with landowners. That is critical. My petition looks at publicly owned land—health board land, local authority land and so forth—so I am not aiming it at private landowners. That said, quite a number of private landowners were at a meeting yesterday with a farmer who is happy for his land to be used but who is worried that, after he says yes to something, it could get out of control, and he would not be able to change the land use decisions further down the line. That is not true with the particular person I met yesterday but, in general, if we can have an agreement whereby people can use land according to a commonsense arrangement, which can be changed, that could be a very positive thing.

Roz Corbett: There is potential for the bill to support allotments strategically. It could do more, however, towards community gardening and other community growing initiatives. Potentially, more thought needs to be given to strategically addressing the skills and resources of community groups. There is a massive skills gap in horticulture at the moment, and the food-growing strategy seems to be an opportunity to address that at a local authority level.

On the contaminated land issue, several groups and organisations already use their resources to support other groups. The grow your own working group recently launched a contaminated land guide for groups wishing to assess whether their land is contaminated. There could be more support for organisations that are doing that kind of work.

Anne McTaggart: I thank and welcome the panel members. I will stick to the issue of size, although I know that you have just discussed it, convener.

Before that, I make people aware of the visit that I went on with Stuart McMillan. We are very grateful to Ian Welsh and to Judy Wilkinson, who is in the public gallery, for the extensive knowledge that they shared with us on the day when they took us around some allotments in Glasgow.

The biggest item from that day was the size of allotments. I did not meet any allotmenteers—is that a word?

The Convener: Allotment holders, perhaps.

Anne McTaggart: I did not meet any allotment holders who were not concerned about what would happen if the size of allotments was not in the bill, in that local authorities could well take shortcuts and cut sizes. I heard what Mr Welsh said earlier: if people do not have a statutory size to begin with, how can that be cut down and how can it be defined later? I would like to hear a wee bit more about some of those concerns—I certainly heard them on the day of our visit.

Ian Welsh: There were ordinary plot holders on that visit. Some of them are on my site, and they took on their plots relatively recently, within the past five to eight years. Our plots are at least 200m². The square meterage thing is simply the updated metric equivalent of 300 square yards, which was recognised as a suitable size to achieve the aim of feeding a family-size group. Many of the new people who come to our site and look at the plots think that they are big and wonder how they can handle them. Anne McTaggart heard from two people who both said exactly that and have now reached the stage that they do not have enough ground to do all that they want to do, because of the range of produce that they realise they can grow.

That touches on something that was referred to earlier, which is the lack of knowledge and skill out there. The allotment world has shrunk so much that it is not something that features in many people’s experience any longer. When I was a child being carried around, I was taken to the allotment in Glasgow that my parents had looked after during the war. That experience stuck with me and there were many people like that, but now things are changing and people have a different perception of what an allotment might be about as opposed to what it actually is.

One of the other concerns, which is linked to that, is how waiting lists will trigger the creation of plots. The current recommendation is that, when a waiting list in any area reaches 50 per cent of the existing plot provision, the local authority will be required to take action. I think that the most likely action would be simply to take plots when they become available and halve them. That would enable the authority to reduce the waiting list to below the 50 per cent threshold without necessarily creating any new growing land.

We are at a very low ebb. The total number of allotments in the United Kingdom is 300,000, so our increase from 6,400 to 8,000 allotments from 2007 to now is poor by comparison. Things have declined very badly in Scotland. Not only must we protect what we have got, we must create a suitable framework to achieve the things that the others are talking about. The community gardens and the other smaller growing initiatives all have a part to play. That is where people will learn, so there is undoubtedly a value to all that, but there needs to be a mechanism to allow for people who learn and then want more.

Roz Corbett: I agree with Ian Welsh.

Pete Ritchie: We need far more allotments and community gardens in Scotland. My concern is that the bill does not have any levers to require that to happen. The framework of single outcome agreements is the lever that we need. The intentions of the bill are fine, but the lever is not there to enable us to get from 8,000 to 30,000 allotments in the next five or 10 years. As Ian Welsh said, that is where we need to be.

As Roz Corbett says, we need a significant investment in skills, both for allotmenteers and for community growers.

John Hancox: Picking up on the issue of skills, I would say that the best way of increasing the skill base is to work with young people. I have worked with a lot of schools, developing school allotments—to use the term loosely—and school orchards. Working with children is a very good way of working with the whole community, because if children get involved and interested, they drag their parents, grandparents and wider community into it. Providing opportunities for people at a community level to take small steps will lead to bigger steps. I see the number of children in schools throughout Scotland having experience of food growing feeding through to an ever-greater demand for growing spaces further down the line.

The Convener: You say “small steps”, but do you not think that small-size growing might lead to folk moving on—if that is possible—or sticking to that smaller size if that is all that they are fit for doing at that time? I am talking about the flexibility that I mentioned earlier.

John Hancox: I do not want to be controversial, but I think that small-size growing, which can be growing in a square metre, a barrel or in a flower pot on a windowsill, is all great and I would encourage all of it.

11:00

Anne McTaggart: Yes, but the size matters. The concern from the community groups and people that I have met is that, if we do not define the size, local authorities might well take shortcuts and make half and quarter allotments, which would then get them up to the number that they should be at. That is the major concern.

Another point that I took from our visit to allotments was the importance of wellbeing and the community aspect. Roz Corbett touched on that. It is not just about growing and gardening; it is about sharing and caring and about other people’s knowledge and experience. Allotments are hugely family orientated and provide benefits for people’s general health.

Pete Ritchie: I support that. To give some context, all the allotments in Scotland would fit into 200 hectares, which is one small farm’s worth—that is all the allotments that we have in Scotland. We put hundreds of millions of pounds into single farm payments through the common agricultural policy to support farming; we should put more money into providing more hectares for more growers. There should absolutely be flexibility on plot size, but Ian Welsh is right that we need more ground under community cultivation, whether that is allotments or community gardens.

There is 300 hectares of derelict land in Edinburgh alone, and that is before we get to parks, golf courses and back gardens. Less ground is being used for allotments in Scotland than there is derelict land in Edinburgh. We need to acknowledge the scale of that. The bill, or the follow-up to it, needs to be much more assertive and say that we just need more ground being grown on.

John Hancox: I will touch on a similar point, which is that, in Glasgow, there is around 3,000 hectares of vacant and derelict land. There are vast areas of what is known in the trade as green desert—great areas of grass where nothing happens. I have done a bit of work with a local food operation on the south side of Glasgow called Locavore, which has a pig on a bit of ground. It is worth mentioning that there should be flexibility and that chickens, goats and pigs should be included in the discussion—it is not all about fruit trees or vegetables. People like growing food in all shapes and forms.

Roz Corbett: On the size of allotment plots, currently, if a person feels that they cannot manage an allotment, they can share it with someone else they know, or they can talk to the allotments officer and take someone on. That should not mean that the size of the plot is watered down, because the standard size should be maintained. There needs to be provision for allotments of that size. Community gardens play a role in making available smaller spaces for people to grow and for people to meet local community members. Community gardens should be seen not as an alternative to allotments but as complementing them in that sense.

Ian Welsh: I am glad that other panel members have cited issues to do with land. When I first became involved in the issue at this level, I was a volunteer mentor for the allotments regeneration initiative, which was a project managed by the Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens. That involved me following up on contacts that had been made by groups or sometimes individuals—it often started with individuals—throughout Scotland who wanted an allotment.

I have quoted some figures from the survey that we did in 2007. More than half of those allotments were in our four main cities, and the rest—fewer than 3,000 of the 6,500—were scattered across the rest of Scotland. They are still there. No one wanted the land for anything else in the years since the war, so they remained there. The land has not always been of the best quality or in the best location, which is probably why no one wanted it for anything else.

The issue then became that groups were competing with whoever had an interest in the land and saw its potential for building and private housing development. That interest has receded, but there obviously will, in the years ahead, be a need for social housing. I certainly would not want to argue the case for depriving people of that housing, but there is a misperception of the amount of land that is involved in allotments.

If we were to add another 40,000 allotments to what we currently have, it would take 1,000 hectares of land to provide the standard size of 250m². It is difficult to envisage 1,000 hectares. The area that is defined by the red line in the map that I am holding up, which lies between the roads, is approximately 3.2km by 3.2km, which is 1,000 hectares. It is the greater Holyrood park area, which we are sitting on the edge of.

In other words, the amount of land that would be needed to provide 40,000 allotments throughout Scotland would be no more than that.

Stuart McMillan: Good morning, panel. As Anne McTaggart said, I was on the visit in Glasgow. As someone who had no knowledge of allotments beforehand, I took a lot from the day, and I thank the people who were there.

I have a few questions. I know that there are waiting lists for people who want to have an allotment. Is there enough demand to reach the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society’s suggested target of 50,000 plots in 10 years’ time?

Ian Welsh: That would be our aim—

The Convener: Mr Welsh, I ask you to wait to be called, please.

Ian Welsh: Sorry—I beg your pardon.

The Convener: Ms Corbett can go first.

Roz Corbett: Mr Welsh probably has better statistics on allotment waiting lists. From my community gardening experience, a lot of the people who come to community gardens do not bother to put their names on waiting lists, because they perceive that they will not get an allotment in the next 10 years. The accuracy of waiting lists at present is probably questionable, but I imagine that the demand is more than the lists would suggest.

John Hancox: Allotments are partly about provision and partly about demand. I work with a lot of people who are interested in community food growing. One example would be students who are in Edinburgh or Glasgow for a three-year period. They are not particularly interested in taking on a plot, but they are interested in doing some practical work for the time in which they are resident in the city. They can get involved and do some useful work, with the understanding that they will be moving on at some point.

I have an allotment, and I have experience of the issues. Allotments tend to be more appropriate for people who are quite settled and who want to develop their allotment and grow food for a reasonable length of time. There is a need for provision for people who arrive in town and want to just get on with things rather than putting their name on a waiting list in the expectation that they will still be living in Glasgow in five years’ time. An awful lot of people do not live like that. They are in town for a period of time and they want to do the work, but they accept that they will be moving on.

There is also a demographic issue here. A lot of the allotment people are a bit older and quite a lot of the community garden people are a bit younger. There is a throughput whereby the people who have experience of community gardens often want to get an allotment eventually. A range of provision is needed.

Pete Ritchie: There is a demand, and I do not think it is all pent up and contained within allotment waiting lists. I just want to share some vignettes. First, there is Tom Kirby’s work with the Granton community gardeners. He set up two or three community gardens in Granton in a short space of time and brought lots of people in who were new to gardening, who never had their name on an allotment waiting list but who have now become involved in community growing. The second is our farm at home out near Penicuik. About 40 households in a very sparsely populated area, where we thought that everybody already had gardens, have taken plots on the farm. We also teach teachers. We have teachers from Edinburgh schools on a course with us at the moment. They are all involved in community growing and school growing activities. As John Hancox said, if those kids have that experience, they will be looking to grow more when they grow up.

We should not focus our allotments policy on the existence of waiting lists. We should have a clear public policy that we want to see more people growing more of their own food. It is part of community empowerment and part of a resilient food strategy. It should be a public policy objective to increase allotments, not simply to ask whether there is pent-up public demand. We should encourage demand for allotments and support it through growing skills and, as John Hancox said, through taking an open approach to people getting access to growing space when they want it, rather than telling people that if they wait five years, they might get something.
Ian Welsh: I agree with everything that the other panel members said. The statistics show that there are currently about 4,500 people on waiting lists in our four main cities. The other groups out in rural areas tend to be self-starting—people have empowered themselves, if you like. More than 100 such groups have emerged since about 2005. About half of them have managed to get new allotment sites—hence the reason why the numbers rose—but probably around half are still waiting. On the basis that each of those new sites has averaged about 30 plots, that amounts to another 1,500. That could take the total up to between 14,000 and 15,000. We have the aim of getting back to the numbers that were there after the war, but that has to be demand led.

As others have outlined, the profile of a plot holder has changed. When I took on my plot in 1976, plot holders tended to be people who looked a bit like me. There are many more families and younger people involved now. Some of them move on because of career progression and so they have the allotment for a shorter period than would have happened in the past. However, the change in profile reflects the general interest that a new generation has in growing things.

The Convener: I call Stuart McMillan. Stuart, could you be brief in asking questions—and could panel members be brief in answering them—because a lot of other folk have to come in?

Stuart McMillan: Sure. One of the issues that has been raised today is the availability of land. When I was in Glasgow it was suggested that instead of land banking, whereby land just lies dormant, land that might be used for a specific purpose at some future point could be utilised in the interim. There would be cost implications of that for people who wanted to take on an allotment on that land. Would taking over some of that land for community garden projects. The Grove community garden in Fountainbridge in Edinburgh is an interesting example of that. In the short term, there is a cost benefit argument in terms of maintaining the site, reducing vandalism and so on.

The Convener: I think that that site featured in our video.

Pete Ritchie: We think that the food-growing strategy should include clear provision for traditional allotments, for the use of meanwhile land for community growing, and also for more ambitious larger-scale programmes. There are some very attractive sites, both in Edinburgh and Glasgow, that could be used for larger-scale community growing and we think that part of the food-growing strategy should be about properly run social enterprises growing at scale, not simply community volunteers or people growing for their individual consumption. We think that there should be an emphasis on a community food economy in and around our cities and that food-growing strategies should contribute to developing that.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): What is your solution to the problem of wasteland that you cited in both Edinburgh and Glasgow? I read about guerrilla gardening in somebody’s submission. Is that the answer?

Roz Corbett: It follows up on the previous question. There is a potential to use a lot of derelict and underused land at the moment. In Glasgow, the stalled spaces programme has been quite successful in using such land. Guerrilla gardening is but one type of community gardening that people can do to make use of that kind of land.

Cameron Buchanan: My question is, what would you do with the wasteland? Would you... legislate for the vast acreage of wasteland to be used for allotments?

Roz Corbett: There could be a lot more encouragement in the bill for use of that land. I would not necessarily restrict that to allotments. The land might not be suitable for allotment growing, but a view would have to be taken as part of an assessment of the land.

The Convener: I want to turn Cameron Buchanan’s question around. Legislation may not be the key here. For example, should allotments and garden spaces feature in councils’ local development plans?

Roz Corbett: I will leave that to Ian Welsh.

The Convener: Mr Welsh, you have been pointed to.

Ian Welsh: I say yes. The social housing issue will be important in the coming years because of the situation that many people find themselves in—they will never be able to afford to buy houses at the prices they are now going for. It is important that people get decent affordable housing, but it is equally important that land is set aside for some type of growing activity or whatever type of green space activity that people want.

I would hate to think that it looks as though we want people to be forced to have allotments. We do not. We want the circumstances to exist so that, if someone wants an allotment, they can have one.

Pete Ritchie: There are good examples of growing on derelict contaminated land using raised beds, such as in Fairlie. Local authorities need to assess the costs of remediating land. The pace of land remediation has been very slow, mainly because we are trying to pay for it out of the current account. We should look at financial mechanisms to invest in the remediation of land for which the payback would be over 30 or 40 years, as a result of the upgrading of land for social housing, allotments and other purposes. We are a bit stuck at the moment. A lot of derelict land is not being remediated because there is no financial mechanism to make it worth while. Although that is perhaps outwith the scope of the bill, it is an area that we need to look at.

John Hancox: I have two comments. First, I love guerrilla gardening. Anything that makes gardening sexy and attractive to young people is great. Guerrilla gardening has a frisson, because you go out in the middle of the night and plant things.

More seriously, there is a lot of good-quality land that is not derelict and which is the legacy of Victorian times. Victorian parks were laid out only with amenity trees. When the Victorians laid out parks, they deliberately planted things that were not productive—the exotics of the time. It is worth considering getting food growing back into mainstream open spaces. Access to bits of ground in parks should perhaps be part of the bill’s considerations. We basically want open space to reflect what the populace wants, and people love picking apples off trees. We can as easily plant productive trees—nuts, fruit or whatever—as we can any kind of amenity tree. Such trees would produce food at the same time as having an amenity value.

John Wilson: Good morning. I will be slightly controversial and ask whether allotments should be used only for food production. A number of allotment holders—particularly the ones who are associated with the horticultural shows around Scotland—also grow plants such as dahlias and chrysanthemums. I am concerned that we could end up with rules and regulations that say that, when additional allotments are allocated, they can be used only to produce food for consumption by allotment holders or the community. Are there any views?

Roz Corbett: To encourage biodiversity in a garden, good organic gardening principles include planting other things and not strictly plants that produce food. That should be encouraged.

John Hancox: I take a very liberal view of these things. As long as people are planting things and enjoying doing it, and as long as they are getting exercise and the community and health benefits, what they are growing does not matter that much. I have an enthusiasm for fruit but I am tolerant of people’s enthusiasm for flowers.

Pete Ritchie: The bill gives local authorities responsibility for regulation of those issues.

Ian Welsh: I suppose that I should own up, in that the site that I am on is an independent one, and growing flowers has always been part of it. Indeed, when I took my plot on in 1976, there was a significant number of chrysanthemum and dahlia growers. Unfortunately, that has declined a bit.

The trend among most people newly coming in seems to be to grow fruit and vegetables, but our site rules do not prohibit the growing of flowers, and I do not see why any site regulations should be so restrictive as to not let people grow flowers. They are perhaps just a bit more expensive to grow than vegetables, depending on what someone wants to grow.

John Wilson: It is interesting that Mr Welsh is involved in allotments that are independently owned. One issue for us is community ownership, which is also covered in the bill. Could we create more allotments through communities making bids to take on the ownership of land to turn it into allotments or to produce food? As others have mentioned, there is lots of green space around... towns and villages that is just lying there, and the council comes along once every couple of months and cuts the grass. How would you view communities taking on land for productive use, either for allotments or community food-growing projects?

Pete Ritchie: In general, we welcome growth in community ownership of land full stop, whether it is in the Highlands and Islands or on the outskirts of Edinburgh.

We have to recognise, though, that new financing mechanisms are needed. We point to the success of organisations such as Terre de Liens in France, which issues community shares on a national scale to invest in community-owned land. There are benefits to a national-scale issue, because for any community to raise the hundreds of thousands of pounds that may be involved in purchasing high-value peri-urban land is a big ask and it can distract the community from the real job, which, as John Hancox says, is to use the land productively. If a local authority has maintenance costs for a piece of land, it is unlikely that the community will have lower maintenance costs, so it will need an alternative business plan that generates an income to meet those costs.

We would welcome the extension of community ownership, but we caution that it is not simply a question of raising a few bob, buying a bit of ground and then seeing how it goes. Communities need support to put proper sustainable business plans together if they are going to take on significant bits of land as owners.

Ian Welsh: I am on an independent site, and it has been independent for 50 years.

I see the bill as creating a process by which community takeovers could happen for groups that want to do it. I think that the way to that will be through local authorities, simply because the likely economic circumstances over the foreseeable future will mean that self-managing on sites will become a desirable option. It would provide cost savings to the plot holders and, potentially, to the local authority, depending on how much of the management of the site the group takes on. It is a road to ultimate ownership, which might appeal to some people.

Our main concern with that aspect of the bill is about the kind of legal entities that such bodies would be. There are problems with aspects of the unincorporated association, which is what allotment associations are commonly classed as. We are hoping to see something in the bill that might improve the situation.

The Convener: You have to be very brief, Mr Welsh, because we are really pushed for time now.

Ian Welsh: There is a marked difference between what has been happening in most rural areas and what has been happening, to a much lesser extent, in the post-industrial areas, around Glasgow in particular. That difference will be reflected in many aspects of community empowerment beyond allotments and growing activities.

Roz Corbett: I agree with the previous comments from the panel.

John Hancox: The petition that I put forward was aimed at public bodies—the Forestry Commission, local authorities, housing associations, health boards and so forth. In my non-legal head, that land is already in public ownership. It seems to me that it should be there for people to use, and that issues about transferring land from one body to another are not where the efforts should be focused. To my mind, it should be about making land that is already in public ownership more productive. We need a presumption in favour of people being able to use underused land unless there is any good reason why not, and that should particularly be so when it is in public ownership.

11:30

Mark McDonald: Part of the first question that I was going to ask has been dealt with by John Wilson. It is worth noting that the bill does not just provide for communities to own land. Transfers do not have to be about ownership; they can be about leasing. There is also the opportunity for participation requests, which might deal with some of the concerns around the absence of a duty, which is mentioned in the submissions.

The big question, though, is something that Mr Hancox has touched on. For almost the entirety of this session, we have been talking about local authorities, although Mr Hancox has mentioned other public bodies. The national health service holds large amounts of land, as do universities, and perhaps we should be looking at how such bodies could play their part in providing more land and making it available for allotments, given that it would have an added benefit for some of the work that they are engaged in. What are the panel’s views on that?

The Convener: Maybe you could give us yes or no answers. Should other public bodies be involved as well as local authorities?

Pete Ritchie: Yes, and the Forestry Commission is doing some good work on that.
Ian Welsh: Yes. In fact, that has already happened in some instances.

The Convener: Could you give us an example of where that is happening?

Ian Welsh: In Fort William, some Forestry Commission land has been made available for allotments. It is mainly in the rural areas.

The Convener: We are going to Fort William, so we can find out more about that example.

John Hancox: I definitely agree. There are a lot of different bodies that could make land available. The Crown Estate is an interesting case, as it has a lot of assets, as do health boards and public trusts of one sort or another. My view is that private landowners are often enlightened and can see the benefits of making land available, so I would not want to come across as controversial or coercive, but I would not want them ruled out of the picture. Private landowners may well be amenable to that use of their land.

The Convener: That was a long yes or no answer, Mr Hancox.

John Hancox: I am sorry.

Roz Corbett: We have examples of groups working on NHS land. There is a question about land that remains within Westminster powers, such as land owned by the Ministry of Defence and Network Rail, and how those bodies can support that effort in Scotland.

The Convener: I have one final question that it is important to ask. Is there enough provision in the bill to ensure that folk with a physical impairment can access allotments? Mr Ritchie talked about raised beds at Fairlie. Are we doing enough of that sort of thing to help people with a physical impairment to take part?

Pete Ritchie: My understanding of the equalities legislation is that all public bodies are required within the existing framework to make provision for people with specific needs. As in lots of other areas of local authority policy, I think that authorities would ensure that people whom they support follow similar provisions, but that should certainly be made explicit, if not in the bill then certainly in guidance and implementation advice. People should definitely pay attention to that.

Ian Welsh: We mention in our submission the need to take account of the fact that people suffering from mental health issues or conditions such as Alzheimer’s disease may have their own special needs. I have seen a site in Bristol where the association decided to create allotments that would suit people with disability access issues, but it turned out that there was not a demand for them and they were not used. Identifying a clear demand would have to be part of it.

John Hancox: We have worked with a number of nursing homes, prisons, secure accommodation facilities and secure hospitals. Having some food growing in areas such as prison grounds—

The Convener: That is really outwith the scope of the bill.

John Hancox: I am talking about access. Having stuff close to where people are is highly relevant. Having food growing close to where people live, especially if they are elderly or disabled, is something that should be considered, rather than making people go out and use an allotment site elsewhere.

The Convener: Ms Corbett, do you have anything to add?

Roz Corbett: I have no further comments.

The Convener: I thank all the witnesses for their evidence today. It has been extremely useful.

11:35

Meeting suspended.

11:43

On resuming—

The Convener: Welcome back. I introduce our final panel for this morning. I welcome Douglas Sinclair, chair of the Accounts Commission for Scotland, and Caroline Gardner, Auditor General for Scotland. I understand that this is your second committee of the morning, Ms Gardner.

Caroline Gardner (Audit Scotland): It is indeed.

The Convener: I invite the witnesses to make some opening remarks.

Douglas Sinclair (Accounts Commission): Thank you very much for this opportunity to give evidence in relation to our joint submission to the committee. I will say a few words on behalf of the Auditor General and the Accounts Commission.

We remind the committee of its potential interest in our report, “Community Planning: Turning ambition into actions”, which we will publish on 27 November. We will provide the committee with that report when it is published. It draws on the findings of the five local audits that we have undertaken this year. Of those, audit reports for Glasgow, Falkirk, Moray and West Lothian have already been published, and the one for Orkney will be published tomorrow. We will draw on the findings of those audits in the evidence that we give today.
Our submission notes that the bill presents opportunities for local communities and public authorities to work differently together to create new models for the delivery of public services. That fits with the core theme that we have consistently touched on in our work, which was articulated in our briefing to the committee last year during its inquiry into public sector reform. We noted the “growing consensus that significant change is needed in the design and delivery of public services” in order to respond to rising demand due to the pressure on resources, demographic change and ever-increasing public expectations.

Part of the process of change must include thinking carefully about the important role that communities can play in redesigning—and, in some cases, providing—public services.

As I have already stated, we will provide the committee with more reflections on the progress of community planning through our forthcoming report on community planning. In the meantime, we are happy to take any questions that the committee may have on our submission.

The Convener: Ms Gardner, do you want to add anything?

Caroline Gardner: No. As Douglas Sinclair said, he speaks for both of us on this occasion.

The Convener: We have caught sight of the reports from Glasgow, Falkirk, Moray and West Lothian, which are a mixed bag. Do you think that putting some of the duties on a statutory basis will help to improve community planning?

Douglas Sinclair: It will certainly make it more of a shared enterprise. In placing a parallel duty on all the bodies concerned, along with the council, the bill is saying that community planning is not just the responsibility of the council.

However, there are some issues in relation to the section of the bill that deals with governance. A more appropriate title for section 8 might be “Organisation of community planning”. It says that each partner must contribute the necessary resources by way of money, staff and information to ensure that community planning works effectively, but there does not seem to be anything in the bill that deals with the issue that could arise whereby one of the partners is not contributing effectively towards the local improvement plan. That is quite an important issue. What is the sanction? There will be ministerial guidance, but there do not seem to be any dispute resolution provisions.

That touches on an interesting point about the bill. In the past, the role of the local authority has been to initiate, facilitate and maintain community planning. That is being repealed. That raises an interesting point: what is the future role of the council in community planning? In my view, that role has always been one of facilitation rather than dictation.

If we think about what a local authority does and what distinguishes a local authority, it is not the fact that it provides services, because many other bodies provide services, including in the private and voluntary sectors. It is not distinguished by virtue of its role as a regulator, as there are other regulators, including the Scottish Environment Protection Agency and the Care Inspectorate. What distinguishes local government is its capacity for community leadership, which is a result of its democratic legitimacy.

There needs to be some articulation of what the continuing role of the council might be in community planning. Perhaps it needs to move away from a role that is enshrined in statute towards one that is accepted around the table as being an appropriate one. We need a leader of community planning, not least to resolve some of the disputes that could arise, which I mentioned earlier.

Caroline Gardner: I agree entirely with Douglas Sinclair that the definitions and responsibilities that are set out in the bill are useful improvements. One of the themes that came through from our individual audits of community planning partnerships and from our previous national report is the sense that, where community planning works well, those things help, but where partnerships are struggling, they are probably not the answer. The questions about governance and accountability are important in helping the local community to hold its partnership to account and in helping the Scottish Government to hold partnerships to account for their contribution to national outcomes.

There are no easy answers to those things, because community planning partnerships are not formal, incorporated bodies. That may not provide the best solution, but on the question of what support community planning partnerships might need and what mechanisms might be required to encourage partners that are not taking part or that are not statutory partners to play their full part and to increase transparency, so that local communities and the Government have a clearer picture of what is happening locally and what contribution is being made to the national picture, those seem to be important things that are not apparent in the bill as introduced.

The Convener: Do you think that the bill will be helpful when it comes to sharing best practice and exporting that from one partnership to another? It seems that in some places we do certain things very well, yet, not that far away, we fail dismally when doing the same things.

Douglas Sinclair: As I mentioned, the extent to which the bill makes community planning more of a shared endeavour, so that there is an equality of participation, will hopefully help people to share best practice. I have made the point before that a report on public services in Wales contains the interesting phrase that good practice is a bad traveller.

An interesting point is whether the commission, the Auditor General and, indeed, other scrutiny bodies can do more collectively to identify good practice, perhaps in an annual good practice manual or guide. That would encourage people to move away from the view that if something is not invented in their area, they will not do it. There is a lot to be said for an initiative of that nature. That is one of the things that we are thinking about in terms of the future role that we might play in our work in relation to community planning.

Caroline Gardner: You are right about the challenges of spreading good practice and learning from one another, whether through good practice or by learning from things that have not worked so well and the difficulties involved. That is an area in which the greater transparency that I mentioned earlier might help. Giving a clearer picture of what people are trying to achieve, how they plan to go about it and the linkage between what each of the individual partners is doing could let people follow up with questions about why they are trying that, how it worked in practice and why they may have stopped doing something that did not have the impact that was hoped for.

The Convener: Will the publication of an annual report help with the export of best practice? Will that make the process much more transparent, particularly for members of the public? Is what is envisaged for the annual report enough, or should it be beefed up in any shape or form?

Douglas Sinclair: I would like to think that an annual digest or report—call it what you will—that is signed off by all the scrutiny and inspection bodies would have considerable impact and influence on community planning partners. In addition to that, there is the potential to produce good practice guides. If we consider a community planning partnership in which the exercise of joint leadership is particularly effective, it would be interesting to analyse that in a bit more detail and provide a good practice note that could be disseminated to the other 32 community planning partnerships.

The leadership of CPPs is incredibly complex, as Caroline Gardner has suggested. We are talking about plural accountability: the council is accountable to the local community; the health board is accountable to ministers and, ultimately, the Parliament; the police commander is responsible to the chief constable; and the fire officer is responsible to the chief fire officer. All those people are trying to work together with different accountability arrangements. We have found that it is important to build a relationship of trust that can bring about change because people want to make a difference rather than because of formal accountability mechanisms.

Analysing some community planning partnerships in which the leadership role has been extremely successful and effective, finding out why and sharing that knowledge with other community planning partners would be very useful.

The Convener: At the end of the day, though, everybody is accountable to the public.

Douglas Sinclair: Ultimately, yes.

Caroline Gardner: As we said in our submission, the proposed regular national reports by Scottish ministers on community planning and empowerment would be an important step forward. There are still questions for us about the accountability arrangements for that, what will happen with the reports and to what extent there will be independent scrutiny of them—whether by the Parliament or by us as auditors. It feels to us important to make sure that they are prepared in a fair and balanced way in which people have confidence.

There is a growing sense that integrated reporting is a big theme in the corporate world. The matching of performance on services and outcomes with the finances and other resources that are available lets us get a much stronger picture of what is working well and where there may be choices to be made. I would be keen to see the development of such national reporting happening in tandem with the Government’s developing thinking about the way in which its financial reporting needs to develop under the Scotland Act 2012 and as further powers are devolved in the future to keep both things moving in parallel.

The Convener: Before I bring in colleagues, I will change topic ever so slightly. Our first panel discussed the common good aspects of the bill. In particular, there was a lot of discussion about registers of common good assets. One of the witnesses, Dr Neil, said that there was some inadequacy on the part of Audit Scotland in holding councils to account for the lack of registers in some cases, or the existence of poor registers in others. Do you have any comment on that?

Caroline Gardner: I am happy to comment on that as a former controller of audit, and Douglas Sinclair may well wish to come in. The issue is clearly a contentious one, which has been important for communities throughout Scotland, and for some particular communities, for a long time. Councils have made significant strides in registering common good land, buildings and other assets. Different choices have been made in different parts of Scotland about the priority that should be attached to reconstructing historical records—which, in some instances, are very old and incomplete—rather than the other priorities that councils have to meet.

You will not be surprised to hear that I do not think that Audit Scotland has necessarily been deficient in following that up, but I recognise that there are differences in the quality of the information and that, in some cases, making it complete would be a very expensive and possibly impossible task.

Douglas Sinclair: I would not disagree with any of that. It is a complex issue, which, as Caroline Gardner has indicated, has been one of priorities and finance. I would be interested to see the evidence that Dr Neil has for his view that the Accounts Commission or Audit Scotland has been deficient in relation to the issue.

Cameron Buchanan: I have read your submission, and I notice a bit of criticism in it. It includes phrases such as “a long way to go ... work effectively ... holding Ministers to account for their achievement ... being clearer about the frequency of such reporting”.

The bill appears to be silent on the extent to which the resourcing of the administration of the community planning process should be seen as a partnership task. Could you comment on that? Is that the main point that worries you?

Caroline Gardner: It is not a major worry, but it is one that we felt we should jointly register with the committee. At the moment, the duty to lead community planning clearly sits with local authorities, and our audit evidence shows that it has mainly been councils that have provided the resources required to administer it, to keep partnerships running and to do lots of the background work that is essential for partnerships to be effective.

Our sense is that, if the leadership responsibility is shared more equally, there is a risk that the resource that is needed to underpin the processes of community planning might be less easy to identify and protect, given the budget pressures that face all public bodies as well as the third sector and other partners involved. It is not a major concern for us, but we do not underestimate the importance of getting that support right for effective community planning, and it seems that a risk could arise with the proposed changes in the responsibilities for leadership.

Cameron Buchanan: There seems to be a significant gap when it comes to how such partnerships can work effectively. You commented on that in your “Improving Community Planning in Scotland” report. You did not think that the reporting bit was accurate enough.

12:00

Douglas Sinclair: There is a lot of good will. The difficulty that community planning partnerships have lies in translating that good will into tangible action, because there are so many other priorities to deliver.

Community planning was established in 2003. In a sense, it has taken off and made progress only since the joint statement of ambition between the Scottish Government and COSLA. The ambition is there, but it is not easy for bodies to build relationships of trust, to show willingness to share resources and to recognise that, by working together, they can achieve more. That is complicated by the fact that some bodies have separate targets. For example, health boards have national targets. In a sense, those national targets are their priority, rather than the priorities of the community planning partnerships.

It is a slow but maturing process. As I mentioned, we found that when CPPs have managed to build a relationship of trust, that has led to a willingness to share, to experiment and to find the areas in which they can add demonstrable value by working together. A key priority for CPPs is the agenda of reducing inequality. That does not mean that everything will be on the table when it comes to reducing inequality, but they should make a difference where they can.

The statement of ambition was perhaps overambitious in some areas. For example, it suggested that CPPs should have all the attributes of a governance board. That was perhaps overambitious because, as Caroline Gardener has indicated, they are voluntary partnerships. They depend, to a large extent, on good will and a willingness to work together. Because they are voluntary, it takes time to build up the relationship of trust and good will that adds value and makes a difference in terms of outcomes for communities.

It is a maturing process—progress continues to be made—but because of all the competing priorities and other demands on public bodies, moving community planning from being the Saturday job to a seven-day job will continue to take time.

Mark McDonald: If you were to ask community representatives—we have spoken to community representatives—you would find that there is a perception that community planning is too often something that is done to communities rather than with communities. They would probably identify a disconnect between the community planning process and the turning of what priorities the process comes up with into deliverable outcomes—the delivery of what has been discussed. From your work, do you see that that is just a perception, or is there a fair chunk of reality in it? How might the bill address such concerns?

Douglas Sinclair: We have found in our audits some good examples of CPPs listening much more effectively and engaging with communities. For example, in Falkirk there was a redesign of social work services in Bo’ness and Blackness to allow older people to live in their homes for longer. In an interesting piece of work called empowering communities, Orkney Islands Council is consulting communities about the potential transfer to the communities of responsibilities for running minor services.

It is fair to say that although CPPs are getting better at consultation and participation, there is still a way to go with the transfer of power to communities. One point that the Accounts Commission regularly makes in our overview reports is that councils should make better use of options appraisals in order to identify the best way to deliver services. That must include the possibility of transferring a service to communities.

One problem is that communities are not homogeneous. Community planning implies a single community, but in any area there are different interests. It is not easy for a CPP to balance those interests.

There is a need for CPPs to consult together rather than separately and there is a best-value issue in respect of how CPPs engage with communities. Too often in the past they have tended to consult separately rather than collectively. There may be a case for both—if a council wants to consult on a school closure, that is a matter for the council—but where there are opportunities to consult together, there is scope for CPPs to do that better.

Caroline Gardner: I agree entirely. We have seen more consultation: public bodies and partnerships are getting better at consulting. We are not seeing much of a shift towards making communities and people partners in deciding what the priorities are or in redesigning services and delivering them. I believe that the real sense of participation and the true sense of empowerment will become much more important.

The convener referred to my meeting with the Public Audit Committee, at which we spent some time talking about the choices that we need to make between short-term targets in the health service and social care versus the longer-term changes that are needed to meet the 2020 vision for an ageing population. We cannot do that to people; everyone must have the chance to take part in the conversation about the relative priorities of shorter waiting times versus the longer-term priorities of services that are based near people’s homes and which help all of us to live longer and healthier lives at home.

That sense of the conversation with people being at the heart of resolving the challenges around prevention-type finances and growing inequalities is more important than it has ever been.

Douglas Sinclair: The bill is focused very much on community empowerment. There is a debate to be had on the point that the Christie commission made about the need for services to be designed around not just communities but individuals, because the individual interest is not necessarily the same as the community interest. A patient’s relationship with the health service is quite different from the community’s relationship with it. An interesting question is whether we can empower communities without first empowering individuals.

Mark McDonald: That is an interesting question, which will probably come up in our deliberations.

You raised the point that local authorities are perhaps being given the burden of taking forward community planning in many places. Are there many places where public sector organisations or community planning partners are not pulling their weight, or does the situation vary from area to area?

Douglas Sinclair: The situation varies from area to area. I would not like to call community planning a burden—as I tried to express earlier, community leadership is arguably the most important role for local government.

As I have said, there is a way to go on getting a joint commitment, but the bill may well help that process in placing a parallel duty with regard to the contribution that is made through resources, staff and information in order to fulfil the local improvement plan. It will be interesting to see how that works in practice—I think that it will be an interesting issue for Audit Scotland, the Accounts Commission and the Auditor General to keep an eye on in order to see how well the duty is implemented and what the difficulties are in that regard.

As Caroline Gardner indicated, the resource in supporting community planning has, to date, come largely from local authorities. It will be interesting to see whether other partners are prepared to put their money on the table to help to bring that about.
Community planning will not just happen—it needs a dedicated resource to make it work and to implement the decisions of the community planning board. If the board wants to deliver a joint initiative, it needs somebody to ensure that that is managed and delivered, and that the results are reported back.

Caroline Gardner: We were trying to convey the point that, at present, councils formally have that leadership role, and the broadening of responsibility to include the other partners and make community planning more of a shared endeavour is welcomed by local authorities as well as by others.

In practical terms, we see variation across Scotland. That is partly to do with local circumstances but—as Douglas Sinclair mentioned earlier—we see the effect of having different accountability regimes and performance targets for other partners. That is the case in particular with the health service, where there is a strong and understandable focus on the HEAT—health improvement, efficiency and governance, access and treatment—targets for each individual health board, which may be more or less consistent with the priorities of the community planning partnership and other public bodies that are involved and engaged to different degrees in setting the local priorities.

The shared endeavour will help, but the point that we have previously made with regard to aligning the Scottish Government’s policies to make them as consistent as they can be on the ground is also important.

Mark McDonald: I have one final brief question. I appreciate that “burden” may have been the wrong term to use. I did not mean it in the sense that was perhaps picked up.

Do you think that community planning partnerships are as accessible as they could be for our most deprived communities? Do they focus enough on prioritising investment, resources and services for communities that are most in need, rather than on communities that have the loudest voices? Those are not always the same communities.

Douglas Sinclair: That is a very fair question. Looking at the definition of community empowerment, we can say that we know it when we see it. First, however, we need to build the confidence and the skills of communities to enable them to tackle the council and the health board. There is a huge resource issue in making that happen.

The other side of the equation is the need to ensure that public bodies increase their openness and their culture of listening, that they respond to their users and that they aim to think of other ways to deliver services. Again, that is a big culture change and a big resource issue. The danger is that sufficient resources are not being devoted to that, which comes back to the point that the articulate middle class, rather than the communities that are most in need, will make further progress.

We have been encouraged by the fact that a number of community planning partnerships see reducing inequalities as their number 1 priority. There is a lot to be said about that, and an argument to be made that it is a very important role for community planning partnerships to enable them to continue to make a difference.

There is another difficulty in engaging communities with community planning partnerships. The bill mentions the duty on a community planning partnership to “consult ... such ... bodies as it considers appropriate”.

It does not use the word “engage” or refer to the national standards for community engagement. Some of the wording could be tightened up—some local authorities have, to their credit, said that in their evidence to the committee. There is a long way to go.

The Convener: Does Ms Gardner want to come in?

Douglas Sinclair: I will make just one final point, first. We found in all the community planning partnership areas that at local level—sometimes irrespective of the local CPP—there are a lot of good examples of partnership working. We could capture some of that work more effectively as part of our annual digest of partnership working. We could look at how local partners engage with disadvantaged communities and disadvantaged service users. We should not forget those people. That would be really helpful.

Caroline Gardner: It is clearly a perpetual problem that the most deprived communities are the hardest to reach, and the least likely to have the time and resources to speak up and to have access to the support that other groups may have. Community planning partnerships need to be aware of that and work to counter it.

There are some very good examples in that regard, as Douglas Sinclair said. One of the examples in the reports that we have published so far this year comes from Glasgow, in which partnerships have, as part of their priority of reducing the harm that is caused by alcohol, focused on communities in which there are particular problems with alcohol misuse. It is important to build in the support that is needed so that we can understand what is going on in those communities in order to help people to speak up and to participate in the process. That bottom-up approach has a lot of potential.

Stuart McMillan: I was struck by Mr Sinclair’s comments. In addition to the annual digest of good practice, is there potentially a role for the benchmarking tool?

Douglas Sinclair: Yes. That is a good point. It is fair to say that the Accounts Commission has strongly welcomed the work by the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers and COSLA in developing benchmarking for local government. Those bodies are now embarking on a new piece of work to develop benchmarking for community planning partnerships, which is good to see. We would not want that work to be carried out to the detriment of the work that they are doing in councils, which still has a long way to go. However, we strongly welcome the provision of a baseline to enable community planning partnerships to compare their performance with that of others.

John Wilson: Good afternoon. I have a number of questions, but I will focus on two or three. Ms Gardner mentioned in response to Mark McDonald that the communities that are the most difficult to engage have the least resources spent on them. If you are able to identify that as an issue, why are the community planning partnerships, local authorities, health boards and other agencies in the community planning process not applying resources to ensure that we get some of the most deprived communities and individuals to engage in the process?

Caroline Gardner: It is important to say that we have found some great examples of where people are doing that. However, there are not nearly as many as we would like to see or as many as are needed to address the challenges that we are facing. One reason is that such work is hard to do, because it needs to be done over a long period of time and requires investment not only of money, but of time, attention and thought. In many ways, it requires a complete change of mindset among the people who are responsible for public services. It means their letting go of the idea that they know what the problem is or what the right answer is, and instead going out and listening and seeking to understand what is going on.

I mentioned “The Ripple Effect”, which is about alcohol misuse in Glasgow. What is interesting about that is the way in which it seeks to understand what is causing the problem, rather than jumping to an answer. That can feel as if it is time consuming, and it can be hard for professionals who have worked in the area for a long time, particularly at a time when public services’ budgets are under pressure for all sorts of reasons.

One of the tricks to turning that on its head is to recognise that to carry on as we are will keep on throwing up the problems that exist now, with particular communities being excluded from services and the risk that inequality may actually increase as more affluent communities benefit from the initiatives that community planning partnerships and others are undertaking. I do not want to leave you with the impression that it is an easy thing for them to do.

12:15

John Wilson: Prior to local government reorganisation in 1995, Strathclyde Regional Council had a number of community workers in deprived areas around Glasgow and did a lot of good work, but their focus was changed after the reorganisation. We seem to be reinventing the wheel in relation to what we want to do in engaging communities. I leave that comment with you.

Mr Sinclair said something in response to a question from the convener about the accountability of community planning partnerships. Part of the bill is about accountability for what is being delivered in communities. If I picked you up correctly, your comment was that local authorities, as democratically elected bodies, can hold community planning partnerships to account for what they are delivering in their areas. My understanding is that, for the majority of community planning partnerships, the only elected member who sits on the partnership is the leader of the council and that the majority of community planning partnerships have no other elected members sitting on them. How do local authority elected members—I mean the 1,223 local government elected members—hold the community planning partnerships to account for delivery of services in the local authority area if the local authority has the lead role in delivering services?

Douglas Sinclair: I am sorry if I gave the impression that local authorities can hold the community planning partnerships to account. They are participants in community planning. What councils can do is hold to account the performance and contribution of the representatives that they have on community planning partnerships. I am interested in the example that you gave of a community planning partnership on which there is only one elected member. The work that we have undertaken shows that that is not the case in many community planning partnerships. In some cases, there is an argument that the local authority is overrepresented. It is worth making that point.

John Wilson: To clarify, do you mean that more councillors are involved at strategic level with the community planning partnerships, or are you referring to the number of sub-groups that have been established by local authorities? For example, Glasgow has five area partnerships and North Lanarkshire has four or five. The councillors are involved at that level and they feed into the community planning partnership, but they do not actually sit on the strategic partnership.

Douglas Sinclair: My point is that, in the audits that we have done, we have found councillors both at strategic level and at the thematic partnership level. There is a balance to be struck. If you want to engage effectively with all the partners in a common endeavour, although the council has the lead role it should not dominate, or create the perception that it is dominating, by virtue of the size of its membership on the community planning partnership. If it does, there is a danger that the other partners will feel that they are second-class citizens and that they do not have equality of contribution or representation.

I do not think that there is a simple template that can be followed by all of them; there are 32 different community planning partnerships. You will find, for example, not only the chair of the health board sitting on some partnerships, but the chief executive, because he is an executive member of the health board, whereas the chief executive of the council does not have that status and may not be represented on the same basis. It is a complex model of governance—if you can call it that—and many such issues are in the process of being worked through and resolved. However, it is fair to say that some community planning partnerships still have a way to go in understanding the nature of representation and the different roles that people play.

For example, there is a difference between a non-executive member of a health board and a councillor who is an executive; they sit round the table with different roles and different responsibilities in the back-office organisation, yet we expect them to work together in a different way in a CPP. Some of those issues are still to be unpicked and unravelled and worked through.

John Wilson: That is despite 11 years of community planning partnerships.

Caroline Gardner: My sense is that the situation reflects the complexity of the accountability that we are talking about. Douglas Sinclair touched on the fact that CPPs are voluntary partnerships. How we are able to audit them highlights that we can go a long way with those voluntary arrangements, but that there are limits to them.

Between us, we audit all the statutory bodies that make up the partnerships. We can use our audit responsibilities to audit how they work together and to produce reports on them. Where normally my reports would go to the Public Audit Committee, the commission has powers to consider reports from the controller of audit and to engage with councils on the back of those reports. For CPPs, there are no similar powers because CPPs do not have formal status. That need not be an enormous problem when things are going well, in the same way that the non-incorporated status of CPPs is not a problem, but it can leave a gap when there are problems. That is what we have tried to draw out in our submission.

John Wilson: Given that comment about the voluntary nature of CPP engagement by other bodies, would it not be preferable—particularly given the earlier comment about the accountability of some of the agencies for their spend or for the effectiveness of the work that they do in CPP areas—to bring CPPs on to a statutory footing? We could then be quite clear about their role and responsibilities, especially in terms of delivery of services within the CPP areas. Instead of those voluntary arrangements, do they need to be put on a formal footing whereby we bring them on board and say that there is an expectation about delivery of services in line with the identified CPP strategy?

Douglas Sinclair: It is worth making the point that the power has existed since 2003 for a CPP to apply to the Scottish ministers to become an incorporated body—in fact, it is reiterated in the bill—and none of the CPPs has exercised that opportunity. That says something about their appetite to become incorporated bodies, recognising—as Caroline Gardner has indicated—the separate nature of their accountability.

The other point is—

The Convener: Before you go on to the other point, are you aware of any CPP that has discussed in any depth whether it should become an incorporated body?

Douglas Sinclair: Not to my knowledge, convener. I do not know the answer to that.

The second point is that it is interesting that the Scottish Government has decided that health and social care partnerships should be statutory bodies. I think that they will be accountable for about 40 per cent of the Scottish budget and the relationship between the HSCPs and the CPPs is going to be an interesting one. HSCPs will be represented in future on the CPPs, but the nature of the oversight relationship between a CPP and a statutory body—an HSCP—is still to be developed and clarified.

Caroline Gardner: I do not think that putting the partnerships on to a statutory basis is necessarily the answer. There can be strengths in the sorts of voluntary arrangements that are underpinned by the bill provisions that we are seeing. However, as we pointed out in our submission, that arrangement brings with it a gap in accountability between the partnerships and the individual partners. Given the importance that is placed on them in public service reform and in meeting both the challenges in Scottish society and the financial pressures that we are facing for the foreseeable future, those questions about accountability and governance are important ones to work through.

John Wilson: I have one last, quick question. It goes back to your submission. In relation to community asset transfer, you highlighted that “it would be necessary to be clear about what would happen in case of failure by the community to make effective use of the asset.”

Which organisation do you see determining whether a community is making effective use of an asset that has been transferred? What is your evaluation of the use of assets at present by the local authorities that hold them?

Douglas Sinclair: Some criteria will have to be developed to enable evaluation of whether the community body is making effective use of the asset. That might be something for ministers to develop in guidance. If a view is taken, say by a council, that a body is not making appropriate use of an asset, there should be an appeals mechanism whereby the body concerned has a right of appeal so that natural justice is observed.

Caroline Gardner: At the point when the asset is transferred, it will be important to have an agreement between the body that is transferring it and the community organisation that is taking it over about the purposes and how success will be measured. That will provide a basis for some reasonably objective assessment of whether there is failure and, as Douglas Sinclair said, natural justice demands that there be an appeals mechanism linked to that.

Anne McTaggart: Good afternoon, panel. We will forgive you if you think that I should be saying, “Good evening,” as we have been here for a while.

How will the bill assist with the measurement of achievements and value for money by public bodies? Will you incorporate in your answer some of the benchmarking that you mentioned earlier?

Caroline Gardner: We already have the requirement that community planning partnerships produce reports on progress against their single outcome agreements, and we have reported previously that there is room for those to develop further. They should be better based on clear objectives in the first place, with clear milestones for progress on issues that will sometimes take a generation to change—we cannot wait 20 years to see whether we are making a difference to children in the early years. They should also make better use of the data that is available to show some of the linkages in that.

We know that there is scope for improvements at the local level, and some of the same considerations are likely to apply to the proposed regular reports from the Scottish ministers on the national picture. In particular, it is not simple to make linkages between the long-term, high-level outcomes that people are trying to achieve and the actions that they are taking right now—this year and this month—to move towards them, but it seems to us to be really important in helping people to make choices about the best way of improving the life chances of children across Scotland or developing sustainable economic growth.

That seems important to us both because it demonstrates the thinking process about the policy choices that are being made and because it helps people to think about whether progress is meeting expectations and, if not, what should be done to correct that. That would make a real difference to our ability to assess value for money and the overall way in which outcomes are delivered.

Douglas Sinclair: The bill is silent on who the report by the Scottish ministers on the national outcomes will go to. There is a question mark over whether there is a role for the Parliament in holding ministers to account for their performance in relation to the delivery of national outcomes.

Also, the bill leaves it to the Scottish ministers to decide the frequency of reports on national outcomes. Is there a role for the Parliament to determine that? There is an argument that reports should not be too frequent, because we want to allow a reasonable time to see improvements in national outcomes, but they should not be too infrequent either. We should consider what the Parliament’s role is in relation to both the frequency of reports and who they go to.

As we state in our evidence, it is important that the reports on national outcomes do not mask inequalities and that they cover performance in different parts of Scotland, so that the issues, particularly those that relate to deprivation and poverty, are not lost.

Anne McTaggart: Given what Ms Gardner said in her answer, do you believe that there is enough in the bill that links local improvement plans, strategic priorities, partner bodies and single outcome agreements?

Caroline Gardner: I think that we make the point in our submission that those linkages could be clearer. It does not all need to be in the bill. You might want to keep some flexibility as Governments and circumstances change over time, but it is important to make the link between national and local. We have found through our audit work in the past that, particularly at a local level, community planning partnerships are not always clear about the relationship between their local priorities and the national priorities, or about the weight that each should take.

12:30

Anne McTaggart: I have a tiny final question—I thank the convener for his patience.

Should any community planning partners be removed from or added to the current set-up?

Douglas Sinclair: The bill proposes—it is in schedule 1, I think—to add a fair number of additional bodies to the community planning partnership. That raises the issue of the effectiveness of a community planning partnership, given that it is a big body. Community planning partnerships need to think through how they work effectively with an increased membership.

Anne McTaggart: Thank you.

The Convener: I have one final question. We have the bill and the new legislative proposals, but how much of getting this right is down to common sense and a change of culture in organisations rather than legislation?

Douglas Sinclair: That is a very good point. A lot of this is about developing a culture of trust and joint working—that is what community planning is about. Community planning is about the willingness of a community planning partner to give up some of its power to work for the common good. That is a challenge for every public body, because giving up power is not something that comes easily. However, that is what community planning requires, as there needs to be sharing of power, recognition that we are here to provide joined-up services and recognition that solutions to people’s problems are seldom within the gift of one organisation. You are right to put the emphasis on what you call common sense and what I would call a culture of being absolutely focused on the user and on the community.

Caroline Gardner: We have reported repeatedly that where community planning and other forms of partnership work, it tends to be because there is a culture of putting the user at the centre, putting communities at the centre and doing what is needed to get on with it. The question for the bill is how far it can set the conditions for that to happen and put in place mechanisms that will help when things are not working as well as they need to. That is the test that we suggest you apply to it.

The Convener: Thank you very much for your evidence.

12:32

Meeting continued in private until 13:19.
Present:

Cameron Buchanan     Mark McDonald
Stuart McMillan      Anne McTaggart
Alex Rowley          Kevin Stewart (Convener)
John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Bill at Stage 1 from—

Derek Mackay, Minister for Local Government and Planning, Alasdair McKinlay, Head of Community Planning and Community Empowerment Unit, Jean Waddie, Bill Manager, and Dr Amanda Fox, Food and Drink Policy Leader, Scottish Government.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (in private): The Committee considered the evidence received.
Scottish Parliament
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Wednesday 12 November 2014

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:31]

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the 28th meeting in 2014 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. Everyone present is asked to switch off mobile phones and other pieces of electronic equipment as they affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members might consult tablets during the meeting because we provide meeting papers in a digital format.

Agenda item 1 is an oral evidence session on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We have one panel of witnesses giving evidence this morning. I welcome Derek Mackay MSP, the Minister for Local Government and Planning, and from the Scottish Government Alasdair McKinlay, the head of community planning and community empowerment; Jean Waddie, the bill manager; and Dr Amanda Fox, the food and drink policy leader. Would you like to make any opening remarks, minister?

The Minister for Local Government and Planning (Derek Mackay): Yes, thank you, convener. It is helpful that the committee has endeavoured to be proactive in its research and study of the bill. I know that people appreciate that. Just this week, I was in Dumfries and heard about the committee’s visit there. New ways of working are helpful in exploring the potential of the bill.

The bill creates new rights for community bodies and new duties on public authorities, providing a legal framework that will promote and encourage community empowerment and participation. Of course, there are differences between engagement, consultation, participation and community ownership and leadership. The new rights will empower communities through the use and ownership of land and buildings. Strengthened involvement and participation will be very healthy for democracy, too.

The bill cannot come a moment too soon, and people have an appetite to take it forward. It is also timely, given the referendum. We might disagree about what decision we sought from the referendum, but surely it is a further clarion call for action and for people to be empowered and engaged in public services in their communities. I hope that the bill will help to create the conditions in which that enthusiasm and engagement can prosper.

The Convener: Thank you, minister. Would you like to comment on the Finance Committee’s somewhat critical comments about the financial memorandum?

Derek Mackay: Of course. We understand and take very seriously the work of the Finance Committee—and this committee—in looking at the financial assumptions and the provision of best estimates for any piece of legislation. The committee will be well aware that it is difficult to quantify with a cash figure the cost of an empowering piece of legislation because there are so many variables. Those include who might come forward to make an asset transfer request; what the value of the property might be; what value it will be transferred at; how many people are involved and where; how the transfer happens; and the costs involved for each local authority. There is great variability, and I would rather not offer the committee a flawed figure. However, we have been able to showcase in evidence the nature and the wide range across the country of the costs of, for example, asset transfers and other matters.

The Parliament is expected to understand the potential cost of a bill, within which there are checks and balances. Any public authority, in considering the transfer of an asset, would have to consider the economic impact and the wider benefits of that transfer. As I said, we have endeavoured to give the best possible information. On this occasion, I simply agree with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities that the bill will not be overly onerous on public sector finances.

On participation requests and how local authorities engage their communities, because they should be engaging anyway the bill will not add a particularly cumbersome new burden; rather, it will create consistency, remove barriers and strengthen people’s rights. The infrastructure for engagement already exists.

We are not going to make up a figure, as a nicety, for something that we cannot quantify, but we have set out the type of costs that would be involved in an asset transfer.

I am happy to go on if the committee requires me to do so. The position on costs is not the result of a lack of effort or any difficulties with local authorities. Indeed, just yesterday I spoke to the relevant spokesperson about the bill. It is not a matter of conflict; it is simply a matter of our having put on the table the evidence on what the costs may look like. It would not be appropriate to come up with a false figure—that would be misleading and would give communities the false impression that we have set a floor, a ceiling or an arbitrary target. We are not doing that. The bill is about empowerment; it is not an accountancy exercise. We believe that we have fulfilled the requirements placed on us by the Finance Committee, but it is quite right that you are probing me further on what costs may be involved and what ramifications the bill may have.

The Convener: A few years ago, there was great concern about the implementation of freedom of information legislation and how that would affect local authorities financially, but it transpired that the legislation was not as onerous as was originally thought. Was any analysis done when the FOI legislation had been passed to look at those differences? Is something similar likely to happen with participation requests?

Derek Mackay: Although the freedom of information legislation brought about some pressures, that was proportionate and public authorities were able to deny requests that were too costly. That legislation has generated extra costs to the public sector, but the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill is about encouraging best practice. It will focus public servants’ minds in considering how they engage communities in the decisions that they make and, when requests to be involved are made, that involvement will be proportionate. Some may argue that that will be too costly, that the decision makers should be left to get on with it and that they should not engage. However, that is entirely not in the spirit of the legislation, the guidance on good consultation or community planning partnerships, for example—it could remove some of the costs of duplicating the consultation by consulting just once, properly and more effectively.

The question is then about how we engage with communities. If the public sector engaged more collaboratively—through community planning partnerships, for example—it could remove some of the costs of duplicating the consultation by consulting just once, properly and more effectively.

The Convener: That is very useful, and it is good to have your assurance that the situation will be monitored. The list of the assets that have been transferred in Dumfries and Galloway, for example, is quite extensive thus far, and it would be interesting to hear from the local authorities whether some of the assets that have been transferred were really assets or were actually liabilities on their books. I am glad to hear that you will continue to monitor the situation, as will we.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Good morning, minister. The Finance Committee report states that “best estimates have not been ... provided.”

Should there not be some sort of estimate of cost? I heard what you said, but there should be some costing in the financial memorandum. In two paragraphs in its report, the Finance Committee was pretty critical of the lack of estimates.

Derek Mackay: I understand the rules of the Parliament, and I understand the desire of the Finance Committee to have a full understanding of cost. If Mr Buchanan and this committee want me to make up a figure I will do that, but it would be utterly flawed. It would send the wrong message on what the bill is about to provide floor or ceiling targets.

It is fairly easy for local authorities to produce a figure for how much it costs an official to do something—that is quantifiable. What is not quantifiable are the community engagement and empowerment that the bill will release, which groups will come forward to acquire public sector assets and from where those assets will come and at what value. Those things are impossible to predict. We could make up a figure as an accountancy nicety, but it would be utterly misleading because it would be a figure for the sake of having a figure.

We believe that we have provided the best estimates in that we can show that the costs of the bureaucracy arising from the bill can be absorbed. In COSLA’s words, they are not “overly onerous”—and I can tell you, from negotiating with COSLA, that if it thought that those costs were overly onerous it would say so, and if it thought that there were substantial new costs it would state that.

We will continue our negotiations with COSLA, of course. However, we believe that, by setting out what we have set out in relation to current practice, current asset transfers and the type of burdens that would be added to public authorities, we have provided the most reasonable estimate of the cost that we can provide. It is not possible to say that the bill will cost a figure in a range between A and B because we cannot predict what the demand from the community will be, but we will continue to monitor the situation. That is not about a lack of effort; it is about the falseness of providing an arbitrary figure. I would rather not mislead Parliament or the committee by fabricating a figure.

Cameron Buchanan: I do not think that you are being accused of a lack of effort; it is just that the Finance Committee needs some sort of estimate of before-and-after and top-and-bottom costs.

Derek Mackay: I understand why you may wish to have such an estimate. However, if I said that our prediction was that a certain number of groups would come forward at a certain level to engage in transfers to a value of £10 million and that that was the value of assets that communities may want to transfer, it would be a completely false figure because no one knows what will happen.

The bill unlocks the potential locally to have asset transfers, more participation requests and a greater understanding of common good. It is easier to quantify the bureaucracy involved in servicing the machine—the state—and understanding asset registers, but we cannot predict, in all reasonableness, which communities will come forward to acquire what assets at what value.

09:45

Of course, the committee will want to be reassured that the bill will not wipe off the capital assets of the public sector in one fell swoop. That would be incredibly empowering but not particularly affordable. That affordability, that public benefit test and those checks and balances are built into every asset transfer decision as well as the wider considerations of local authorities and, indeed, all public authorities—we are mindful that this goes beyond local councils into all parts of the public sector—to ensure that they deal with requests and make decisions in view of their financial outlook and the assets that they hold.

Again, I say to the committee that if it were to recommend that a figure be produced for its own sake I could do that but it would be utterly false, and I therefore encourage members not to do so. It is not for me to ask you not to do something, but it would be more credible if I provided an analysis of the asset transfers that were happening across the country and how public finances looked as a consequence of the bill and then took any necessary action. That is what we and the public authorities would do anyway. Any figure that we would produce would contain too many variables for it to be credible.

The Convener: As you know, minister, the committee continues to look at things after the event, and I think that we would monitor the situation.

Do you have another question, Cameron?

Cameron Buchanan: I am okay, convener.

The Convener: I want to stick with the financial situation at the moment. Anne, is your question about finance?

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): Yes, convener. It is just a wee supplementary.

The Convener: On you go.

Anne McTaggart: Good morning, minister. I have loads of other questions, but I will ask them later. I have listened to everything that you have said so far, but I seek some reassurance on allotments. Councils are worried about what is contained in the financial memorandum about the requirement to meet the duty to provide additional allotments. What words of wisdom, advice and reassurance can you give them in that respect?

Derek Mackay: I am not sure that I can offer local authorities any words of wisdom, but I can try to offer them some words of reassurance. The bill updates and simplifies what was there before, and the new trigger point with regard to the demand for and provision of allotments contains a reasonableness test—in other words, councils must take all reasonable steps to satisfy demand. We are not talking about some absolute trigger point whereby, when a certain level is reached, allotments must be produced within said time in said place for said people, because that would take away from the flexibility of local authorities to adapt to circumstances. It is about taking all reasonable steps to meet the demand.

We are also being quite flexible in leaving it to local authorities to decide the size and nature of allotments. We are not being too prescriptive. As I have said, much of the bill only simplifies the legislation that was already there. I hope that local authorities will be reassured that the bill will not place a huge new burden on them, but it will certainly move things along more proactive lines.

Anne McTaggart: I welcome those comments, but can you give reassurance to allotmenteers, who are concerned that local government might halve, quarter or otherwise reduce the size of allotments in order to meet its duties and requirements? Some people think that that is fine and only fair dos; in fact, they want that to happen because they want smaller allotments. Would it not be easy for local authorities to halve or quarter the size of allotments to get the figures they need in order to fulfil their duties?

Derek Mackay: That is a fair point. Anne McTaggart is skilfully playing both sides of the same argument to ensure that I get a complete grilling.

The Convener: I also like the word “allotmenteers”. We might use that from now on.

Derek Mackay: Incidentally, those with an interest in allotments should not be confused with the growing lobby. My officials have advised me—for my own protection—that they are two different sets of enthusiasts.

As I have said, Anne McTaggart makes a fair point. However, the spirit of the legislation is that the trigger point encourages a local authority to meet demand, which might simply be for a space to grow things in, not necessarily for an allotment of a set size. We want local authorities to be able to define that for themselves. It would send the wrong message about empowerment and localism if I determined everything centrally in Edinburgh, including the size of an allotment, when, for good reason, local variations might be required in relation to things such as the size and nature of a site or the size of allotment that local people want. People have different needs and demands, and it might be that not everyone would want a full-scale allotment with all the work that goes along with it.

I would like to put a bit of faith in local authorities, which would generally try to meet demand and get the size of allotments and spaces that would be required for communities in view of the circumstances. If established allotments are in place, I do not think that the council would try to reduce the size of them to meet the need, as that would be changing what people had already. The provision will be about new sites. My experience over the past few years, not just as a minister but as a constituency member and, before that, as a ward councillor, is that some people will want a full-scale allotment on which to do a variety of things and other people will just want some space in which to grow some basic vegetables. People’s needs are different. If councils did go down the road of being so minimalist and meagre in their approach—I do not think that they will—we would have powers under the bill to prescribe the size of allotments, if necessary.

Anne McTaggart: Thank you, minister.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): As a keen allotment grower, I would not disagree with what the minister had to say. However, I would say that if we are serious about driving the agenda of people growing food for health, wellbeing and fitness reasons, that will have a resource implication. This part of the questioning is about resources.

East Lothian Council states:

“Local government will incur extra cost as a result of these provisions … and it is not possible to allocate money to these costs from within our budgets without taking it from other activities. We would expect central Government to add to our settlement any money necessary to fulfil the provisions of the Bill.”

I suppose that that is the Finance Committee’s concern. In its submission, Glasgow City Council states that it will be “challenging to meet these costs from existing resources.”

Inverclyde Council, North Ayrshire Council and North Lanarkshire Council all say that they believe that the bill will have significant financial implications.

I get what you say about not being able to quantify the costs, but do you intend to ensure that any costs that come through as a result of the bill will be in the settlement?

Derek Mackay: Yes. It has been custom and practice with this Scottish Government that if we place a new burden on local authorities, we will fund that burden. As Mr Rowley well knows, the figure that we arrive at is a matter of negotiation with COSLA and local government. On-going monitoring will assist us. It has been the case that if, as a consequence of the Government’s work, a burden is imposed on local authorities, we fund that. That is the commitment, bearing in mind of course that the provisions of the bill extend beyond local authorities. Allotments are specific to local authorities, but participation requests, asset transfer requests and the wider duties in community planning extend beyond local authorities, so there will be costs to Government and Government agencies, such as health, police, justice and other departments that have not necessarily had the same exposure to that level of community engagement, or to participation and asset transfer requests.

What we are trying to do is to empower local communities through participation, public ownership and community-led regeneration. There will be a cost to various parts of the public sector. We will continue to discuss that with local authorities. It would be remiss of me not to make the main, general point about finance in Scotland, which is that roughly two thirds of the Government’s block grant goes to health and local government and one third goes to everything else. Within that, the budget will increase in terms of grant support to local authorities from £10.6 billion to £10.8 billion, which is a cash increase. Of course, new responsibilities go along with that, but the budget protection that we have been able to provide to local authorities—proportionate as it is—compares very well with what has happened south of the border.

We see the transfer of assets not as a disposing of liabilities to communities but as something that empowers them. That will come at a price, and we will continue to discuss with local authorities and all parts of the public sector how it may affect them.

Alex Rowley: From the evidence that the committee has taken and the evidence from my area, the loss of capital assets is not the issue. In Fife, where the new administration has been doing a major review for the past two and a half years, the council has been quite happy for community organisations to take over buildings. It is actually trying to get rid of a load of buildings and to pull services together in one building. For example, in my constituency, three or four council buildings are being pulled into one and a new community centre is being built as a result. A lot of that has been successful—in Wellwood, for example, the local churches have taken over a building and are running it as a community facility. That is being encouraged. However, what has come up in the context of the bill is the issue of allotments, for which resourcing is needed if a serious strategy is to be rolled out.

Another issue that has come up continually in the evidence that we have taken is the capacity that exists in communities. We say that the purpose of the bill is to empower communities, but when we look at areas of high social deprivation, often the capacity is not there. One exception is Dundee, where we have heard that some excellent work is being done on community capacity building and community organisation. In many communities, however, concerns are being expressed about whether sufficient capacity exists in those communities, where the support to build capacity will come from and how it will be resourced.

Derek Mackay: Those are all fair points. One of the motivating factors of the bill is revealed by what Mr Rowley says. He describes an asset transfer approach that many local authorities are currently undertaking, some of them quite successfully. That goes to show that allowing the community to have access to buildings that are—let us face it—sometimes underused or unused does not involve a huge financial burden. If a building is sitting empty, 90 per cent of the non-domestic rate is probably being paid, thanks to the changes that I made through the Local Government Finance (Unoccupied Properties etc) (Scotland) Act 2012. If a community group were to take over the building and it received charitable relief, it would probably pay nothing. That is an example of how better use of buildings can sometimes save money.

Mr Rowley said that some authorities are getting rid of a load of buildings. I know what he meant, but that is part of the problem. The local authorities choose what they want to dispose of, instead of the community being able to say, “We could do better with that.” I am sure that I have said in previous evidence that, when I was a council leader, I took the approach that the council and I would decide what was to be transferred and the nature of it, rather than the community being able to request a transfer in a way that was proportionate, fair and reasonable. That is where the bill can make a big difference.

Mr Rowley is right. Co-location is absolutely the way forward in our public service reform agenda. As far as capacity and support are concerned, the billions of pounds that are in the system should be aligned to support that agenda. Community planning partnerships should be made to work to have a full plan for place—that is a requirement at the moment. We must genuinely share out the planning of resources and assets, which requires a recalibration of some of the bureaucratic support that is there now.

On Government funding, even in these times of austerity and financial reduction, we propose an increase in the relevant budgets. I will give some examples. We are recommending an increase from £7.9 million this year to £9.4 million in 2015-16 for the people in communities fund, which is for community-led regeneration work. We have allocated an additional £900,000 over three years to the community ownership support service, which will support people on the ground who are taking on land and buildings and helping to develop their communities.

Specifically on capacity, through a £3 million strengthening communities programme, we will support 150 community-led organisations to build their capacity. That will have a great multiplier effect at local level. On the right to buy and community land ownership, we are increasing the Scottish land fund budget by another £3 million on top of the £6 million for 2015-16 to show that there will be more financial support for community ownership of land. That is just what the Scottish Government is providing as well as the budget increase—admittedly, it is a cash-terms increase—to local authorities. We are also making other public authorities aware of their duties in this regard. That is why we have rewritten the much-read Scottish public finance manual to reflect the nature of community transfers, asset disposal and other priorities.

It is fair to say that we need to expand our communities’ capacity, but we need to make the approach more consistent and to build in legislative provision to tackle inequality. In the guidance, we are very mindful of the inequalities that exist and of the fact that there is not a level playing field. If we legislate for asset transfer without added support, the better-off communities will acquire the better facilities and the less well-off communities will not have the skills, support and professionals to make best use of the legislation. That is why we are tooling up groups that will support the agenda nationally and locally.

However, I agree that we have to ensure that all parts of the public sector consider the bill and, to make it even more powerful, the support that they provide to communities.

10:00

Alex Rowley: I noticed that Lesley Riddoch described the bill as toothless and said that it was a missed opportunity. When we talk about communities, we could be talking about villages, towns or neighbourhoods. Indeed, it has been pointed out in evidence that we could be talking about other sorts of communities.

How far does the bill go in empowering communities? I think that it makes no more than a mention of community councils. In my constituency, three or four community councils are having elections for the first time in some 20 years. Why would people stand for election to a body that has no powers? Are we satisfied that having 32 local authorities is empowering for communities? Should we not be much bolder and consider putting real resources into community councils or similar bodies? Should we not consider something on community plans that communities draw up for the types of services that they can expect?

Is the bill bold enough? Should we not go much further if we are serious about empowering communities to be able to take charge of their services and the environments in which they operate?

Derek Mackay: I disagree absolutely that the bill is toothless. From the evidence that the committee has received and that I have received through, for instance, the reference group, the bill is broadly welcomed. When people are asked specifically whether it will make a difference, the answer is almost universally that it will. I think that it will, but I am not removing the democratic authority of locally elected members who, like the Government and the Parliament, have a mandate.

We could go further in disempowering local authorities and transferring more to communities and we will see whether such amendments are proposed. However, the bill is about swinging the balance of power towards communities. It does that through participation requests, which will empower groups and communities to initiate decisions and consultations that affect them on their terms. It also does it through asset transfers and extending community ownership to urban Scotland and making it more flexible. It does it by introducing compulsion where there is no willing seller of abandoned and neglected land.

There are a range of provisions that will be empowering for local communities, especially given how we have defined communities in the bill. I take heart from the evidence that the committee has received that it will make a difference to people’s lives.

I have said to Opposition spokespeople and the groups with which I have engaged that if they want to toughen up the bill through further amendments and to do things differently, I am all ears. That is why, as the bill has gone on, we have built in a presumption in favour of transfer to the community that was not there at the start. That presumption is very important. We are not changing who gets to make the decisions on, for example, asset transfers, but we are absolutely changing how the decisions are made and where the balance of power lies. We are strengthening the hand of communities by doing that, in terms of participation requests and new rights to initiate that dialogue.

Alex Rowley is right. If we were to design local authorities today, we would not design them to be the way that they are now—I am sorry, Mr Buchanan, but the 32 councils are a consequence of Tory gerrymandering. If we tried to reorder local authorities’ structures at this point, I would be concerned that it would consume our energy and we would end up in boundary disputes and court battles. It would be a bit of a power struggle, with people vying for senior jobs in the new organisations. Instead, we should focus on outcomes, which, in essence, is what the bill and the wider work of Government are trying to do. We have been encouraging people to work across boundaries—geographic, institutional and organisational—to focus on those outcomes, which is why we do not propose any changes to the number of local authorities or their boundaries. However, we expect new ways of working.

That takes me to Alex Rowley’s final point on accountability, on which I agree with him. Community planning partnerships and all parts of the public sector must be accountable through community planning. The committee has heard evidence on the accountability of community planning partnerships, as have I, and Audit Scotland has made statements on the issue—indeed, I met Audit Scotland recently to discuss it. Even if we establish an equal duty to contribute to CPPs, we must still do more about their accountability. There is an issue about who holds CPPs to account other than just the audit agencies. How can communities hold CPPs to account? How can they access that? If Alex Rowley wants to pursue that, I am happy to give consideration to how we can produce a stage 2 amendment to strengthen the accountability of CPPs to their communities. That is a very fair point.

